² The importance of this correction will appear if we compare the alternative explanation of Hommel (AHT 245f.), which produces the following most unnatural and unworthy distich:

'Jackals (דִּמְיָא) shall come from the north

And wild cats (דִּמְיָא) from the coast of Kittim,' where 'jackals' and 'wild cats' are figurative expressions for wild invaders, and Kittim is, Hommel says, 'the familiar term for the Hittites (var. chittim).' See ASSHURIM, EBER.

The Priestly Writer represents Balaam in a much more unfavourable light, Nu. 31816 Josh. 1322 (cp Nu. 256-18). He is a sorcerer, at whose instigation the Midianite women seduced the Israelites into sensual idolatry; and he died in the battle between the Israelites and the Midianites. Jos. (Ant. iv. 66) dwells at great length on the corrupting advice of Balaam, given in the first instance (cp Rev. 214) to Balak, and in Rabbinical literature Balaam is the type of false teachers (Aboth, 519; cp Rev. 1. c.) and sorcerers. BALM (רִיָּח or רִיָּח; ΠΗΤΙΝΗ [PIT. AEF] ΠΙΤΗΝΗ [E once]: cp Ezek. 27:17 AV^{mg}. 'rosin'; Vg. resina 27:17), a valuable product of Palestine, the identification of which has given much trouble. EV's rendering, 'balm,' is an unfortunate inheritance from Coverdale's Bible (see New Eng. Dict. s.v.). Let us look first at the Hebrew name רִיָּח (šōrē). The Arabic darw or *dirw*¹ is identical with it, and since the root means to 'drip' or 'bleed,' the product referred to must be resinous, but it need not be aromatic. From the OT notices we learn that šōrē (EV 'balm') was found abundantly in Gilead, that it was in early times exported thence to Egypt (Gen. 37:25), was sufficiently prized to form an appropriate gift to a lord of that country (Gen. 43:11), was applied as a remedy for violent pain (Jer. 46:11), and was among the chief products of Palestine that were brought into the Tyrian market (Ez. 27:17).

Next, we must point out that the modern commercial name 'balm of Gilead' has, like the botanical specific name Gileadense, no foundation but the hypothesis that the substance so designated is the OT 'šōrē of Gilead'; and that from the earliest times resins and turpentine have been used in medicine, as stimulants and as antiseptics for wounds, and as counter-irritants for pain. The šōrē (EV 'balm') of Jer. 46:11 is clearly a local product in Gilead; its association with mōr (EV 'myrrh') in Gen. 37:25 43:11 proves that it was a valuable article of commerce.

It has been shown elsewhere (BALSAM) that the so-called 'balsam of Mecca,' produced by the Balsamodendron Opobalsamum, is most probably

2. Probably not the 'šōrē of Gilead' but the Hebrew mōr, which EV mistakenly renders 'myrrh' (see BALSAM, MYRRH). Šōrē (EV balm), then, must be something else.

(1) Arabic usage is in favour of the rendering of RV^{mg}. Gen. 37:25 etc., MASTIC—i.e., the resin yielded by the mastic tree, Pistacia Lentiscus.

This tree 'is a native of the Mediterranean shores, and is found in Portugal, Morocco, and the Canaries' (Flückiger and Hanbury's Pharmacogr., 161). According to Tristram (NHB 362), it is extremely common in all the Mediterranean countries, especially on the African coasts and in the Greek islands, where it overruns whole districts for many miles. Tristram states, also, that it is indigenous in all parts of Palestine, though, according to Post (Hastings, BD 236a), it is not now to be found E. of the Jordan. The mastic of commerce is mainly derived from the Isle of Scio. Down to the seventeenth century mastic was an ingredient of many medicines. Unlike most resins, it readily softens with moderate heat, even that of the mouth.

As the Arabic word darw (or dirw) is used mainly of this tree and its products, we are not rash in concluding that a substance of this kind is intended in the biblical passages, though it seems unnecessary to limit רִיָּח šōrē to the resin of P. Lentiscus: it may include the resins of the terebinth (P. Terebinthus) and Aleppo pine (Pinus halepensis; see ASH). The former yields 'Chian turpentine,' which has recently been brought into notice as an alleged remedy for cancer. According to Tristram (op. cit. 400), the terebinth is not now tapped for turpentine in Palestine, 'where the inhabitants seem to be ignorant of its commercial value.' There is abundant evidence of the medicinal use of these resins in antiquity (see Movers, Phön. Alt. iii. 1223).

(2) Balanites aegyptiaca, called zakhūm by the Arabs (Tristram, op. cit. 336), yields an oil 'prepared by the Arabs of Jericho and sold in large quantities to the pilgrims as balm of Gilead.' This, however, was the περσέα of Greek writers, and clearly, therefore, distinguished by them from βάλσαμον or πητίνη. It is merely a modern substitute.

(3) Lastly must be mentioned Lagarde's view that Gr. στύραξ = רִיָּח (šōrē). There is great probability in this identification of the words, for στ- is employed in several instances to transliterate ר (š); but evidence is wanting to connect רִיָּח with the substance στύραξ, which seems to have been called in Hebrew רִיָּחִי (libhnehi). BALNUUS (ΒΑΛΝΥΟC [B], ΒΑΛΝΟΥΟC [A]), 1 Esd. 9:31 = Ezra 10:30. BINNUI, 4.

BALSAM appears in RV^{mg}, once for בַּסָּם bāsām (Cant. 5:1, Ἀρωματα), and twice in rendering the

1. Heb. bāsām. phrase עֲרִיגַת הַבֶּסֶם, arīgath hab-šēm, 'bed of balsam' (Cant. 5:1362, ΦΙΛΑΔΙ ΤΟΥ ΑΡΩΜΑΤΟΣ). RV text and AV have 'spice,' 'bed of spices.' The verb (in Aram. bēsem) signifies to 'have pleasure,' 'be attracted by desire,'¹ and in Heb. the nominal forms² denote enjoyment connected with one particular sense—that of smell. From one or other of the Semitic forms comes Gr. βάλσαμον. Although bāsām and bšēm in the above passages may have the general sense of spice or perfume,³ it is more probable that, like bāsām and βάλσαμον, they denote the balsam tree or plant par excellence. We now know that the proper source of Mecca balsam is Balsamodendron Opobalsamum (see § 4); and a tree of this kind seems to be intended in the passages from ancient writers which are here summarised.

(a) Theophrastus (Hist. Plant. 96) has a long passage about the production of balsam. It is produced, he says, 'in the hollow about Syria' (ἐν τῷ αὐλῶνι τῷ περὶ Συρίαν). This phrase Stackhouse explains from Strabo as meaning Κοιλε-Συρία; but at the present day Balsamodendron Opobalsamum does not grow farther N. than Suākim; it is essentially a tropical plant. Theophrastus, who is so minutely accurate in all his other details (note his happy expression φύλλον δὲ . . . ὁμοίον πηγάνῳ, 'with leaves like rue'), cannot have meant what Stackhouse supposes. It is certain, however, that the term CŒLE-SYRIA [g.v.] in the Greek period had a wider application, and Veslingius (Opobalsami Vindicie, 243) rightly remarks, 'Vallem hic intelligentiam esse Hierichuntis . . . persuademur.' The fruit, Theophrastus continues, resembles the terebinth (turpentine) in size, shape, and colour. The 'tear' is gathered from an excision made with iron at the season when the stems and the upper parts are tinnest (πύλη). The odour is very strong; the twigs also are very sweet-smelling. No wild balsam is met with anywhere. The unmixed juice is sold for twice its weight in silver; even the mixed, which is often met with in Greece, is singularly fragrant.

(b) Strabo (763) is somewhat less full; but there can be no doubt that it is the Mecca balsam plant which he describes as 24 B.C. grown in a παράδεισος at Jericho. He says that it is a shrub-like (θαμνώδης), resembling cypress and terebinth, and sweet-smelling. The juice is obtained by means of incisions in the bark; it is very much like a viscous milk (γλαύχρον γάλακτι) and solidifies when stored in little shells (κογχάρια). He praises its medicinal use, and says that it is produced nowhere else.

Diodorus Siculus (248) mentions 'a certain hollow' in the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea as the habitat of the balsam, 8 B.C. and adds that great revenue is derived from this plant, because it is met with nowhere else in the world, and is of great value to physicians.

Pliny too (HN 12:25) affirms that the balsam plant is confined to Judæa. 'In former times it was cultivated only in two gardens, both of them royal; one of them was no more 70 A.D. than twenty jugera in extent, and the other less. The emperors Vespasian and Titus had this shrub exhibited at Rome; . . . it bears a much stronger resemblance to the vine [i.e., in the stems; here Pliny seems to borrow from Trogus Pompeius] than to the myrtle. The leaf bears a very close resemblance to that of [rue]¹ and it is an evergreen. . . . At the present day it is cultivated by the fiscal authorities, and the plants were never known to be more numerous. They never exceed a couple of cubits in height.'

¹ Curiously enough, Ar. bāsima has the contrary sense of loathing (see Lag. Ubers. 143); but bāsām denotes the balsam tree.

Josephus makes several references to the balsam. He says (Ant. viii. 66) that the first roots of balsam (ὀποβάλσαμον) were 90 A.D. brought to Palestine by the queen of Sheba. To give an idea of the site of Pompey's camp (at Jericho), he says it is where that balsam (ὀποβάλσαμον) which is of all unguents (μύρα) the chief grows, and describes how the juice (ὀρός) is obtained (Ant. xiv. 41). Again, when speaking of the districts around Jericho assigned to Cleopatra, he speaks of the preciousness of this plant, which grows there alone (Ant. xv. 42). Lastly, in a second reference to Pompey, he says that the region of Jericho bears the balsam tree (βάλσαμον), whose stems (πρέμνα) were cut with sharp stones, upon which the juice 'drops down like tears' (Bf i. 66).

Trogus, an author of the time of Augustus, is reproduced by Justin (363). He describes the closely shut-in valley in which 1st cent. A.D. alone the opobalsamum grows; the name of the place is Jericho (Hierichus). 'In that valley is a wood, notable alike for its fertility and its pleasantness, being adorned with a palm grove and opobalsamum. The opobalsamum trees have a form like pine trees (πίκεις), except that they are less tall (magis humiles), and are cultivated after the manner of vineyards. These at a certain time of the year sweat balsam.'

It is remarkable that the Greek and the Roman writers dwell so constantly on the uniqueness of the balsam-tree of Jericho. Some of them, at any rate

3. Balsam in Arabia.

(e.g., Strabo, Pausanias, Diodorus), were not unaware that the plant grew on the coasts of Arabia; and Josephus, in his legendary style, actually attributes to importation from Arabia its presence in Palestine (Ant. viii. 66). No doubt this is substantially correct. Prosper Alpinus (De Balsamo, 1592) and Veslingius (Opobalsami Vindicie, 1643) long ago investigated the subject. In the time of the former, balsam plants were brought to Cairo from Arabia; Alpinus himself (op. cit. 64) apparently possessed a living specimen. The Arabic writer 'Abdallatif (d. 1231) also speaks of the balsam tree as in Egypt at 'Ain Shems ('Fountain of the Sun')—i.e., in the gardens of Maṭariya, close to Heliopolis. It was about a cubit high, and had two barks; the outer red and fine, the inner green and thick. When the latter was macerated in the mouth, it left an oily taste, and an aromatic odour. Incisions were made in the barks, and the amount of balsam oil obtained formed a tenth part of all the liquid collected.² The last balsam tree cultivated in Egypt died in 1615; but two were alive in 1612. This was the only place in Egypt where the balsam tree would grow. We can well understand, therefore, that the neighbourhood of Jericho was the only habitat of the tree in Palestine.

It would, however, be unreasonable to suppose that the needs of the luxurious class in Palestine in pre-Roman times were altogether supplied from Jericho. The precious unguent derived from the balsam tree, not less than the costly frankincense, was doubtless always one of the chief articles brought by Arabian caravans. The tree that produces the so-called 'balsam of Mecca' is the Balsamodendron Opobalsamum. This tree, as Schweinfurth reports,³ 'averages above 15 ft. in height, possesses a yellow papery exfoliating bark, and produces thin, grayish black twigs, from the ends of which a small quantity of balsam exudes.' 'It is widely distributed over the coast territory of Arabia, the adjacent islands, and S. Nubia'; but 'the balsam is collected only in the valleys near Mecca.' It is thus described by Dymock (Pharmacogr. Ind. 1317): 'Balsam of Mecca, when freshly imported into Bombay, is a greenish turbid fluid of syrupy consistence, having a very grateful odour, something like oil of rosemary.' Jewish tradition seems to have held that Mecca balsam is what the OT writers call šōrē—whence the rendering 'balm' of AV and RV (text); but the tradition was impugned long ago by Bochart (Hieroz. i. 251), and does not agree with the use of the Arabic cognate word qarū (mastic; see BALM, 1). Schweinfurth holds that the OT name for Mecca balsam was not šōrē (EV balm, perhaps really mastic; see BALM, 1), nor dōsem (see above, § 1), but mōr (see MYRRH). Certainly mōr was (like Mecca balsam) strongly aromatic and also a liquid substance (Ex. 30²³ Cant. 5⁵ 13), whilst the OT references do not necessarily imply that šōrē was aromatic. It is not unlikely that both dōsem (§ 1) and mōr mean Mecca balsam. (Cp Kew Bulletin for Mar.-Apr. 1896, p. 89.) See MYRRH. N. M.—W. T. T.-D.—T. K. C.

Eus. (OS 101²²) describes it as 'on the Arnon' (like Nahaliel), which must be wrong. See BAMOTH-BAAL.

BAMOTH-BAAL (בָּמוֹת בַּעַל—i.e., 'the high places of Baal') lay in the Moabite territory (see Nu. 22⁴¹, RV; CTHΛH TOY BAAΛ [BAFL]), to the north of the Arnon, and was assigned to Reuben (Josh. 13¹⁷: ΒΑΙΜΩΝ ΒΑΑΛ [B], Bāmōth B. The order of enumeration in Nu. 21¹⁹ f., where it is called simply BAMOTH, leads to the supposition (so Di.) that it must have lain somewhere on or near the Jebel 'Aṭṭāris, on the south side of the Wady Zerkā Ma'in (cp Is. 15²: 'the high places'). Conder (Heth and Moab, 144) and G. A. Smith (HG 562), however, find the Bamoth in the dolmens immediately north of el-Maslūbiyeh, near the Wady Jideid. The Beth Bamoth of the Moabite stone is perhaps the same place (cp BAJITH); but this whole region is thickly strewn with the remains of ancient altars and other religious monuments (Conder, op. cit. 140 ff.). The name Bamoth-baal is suggested also by Nu. 21²⁸, where the בָּמוֹת אֲרֹנִי (EV 'lords of the high places of Arnon'—but see 6) are mentioned in parallelism with Ar of Moab. G. A. S.

6 renders by ἀνάθεμα, ἀνάθημα, ἀναθεματισμένον, and in a few instances ἀπωλεία and other words denoting destruction; ἀναθεματίζειν and more rarely ἀνατιθέναι

1. Terms. once, 1 Esd. 9⁴, ἀνιερών, ἐξολοθρύνειν, and in a few instances other verbs denoting 'kill' or 'destroy.' Vg. has anathema, consecratio, etc.; occido, consumo, consecro, etc. AV translates curse, utterly destroy, accursed thing, etc.; RV, devote, utterly destroy, devoted thing.

The root HRM in Hebrew denotes devoting anything to Yahwè by destroying it: hērem is any person or thing thus devoted. The root is found in a similar sense in all the Semitic languages, of sacred things which men are partly or wholly forbidden to use. It is especially common in Arabic: e.g., the sacred territory of Mecca and Medina is haram, and the harīm (harem) is ground forbidden to all men other than the master and his eunuchs. It may be noted that the exclusive use of the root in the strong sense of devoting by destroying is characteristic of Hebrew (and of the dialect spoken by the Moabites; see §§ 3 f.), and that in other languages hrm bears a meaning more nearly approaching נָקַף (unclean), קָדַשׁ (consecrated).

(a) Idols are hërem in themselves. In Dt. 7²⁵ the Israelites are ordered to burn all heathen idols and not to bring them into their houses. The idols

2. Law of are hërem, and make those who keep them hërem. (b) Public hërem. The Israelites or their rulers are ordered to treat as hërem in certain circumstances, guilty citizens or obnoxious enemies. In Ex. 22¹⁹ [26] (Book of the Covenant, E) any one sacrificing to any deity other than Yahwë is to be made hërem. So in substance Dt. 18⁶⁻¹¹, though the term hërem does not occur till v. 16. In Dt. 13¹³⁻¹⁹ [12-18] any idolatrous Israelite city is to be made hërem: all living things are to be killed and 'all its spoil' is to be burnt. So far, in (a) as in (b), the hërem is something abominable in itself and distasteful to God. Its destruction is a religious duty, and an acceptable service to Yahwë. Similarly, in Dt. 20¹⁶⁻¹⁸ all Canaanite cities are to be made hërem, that they may not seduce Israel to idolatry. In Dt. 20¹⁰⁻¹⁴, if any distant city refuses to surrender when summoned, all the males are to be slain, and all other persons and things may be taken as spoil. The term 'hërem' is not used in that paragraph, and is perhaps not applicable to it. (c) We gather from certain passages that individuals might devote some possession to destruction as a kind of service to Yahwë, and that also is called hërem (see VOW). In a section of P concerning vows, Lev. 27, two verses (28 f.) deal with this individual hërem. Other vows may be redeemed; but individual (like public) hërem must be destroyed—it may not be sold or redeemed: it is most holy (kôdesh kôdâshim) unto Yahwë. Among the objects which an individual may make hërem, men are specially mentioned: they must be put to death. It is startling to find such a provision in one of the latest strata of the Pentateuch. Possibly only criminals could be made hërem; or the text may be fragmentary. Cp Dillmann and Kalisch on Lev. 27²⁸⁻²⁹.

In Josh. 6²⁴ we have a provision that metal hërem (obviously because indestructible) is to be put into the treasury of the sanctuary. By an extension of this principle, Nu. 18¹⁴ (P) and Ez. 44²⁹ ordain that hërem shall be the property of the priests.

Hërem is met with in Hebrew literature in all periods. The sweeping statements that all Canaanite cities E.

3. Practice. are late generalisations; but Nu. 21² (JE) and Judg. 1¹⁷ (J), though otherwise discrepant, agree that the city on whose site Hormah was built was made hërem. Other instances of hërem are Jabesh-gilead (Judg. 21¹⁰ f.), Jericho (rebuilding forbidden under supernatural penalty, Josh. 6²⁶ f.), the Amalekites (1 S. 15), and the children of Ham at Gedor (1 Ch. 4⁴¹). Similar cases—in regard to which, however, the term hërem is not used—are Gibeah and Benjamin (Judg. 20) and Saul's attempt to execute Jonathan (1 S. 14²⁴⁻⁴⁶). On the Moabite stone (L. 16 f.) Mesha' says that he made the whole Israelite populace of Nebo hërem to Ashtarchemosh. The prophets speak of Israel or Yahwë making hërem of enemies (Is. 34² etc.) or of enemies' property (Mic. 4¹³), or, conversely, of the heathen (Jer. 25⁹), or Yahwë (Is. 43²⁸), making hërem of Israel. In the later literature the root hërm often only means exterminate (2 Ch. 20²³). The old meaning, however, was not quite forgotten, and in Ezra 10⁸, if any Jew failed to obey Ezra's summons to Jerusalem, his property was to be made hërem and he himself excommunicated. In post-biblical Hebrew hërem came to mean excommunication as well as property set apart for the priests and the temple (Levy and Jastrow's Dictionaries, s.v.; S. Mandl, Der Bann, '98, pp. 24-51). See, further, EXCOMMUNICATION.

The character of hërem, the diffusion of the root in a similar sense throughout Semitic languages, and its use in the Hebrew sense by the Moabites, show that it was an ancient Semitic institution belonging to Israel in common with its kinsmen. Stade (Gesch. 1.490) holds that a Semitic people besieging a city vowed to make it

4. Origin and hërem to their god in order to secure his aid. Moreover, the idea of hërem—parallels. as the use of the root in allied languages shows—was kindred to that of sanctity and uncleanness. Like these, it was contagious (cp CLEAN, §§ 2, 14): the possessor of hërem became hërem (Dt. 7²⁶ Josh. 6¹⁸; Achan). OT legislation, as we have seen, converts the bribe to a venal deity into a legitimate penalty. The various degrees of severity are not important in relation to the principle.

Hërem has something in common with taboos, especially in its fatal effect on its possessor—e.g., in New Zealand tabooed food is fatal to any one who eats it (Frazer, Golden Bough, vol. ii. 'Taboos');—but it is not so closely allied to taboos as the idea of uncleanness (מטא; WRS, Rel. Sem. (2) 450 ff.). The Arab harim often assimilates to hërem: e.g., clothes used at the circuit of the Ka'aba are harim, and may not be worn or sold. Cp also the Roman ceremony of devotio, by which an enemy was devoted to destruction as an offering to the infernal gods (Preller, Röm. Myth. 124, 466). The instance of Kirrha and the Amphictyonic council, in which the cultivation of land laid under a curse was made the pretext for a holy war, may also be compared with the case of Jericho. W. H. B.

BAPTISM (βαπτισμα, βαπτίζειν). Among the permanent witnesses to the birth of Christianity out of Judaism is the primary institution of the Christian Church, the rite of baptism. With the Jews the bathing of the whole body in pure cold water—if possible, in a running stream—was a recognised means of restoration from a state of ceremonial uncleanness. Passages like Num. 19.11 f., 31.19, also Is. 1.16 Zech. 13.1, and especially Ezek. 36.24 f., may be compared. The pouring of water on the hands—a symbolic representation, perhaps, of baptism in a running stream—was a Pharisaic precaution insisted on before every meal (cp Mk. 7.3 Lk. 11.38). The Gentile, whose whole life had been ceremonially unclean, was required to submit to baptism among other conditions of his reception as a Jewish proselyte (Schürer, Gesch. (2) 2.569 f.; 3rd ed. 3.129). See PROSELYTE, § 5.

The connection between Jewish and Christian baptism is strikingly illustrated by the regulations prescribed for the latter in the Didachē, to be noticed presently; but, the ceremonial baptisms of Judaism, though they lie behind Christian baptism and exert an influence on its history, are not its immediate antecedent. The Jewish baptisms were the outcome of the Jewish distinction between clean and unclean—a distinction which was done away by Christianity (cp WASHINGS). Christian baptism is a purification, not from ceremonial, but from moral impurity. The historical link is found in the baptism of John in the river Jordan. John adapted the familiar ceremony of baptism to a moral purpose: his was 'a baptism of repentance for the remission of sins,' a purification of the nation from that moral uncleanness of which ceremonial uncleanness was properly typical. It was by means of this development of its true significance that baptism was rescued from mere formalism, and prepared to become the initiatory rite of the new Christian society.

As Jesus' work took up John's, and as he himself had chosen to be baptized by John, it was natural that his first preaching of repentance should be coupled, like John's, with a baptism. It is significant, however, that he did not perform the rite himself: only his disciples did so (Jn. 4.1 f.). Christian baptism was not yet instituted; and when it came it was to add a spiritual element which John's baptism lacked. Meanwhile Jesus was indicating by his own action, and by his defence of the action of his disciples, that the frequent Pharisaic baptisms—the ceremonial washing of the hands, and the 'baptisms' of vessels and dishes (Mk. 7.4)—had no permanent claim on the conscience; and certain of his words are directly explained by one of the Evangelists as repealing altogether the ceremonial distinction of clean and unclean, and as 'cleansing all meats' (Mk. 7.19). Only when the whole purport of Jewish baptisms was annulled was the way clear for the institution of the Christian rite, one of the essential principles of which was that it should be performed once for all, with no possibility of repetition.

On the day of Pentecost Peter answers the inquiries of the multitude in words which, whilst they recall the baptism of John, indicate the fuller significance of Christian baptism: 'Repent ye, and be baptized, each one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit' (Acts 2.38). About three thousand were thereupon added by baptism to the original band of believers. It is expressly stated that at Samaria, as the result of Philip's preaching, both men and women were baptized 'in the name of the Lord Jesus'; but the gift of the Holy Spirit did not follow until the arrival of Peter and John from Jerusalem (8.12-17). The eunuch after Philip's instructions asks for baptism; and 'they go down both together into the water' (8.36-38). Saul is baptized by Ananias at Damascus (9.18). When Peter preached to Cornelius and his friends 'the Holy Spirit fell on all that heard the word'; whereupon the apostle 'commanded them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ' (10.44 f.). Special stress is laid on this incident as the first occasion of the baptism of Gentiles as such (10.45 11.18). It was justified by the apostle on the ground of the previous gift of the Holy Spirit, which was the baptism promised by Christ in contradistinction to John's baptism (11.16 f.).

Baptism was thus recognised as the door of admission into the Christian Church for Jews and Gentiles alike; and certain disciples of the Baptist whom Paul found at Ephesus were baptized afresh 'in the name of the Lord Jesus' (19.5). Of Lydia, the purple seller of Thyatira, found by Paul at Philippi, we read that she 'was baptized, and her household' (16.15); and of the Philippian gaoler, that he was baptized, 'he and all his straight-way,'—i.e., in the middle of the night (16.33). At Corinth a few of the earliest converts were baptized by Paul himself—Crispus, Gaius, and the household of Stephanas;—but the apostle's language shows that this was quite exceptional (1 Cor. 12:17). In 1 Cor. 15:29 Paul mentions a custom, apparently prevailing in Corinth, of vicarious baptism in behalf of the dead. He neither commends nor rebukes it, and it would seem to have soon died out.¹

The earliest notice of the method of baptism is perhaps that which is found in the Didaché, and, as we have already said, it illustrates the recognition of a connection between the Jewish and the Christian baptisms. The Didaché, here as elsewhere, is strongly anti-Judaic in its tone, and at the same time shows the influence of Jewish practices upon the community which it represents. The Mishna draws six distinctions in the kinds of water available for various purificatory purposes (Alukah 1:1-8, quoted by Schürer, 2:403 ff.), and in certain cases it insists upon the full stream of running water, in which the whole body can be immersed. The Didaché (chap. 7) recognises 'living water'—i.e., the running stream—'other water,' 'cold,' and 'warm'; and finally allows a triple pouring, where a sufficiency of any water for immersion cannot be had; but, though it indicates a preference in the order here given, it admits the validity of baptism under any of these conditions.

It is sometimes urged that, because βαπτίζω means 'to dip,' Christian baptism must originally have been by immersion. In the NT, however, as in classical writers, the usual word for 'to dip' is βάπτειν (Lk. 16:24; Jn. 13:26). βαπτίζω had a wider usage, and could be used even of a mere ceremonial handwashing, as we see from Lk. 11:38, 'he marvelled that he had not first washed (ἐβαπτίσθη) before dinner.' Already the partial ablution would seem to have been regarded as symbolical of the whole. It is difficult to suppose that the 3000 converts on the day of Pentecost could all have been baptized by immersion. Such a method is indeed presupposed as the ideal, at any rate, in Paul's words about death, burial, and resurrection in baptism (Rom. 6:3 f.); but pouring water on the head was in any case symbolical of immersion, and tantamount to it for ritual purposes.

(a) In the Name, not 'into the name.' Although ἐν is the preposition most frequently used, we find ἐν in Acts 2:38 10:48; and the interchangeability of the two prepositions in late Greek may be plentifully illustrated from the NT. Moreover, the expression is a Hebraism; cp ἐν ὀνόματι κυρίου Mt. 21:9 (= Ps. 118:26 עֲנֵה); so in the baptismal formula of Mt. 28:19 the Syr. version has ܒܫܡܝܢ (Lat. in nomine).

(b) In the name of Jesus Christ, or of the Lord Jesus. The former expression is used in Acts 2:38 10:48; the latter in Acts 8:16 19:5; cp also Acts 22:16, 'Arise and be baptized and wash away thy sins, calling on his name.' From these passages, and from Paul's words in 1 Cor. 1:13 ('Was Paul crucified for you, or were ye baptized in the name of Paul?'), it is natural to conclude that baptism was administered in the earliest times 'in the name of Jesus Christ,' or in that 'of the Lord Jesus.' This view is confirmed by the fact that the earliest forms of the baptismal confession appear to have been single—not triple, as was the later creed. When Philip's baptism of the eunuch appeared to have been abruptly narrated, the confession was inserted in the simple form, 'I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God' (Acts

The difficulties in which Commentators who reject the obvious meaning of the words find themselves involved may be seen at length in Stanley's Corinthians (ad loc.).

8:37); and the formula 'Jesus is Lord' appears soon to have become a stereotyped confession of Christian faith (cp Ro. 10:9 1 Cor. 12:3 Phil. 2:11); moreover the 'question and answer' (ἐπερωτήματα) connected with baptism in 1 Pet. 3:21 would appear to represent only the central section of the later creed.

On the other hand, we have in Mt. 28:19 the full formula, 'in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost.' We have no synoptic parallel at this point; and thus, from a documentary point of view, we must regard this evidence as posterior to that of Paul's Epistles and of Acts.

The apparent contradiction was felt by Cyprian, who suggested (Ep. 73:17 f.) that in baptizing Jews the apostles may have been contented with the one name of the Lord Jesus Christ, as they already believed in the Father; whilst in baptizing Gentiles they used the full formula, which was given (as he points out) with the command to 'make disciples of all the nations' or 'Gentiles.' This explanation, however, breaks down in face of Acts 10:45-48, the opening of the door to the Gentiles.

Three explanations deserve consideration: (1) that in Acts we have merely a compendious statement—i.e., that as a matter of fact all the persons there spoken of were baptized in the threefold name, though for brevity's sake they are simply said to have been baptized in the single name; (2) that Matthew does indeed report exactly the words uttered by Jesus, but that those words were not regarded as prescribing an actual formula to be used on every occasion, and that the spirit of them was fulfilled by baptism in the name of the Lord Jesus; (3) that Matthew does not here report the ipsissima verba of Jesus, but transfers to him the familiar language of the Church of the evangelist's own time and locality.

The first of these explanations cannot be regarded as satisfactory in the absence of any historical evidence of the employment of the threefold formula in the earliest times. A decision between the second and the third would involve an inquiry into the usage of the evangelist in other parts of his Gospel, and belongs to the discussion of the synoptic problem; but in favour of the third it may be stated that the language of the First Gospel, where it does not exactly reproduce an earlier document, shows traces of modifications of a later kind.

It has been argued that when Paul (Acts 19:2 f.), in answer to the statement of the Ephesian disciples of the Baptist, 'We have not so much as heard if there be a Holy Spirit' (εἰ πνεῦμα ἄγιον ἔστω), said, 'Unto what, then, were ye baptized?' he presupposed the use of the longer formula which expressly named the Holy Spirit. The statement can hardly mean, however, that they had never even heard of a Holy Spirit, for disciples of the Baptist could scarcely so speak (Mk. 1:8): it must refer to the special gift of the Holy Spirit which Christians were to receive. Accordingly, Paul's question simply implies that Christian baptism could scarcely have been given without some instruction as to this gift which was to follow it. In any case, it would be exceedingly strange that at this point Lk. should not have referred to the threefold formula, had it been in use, instead of simply saying, 'When they heard it, they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus' (Acts 19:5).

The threefold formula is attested by the Didaché (chap. 7), both in express words and by the mention of the alternative practice of triple effusion; but, as the Didaché shows elsewhere its dependence on Matthew, this is not independent evidence.

Justin Martyr (chap. 153), in describing baptism to heathen readers, gives the full formula in a paraphrastic form (Apol. 16:1), 'in the name of God, Father of the Universe and Ruler, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit.' Such a paraphrase was necessary to make the meaning clear to those for whom he wrote.

We find the full formula again in Tertullian some forty years later (De Bapt. 13, Adv. Prax. 26); and when the First Gospel was widely known it was certain to prevail. Exceptions are found which perhaps point to an old practice dying out. Cyprian (Ep. 73) and the Apostolic Canons (n. 50) combat the shorter formula, thereby attesting its use in certain quarters. The ordinance of Can. Apost. 50 runs—'If any bishop or presbyter fulfil not three baptisms of one initiation (τρία βαπτίσματα μιᾷ μυστήσεως), but one baptism which is given (as) into the death of the Lord, let him be deposed.' This was the formula of the followers of Eunomius (Socr. 524), 'for they baptize not into the Trinity, but into the death of Christ' (for other references see Usener, Relig. Untersuch., 1889, 1184); they, accordingly, used single immersion only.

No statement is found in the NT as to the age at which baptism might be administered. Circumcision,

4. Age. which Paul regards as fulfilled in Christian baptism (see below, § 5), enrolled the Jewish boy in the covenant of his fathers on the eighth day after birth, so that there could be no doubt that young children were truly members of the holy people. Thus, if children had been excluded from baptism when whole families were won to Christianity, we should almost certainly have had some record of the protest which would have been raised against what must have seemed so inconsistent a limitation to the membership of the new 'Israel of God.' It seems reasonable to suppose, therefore, that where 'households' are spoken of as being baptized (Acts 16:15 31-33 1 Cor. 1:16), there must have been, at least in some cases, instances of the baptism of infants. That Paul could speak of the children of a believing husband, or of a believing wife, as 'holy' is an indication in the same direction.

Paul, as we might expect, sees in baptism the means by which the individual is admitted to his place in the

5. Interpretation. one body, of which he thus becomes a member; 'For as the body is one and hath many members, but all the members, many though they be, are one body, so also is the Christ; for indeed by one Spirit (ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι) we all were baptized into one body—whether Jews or Gentiles, whether bondmen or free' (1 Cor. 12:12 f.). Baptism was thus the fundamental witness of Christian unity (Eph. 4:5, 'one baptism'); and in both the passages here referred to it is emphasised as such in view of the variety of spiritual gifts. A parable of Christian baptism might be found in the cloud and the sea through which all the Israelites had alike passed; 'they were all baptized into Moses in the cloud and in the sea' (1 Cor. 10:2).

In Rom. 6:1 f. Paul regards baptism as effecting a union with the death of Christ: 'we were baptized into his death.' It was a kind of burial of the former self, with a view to a resurrection and a new life. The same conception recurs in Col. 2:11 f., where it is immediately preceded by the thought that it corresponds in a certain way to the circumcision of the old covenant. It is 'the putting off'—totally, not merely partially and symbolically—of the whole 'body of the flesh'; and so it is the fulfilment of the old rite: it is 'the circumcision of the Christ.'

In Gal. 3:26 f. Paul further speaks of baptism as involving a kind of identification with the person of Christ, so that the divine sonship becomes ours in him; 'For ye are all sons of God, through faith (or 'the faith') in Christ Jesus; for as many of you as were baptized into Christ put on (or 'clothed yourselves with') Christ.' The old distinctions, he again reminds us, thus disappeared—Jew and Greek, bond-man and free, male and female—'for ye all are one [man] in Christ Jesus' (εἰς ἑστέ ἐν Χρ. 'I').

Eph. 5:26 speaks of Christ as cleansing the Church by the 'washing' (λουτρόν = 'washing,' probably not 'laver.' [In ἔ 11:7 is always λουτήρ: λουτρόν is קִיטָה Cant. 4:2 8; Eccles. 34:25; so Aquila renders קִיטָה in Ps. 60:10 108:10]) of water with the word' (ἐν ῥήματι). This last expression finds its interpretation in the ῥήμα, or formula of faith, to which we have already referred—which, whether as the confession in the mouth of the baptized or as the baptismal formula on the lips of the baptizer, transformed the process of ablution into the rite of Christian baptism. With this passage we may compare Tit. 3:5, 'He saved us through the washing of regeneration and renewal of the Holy Spirit' (διὰ λουτροῦ παλυνγενεσίας καὶ ἀνακαινώσεως πν. ἁγ.).

This last passage reminds us of the teaching of Jn. 3. The relation of that chapter to the sacrament of baptism is exactly parallel to that of chap 6 to the sacrament of the eucharist (see EUCHARIST). We are secure in saying that the evangelist's interpretation of the significance of baptism must have followed the line of Jesus' conversation with Nicodemus as there related. That a Gentile, or even a Jew who had been neglectful of the Rabbinical discipline of ablutions, should need to begin entirely anew in the religious life, to be 'born again of water and the Spirit,' as a condition of entry into 'the kingdom of God,' would seem natural. The marvel and the stumbling-block was that this should be required of those who, like this 'teacher of Israel,' had been strictest in their ceremonial purity; 'Marvel not that I said unto thee: ye must be born again.'

Jn., then, recognises, with Paul, the universal character of the initial rite; whilst at the same time the narrative teaches the radical nature of the change in the individual soul.

BAPTISMS (ΒΑΠΤΙΣΜΟΙ), Mk. 7:4, etc., *Rv*¹⁸₆, EV WASHINGS (q.v.).

BARABBAS (ΒΑΡΑΒΒΑΣ [Ti. WH], § 48), the name of the prisoner whom, in accordance with a Passover custom, Pilate released at the demand of the Jews while condemning Jesus to death (so Mt. 27:15-26 Mk. 15:6-15 Lk. 23:17-25 Jn. 18:39 f.).

More precisely than Mt., who simply calls him a 'notable' (ἐπίσημον) prisoner, and Jn., who calls him a robber, Mk. describes him as lying

1. Story. 'bound with them that had made insurrection (μετὰ τῶν στασιαστῶν δεδεμένους), men who in the insurrection had committed murder.' As Mk. has not previously referred to these insurgents, it seems all the more probable that he is borrowing verbatim from another source, although about this particular insurrection we are in as complete ignorance as about the Galileans mentioned in Lk. 13:1. Lk. (23:19), who follows Mk., adds that the insurrection had occurred in Jerusalem, but says nothing about any fellow-prisoners with Barabbas, and thus leaves the impression that Barabbas personally had committed murder. Mk. is entitled to the preference, not only on this point but also when he represents the Jews as having demanded the release of a prisoner on their own initiative, as against the less probable view that Pilate offered them this of his own accord.

Reference is sometimes made to the analogy of the Roman Lectisternia; but of these all that Livy (v. 139) says—and that only with reference to their first celebration—is that during those days such also as were bound (vinctis) were relieved of their chains (vincula), and such was the religious awe inspired by the proceedings that no one dared afterwards to relink (vinculi) the recipients of this divine favour. Thus he says nothing about release from prison; and his contemporary Dion. Halicarn. (129 [=10]), on the authority of the Annals of a certain Piso, who himself had been censor, while he does indeed speak of such release, limits it to the case of slaves who had been laid under arrest by their masters (αλευρόμενοι μὲν τῶν θεραπεύοντων, ὅσους πρότερον ἐν τοῖς δεσμοῖς εἶχον οἱ δεσπότηται).

Those who find some difficulty in accepting the narrative as it stands may perhaps find themselves better able to explain its origin on the lines indicated by W. Brandt, by whom every detail has been discussed with great care (Evangelische Geschichte, 1893, pp. 94-105). Brandt takes the kernel of the story to be that a certain prisoner who had been arrested in connection with some insurrection, but against whom no crime or at least no grave crime could be proved, was released on the application of the people, who intervened in his behalf because he was the son of a Rabbin (see below, § 2). The incident, even although it was not simultaneous with the condemnation of Jesus, gave occasion in Christian circles for the drawing of this contrast: the son of the rabbin was interceded for and released, Jesus was condemned. In the course of transmission by oral tradition the statement of this contrast might gradually, without any conscious departure from historical truth, have led to the assumption that the two things occurred at the same time and on the same occasion. Finally, the liberation of a seditious prisoner—in any case a somewhat surprising occurrence—seemed explicable only on the assumption of some standing custom to account for it; this assumption must presumably have arisen elsewhere than in Palestine.

The above theory presupposes that βαρᾶβας stands for אבנא, 'son of the father'—i.e., here, of the

2. Name. rabbinical 'master.' (It was not till afterwards that Abba began to come into use as a proper name [of rabbins], explained by Dalman [Gram. 142] as an abbreviation, like אבנא, of אביו: in the time of Jesus it was a title of honour [Mt. 239].)

Jerome, indeed, in his commentary on Mt. 27:16-18 says that in the Gospel of the Hebrews (quod scribitur iuxta Hebraeos) Barabbas is explained as 'son of their teacher' (filius magistri eorum), where eorum apparently implies an etymology similar to that found in a scholion of a Venice MS in WH App. 296—viz., that βαρᾶβας (only another form for βαρᾶβᾶν; see Winer, Gram. (9) § 5, n. 70) means 'son of our teacher.' In that case we must (with Syr. hr.) write βαρᾶβᾶν, taking the second element as being 'teacher,' and assume that βαρᾶβᾶν was explained as אבנא, 'our teacher,' or רבנא, 'their teacher.' The meaning, however, is not essentially changed by this, as אבנא (as also רבנא) is, like אבנא, a title of honour for a great teacher.

The most remarkable fact in connection with the name of Barabbas is that Origen knew MSS, and did not absolutely reject them, in which Mt. 27:16 f. read 'Jesus' (Ἰησοῦν) before 'Barabbas'—a reading still extant in some cursives, as well as in the Armen. vers., in Syr. sin., and partly also in Syr. hr. Whether the Gospel of the Hebrews, referred to by Jerome, also had this reading is uncertain (see WH). In this reading 'Barabbas' would be only an addition made for the sake of distinction, as in Simon Bar-jona, but not yet with the full force of a proper name.

Some support for it might perhaps be found in the fact that the first mention of the name in Mk. is preceded by δ λεγόμενος. The meaning would then be 'He who, for distinction's sake (though it was not his proper name), was called Barabbas.' Only, in that case, in Mt. the λεγόμενος (here without the article), since it is followed, on the reading at present in question, by Ἰησοῦν βαρᾶβᾶν, would simply mean 'whose name was Jesus Barabbas'; and it may be so in Mk. also. In any case it is remarkable that in all the MSS in question Barabbas should have the name Ἰησοῦς exclusively in Mt. and there only in two verses, while vv. 20 and 26 simply give τὸν βαρᾶβᾶν, τὸν δὲ Ἰησοῦν as an antithesis. Thus we may be tolerably certain that the name Jesus as given to Barabbas has arisen merely from mistake.

A fairly obvious explanation would be the conjecture of Tregelles, that a very early transcriber had 'per incuriam' repeated the last two letters of Ἰησοῦν and that these were at a later date taken for the familiar abbreviation of the name of Jesus. If this theory be adopted we must assume further that a later copyist inserted also in v. 16 the name Ἰησοῦν, which he had found in v. 17; but it is specially interesting to observe that in the Latin translation of Origen the word Jesus stands in v. 17 but not in v. 16 also. BARBARIAN (Βαρβαρος), primarily, one who speaks in an unintelligible manner:¹ hence a foreigner (cp Il. 2:867), in which sense it is employed by Paul in 1 Cor. 14:11 Acts 28:2. This usage was not restricted to the Greeks alone: it is met with among the Romans (cp Ovid, Trist. v. 1037), and (according to Herod. 2:158) among the Egyptians. In agreement with this, the people of Melita, who perhaps spoke some Phoenician dialect, are called 'barbarians' (Acts 28:24), and ὁ uses βάρβαρος to render the אֲרָמִי of Ps. 114:1—a people 'of strange tongue' (Targ. עַמָּא בִּרְבָּרָא).² The not uncommon Ἕλληνες καὶ βάρβαροι, accordingly, includes the whole world: cp Rom. 1:14 (also Jos. Ant. xi. 7:1) and the similar 'Barbarian, Scythian,' Col. 3:11; see HELLENISM, § 2.

The use of βάρβαρος became so customary that the term was used actually in referring to the speaker's or writer's own people; cp Philo, Vit. Mos. § 5, and Jos. (B.), pref. § 1, who applies the designation 'upper barbarians' to his countrymen beyond the Euphrates.³ At a later date the word gets the meaning 'cruel,' 'savage,' etc. (cp Cic. Fontei. 10:21, 'immanis ac barbara consuetudo'), in which sense it recurs in 2 Macc. 2:1425 15:2 and in the ὄ of Ez. 21:36 [31] (for MT בְּרָשִׁי, 'brutish').

BARIAH (בָּרִיָּה, Βαρι [B], Βερια [AL]), a descendant of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3:22).

BARJESUS, the Jewish sorcerer and false prophet in the train of the proconsul Sergius Paulus at Paphos, in Cyprus, who (Acts 13:6-12) withstood the preaching of Paul, and was punished with temporary blindness.

At the outset, the names present great difficulties. In 13:6 his name (δνομα) is expressly said to have been

1. Names. Barjesus (Βαρῖησους), and such a compound (son of a father named Jesus) can quite easily have been a proper name (cp Barabbas, Barnabas, Bartholomew). In v. 8, however, he is abruptly called 'Elymas the sorcerer, for so is his name by interpretation' (Ελυμας ὁ μάγος, οὕτως γὰρ μεθερμηνεύεται τὸ δνομα αὐτοῦ). A translation has relevance only when it is a translation into the language of the readers: in any other case it would be incumbent on the author to state what foreign language he is translating into.

(a) This being assumed, we must take it that 'the sorcerer' (ὁ μάγος) is the translation. Elymas (Ελυμας), in that case, would be the word translated. Accordingly, the name has been identified with the Arabic 'alim, which occurs in the Koran (7:106 [109] 26:33 and 36 [34 and 37]) as an adjective following the noun sāhir which denotes a sorcerer, and has thus been taken to mean 'wise,' 'able.' Less appropriate is the derivation from Aram. אֵלִים or אֵלִים, meaning 'strong.' Equate μάγος, however, etymologically, with Ελυμας as we may, it still has to be explained how Barjesus came suddenly to be called by the other name, Elymas. The only way in which a plausible explanation could be reached would be if Elymas (in the sense indicated) could be taken as a title or cognomen assumed by Barjesus—a foreign tongue being used to heighten still further the prestige which he sought to acquire by it. It is not as a title, however, that the author employs it. On the contrary, he gives the word without the definite article, and expressly adds that the word which he is translating was the actual name (ὄνομα) of the bearer.

(b) It was quite sound method, therefore, to take Barjesus for the name translated, and Elymas for the translation.

Even Pesh., in v. 8, for Ελμας ὁ μάγος arbitrarily has 'this sorcerer Barshuma [so Pesh. reads for Βαρισησους in v. 6; see below, (c)], whose name, being interpreted, means Elymas.' Klostermann (Probleme im Aposteltexte, 1883, pp. 21-33), however, is able to support this view only on three assumptions, each one of which is bolder than the other. We must read, he holds, not Ελμας, but Ἐτοιμος; secondly, we must read, not Βαρισησους, but Βαρισησαν, or, to be exact, the Latin Barjesuban; and, in the third place, the מַשְׁכֵּן so transcribed (whether we derive it etymologically from the root מָשַׁךְ, or, with more probability, from the root מָשַׁךְ which underlies מָשַׁךְ, præsto est) means 'son of preparedness' or 'son of fitness,' and thus, by the same Hebraism as we find in the name Barnabas (q.v.), paratus, ἔτοιμος.

a. As to the first of these assumptions, it has to be noted that the reading Ἐτοιμος is met with only in Lucifer of Calariz (ob. 371), and even there not as Hetemus but as Etæmus; D has Ετοιμας, which, indeed, we cannot explain, but which, from its ending, is clearly intended to be taken as a proper name; paratus is found only in Lucifer, one Vg. MS, and two Latin MSS, in which in many places is found the markedly divergent text of Acts which Blass takes to be Luke's earliest draft (see ACTS, § 17).

β. Next, as regards the second assumption. Βαρισησαν is found only in D; Barjesuban, only in the Latin translation of D; Barjesuban or rather, according to the one MS known to us, Barjesuban, only in Lucifer. The corrector of D has restored Βαρισησαν, which, as accusative, fits his reading ὀνόματι καλούμενον for ὄνομα, but, in spite of ὄνομα, is found also in AHP and the Greek margin of the Philoxenian; N, Vg., Copt., Armen., and the Philoxenian version as well as 'nonnulli' known to Jerome, read Βαρισησαν—that is to say, the simple Hebrew form without a Greek termination. On this Jerome (on the Hebrew names in Acts; Opera, ed. Vallarsi, 399) remarks, 'nonnulli Barjesu corrupte legunt,' himself declaring the right reading to be Barieu or Berieu, for which, by very daring etymologising from the Hebrew, he obtains the meanings malefictum, or maleficus, or in malo. Perhaps, however, even Jerome's aversion to Βαρισησαν rests upon the very obvious dogmatic consideration put forward by Beda in the eighth century, 'non convenit hominem flagitiosum et magum filium Jesu, id est, salvatoris, appellari quem e contrario Paulus (v. 10) filium diaboli nuncupat.' The form Barieu in Jerome can readily be accounted for as merely a clerical error for Barjesu, or as arising out of the Greek abbreviation IHY which is met with in the oldest MSS along with the more frequently occurring IY for Ἰησοῦ. The explanation in the case of the readings preferred by Klostermann is much less easy. On this account, in spite of their weak attestation, one might be inclined to regard them as the true ones; but all the authorities for the reading paratus have the word, not in v. 8 instead of Ελμας, but as an interpolation after Βαρισησους in v. 6, 'quod interpretatur paratus.' This addition is met with elsewhere only in E, in the form ὁ μεθερμηνεύεται Ελμας—rendered in the Latin of this MS: quod interpretatur Elymas. It is evident that in neither case have we more than a late attempt to obviate the impression that Elymas, first introduced in v. 8, was the name of another person. Blass, on the other hand, regards the added words as part of Luke's earliest draft. He sees, however, that Luke could not have written at the same time in v. 8 'for thus is his name interpreted' (οὕτως γὰρ μεθερμηνεύεται τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ); and, accordingly, he rejects these words from Luke's earliest draft. For this he has not a single authority; and how can he explain Luke's having, after all, introduced the words into his second transcript, leaving out those in v. 6 instead? Are we really to believe that with his own hands Luke changed his good and thoroughly intelligible first text into a positively misleading after-text? Cp ACTS, § 17 (f). If, however, the addition 'quod interpretatur paratus' at the end of v. 6 is to be regarded as a late interpolation, Lucifer also, who has it, lies open to suspicion: his form Etæmus in v. 8 may be not taken from an authoritative source, but a mere conjectural adaptation to allow of the word's being rendered paratus and itself regarded as a rendering of Βαρισησους. What etymology he was following when he preferred (or perhaps conjecturally introduced) the form Barjesuban is a matter of indifference. In ancient times, as the Onomastica Sacra abundantly show, people made out Hebrew etymologies in a most reckless way.

γ. Klostermann's proposed etymology, paratus, rests upon a very weak foundation, as no such word as מַשְׁכֵּן (Yiswān) can be shown to exist (the proper name מַשְׁכֵּן, ISHVĀN, in Gen. 46 17 has no importance in this connection), and the root מָשַׁךְ or מָשַׁךְ which is used in Syriac frequently for ἀείος, ἱσος, ὁμαλός, as also for συμ-, ὁμο-, ἀξιο-, in compounds, is never used for ἔτοιμος.¹ Besides, as we have said, the codex has not Barjesuban but Barjesuban. Above all, however, Klostermann's hypothesis remains untenable as long as one is unprepared to accept the further assumption that ὁ μάγος after Ελμας (or Ἐτοιμος) in v. 8 is a mere gloss to be deleted; for ὁ μάγος necessarily leads to the assumption dealt with under (a). This had no doubt already been perceived by the scribe of H, who wrote ὁ μέγας (the great) for ὁ μάγος, and so also by Lucifer, if the editio princeps (of Tilius) is right in attributing the reading magus to him (the only MS of Lucifer at present known has magus). If Lucifer really wrote magus, this increases the suspicion that the other variants in Lucifer are in like manner arbitrary and unauthorised alterations of the text.

(c) In order to make out Elymas to be a translation of the name of the sorcerer, stress has been laid on the remarkable Peshitta rendering Barshuma for Βαρισησους.

Already, in the seventeenth century, we find Castell (Lex. Heptagl. s.v. מַשְׁכֵּן) and Lightfoot (Hor. Hebr. ad loc.) interpreting Βαρισησους as filius vulneris, and deriving Elymas from the Arabic 'alima=doluit (دَلِمَا). Over and above the reasons to the contrary that have already been urged under (b), however, it has to be observed (see above) that a translation into Arabic would explain nothing to the readers: it would itself require to be explained. A somewhat different turn is given to the matter by Payne Smith (Thes. Syr. 598). Barshuma was in the first instance given in v. 8 as a rendering of Elymas, and only later introduced by copyists also into v. 6 in substitution for Barjesus in the erroneous belief that it was the man's proper name. But the Peshitta in its arbitrary change of text in v. 8 (see above (b), ad init.) says precisely the opposite,—that Barshuma was the proper name, and Elymas the translation. It must, therefore, from the outset have held Barshuma to be a reproduction of the proper name Barjesus. Thus Barshuma probably means merely 'son of the name'; and 'the name' is most easily to be accounted for as a substitute for 'Jesus' from the feeling of reverence which we have already heard expressing itself in Beda [see above (b) β], a reverence similar to that shown by the Jews when they said 'the name' instead of 'Yahwē'.

(d) Van Manen, contrariwise (Paulus 1, Leyden, 1890, pp. 98 f. 147), holds Elymas to be the proper name, and interprets Barjesus in the Hebrew sense as meaning 'son of Jesus'—i.e., 'follower of Jesus.'

In this he assumes that the primary document here made use of by the author of Acts did not refer to the man as a Jew, or as a sorcerer, or as a false prophet; that it simply contained the information that at Paphos Paul came into opposition with one of the older and very conservative disciples of Jesus, and got the better of him with Sergius Paulus. This hypothesis admittedly departs so widely from the text of Acts that it is impossible to control it thereby.

(e) Dalman (Gram. 129, n. 1 [94]) proposes a purely Greek explanation.

Ελμας (so accented) he regards as contracted from Ελμαλῖος (on these contractions see NAMES, § 86 ad fin.). In G [except the Apocryphal and NT, indeed, the Ελμαλῖος are always Ελαμ, Ελαμῖται; but with the Greeks the forms are as invariably Ελμαλῖος, Ελμαλῖοι; so in Tobit 2 10 Judith 1 6; 1 Macc. 6 1 has Ελμαλῖος].

Philologically this derivation is the simplest of all; but it contributes nothing towards the solution of the riddle.

The failure of all the attempts enumerated above renders inevitable the suggestion that here the author of

2. Different sources?

Acts has amalgamated two sources, one of which called the man Barjesus while the other called him Elymas. Even Klostermann, in order to explain the peculiar distribution of the names in v. 6 8, seeks the aid of this hypothesis in addition to the hypotheses already referred to [above (b), beg.]. The addition, οὕτως γὰρ μεθερμηνεύεται τὸ ὄνομα αὐτοῦ (for so is his name translated), however, would in any case be a very unskillful way of amalgamating the two sources unless ὁ μάγος (sorcerer), as suggested above, be deleted as a gloss. Still, if once it is agreed to assume two sources, a further and larger question arises: the question, namely, whether the addition itself be substantially right—that is to say, whether the one name be really a translation of the other. Nay, more: it is even conceivable that the two names do not denote the same person; that accounts relating to two different persons have been transferred to a single person. This inference is suggested also by the epithets applied; for, though it is not altogether inconceivable that a 'sorcerer' (μάγος) should be a 'false prophet' (ψευδοπροφήτης), the two ideas are widely different.

Of the critics mentioned in ACTS, § 11, who discuss our present passage with reference to the distinction of sources, only Spitta and B. Weiss regard 186-12 as all of one piece; Clemen and Hilgenfeld are convinced of the opposite, but make no definite suggestions as to separation of the portions; Sorof and Jüngst derive v. 6f. from a written source, vv. 8-12 from the pen of the redactor or from oral tradition. Jüngst further attributes to the redactor the word μάγος in v. 6. Yet not even so are all the difficulties cleared up.

How far the narrative as a whole is to be accepted as historical becomes a serious question as soon as it has been traced to more than one source; but its credibility has been doubted even by Spitta, B. Weiss, and others, who defend its unity. As regards the miracle in particular, one is not only surprised by its suddenness, but is also at a loss to see its moral justification. On the other hand, a misunderstanding would account for it readily enough. A sorcerer, a false prophet—nay, any Jew (Acts 28:27)—is, in the judgment of the Christian, spiritually blind, and this is what Paul and Barnabas proved of Barjesus in their disputation with him. In being handed down by tradition this thought could easily undergo such a change as would lead to the representation that physical blindness had been brought on as a punishment by the words of Paul. On the other hand, one would expect the blindness, if it is to be regarded as merited, to be permanent, or, at least, would expect to be told of some reason for its subsequent removal, as, for example, that the sorcerer had ceased to withstand Paul and Barnabas, or even had become a convert to Christianity. It is very noticeable that the narrator shows but little interest in the subsequent history of the man. The conversion of the proconsul (not his existence; see ACTS, § 13 ad fin.) also is doubtful to many.

3. Credibility of Narrative.

All the more does it now become incumbent to

4. Tendency. enquire whether the narrative reveals in any measure the tendencies discerned elsewhere in Acts.

(a) In the first place, and generally, it is clear that it has a place in the parallelism between Peter and Paul (ACTS, § 4), in respect alike of the miracle of chastisement, the confutation of a sorcerer, and the conversion of a high Roman officer (cp Acts 5:1-10 8:18-24 10:1-48). It is also in harmony with that other tendency of Acts, to represent the Roman authority as friendly, and the Jews as hostile to Christianity (ACTS, § 5 (1); § 4 ad init.; compare very specially the Jewish exorcists in close relation to sorcery, Acts 19:13-16).

(b) A conjecture of wider scope¹ connects itself with what is said of Simon Magus (see SIMON MAGUS). If Paul was the person originally intended in the story of Simon, then in Acts 8:9-24 we find attributed to him the one deed which used to be flung in his teeth by his Judaistic adversaries—that, by his great collections made in Macedonia and Achaia, he had sought to purchase at the hands of the original apostles that recognition of his equality with them which they had so persistently withheld. The romance of Simon Magus, however, of which we still possess large portions (see SIMON MAGUS), had for its main contents something different, viz., that the sorcerer had spread his false doctrines everywhere and supported them by miracles, but in one city after another was vanquished in dispute and excelled in miracle by Peter. Thus, apart from the repetition of the occurrence in many cities, we are told of Barjesus in Acts 13:6-12 exactly what is told in the romance about Simon (that is, Paul), and of Paul exactly what is told in the romance about Peter. Hence the belief that in 13:6-12 we can discover the same purpose on the part of the author as we discover in 8:18-24. He was acquainted with the unfriendly allegation about Paul, did not believe it, and wished to set forth another view. In the two passages, however, the method is not the same. In 8:18-24 it is shown that Paul could not possibly have been the infamous sorcerer, inasmuch as Simon the sorcerer was a Samaritan and was quelled by Peter indeed, but before the conversion of Paul. In 13:6-12, on the other hand, it is shown that it was Paul himself who victoriously met a sorcerer of this kind. One of the reasons for this divergence is seen in the desire, already noted, to establish a close parallelism between Paul and Peter. It is believed possible also to explain on the same lines why in Acts 13:6-12 the scene is laid in Cyprus, with a Jew in the entourage of a high Roman officer as one of the dramatis personæ. To Cyprus, according to Josephus (Ant. xx. 72, §§ 141-143), belonged the Jewish sorcerer Simon, who, at the instance of Felix of Judæa, procurator (i.e., highest Roman officer), had induced Drusilla to quit her husband, King Azizus of Emesa, and marry Felix. The purpose of the narrator would have been sufficiently served had he been able to say that the sorcerer in question—Simon, to wit—under whose name the Judaizers imputed to Paul so much that was shameful, had been met and vanquished by Paul himself. That, however, was impossible; the tale had already been related of Peter. Accordingly (so it is supposed) the narrator found it necessary to give another name to the sorcerer worsted by Paul.

(c) His choice of the names Barjesus and Elymas is still unaccounted for. There is, therefore, a motive for our attributing a historical character to a certain other sorcerer, Barjesus (or Elymas), as well as to a Samaritan sorcerer named Simon. Although it is not easy to believe that Peter met the Samaritan Simon, there is no reason for assuming that Paul did not meet Barjesus. Indeed, it can easily be conceded that in Acts 13:6-12, just as in Acts 8:9-24, the author was not consciously giving a false complexion to what he had heard. He believed himself able to offer a material correction. He assumed, that is to say, that what the Judaizers were in the habit of relating of Simon the sorcerer, while really intending Paul and his opposition to the 'true' Gospel, rested in actual fact upon a mistaken identification with this Barjesus (or Elymas), and that the latter was vanquished not by Peter but by Paul. It is less easy to suppose that Cyprus was given by tradition as the scene of the occurrence. Even without any tradition, the name could be suggested by Josephus's mention of the native place of the Jewish sorcerer, and the name of Paphos would naturally present itself from the fact that the Roman proconsul had his residence there.

(d) The hypothesis has received developments to a point where we have to depend on less clear indications. If the accusations in Acts against Simon and Barjesus had originally been brought against Paul, what is said of the intimate relations of Barjesus with Sergius Paulus would belong to the same class. Now, in Acts 24:26, it is said that Felix often sent for Paul and communed with him. It is assumed that the Judaizers had gone so far as to allege that Paul had purchased the friendliness of Felix with money, or even, perhaps, to insinuate that he had been negotiator between Drusilla and Felix. It is to meet those accusations (so it is assumed) that the writer of Acts alludes to bribery by Paul as merely a hope on the part of Felix, and informs us that Paul had stirred Felix's conscience by a solemn 'reasoning' with him about his sinful marriage (24:25 f.).

(e) There are two more explicit indications that what we now read about Barjesus was originally told of Paul. 'Ἐχθρός, 'enemy,' the epithet applied by Paul to Bar-jesus (1310), is, with or without the substantive ἀνθρώπος, the standing designation for Simon (that is, Paul) in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies and Recognitions. The name, 'enemy of righteousness,' fits Paul and his doctrine of the abrogation of the Mosaic law through Christ (Rom. 104) all the more because his Judaistic opponents in Corinth came forward as 'servants of righteousness,' that is, men of strict observance of the law (2 Cor. 1115). In that case, the temporary blinding of Barjesus will represent what befel Paul at his conversion; even the expressions μὴ βλέπων (without sight) and χειραγωγούμενος (leading by the hand) in 98f. have their parallels in 1311. Here, then, unless the whole hypothesis under consideration be rejected, we may say, with reasonable probability, that the blindness of Paul at his conversion (whether historical or not is immaterial) was originally represented by the Judaizers as a divine visitation for his hostility to the 'true' (that is, the legal) gospel, and that it was simply passed on by the author of Acts to Barjesus the Jew.

Whatever else be the result of what has been said in the present section, one thing at least is clear: it is impossible to reach a definite conclusion unless the tendency of the author is taken into account.

According to the πελοδοὺ Βαρνάβα—a legendary work composed by a Cyprian about 488—Barjesus opposed the work of Barnabas when, along with Mark

5. Later legends. (Acts 1539), Barnabas visited Cyprus for a second time. He withstood him in various ways at his entrance into the cities where he desired to preach, and at last stirred up the Jews to burn him at the stake at Salamis. (Cp Lipsius, *Apokr. BARKOS (בַּרְקוֹס, § 82, Βερκωσ [L]). The B'ne Barkōs, a family of NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9), EZRA 253 (ΒΑΡΚΟΥΣ [B], -ΚΟC [A]) = Neh. 755 (ΒΑΡΚΟΥΕ [BNA], L om.) = 1 Esd. 532, CHARCUS, RV BARCHUS (ΒΑΧΟΥC [B], ΒΑΡΧΟΥΕ [A]). The NETHINIM (q.v.) were mainly of foreign origin, and the name Barkos seems to be Aramaic and to signify 'son of the God Kōs or Kaus.' The name of this god occurs in many theophorous proper names among the Northern Semites; we have Kaus-malak as king of Edom on an Assyrian inscription (Schr. KAT 150), Kōsnathan (קוסנתן) in Euting's Nabat. Inscr. n. 12 1. 1, and a variety of Semitic names on Greek inscriptions from Egypt containing the same element (Rev. Archéol., Feb. 1870, p. 109 ff.). Cp also the Edomite Kostobaros¹ (Jos. Ant. xv. 79). Names designating the worshipper as son of his god are common in Aramaic—e.g., the biblical BENHADAD [probably], the Palmyrene ברנוב, 'son of Nebo' (cp BARNABAS, § 1), בני ברשעש, 'sons of the son of the Sun-god,' the Syrian Bar-ba'smin, 'son of the lord of heaven,' Barlāhā, 'son of God,' etc. W. BARLEY (שְׂעִירִים, שְׂעִירִים,² κριθα, κριθα [BAL], Ex. 931 Lev. 2716 Dt. 88 Judg. 713, etc.) was in biblical times one of the most characteristic products of Palestine (Dt. 88), regarded as one of the necessities of life (Joel 111). It comes second in the series of grains mentioned in Ez. (49) as ingredients to be used in bread-making—wheat, barley, beans, lentils, millet, and spelt (cp BREAD). It may be inferred from a variety of passages, such as Ru. 217 Jn. 6913, that barley was, even during the times when it was cultivated along with wheat, the staple food of the poorer class (cp FOOD). Such a reference as that in 1 K. 428 (58) shows us how largely it was used to feed horses and cattle.¹ It may also be gathered from the part played by the barley-cake in the dream of the Midianite, overheard by Gideon (Judg. 713), where it stands as a type of the Israelite peasant army, that as in other countries, so in Palestine, the cultivation of barley preceded that of wheat, and was the earliest stage in the transition from a nomadic to an agricultural life.² (Cp Pl. HN xviii. 72, 'antiquissimum in cibis hordeum.') This is, on the whole, more probable than the view of Jos. (Ant. v. 64), which has been very generally accepted, that barley-cake represented the jeelness of Gideon's three hundred, and we are entitled to conclude that there was a time when barley was the staple food of all classes among the Israelites. The fact referred to in Ex. 931f., that in Egypt barley ripens some time earlier than wheat, is supported by the testimony of Pliny (HN xviii. 106) as well as of modern writers (see references in Di. ad loc.).

In the single case in which the use of barley is prescribed in an offering under the ritual law (see JEALOUSY,

2. Ritual. ORDEAL OF, § 2), it is somewhat difficult to determine the reason. Some (e.g., Bahr, Symbolik, 2445) have regarded it as expressive of the sordid nature of the alleged offence and the humiliation of the accused³ (a wife suspected of adultery). A reason which has recently found more acceptance is that in the case of a simple appeal to God for a judicial decision a less valuable offering was sufficient than was requisite when a suppliant besought God for the bestowal or continuance of his divine grace⁴ (Di. on Nu. 511, etc.). The prohibition to mingle oil or frankincense with the offering will, of course, receive a similar explanation.

Two-rowed barley (Hordeum distichon), which may be presumed to be the feral form, is a native of W. Asia. It may have been cultivated by

3. Variety. Semitic races; but it is not represented on Egyptian monuments. The kind most frequently cultivated in antiquity was six-rowed barley (Hordeum hexastichon). This occurs on the most ancient Egyptian monuments and on the coins of Metapontum six centuries B.C. It was no doubt derived by cultivation from the two-rowed kind (cp De Candolle, Orig. 294-297, and authorities quoted there).

The word 'gerah' (Ex. 3013) 'is defined by Rabbinical writers as equal to sixteen barley-corns'; but see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BARNABAS (ΒΑΡΝΑΒΑΣ [Ti. WH]; § 48), otherwise JOSEPH (or Joses).

According to the author of Acts (436), the name Barnabas (= υἱὸς παρακλήσεως) is derived from the Aram. ܒܪ (son) and the same root as the Heb. מְנַחֵם, prophētēs — the duty of παράκλησις ('address, exhortation'), according to 1 Cor. 143, and also according to Acts 1531f., being one of the duties of the προφήτης. ¹ So in the Physiologus (Land, Anecd. Syr. 4 24f., cited by Löw, 277) barley is called the food of cattle as opposed to wheat the food of man.

² Cp, especially, the parallel cited by Budde (ZDPV 1893) from Radloff's Aus Sibirien, 1329. Cp also Moore on the passage.

closely examined, however, this etymology is not without its difficulties. It combines words from two different languages, and moreover fails to account for the form -αβα. Klostermann (Probl. im Aposteltext, 1883, pp. 8-14) seeks to derive the meaning παράκλησις from the Aram. ܩܠܝܬܐ, qiliyetis, but finds in it no further reference than to the satisfaction which Barnabas caused to the apostles by becoming a convert to Christianity. Dalman's etymology (Gram. d. jüd.-paläst. Aramäisch, 1894, p. 142), which makes παράκλησις a rendering of ܩܠܝܬܐ, this last being an abbreviation (not elsewhere met with) of a proper name ܩܠܝܬܐ or ܩܠܝܬܐ (ܩܠܝܬܐ), takes us very far from the form to be explained. Deissmann comes nearer the sound when (Bibelstudien, 175-178 [95]; Neue Bibelstudien, 15-17 [97]) he compares the Barnebo (ברנבו) of a Palmyrene inscription of the year 114 A.D. (see De Vogüé, La Syrie Centrale no. 73), and the Semitic Barnebo (son of Nebo) on a North Syrian inscription of the third or fourth century A.D.¹ In Is. 46:1, as also in Ναβουχοδονσορ, Ναβουζαβαν, Nebo is transliterated into Greek with a instead of e, and the termination -as may possibly have been substituted for -us with the view of disguising the name of the heathen divinity. (For examples of such a custom, see Winer, Gram. d. NTlichen Sprachidioms, (9) § 5 27a.) On this theory, the rendering παράκλησις is merely a piece of popular etymology. Nestle (Philol. sacr., 1896, p. 19 f.) is inclined to take the Syr. ܩܠܝܬܐ, which signifies παράκλησις, as the starting-point of the etymological interpretation; but he refrains from explaining more minutely the structure of the form.

If Joseph really did first receive the surname of Barnabas from the apostles, this seems to have been on account of his distinction as a speaker. In this respect, however, the author of Acts (13:15-16 14:12) invariably subordinates him at least to Paul. Many Jews, with a view to their dealings with Greeks and Romans, assumed in addition to their Jewish name a Greek (or Latin) or at least Greek-sounding surname (e.g., Acts 1:23 12:25 13:19 Col. 4:11, and Ἰανναῖος = יונה); and it may at least be asked whether this cannot perhaps have been the case with Barnabas also (see NAMES, §§ 48, 84).

According to the Epistle to the Galatians (our primary source), Barnabas was a companion of Paul in

2. References: his missionary journeys for at least in Galatians. Jerusalem. In the council he joined

Paul in supporting the immunity of Gentile Christians from the Mosaic Law (Gal. 2:19), which makes it all the more surprising that he afterwards retreated from the position he had taken long before, that a Jewish Christian was at liberty to eat at the same table with a brother Gentile freed from the law (Gal. 2:13). As in the case of Peter, so also in that of Barnabas, the reproach of hypocrisy hurled at both by Paul on this account may safely be toned down into one of inconsistency (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 3). In point of fact, Barnabas had shaken off the Mosaic law; but he had never thought out all the bearings of the step so fully as to be able to vindicate it when the venerable and sacred duty of observing the whole law was so authoritatively pressed upon him. From this date it was, of course, no longer possible for him to work along with Paul on the same lines; and thus the dispute at Antioch more than sufficiently explains why the two separated. The mention of Barnabas in 1 Cor. 9:6 only proves that at that time also he was a prominent missionary, and that he held to the Pauline principle of supporting himself by his own labour; it is no evidence that he was personally known to the Corinthians, or that he had again become one of the companions of Paul.

In the Acts of the Apostles the separation of Barnabas from Paul is explained as due not to a difference on a

3. In Acts. matter of principle, but to a personal question; Barnabas wished to take John Mark—a near relation of his, according to Col. 4:10—as companion on a second journey planned by Paul and himself; but Paul objected, because on a previous occasion (Acts 13:13) Mark had left them in the lurch

¹ In Die Worte J., 32 (98), Dalman comes over to Deissmann's view, which is also ably defended by G. B. Gray, Exp. Times, Feb. 1899, p. 232 f. Cp also Arnold Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache, 47 f. (96).

BARNABAS

(Acts 15:36-39). Even if this be accepted as a historical explanation (and we have no means of controlling it), it cannot be said to have been the chief one (see above, § 2); as to which Acts (see ACTS, §§ 4, 6) is scrupulously silent. In virtue of the intermediate position,—as between Pauline and Jewish Christianity,—which was held, as we have seen, by Barnabas, he is admirably fitted for a mediating rôle in Acts. Although a native of Cyprus, he is regarded as a member of the church of Jerusalem (4:36 f.; on the sale of his estate, see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, §§ 1, 5); it is he who negotiates Paul's admission to that church (9:27); it is on that church's commission that he inspects the church which had been founded by dispersed Christians at Antioch in Syria (11:22-24); it is he who fetches Paul to Antioch from Tarsus and introduces him to his field of work (11:25 f.), and he also is the apostle's travelling companion when the collection for the poor Christians there is being brought to Jerusalem (11:30 12:25); as in this case, so also in the so-called first missionary journey, undertaken along with Paul through Cyprus and the south of Asia Minor, his name is placed first, at least till 13:7, and then again in 14:14 and even 15:12-25. All this is not easy to reconcile with Paul's well-known independence as shown in his letters; but the journey in Acts 11:30 12:25 must also on other grounds be pronounced unhistorical (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 1), and the rest of what is related in Acts 11 is inconsistent with the order τῆς Συρίας καὶ τῆς Κιλικίας in Gal. 1:21, as is the rest of what we read in Acts 9 with Gal. 1:15-20 (cp ACTS, § 4, and, for the doubtfulness of the contents of Acts 13 f., and the probability of a Barnabas source there, §§ 13 and 10). But, although the object of the narrative in Acts is inconsistent with history in as far as it seeks to suggest that the missionary activity of Paul among the Gentiles was no departure from the views of the primitive church,—that on the contrary it was authorised and even set on foot by it,—we may without hesitation accept as historical (see ACTS, § 4) not only the co-operation of Barnabas with Paul shortly before and at the Council at Jerusalem, which is vouched for by the Epistle to the Galatians, but also the part which he took in the first missionary journey (Acts 13 f.), and even perhaps in Paul's introduction to Jerusalem (of course according to Gal. 1:18 f.) at his first visit to that city three years after his conversion. We may also accept in all probability the second journey of Barnabas to Cyprus in company with Mark (Acts 15:39). From this point his name disappears from the NT.

Our later notices of him are of little value. According to Clem. Al. (Strom. ii. 20, § 116; cp Eus. HE ii. 14), he was one of the Seventy of Lk. 10:1;

4. Later notices. in the frankly anti-Pauline Clem. Homilies

(i. 9-16), which date from the end of the second or the beginning of the third century—or rather, in the sources from which these Homilies were drawn—he was a personal disciple of Jesus, Palestinian by origin, but Alexandrian by residence, a strict adherent of the law; according to Hom. i. 8, ii. 4, Clement meets him in Alexandria, but in Clem. Recog. (17) the meeting was in Rome. According to this presumably earlier (but none the less unhistorical) representation, he proclaimed the gospel in Rome even during the lifetime of Jesus, and therefore before Peter. In Hom. 17 this statement is made only of some person who is left unnamed, and later means were found for the complete suppression of any such tradition, so full of danger to the authority of Peter and his alleged successors. From the fifth century onwards its place was taken by the statement that Barnabas was founder and bishop of the Church of Milan—a statement, however, accompanied by the clause, 'after he had been the first to preach the gospel in Rome.' It was upon this allegation that the archbishops of Milan afterwards based their claims to metropolitan authority over the whole of Northern and part of Central Italy. In the interests of Roman supremacy (which had originally been helped by it), the allegation was violently disputed by Roman theologians of the eighteenth century.

In complete independence of the Roman and Milanese tradition, there arose, after 431 A.D., the legend that Barnabas had been the missionary to his native island of Cyprus, and had suffered martyrdom at Salamis, where he was buried. On this plea the Cyprian church, between 485 and 488 A.D., obtained from the Emperor Zeno its independence of the Patriarchate of Antioch. The implied assumption is that Barnabas was an apostle in the full sense of the word.

Ecclesiastical writers often substitute him for Barsabbas (Acts 123; cp BARSABAS, § 2), perhaps on account of the name Joseph, common to both (the Sahidic and Philoxenian versions have, on the other hand, Josés in both cases, and there are isolated authorities for Barnabas alone), but perhaps in order to bring him nearer the apostolic circle. This object is effected in a more pronounced way by Clem. Recog. (160), which identify him with Matthias (Acts 126). There is an isolated notice in the (Gnostic) Actus Petri Vercellenses to the effect that Barnabas was sent along with Timothy to Macedonia before Paul's journey to Spain. Cp. Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch. ii. 2, pp. 270-320 (especially 310), 260, 373.

Tertullian's claim of the authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews for Barnabas is quite inadmissible. It is difficult to attribute to a born Levite

5. Alleged authorship. (Acts 436) such grave errors about the temple (or tabernacle) as occur in Heb. 93 f. 727; or to any member of the primitive church of Jerusalem any such declaration as that in Heb. 23, that he had first received the gospel at second hand through hearers of Jesus. Nor is such an origin consistent with the thoroughly Alexandrian character of the Epistle. Even, however, if we must refrain from basing any argument on the statements about Barnabas in Acts 436, we are still confronted by a decisive fact: the man who at a critical moment was so much subject to the Mosaic law (Gal. 213), could not have spoken of its abolition and even of its carnal character, as the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks in 712 18 16. Doubtless the Epistle to the Hebrews was attributed to Barnabas because it was supposed that the λόγος τῆς παρακλήσεως of Heb. 1322 could only have come from the υἱὸς παρακλήσεως of Acts 436.

That Barnabas should have written the anonymous epistle which since the time of Clement of Alexandria has borne his name, and on that account has been included among the writings of the 'apostolic fathers,' is still more inconceivable than his authorship of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It goes far beyond Paul in its assertion of freedom from the law. As to its date, see under ACTS (§ 16). F. W. S.

BARSABAS or BARSABBAS (§§ 48, 72). The etymology is doubtful. Βαρσαβας has been derived

1. Name. —which, however, as far as we know, is always the name of a country, never of a person), from בָּר ('son') and שָׁבָא or שָׁבָא ('Sheba,' which, however, as far as we know, is always the name of a country, never of a person), from בָּר and שָׁבָא (= 'warrior'; cp Nu. 31 53), or from בָּר and שָׁבָא ('old man's son'). Βαρσαββας ([Ti. WH] the better attested form of the name) suggests 'child of the Sabbath.' Dalman (Gram. d. jüd.-paläst. Aramäisch, 1894, p. 143) instances analogies to show that שָׁבָא or שָׁבָא could by contraction become שָׁבָא, though שָׁבָא is what we should more naturally expect in such a case.

1. Joseph Barsabbas, surnamed Justus (Ἰουδστος [Ti. WH]), was nominated, though not chosen, for the

2. Joseph. vacancy in the apostolate caused by the death of Judas. The account of the election in Acts 115-26 could not be held to be historical if we regarded the number twelve for the original apostolate as having been fixed, and invested with special dignity, only after the controversy as to Paul's equality in privilege with the apostles of Jerusalem. But even were we to set aside the reference to the δώδεκα in 1 Cor. 15 5, as being unparalleled elsewhere in the Pauline writings, we should still be at a loss to explain why Paul never vigorously protested against an innovation—if innovation it was—so arbitrary and so derogatory to his own position. Occasion enough for doing so presented itself in Gal. 2 and 2 Cor. 10-13. We must, accordingly, ascribe to Jesus himself the choice of twelve of his disciples who stood in peculiarly close relations to their Master. But in that case it was very natural that these should seek to keep up their number—that of the twelve tribes of Israel.

Whether the election was in Jerusalem is more open to question. On the arrest of Jesus all the disciples, according to Mk. 14 50 Mt. 26 56, had taken to flight, and that they should have returned to Jerusalem so soon is not likely. The view of Lk. and Jn., according to which they are present in Jerusalem on the day of the resurrection of Jesus (and remain there), cannot be reconciled with what we are told by Mk. and Mt.; the explanation is that the third and fourth evangelists found the statement of the first and second incredible. According to this last, Jesus, in Jerusalem, through the women, sends the disciples, who are also in Jerusalem, to Galilee, in order that he may there show himself to them. The kernel of historical fact, however, is not as Lk. and Jn. have it, but the reverse: namely, that the apostles were not in Jerusalem at all, but in Galilee, and thus in Galilee received the manifestations of their risen Lord. It may even be questioned whether they were again in Jerusalem and able to come forward publicly and unopposed so early as at the following Pentecost (see GIFTS, SPIRITUAL).

In a still higher degree must the discourse of Peter in Acts 116-22 be regarded as entirely the work of the author (see ACTS, § 14).

Instead of Ἰωσήφ in Acts 123, there is some (though inferior) authority for Ἰωσῆς, a reading due perhaps to a conjecture that the 'brethren of Jesus' named in Mk. 63 were of the number of the Twelve; the same conjecture, if in Acts 123 the reading Ἰωσήφ be retained, appears to find support in the fact that in Mt. 13 55 the brother of Jesus in question is called, not as in Mk. 63 Ἰωσῆς, but according to the best MSS Ἰωσήφ. The assumption, however, is quite inadmissible (see CLOPAS, §§ 4, 5).

According to Papias (Eus. HE iii. 39 9), Justus Barsabas drank deadly poison with impunity. From the fifth century onwards he is named as one of the seventy of Lk. 10 1; in the list of these preserved in Chron. Pasch. (Bonn ed. i. 400) he is identified with Thaddæus = Lebbæus; in that of Pseudo-Dorotheus (ib. ii. 128), with Jesus Justus (Col. 4 11), to whom the see of Eleutheropolis is assigned. In the Passio Pauli (attributed to Linus, but really dating from the 5th or 6th cent.) 'Barnabas et Justus,' in another redaction 'Barnabas Justus,' and in a third ὁ Βαρσαββας Ἰουδστος, are enumerated among servants of Nero who, converted by Paul, are cast into prison and condemned to death by the emperor, but afterwards released after an appearance of the risen Paul to the latter. The identification of this Justus with the biblical Barsabas seems to have been made at a comparatively late date. See Lipsius, Apokr. Ap.-gesch. i. 201-3, 24; ii. 194-96, 150, 161, 281 f.

2. Another Barsabbas called Judas appears in Acts 15:22-34, along with Silas, as a prominent member of the early church in Jerusalem, and as a πρόφητης—that is to say, as a man endowed with the gift of παράκλησις (see BARNABAS, § 1). The mission ascribed to him—that of conveying the decree of the council of Jerusalem—cannot, of course, be more historical than the decree itself (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 10).

BARTACUS (ΒΑΡΤΑΚΟΥ [BA], ΒΑΖΑΚΟΥ [L], BEZACIS [Vg.]), father of Apame, a concubine of Darius (1 Esd. 4:29). His title or epithet τοῦ θανμαστοῦ is obscure. Jos. (Ant. xi. 35) gives it as τοῦ θεμασίου, which may possibly be for μαθεσίου=old Pers. mathišta (simply 'colonel'), and, at any rate, is hardly a misunderstanding of the τοῦ θανμαστοῦ in 1 Esd. (RV 'the illustrious B.'). which is not a very natural epithet. The form given by Josephus, παβεζακου (cp Syr. ܒܪܬܐܩܘܝܐ), seems nearest to the original name, which was probably Artabāzak. Out of this 'Bartacus' may have arisen in this way: the MS had βαζακου, and over the first four letters was written αργα—a correction which the scribe misunderstood (so Marq. Fund. 65).

BARTHOLOMEW (ΒΑΡΘΟΛΟΜΑΙΟΣ [Ti. WH]) is enumerated in Mt. 10:3 Mk. 3:18 Lk. 6:14 Acts 1:13 (see

1. In NT. APOSTLE, § 1) as one of the twelve apostles of Jesus. The second portion of the name represents the OT proper name vocalised by MT as בְּרִיָּה (θολμει; for the variants see TALMAI). In Josephus (Ant. xx. 1:5) the name Tholomaios (θολομαῖος) occurs as borne by a robber-chief. It is not necessary to derive from Ptolemy (Πτολεμαῖος); the θ instead of τ is against this, though the second ο for ε presents no difficulty (Winer, ⁽⁸⁾ § 520 d). Bartholomew may have been either a genuine proper name like Barnabas, Barjesus, etc., or a mere addition to the real proper name of the bearer, given for the sake of distinction, like Simon Bar-jona (cp BARABBAS, § 2); on the latter supposition we do not know the true name of Bartholomew. It is the merest conjecture that identifies him with Nathanael (see NATHANAE). If we neglect this conjecture the NT has nothing further to tell us about Bartholomew.

Ecclesiastical tradition makes him a missionary to the most widely separated countries, and attributes to him a variety of martyrdoms. The oldest writer from whom we have a post- account of him is Eusebius (HE v. 103), who represents him as having preached in India (in those days a very wide geographical expression, including, for example, Arabia Felix), and as having left behind him there the Gospel according to Matthew in Hebrew; but Lipsius (Apokr. Ap.-gesch. ii. 254-108; cp Ergänz.-heft. 130 f., 189-191), from the closely related character of the tradition regarding him and Matthew, assigns an earlier date to a tradition that the shores of the Black Sea were the scene of the labours of both, although this tradition is found only in authors later than Eusebius. According to other accounts, he preached the Gospel among the Copts, or (with Thomas) in Armenia, or (with Philip) in Phrygia, and, after the death of Philip, in Lycaonia. In the lists of the apostles his name is always coupled with that of Philip, a fact which makes it all the more remarkable that in this group of legends he is expressly designated as one of the 'seventy' disciples of Lk. 10:1. On the other hand, the Parthian legend which gives Mesopotamia and Persia as the field of his labours, identifies him with Nathanael. A heretical Gospel of Bartholomew is mentioned by Jerome in his preface to Mt.

BARTIMÆUS (ΒΑΡΤΙΜΑΙΟΣ [Ti. WH]); on the accent see below, § 2, end), the name of the blind beggar whom (according to Mk. 10:46-52)

1. Story. Jesus healed as he was leaving Jericho for Jerusalem. The parallel narratives of Mt. and Lk. show various discrepancies in points of detail. According to Lk. 18:35-43 the healing happened as Jesus was entering, not when he was leaving, Jericho, and according to Mt. 20:29-34 two blind men were healed. It might perhaps be suggested that each of the two evangelists, or at least Mt., was thinking of some occurrence other than that recorded by Mk.; but, as against this, the very close coincidence with the text of Mk. shows clearly that both are dealing with the story which is associated in Mk. with the name of Bartimæus.

As regards this particular class of miracle, our judgment on which must depend on our doctrine of miracles in general, so much at least may be remarked, that in speaking to the disciples of John (Mt. 11:5=Lk. 7:22) of his giving sight to the blind, and other similar wonders, Jesus meant to be understood in a spiritual, not in a physical, sense. Otherwise the closing words, 'and to the poor the gospel is preached,' would have no force; for no proof of supernatural physical power is involved in this crowning instance. It is plain, however, that the evangelists understood his words in a physical sense. For in Mt. there is recorded, before the account of the message to John, not only the healing of a leper (8:1-4) and of a lame man (9:1-8), as in Lk., but also the bringing to life of Jairus's daughter (9:18-26), which Lk. records after that message (Lk. 8:40-56), the healing of a κωφός (9:32 f.), which Mk. does not record at all and which Lk. relates, like the raising of Jairus's daughter, after the message to John (11:14), and, above all, the healing of two blind men (9:27-31), which does not appear in the parallel narratives. It thus appears that, in the first gospel, instances of all five classes of miracle are recorded as having occurred before Jesus appeals to them (if we may disregard the consideration that in Mt. 9:32 f. κωφός is used in the sense of dumb; while Jesus in the message to John uses it in the sense of deaf). Lk., on the other hand, in whose narrative the message to John is preceded only by the raising of the widow's son at Nain (7:11-17), in addition to the healing of a leper and a lame man (5:12-26) relates in 7:21 that Jesus wrought upon many persons in the presence of the disciples of John the miracles to which he was immediately afterwards to appeal. Of these miracles we have no indication in the other evangelists. The conclusion is that the words 'to the poor the gospel is preached' cannot have been the addition of the evangelists or of any of their predecessors. The words destroy the physical-supernatural interpretation which the evangelists seek to put upon the preceding clauses. They are the authentic words of Jesus himself, and they prove that he did not claim to be a healer of the physically blind.

Some of the critics who argue that the evangelists have misapprehended Jesus's words do not deny the historicity of the story of Bartimæus. They point out that, in Mk.'s narrative at least, Bartimæus, 'casting away his garment, sprang up and came to Jesus' (and thus cannot have been completely blind); also that the event helps to render intelligible the popular enthusiasm at the entry of Jesus into Jerusalem immediately afterwards. They account for the divergence of Lk. by pointing out that for the story of Zacchæus a great concourse of people before the entry of Jesus into Jericho is required, and that the evangelist (erroneously) believed this to have been due to the healing of the blind man; Mt.'s divergence they account for by supposing that he had fused together the story of Bartimæus and that of the blind man, recorded in Mk. 8:22-26, which he had previously passed over. Finally, they appeal to the express mention of the name of the person healed—a rare thing in the gospels—as guaranteeing a genuine reminiscence.

This last argument would, of course, lose its validity should the name prove to be no real name

2. Name. but merely a description.

According to Payne Smith's Thes. Syr. 588, 1461-2, the Syrian lexicographers Bar 'Ali (circa 885 A.D.) and Elias of Anbar (circa 922) interpret Ἰμαῖος as meaning blind (samyā); similarly Onom. Sacr., ed. Lag. (1) 1735; Βαρτιμαῖος, νῖος τυφλός; and Jerome (ib. 6610) even gives the corrected form 'Barsame filius cæcus' and adds: 'quod et ipsum corrupte quidam Bartimæum legunt.' The reading Barsame, however, has no support except in Barhebraeus (ob. 1286 A.D.), who found in two Greek MSS 'Samya bar Samya';¹ and the interpretation 'blind' cannot be established. Hitzig, who upholds it, has only inferred an Aramaic ܒܪܚ, 'to be blind,' as being the intermediate step between the Syr. semi and the Arabic 'amiya of this meaning (in Merx's Archiv, 1 107 f., and Kritik paulinischer Briefe, 1870, p. 9 f.); but the inference is not sound. It would appear, then, that the ancient interpretation 'blind' was hit upon simply because τυφλός stood near. Neubauer (Stud. Bib. 1 57), without expressing any view as to the etymology, gives ܒܪܚ as the original form. This rests, however, only on the writing of the name in some MSS of the Vet. Lat. with th instead of z, and the termination -eas instead of -eus,—to which, however, the unanimous testimony of the Greek MSS is surely to be preferred (only D has Bapiretymias). Thus the most likely rendering of the name would be ܒܪܚ, 'son of the unclean.'

Accepting this interpretation, Volkmar still regarded the name as only a description of the actor in the story. Uncleaness, he argued, is the characteristic of the Gentile world; what Mk. means to say is, not that an individual man, but that the whole Gentile world, is freed from spiritual blindness by Jesus—that is, by the preaching of his gospel (Marcus u. d. Synopse, 422, 502-6, 675, 711 f.; Jesus Nazarenus, 266 f.). But in the sight of Christianity, Judaism, as well as heathenism, is blind, and Volkmar finds Judaism, too, represented, in the blind man whose healing is described in an earlier chapter (Mk. 8:22-26; see Marcus, 338 f., 403-11; Jesus Nazarenus, 243-5). The text, however, supplies not the slightest indication or hint that in the one place the Jews, in the other the Gentiles, are intended; in fact, as Bartimæus uses the words 'son of David' and 'Rabboni,' Volkmar finds himself constrained to pronounce him not a Gentile in the full sense of the word, but a proselyte—thereby, however, destroying his own position, which is that the two healings taken together express the deliverance by the gospel of the whole of humanity from spiritual blindness.

We are shut up, then, to the conclusion that Bartimæus is a proper name like Barnabas, Barjesus, and the like, and it is a matter of indifference whether the second element be the appellative ܒܪܚ, 'unclean,' or the personal name ܒܪܚ (Levy, Neuhebr. Wörterb. 2 154),¹ or the place name ܒܪܚ (ib. 166), or the second part of the Syriac place-name ܒܪܚ (Thes. Syr. 486, 1462), and whether any or all of the last three forms admit of being traced to a Jewish-Aramaic root ܒܪܚ, 'to close up' (Syr. ܒܪܚ).

Bartimæus remains a proper name, also, if the second part of it be supposed to be the Greek name Τίμαιος (found, e.g., in Plato). Origen seems to have had this derivation in his mind when he called Bartimæus ὁ τῆς τιμῆς ἐπώνυμος. Such a blending, however, of Aramaic and Greek is unlikely. On the other hand, it is not impossible that the Greek word may have had influence on the accent. With a Semitic derivation this would naturally be Βαρτιμαῖος, as in Ματθαῖος, Ζαχαρίας, and so forth. But just as, on the analogy of the very common Greek termination -αῖος, the accepted pronunciation of Urbanus and Silvanus was Οὐρβανός and Σίλβανός (Rom. 16:9 2 Cor. 1:19), although in Latin the accent lay on the penultimate, so conceivably the name under consideration may have been accented Βαρτιμαῖος, even without supposing it to be etymologically derived from the Greek.

BARUCH (ברוך, 'blessed [of God]'; ΒΑΡΟΥΧ [ΒΝΑΩ]; ΒΑΡΟΥΧΟΣ [Jos.]), son of Neriah and brother of SERAIAH (q.v., 4), one of Jeremiah's most faithful friends in the upper class of the citizens of Jerusalem (cp Jos. Ant. x. 91, ἐξ ἐπισήμου σφόδρα οἰκίας). We hear of Baruch first in 604 B.C. as the scribe who committed to writing the prophecies delivered by his master up to that date, and then in 603 B.C. (?) as the fearless reader of those prophecies before the people, the princes, and the king (Jer. 36). After the roll from which he read had been burned, Baruch wrote down the substance of the former roll afresh—a fact not without significance for the criticism of the Book of JEREMIAH (q.v.). In 587 B.C., it was to Baruch that Jeremiah when in prison committed the deeds of the land which he purchased from his cousin Hanamel at Anathoth (32:12), and after the fall of Jerusalem it was this faithful scribe who was charged with having induced Jeremiah to dissuade his countrymen from seeking a refuge in Egypt (43:3). The disciple appears to have been similar in character to his master. In the language of strong emotion he complained of the troubles which had come upon him, and of the wandering life which he was forced to lead. 'Seekest thou great things for thyself' (i.e., the leadership of a new and better Israel)? 'Seek them not' was the answer; for still worse troubles are in prospect; but Baruch's own life will be spared (45:1-5; cp 12:1-5). We may be thankful for this brief record of Baruch's inner life. Its genuineness has been too hastily doubted:¹ the date given in 45:1 is, of course, too early to suit the contents, and must be interpolated; but the prophecy itself is altogether in character with Jeremiah.

No other trustworthy facts respecting Baruch have reached us. In the Midrash Shir ha-Shirim (on Cant. 5:5) and in Megilla 16b, he is said to have been the teacher of Ezra; and the Midrash adds that Ezra did not go up to Jerusalem directly after the edict of Cyrus, because he did not like to miss the instructions of his teacher. This is obviously an attempt to prove the unbroken transmission of the oral tradition. An equally great and equally groundless honour was conferred on Baruch when Bunsen represented him as the 'great unnamed' prophet who composed Is. 40-66. That various apocryphal writings claimed Baruch as their author is not surprising: Ezra and Baruch, the two great scribes, were marked out for such distinctions. See APOCRYPHA, § 20; APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 5 f., and BARUCH, Book of.

BARUCH, Book of, a short book which in the LXX is placed immediately after Jeremiah, and is reckoned by the Roman Catholic Church as one of the so-called deuterocanonical writings.

Its contents may be summarised as follows:—

(Chap. 1:1-2.) The book is said to have been written

1. Contents. by Baruch the son of Neriah at Babylon in the fifth year, at the time when Jerusalem was burned by the Chaldeans.

(Chap. 1:3-14.) Baruch reads his book in the presence of Jeconiah (i.e., Jehoiachin), the son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, and in the presence of the other Jewish exiles who dwell at Babylon by the river Sud (Σοῦδ [?]). After mourning and fasting, they send money to Jerusalem to the priest Jehoiakim (Ἰωακίμ), the son of Hilkiyah, commanding him to offer sacrifices in behalf of Nebuchodonosor (Nebuchadrezzar) king of Babylon and his son Belshazzar, in order that Israel may find mercy. At the same time, the Jewish exiles send the following book, which is to be read publicly on feast days in the Temple.

(Chaps. 1:15-38.) This section is a confession of sin, put into the mouth of Israel and accompanied by prayers that God will at length pardon his people whom he has so justly punished. Special stress is laid upon the sin which the people committed in refusing to serve the king of Babylon, notwithstanding the solemn injunctions of the prophets.

(Chaps. 3:9-5:9.) Now follows a discourse addressed to the Israelites dispersed among the Gentiles. It begins by showing that the calamities of the people are due to their having forsaken God, the only source of wisdom, and then proceeds to console them with promises of restoration—Jerusalem will be gloriously re-established for ever and ever, and the oppressors of Israel are to be humbled to the dust.

It will be seen that the book is very far from presenting the appearance of an organic unity. After the

2. Integrity. heading of chap. 1, 'These are the words of the book which Baruch wrote,' etc., we might expect the book itself to follow immediately; but, instead of this, we have a long account of the effect produced upon the people by the reading of the book. Nor are we clearly informed whether 'the book' sent by the Jewish exiles to Jerusalem (1.14), which they cite at full length in the following section (1.15-38), is or is not identical with 'the book' written by Baruch. Moreover, the historical situation described in the narrative (1.3-13) does not agree very well with the subsequent portion, since the narrative assumes the continued existence of the temple, whereas 2.26 implies its destruction. Finally, the discourse which occupies all the latter half of the book begins quite abruptly and stands in no definite relation to what precedes: it presupposes, indeed, the dispersion of Israel; but to Baruch and to the special circumstances of the Babylonian captivity there is no allusion.

To these general considerations may be added several difficulties of detail. The date given in 1.2 is so obscurely worded that several modern commentators (e.g., Ewald and Kneucker) have felt obliged to emend the text. Even if the omission of the month be explained, we still have to decide whether 'the fifth year' means the fifth year of Jeconiah's captivity or the fifth year after the burning of Jerusalem; and to both views there are serious objections. Chap. 18 disturbs the sense, and if it be genuine must originally have stood in some other place.

Though the Book of Baruch never formed part of the Hebrew Canon (for which reason Jerome excluded it from his Latin translation of the Bible), it was regarded as authentic by many of the Christian fathers, from the second century onwards. Sometimes, owing to the place which it occupies in the LXX, it is cited as a part of Jeremiah. Even in quite recent times, it has been maintained by Roman Catholic theologians that the book is a translation of a genuine work of the well-known Baruch, the friend and secretary of the prophet Jeremiah. All competent critics, however, have long ago concluded that it dates from a very much later period, and belongs to the large class of Jewish books which were put forth under false names. Its origin and history remain, however, in some respects obscure. That 1.15-38 and 3.9-5.9 are by different authors is generally acknowledged: both in substance and in style there is a marked contrast, the language of the former section being simple and full of Hebraisms, while that of the latter is highly rhetorical. The dates of the various parts, however, and the question whether the whole or any part was originally written in Hebrew are matters about which critics differ.

Ewald ascribed the first half (1.1-38) to a Jew living in Babylonia or Persia under one of the latter Achaemenian kings, and regarded the rest of the book as having been written soon after the capture of Jerusalem by Ptolemy Soter (320 B.C.); 4.32 Ewald explained as a reference to the deportation of Jews to Alexandria. Very few critics, however, are now in favour of so early a date. Kneucker thinks that the work, in its original form, was composed in the reign of Domitian, and consisted of only the heading (i.e., 1.1-2 in part, 3), and the discourse contained in 3.9-5.9; the confession of sin (1.15-38) was, according to Kneucker, probably written a little earlier (in any case after the year 73 of our era) as an independent work, and was subsequently inserted into the Book of Baruch by a scribe, who himself composed 1.4-14. Schürer, on the contrary, whilst admitting that the middle of chap. 1 does not harmonise very well with what precedes and follows, thinks it on the whole probable that all the first half of the book (1.1-38) is by the same author, whom he places soon after the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A.D.), the second half being by a different hand but of about the same period.

With regard to the original language, Ewald, Kneucker, and others believe the whole to be a translation from the Hebrew, whilst Bertholdt, Hävernick, and Nöldeke regard the Greek as the primitive text. Fritzsche, Hilgenfeld, Reuss, and Schürer maintain the theory of a primitive Hebrew text in the case of the first half only. In favour of this hypothesis, it may be mentioned that on the margin of the Syro-Hexaplar text of Baruch there are three notes by a scribe stating that certain words in 1.17 and 2.3 are 'not found in the Hebrew' (cp APOCRYPHA, § 6 (1)).

As to the question of historical credibility, it is obvious that if, with the majority of critics, we ascribe the book to the Roman period, its value as a record of facts is reduced to nothing. Whether, for example, the statements about Baruch's residence in Babylon, the river Zōd, and the priest Jehoiaakim are based upon any really ancient tradition it is impossible for us to decide. The author of the first half borrows largely from Jeremiah and from Daniel; in the second half we find many reminiscences of Job and of the latter part of Isaiah; and it may be that sources now lost also were employed. It is particularly important to observe that the closing passage (4.36-5.9) bears a striking resemblance to one of the pieces in the so-called 'Psalms of Solomon' (Ps. 11—see the edition of Ryle and James, pp. lxxii.-lxxiv.), which probably date from about the middle of the first century B.C. Since there is every reason to believe that the Psalms of Solomon were originally composed in Hebrew (cp APOCALYPTIC, § 83), the close verbal agreement seems to indicate that the author of this part of Baruch used the Psalms of Solomon in their present Greek form.

The most important of the MSS containing the Greek text of Baruch are B, A, and the Marchalianus (Q). In A this book is missing. Fritzsche's edition of the Apocrypha (Libri apocryphi veteris testamenti graece, 1871) does not accurately represent the B text of Baruch; but trustworthy information about this MS may be obtained from Swete's Septuagint iii., in the preparation of which the photographic reproduction of B was used.

The ancient versions are—(1) the old Latin, contained in the editions of the Vg.; (2) another Latin version, first published at Rome in 1688 by Joseph Maria a Caro Tommasi; (3) the Old Syriac, edited by Paul de Lagarde in his Libri veteris testamenti apocryphi syriace, 1861, from a MS in the British Museum, Add. 17,105; (4) the Syro-Hexaplar—i.e., the Syriac translation of Origen's Hexaplaric text—contained in the Codex Ambrosianus, which was reproduced in photo-lithography by Ceriani in 1874; (5) the Ethiopic—a much abridged form of the text—ed. by Dillmann (Berlin 1894) in the 5th vol. of his Vetus Testamentum Ethiopicum; (6) the Armenian, of which the best edition is contained in the Armenian Bible published at Venice in 1805; (7) the Coptic, edited by Brugsch in ZÄ x.-xii.

Of modern commentaries the most valuable are those of Fritzsche (in Kurzegef. Handb., 1851), Reusch (Erklärung des Buchs Baruch, 1853), Ewald (Propheten des alten Bundes,⁽²⁾ iii. 1867-68), Kneucker (Das Buch Baruch, 1879), and Gifford (in Wace's Apocrypha, 1888). The best general account of the book will be found in Schürer (GVV, 1886-90, ii. pp. 721-726, ET). The reader may consult also Bertholdt (Einleitung, 1812-19, pt. iv.), Hävernick (De libro Baruchi commentatio critica, 1843), Hitzig (in ZWT 8 262-273), Hilgenfeld (ibid. 5 199-203, 22 437-454, 28 412-422), Nöldeke (ATliche Lit., 1868, p. 214 n.), Reuss (Gesch. d. heiligen Schriften ATs.,⁽²⁾ 1890), and the article on this book in Smith's DB,⁽²⁾ 1893—an article valuable chiefly on account of the additions made by Prof. Ryle. In many MSS and printed editions the apocryphal Epistle of Jeremiah is appended to Baruch, and it is reckoned in the Vg. as the sixth chapter of the book.

The Book 6. Appendices. of Baruch is not to be confounded with the Apocalypse of Baruch (see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 5 ff.). The work known as 'The Rest of the words of Baruch,' extant in Greek, Ethiopic, and Armenian, seems to be a Christian imitation of the Apocalypse of Baruch. We possess, moreover, a third apocalypse of Baruch extant in Greek and in Slavonic, and a fourth extant only in Ethiopic. The Greek text of the former has been published by James in his Apocrypha Anecdota, second series [97] (Texts and Studies, vol. 5, no. 2), where some information will be found also about the Ethiopic apocalypse (lii.). BARZILLAI (בָּרְזַי; Βερζελλ[ε] [BNAI]). The meaning can scarcely be 'iron,' for such a name would be without a parallel. According to Nestle (ZDPV 15257; cp Kampfmeyer, ib. 9), the name is Aramaic ('son of —?'); but the latter part of it is still obscure.

1. A wealthy Gileadite of Rögëlim, who befriended David in his flight from Absalom at Mahanaim (2 S. 17.27). He refused David's offer to live at the court at Jerusalem, but entrusted to him his son CHIMHAM

A man who married one of the daughters of (2) and changed his name to Barzillai.¹ In post-exilic times the b'ne Barzillai were among those deposed from the priesthood because they were unable to prove their pedigree. In 1 Esd. 5 38 the original name of the founder of the family is said to have been JADDUS, AV APPUS (αδδους [B], ιοδδ. The same passage gives AUGIA as the name of his wife.

4. A man of Abel-meholah (not far, therefore, from Gilead), whose son ADRIEL (q.v.) also has been thought to bear an Aramaic name (2 S. 218).

1. Name. appellative sense of the word, to judge from the Arab. *būḥāinat*¹, was probably 'fertile, rich and stoneless soil': see Wetzstein, in Del. Hiob⁽²⁾ [App.], 556 f.: ḡāšān βασαν or ἡ βασανεῖτις, the name of the broad and fertile tract of country on the E. of Jordan, bounded (somewhat roughly) on the S. by the Yarmūk and a line passing through Edre'i and Salchah (mentioned as border cities in Dt. 3 10), on the E. by the imposing range of extinct volcanoes called the Jebel Ḥaurān, on the W. by Geshur and Ma'acah (see Josh. 12 5), and on the N. stretching out towards Ḥermon (cp Dt. 33 22: see further, on the limits of Bashan, Guthe, ZDPV, 1890, pp. 231-4). The name (in its Gk. form Baravala,² and its Arabic form *Bathaniyeh*³) was, however, afterwards restricted to the southern portion of the area thus defined, other parts of the ancient 'Bashan' being distinguished as TRACHONITIS (q.v.)—i.e., the remarkable pear-shaped volcanic formation in the NE. now called the Lejā—Auranitis (probably the Jebel Ḥaurān and its environs in the SE.), and Gaulanitis (which, however, may have included parts of Geshur and Ma'acah, beyond the limits of Bashan proper) in the West. The principal part of the Bashan of the OT must have been the broad rolling prairie now called by the Bedawin en-Nukra, a word properly denoting the 'hollow hearth' dug by the Bedawi in the middle of his tent, and applied to this great plain because, though it is some 1800-2000 ft. above the level of the sea, it forms a depression between the hilly Jaulān (across the Nahr er-Rukḡād) on the W., the Zumleh range on the S., and the Jebel Ḥaurān and the Lejā on the E.:¹ the S. and SE. part of en-Nukra also bears the special name of Ḥaurān (q.v.).

Bashan, as defined above, is distinguished geologically from the country S. of it. The Yarmūk forms a natural

2. Character. dividing line, on the S. of which the limestone comes to the surface, while on the N. it is covered by volcanic deposits. Jebel Ḥaurān, on the SE., is simply a range of extinct volcanoes; volcanic peaks extend from N. to S. in Jaulān, along the edge of the Jordan valley, on the W.;² and there are isolated volcanic hills in other parts of the country. The Lejā, that strange 'petrified ocean' NW. of the Jebel Ḥaurān, which measures some 25 m. from N. to S. by 19 from E. to W. (see TRACHONITIS), owes its origin entirely to streams of basaltic lava emitted from the Gharārāt el-Kibliyeh, a now extinct volcano at the NW. corner of the Jebel Ḥaurān. The soil both of the slopes of the Jebel Ḥaurān and of the Nukra is a rich red loam,³ formed by the lava scoria, which has become disintegrated under atmospheric action. The soil thus constituted is celebrated for its fertility: the best corn grows upon it, and in summer time the plain is covered far and wide with waving crops. The country is, however, in general almost entirely destitute of trees: only on the slopes of Jebel Ḥaurān, especially in its central and southern parts, are there abundant forests of evergreen oak⁴ (cp the allusions to the 'oaks of Bashan' in the OT: Is. 2 13 Zech. 11 2 Ez. 27 6, also Is. 33 9 (ἡ ἑλ[ε]λαια), Nah. 1 4). In ancient times, also, it must have supplied rich pastures: the strong and well-nourished herds of Bashan are mentioned in Ps. 22 13 [12] (ἡ οἰτ[ί]ς Am. 4 1 Ez. 39 18 (ἡ οἰτ[ί]ς) Dt. 32 14 (ἡ ταύρων); cp also Mic. 7 14 Jer. 50 19 (ἡ οἰτ[ί]ς). The lofty conical summits of the volcanoes forming the Ḥaurān range (cp Porter, 183, 186, 190, 227, 250) are no doubt the 'mountains with peaks,' which the poet of Ps. 68 16 f. [15 f.] pictures as looking enviously at the comparatively unimposing mountain of Zion.

The principal towns of Bashan mentioned in the OT are the two royal cities of 'Og (Dt. 14 Josh. 12 4 βασα

3. Towns. [B]), 'ASHTAROTH, now probably either Tell 'Ashterā or Tell 'Ash'ari, in the middle of en-Nukra, and EDRE'i, now Der'at, on its S. border, GOLAN (Dt. 4 43), somewhere in the W., and SALCHAH (Dt. 3 10), now Ṣalchad, a frontier-fortress in a commanding position overlooking the desert in the SE. corner of Bashan, S. of Jebel Ḥaurān. Boṣra, between Edre'i and Salchah, though not mentioned till 1 Macc. 5 26 ff. (Βοσορ [ANV*]; but see BOSOR), also was, no doubt, an important place: the site is still marked by extensive remains belonging to the Roman age. 'Threescore fenced cities, with high walls, gates and bars,' forming the kingdom of 'Og, are likewise mentioned in Dt. 3 4 (cp 1 K. 4 13) as situate in the 'region of Argob,' in Bashan. The position of Argob, and, consequently, the positions of those cities as well, are uncertain (see ARGOB, 1); but there are remains of many ancient towns and villages in these parts, especially in the Lejā, and on the sloping sides of the Jebel Ḥaurān; according to Wetzstein, for example (Hauran, 42), there are 300 such ancient sites on the E. and S. slopes of the Jebel Ḥaurān alone.

The dwellings in these deserted localities are of a remarkable character. Some are the habitations of Troglodytes, being caverns hollowed out in the mountain-side, and so arranged as to form separate chambers; these are found chiefly on the E. of the Jebel Haurān. Others are subterranean abodes entered by shafts invisible from above; these are frequent on the W. of the Zumleth range, and at Edrei the dwellings thus constructed form quite an underground city. Commonly, the dwellings are built in the ordinary manner above ground; but they are constructed of massive well-hewn blocks of black basalt—the regular and indeed the only building material used in the country—with heavy doors moving on pivots, outside staircases, galleries, and roofs, all of the same material; 1 of this kind are, for example, the houses at Burāk, on the N. edge of the Lejā, at Sauwarah, El-Hazm, Deir Nileh, Hiyāt, Hīt, Bathaniyeh, Shaḳā, Shubba, E. of it, Kanawāt and Suweideh, on the W. slopes of Jebel Haurān, Šalchad, Kureiyeh, and Bosra, on its SE. slope, and Nejṛān, Ezra, Khubab, Dāmā, and Mismeiyeh, within the Lejā itself.² Many of these cities are in such a good state of preservation that it is difficult for the traveller to realise that they are uninhabited, and in the Lejā especially, where the ground itself is of the same dark and sombre hue, unrelieved by a touch of green, or a single sign of life, a feeling of weirdness comes over him as he traverses their desolate and silent streets.

The architecture of the buildings contained in these cities (comprising temples, theatres, aqueducts, churches, etc.) stamps them as belonging to the Græco-Roman age, and is such as to show that between the first and the seventh centuries A.D. they were the home of a thriving and wealthy people. May any of these cities date from a remoter antiquity, and be actually the fortified places pointed to with wonder in Dt. 34 f. and 1 K. 413? The question was answered in the affirmative by Porter³ and by Cyril Graham,⁴ who believed that they had really rediscovered the cities 'built and occupied some forty centuries ago' by the giant race of the Rephāim; but this view cannot be sustained. The best authorities are unanimous in the opinion that, though in some cases very ancient building materials may be preserved in them, the extant remains are not, as a rule, of a date earlier than the first century, A.D.⁵ Dt. 34 f. and 1 K. 413 are sufficient evidence that in the seventh century B.C. there were in Bashan strongly fortified places which were popularly supposed to have belonged to the ancient kingdom of Og; but none of the existing deserted cities can be as ancient as this. At the same time, it is not improbable that some of the cities built during and after the reign of Herod may have stood upon the sites of cities belonging to a much earlier age, and that in their construction the materials employed in building the more ancient cities may in some cases have been utilised and preserved.

As regards the history of Bashan, it is stated in Nu. 21.33-35 that the Israelites after their conquest of Sihon, king of Heshbon, turned in the direction

4. History. of Bashan, defeated Og its king, who came out to meet them as far as his frontier fortress of Edrei, and took possession of his territory. The passage is in the context of JE; but it agrees so closely, in form as well as in substance, with Dt. 31-3, that Dillmann and other critics consider this to have been its original place, supposing it to have been inserted afterwards into the text of Numbers for the purpose of supplying what seemed to be an omission.

All other notices of the same occurrence in the historical books are Deuteronomic (or later): Israel's ancient victories over 'Sihon king of the Amorites and Og the king of Bashan' being two national successes, to which, especially, the writers of the Deuteronomic school were never weary of referring (Dt. 14 31 ff. 447 296 f. 7] 814 Josh. 210 9 10 124 f. 1311 f. 3 K. 419; see also, later, Nu. 32 33 [R], Neh. 9 22 Ps 135 11 186 19 f.)

The territory of Bashan fell to the possession of the half-tribe of Manasseh (Dt. 313 443 Josh. 13 29-31 [Basarevi B v. 30]). Golan and 'Ashtaroth are stated in P to have been Levitical cities (Josh. 21 27, cp 1 Ch. 6 56 [71]); the former also is named as a city of refuge (Dt. 443 Josh. 208 21 27).

Bashan played no prominent part in the history; and it is rarely mentioned in a historical connection. In 1 K. 413 it forms one of Solomon's commissariat districts; and in 2 K. 1033 it is included in the enumeration of trans-Jordanic regions which were 'smitten' by Hazael. Its inhabitants may be presumed to have suffered, like their neighbours in Gilead, on other occasions during the Syrian wars, and finally to have been carried into exile by Tiglath-pileser in 734 (2 K. 15 29); but in neither connection are they expressly mentioned. Apart from the prehistoric 'threescore cities' of the Argob, settled civilisation appears to have begun for the region of Bashan about the time of the Christian era, when its Semitic inhabitants first fell under Greek and Roman influence. The most important event in the history of the country, however, was its incorporation by Trajan, in 106 A.D., in his newly-founded province of Arabia. Then it was that Roman culture impressed itself visibly upon both the surface of the country and the character of its inhabitants; and towns, with great public buildings, of which the remains, as described above, survive to this day, sprang up in every part of it and continued to thrive for many centuries.¹

BASHAN-HAVOTH-JAIR (הַבְּשָׁן הַחֹתַיִר) occurs in Dt. 314 (ΒΑΣΣΕΜΑΘ ΑΥΘΩΘ ΙΔΕΙΟΙ [B*], ΒΑΣΑΝ ΑΥΘΩΘ ΙΔΕΙΟΙ [Bab (vid.) (ut vid.) AFL]), where AV renders, 'and (Jair) called them after his own name, Bashan-havoth-jair.' This version does justice to the present text, but certainly does not represent the mind of the original writer. The awkward (indeed, impossible) expression Bashan-havoth-jair can be accounted for only on the hypothesis that the first element in it (Bashan) is a misplaced gloss from the margin. RV seeks to evade the difficulty by rendering, 'called them, even Bashan, after his own name, HAVVOTH-JAIR.' On the geographical difficulty which still remains, see HAVVOTH-JAIR.

BASILISK, RV rendering of בַּשְׂמַת (Is. 14:29), בַּשְׂמַת (Is. 11:8), for which AV has COCKATRICE [q.v.].

BASKETS of various kinds were used by the Hebrews, and were doubtless not unlike those which are often found depicted upon Egyptian monuments—large open baskets for fruit etc. (cp illustration, Wilk. Anc. Egypt. 1:379), which could be borne upon the head (ib. 383, cp Gen. 40:16 f.), baskets to collect earth in the manufacture of bricks (on a supposed reference to which in Ps. 81:6, see BRICK), or deep wicker ones slung upon a yoke (ib. 380). Especially noteworthy is the large carpenter's tool-basket made of rush (a kind common throughout W. Asia), a specimen of which is now in the British Museum (cp ib. 401). The references to baskets present many points of interest; suffice it to refer to the difficult saying in Prov. 25:11, which RV renders, 'A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in baskets (AV 'pictures'; RVmg. 'filigree work') of silver,' where the implied notion is that the golden-hued apples look all the more beautiful in silver baskets. But (1) golden, not golden-hued apples (quinces) must be meant, if the text be correct; 'gold' and 'silver' must both be taken literally. (2) 'Baskets' is an impossible rendering, and 'filigree work,' though more plausible, is still hypothetical. (3) 'Fitly' has no sound linguistic basis. This is a case in which no weak emendation, affecting one or two letters, suffices.

Frankenberg has tried such a one; the sense produced is—Golden gravings (מְחֻטָּה) on silver chased work, (So is) a word spoken to the trustworthy (אֱמֻנָה) of silver, i.e., a word spoken to the receptive is as ineffaceable as the chased work referred to. Not very natural, and not a good parallel to v. 12.

By emending the text more boldly (but avoiding arbitrary guessing, and following parallels found elsewhere) it is possible to reach this excellent sense¹—

A necklace of pearls in sockets of wreathen gold,
(So is) a word of the wise to him who hears it.

It is really only a slightly different version of the next proverb:

A ring of gold and an ornament of fine gold,

Of the other Hebrew words rendered 'basket,' dud (דֹּד) (Is. 14:29), zene (זֶנֶה) (Is. 11:8), and sal (סַל) were used for general purposes, see COOKING, § 2. Nowack (Arch. 1:146) suggests that these were similar in character to the clay and straw basin of the modern fellahin. The former may perhaps denote loosely any pot or jar, since we find it used for cooking in 1 S. 2:14 (cp BDB s.v.). The last-named (sal), a reed basket (equivalent to the Gr. kanoun [by which it is rendered] and Lat. canistrum),² has been brought into connection with the reduplicated form סַלְסַל, Jer. 6:9 (EV 'grape-gatherers' baskets'; Θ καρταλλος).³ This, however, is doubtful, and indeed the text is uncertain (cp Pesh.). RVmg. renders 'shoots'; but this is סַלְסַל; cp VINE. For סַלְסַל (Am. 8:1; אֵגְרוֹס [Θ]), used also of a bird-cage, see CAGE.

In the NT mention is made of (α) σαργάνη, a basket of braid-work (used especially of fish-baskets), in which Paul escaped from Damascus (2 Cor. 11:33). In Acts 9:25, however, the word is (δ) στυρίς (WH prefer στυρίς), the basket in the miracle of the 4000 (Mt. 15:37 etc.). Both were probably larger than (ε) the κόφινος, in the miracle of the 5000 (Mt. 14:20 etc.). The last-mentioned was an essentially Jewish article (quorum cophinus fenumque supellex, Juv. 8:14), whose size may perhaps be determined from the use of the word to denote a Boeotian measure of about 2 gallons (vide Corp. Inscr. Gr., 1625, 46). T. K. C.

BASON (Amer. RV BASIN). That all the words (one Greek and four Hebrew) denote hollow vessels adapted to receive and contain liquids is certain; but what was the general form, and wherein the peculiarity of each consisted we have no means of determining. This uncertainty is sufficiently proved by the frequent variations in the EV renderings. On the whole subject, see BOWL, CUP, GOBLET, and cp ALTAR, § 10; COOKING UTENSILS, FOOD, MEALS, § 12; POTTERY.

1. בַּסֶּן, aggân (see BDB Lex. s.v.; κατήρη [BNA etc.]), a large bason (EV) or bowl used in the temple ritual (Ex. 24:6). In Is. 22:24 EV, 'cups' (om. BNAQT, αγαλῶθ [Theod. Qmg.]). On account of its shape, it is employed in Cant. 7:2 [3] as a simile in the eulogy of the bride (EV 'goblet'); see Che. ad loc. JQR, April 1899.

2. בִּכּוּר, keḇer (cp MH כִּבּוּר goblet), for which AV 'bason,' RV 'bowl' consistently, occurs only as a vessel used in the temple. Θ found it unintelligible. 1 Ch. 28:17 (om. 3. מִזְרִיָּה, mizriyâ (a vessel for throwing or tossing a liquid, φιάλη).¹ With the exception of Am. 6:6 (Θ βαζ, τὸν δουλισμένον οἶνον, as though πῶρ; see MEALS, § 12 and 2 Ch. 4:11), this utensil is used only in the temple sacrificial ritual. EV renders variously 'bason' (e.g., Ex. 27:38 3 2 K. 12:13 [14] etc.) or 'bowl' (Am. 6:6, Zech. 9:15 14:20 Nu. 7:13 etc.; see ALTAR, § 9).

4. בַּסֶּן, saph, a temple utensil (1 K. 7:50 2 K. 12:13 [14] Jer. 52:19 [where Aq. (Qmg.) ὕδρια, Sym. φιάλη]; AV 'bowls,' but RV 'cups' [so EV in Zech. 12:2]), used also in the ritual of the Passover (Ex. 12:22). The pl. בַּסֶּן, evidently denoting domestic utensils, occurs in 2 S. 17:28 (Θ βαλ λέβητες);² but see Klo. ad loc.

5. νιτήρη used in Jn. 13:5 of the 'bason' (EV) in which Jesus washed the feet of the disciples (cp νιτήρ=πῶρ Gen. 18:4 etc.). The utensil must have been larger than any of the above. The Pal.-Syr. (Evang. Hierosol.) renders by ܒܫܐܢܐ; cp Heb. בַּסֶּן, and see BOWL, 7.

BASTARD (בַּשְׂמַת). The mamsēr is mentioned along with the Ammonite and Moabite as excluded from the 'congregation' (Dt. 23:2 [3]). The Heb. word is of uncertain derivation, and the EV rendering is based upon the Vss. (ἐκ πόρωνης [Bab mg. et sup ras A³L], B*F om.). More probably the word means one of mixed or alien birth (so Zech. 9:6, ἀλλογενής [BNAQ]), and among the Rabbins it was the term applied to relations between whom marriage was forbidden (cp Mish. Yebam. 4:13). It is presupposed by Θ in Nah. 3:17 (ὁ σύμμικτός σου [BNAQ]), where MT has בַּשְׂמַת (EV 'thy crowned ones'), and is rather infelicitously accepted by Wellhausen who thinks that the reference is to the mixed population of Nineveh. Ruben is certainly right in conjecturing בַּשְׂמַת, 'thy measuring clerks' (see SCRIBE). For bastardy, in its religious connection, cp COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 10.

² Apart from the two exceptions mentioned, Θ regularly thinks of בַּסֶּן 'threshold,' and renders θύρα πρόθυρον (in Jer. 1:2, σαφῶς).

BAT (בַּתְּיָמִין, lit. 'night-flier'?) ΝΥΚΤΕΡΙC; vesperilio.² Lev. 11:19 Dt. 14:18 Is. 2:20; also Bar. 6:21. The bats form a well-defined and very numerous order of mammalia, termed by naturalists the Cheiroptera. The position of the name at the end of the list of unclean birds, and immediately before the list of reptiles, accords with the universal opinion of antiquity that the bat, in Aristotle's words, 'belonged both to birds and to beasts, and shared the nature of both and of neither';³ nor is it in any way surprising to find them included, apparently, amongst birds, for bats alone amongst mammals have developed the faculty of true flight, and have become so modified by their aerial habits that their power of progressing on the ground is markedly inferior to that of most birds and insects. They show, in fact, a strong aversion to being on the ground, and, as a rule, at once try to leave it, by crawling up some wall or tree from which they can take their flight.

The nature of their food (either insects or fruit) makes it necessary for those bats which inhabit temperate climates either to migrate at the approach of winter or to spend the cold months in a long winter sleep, for which purpose they often collect in large colonies in caves, ruins, or disused buildings. As a rule the bats of the Old World choose the latter alternative, and this seems to be the case with many of those found in Palestine. When food again becomes abundant, they as a rule sleep during the day suspended head downwards by their feet, and leave their homes only to search for food at the approach of twilight. The majority of the bats of Palestine (and they are very numerous) inhabit caves, caverns, tombs, ruins, and disused buildings of all kinds, where they can avoid the light, a fact referred to in Is. 2:20 f.

As many as seventeen distinct species of bats, belonging to four different families and eleven different genera, have been described by Canon Tristram. Two or three of these may be mentioned by name. The only representative of the fruit-eating bats (Megachiroptera) is Xantharphya (Cynonycteris) egyptiaca, a species which is elsewhere arboreal in its habits, but in Palestine is found living in large colonies in caves and tombs. A further peculiarity of this species is that individual specimens from different localities vary markedly in size, those from Kurn in the plain of Acre being much smaller than those from the hills near Tyre, which resemble in size the variety found in Cyprus and Egypt. This species is very commonly found inside the Pyramids of Egypt and is believed to be the one so often figured in Egyptian frescoes.

The horse-shoe bat Rhinolophus ferrum-equinum is the commonest bat in Palestine, swarming in immense numbers in the caverns along the Jordan and the Red Sea. It has a wide distribution, extending from England to Japan and all over Africa. It collects in large colonies (180 have been found together) in caves and ruins for its winter sleep, and these colonies are peculiar as they are exclusively of one sex.

Another British bat very common in the hill country about Bethlehem, Jerusalem, and the Sea of Galilee, is the long-eared bat, Plecotus auritus, usually found in caverns. It is always very late in leaving its resting-place, not appearing till twilight has changed to night; but it continues to hunt for the insects on which it feeds the whole night through. N. M.—A. E. ¹ According to Schultens, Clar. Dial. 322, from the root which appears in Ar. as gaṭila 'to be dark' (of night), and ḡay 'to fly.' It must, however, be said that compounds are very rare in Hebrew; and the modification of form involved in this case is improbable. It might be thought, from the absence of the word in the cognate languages (in the language of the Targums it is simply borrowed from Hebrew), that it is a loan-word which came in from a non-Semitic source; but there is much to be said for the view that it is connected with Aram. artel, 'naked' (from the character of a bat's wings), as suggested by Löw (see Ges. HWB (11)), or with the root ḡay, which in Hebrew has the sense of being covered or darkened.

² The Peshitta has in Leviticus and Deuteronomy the curious rendering 'peacock,' but in Is. 2:20 Bar. 6:21 employs the proper Syriac word for 'bat'; the Arabic version has 'bat' in Leviticus and Deuteronomy, but (like the Targum) goes astray in a mistaken paraphrase of Is. 2:20.

BATHSHEBA

BATH (בַּת, deriv. uncertain; cp BDB. s.v.), Is. 5:10. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BATH-RABBIM (בַּת־רַבִּים, 'daughter of multitudes', [BDB]; ΘΥΓΑΤΡΟΣ ΠΟΛΛΩΝ [BNA]; filia multitudinis; Cant. 7:4[5]). The eyes of the bride are likened to the 'pools in Heshbon by the gate of Bath-rabbim.' With true insight, Grätz in 1871 recognised the impossibility of the reading Bath-rabbim; he suggested Rabbath-Ammon. Certainly this is possible; and NW. of Heshbon, in a lateral valley of the Wady Heshbān, old reservoirs have been found. We cannot, however, suppose that these reservoirs were so famous as to be celebrated in a popular song beside Carmel and the Tower of Lebanon. 'Heshbon' as well as 'Bath-rabbim' must be wrong. Winckler's suggestion 'Helbon' (AOF 1293 f.) fits in with the mention of Lebanon, but has no other recommendation. Considering that there is deep-seated corruption in the next verse (see HAIR, GALLERY, 2), we are justified in making an emendation which might otherwise seem too bold. The most famous pools in Palestine, outside of Jerusalem, were no doubt those known as the Pools of Solomon (see CONDUITS, § 3). In the long green vale of 'Artās, unusually green among the rocky knolls of Judaea, Solomon, according to post-exilic belief, 'planted him vineyards, and made him gardens and paradises . . . and made him pools of water, to water therefrom the forest where trees were reared' (Eccles. 2:4-6). Probably it is this scenery that has suggested several descriptive passages in Canticles (Stanley; Del.); it was worthy to be mentioned beside Carmel and Lebanon. Read בְּחֶשְׁבֹן, and (with Wi.) יַעַר, and render

Thine eyes are like Solomon's pools
By the wood of Beth-cerem.

Beth-cerem, 'place of a vineyard,' was probably the name of some part of the garden-land referred to in Eccles. 2:4-6. See JQR, April 1899. Cp BETH-HACCEREM. T. K. C.

BATHSHEBA (בַּת־שֶׁעִי, 'daughter of the oath' (?), § 48; in 1 Ch. 3:5 בַּת־שֶׁעִי, where the pointing should be corrected to בַּת־שֶׁעִי; in GBAL, by a strange confusion, ΒΗΡΘΑΒΕΕ = Beersheba), wife of Uriah the Hittite, afterwards wife of David and mother of Solomon 2 S. 11:2-12:24 (ΒΗΘΘΑΒΕΕ [A]) 1 K. 1:1 f. (ΒΗΘΘΑΒΕΕ in 1:115). Some think that she was a granddaughter of AHITHOPHEL (q.v.).

When David first saw Bathsheba, Joab was engaged in the siege of Rabbath Ammon. The king himself was reposing, after his years of hardship, at Jerusalem. The story (which is omitted in Chronicles) is that, walking one evening on the flat roof of his palace, David saw a beautiful woman bathing in the court of a neighbouring house. He asked who she was, and, learning that her husband Uriah was away with the army, 'sent messengers and took her' (2 S. 11:4). To avert the shock which an open act of adultery would have caused to the ancient Israelitish sense of right, he devised the woful expedient related in 2 S. 11:6-25. First he had Uriah sent to him, ostensibly with a message from the camp. He dismissed him to his house with a portion from the royal table; but Uriah remained with the guard of the palace: he scrupled, if Robertson Smith may be followed (Rel. Sem. (2) 455, 484), to violate the taboo on sexual intercourse applied to warriors in ancient Israel. The next night the king plied him with wine; but still Uriah was obstinate. Driven desperate, his master sent the brave soldier back to Joab, bearing a letter ordering his own destruction. Uriah was to be set in the place of danger and then abandoned to the foe. The cruel and treacherous plan was carried out, and, when Bathsheba's mourning for her husband was over, David made her his wife.

The story of the rebuke of Nathan, of the revival of the king's better self, and of the sickness and death of the child of Bathsheba, is well known. It is a question, however (see Schwally, ZATW 12 153 ff.; Bu. SBOT 89), whether, in the original form of the narrative, 2 S. 12^{15b} did not follow on 12¹⁷, which means treating the most edifying part of the story as a later amplification (see DAVID, § 11). Considering what we know of the gradual idealisation of the life of David (which culminates in Chronicles and the titles of the Psalms), this appears far from impossible. The story gains in clearness by the omission. At any rate, Wellhausen is right in regarding 12¹⁰⁻¹² as an interpolation in the narrative of the colloquy between David and Nathan. It was suggested by an intelligent reading of the subsequent history. David's evil example was imitated in exaggerated form by Amnon; and Amnon's sin was fruitful in troubles, which culminated in Absalom's rebellion, and darkened all David's remaining years.

We meet Bathsheba for the last time, just as David's end was at hand, in the full glory of a queen-mother. Solomon rises to meet her, bows down before her, and sets her on a seat at his right hand. She gained her object, and it is interesting (if Nathan really took the part assigned to him in 2 S. 12¹⁻¹⁵) to notice that Nathan was one of her chief supporters.

BATTLE AXE. The rendering is not very happy, as will at once be seen.

1. בָּרֵךְ, marbēs Jer. 51²⁰ (διασκορπίζεις σύ [BNAQT]); or בָּרֵךְ, marbēs (Prov. 25 18 ρόπαλον [BNC.3 A]—πανον [N*]). EV's rendering 'maul' introduces an arbitrary distinction. Better, 'battle hammer,' or 'club' (cp בָּרֵךְ). In Ezek. 9² בָּרֵךְ (πέλυσ) should possibly be corrected into כְּשֶׁחֶת, 'his destroying weapon' (Che.); 'battle axe' (RVmg.), 'slaughter weapon' (EV), 'a weapon of his breaking in pieces' (AVmg.) are all difficult to justify.

2. כָּרָךְ Ps. 35 3 RVmg. The usual rendering (Del., Bā., etc., accepting MT's vocalisation [רָכַךְ] and Verss.) is 'stop the way' (ὅς σύνκλεισον). This involves a double ellipsis—'shut up [the way], [going] against my pursuers.' It is improbable, however, that כָּרָךְ means 'battle axe'; σάγαις may mean the battle axe used in upper Asia; but this does not justify the inference of critics (Drus., Grot., Kenn., Ew., Dri., We., etc.). The text needs emendation (see JAVELIN, 7).

BATTLEMENT. For עֲקָרָה, ma'akeh, Dt. 22⁸ EV, see House, § 4. For עֲקָרָה, binnoth, 2 Ch. 26 15 Zeph. 1 16 86 RV, and עֲקָרָה, emāsoth (plur.), Is. 54 12 SBOT, RV pinnacles' (cp עֲקָרָה Ps. 84 12 [Bā.]), see FORTRESS, § 5. עֲקָרָה, kānāph, in Dan. 9 27 RVmg. is rendered 'battlement.' It is better to read נִצֵּב, kanno (see Bevan, ad loc.).

BAYITH (בַּיִת), Is. 15 2 RV; AV BAJITH.

BAY TREE (בָּרֵךְ) 2 Ps. 37 35), or, more plausibly, as

1 כְּשֶׁחֶת, 'destruction,' we know; but בָּרֵךְ, 'breaking in pieces,' is unattested elsewhere. Co. recognises that the closing words of Ezek. 9 1 are no part of the true text, but represent a variant to the equivalent words in v. 2.

2 ⚔ has no rendering of בָּרֵךְ in this passage, since for כְּשֶׁחֶת it reads לבנן כְּשֶׁחֶת (ὡς τὰς κέδρους τοῦ Διβάνου [BNART]). Aq., Symm., and Editio Sexta all render in the sense of 'indigenous tree'; and neither Pesh. nor Targ. supports the rendering of AV or that of RV.

BDELLIUM

RV, 'a tree in its native soil.' The word בָּרֵךְ, 'native born,' however (from the root בָּרַח, 'to arise,' 'spring forth' [Barth, 152 c.]), cannot be applied to a tree, whence Celsius (Hierob. i. 194 ff.) supposed the phrase to mean ἀνὴρ ἐπιχώριος.

As Hi., Gr., Che., Bā., We., Dr. agree, the right reading is כָּרָךְ 'cedar.' On the (probably) corrupt words כָּרָךְ (Dr. 'putting forth his strength') and כָּרָךְ (Dr. 'spreading'), see Che. Psalms (2).

BAZLUTH (בָּזְלֻת, 'stripping'?; βακαλωθ [NA]).

BDELLIUM (בָּדֵלִיּוֹן; Gen. 2 12 ἀνθραξ [AEL]; Nu. 11 7 κρυσταλλοκ¹ [BAFL]), appears in Gen. 2 12

1. Bēdhōlah ONYX as a characteristic product of the = βδέλλιον. land of Havilah; whilst in Nu. 11 7 its 'appearance' (so RV, lit. 'eye,' not COLOUR [q.v., § 3], as AV) is likened to that of manna—a comparison the appropriateness of which is obvious if, as is in all probability the case, the OT bēdhōlah is the resinous substance known to the Greeks as βδέλλιον, μάδελκον, βολχόν² (Dioscor. 1 80) or βδέλλα (Peripl. Mar. Eryth., §§ 37 39 48 f.).

Peiser identifies בָּדֵלִיּוֹן with Bab. bidlā, a spice obtained in Babylonia, and often mentioned in contract-tablets (ZATW 17 347 f.); this is important in connection with the Eden-story (see PARADISE). As Glaser has shown (Skizze, 2 364 ff.), bdellium was distinct from storax (against Hommel, GBA 613 n. 1). Bochart, identifying Havilah with the Arabian coast opposite Bahrain, in the Persian Gulf naturally explained בָּדֵלִיּוֹן as meaning pearl (Hieroz. ii. 55). This view, however, lacks the support of any ancient version, and, though upheld by several Jewish authorities (cp Lag. Or. 2 44), has no solid foundation. The renderings of ⚔ (ἀνθραξ and κρυσταλλος) point to some kind of precious stone; but, as Di. remarks, ⚔, 'stone,' is prefixed to ⚔, the word following, and not to בָּדֵלִיּוֹן. The Pesh. bēdulā (in both places) seems to be due to a mere scribe's error: r for d. It cannot be supposed to be a genuine Aramaic word.

Bdellium is described by Dioscorides (l.c.) as δάκρυον δένδρου ἀραβικοῦ³; the best sort being 'bitter in taste, out and easily softened, unmixed with chips or dirt, fragrant when burnt as incense, resembling onyx⁴; he speaks also of a black sort found in large lumps, which is exported from India, and of a third kind, brought from Petra. Pliny (VI 12 9) gives some further details: the best sort grows in Bactriana (N. Afghanistan), on a 'black' tree 'of the size of an olive, with a leaf like the oak and fruit like the wild fig'; it also grows in Arabia, India, Media, and Babylon, that of India being softer and more gummy, while that brought through Media is more brittle, crusted, and bitter. The author of the Peripl. mar. Erythr. speaks of it as growing largely in Gedrosia (Beluchistan) and Barygaza (Gujerat), and as exported westwards from the mouth of the Indus. In the older classical literature bdellium appears to be mentioned only in Plautus (Curc. 101),⁵ in a list of perfumes.

2. Descriptions transparent, gelatinous (ταυροκολλῶδες, lit. 'like bull's hide glue'), oily throughout of βδέλλιον.

Two of the kinds of bdellium described by Dioscorides are generally identified by the authorities with the two substances described as follows, kinds. which are still met with in commerce:—

1 In both places οἱ λαῖποι, i.e., Aq., Symm., and Th., have βδέλλιον, so Vg. bdellium. Cp Jos. Ant. iii. 1⁶.

2 The exact form of these two words is uncertain. Pliny (12 9) has maldacum, brochon. On the connection of this group of names with bēdhōlah, see Del. Par. 16 f., 101. Pott in WZKM 7 98 ff.

3 The reading of this word is uncertain.

4 Perhaps a 'nail' or 'hoof'.

BEACON

1. Ordinary Bdelium (African).—The drug is exported from the whole Somali coast to Mokha, Jidda, Aden, Makulla, the Persian Gulf, India, and even China' (Flückiger and Hanbury, Pharmacogr. (2) 145). Hanbury says he had it sent him for sale in London from China; but in matters of this kind the immediate port of origin is often substituted for the ultimate source.

Dymock (Pharmacogr. Ind. 1310) says: 'From Berbera also comes Bdelium. Further on he explains that 'to a certain extent' it 'resembles myrrh,' but that it is darker . . . less oily . . . strongly bitter and has hardly any aroma' (l.c. 310). According to Mohammedan writers (l.c. 312), 'Good bdelium should be clean, bright, sticky, soft, sweet-smelling, yellowish, and bitter.' Its botanical source is Balsamodendron africanum (see Kew Bull. 1896, p. 91 f.).

2. Indian Bdelium.—Dymock (l.c. 310) describes this as somewhat resembling the African drug; 'but the colour is lighter, often greenish.' Dioscorides, therefore, must have had a very dirty sample—a not infrequent experience still. Its source is Balsamodendron Mukul, a plant the botanical distribution of which—NW. India, Beluchistan, and possibly Arabia—exactly agrees with the statements of the old authors. The only difficulty is the description of Pliny, which it does not fit very well, as it is a small tree; but Pliny's statements cannot be pressed from the botanical point of view: Lemaire (Flore de Virgile, 125) calls Dioscorides 'bien préférable à Plin.'

As to the third kind of bdelium spoken of by Dioscorides, Dymock (310) conjectures that it was 'probably a kind of myrrh.' N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

BEACON (בִּיעוֹן), perhaps from בִּיעוֹן, see ASH; $\beta\alpha\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$ [BNAOQI], or rather, as in EV^{mg}, $\mu\alpha\sigma\tau$ (cp Is. 33:23 Ez. 27:5), employed in Is. 80:17 as a simile of nakedness and desolation. The reference is to the poles, etc., erected in prominent places for signalling purposes; cp ENSIGNS (§ 2).

BEALOTH (בְּעִלְוֹת), Josh. 15:24. See BAALATH-BEER.

BEAN, or rather Bēan (RV), The children of (ΥΙΟΙ ΒΑΙΑΝ [ANV]; BEAN [Vg.]; $\beta\alpha\alpha\upsilon\omicron\varsigma$; BEAN, Jos. Ant. xii. 81), an otherwise unknown tribe or community, who in the pre-Maccabean period were a 'snare and offence' to the Jews 'in that they lay in wait for them in the ways.' Their robber castles or 'towers' lay, apparently, somewhere between Idumæan and Ammonite territory. This would suit the Beon of Nu. 32:3 (see BAAL-MEON). In one of his warlike expeditions against the unfriendly surrounding peoples after the reconsecration of the temple, Judas the Maccabee utterly destroyed the children of Bean and burnt their towers (1 Macc. 5:4 f.; cp 2 Macc. 10:18 f.).

BEANS (βῆλος, $\kappa\gamma\alpha\mu\omicron\varsigma$ [BAL] 2 S. 17:28 Ez. 4:9) are twice mentioned as material for food, along with wheat, barley, and lentils; in the second passage Ezekiel is instructed to make bread of a mixture of wheat, barley, beans, lentils, millet, and spelt. The Hebrew name is found also in post-biblical Hebrew, Jewish Aramaic, Arabic, and Ethiopic. Beans are the seeds of Vicia Faba (Linn.), the cultivated plant—not certainly known in the wild state, but in all probability a domesticated form of *Vicia narbonensis*²—which is a native of the whole Mediterranean region and extends eastward to N. India. It was the $\kappa\beta\alpha\mu\omicron\varsigma$ of the Greeks, which is mentioned as far back as the Iliad ($\kappa\beta\alpha\mu\omicron\iota$ $\mu\epsilon\lambda\alpha\nu\acute{o}\chi\rho\omicron\epsilon\varsigma$, 13:589). Virchow found the seeds in the excavations at Troy, and the plant was cultivated in Switzerland and Italy in the age of bronze. Beans are, without doubt, one of the earliest articles of vegetable food among the European races of mankind. Cp FOOD, § 4, COOKING, § 7. N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

BEAR

BEAR. 1. (בֶּרֶךְ). The name, common to Heb., Aram., Ar., and Eth., is from a root signifying to move slowly and softly,¹ and thus befits the bear, which has a stealthy tread.

The Heb. word is generally masc., even when the she-bear is intended; thus 'a bear robbed of her whelps' is always בֶּרֶךְ שָׁמַיִל. On the other hand, the pl. בְּרִימִים takes a fem. verb in 2 K. 2:24, and the sing. is apparently fem. in Is. 11:7. \mathfrak{B} renders $\acute{\alpha}\rho\kappa\omicron\varsigma$ [BAL], but in Prov. 17:12 wrongly $\mu\acute{\epsilon}\rho\iota\mu\upsilon\alpha$ [BNA] (connecting probably with בָּרָח, 'to be anxious'); Theod. has $\acute{\alpha}\rho\kappa\omicron\varsigma$. In Prov. 28:15 \mathfrak{B} has $\lambda\acute{\upsilon}\kappa\omicron\varsigma$ [BNA twice], easily explained when we remember that the Aram. form of $\lambda\omega$, wolf, is $\lambda\acute{o}\lambda\lambda$.

The animal is frequently mentioned in OT (in the Apoc. in Wisd. 11:17 Ecclus. 25:17 [NA; but $\sigma\acute{\alpha}\kappa\kappa\omicron\nu$ (B)] and 47:3†) and once (Rev. 13:2).

2. Allusions. in NT. No difficulty arises in connection with any of the OT passages; the attacks of the lion and the bear on David's flock (1 S. 17:34 36), and of the she-bears² on the children who mocked Elisha (2 K. 2:24), accord with the ravenous habits of the animal; 'a bear robbed of her whelps' (2 S. 17:8 Prov. 17:12 Hos. 13:8) or 'a ranging bear' (Prov. 28:15) is naturally regarded as the most dangerous possible object to encounter; one of the signs of profound peace in the Messiah's kingdom is that the cow feeds side by side with the bear, its natural enemy (Is. 11:7). The roaring, or rather moaning, of the bear is well expressed by the verb בָּרַךְ (Is. 59:11, \mathfrak{B} $\sigma\tau\epsilon\nu\acute{\alpha}\zeta\omega$), which is applied also to the howling of a dog, the cooing of a turtle-dove, the sighing of a man, and the moaning of the sea. The stealthiness of a bear's attack is mentioned in Lam. 3:10. By the likening of the second (probably the Median) kingdom in Dan. 7:5 to a bear—which 'was raised up on one side, and three ribs were in his mouth between his teeth; and they said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh,'—the extreme destructiveness of the Median conquests is probably indicated (see further Bevan's Daniel, in loc.). In Am. 5:19 'as if a man did flee from a lion, and a bear met him,' we have, as Bochart remarks, a Hebrew equivalent to the classical

'Incidit in Scyllam cupiens vitare Charybdin.'³

In the combination of the 'feet of a bear' with the body of a leopard and the mouth of a lion in Rev. 13:2, we have an instance of the characteristic re-combination of elements borrowed from OT apocalyptic. The hyperbolic treatment of old history in later Jewish literature is illustrated by the mention in Wisd. 11:17 of wild beasts, such as lions and bears, among the plagues sent upon the Egyptians, and by the statement about David in Ecclus. 47:3 that 'he played (Heb. . . . לִכְפִּירִים שָׁחַק, 'he mocked at . . .') among lions as among kids, and among bears as among lambs of the flock.'

Finally, we notice the interesting reading of \mathfrak{B} in Ecclus. 25:17:

A woman's wickedness altereth her visage
And darkeneth her face as doth a bear ($\acute{\omega}\varsigma \acute{\alpha}\rho\kappa\omicron\varsigma$).

If this reading be correct, the verse will allude to the tristitia or moroseness often attributed to the bear, which several ancient writers speak of as expressed in its countenance. On the whole, however, it is more probable that \mathfrak{B} (supported by the Syr. and Ar. versions) is right in reading

And maketh her face dark like sackcloth ($\acute{\omega}\varsigma \sigma\acute{\alpha}\kappa\kappa\omicron\nu$).

3. Natural history. arctos, although somewhat lighter in colour and smaller than the typical varieties. It has a wide distribution, ¹ The other meaning of the Ar. verb, 'to have a bristly skin,' is probably, as Ges. thinks, secondary, and derived from the noun dubb.

² It was a common opinion in antiquity that she-bears were fiercer than the males; thus Pliny (11:49), 'Mares in omni genere fortiores præterquam pantheris et ursis.'

the son of APHIAH [q.v.], an ancestor of Saul, 1 S. 9:1 (Βαχεϊ [B], Βεχωραθ [A], μαχεϊρ¹ [L]. The name is really to be read as BECHER [q.v.]; it is the name of Saul's clan. Cp Kto. on 1 S. 9:1 and Marq. Fund. 14.

BECTILETH (ΒΑΙΚΤΕΙΛΑΙΘ [B], ΒΕΚΤΕΛΕΘ and ΠΑΚΤΑΛΙΑ [A], ΒΑΙΤΟΥΛΙΑ [N*], ΒΕΚΤΙΛΕΘ [N^c.a]; Beth-Κ^e-tilath, 'house of slaughter' [Syr.], THE PLAIN OF, three days' journey from Nineveh, 'near the mountain which is at the left hand of upper Cilicia' [Judith2ar]. Grotius has suggested Ptolemy's βακταιαλλη in Syria (Ptol. v. 15:6; cp the Bactiali of the Tab. Pent. 21 R. m. from Antioch); but this does not agree with the situation as defined in the text. The name of the mountain is given as Ange, Agge by It. Vg. and as  by the Syr. (so Lag.). For the latter Walton gives  'mountain of pots,' which suggests that the name may have arisen from reading חרש, 'potsherd,' for an original חרשא, or חרשא,  תל, which actually occurs as a place-name. See TEL-HARSHA.

BED. Oriental beds in the olden time cannot always have been so simple as we are led to suppose that they generally are to-day. Both the frame-

1. General conditions. generally are to-day. Both the framework and the trappings of the bed were sometimes richly ornamented. Of course, manners changed and luxury grew. Egypt was perhaps in advance of other nations; but even in Egypt the priests were wont to use beds of a very simple kind. If they had any frames at all, they were wicker-work of palm-branches, resembling the kafas of the modern Egyptian (cp Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. 1 185 f., 419 f.).² The early Israelites were naturally slow in their material progress. Shepherds, for example, sleeping in the open air (cp Gen. 31 40), would wrap themselves in their simlah or rug³ (Ex. 22 26 [25]), and, if need were, used stones for their head-rests (Gen. 28 11). Tent-dwellers too would be content with that useful article—the simlah, and this was probably what Sisera was wrapped in when he lay down to sleep⁴ (Judg. 4 18). Those who dwelt in the house were protected from the weather, but knew no luxury. Great persons had special sleeping-chambers. Ishbaal for example, was murdered in such a room (חֶדֶר מִשְׁכָּב, 2 S. 4 7; cp Ex. 8 3 [7 28], 2 K. 6 12; also חֶדֶר 2 S. 13 10; 1 K. 1 15 Ps. 105 30 (corr. text), and in the highly civilised period represented by Ecclesiastes it was perhaps the usual arrangement (Eccles. 10 20). Considering, however, how rare special bedrooms are in Eastern houses now, and also the poor construction of the houses in ancient Palestine, we can hardly venture to suppose that a ‘chamber of beds,’ (חֶדֶר מִשְׁכָּב, 2 K. 11 2 2 Ch. 22 11) was common among the Israelites. Guests, however, enjoyed privacy in the so-called upper-story (ὑπερφῶν in G and NT), which was on a part of the flat roof, where coolness could be enjoyed (עֲלִית מִתְּכָה, 2 K. 4 10 Kto. עֲלִית, 1 K. 17 19 23). And in such rude houses as may still be seen in parts of Palestine, and were doubtless common in antiquity, the upper chamber would necessarily be the sleeping-room of the family, as long as the weather permitted (see HOUSE, § 2). During the ² Porphyry calls them by the name bais, from the Coptic bai, 'palm-branch.' Cp baia, 1 Macc. 13:51 (where the form of the Greek is doubtful) Jn. 12:13 and Symm. Cant. 79.

³ So the modern Arab sleeps, e.g., on the roof of the mosque (Doughty); a šimlātun (שִׁמְלָה) is still the chief article of his wardrobe—an oblong piece of thick woollen stuff, used for an outer garment by day and for a coverlet by night. See Dozy, Dict. des Vêtements des Arabes, 39.

4 For the unintelligible שְׂמִינָה (Judg. 4:18) read with Che. שְׂמִינָה; a more technical term than מְסִינָה (Grätz) is required. Moore (ad loc.) frankly states that the main exegetical tradition points to a coarse rug or wrap.

summer, in the absence of a latticed upper chamber, huts of boughs on the flat roof could be used (for a description of such see Schumacher, Across the Jordan, 89).

2. Terms. The bed itself is called generally (a) מִטָּה miṭṭāh (from נָמַה, 'to stretch,' cp κλινῆ from κλινω; Gen. 48₂ etc.); (b) מִשְׁכָּב miškābh (properly 'place for lying,' Gen. 49₄ etc.); and (c) עֶרֶשׁ eres

(properly bedstead, Prov. 7 16).

אֶת־הַמִּטָּה LIT. g-v. (י), Cant. 3:7 RV is used in a S. 3:2 of a hier. עֲשֵׂה מִטָּה is used collectively of the bedding, etc. in a S. 17:28 (where read pl.). There seems to be no distinction between these three words: בֶּדֶן and עֲשֵׂה occur together in parallelism in Job 7:13, א and ע similarly in Ps. 66 [7]. The variant rendering 'couch' is employed arbitrarily, for the sake of differentiation, by EV in Job 7:13 (מִשְׁכָּב), by AV in Am. 3:2 (עֵר), by RV בֶּדֶן (מִטָּה), and by EV in Am. 6:4 (עֵר).

Other words rendered 'bed' are (d) yāq, yāšūa' (properly 'spread out', Ps. 686 [7], Job. 17.13), used also of the bed of wedlock in Gen. 49.4 (cp Ch. 5.1); an extension of meaning similar to that borne by κοίτη in Heb. 13.4 (but cp Lk. 11.7 etc.); cp Ar. ʾirs, conjux. From the same root is derived also (e) maššāʾ, Is. 28.20 (see below on 2 K. 3.15).

In NT κοίτη (cp above), κλίνη (Mk. 730 etc.²), κλινίδιον (Lk. 519 24, EV 'couch'), and κράββατος = Lat. grabbatus, Mk. 2 4 etc.). The Book of Judith adds στρωμνή (139), which may perhaps = מִטָּה.

For אַפּריל, Cant. 39 AVmg., see PALANQUIN, and for עֵרֶנֶת, ib. 513, cp GARDEN.

To-day the divan, or platform, which goes along the side or end of an Oriental room serves as a rest for the bedding. This arrangement may have been

3. Construction. This arrangement may have been known in N. Israel as early as the time of Amos (see below § 5) : but if so it was con-

Amos (see below, § 5); but, if so, it was confined to the rich. What we know for certain is that the beds were movable (1 S. 19¹⁵: Saul wishes to have David brought to him in the bed), and this characterises all periods (see Lk. 5:8 and cp σπρωγνύς in Mk. 14:15 Acts 9:34). Thus (cp below, § 5) they could be used by day as seats or couches (Ezek. 23:41). In some cases the bed was fitted with a head (cp Gen. 47:31),³ such perhaps as we find represented on Egyptian monuments (cp Wilk. op. cit. 1:46 fig. 191). That Og, king of Bashan, had an iron bedstead, according to Dt 3:11, is a statement of EV which most scholars would question. The wide application of Semitic words for 'bed' justifies the rendering 'couch of death'—i.e., sarcophagus.⁴

Basaltic sarcophagi abound in the E. of Jordan, and a giant could well be enclosed in 'Hiram's tomb,' as the Bedouins still designate one of them,⁵ which is said to measure twelve feet by six.

The cloths or rugs spread over a bedstead were called קִרְבָּיִם (Prov. 7:16), and very possibly the singular of this word is to be substituted for the obscure קָבִי and קִבְבִּי found in 1 S. 19:13:16 and 2 K. 8:15 respectively (see above, § 2, on Judith 139). Neither of the latter words was understood in antiquity,⁶ and the revisers

² In 74 the word does not appear in the best texts (so RV).

⁴ We can hardly say with Driver (Deut. 53) that 'the supposed meaning of עֶרֶשׁ is little more than conjectural.' The evidence from a comparison of usages is overwhelming. If Ešmānazar can use מִשְׁכָּב for his death-couch, the Deuteronomist may of course use עֶרֶשׁ for that of Og. עֶרֶשׁ, indeed, occurs in a Palmyrene bilingual from eṭ-Tayyibeh in this sense. Cp also מִשְׁכָּב in 2S.83, and the Syr. use of ܡܫܟܒܐ (n. 1 above). It must be remembered too that the Deuteronomist assumes an oratorical style. He ought not to be required to use the technical Hebrew term for sarcophagus, אֲרוֹן (Gen. 5026). Cp Schwally, ZATW, 1898, p. 127, n. 3 (who would render either 'bed' or [cp Aram. עֶרְשָׁא] 'bier').

Of pillows we hear nothing in OT. In Mk. 4:38 we have προσκεφάλαιον (cp Ezek. 13:18 Ⓞ, 4. Pillows. AV 'pillow'; but it was an extemporised pillow; RV better, 'cushion'.

AV—even sometimes RV—does indeed assume the use of pillows. Thus (a) בִּרְאֵי (with suffix) is rendered 'bolster' by AV in 1 S. 19:13 16 26:7 11 16, and by AVmg. in 1 K. 19:6; and 'pillow' by AV in Gen. 28:11 18. The word, however, denotes properly 'the parts about one's head,' and is thus rendered by RV everywhere (e.g., 1 S. 19:13, 'at the head thereof'), and once even by AV in 1 K. 19:6. The Heb. word finds its exact parallel in the בִּרְאֵי (with suffix), 'the parts about (one's) feet' (Ruth 3:14). (b) For בִּרְאֵי in 1 S. 19:13 16, EV has 'pillow,' while RVmg. offers 'quilt' or 'network' (so Ew., cp בִּרְאֵי, a sieve); but see § 3. (c) The 'pillows' of the prophetesses (so Ⓞ προσκεφάλαιον; cp Vg. Pesh. Targ.) in Ez. 13:18 20 are purely imaginary. בִּרְאֵי appears to mean some kind of magical amulet carried by the prophetesses; cp Ass. kasā, 'to bind,' kasītu (Del. in Baer, Ezek. xii. 7).

It is impossible to separate the subject of beds from that of couches or divans. Amos, as a dweller in the country, directs his scorn against the luxury of the rich grandees 'that sit in Samaria in the corner of a couch, and on the silken cushions of a bed' (Am. 3:12 Ⓞ, RV). The rendering of RV is indefensible: Damascus and damask have no connection (see DAMASCUS, § 6 n.). The passage has been cleared up with an approach to certainty by critical conjecture: it should run thus, 'that sit in Samaria on the carpet (בִּרְאֵי) of a couch, and on the cushion (בִּרְאֵי) of a divan.'¹ From another passage, which also can be restored very nearly to its original clearness (see DAVID, § 12 n.), we learn that the couches of the great were richly adorned. The selfish grandees are described as those 'that lie upon couches (or beds, בִּרְאֵי, of ivory,' Am. 6:4). Such couches were sent as tribute by Hezekiah to Nineveh (KB 2:97, l. 36), and the Amarna Tablets (520; cp 27:2028) speak of 'beds' (iršu) of ivory, gold, and wood sent to the king of Egypt. So too in Esther (1:6; cp 1 Esd. 3:6) we read of couches adorned with gold and silver, and covered with rich tapestry and deckings from Egypt (cp Prov. 7:16). Some of these couches would of course be used as beds. Such, at any rate, was the gorgeous bed (κλίνη) in the tent of Hophernes. The description of it contains the first mention of a 'canopy' (κωνόπιον, Judith 10:21 13:9 16:19, originally a fly-net)—one of the results of Greek influence; HELLENISM, § 15.

BEDAD (בִּדַּד; Βαδὰδ [BADEL]), the father of Hadad I., king of Edom, Gen. 36:35 1 Ch. 1:46 (Βαδὰμ [L]). The name is seemingly a corruption of Bir-dadda—i.e., probably, Bir is Dadda (two names of the storm-god best known as Rammān): cp with this Bir-zur (בִּרְזֹר, Panammu inscr. from Zenjirli, 1, 3). Waiti, the 'king of Arabia' conquered by Ašur-bāni-pal, had for his father Bir-dadda (KB 2:222 f.), a name which answers to the Assyrian name Bir-rammān (the eponym for 848 B.C.). Hommel (Beitr. z. Ass., 1897, p. 270) derives from Be-(Ha)dad—i.e., by Hadad;—cp BAANA, BE-ESHTERAH. T. K. C.

BEDAN (בִּדַּן; BADAN, or [Cod. Am.] BENEDAN).

1. In an address ascribed to Samuel we find Bedan mentioned between Jerubbaal and Jephthah as one of the chief deliverers of Israel (1 S. 12:11 MT). No such name occurs in the Book of Judges, however, and the form of the name is suspicious.

Ew. supposed that the initial letter had been dropped, and that we should read Abdon (עֲבֹדָן, Judg. 12:13). Abdon, however, is one of the six 'minor Judges' introduced into the

By reading BERAIAH (q.v.) as above, we gain a second name in which creation (בְּרָא) is referred to by the distinctive exilic and post-exilic term. See CREATION, § 30.

BEE (בִּיָּה), Μελίττα; Dt. 1:44 Judg. 14:8 Ps. 118:12 Pr. 6:8 Ⓞ Is. 7:8 Ecclus. 5:7 [N⁴] 11:3 4 Macc. 14:19† has for its Hebrew name a word derived from a root meaning to lead (or to be led) in order. Thus it means properly a member of a swarm (cp examen from ex-ago). Besides the familiar incident of Samson finding a swarm of bees in the lion's carcase (recalling Vergil's story of Aristæus and other classical allusions, see below), we have in the OT two references to the angry assaults of bees on those who meddle with their hives (Dt. 1:44 Ps. 118:12 [MT];² cp 4 Macc. 14:19), and a likening of the Assyrian power to a bee summoned by the sound of a hiss to settle on the land of Israel³ (Is. 7:18). In Prov. 6, at the close of the exhortation to the sluggard to learn from the ant and her ways, Ⓞ has the following addition to the Hebrew text:—

Or go thou to the bee
And learn how diligent she is,
And how noble (σεμνή) is the work that she doeth;
Whose labours kings and private men use for health,
And she is desired and honourable in the eyes of all:
Though she be weak in strength,
By honouring wisdom she is advanced.

We may compare the words of the son of Sirach (11:3).

The bee is little among such as fly,
But her fruit is the chief of sweet things.

The common bee of Palestine is Apis fasciata, Latr.; some authorities regard it as a distinct species, others as a sub-species of the cosmopolitan honey-bee Apis mellifica. In favour of the latter view it is stated that when crossed with races of the same species it breeds freely; but, on the other hand, it differs in size and colour from the English bee, being smaller and lighter, and beautifully striped. The colonies are large and very many, Palestine being a country well adapted for the needs of insects which flourish in the sun and feed on flowers.

Bees are found wild, making their hives in crevices of the rocks and hollow trees, etc.; and, even at the present day, many of the Arabs make a living by collecting wild honey and bringing it into the towns for sale. Bee-keeping is much practised in the East (where honey is largely used in cooking), the hives, according to Canon Tristram, being tubular structures 3 or 4 ft. long, and some 8 in. in diameter, roughly made of sun-dried mud. The ends of the tube are closed with a tile perforated with a hole for the access of the bees. Many of the hives are piled up together and covered with boughs for the sake of shade. When the combs

² Ⓞ has 'as bees about wax,' which Bā., Che.⁽¹⁾ adopt; but בִּרְאֵי comes from עֲבֹדָן, a rival reading to עֲבֹדָן (Che. Ps. 11:3). In cod. 8 Ecclus. 5:7 a corrector has added ὡς μελισσαι εκπιθουσαι.

³ The ancients believed that it was possible to summon bees by sounds, such as the beating of metal: see Verg. Georg. 4:45, and the other passages cited by Bochart (Hieroz. 4:10).

are stored with honey the end is removed and the comb pulled out with a hook. It is possible that this method of apiculture is of considerable antiquity—the art was well known in classical times, and the bee has been, as Darwin points out, ‘semi-domesticated from an extremely remote period,’—but there is no reference to it in the OT or the NT.

The temper of this race of bees is very irritable, and they are very revengeful; indeed, it seems that the farther East one travels, the more the bee is to be avoided. This eagerness to attack may explain such passages as Dt. 14 Ps. 118¹², which, if they referred to the English bee, would seem exaggerated. A few years ago some hives of this Eastern race were introduced into the South of England, but proved so aggressive that they had to be destroyed. They are very active on the wing and fly great distances.

The passage in Judg. (148), which describes Samson finding ‘a swarm of bees and honey in the carcase of the lion,’ reads strangely. It is, however, by no means improbable that in the hot dry climate of Palestine the body of a lion might dry up quickly, and it is possible that the flesh of the animal might have been removed by ants. The skeleton might then form an attractive shelter for a hive. On the other hand, Baron Osten Sacken¹ has recently drawn attention to the widely-spread myth called Bugonia, which is that bees are generated in the bodies of dead animals, more especially in the carcases of oxen. This myth frequently occurs in ancient and mediæval literature,² and was believed and quoted by distinguished naturalists as late as the middle of the seventeenth century. Its explanation, according to our author, lies in the fact that a true fly (Eristalis tenax, one of the Diptera), which mimics a bee so closely as to deceive those who are not entomologists, lays its eggs in decaying meat. This provides food for the maggots. After the pupa stages emerges the mature insect. As it flies away, it would be almost certainly taken for a bee. The theory is ingenious; but it does not account for the honey in the lion’s carcase, and at present, although the Eristalis undoubtedly lays its eggs in filth, the evidence that it does so in dead bodies is somewhat scanty.

A story parallel to Samson’s is to the effect that recently, when the tomb of Petrarch at Arqua was opened, it was found that a swarm of bees had made their honeycomb on the remains of the poet.

The Palestine bee, which is found S. of Mount Carmel, differs from the Syrian bee found in Asiatic Turkey N. of that district. The latter is of a deeper gray. Both races are larger than the Cyprian bee, which is slender and wasp-like. The Egyptian bee resembles the Syrian in size, but is yellow and of an unusually fierce temperament. See also HONEY.

This, the original form of the name, was later altered by the scrupulous copyists to ELIADA in 2 S. 516 (but βααλιαθ [L] and -ειμαθ in B’s secondary [see DAVID, § 11 (d) β] list) and 1 Ch. 38, when Baal had become objectionable as a name of God (WRS, OTJC² 68). BEELZEBUL

BEELZEBUL, as in RV^{mg.}; EV Beelzebub; name of the ruler of the demons (αρχων των δαιμονιων), Mt. 1025 1224 27 Mk. 322 Lk. 1115 1874.

EV follows Text. Rec., which has βεελζεβουβ (so Pesh.); but final l is better attested (βεελζεβουλ [cā Syr.Hcl.]; so Ti. Treg.).

WH, following B and partly M, read everywhere βεεζεβουλ, which, Weiss insists, must be original; but this scepticism as to the l in βεελ is paradoxical. The word βεεζεβουλ is inexplicable and hardly pronounceable, and the famous passage in Mt. 1025, where the οικοδεσποτης is said to be insultingly called Bee(l)zebul, implies the speaker’s consciousness that βεε is one element in the title.

The name differs in two respects from the traditional name of the god of Ekron: (1) its first part is Aramaic,

2. Explanation. Still, we cannot doubt that Bēelzēbūl is identical with Baāl-zēbūb. This heathen god seemed at one moment to be the rival of Yahwē (2 K. 13), and his name naturally rose to Jewish lips when demoniacal possession was spoken of, because of the demoniacal origin assumed for heathen oracles. The title occurs nowhere in Jewish literature, and must, therefore, have lost its popularity after the time of Christ. There were, in fact, so many names of demons that we cannot be surprised that some once popular names passed out of use. If we ask how the name Beel-zebub, or rather Beel-zebul, came to be popular, the answer is—first, that the title Baal-zebul was probably not confined to the god of Ekron, but was once known in Palestine pretty widely, so that a traditional knowledge of it, as well as of the synonymous title BAAL-ZEPHON [g.v.], can be presumed among the Jews and their neighbours even apart from 2 K. 1; and next, that Lk. 954 shows that special interest was felt by the Jews of the time of Christ in the strange narrative in which the name Baal-zebub occurs. That the form Baal-zēbūl was generally preferred may be presumed from the best accredited Greek text of the Gospels—the knowledge of this form must have come to the Jews by tradition and by intercourse with their neighbours—but it is probable enough that Bēel-zēbūb also was current, and from Mt. 1025 we are obliged to assume that some teachers pronounced the name Beel-zebub, with the view of interpreting it Beel-dēbaitha = οικοδεσποτης, ‘lord of the house’—γ and η being easily interchanged.¹ (An analogy for this can be found in the Elohist’s play upon Zebulun, as if Zebudun, in Gen. 3020.) The interpretation was correct (see BAAL-ZEBUB, § 3), though the ‘house’ of which Jesus and his contemporaries thought was, not on the mountain of God (cp BAAL-ZEPHON, ‘lord of the [mansion of the] north), but in the ‘recesses of the pit’² (Is. 1415). Though the demons might be allowed to pervade the upper world (cp Eph. 22), the place from which they proceeded was the ‘abyss’ (the Abaddon of Rev. 911).

As things now stand, therefore, it is best to suppose BAAL-ZEBUB [g.v., § 3] to be a modification in the direction of cacophony for religious reasons (cp Gog, Magog) which did not hold its ground. Baāl-zēbūl is probably the original form, and it meant ‘lord of the mansion’—i.e., to the Jews of NT times, ‘lord of the nether world.’ The reading of the received Greek text is assimilated to the reading of the traditional Hebrew text.

Over against this view stands that of the old scholar Lightfoot (still defended by Arn. Meyer, Jesu Mutter-sprache, 49), which connects -zebul with

3. Other explanations. זְבֻל, ‘dung,’ זְבִיל, ‘dung-making,’ in new Hebrew; cp זָבַל, ‘to offer to idols.’

The idea is that ‘lord of flies’ was changed into ‘lord of dung,’ to show abhorrence of heathenism. Such transformations are, no doubt, in the later Jewish spirit; but this particular one is improbable.¹ 'Lord of flies' (could we assume that this was the original meaning) was itself, as a title, bad enough; nor would the people, who feared the demons so much, have ventured to speak too disrespectfully of the archdemon (cp Ashmedai or Asmodēus, which to a Hebrew ear meant the 'destroyer'—not a disrespectful title); lastly, on Lightfoot's theory the name ought to be Beel-zebel: it is shown elsewhere that a late editor detected the new Hebrew word zebel, 'dung,' in the name I-zebel (JEZEBEL). Lightfoot's theory, then, must be abandoned, as Baudissin holds. But Baudissin's own theory (adopted from Hitzig) is not really more satisfactory. He thinks that Baal-zebul is simply a euphonic modification of Baal-zebul, the consonant which closed the first syllable being repeated at the close of the second part of the word.²

² She’ōl, on this theory, is ironically described as the זְבִיל, the ‘palace’ or ‘mansion’ of the demons, as in Ps. 4915 (according to one possible view, see PSALMS, SBOT where We. reads זְבִיל of the wicked rich.

This, however, leaves Baal-zebul unexplained, for Baudissin's theory of the name is scarcely admissible.

See Selden, De Dis Syris, 26; Lightfoot, Horæ Hebraicæ, on Mt. 12.24 Lk. 11.15; Movers, Die Phönizier ('41), 1.260 f.; Riehm's article in HWB⁽²⁾. The latter revives an old theory of Storr and Döderlein that bē'el dēbābā in Aramaic might mean either 'lord of flies' or 'an enemy,' ἐχθρὸς ἀνθρώπου (Mt. 13.28) = διὰβολος. This is doubtless plausible. We must at least admit that the common people cannot without instruction have attached a meaning to -zebul. But how has Beelzebul (half Hebrew, half Aramaic) fixed itself in the Gospel tradition? Pesh. too retains Beelzebul. Baudissin's article in Herzog, PRE⁽³⁾ (learned and thorough) adopts the ordinary view, as far as Baal-zebul is concerned.

BEER (בֵּיַר, 'well', § 101). 1. (τὸ φρέαρ [BAFL]).

A station of the Israelites, apparently between Heshbon and the Arnon (Nu. 21.16 [JE]). See NAHALIEL; WANDERING, § 8; and cp, below, BEER-ELIM. The interest of Beer is not geographical but literary. The discovery of the well was commemorated (the narrator gives us to understand) by a song. The song with its context runs thus, according to MT,—

And from there to Beer: that is the well whereof Yahwē said unto Moses: Assemble the people, and I will give them water. Then sang Israel this song:

Spring up, O well; greet ye it with a song.
Well, that the princes have dug,
The nobles of the people have bored,
With the sceptre—with their staves.

And from Midbar [EY the wilderness] to Mattanah; and from Mattanah to Nahaliel; and from Nahaliel to Bamoth.

The historical character of this statement has generally been assumed. Ewald, however, is on the road to a very different theory when he remarks that such a well-song would become a source of joy to the labourers who thenceforward used it (Hist. 2.204). He sees, in fact, that it is essentially a popular song. Robertson Smith, too, finely speaks of 'the exquisite song in which the Hebrew women as they stand round the fountain, waiting their turn to draw, coax forth the water which wells up all too slowly for their impatience.'³ We should not expect the origin of such a song to be remembered; nor is there anything in the words to suggest the occasion ascribed to it in JE. More probably it arose in the dry country of the south of Judah, where springs were the most valued possession (cp Judg. 1.15 Josh. 15.19 Gen. 26.19 ff.). The 'princes,' 'nobles,' and 'captains' (for בְּמַחֲקֵי we read בְּמַחֲקֵי; cp Judg. 5.9-14) referred to are the sheikhs of the clan. When a fresh well has been found, the sheikhs go through the symbolic form of digging for it with staves, and the poets of the clan greet the well with a song.

Does MT give us the whole of the song? Can Midbar be used as a proper name? Surely not. And, when we examine the MSS of Ḥ, we find some justification for the hypothesis of Budde, that the text of the itinerary originally ran, 'And from there to Beer; and from Beer to Nahaliel and from Nahaliel to Bamoth,' and that an editor who knew the song of the well, and desired to do it honour, inserted it between the first and the second items in the list, with the additional line, 'Out of the wilderness a gift' (see MATTANAH). See Budde, New World, March 1895; Preuss. Jahrb., 1895, p. 491 ff.; Franz Del. ZKW, 1882, p. 449 ff.

2. A place to which JOTHAM [1] fled from his brother Abimelech, Judg. 9.21 (βαῖρα [B], παρὰ [A], βηρα [L]). In OS (238.73; 106.20) it is identified with a village called Bera, 8 m. N. of Eleutheropolis. The context, however, gives us no data for determining the site of the 'well' in question.

BEEROTH (q.v.) and even Beersheba have been suggested. Kh. el-Breh, W. of 'Ain Shems, is considerably more than 8 m. N. of Beit Jibrin. T. K. C.

BEERA (בְּעֵרָא, 'well'; βαῖρα [B], βηρα [A], om. L.), b. Zophah, in genealogy of ASHER (1 Ch. 7.37).

BEERAH (בְּעֵרָה, 'well'), a Reubenite prince, son of Baal, carried off by Tiglath-pileser, 1 Ch. 5.6 (BEHA [B], -HRA [A], BAPA [L]). He is identified by the rabbins with Beeri, the father of the prophet Hosea.

BEER-ELIM (בְּעֵר אֵילִים [Bä. Gi.], 'well of terebinths' (?) or 'of sacred trees'; φρεαρ τοῦ αἰλ[ε]ϊμ [BNAQI]), a place apparently on the northern border of Moab, answering to EGLAIM on the south (Is. 15.8). It is generally identified with the BEER of Nu. 21.16. Some identify it also with the Alema of 1 Macc. 5.26; but see ALEMA.

BEERI (בְּעֵרִי, 'belonging to the well' or 'BEER,' § 76; cp above).

1. A Hittite, the father of JUDITH (i. 1), Esau's wife, Gen. 26.34 (Bera [AD], βαῖρα [E], βαῖρα [L]). It is impossible to reconcile this description with that of Adah in the genealogy in Gen. 36.2, for which see BASHMATH, 1.

2. The father of HOSEA, Hos. 1.1 (ὁ Bera [e], [BAQ]).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI (בְּעֵר לְחַי רֹאִי), a well in the Negeb, famous in Hebrew tradition as the scene of Hagar's theophany (Gen. 16.14), and no doubt connected with a sanctuary (St. ZATIV 1.349 [81]). Beside this sacred well was the abode of Isaac (Gen. 24.62 25.11).

1. Name. The name is mentioned only by J; E, who gives nearly the same account of the theophany (21.8-21), speaks simply of 'a well.' According to RV, Beer-lahai-roi means 'well of the living one who sees me.'

So the Versions (16.14: φρεαρ τοῦ ἐνώνιου [e]δων [ADEL], 21.6 25.11: φ. τῆς ὁράσεως [ADEL]; Pesh. in all three ܒܝܐܪ ܠܚܝ ܪܝܐ). This rendering, however, is inconsistent with that given of El Roi in 16.13, 'A God that seeth'; we should expect, not 'ܪܝܐ', but 'ܪܝܐ', and, even apart from this, 'ܪܝܐ' cannot be equivalent to 'ܐܠ', 'God' (the phrase 'ܪܝܐ ܐܠ' is late). Probably, therefore, we should render with We. (Procl. 4.330; ET 3.6), 'living is he who sees me,' and explain this by the light of Hagar's words in v. 13, which, as they stand, are unintelligible, but may, by the correction of הַלֵּל into אֱלֹהִים,¹ and the insertion of וַחֲזִי between רֹאִי and אֱלֹהִים (the resemblance of these three words accounts for the omission of one), be interpreted thus: 'Have I seen God and remained alive after my vision (of God)?' El Roi (lit. 'God of vision') will then mean 'the God who is seen' (cp Gen. 22.14).

These explanations of EL-RŌ' and Beer-lahai-rō' are too plainly not original. According to analogy, לַחַי (wrongly vocalised lahai) ought to be a noun in the construct state. Instead of lahai we should doubtless vocalise lēhī, 'jaw-bone'; roi (?) is some animal's name, not known in the later Hebrew, and perhaps of Arabic origin. The name misread Lahai-roi should, therefore, be rendered 'Antelope's (?) jaw-bone'.

¹ Cp לַחַי in MT of 1 S. 3.13: read אֱלֹהִים with BAL.

Another explanation is proposed by Hommel (AHT 209). Adhering to the points as regards the syllable lai, he compares the S. Ar. name Luhai-atht. He does not account for roi. Should רֹאִי be רֹאִי (see REV)? Samson's Lehi, however, supplies a more obvious clue.

Lēhī, 'jaw-bone', was a name given to any prominent crag, from a fancied resemblance to a jaw-bone. See LEHI; and cp Onugnathos (ὄνουν γνάθος), a promontory on the coast of Laconia, and 'Camel's jaw-bone' (an Arabic name, Yāḥūt, iv. 3539 f.; cp We. Vakidi, 298, n. 2).¹

According to E, the well was in the wilderness of Beersheba (Gen. 21.14); J, more precisely, states that it was 'on the way to Shur' (167), 'between Kadesh and Bered' (v. 14). Jerome knew of a 'well of Hagar' (*OS*1013); does he mean the traditional well in the Wādī el-Muwailah? This strangely formed wady is at the foot of mountains of the same name, and Palmer thinks that there was once a large city here ('perhaps one of the "cities of the south"'). One of the wells has special sanctity, and is connected by the Bedouin with Hagar. Two caves appear to be ancient. The smaller, at the upper end of the wady, on the right hand, was apparently a Christian chapel; the other, on the opposite side, seems to have served as the hermitage (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 2354). As to the 'jaw-bone' rock no positive statement can be ventured. On the geographical statement in v. 14, see BERED, i. To the suggestions there made it may be added that the 'way to SHUR' (q.v.) would be one of the regions called by the Assyrians Mušri. According to the original tradition Hagar seems to have fled, not to Egypt, but to a N. Arabian district called by a name which was confounded with Mizraim (Egypt). This, and not Egypt, was really her native country; this too was the country from which, according to E, she took a wife for her son Ishmael (21.21). So *Wi. BEEROTH (בְּאֵרוֹת; ΒΗΡΩΘ [BNAL]), a city of Benjam.

In Josh. 18.25, βερωθα [B], βηρωθα [L], 2 S. 4.2 [A omits]; gentilic Beerothite (בְּרֹתִי; βερωθαιος [BAL], 2 Sam. 4.2 f. 59; βηρωθ, [BA], βιθαρε [L], 2 Sam. 23.37; בְּרֹתִי, EV BEROTHTITE, 1 Ch. 11.39; δ βερθε [B], δ βερωθ [A], δ βερωθε [L]).

According to Josh. 9.17 (βερωθ [B*], βηρωθ [Bab mg.]), it belonged originally to the Gibeonite confederation; and, according to 2 S. 4.3, there was at one time a migration of its inhabitants to Gittaim (see ISHBAAL, i). Men of Beeroth are mentioned in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9, § 8 c); Ezra 2.25 = Neh. 7.29 (βερωθ [B], αβερωθ [L]) = 1 Esd. 5.19 (βερωθ [B] βερωθ [A]). It is named by Eus. (cp Reland, 618-19), and is now represented by the modern El Bireh (which still owes its name to its abundant supply of water), a village of about 800 inhabitants, in a poor district, about 9 m. N. from Jerusalem, on the Shechem road. Tradition assigns it as the place where Joseph and Mary missed Jesus from the company of returning pilgrims (Lk. 2.43-45).

BEEROTH OF THE CHILDREN OF JAAKAN, RV Beeroth Bene-Jaakan (בְּאֵרוֹת בְּנֵי יַאכָן, 'wells of the b'ne Ja'ākān'), a halting-place in the desert, Dt. 106 (ΒΗΡΩΘ ΒΕΝΩΝ ΙΑΚΑΙΜ [BAL]), where it is mentioned before MOSEROTH.² This notice is pre-Deuteronomie, and belongs to a fragment of E's list of stations which has been inserted by the editor (Bacon, Trip. Trad. 207 f.; cp Meyer, ZATW 1.118; Dr. Deut. 120). In Nu. 33.31 f. the same name occurs (shortened into BENE-JAAKAN, בְּנֵי יַאכָן; βαναα [B]; -νικα [A]; -νικαν [F]; μανικ [L]) after Moseroth; but the list of stations in Nu. 33 is of late editorial origin (cp *Kue. BEERSHEBA (בְּאֵר שֶׁבַע, § 107—i.e., 'well of seven,' rather than 'seven wells'—see below, § 3; ΒΗΡΣΑΒΕΕ

1. References. [BAL]; in Josh. 15.28 ΒΗΡΣΑΒΕΘ [A]; in Gen. 21.31 ΦΡΕΑΡ ΟΡΚΙΣΜΟΥ [ADL], 26.33 φ. ορκου [ADEL], it is taken as meaning 'well of the oath'.¹ One of the Simeonite towns in the southern territory of Judah (Josh. 19.2), on the border of the cultivated land, came to be regarded, for the greater part of history, as the remotest point of Canaan in that direction; whence the phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba' (2 S. 17.11), which, after the fall of the N. kingdom, became from 'Geba to Beersheba' (2 K. 23.8), or 'from Beersheba to Mt. Ephraim' (2 Ch. 19.4 βερσάβη [B]), and in the post-exilic period 'from Beersheba to the valley of Hinnom' (Neh. 11.27 βερσάβη [B], βερσ. [A], 30 βερσάβη [B], βερσ. [A]). Yet Beersheba, though the practical, was not the ideal, border of the Holy Land. This ran along the 'river of Egypt,' the present Wādī el-Arish, nearly 60 m. SE. of Beersheba.

An account of the origin of the name and the planting of the sacred tamarisk of Beersheba is given in the story of Abraham (Gen. 21.22 f. E); but another story belonging to another document (J) assigns the origin of the well and its name to Isaac (Gen. 26.26-33). It was the scene of more than one theophany in patriarchal times. It was an important sanctuary frequented even by N. Israel in the time of Amos (5.5 φρέαρ τοῦ ὀρκου [BAQ]), who refers with disapproval to those who swear by the life of the divine patron² of Beersheba (8.14). It was in Beersheba that the two sons of Samuel are said to have exercised their judgeship (1 S. 8.2), and a day's journey thence into the wilderness is placed the incident of the 'juniper' tree in the life of Elijah (1 K. 19.3 βερσάβη [A]). Beersheba was the birthplace of the mother of King Joash (2 K. 12.1 [2] 2 Ch. 24.1). In post-exilic times it was inhabited by men of Judah.

The ruins at Beersheba belong apparently to early Christian days. The Onomastica describe it as a large place with a Roman garrison (103.32 234.100). In the time of Jerome the place was of some importance; later, it became an episcopal see; but by the fourteenth century it had become deserted and ruined.

It is represented by the modern Bir es-Seba', on the W. es-Seba', 28 m. SW. from Hebron (Rob. BR 1.300 f.).

2. Identification. virtually comes to an end with Beersheba, and the country to the south of it is usually barren, there are, for nearly 30 m. S. of Beersheba, ruins of old villages gathered round wells; they evidently date from Roman times.

On Josh. 19.2, 'Beersheba and Sheba,' see SHEMA (i.). [WRS (Rel. Sem. 181) remarks 'The sanctuary of Beersheba properly consisted of the "Seven Wells" which gave the place its name.' Among

3. Derivation. the Arabs a place called 'Seven Wells' is mentioned by Strabo (164.24). Robertson Smith has also given abundant evidence of the sanctity attaching to the groups of seven wells among the Semites. Even to-day seven wells or cisterns seem to have the power of undoing witchcraft (ZDPV 7.106). This view is due to Stade (Gesch. i. 127), who thinks that the postposition of the numeral was Canaanitish; but, as in the case of Kirjath-arba (see HEBRON, i.), the theory is doubtful. 'Well of Seven' is not inexplicable; 'Well of (the) Seven

'gods' is intrinsically a probable meaning. Few persons, it is to be hoped, go to Beersheba looking for seven wells. Gautier affirms that there are now only three, though there may once have been more (Souvenirs de Terre Sainte,¹ 147; but cp his letter in Exp. Times, 10328 (Apr. '99). Trumbull (Exp. Times, 889 [Nov. '96]) also states that he saw three wells, but adds that at some distance he saw the remains of a fourth and a fifth. He admits that there may once have been more than five. Cp also Dr. Exp. Times, 7567 f. (Sep. '96). For descriptions of Beersheba as it is to-day, see Rob. BR 1204; Guérin, Judée, 2278 283; Séjourné, Rev. biblique, 1895, p. 265.] G. A. S.

BE-ESHTERAH (בַּעַשְׁתֶּרָה) in Josh. 21:27 (ΒΟΚΟΡΑΝ [B], -pp. [L], ΒΕΕΘΑΡΑ [A]), perhaps an abbreviation for בֵּית אֶשְׁתָּר 'house of Astarte' (cp Ges., Nestle, Eig. 114, etc.). Hommel, however (Beitr. f. Ass., 1897, p. 268), explains 'by Ashtar'; cp the S. Ar. בַּעַשְׁתָּר, 'by Athtar (i.e., Ashtar)'. Gray (HPN 127) also is against the supposed abbreviation of bēth into bē. See ASHTAROTH.

BEETLE, RV CRICKET (בַּתְּלָה; ΟΦΙΟΜΑΧΗΣ¹ [BAFL]: Lev. 11:22). By the word so rendered is almost certainly intended a species of locust or grasshopper; the name is one of four used in the verse to denote 'winged creeping things that go upon all fours, which have legs above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth.' The Hebrew name has passed into Aramaic, post-biblical Hebrew, and Armenian; in Arabic ḥarjāla means 'a troop of horses' or 'a troop of locusts' (cp Joel 24), and the connected verb means 'to proceed in a long train,' as do locusts. 'Beetle' is at all events a wrong rendering; for the Coleoptera have, as a rule, legs ill adapted for 'leaping upon the earth,' and are seldom or never eaten; whereas certain kinds of crickets, as of locusts, are fried and eaten by Eastern nations. It is impossible, however, to identify the species (if any) referred to. Cp also LOCUST, § 2.

BEHEMOTH and LEVIATHAN, two real or supposed animals grouped together in Job 40:15-41, but nowhere else in the canonical books (see however below).² Bēhēmōth (בְּהֵמוֹת) is no doubt an intensive plural form, and means 'a colossal beast.' It occurs (a) in Job 40:15-24, probably (b) in Is. 30:6, but hardly (c) in Ps. 73:22.³

In (a) the animal so called is described at length. This description is followed by a sketch of Leviathan, and most critics have thought, specially on the ground of the 'hyperbolic' expressions, that the two pictures are later insertions in the speeches of Yahwē (see Job). Whether the expressions are fitly called 'hyperbolic,' we shall see presently. Almost all modern critics, whether they separate Job 40:15-41 from the main body of the speeches of Yahwē or not, have thought that Bēhēmōth is a Hebraised form of an Egyptian word for the hippopotamus (p-che-mū, 'water-ox'), but there is no philological basis for this opinion.⁴ In (b) Is. 30:6 בְּהֵמוֹת מִצְרַיִם is probably to be rendered 'Oracle of the monster (bēhēmōth)

³ The versions render Bēhēmōth as follows:—in (a) θηρία [LXX], κτῆνη [Aq. Theod.], in (b) τὸν τετραπόδον [LXX], κτῆνη [Aq. Sym. Th.], in (c) κρηνώδης [LXX, Sym.].

of the south land.¹ This is the heading of a short fragmentary passage of prophecy, and refers to the description of Egypt at the end of v. 7 as 'Rahab the quelled one' (see RAHAB, ii. § 1). The south-land' (Negeb) is here, as in Dan. 8:9 115 f., a designation of the second of the two empires which endangered Palestine,—i.e., Egypt,—the other being Šāphōn, 'the northland' (Jer. 10:15 Zech. 2:6 [10])—i.e., in a large sense, Babylonia. So Del. The heading in v. 6 may be very late.

Delitzsch finds Bēhēmōth also in (c) Ps. 73:22, 'As for me, I was senseless and ignorant, I was a Bēhēmōth toward thee' (Del., Nowack). This rendering is correct, if the text is sound, and if the speaker is an individual. If, however, the speaker is to be understood collectively, we may perhaps render, 'I was (like) the beasts toward thee.' So Bā; but the absence of the particle of comparison is a difficulty. If we compare 49:10 [11] 92:6 [7] it becomes plausible to read, with Grätz, בְּהֵמוֹת חֲסִידֶיךָ, 'I was devoid of understanding toward thee.'

Leviathan (לֵוִיָּתָן, Leviathan, 'wreathed'—i.e., 'gathering itself in folds'; or perhaps of Bab. origin) is a designation of a mythic serpent in

2. Of Leviathan. all the passages in which it occurs, unless Job 41:1 be an exception.² See also LEVIATHAN.

It is found (d) in Job 41:1 (40:25), 'Canst thou draw up³ Leviathan with a hook, (and) press down his tongue with a cord?' (e) Job 38, 'Let those who lay a ban upon the sea⁴ curse it, (those) who are appointed to rouse up Leviathan'; (f) Is. 27:1, 'In that day shall Yahwē punish Leviathan the fugitive serpent, and Leviathan the coiled serpent, and he shall slay the dragon in the sea'; (g) Ps. 74:14, 'Thou didst shatter the heads of Leviathan, and gavest his [carcase] to be food for the jackals';⁵ (h) Ps. 104:26,⁶ 'There do the dragons move along, (there is) Leviathan whom thou didst form to be its ruler.' To these references, two supplied by apocryphal writers may be added: (i) En. 60:7-9, cp 24:1; (j) 4 Esd. 6:49-52; cp Apoc. Bar. 20:4.

In the present article we shall desert the zoological explanation of Bēhēmōth and Leviathan, leaving the field open to another writer to represent the more generally received opinion (see HIPPO-MYTHICAL POTAMUS, CROCODILE). Strong reason will have to be shown for not interpreting these strange forms with some regard to mythology. No one would assert that the author of Job had an altogether distinct mythological conception; but modern commentators who disregard the mythic basis of the descriptions make a serious mistake.

It was natural in 1887 to look for illustrations of the Job passages, (d) and (e), to Egypt,⁷ though reference should have been made, not to the fantastic griffins on certain wall-paintings, but to the idealisation of the ordinary monsters of the Nile in the mythic narratives of Rē and Osiris. 'There are supernatural as well as natural hippopotamuses and crocodiles, and it is a specimen of these which the poet has given us. The descriptions are hyperbolic and unpleasing, if referred to the real monsters of the Nile; they are not so if explained of the "children of defeat," with the dragon Apopi at their head,⁸ which the poet, by a fusion

² Θ renders Leviathan as follows:—in (d) δράκοντα (Aq. Sym. Leviathan), in (e) τὸ μέγα κῆτος (Aq. Sym. Leviathan, Th. ἐπίκοντα), in (f) τὸν δράκοντα (Aq. Sym. Th. Leviathan) [twice], in (g) τὸν δρακόντων (Aq. Leviathan), in (h) δράκων.

⁴ Read נָה for נָה, with Gunkel, to restore parallelism; cp Ps. 74:13 f. 104:25 f. Is. 27:1.

historically most justifiable,¹ identifies with the monsters of Babylonian origin called elsewhere Rahab and his helpers (Job 9.13). And even in the uncorrected but still more in the corrected text there are expressions and statements which are hardly explicable except on the mythological theory.² How, for example, can the hippopotamus and the crocodile be said to be, not merely dangerous to approach, but beyond the range of hunters? There is evidence that even in early times the Egyptians were skilled in attacking and killing them. How, too, can the ordinary hippopotamus be called 'the firstling of the ways of God' (Job 40.19), and the ordinary crocodile be said to be feared by all that is lofty, and to be king over all the sons of pride³ (Job 41.34 [26])?

The Babylonian elements in Bēhēmōth and Leviāthān, however, are more important than the Egyptian. They have been pointed out, though with some exaggeration, by Gunkel, who also noticed how much the text of the accounts of Bēhēmōth and Leviāthān has suffered in transmission. It may be hoped that by the light of the mythological interpretation the corruptions may be partly removed. For example, Job 41.9-11 [1-3] may be plausibly emended thus (see JQR, April, 1897):—

Surely thy self-confidence proves itself vain;
Even divine beings the fear of him lays low.
An angel shudders when he would arouse him;
Who then (among mortals) would dare to meet him as a foe?
Who ever confronted him and came off safe?
Under the whole heaven, not one!

The un-emended form of this passage, it is true, does not favour a mythological interpretation; but it is very difficult to give it any plausible meaning, whereas the emended text is in perfect harmony with all that we hear of Leviāthān elsewhere. One more proof of the helpfulness of the new theory may be given. No passage has puzzled interpreters more than Job 41.9 b. The RV renders thus, 'He (only) that made him can make his sword to approach (unto him).' חרבו, however, should be הִכְרִיזוּ (Giesebrecht). The real meaning is, 'that was made to be ruler of his fellows' (הָרָאָה לְפָנָיו)—i.e., Bēhēmōth is the king of all land animals. Take this in connection with Job 41.25 [33]³ and Ps. 104.26, and it would seem that Leviāthān was regarded as lord of the ocean, and Bēhēmōth of the dry land. The former notion was borrowed from the Babylonians; the latter perhaps from the Egyptians.⁴

Thus the Bēhēmōth and Leviāthān passages in Job represent a fusion, from every point of view most natural, of Babylonian and Egyptian elements. The dragon is primarily Babylonian: it is Tiamat (= תְּהוֹם; see CREATION, § 2. f.). Bēhēmōth may be ultimately identified with Tiamat's consort Kingu. Being ignorant of the mythic monsters in question, the poet naturally filled up the gaps in his knowledge from two monsters of the Nile which the Egyptians regarded as representatives of the evil god Sit.⁵

Coming now to (f), Is. 27, we note that the writing belongs to a prophetic passage which has a strong apocalyptic tinge, and stands at the head of the period which produced the apocalypse of Daniel.⁶ Nowhere perhaps in the OT is the phraseology more distinctly

² Reading חַרְבּוֹ בְּלִיָּה with Budde (improving slightly on Gunkel). The 'sons of pride' (if שָׁחֵק is correct) may be a phrase equivalent to 'Rahab's helpers.' If so, mythic monsters are referred to.

⁵ Cp Maspero's Struggle of the Nations. Plutarch (De Is. et Osir. 56) well knew the connection of the two Nile-monsters with Typhon or Sit.

mythical. 'Leviāthān the fleeing serpent' finds its explanation in the carving on a seal representing Marduk⁷ with a dagger pursuing the dragon which flees before him in the shape of a serpent, and 'Leviāthān the coiled serpent' is the mythic phrase for the ocean which surrounds the earth.¹

In (g), Ps. 74.14, a psalmist gives a somewhat different view of Leviāthān. To him the destruction of Leviāthān is past. This is, of course, the original view represented in the Babylonian Creation-story (see CREATION, § 2). The passage should most probably be read thus:—

Thou didst shatter the head of Leviāthān,
And gavest up his [carcase] as food for the jackals.

There is no reference to the unburied corpses of the Egyptians (Ex. 14.30); 'the people inhabiting the wilderness' is an impossible rendering of a corrupt text (see FOX). We have here simply an amplification of a mythic detail in the story of Tiamat (see the Babylonian Creation-tablet iv. L. 104)—the same detail which explains a fine passage in the latter part of Isaiah (Is. 51.9).

Taken by itself (h), Ps. 104.26, it must be admitted, gives no confirmation to our mythological interpretations. Leviāthān appears as one of the monsters of the sea, and we are told that Yahwē himself 'formed' him as its ruler. The writer may know nothing of mythology. He has heard this said, and repeats it.

We now turn to (i) and (j), the apocryphal passages.

The former (Enoch 80.7-9) runs in Charles's translation from the Ethiopic version (155):—'And in that day will two monsters be parted, a female monster named Leviāthān, to dwell in the depths of the ocean over the fountains of the waters. But the male is called Bēhēmōth, who occupies with his breast (?) a waste wilderness named Dēndāin, on the east of the garden. . . . And I besought that other angel that he should show me the might of these monsters, how they were parted on one day, and the one was placed in the depths of the sea and the other in the mainland of the wilderness.'

The latter (4 Esd. 6.49-52) is as follows:—'Et tunc conseruasti duo animalia, nomen uni uocasti Behemoth et nomen secundi uocasti Leniathan. Et separasti ea ab alterutro, non enim poterat septima pars ubi erat aqua congregata capere ea. Et dedisti Behemoth unam partem quae siccata est tertio die, ut inhabitet in ea, ubi sunt montes mille; Leniathan autem dedisti septimam partem humidam; et seruasti ea ut fiant in deuorationem quibus uis et quando uis.' (Behemoth becomes uehemoth in cod. M and Enoch in codd. SA [so AV].)

It is needless to pause long on the purely Jewish elements in these descriptions.² That Bēhēmōth was created on the fifth day was an inference from Gen. 1.21; the reference to the 'thousand mountains' comes from a faulty reading in Ps. 50.10 (where אֲלֵהֶם should be אֵלֶיךָ) combined with an absurd interpretation of בְּהֵמוֹת in the same passage. The chief points to notice are these: Bēhēmōth and Leviāthān are not two great water-monsters, but have their habitation, the one on the dry land, the other in the deep;³ the Dēndāin of Enoch may possibly be the Babylonian danninu, which is a synonym of iršitū, 'the earth,' and is literally 'the firm.'⁴ According to Gunkel, the female monster Leviāthān is Tiamat, and the male monster Bēhēmōth is Kingu, Tiamat's husband (on whom see Creation-tablet iv. L. 119-122). In the Babylonian story these monsters met their fate at creation; in Enoch the assignment of their respective dwellings is an incident of the judgment at Noah's flood; in 4 Ezra again it is a detail of creation. It is not safe, however, to dogmatise too freely on the sources of the apocryphal writers. Their notions were probably a strange compound, in which there were exegetical inferences side by side with corrupted statements of Oriental tradition. One of these statements appears to have related to the habitation of Bēhēmōth—at least, if we may accept Zimmern's explanation of Dēndāin, which Dillmann and Charles unconvincingly connect with בֶּקַח (comparing Dudaël, Enoch 104, which is certainly not a mere 'fiction of the author'). The view here taken is, of course, quite consistent with Charles's theory (Bar. 53) that the writers of 4 Esd. 630-725 and Bar. 27-30 both used the text of an earlier work which contained the story of the six days of Creation. This lost hexahemeron, just as much as 4 Esd. 638-64, represents not a homogeneous tradition, but a medley of notions derived from different sources, Jewish and Oriental.

BEL (בֶּל; 𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴 BHAL[OC], 𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴), Ass. bēlu, like בֶּל (Baal), is a simple appellative meaning 'lord' quite as often as it is a proper name (see PHENICIA). In the Assyrio-Babylonian pantheon it is borne by two deities (see BABYLONIA, § 26), the younger of whom, identified with Marduk (see MERODACH), finds mention in writings of the Babylonian and Persian periods (Is. 461 Jer. 502 [בֶּל־יְהוָה], 5144 (𐎠𐎼𐎷𐎡𐎴 omits)).¹

The extent of the cultus of this god in later times appears from the many proper names compounded with Bēl in Phœnician, and more especially in Palmyrene inscriptions.² Jacob of Serūg states that he was the god of Edessa (ZDMG 29 131).

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See DANIEL, ii. § 21, and cp §§ 10, 19.

BELA (בֶּלָא, 'that which is swallowed up': cp Jer. 5144; בַּלְאֵק [ADL], -לֵאֵל [E in Gen. 142]), one of the five royal cities in the vale of Siddim at the time of the invasion of CHEDORLAOMER (q.v., § 2), Gen. 1428, where the name receives the geographical explanation, 'that is Zoar.' In fact, in Gen. 1920-23 we hear of a small city near Sodom, the name of which was called ZOAR (q.v.), to commemorate the escape of Lot from the catastrophe of Sodom and the other 'cities of the plain.' The writer of the explanation in Gen. 1428 evidently means us to suppose that the original name of Zoar was Bela. The author of Gen. 19 (J), however, does not appear to have known this. In 1310 the same writer speaks of Zoar as bearing that name before the catastrophe of Sodom, and a comparison of the phraseology of 2530 makes it probable that the etymological myth in 1920-22 does not really presuppose a change of name. It is probable that, had the name of Bela been known in the comparatively early period when Gen. 19 was written, an etymological myth would have grown up to account for it—'Therefore that region is called Bela, because the ground opened her mouth and swallowed it up' (cp Nu. 1630).

Such a myth did, as a fact, spring up, but long afterwards, and not as a fruit of the popular imagination. In the Targum of Jonathan the phrase 'the king of Bela' (Gen. 142) is paraphrased as 'the king of the city which consumed its inhabitants.' The same interpretation was given by R. Meir and his contemporary Joshua b. Karcha (Bacher, Die Agada der Tannaiten, 38), and is repeatedly given on the authority of 'the Hebrews' by Jer. (Quest. in Gen. 142 1930; Comm. in Jes. 155); it has also naturally enough found a place in the Midrash (Ber. rabba, par. 42). Hommel (AHT 195-198) boldly identifies Bela with the ancient city of Malkā, which he surmises to have been in the trans-Jordanic region; but his authority for giving this situation to Malkā is a tablet which refers not to Malkā but to Melkart (Johns, Expos., Aug. 1898, p. 160).

It is remarkable that no name is given to the king of Bela. When we consider the (probable) corruptness of other names in the passage, it is reasonable to suppose that the name, being uncouth, early dropped out of the text. To supply 'Bela,' with Bishop Hervey (Smith's DB⁽²⁾), is unnatural. T. K. C.

BELA (בֶּלָא). 1. (בַּלְאֵק [ADEL], -לֵאֵל [E in Gen. 3633]). The first Edomite king, son of Beor (or perhaps Achbor; see BAAL-HANAN [1]), of the city of Dinhabah (Gen. 3632f. = 1 Ch. 143f.). It is singular that a diviner famous in legend was called 'Bil'am (Balaam) son of Beor.' With Nöldeke (Untersuch. 87) and Hommel (AHT 153) we may venture to identify Bela' and Bil'am, and all the more confidently if Bil'am belonged to a region adjoining Edom (see PETHOR). Obviously the temptation which the name presented to an imaginative narrator must have been irresistible. Targ. Jon. and Targ. 1 Ch. 144 had already suggested the identification. The list which contains the name Bela ben-Beor is regarded by Sayce as a piece of an Edomite chronicle. It comes before us, however, as a thoroughly Hebrew document, and is correlated with the history of the b'ne Israel (Gen. 3631-39; probably JE). Certainly it is no sport of the idealistic imagination; a true interest in the fortunes of a kindred people prompted its preservation. It may be incomplete, or it may have had some lacunae filled up ignorantly, not to speak of the undeniable corruptions of the text. Let us take the list as it stands, and see what we can gather from it.

The list contains eight names (or rather seven, for Baal-hanan has come in through a scribe's error). Four kings have their fathers' names given; 1 six are distinguished by the name of their city, and one is described as of a certain region (HUSHAM). The names both of the cities and of the persons (or apparent persons) are not all correct. DINHABAH, MATREB, and MEZEHAB are corrupt, and the corruptions efface the important fact that Be.a (whose city was not Dinhabah but Rehoboth; cp v. 37) and Mehetabel came from the N. Arabian land of Mušri or Mušur (see MIZRAIM, § 26). It will be noted that one of the names occurs twice (in v. 39, 'Hadad' is certainly a wrong reading): it is properly the name of a god—of the Aramaean god Hadad. From this name, and from two other items—'Bela the son of Beor' and 'Saul of Rehoboth by the river'—Bishop A. C. Hervey inferred (Smith's DB,⁽²⁾ s.v. 'Bela') that there had been an Aramaean conquest of Edom. The references to Bela and Saul, however, are not really in point (cp BALAAM, § 3), and all that the doubly attested HADAD, 3 [i. 2]—together with BEDAD—can be held to suggest is that Aramaean influence was early felt as far south as Edom.

More important is the historical notice connected with the name of Hadad, son of Bedad (see also HUSHAM). It tells us of the early occupation of what afterwards became the land of Moab by the Midianites, whom the Edomites under Hadad defeated. We can understand this notice in the light of Gideon's defeat of the same plundering hordes, described in Judg. 7. To make the two events contemporary, with Kautzsch in Riehm's HIVB⁽²⁾ (art. 'Midian'), seems needless and hazardous.

Our most interesting as well as most certain result, however, is the antiquity of regal government among the Edomites; and, from the fact that there is no trace of dynasties, and from the continual references to the cities of the respective kings, we may probably infer, with Winckler, that the kings were of the type of Abimelech, or at the most of Saul, and that their rule, except in time of war, was little felt save by their own tribe. It is true that this will not apply to Saul of Rehoboth of the River, for this place seems to have been in Mušri, not in Edom; but we should observe the variation in the phraseology of the account of Saul. It is not said that his city was Rehoboth, but that he was 'of Rehoboth.' We may suppose that he entered by marriage into an Edomite family and then obtained a tribal sovereignty. He was a Mušrite (a native of the N. Arabian Mušri). The name of the last king (Hadar, or rather Hadad) is unaccompanied by the historical notice which we should have expected; it is, however, followed exceptionally by the name of his wife, of whom we are told that she was a daughter of MATRED, and a daughter of ME-ZAHAB. The former name is a corruption of Mizran (Mišrān), the latter of Mizrim (Mišrim). Mišrim was really a correction of Mišrān. Mehetabel, as well as Bela and Saul, was a Mišrite. This is a fact with important historical bearings (see HADAD, i. 2).

BELIAL. This is an imperfect reproduction of the Heb. בְּלִיעֵל (18 times in historical books, once in Job, thrice in Proverbs, thrice in Psalms, twice in the psalm-like passage prefixed to Nahum (1 11-15 [2 1], see RV]). On 2 Cor. 6 15, see below (§ 1).

It is generally taken to mean 'worthlessness,' whether moral or material, so that the familiar phrase, 'sons (or men) of Belial,' would mean 'good-for-nothing fellows'; RV^{mg} gives 'base fellows.'

So BDB, from בָּלַ, 'not,' and לַעַז, 'profit' (?); so, too, RV^{mg} in 2 S. 23 6 and elsewhere. This rendering, however, is not supported by the earliest tradition; for 5 renders 'Belial' by ἀνομία, ἀνομία, ἀποστασία (Aq. also gives ἀποστασία), and the qualification 'of Belial' by ἀσεβής, ἄφρων, λοιμός, παράνομος, with or without ἀνὴρ as the case may be. We find also νῦν παρανόμων (often), and (Symm.) ἀνυπότακτοι, ἀνυπόστατοι. These renderings may imply the etymology בְּלִיעֵל, ἄβυσσος (Jer.), and this etymology, though impossible, is yet more in harmony with biblical usage. Tg. gives בְּלִיעֵל, 'oppressors.'

Another tradition, however, favours the use of Belial as a proper name. So in 5 Jud. 20 13 (βελιαμ), Theod., Judg. 19 22, and occasionally in Vg.; so, too, in the English versions including even RV (on RV^{mg}, see above). This came about in the following way. However we account for it, it is a historical fact that in the interval between the OT and the NT Belial (sometimes in the forms Beliar or Berial) was used as a synonym for the arch-demon Satan; it is so used in 2 Cor. 6 15, where Paul asks, 'What harmony is there between Christ (parallel to 'light') and Beliar (parallel to 'darkness')?' [βελιαρ (BNC)]; cp. Jer.'s explanation, cacum lumen, as if בְּלִיעֵל, in OS,⁽²⁾ 764. Beliar stands for Satan also in Test. xii. Patr. (often; e.g. Test. Rub. 2, 4, 6), the Asc. Isa. (Berial), and Jubilees (ch. 15, ed. Charles). In the Sib. Oracles (iii. 63 ff. iv. 137 ff.) Nero, under the name of Beliar, is to lead the armies of Antichrist¹ (see ANTICHRIST, § 15); and, according to Bousset, the phrase ὁ ἀνθρώπος τῆς ἀνομίας (ib. § 4) in 2 Thess. 2 3 (BN, Tisch., Treg., WH; ἀμαρτίας for ἀνομίας has also good authority) may be a translation of Belial.

W. H. B.

Both for the sake of exegesis and on account of the importance of Jewish semi-mythological modes of thought, it is needful to be clear as to the course of development of the meanings of Belial, and to form a probable conjecture as to the origin, or at least the nature, of the word. G. F. Moore (on Judg. 19 22) gives a better rendering of בְּלִיעֵל than most commentators, viz., 'vile scoundrels'; this recognises the fact that בְּ suggests not merely worthlessness or ordinary viciousness, but gross wickedness. He also describes the different etymologies of Belial as extremely dubious, and cannot find in the Hebrew language any analogy for the word. In fact the seemingly compound word בְּלִיעֵל (Job 26 7) is imaginary; it is a corruption of הַבְּלִיעַ, 'utter vanity.' But Moore passes over Lagarde's acute suggestion (in Proph. Chald., p. 47, cp. Ubers. 139), that בְּלִיעֵל in Ps. 41 8 [9] (cp. l. 2) suggests an etymology (a popular one?) from בָּלִי יֵעֵל, 'no rising up.' In Expos. (95^a 435-439) the present writer sought to show that Belial (בְּלִיעֵל) is found in the OT in three senses: (1) the subterranean watery abyss, (2) hopeless ruin, (3) great or even extreme wickedness. The third meaning is common; the first and second are rare, and found only in late passages (see Ps. 184 [5]=2 S. 22 5, Ps. 41 8 [9] 101 3 [58 3 בְּלִיעֵל, so read, =deeds of destruction] Nah. 1 11 15 [2 1]), but should, if naturalness of development is to count for anything, be more nearly original than the third. It is only in Ps. 184 [5] that Belial is used to denote the abyss,¹ and it may be objected to the view that this is the primary meaning that in Asc. Jes. 4 2, Berial, like Sammael in 7 9, appears as an angel of the firmament (cp. Eph. 2 2). However, as Bousset has shown,² the eschatological tradition of ANTICHRIST [q.v., § 13 f.], one of whose names is Belial, is derived ultimately from the old Babylonian dragon-myth, and we know that the mythic dragon has for his proper sphere the sea, though in some mythic developments he appears as a temporary inhabitant of heaven, from which at last he and his angels are cast out (Rev. 12 7-9). It is, therefore, in perfect harmony with the old myth to suppose that Belial may have been originally an angel of the abyss, not of the firmament.

We now come to the origin of the word. Belyiyya³ seems to be a Hebrew modification of some earlier word, planned so as to suggest a popular etymology, בְּלִי יֵעֵל, 'from which' one comes not up again' (cp. mat lā tārāt, the Ass. equivalent of a Sumerian title of the underworld meaning 'the land without return,' Jensen, Kosmol. 218, 222). This earlier word was most probably borrowed from the Babylonian mythology of the underworld. The original word, which was Hebraised just as abūbu, 'deluge,' was Hebraised (see DELUGE, § 7), may very possibly have been Belili,³ which is the name of a goddess of vegetation, and hence of the underworld, the sister of Du'uzu or TAMMUZ, from whom she differs in being unable to ascend again to earth (see Descent of Ištar, l. 51 in Jeremias, Bab.-ass. Vorstell. 23; and cp. Jensen, Kosmol. 225, 272, 275). There may have been a middle form between Belili (which appears to be Sumerian—i.e., non-Semitic) and Belyiyya³ which has been lost; cp. NEPHILIM, § 2. The Canaanites and Israelites probably took the name (which three times [1 S. 25 25 2 S. 16 7 1 K. 21 13] has the article) as a synonym for the abyss of Sheōl. Afterwards it seems to have become a symbol of insatiable and malignant destructiveness (cp. הָוָה), and hence the phrase 'sons (son, daughter) of Belial'; but the older meaning was not forgotten, as we see from Ps. 184 [5]. The objection of Baudissin (Herzog,⁽³⁾ s.v. 'Belial'), that 'streams of the under-world' (Ps. l.c.) would be a unique phrase, is of no moment, for the whole context is in some important respects unique. It is not a flood from the sky that overwhelms the speaker; it is a flood from below—i.e., the 'waters of death,' which are a primitive element in Babylonian mythology (see CAINITES, § 6).

Hommel, while accepting this identification, proposes a modification of the theory. He thinks that the Assyrio-Babylonian phrase quoted above was simply translated by the Canaanites, from whom the name was borrowed again by the Babylonians as Belili (Exp. Times, 8472). This is plausible; but we should like to know how far this theory would lead us.

In Exp. Times, 940 ff., Baudissin returns to the subject. He still maintains the derivation of Belīyā'al from בל and יא', and thinks that some of the occurrences of the word may possibly be due to editorial manipulation, and that the word (explained as 'worthlessness' = 'wickedness') does not look very ancient. He also quotes a communication of Jensen, which Cheyne in his answer regards as favourable rather than otherwise to the new theory, though Jensen himself expresses his agreement with Baudissin. See Exp. Times, ix., x., and also Che. Psalms, (2) on Ps. 184 [5] (popular etymology from בלע, 'to swallow up.' y, however, is intrusive, cp König, Lehrgeb. ii. 1402). § 1, W. H. B.; § 2 f., T. BELLOWS (בִּלְיָא, properly 'instrument for blowing'; ΦΥΧΗΤΗΡ), mentioned only in EV of Jer. 629¹ in connection with lead-smelting; see METALS, § 2.

In Egypt bellows were used as early as the time of Thotmes III. A leather bag was fitted into a frame from which extended a long pipe to the fire. Two bags were used, upon each of which the operator placed a foot, pressing them alternately, while he pulled up each exhausted skin with a string that he held in his hand (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 232 f.). In one illustration Wilkinson notes that when the man left the bellows they were raised as if full of air, thus implying a knowledge of the valve. The earliest forerunner of the bellows seems to have been a mere reed or pipe, which was used by smiths in the age of Useratesen (2234, illustration 413, fig. 3).

Whether hand-bellows were used by the Hebrews for domestic purposes is quite unknown; for a description of a primitive kind still used in Egypt see Wilkinson (ii. 313).

BELLS, in the modern sense of the word, though used as ornaments at the present day in Syria, do not seem to have been known to the ancient Hebrews. The words so rendered require examination.

1. מַעֲבָדִים, pa'āmim (√=to strike), used of the golden ornaments which, alternately with POMEGRANATES (q.v.), were worn upon the lower part of the Ephod (Ex. 2833 f. 3025 f., κώδωνες; cp also in the Heb. of Ecclus. 4574 and 92, and see Cowley and Neubauer ad loc.). Their purpose is related in Ex. 2835.

2. מִצְבָּחִים, mēṣibāḥim (cp מִצְבָּחִים, 'cymbals'), upon which were inscribed the words, 'Holy unto Yahwe', were worn by the horses in Zechariah's prophecy (Zech. 1420, AVmg. 'bridles'; so ὄ χαλκίνοις and Vg. frement).

In both cases small discs or plates are meant, the מִצְבָּחִים being possibly similar to the מִצְבָּחִים or crescents (see NECKLACE) of Judg. 826.

BELMEN (RV Belmaim) is mentioned, in connection with the defensive measures of the Jews against Holofernes, in Judith 44. The readings are ΒΕΛΜΑΙΝ [A], ΒΑΙΛ. [B], ΔΒΕΛ. [N]; Syr. ܒܠܡܝܢ (Abel-meholah); Vet. Lat. Abelmam. Belmen would thus appear to be the same as the Belmain [EV] (ΒΕΛΒΑΙΜ [BA], ΔΒΕΛ. [N], Syr. ܒܠܡܝܢ, Vg. Belma, Vet. Lat. Abelme) of Judith 73, which, obviously, is regarded as lying near Dothan, and therefore cannot be the Abel-maim of 2Ch. 164, nor perhaps the BAAL-HAMON of Ct. 811. The place meant is probably Ibleam (modern Bir Bel'ameh), a town of strategical importance. In Judith 83 this place is probably intended by BALAMO, RV BALAMON (βαλαμων [BNA], Syr. ܒܠܡܝܢ), and if we might assume that the translator had a correct text and understood it rightly, we should be justified in restoring βαλαμων for βελμαιν in 44. Certainly none of the readings in 44 can be accepted as reproducing the original name. T. K. C.

is called in Baruch 111 f., Balthasar, RV Baltasar (ܒܠܬܫܐܙܪ, or, less correctly, ܒܠܬܫܐܙܪ; ΒΑΛΤΑCΑΡ [♂ Theod.], which is also used as the equivalent of ܒܠܬܫܐܙܪ, Belteshazzar,¹ see DANIEL ii. §§ 2 13), was, according to the Book of Daniel, a son and successor of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. The length of the reign of Belshazzar is not given; but we read in Dan. 81 of 'the third year' of his reign. In Dan. 530 f. [31 f.] it is stated that he was slain, and that on his death the empire passed into the hands of Darius the Mede. All references to Belshazzar in other authors, including that in the apocryphal Book of Baruch (111 f.), appear to have been suggested by the passages in Daniel; and, since it is now recognised that the Book of Daniel was composed in the second century B.C., the narrative is open to question.

Till quite lately it was the fashion to follow Jos. (Ant. x. 112) in identifying the Belshazzar of Daniel with the last Babylonian king, Ναβοάνδρηλος, whom Jos. elsewhere calls Ναβόννηδος (in a citation from Bērōssus; see Ant. Ap. 120); in Herod. 177188 this king appears as Ναβόννητος, and in Abydēnus (quoted by Eus. Pr. Ev. 941) as Ναβαννίδος. Against the identification of Belshazzar with Nabonnēdus it was urged that the latter, according to Bērōssus, was not even a relation of Nebuchadnezzar, but 'a certain Babylonian' who usurped the throne in consequence of a revolution; nor was Nabonnēdus slain, like the Belshazzar of Daniel, on the overthrow of the Babylonian empire, but is stated to have been sent to the province of Carmania (the modern Kirmān). These objections were so serious that a few writers, in their anxiety to defend the narrative of Daniel, identified Belshazzar with Evil-merodach (2 K. 2527).

The discovery of the Babylonian inscriptions has refuted both of the above-mentioned theories, and has at the same time confirmed the opinion that the narrative in Daniel is unhistorical. An unhistorical narrative, however, is not necessarily a pure fiction, and in this case it appears probable that the author of Daniel made use of a traditional story. It is now known that Nabonnēdus, the Nabū-nā'id of the inscriptions, who reigned from 555 to 538 B.C., had a son called Bēl-šar-ušur (i.e., 'Bel, preserve thou the king'), a name of which Belshazzar is evidently a corruption. In a celebrated inscription Nabū-nā'id offers up a prayer in behalf of 'Bēl-šar-ušur, the exalted (or, my first-born) son, the sprout of my body (lit. heart)': see Schr. COT 213, and also A²B 3096 f. Moreover, in certain contract-tablets, dating from the first, third, fifth, seventh, eleventh, and twelfth years of Nabū-nā'id, Bēl-šar-ušur, the son of the king, is expressly named. Several other tablets of the same reign speak of a 'son of the king'; but whether in all these cases Bēl-šar-ušur is meant cannot be determined, since Nabū-nā'id appears to have had at least one other son.² It is, however, generally believed that Bēl-šar-ušur must be identical with the prince mentioned in an inscription of Cyrus, which informs us that in the seventh, ninth, tenth, and eleventh years of the reign of Nabū-nā'id, 'the son of the king' was at the head of the army in Akkad—i.e., Northern Babylonia. Unfortunately, this very important inscription is mutilated, so that we learn nothing of the years twelve to fifteen of Nabū-nā'id, and in the account of the sixteenth year only a few words are legible. Of the seventeenth and last year of Nabū-nā'id there is a long account; but it would seem very doubtful whether 'the son of the king' is mentioned again.¹ In any case, it is implied that Nabū-nā'id, not Bēl-sar-ušur, was at this time commander of the army in Akkad (see TBSA 7 139-176, KB 3 b 128-137, and O. E. Hagen, 'Keilschrifturkunden zur Gesch. des Königs Cyrus' in the Beiträge zur Assyriologie [ed. Delitzsch and Haupt] 2 214-225 [194]). We possess, moreover, another inscription of Cyrus, describing the conquest of Babylonia at considerable length and expressly mentioning King Nabūnā'id, but without any reference to a 'son of the king' (see JRAS, new series, 1270-97, KB 3 b 120-127, and Beiträge zur Assyriologie 2 208-215). Hence there is nothing to prove that Bēl-sar-ušur played any important part at the close of his father's reign, and it is even possible that he may have died some years earlier.

Thus it will be seen that, apart from the similarity of name, the historical prince Bēl-sar-ušur bears but a very slight resemblance to the Belshazzar of Daniel. The one is the son of the usurper Nabūnā'id; the other is the son of Nebuchadrezzar. The one is, at the most, heir to the throne; the other is actually king, for documents are dated from the year of his accession (Dan. 7 1 81). Moreover, if the ordinary rendering of Dan. 5 7 1629 be correct, Belshazzar is represented as sole king, for a man who can of his own authority make any one he pleases 'third ruler in the kingdom' must clearly be supreme in the state. Since, however, the word translated 'third ruler' occurs nowhere else, and is of very doubtful meaning, it would be unsafe to press this argument.

In order to prove that Bēl-sar-ušur reigned conjointly with his father, it has sometimes been asserted that king Marduk-sar-ušur, who is mentioned on certain Babylonian tablets, must be identical with Bēl-sar-ušur; but Assyriologists now admit that king Marduk-sar-ušur reigned before Nabūnā'id, and identify him with Nergal-sar-ušur (559-555 B.C.: see TBSA 6 108, and Tiele's BAG 476 n. [1886-88]). It has likewise been urged that, though Bēl-sar-ušur was not a son of Nebuchadrezzar, he may have been a grandson of Nebuchadrezzar through his mother; but the theory that Nabūnā'id married a daughter of Nebuchadrezzar rests upon no evidence whatever.

It remains, therefore, altogether uncertain how the story in Daniel really originated; but, besides the similarity of the names Belshazzar and Bēl-sar-ušur, there is at least one reason for thinking that King Belshazzar was not invented by the author. Herodotus, as has been mentioned, calls the last Babylonian king Labynētus, representing him as the son of an earlier Labynētus, the famous Nebuchadrezzar. Further, in a Chaldean legend related by Abydēnus, the last king of Babylon seems to have figured as a son of Nebuchadrezzar (see Schr. 'Die Sage vom Wahnsinn Nebuchadrezzar's', in the JPT, 1881, pp. 618-629). The date of the historian Abydēnus is indeed doubtful; but he can hardly have borrowed either directly or indirectly from the Book of Daniel, so that the agreement of these three accounts in wrongly describing the last Babylonian king as a son of Nebuchadrezzar must be due to their having followed some popular tradition. ¹ The passage which Schrader in 1890 translated 'the wife of the king had died' is supposed by Pinches to mean 'the son of the king died' (see Smith's DB (2), 1893, article 'Belshazzar'), while Hagen renders 'he [i.e., Gubaru] slew the son of the king' (he is careful, however, to indicate that the word 'son' is doubtful). It is therefore obvious that no argument can be built upon the clause in question.

Klostermann, however, suggests אַבְינָדָב, 'Abiner'; and γ are easily confounded, and the final ב in אַבְינָדָב may be really the preposition ('in') prefixed to 'all Naphthador,' or 'all the height of Dor' (EV), words which define the extent of the prefecture.

Three (or at any rate two) special exploits were assigned to him in popular tradition (2 S. 23 20 f. = 1 Ch. 11 22 f. [καυαία B]). On the first two see ARIEL, 1; a correction of the text is indispensable. The other feat consisted in his slaying a 'Mistrite' (2 S. 23 21)—i.e., a man of Muṣr or Muṣri (see MIZRAIM, § 2). This hero is twice mentioned in a list of no value in 1 Ch. 27 (5 f. 34). Each time there is an inaccuracy. In v. 5 (RV) Benaiah's father is described (by an obvious confusion of names) as 'the priest'; in v. 34 'Jehoiada son of Benaiah' takes the place of 'Benaiah son of Jehoiada.' The name is improbable; nor is ^B Ben-Rechab any more probable. It is reasonable to hold that, as in other cases, the father of this prefect was an influential officer of the crown. The prefect's real name has certainly dropped out. Klostermann suggests that we may restore thus: 'Elihoreph, son of Shisha the secretary' (v. 3). Ben-dekar is not impossibly a corruption of Beneberak [q.v.]. The locality suits.

1. Name. to the letter R at the end of the name. The divine name Bir was confounded by a Hebrew scribe with the Aramaic bar, 'son,' and translated into Hebrew as Ben (= בן utbs), and DR was miswritten DD; hence arose the wrong form Ben-hadad. The name in Assyrian is (ilu) IM-'idri, where the ideograph IM is most naturally read Rammān (the Assyrian thunder-god; cp EN-RIMMON), but may of course be read (and probably was read also) Bir or Bur (cp the name Bir-dadda, and see BEDAD). The meaning is 'Bir is my glory.' See Wi. ATUnters. 68 ff., who controverts Schr. and Del.; but cp Schr. KAT⁽²⁾ 200, Del. Calver Bib. Lex.⁽²⁾ 97, and Hilprecht, Assyriaca, 76-78.

The name Ben-hadad is used as a general name for the kings of Damascus in Jer. 49²⁷; but as this passage

2. Benhadad I. occurs in a very late oracle, made up of borrowed phrases, the use of which is of no historical significance. In fact, Amos, from whom the author of Jer. l.c. borrows the phrase 'the palaces of Benhadad,' means most probably by Benhadad (Am. 14) the first king of Damascus who bore that name: he speaks, in the parallel line, of 'the house of Hazael. Hazael was certainly a historical person: he was the successor of Benhadad I. (others say Benhadad II.). Consequently, Benhadad—in Amos's phrase 'the palaces of Benhadad'—cannot be a merely typical name, as in the imitative passage, Jer. 49²⁷. There are two (some, however, say three) Benhadads in the Books of Kings, just as there are (really) two Hazaels (see HAZAEL).

1. BEN-HADAD I., son of Tab-rimmon, was the ally of ASA [g.z., 1], king of Judah, against Baasha, king of Israel (1 K. 15.18 ff.). He was an energetic king, and constantly involved in warfare, not only with Ahab of Israel, whom he appears to have besieged in Samaria (2 K. 6 f.), but also with Shalmaneser II. of Assyria. In 854, at the head of a Syro-Palestinian league which included Israel, he opposed Shalmaneser, not without success. For, though Shalmaneser claims to have been victorious at Karkar (near Hamath), he certainly had to return to Assyria to prepare for a more decisive campaign. Again in 849 and in 848 Shalmaneser, though nominally victorious, had to return. Convinced that he had no ordinary opponent, the Assyrian king entered on his next campaign with a much larger force than before. Bir-'idri, however, had taken his precautions, and again it was only an indecisive victory that was gained by Shalmaneser. On the relations between Benhadad and Ahab, in which there was apparently a change for the advantage of Israel, see AHAB, § 4 ff. Benhadad is sometimes referred to, not by name, but as 'the king of Syria'; see 1 K. 22 & K. 5 68 ff. Some unnecessary trouble has been produced (1) by the supposition that the period between 'Benhadad's' assistance to Asa and 'Benhadad's' death (which occurred between 846 and 842) was too long to be assigned to a single king of Damascus, and (2) by the reading of the name of the opponent of Shalmaneser II. as Dad-'idri, which, again, is supposed to be equivalent to Hadad-ezer. On the first point it is enough to remark (after Wi.) that Tab-rimmon may (Rezon and Hezion not being identical) have been for a long time a contemporary of Baasha and Asa, so that only about forty years may have elapsed between Benhadad's war with Baasha and his death. On the second point, it may be doubted whether the reading Dad-'idri is tenable;¹ the equation IM = Rammān (or Bir) appears to have been made out (see above); and even were it otherwise, it could hardly be held that 'idri is 'the Aramaic form of ezer' in דרדור (Sayce, Crit. and Mon. 316), for an y would have made the alteration of 'idri into דרד impossible. 'Idru ('idiri), whence 'idri ('my . . .'), seems in fact to be derived from 'adaru, 'to be wide, grand' (ארר; cp Heb. הרר). On the narrative of the death of Benhadad (2 K. 8.7-15), see HAZAEL.

2. BENHADAD II. By this king is here meant, not the contemporary of AHAH (often wrongly so designated),

3. Benhadad II. (probably = Mari').

(2 K. 133). But was his name really Ben-hadad? Rammân-nirari III. (see ASSYRIA, § 32) mentions a king of Damascus named Mari', whom he besieged in his capital, and compelled to pay tribute. This event must have occurred between 806 or 805 and 803. Now Benhadad II. is represented as a contemporary of Jehoahaz, son of Jehu, who probably reigned (see CHRONOLOGY, § 34) from 814-798. It is difficult to suppose that another king named Mari' came between Hazael and Benhadad. More probably Mari', and not Benhadad, is the right name of the son of Hazael. This king may have sought to compensate himself for the blow inflicted by Assyria, by exercising tyranny over Israel. (For a different view of the Benhadads see DAMASCUS, § 7.) T. K. C.

BEN-HAIL (בֶּן-חַיִל, 'son [man] of might'), one of Jehoshaphat's commissioners for teaching the Law (2 Ch. 17). The name, however, is suspicious. Berthau quotes Ben-hesed ('son of lovingkindness'), 1 K. 4. 10 (MT); but the reading there is doubtful (see BEN-HESED, § 3). ⁶BAL and Pesh. read יִזְרָאֵל for בֶּן (τοὺς υἱοὺς τοῦ ἰζραὴλ); but ⁶L adds τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ; cp Gray, HPN 65 n. 2. If the story of Jehoshaphat's commission is only 'ideal,' we may surmise that the name Ben-hail is equally unhistorical.

BEN-HANAN (בְּנֵי חָנָן)—i.e. 'son of a gracious one'—a patronymic; ὁ ἱὸς φανᾶ [B], γ. ἈΝΑΝ [A], -NN. [L], a son of SHIMON (q.v.), a Judahite (1 Ch. 4.20).

BEN-HESED (בֶּן־חֶסֶד, 'son of kindness'; an impossible name, see below), the third in the list of Solomon's prefects (1 K. 4:10, AV 'son of Hessed'; $\gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \epsilon\epsilon\omega\theta$ [B], . . . $\epsilon\epsilon\Delta$ [Λ], $\mu\alpha\chi\epsilon\iota\ \gamma\iota\omicron\varsigma\ \epsilon\chi\omega$ [BHP] [YL]).

His prefecture included, at any rate, Socoh; but which of the different Socohs? If we look at the sphere

1. Prefect of Hebron ? of the prefect whose name precedes his in the list, we shall think of one of the two southern Socohs mentioned in Joshua, either that in the mountains near Hebron, or that in the Shēphēlah, SW. of Jerusalem. If, on the other hand, we consider the sphere of the two prefects whose names follow his, a northern Socoh, which is possibly referred to in early Egyptian name-lists (see

BEN-HESED

SOCO^h, 2), will be more suitable. The decision must be in favour of one of the two southern places of the name, because otherwise the land of Judah will have had no prefect. Which of the two southern Socohs, then, is the right one? Probably that in the rich corn-growing country of the Shēphēlāh, because the prefects had to supply provisions for the court. 'The whole land of Hephher' also fell to his lot. There are traces of this name in the N. (HEPHER, i. 2; cp Gathhepher, Hapharaim). But if this prefect is the only southern one, we must expect the land of Hephher to be some large district (this, indeed, is implied by 'the whole land'). In 1 Ch. 4:18 we hear of a Heber (חֶבֶר) who was the father of Socoh. Plainly this Heber is closely connected with Hebron (as the heros eponymus). ה and פ are easily confounded from a phonetic cause: we should, therefore, probably read חֶבֶר-כָּל-אֶרֶץ, 'the whole land of Heber,' or, better, 'of Hebron' (חֶבְרוֹן).

2. His place of residence is in MT called Arubboth. Arāb in Josh. 15₅₂ (see Klo.) does not help us. G^A

2. Residence at Mareshah? אֶרֶשָׁה cut the knot by reading רְבוֹת אֶרֶשָׁה. Analogous phenomena elsewhere suggest that בֵּית הַחָרִים and that it has been misplaced. בֵּית הָאֶרֶשׁ (cp בֵּית הָאֶרֶשׁ in v. 8 [BL], perhaps for 'Beth-horon') could, of course, be only a mutilated form of a name. To read 'Bethlehem' would be much too bold, and Bætogabra (mod. Bêt Jibrîn) would not suit, since the name occurs late, and (as Buhl points out, Pal. 192) the description of the battle of Mareshah in 2 Ch. 149 is opposed to the assumption that there was a town on the site of Bætogabra in early times. It is quite possible, however, that the neighbouring town of Mareshah had a second name—scarcely Beth-gibbōrīm, but perhaps Beth-horīm, 'place of caves'¹—that has been corrupted into Arub both. בֵּית הָאֶרֶשׁ may have been partly mutilated and partly corrupted in the record into בֵּית הָאֶרֶשׁ, whence אֶרֶשָׁה, especially if הָאֶרֶשׁ was written with the mark of abbreviation (הָרִ' or 'הָרִ). The conjecture is geographically plausible. At the present day Bêt-Jibrîn is rightly described as 'the capital of the Shephēlāh';² this is set forth more fully elsewhere (see ELEUTHEROPOLIS). Suffice it to remark here that if Bêt-Jibrîn became the 'centre of the district' after the fall of Mareshah, the earlier city cannot have been less important in the time of Solomon. If Taanach and Megiddo are mentioned in the record of the prefectures, surely Mareshah, under this or some other name, must have been mentioned too. Now, Bêt-Jibrîn is only 20 min. N. of Mer'ash (Mareshah).

We have spoken of Beth-horim as possibly an early name of Mareshah. This designation would harmonise excellently with the natural features of the neighbourhood of Mareshah and Betogabra. The excavation of the caverns which now fill the district must have begun in ancient times. The Christian and Islamic marks and inscriptions which are sometimes found do not oppose this obvious supposition. See ELEUTHEROPOLIS, § 2.

We now turn to consider Ben-hesed's real name. Klostermann has made it probable that the first two prefects were described as sons of Zadok, the priest, and Shisha (Shavsha), the secretary, respectively (cp v. 2 f.).

It is very possible that בִּנְחָסֵר should be read בִּנְתָּהֶפֶר 'son of the secretary,' and that the prefect was in fact the Ahijah mentioned in v. 3. This is slightly favoured by G^L's (μ)αχεῖ, but really rests on internal probability (cp BIDKAR). The misreading בִּנְחָסֵר is touching, as a

¹ Beth-horim, 'place of caves,' would naturally come to be explained 'place of the Horites,' (see ELEUTHEROPOLIS, § 2); the Horites were no doubt regarded as giants (gibbôr = γίγας 6), like the Anakim. Hebron is called in Targ. Jon. Gen. 23 'the city of the giants.'

The prefect's own name is omitted; probably his father's name also; for the evidence tends to show that most of the prefects were the sons of famous men. The name of his city also is wanting. Yet the hill-country of Ephraim was not deficient in places of importance. Consequently either Hur or Ben-hur must be incorrect. Either 'Hur' stands in the place of one of David's and Solomon's heroes, or Ben-hur is a corruption of the name of the prefect's city. G^A's rendering may seem to protect Ben. But nowhere else in G's version of this section is βερ given instead of υδς (υδς is of course an interpolation); if the בַּ represented by G^A is correct, we must suppose that it is a mutilated form of בֹּהֵן, 'priest' (as כֹּהֵן in חסר in v. 10 may be of בֹּהֵן). In this case, Azariah, son of Zadok the priest (v. 2), will be the prefect's name, and his city will be בֵּית־חור = Beth-horon. Azariah, therefore, stands first in both lists, which is intrinsically probable. If, however, we follow the βασιωρ of G^{BL}, the prefect's city alone has come down to us; βασιωρ may represent Bethhoron. חֹר may easily have come from חורון Horon (abbrev. from Bethhoron). So, in the main, Klostermann. T. K. C.

Though popularly explained as meaning the propitious or sturdy tribe¹—‘the son of my right hand’²—Ben-

1. Name. jamin was probably at first a geographical name for the people of the southern portion of the highland district called Ephraim (cp the expression יָמִינִי in the old narrative 1 S. 9-10 16), just as a district of Gilead (Gad) seems to have been called Šafōn, 'North' (see ZEPHON; cp also Teman, Temeni Yemen, and on the other hand esh-Sham).

It is not impossible indeed that this district was already known to the Canaanites as 'the South'; but there is nothing to suggest that it was. Indeed, it is a good deal more probable that the name means 'south of Joseph,' the Hebrews who settled in the highlands of Ephraim being known as 'the house' or 'sons' of Joseph, a designation which retained this general sense till quite a late date. The question is rather whether Benjamin, at first a distinct tribe, afterwards became the southern part of Joseph (e.g., by the energy and success of Saul; as Winckler supposes), or whether it was not rather the southern part of Joseph that, under the influence of forces immediately to be described,

2 In the uncertainty how the present text of Judg. 20 16 arose (cp Moore, ad loc.), there is perhaps hardly sufficient ground for connecting with this etymology the story of the 700 left-handed warriors. Cp, however, also EHU⁹, and the story of the Benjamite deserters to David, who could use the bow and the sling with either hand (1 Ch. 12:2).

came gradually to be distinguished from the rest of the highlanders of Ephraim by the special name of Benjamites, 'men of the south,' the S. part, as being the smaller (cp 1 S. 9.21), receiving the distinguishing epithet.

It is not difficult to conjecture how this would naturally come about. The plateau of Benjamin, if it is, as we have seen, historically connected with

2. Land. Joseph, is hardly divided physically from Judah. Indeed, although no mean country (σπενώτατος δὲ ὁ κλήρος οὗτος ἦν διὰ τὴν τῆς γῆς ἀρετὴν: Jos. Ant. i. 5.22), it differs materially in its physical features from the northern part of Ephraim, being sterner and less fruitful—in fact, more Judæan. Moreover, valleys, running down to the Jordan (Suwēnit, Kelt) and to the sea (Merj ibn 'Omër), exposed it to attack from the E. (Moab) and from the W. (Philistines), while a line of strong Canaanite fortress-cities (Gibeon, etc.) constituted an additional source of danger to its highland peasants. That these southerners had a certain traditional fierceness¹ (Blessing of Jacob)² was, accordingly, only a natural result of their position and history. We cannot be surprised, then, that they won the right to a special name and place.

It is thus hardly necessary to assume, with Stade (ZATW 1.348 [81]), some specific attempt or series of attempts to overcome by force the Canaanites of the cities (Jericho, Ai), perhaps under the leadership of the clan of Joshua, in order to account for the origin of a separate tribe: the general situation might be sufficient.

Mixture of race may, however, have helped to differentiate the tribe, although at least the Canaanite elements took a very long time to become thoroughly amalgamated, as we see from the story of Gibeon (Josh. 9; St. GVI 161), and still more from the hints about BEEROth (g.v., i.),³ which appears to have retained its distinctively Canaanite population at least till the time of Saul: indeed, even the radical policy of the latter seems to have been only partly successful (see ISHBAAL, 1). If the name CHEPHAR-HAAMMONAI (g.v.) indicates the presence of immigrants from across the Jordan we must look for the explanation to much later times (Josh. 18.24 P). The position of Benjamin on the marches of Joseph, however, doubtless provided opportunities for mixture also with other tribes.

Benjamin is, e.g., explicitly brought by E (Gen. 35.18) into connection with a tribe called BENONI (g.v.), while the first appearance of one or both of them is connected in some way (at least etymologically) with the disappearance of RACHEL (g.v.). If Simeon really temporarily settled in this neighbourhood before making his way south (cp ISRAEL, § 7), it is at least worthy of note that in a Simeonite list we find a clan name, JAMIN 2 (1 Ch. 4.24), and a place name Bilhah (v. 29; see BAALAH, 2). Nor is it impossible to find suggestions of some connection with REUBEN: a famous landmark on the borders of Benjamin is connected with his name (though the genuineness of the text is perhaps not beyond question),⁴ as is also BILHAH (g.v.), the hand-maid of Rachel. In Bilhan, on the other hand, to which the Chronicler in his first genealogy assigns a prominent place (1 Ch. 7.10), we cannot safely see the remains of a Bilhah clan (see BILHAH), for the name may have been taken from the Horite genealogy, as Jeush was taken from the Edomite (below, § 9.ii.α). Historical probability is certainly in favour of the idea that, after Dan failed to establish himself, Benjamin eventually spread westwards—although some of the apparent actual traces of this are not to be trusted (see HUSHIM, Gen. 46.23 [Danite]; see, however, DAN, § 8) compared with 1 Ch. 8.8.11 [Benjamite]; AIJALON [1], Josh. 19.42 [Danite] compared with Judg. 1.35 [house of Joseph] 1 Ch. 8.13 [Benjamite; see BERIAH, 3]). The confused connection with Manasseh, however, that seems to result from the present text of 1 Ch. 7.15 compared with v. 12 is perhaps due merely to corruption of the text. (Shupham and Hupham may have had no place in the original system of the Benjamite list, 1 Ch. 7.6-11, and being perhaps supplied on the margin [see below, § 9.ii.] may, by some confusion, have been their way into the text also in Manasseh, v. 15 [cp Be. ad loc. 1].) What connection with Moab is intended in 1 Ch. 8.8 the present condition of the text makes it impossible to divine (the clause may be a gloss; see below, § 9.ii.β). Cp PAHATH-MOAB. Nor perhaps can we venture to interpret historically the suggestion of the Chronicler with regard to a later transference of clans from Benjamin back to Ephraim (see BERIAH, 2, 3). Clan names common to Benjamin and other tribes are not rare.

The memory of the derivative or at least secondary character of Benjamin still lived in the earlier days of

4. Age. the monarchy, as we see from 2 S. 19.20 [21] (cp also 20.1 with 20.21) and (apparently) from Judg. 1.22,¹ and seems to be reflected in the patriarchal story (JE) which tells how, last of all, Benjamin was born in Canaan.² That the differentiation of Benjamin was relatively ancient, however, we should be prepared to believe from the fact of the other branches of Joseph being called not brothers but sons.³ The reference in the Song of Deborah is too obscure (not to speak of its perplexing connection in some way with Hos. 5.8) to be of much use as positive evidence; while the story of Ehud, if it is perhaps hardly necessary, with Winckler (Gesch. 1.138), to regard the single explicit reference to Benjamin as an interpolation (see below, § 5), may perhaps reflect the conditions of an age when no very clear line was drawn between Benjamin and the rest of Joseph (Judg. 3.27)—the men of the south and the men of the more northern highlands. At all events, by the time of David Benjamin was, owing to the energy of Saul, a distinct political element to be reckoned with, although we must not forget that, e.g., in the story of the first appearance of Jeroboam, the 'house of Joseph' is an administrative unit (1 K. 11.28).⁴

The peculiar condition of the legends relating to this tribe provokes an attempt to explain it. This

5. Legends. must take account of two inconsistent tendencies—a tendency in favour of the tribe (Judg. 3.15 1 S. 4.12 1 K. 3.4.9.2), and a tendency against it (Judg. 19-21). When we bear in mind the central position of the tribe, and the abundance and importance of sanctuaries within and near its bounds (see below, § 6), it cannot surprise us that there were many traditions of incidents in which the tribe played a part. It is, however, remarkable that some of them have no special reference to sanctuaries.

We can hardly suppose this due to contending political interests (those of Ephraim and Judah) leading to a sort of diplomatic flattery of the boundary tribe with a view to securing its adhesion—just as there evidently was rivalry of a less peaceable kind (e.g., 1 K. 15.17.22). A. Bernstein, who worked out this view in great detail in his able, if unequal, essay Ursprung der Sagen von Abraham, Isaak u. Jacob, 1871 (see especially 61), does not take account of the stories unfavourable to Benjamin outside of Genesis; and it seems clear that Benjamin was naturally a part of the northern kingdom (1 K. 12.21 belongs to a much later date than v. 20). The later history of the tribe, especially after the fall of Samaria (see below § 7), would go a long way towards accounting not only for the preservation but also for the mixed character of much Benjamin tradition. If we wish any further explanation, it seems reasonable to seek it in a natural interest, friendly or otherwise, in the great tribal hero, the mysterious Saul and his house.

The interest in the tribe is undeniable.

Israel will run any risk rather than that of losing Benjamin (Gen. 42.38 J); the narrative delights in detailing the various signs of special affection on the part of 'Joseph,' and even Judah offers himself as surety for him (Gen. 43.9 J) or, according to E, Reuben the first-born offers his two sons (Gen. 42.37). On the other hand, all the tribes led by Joseph reprove and chastise Benjamin, but relent and find a substitute in Jabesh Gilead

² For a suggestion of a possible original connection between the metaphor employed in the Blessing and the constellation Lupus right opposite Taurus (= Joseph), see Zimmern's art. 'Der Jakobsegen u. der Tierkreis,' ZA 9.168 [92].

³ A late editor may be following trustworthy tradition when he adds CHEPHIRAH in his list (with which cp Ezra 2.20.25 = Neh. 7.25.29 = 1 Esd. 6.17.19).

² P, however, ignores this (Gen. 35.26).

³ Nöldeke (in a private communication) thinks that at an early time Benjamin was a powerful tribe, and that the rise of the story of its late origin (as also Judg. 19-21) is to be accounted for simply as the result of the crippling of its power by David.

⁴ It has been argued by St. from 1 K. 4.18 [19] that it did not include Benjamin (ZATW 1.115 n.); but could we argue from 4.8 that it did not include Ephraim?

(Judg. 19-21),—a story that is strangely parallel to Joseph's accusing Benjamin (falsely), the others interceding, and Judah offering to become substitute (Gen. 44 33). What historical substratum may underlie this Gibeah story we have not the means of determining. Its late date and its untrustworthiness in its present form appear in its practically wiping out the tribe that was not so very long after able to give its first ruler to a united 'Israel' (see also below, § 7, end, on post-exilic interest in Benjamin).

Benjamin was in a sense at the centre of the religious life of the land. What the religious history of

6. Religious position. ANATHOTH (q.v., 1) may have been we can only guess; but there were sacred massēbas and trees that bore the names of DEBORAH (Gen. 358 Judg. 4 5) and RACHEL (Gen. 35 16 Jer. 31 15);¹ and Ramah, Geba, Gibeah, Mizpeh, Gibeon, Gilgal,² not only were Canaanitish sanctuaries but also continued to be of importance as such in Israel; indeed, Geba, which (or perhaps it was the neighbouring Gibeah) one writer calls 'Gibeah of God' (1 S. 10 5), was perhaps selected by the Philistines as the site of their nēšib because of its sanctity (1 S. 13 3 and especially 10 5; cp SAUL, § 2 n.) as well as because of its strategic position.³

More important still, perhaps, Bethel itself, the famous royal sanctuary (Am. 7 13), where, according to the story, Israel encamped after crossing the Jordan (see BOCHIM), is said by P to have belonged to Benjamin (Josh. 18 22). No doubt the Chronicler afterwards (1 Ch. 7 28) assigns it to Ephraim; but (though it may well have been a border town with connections on both sides) that is perhaps only because he could not conceive of Benjamin, a tribe that he regarded as belonging to the southern kingdom, extending so far north. At all events, there was reason enough for the words used of Benjamin in Dt. 33 12 (cp Di. ad loc. and see below, § 8),

'The beloved of Yahwē, he dwelleth secure;
He (i.e., Yahwē) encompasseth him all the day,
And between his shoulders⁴ doth he dwell.'

It seems, therefore, not unfitting that this tribe, martial though it was, should for all time, whatever view we take of the character of Saul, be associated with two of the greatest names in the history of Hebrew thought and religion, representatives of two of the greatest of religious movements: Jeremiah, who was a native of a Benjamite town, and Paul, who at least believed that he was sprung from the same tribe (Rom. 11 1 Phil. 3 5; cp Test. xii. Patr., Benj. ch. 11).

Saul's career ended in gloom; yet his work was not entirely undone. It was, therefore, a matter of course

7. Later history. that the men of Benjamin (especially the Bichrites, see below, § 9 ii. β), even more than the rest of the house of Joseph, should dislike being subordinated to the newly-risen house of Judah (SHIMEI, 1), and should embrace any good opportunity to assert their claim (SHEBA, ii. 1), and that, along with the rest of the house of Joseph, they should throw in their lot with JEROBOAM (1). We have, accordingly, no reason to question the accuracy of the statement in 1 K. 12 20: 'there was none that followed the house of David, but the tribe of Judah only,'⁵ (cp Ps. 80 2 [3] and Hos. 5 8 with We.'s note, and see ISRAEL, § 28; Jericho is regarded as north Israelite in 1 K. 15 27 16 15 f.). However, as Jeroboam was not a Benjamite, and the capitals of the northern kingdom were always in the northern parts of Joseph (cp ZARETHAN II.), Benjamin does not appear to have

³ Wi. has even tried to show that Gibeah was believed by some to have been the seat of Israel's famous shrine, the 'ark'; but he takes no account of the discussion of KOSTERS (ThT 27 361-378 [93]; cp ARK, § 5).

⁴ Note the Arabic metaphor, WRS Kin. 46 (foot).

really gained by this step. In fact, it seems to have eventually gravitated more and more southwards. Indeed, lying on the border between the two kingdoms, it was important strategically rather than politically; and, although we cannot very well follow the details of the process,¹ some of its towns seem to have been, at one time or another, and more or less permanently, incorporated in the southern kingdom. The blow that the northern kingdom received in 722 was favourable to this process, and in another sense the sack of Jerusalem in 586. Thus in Jer. 33 13 'the land of Benjamin' is included in an enumeration of the various districts of the territory of Judah—viz., the Shephēlah, Negeb, etc.—just as in 2 K. 23 8 'from Geba to Beersheba,' like 'from Geba to Rimmon' in Zech. 14 10, stands for the whole land of Judah, and in Jer. 6 1 Jeremiah's clansmen are living in Jerusalem; and so, in the century following the rebuilding of the temple, Benjamin is regularly mentioned alongside of Judah, the combination of names appearing often to mean the families that were not taken to Babylon (cp KOSTERS, Herstel, passim), and the Jews came to believe that Rehoboam's kingdom had from the first consisted formally of these two tribes (cp Ps. 68 27 [28]² Chron. passim, and a late writer in 1 K. 12 21 23). Hence we need not be surprised at the fulness with which Benjamin, as compared with the other Joseph tribes, is treated in the book of Joshua (Di. 505), or at the frequent and copious Benjamin lists in the Chronicler (see § 8 f.). Only we must remember that these tribal distinctions were in later times theoretical; Simon (2 Macc. 3 4), Menelaus, and Lysimachus were Benjamites; for the explanation of Mordecai's mythic genealogy (Shimei—Kish—Benjamin) see ESTHER, § 2 f.

(a) Although the priestly writer's conception of the frontier of Benjamin is not even self-consistent, Beth-arabah, a point in Judah's N. boundary (Josh. 15 6), being assigned first (v. 6) to Judah and then (18 22, if the text is correct; see BETH-geographical. ARABAH, 1) to Benjamin, it can be identified roughly.

From the Jordan near Jericho he makes it pass up to Beth-aven and Bethel (Beitin), where it turns S. to Ataroth-addar (possibly 'Afarā) and thence W. to Beth-horon the nether (Beit-Ūr), returning by Kirjath-jearim and Nephtoh (Lifāz), circling round the south of Jerusalem through the vale of Hinnom and the plateau of Rephaim, and by the spring of Rogel, and finally returning by En-shemesh (Hūd-el-'Azariyeh) and the valley of Achor to the Jordan at Beth-hoglah (Am., or Ḳasr-Ḥajla).

What led P to fix on this line, the southern stretch of which he repeats with greater fulness in the delineation of Judah (Josh. 15 5-10), we cannot say; nor can we say why he makes the boundary run south of Jerusalem.³ The 'Blessing of Moses' has indeed been taken to imply (Dt. 33 12; see above, § 6) that in the latter part of the eighth century Jerusalem was held to lie inside the boundary of Benjamin; but 'by him' in the first line is probably due to a clerical error, and line 3 is quite indistinct: nothing points specially to Jerusalem.⁴ Stade (GV 116a) proposes Gibeon; perhaps Winckler would suggest Gibeah; Oort, however (ThT, 1896, pp. 297-300), pleads vigorously for Bethel, and nothing could be more appropriate in a poem so markedly north-Israelitish. It is plain enough, on the other hand, that Jerusalem is assigned to Benjamin by P (though he avoids giving the name of the town, speaking simply of 'the Jebusite'); and, if we do not know precisely why he does so, we can at least see that he has a purpose of some kind, for in Judg. 12:1 it is quite clear that the editor has for the same reason twice substituted 'Benjamin' for the original 'Judah,' which we find in the otherwise identical Josh. 15:63. We must conclude that, whatever conceptions prevailed in later times, in the days when tribal names were really in harmony with geographical facts of one kind or another, Jerusalem was counted to Judah.

(b) Many late lists of Benjamite towns have been preserved. 1. The only early one is the rhetorical enumeration of twelve places on the path of the Assyrian invader (Is. 10:28-32).

Of the six names in it which are not mentioned in any of the other lists, two are those of towns the sites of which are known with certainty: MICHMASH (Muqmās) and GEBIM (El-jib).

2. P's list (Josh. 18:21-28) comprises an eastern and a western group—viz., a group of twelve (to which he adds in 21:18 two others) and a group of fourteen towns.

Of these twenty-eight the following sixteen may be regarded as identified, some with certainty, others with a high degree of probability: JERICHO, BETH-HOGLAH, ZEMARAIM, BETH-EL, PARAH, GEBA, GIBBON, RAMAH, BEEROOTH, MIZPEH, CHEPHIRAH, 'the Jebusite,' GIBEATH, KIRIATH, ANATHOTH, ALMON (see ALEMETH).

3. Neh. 11:31-35 contains a list of some sixteen towns alleged to be settled by Benjamites. The list, which may be incompletely preserved, is more and more assigned, by scholars of various schools, to the time of the Chronicler (see Torrey, Comp. and Hist. Value of Ezra-Neh. 42 f.; Mey. Entsteh. 107, 189); at all events, it cannot be early.

Of the eleven new names (unless the Aija of v. 31 be the Avvim of Josh. 18:23) not in the Joshua lists, four may be regarded as identified beyond dispute: HADID, NEBALLAT, LOD (see LYDDA), ONO.

4. In the list Neh. 7=Ez. 2=1 Esd. 5 (see EZRA, ii. § 9), vv. 25-37 20-34, and 17b-22 respectively, seem to enumerate places (apparently places where members of Ezra's 'congregation' were resident), mostly within old Benjamite rather than old Judahite territory.

In this list, excluding NEBO (iv.) as being probably merely a transposition of NOB, we have still five other new names, of which, however, some seem to be spurious, and only NETOPHAH and BETH-AZMAVETH (see AZMAVETH [i.]) can be regarded as identified with any certainty.

Other places perhaps in Benjamite territory are BAALHAZOR (2 S. 13:23) and NOHAH (see Moore, Judges, 443). 1 Esd. also adds a CHADIAS and AMMIDOI (CHADIASAI).

Lists of Benjamite clan or personal names (sometimes, of course, including place names) are many. They have mostly, however, suffered much at one stage or another in transmission.

(i.) P's two (Gen. 46=Nu. 26) are, as usual, different versions of the same list.

They probably contain two triplets (a) BELA—BECHER—ASHBEL, and (b) GERA—Naaman—Ahiram; and a third triplet, not quite so certain, (c) Shuphan—Hupham—Ard.

(ii.) The Chronicler's two (1 Ch. 7 and 1 Ch. 8) are more difficult to understand, but are constructed more or less on the same scheme.

(a) In 1 Ch. 7:6 f. (sons of the first triplet¹—of which, however, Ashbel, 'Man of Baal,' becomes Jediel, 'Intimate of El')² we have what is of all the lists perhaps the most symmetrical. Certain peculiarities (such as apparent doublets) make it plausible to suppose that the symmetry was once even greater. Abijah, a name that occurs elsewhere in the Chronicler's genealogies only in priestly families,³ should perhaps be read 'the father of' (cp. 'father of Bethlehem,' 1 Ch. 4:4). In that way the two places Anathoth and Alemeth would be assigned to the last-mentioned son of Becher, just as in v. 12 Shuppim and Huppim are ascribed to Ir=Iri the last-mentioned son of Bela. Marquart,¹ to whom the detection of this analogy is due, suggests that אֲחִיהֵל should be read בְּנֵה בְּנֵה. If some form of this theory be adopted it will be only natural to look for a name (or names) assigned to the last-mentioned son of Jediel (the remaining branch of Benjamin) and to find it in Hushim the son of Aher (v. 12). This will be still more plausible if we may adopt the rest of Marquart's theory, that Aher אֲחִיהֵל is a miswritten אֲחִיהֵל—i.e., Ahihūr—and that Ahihahar, אֲחִיהֵל, is a corruption of the same name (אֲחִיהֵל). If Uzzi and Uzziel in v. 7 are a doublet, 'five' in the same verse is not original. Perhaps Ehud etc., in v. 10 are brothers of Bilhan, the intervening words being a parenthesis.² Whilst v. 12 is thus required to give symmetry to the genealogy, it may nevertheless be in a sense an appendix.

¹ Verse 12a in a sense represents the third triplet, and 12b has names connected in chap. 8 with the second.

(8) Chap. 8 has in parts the appearance of being constructed in a very schematic form (though efforts to detect a general scheme have not been markedly successful), and this seems to warrant the conviction that the present obscurity is due to textual corruption. For remedying that some help can be had from the versions; but it is not sufficient. Certain suggested emendations (see an article by the present writer in JQR 11 102-114 [1918]) so greatly reduce the disorder that now prevails that there seems to be reason to believe that the genealogy was at one time markedly regular in structure, and that considerable boldness in attempts to restore it is warranted. It has always seemed difficult to explain how the historically important Benjamite clans—the clan of Saul and Sheba (viz., Becher), and that of Shimei (viz., Gera)—are so subordinated in this extraordinarily copious list (they appear to be omitted altogether in Nu. 26; see, however, BECHER). It is probable that the subordination is due to corruption of the text. When emended in the way already referred to, 1 Ch. 8:7-26 is reduced to P's three triplets with the additional statement that Gera was the father of [E]JUD (q.v.) and Shua[il], or rather, as Marquart acutely suggests, SHIMEI (q.v.; cp. אֲחִיהֵל [Ahihūr—Ahihūr]). What follows is obscure—the reconstruction proposed in JQR, loc. cit., is in parts not much more than a guess—but it seems extremely probable that the names in vv. 1-27, beyond P's three triplets, were originally attributed to Gera through Ahihahar (once corrupted into Shaharaim; see above, [a]) and Hushim (v. 12 being an intrusive repetition of a later part of the list). Then vv. 30-38 gave the genealogy of the Bichrites (for וְכִנְיָ הַבִּכְרִית, 'and his firstborn,' read וְכִנְיָ הַבִּכְרִית 'and the sons of the Bichrite'), v. 32b being perhaps a marginal gloss due to some bewildered reader of vv. 30-32 (in their new position after the intrusion of v. 28 f. from chap. 9). Marquart suggests that these nine verses originally followed the mention of the sons of Bela. For fuller details and other suggestions the reader is referred to the article already cited.³ It is difficult to avoid the conviction that some reconstruction is necessary.

(iii.) In Neh. 11:7 f. and 1 Ch. 9:7-9 we have two versions of a list of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerusalem, the original of which it is quite impossible to restore.

The names are grouped in the form of genealogies of a few persons; for which, among other reasons, Meyer pronounces the list an invention of the Chronicler (Entsteh., 189). Kusters, however, suggests that the genealogical form is not original (Herstel), and that the authority was a list of Jerusalem Benjamites living in Jerusalem before the arrival of Ezra.

2. A Benjamite, b. Bilhan, 1 Ch. 7:10 f. (see No. 1, § 9, ii. a).

3. A Levite, of the b'ne Harin, in the list of those with foreign wives, Ezra 10:32 (see EZRA, i. § 5, end).

4. A Levite, in the list of wall-builders, Neh. 3:23 (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f., EZRA, ii. §§ 16 [11], 15 d), perhaps the same as No. 3.

5. In the procession at the dedication of the wall (EZRA, i. § 13 g), Neh. 12:34 (מַעֲקֵר [L]); on which see Kusters, Herstel, 59.

BENJAMIN, GATE OF (בֵּית־בִּנְיָמִן), Jer. 20:2 37 13 38; Zech. 14:10. See JERUSALEM.

BENO (בֶּנִי) is taken as a proper name in 1 Ch. 24:26 f. by EV, in v. 26 by G (ΥΙΟΙ BONNI [A. BONNEIA ΥΙΟΙ ΑΥΤΟΥ [L], B. om.; in v. 27 G^h has ΥΙΟΙ ΑΥΤΟΥ, G^h ΥΙΟΙ ΑΥ. and by Jer. and Targ. That the list of the sons of Levi is in a most unsatisfactory state is evident from a comparison with Ex. 6:17 f. 1 Ch. 6:17 [2] f. 29 f. [14] and 23:21 f. The MT is most obscure, and, according to Kittel, vv. 20-31 are one of the latest additions; one rendering is to take v. 26 f. as follows:—'Of Jaaziah, his (Merari's) son, (even) the sons of Merari through Jaaziah his son,' etc.

BEN-ONI (בֶּן־אֲנִי; ΥΙΟΙ ΟΔΥΝΗC ΜΟΥ [ADIEL].

rightly interpreting the mind of the writer), the first name of BENJAMIN (§ 3), given to her new-born child by the dying Rachel (Gen. 35:18). Ben-oni must, however, have been an early tribal name. We find the clan-names ONAM and ONAN (both in Judah, the former also Horite); also a Benjamite city ONO; nor can the existence of an ancient city called BETH-AVEN (Beth-on?) be denied. To assume, however, with Prof. Sayce (Patriarch. Pal. 191 f.), first that Beth-el was also called Beth-on, and next that the names Beth-on and Ben-oni imply that the name of the god worshipped at Luz was On, and next that this divine name was derived from On=Heliopolis in Egypt, is purely arbitrary. Cp BETH-AVEN, AVEN (3). T. K. C.

BEN-ZOHETH (בֶּן-זֹהֶת), etym. doubtful, probably corrupt). ZOHETH and Ben-Zoheth are mentioned in 1 Ch. 4:20 (υἱοὶ ζωαθ [B], υἱ. ζωαθ [A], υἱ. ζωθ [L]), among the sons of Ishi of JUDAH.

BEON (בֶּעֹן), Num. 32:3. See BAAL-MEON.

BEOR (בְּעוֹר), possibly miswritten for ACHBOR; see BAAL-HANAN [1]; BEOP [BAL; WH in 2 Pet. 2:15]. 1. Father of the Edomite king BELA [ii. 1], Gen. 36:32 (Βαιωρ [L])=1 Ch. 1:43 (Βαιωρ [A], Σετφωρ, i.e., Zippor [L]).

2. Father of BALAAM (Nu. 22:5, etc., βαιωρ [A], except in Dt. 23:4 [5] Josh. 13:22 Mi. 6:5; in Josh. 24:9 [5th omits]), called BOSOR in 2 Pet. 2:15 AV (Βοσορ [Ti. following AN^{CC}]; Vg. Bosor; cp the conflate reading βωσορσορ [N*]), RV BEOR ([Bewp WH]). In Nu. 24:22 5th AEL reads τῷ βεωρ (βαιωρ [A]) for Heb. בְּעוֹר.

BERA (בֶּרֶא), scarcely, 'with evil,' cp BIRSHA; these, like other names in Gen. 14, may be mutilated and corrupted forms; Βαλλα [ADL], Βαρα [E], Βαλας [Jos. Ant. i. 9], king of Sodom, who joined the league against Chedorlaomer (Gen. 14:2). See CHEDORLAOMER, § 2, end.

BERACHAH, RV Beracah (בִּרְכָּה, 'blessing'; Βερχεια [BN], Βαραχια [AL]), a Benjamite, one of David's warriors (1 Ch. 12:3). See DAVID, § 11 [2] iii.

BERACHAH (RV Beracah), VALLEY OF (בְּרִכְה, κοιλας εγλογιας [BAL]), the scene of the great thanksgiving of Jehoshaphat and his people (2 Ch. 20:26; in 26a δ αυλων της ευλογιας [BA], η κοιλας της ευλ. [L]). The geographical knowledge of the narrator was evidently good; but that, of course, does not make his narrative any more historical (see JEHOSEPHAT). At no great distance from Tek'a there is a broad open wady, on the west side of which are extensive ruins named Bereiküt. Just opposite the ruins the wady itself is called the Wady Bereiküt (Rob. LBR, 275). From the form Bereiküt we gather that the true ancient pronunciation was probably Berēchōth, 'reservoirs.' T. K. C.

BERAIAH (בְּרֵאִיָּה, § 31, 'Yahwē creates'; Βαραια [L], Βεριαι¹ και Β. [BA]). 1. A Benjamite, assigned to the b'ne SHIMEI (8); 1 Ch. 8:21. The name is probably post-exilic, 'creation' being one of the great exilic and post-exilic religious doctrines.

2. See BEDEIAH.

BEREA, 1. An unknown locality in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, where Bacchides encamped before the battle in which the Jews were defeated and Judas the Maccabee was slain (Apr. 161 B.C.). The camp of Judas was at Elasa, Eleasa, or Alasa, also unknown, but probably K'h. It¹ asā between the two Beth-horons on the main road from Sharon to Jerusalem (1 Macc. 9:4 f.). The best reading seems to be Berea [ANV]; but there is MS authority also for Βερρ-ζαθ and ¹ That is ברקעה; cp 1 Ch. 7:30.

BERED

Βερρθαζ; Vet. Lat. has Berethim. Josephus (Ant. xii. 10a) has Βηθξηθω, or, in some MSS, Βηρξηθ. Ewald thinks of the modern Bir ez-Zeit, 1½ m. NW. from Jufna, or of Beeroth (mod. el Bireh).

2. RV Beroea, Βέροια [A], -πεο. [V]), the scene of the death of MENELAUS, the modern Aleppo (2 Macc. 13:4).

3. Βέροια [Ti. WH] (some MSS Βέρρ.), now Verria, or Kara Verria, in Lower Macedonia, at the foot of Mt. Bermios, 5 m. above the left bank of the Haliacmon (Vistritsa). It has a splendid view over the plains of the Haliacmon and the Axios; plane-trees and abundant streams make it one of the most desirable towns of the district. Yet it did not lie on the main road; which perhaps accounts for its being chosen as a place of refuge for Paul and Silas in their midnight escape from Thessalonica (Acts 17:10).

A curious parallel is found in Cicero's speech against Piso. Unable to face the chorus of complaint at Thessalonica, Piso 'fled to the out-of-the-way town of Beroea' (in oppidum devium Beroeam. In Pis. 36).

In the apostolic age Beroea contained a colony of Jews, and a synagogue (Acts 17:10). They were of a 'nobler' spirit (εὐγενέστεροι) than those of Thessalonica—possibly because they did not belong to the purely mercantile class. Not only were many of the Jews themselves converted, but also not a few of the Greeks, both men and women (τῶν Ἑλληνίδων γυναικῶν τῶν εὐσεβῶν καὶ ἀνδρῶν οὐκ ὀλίγοι, Acts 17:12: the language seems to indicate that the apostle was here dealing with an audience at a higher social level than elsewhere). Paul's stay here seems to have been of some duration (several months, Rams. Paul, 234), partly in order to allow him to watch over the converts of Thessalonica, only 50 m. distant; he may have been still at Beroea when he made those two vain attempts to revisit them to which 1 Thess. 2:18 alludes, and Timothy may have been sent to them from Beroea, and not from Athens, on the occasion mentioned in 1 Thess. 3:2. The apostle was at length obliged to quit the town, as the 'Jews of Thessalonica' heard of his work and resorted to their usual tactics of inciting to riot (σαλεύοντες τοὺς δῆλους, Acts 17:13). Silas and Timothy were left in Macedonia; but Paul was escorted by certain of the converts to the sea and as far as Athens (Acts 17:14 f.). This hurried departure (εὐθέως, v. 14) may have been by the road to Diurn.

The omission of the harbour is noticeable. In other cases the name of the harbour is given: so in Acts 14:25 16:11 18:18. The omission, however, affords no proof that the journey to Athens was performed by land—a view which derives some colour from the AV 'to go as it were to the sea' (RV 'as far as to the sea').

Possibly one of his escort was that Sopater, son of Pyrrhus, a Berean, who is mentioned in Acts 20:4 as accompanying Paul from Corinth to Macedonia. The Sopater of Rom. 16:21 is probably another person. We read in Acts 20:5 that the escort from Corinth preceded Paul to Troas: this may have been partly due to his making a detour in order to revisit Beroea. W. J. W.

BERECHIAH (בִּרְכִּיָּה, in Nos. 4 f. בִּרְכִּיָּה, § 28, 'Yahwē blesses' = Jerechiah, Βαραχ[ε]ια [BNA], -χιας [L]).

1. Son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch. 3:20 (Βαραχια [L], -ια [B]).

2. One of the Levites that dwelt in the villages of the Netophathites, 1 Ch. 9:16 (-γαι [B], -χιας [A], αβ. [L]), not included in || Neh. 11. Probably the same as the doorkeeper for the Ark, 1 Ch. 15:23.

3. Father of Meshullam in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f., EZRA, ii., §§ 16 [1], 15 d'), Neh. 3:4 (-χιας [NA], om. B), 30 (Βαραχια [BN], Βαρα [A]); cp 6:18.

4. Father of the prophet Zechariah, Zech. 1:17 (Βαραχιας [BNAQ]). Omitted in the || Ezra 5:1. On the question of his identity with the BARACHIAS (AV), or BARACHIAH (RV) of Mt. 23:35, see ZACHARIAS, 9.

5. Father of Asaph, a singer, 1 Ch. 6:24 [39] (AV BERACHIAH), 15:17 (-χια [L]).

6. b. Meshillemoth; one of the chief men of the b'ne Ephraim, temp. Ahaz, 2 Ch. 28:12 (Ζαχαρίας [B], Βαραχιας [A]).

BERED (בֶּרֶד; Βαραδ [AD]; -ρακ [L]; BARAD [Vg.]). A place in S. Palestine, or perhaps rather

N. Arabia, between which and Kadesh lay BEER-LAHAI-ROI [g.v.] (Gen. 16¹⁴). Three identifications deserve mention.

(1) The Targums represent it by the same word as that given for Shur in v. 7—Onk. by חורר Hagra, and Jer. Targ. by חורר חורר. The former word, however (cp Ar. hūr, 'a wall, enclosure'), seems to be meant for a translation of the name Shur, not for an identification of the place. The second name is clearly the Elusa of Ptol., which is now probably Kh. Khalaša in the Wādy 'Aslūj, about 12 m. from Beersheba on the way to Ruhaibeh or Rehoboth (see Palmer, PEFQ, 1871, p. 35; Guérin, Judée, 2269-273). (2) Eus. and Jer. (OS 299⁷⁶ 145²) identify a certain 'well of judgment' with the village Berdan in the Gerarite country (in which Beersheba also is placed). This 'well of judgment' seems like a confused reminiscence of Enmishpat—i.e., Kadesh (Gen. 14⁷). Is this Berdan the same spot which Jerome (OS 101³) calls Barad, where, he says, a well of Agar was shown in his day? (3) If, with Rowlands, we find BEER-LAHAI-ROI (g.v.) at 'Ain Muweileh, Bered may be some place in the Wādy esh-Sheraif, on the E. side of the Jebel Dalfā'a (see Palmer's map).

T. K. C.

BERED (בֶּרֶד), an Ephraimite clan, 1 Ch. 7²⁰ (בֶּרֶד [A], בֶּרֶד [L], om. [B]), apparently called in Nu. 26³⁵, BECHER—a well-known Benjaminite clan name. When we consider the close relation between the two tribes, the occurrence of Becher in Ephraim seems not unnatural (cp BERIAH, 2 f.). See, however, BECHER.

BERI (בֶּרִי, prob. = בֶּרֶי, § 76, 'belonging to the well' [or to a place called Be'er]; the name occurs twice in Phoenician; cābri [B], bāri [A], bheri [L]), an Asherite family-name (1 Ch. 7³⁶).

BERIAH (בֶּרִיָּה, perhaps 'prominent,' § 7; cp the play on the name in 1 Ch. 7²³ with the play on the name BERA [g.v.] in Targ. ps.-Jon.; בֶּרֶא [ε] [BAL]).

1. An Asherite clan individualised; Gen. 46¹⁷ Nu. 26⁴⁴ f. (G. v. 28 f.; in v. 28 Bepi [L], in v. 29 it is omitted); 1 Ch. 7³⁰ (Bepiya¹ [B], v. 31 -ya [B]; gentile, Berite, Nu. 26⁴⁴ (6 Bepi[ε] [Ba vid f], Bepia [B*vid], -pai [A], Bepi [L]).

2. An Ephraimite clan-name, in a story of a cattle-lifting raid in 1 Ch. 7²¹⁻²³ (beginning at 'and Ezer and Elead'; v. 23 Bapγaa [B], -mie [L]); cp 8¹³. According to the Chronicler, Beriah was a son of Ephraim, born after his brother had been slain, and he was called Beriah because 'it went evil with his [father's] house' (note the assonance בֶּרִיָּה-בֶּרֶךְ). This notice of the conflict with the men of Gath is enigmatical; were there family reminiscences of the border strifes of the early Israelites which were recorded in documents distinct from our canonical books and accessible to the Chronicler?

We preserve a sceptical attitude (Prol.(4), 214); Bertheau and Kittel, however, think that there is here a genuine tradition, and that, on the destruction of the clans Ezer and Elead, the Ephraimites of the border districts applied for help to the Benjaminite clans, Shema and Beriah (1 Ch. 8¹³). According to S. A. Fries, the basis of this story is an early tradition dealing with a raid made by Ephraimites into Palestine from the land of Goshen² in the wider sense which Hommel and he himself give to this term (see GOSHEN).

It would be unsafe to use these unsupported statements of the Chronicler as historical material. See below.

3. A clan of Benjamin (§ 9 (ii.) (β)), 1 Ch. 8¹³ (Bepiya [B], Bap. [A], Bapaa [L]), 16 (Bap[ε]γα [BA]), probably to be identified with No. 2. It appears to be stated that the Benjamite clan Beriah was adopted into Ephraim in recognition of the service it had rendered to the imperilled territory. So Bertheau; cp Bennett, Chron. 89. Cp also EPHRAIM.

4. A Gershonite (Levite) family, 1 Ch. 25¹⁰ f. (Bepia [BL]; om. A in v. 10). S. A. C.

BERITES, THE (הַבְּרִיתִים), appear, through a corruption of the text, in 2 S. 20¹⁴ (MT), where Klostermann, Kittel, Budde, and (with some hesitation) Driver, read הַבְּכִרִים, 'the Bichrites (see BICHRI). The consonants בכרי are, in fact, presupposed by the strange rendering of בָּכָא (καὶ πάντες) ἐν χάρρει; ὧ καὶ πᾶσα πόλις). The description of the progress of SHEBA (g.v. ii.) now first becomes intelligible.

BERITH (בְּרִית), Judg. 9⁴⁶ AV, RV El-berith. See BAAL-BERITH.

BERNICE (ΒΕΡΝΙΚΗ [Ti. WH] for ΒΕΡΕΝΙΚΗ, the Macedonian form of ΦΕΡΕΝΙΚΗ), eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I., and sister of the younger Agrippa (Acts 25¹³ 23 26³⁰). She was married to her uncle Herod, king of Chalcis; and after his death she lived, not without suspicion of incest, with her brother Agrippa. She next became the wife of Polemon, king of Cilicia. This connection being soon dissolved, she returned to her brother, and afterwards became the mistress of Vespasian and Titus (Jos. Ant. xix. 51; xx. 72 f.; Tac. Hist. ii. 81; Suet. Tit. 7); cp Sch. GV i., and see HERODIAN FAMILY, 9.

BEROEIA (ΒΕΡΟΙΑ), 2 Macc. 13⁴ RV, AV BEREIA, 2.

BEROTH (ΒΗΡΩΘ? [A]), 1 Esd. 5¹⁹ = Ezra 2⁵, BEEROTH.

BEROTHAI (בְּרֹתַי), a place mentioned by Ezekiel (47¹⁶; 48³⁴ [BQ], 48³⁴ [A], ΒΗΡΩΘ'Α- [Q^{ms}]) in defining the ideal northern frontier of the Holy Land. It is apparently the same as BEROTHAI (g.v.), and may be regarded as a lengthened form of Bērōth = Bērōth, 'wells.' As yet it has not been certainly identified. Ewald (Hist. 3 153) connected it with the well-known Berytus (the B'rutu and B'runa of the Amarna letters, the Bi'rutu of the List of Thotmes III. [so W. M. Müller], and the mod. Beirut); but it seems clear that a maritime city would not suit Ezekiel's description. Tomkins would, therefore, place Berothai in the neighbourhood of the rock-hewn inscriptions in the Wādy Brissa, NW. of Baalbec, down which wādy a stream is marked in the Carte de Liban as flowing to the Orontes (PEFQ Ap. 1885, p. 108); but his philological argument seems unsound. Furrer (ZDPV 8 34), Socin (Pal.(3), 369), and v. Kiess (Bib. Atl.) have thought of Bereitān, a village not far to the S. of Baalbec; but this is only a plausible conjecture, and must be judged in connection with Furrer's general theory of the frontier (see HOR, MOUNT; RIBLAH; ZIDAD). Cp ARAM, § 6.

BEROTHAI (בְּרֹתַי); Klo. would read בְּרֹתַי, a town belonging to Hadadzezer, king of Zobah, 2 S. 8⁸ (ἐκ τῶν ἐκλεκτῶν πόλεων, perhaps reading בְּרֹתַי from בְּרֹתַי 'to separate, select' [so Klo.]), possibly another form of BEROTHAI (see, however, Klo. and the article TEBAH). In 1 Ch. 18⁸ (where ὧ has the same translation), which is parallel to 2 S. 8⁸, for Berothai we find the name CHUN, which must be a corruption, either of the first three letters of Berothai (i.e., בְּרֹתַי) in one of the earlier alphabetic stages, or of some other name which the Chronicler found in his copy of the old narrative.¹ For a suggested emendation see MEROM, end.

¹ The reading בְּרֹתַי is probably supported by ὧ in both places, and by the καλλίστα (=ἐκλεκτῶν of ὧ) of Jos. Ant. vii. 53. The latter's text, however, must have represented a conflate reading, for he reads Μάχων(ι), which points to מֶלֶךְ 'from Cun.'

BEROTHITE (בֵּרוֹתִית), 1 Ch. 11:39. See BEEROTH.

BERYL. The Beryl as a mineral species¹ includes, besides the common beryl, the aquamarine or precious beryl, and the emerald.

1. Description.

The similarity between the beryl and the emerald was pointed out by Pliny (37:20); the only points of distinction are the green colour of the emerald and the somewhat superior hardness of the beryl (7.5 to 8 in the mineralogical scale; specific gravity from 2.67 to 2.732).

If we leave out of account the emerald, the colours of the beryl range from blue through soft sea-green to a pale honey-yellow, and in some cases the stones are entirely colourless. The aquamarine is so named on account of its bluish-green colour, 'qui viriditatem puri maris imitantur' (Pliny, l.c.). The beryl crystallises in six-sided prisms with the crystals often deeply striated in a longitudinal direction. The great abundance of aquamarine and other forms of beryl in modern times has very much depreciated its value; but it is still set in bracelets, necklaces, etc., and used for seals.

That the beryl was known to the ancients there can be no doubt. Some of the finest examples of ancient

2. Greek names, etc.

Greek and Roman gem-engraving are found executed in beryl (see King's description of a huge aquamarine intaglio over two inches square, Prec. Stones, Gems, and Prec. Metals, p. 132): the Romans cut it into six-sided prisms (cylindri) and mounted them as ear-drops. It is also clear from the evidence of Pliny (l.c., berylli) that, in later times, at least, beryl was called by the same name as now, though apart from β (see below) the name does not appear in any Greek writer till considerably after Pliny's time.² It appears, however, to have been called also σμάραγδος; Theophrastus seems to know three kinds of smaragdos, which may well be our true emerald, our aquamarine, and our common beryl (Lap. 23). In Herodotus, too, smaragdos is the material not only of the gem engraved for the ring of Polycrates (341), but also of the pillar in the temple of Heracles at Tyre (244), which cannot have been of true emerald, as the noble kinds of beryl are never found of large size.

The Hebrews must be presumed to have known the beryl. We may perhaps identify it with the shōham

3. Hebrew name.

(שֹׁהַם); for P tells us that the ornaments on the high priest's shoulder (Ex. 28:20 = 35:27) were of shōham, and β renders this σμάραγδος. We cannot always trust β's rendering of stone names (see PRECIOUS STONES); but in this case the identification seems suitable. We are told that on each shōham-stone were inscribed the names of six of the tribes of Israel, for which purpose a natural hexagonal cylinder of beryl would be admirably fitted if, as has been suggested, the six names were inscribed longitudinally on the six faces. The shōham-stones mounted in ouches of gold were probably therefore beryls pierced or simply mounted at the end with bosses (umbilici) of gold, like the beryl cylinders described by Pliny.

The importance given to the beryl among the Babylonians and the Phœnicians (see above) makes it all the more probable that the Hebrews would specially value it. From Gen. 2:12 (later stratum of J?) it would appear that the shōham was known in Judah before the exile, and believed to abound, with good gold and bdellium, in HAVILAH. The Chronicler brings shōham-stones into connection with the construction of the pre-exilic temple (1 Ch. 29:2; but the reading may be incorrect, see EBONY, c), while the writer of Job 28:16 classes it with gold of Ophir and other precious substances.

² The chrysoberyllus, chrysoprasus, and chrysolithus of ancient jewellery appear, to some extent at least, to have been names applied to different shades of beryl.

BETAH

Chronicles as a proper name; see SHOHAM) is at present uncertain.

Ges.-Röd. (Thes. s.v.) traces it to a root meaning 'paleness,' as if 'the pale stone,' while Haupt, connecting it with the Assyrian sāmtu, renders 'pearl.' Delitzsch, however, argues that sāmtu means a 'dark-coloured [stone]' (Ass. HWB 488 b; cp Par. 60 f. 130 f.), and Halévy connects Assy. sāmtu with Syr. šm rather than Heb. šm (Rev. Crit., 1881, p. 479).

Shōham is rendered in the various versions as follows:—

β βηρυλλιον (as in Targ. [יְהוֹרִיָּל], Saad. etc.) in Ex. 28:20 = 39:13, reproduced in Ezek. 28:13 (see PRECIOUS STONES); λίθος [τῆς] σμαράγδου in Ex. 28:9 35:27 39:6; λ. δ. πράσινος (leek-green) in Gen. 2:12; λ. σάφειον in Ex. 35:9; λ. σοομ [BA], δινυος [L] in 1 Ch. 29:2; ἐν δινυι (as in Aq. at Ex., Theod. and Symm. at Ex. and Gen., and Vg. [onychinus, but onyx in Ezek.] except in Job) in Job 28:16; Pesh. everywhere ܕܒܝܠܐ (BRWLA) or ܕܒܝܠܐ except in 1 Ch. 29:2 where its text differs; Aq. in Gen. 2:12 and Vg. in Job 28:16 sardonyx.

RVmg. adds as an alternative the rendering BERYL,¹ thus supporting the identification argued for above.

scopa; πηλοῦ βαρθάρον [BNQ], π. βαθρον [A]), a word occurring nowhere else in Hebrew or, in this sense, in any Semitic dialect.² According to Talm.B. Rōsh ha-shānā, 26 b., the word, though unknown to the Rabbis (who called the article אֲבִירָה), was still in use among the women (cp Jer. Megilla, ii. 2). There is not, therefore, any reason to doubt that Vg. and Pesh. are right in understanding something to sweep (away) with (cp the metaphor in Is. 30:28 [sieve]; on which see AGRICULTURE, § 10). The besom of death is not unknown to mythology (Otto Henne Am Rhyn, Die Deutsche Volksage,⁽²⁾ 411 f.); but the figure hardly needs any mythological warrant (Che. ad loc.).

BESOR (בְּסוֹר, βοσop [BAL], Jos. Ant. vi. 146, βασελος), a wādy (נָחַל), mentioned in the account of David's pursuit of the Amalekites, 1 S. 30:9 f. 21 (v. 21 βεανα [B], βεχωp [A]). It was probably this wādy that Saul 'crossed' when he chastised the Amalekites (1 S. 15:5; read בְּסוֹרָה, Kto.); and in the two definitions of the Amalekite territory in 1 S. 15:7 ('and Saul smote the Amalekites, from Havilah,' etc.), and 27:8 ('for those were the inhabitants of the land, which were from old time,' etc.), we should probably read 'from the torrent Besor even to the torrent [land] of Mūsri.' See TELEM (i.). According to Guérin (Judée, 223), it is the modern Wādy Ghazza which issues from the Wādy es-Seba' and empties itself into the sea SW. of Gaza.

BETAH (בְּתַח, a city of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, 2 S. 8:8 (MT) = 1 Ch. 18:8 (MT), TIBHATH. Pesh., however, reads Tēbah, and this is also favoured in 2 S. 1. c. by Θ ($\mu\alpha\sigma\beta\alpha\kappa$ [B], $\beta\alpha\chi$ [A], $\mu\alpha\tau\epsilon\beta\alpha\kappa$ [L]), where $\mu\alpha$ arises from a corrupt repetition of the preceding letter in this translator's Heb. text). Cp Ew. Hist. 3153, and see TEBAH.

¹ Omitted (through oversight?) at Ex. 35:9 29:6 13 Ezek. 28:13.

BETANE ($\beta\alpha\iota\tau\alpha\eta$ [B], $\beta\alpha\tau$. [N], $\beta\alpha\iota\tau$. [A]), one of the places to which, according to Judith 19, Nebuchadrezzar sent his summons. The BETH-ANOTH (q.v.) of Josh. 15 59 appears to be meant.

BETEN ($\beta\epsilon\tau\epsilon\eta$ —i.e., 'vale' or 'hollow';— $\beta\alpha\tau\eta\epsilon$ [A], $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\omicron\kappa$ [B], $\beta\eta\tau\epsilon\lambda$ [L]), an unidentified site in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19 25) called $\beta\epsilon\theta\beta\epsilon\tau\epsilon\eta$ by Eusebius (OS 236 4r), who places it 8 R. m. to the E. of Acco.

BETH ($\beta\eta\tau$, st. constr. of $\beta\eta\tau$, see BDB); the most general term for a dwelling; used of a tent in Gen. 27 15 33 17, but generally of houses of clay or stone; also of temples (cp $\beta\alpha\iota\theta$, Beth-Bamoth [MI, L 27]). Combinations of Beth with other words are frequent in Hebrew place-names (see NAMES, § 96). In Assyrian, compounds with Bit are used as names of countries: e.g., Bit-Humri = the kingdom of Israel; Bit-Yakin (i.e., Babylonia, the country of Merodach-Baladan).

BETHABARA ($\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ [C² KT^b UAI]), Jn. 1 28 AV, is the place where John baptized, according to the reading which became widely current through the advocacy of Origen, who could find no Bethany across the Jordan, but found a Bethabara with a tradition connecting it with the Baptist. Origen, however, admitted that the majority of MSS were against him. See BETHANY, 2.

Origen was followed by Chrysostom; Epiphanius, like Arm. (Lagarde), has $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$. In the present text of Origen the form varies between $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$, $\beta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$, $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$, and $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\rho\alpha\beta\alpha$ (the latter also in $\kappa\epsilon\beta$. syr. hcl. (mg.), $\alpha\epsilon\theta$; see WH 2 74); in OS 240 12 108 6 we find $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$, Bethabara.

The traditional site of the baptism of Jesus is at the Makhādet Hājla (see BETHARABAH, 2, where, too, it is suggested that we should read Bethabarah in Josh. 18 22). The two monasteries of St. John attest the antiquity of the belief in this site.

Conder suggests the Makhādet 'Abūra, NE. of Beisān, partly because of the nearness of this ford to Galilee and Nazareth, and partly because the river-bed is here more open, and the banks of the upper valley more retired (PEFQ., 1875, p. 73). Another suggestion of the same explorer (ib., 1877, p. 185) is philologically weak.

As stated elsewhere (BETHANY, 2), the true reading in Jn. 1 28 was probably $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ —i.e., BETH-NIMRAH, now Tell-Nimrin, NE. of Jericho.

BETH-ANATH ($\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ —i.e., 'temple of Anath'; in Josh. $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\alpha\mu\epsilon$ [B], $\beta\alpha\iota\alpha\theta\alpha\theta$ [A], $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ [L]; in Judg. $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\chi$ [B], $\beta\eta\theta\epsilon\theta$ [BAL], $\beta\eta\theta\epsilon\eta\epsilon\kappa$ [A]), an ancient Canaanite fortress, with a sanctuary of ANATH (cp BETH-ANOTH), Josh. 19 38. It is mentioned unmistakably by Thotmes III., Seti I., Rameses II., and Rameses III. in the lists of places conquered by these kings (see RP⁽²⁾ 552 638; Sayce, Pat. Pal. 160, 236, 239; WMM, As. u. Eur. 193, 195, 220). According to Judg. 133, it adjoined Naphtalite territory, but (like Beth-shemesh) remained Canaanitish down to the regal period, subject only to the obligation of furnishing labour for public works. Eus. and Jer. (OS 236 45 105 20) inappropriately refer to a village called Batanæa, 15 R. m. E. from Caesarea, possessing medicinal springs. But the site now most in favour—Ainitha, in a valley 6 m. WNW. from Kedesh—is hardly strong enough to have been that of such a fortress as Beth-anath (Buhl, Pal. 232; but cp Conder, PEF Mem. 1 200).

BETH-ANOTH ($\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$; $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\mu$ [B], $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\omega\eta$ [A], $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\rho\omega\theta$ [L]). A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15 59), towards the eastern border of that region, identified by W. M. Müller with the Bi-t-n-t of the list of places conquered by Shishak (As. u. Eur. 168). If the form Beth-anoth be correct, it may be explained as = Beth-anath, 'house of ANATH' (q.v.); cp $\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ (Josh. 21 11) and $\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ and $\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$. To suppose a popular etymology 'place of answering' (i.e., of an echo?), with Kampffmeyer (ZDPV 163; cp Is. 10 30, SBOT), is needless.

But is the form correct? Conder and Kitchener (PEF Mem. 331 351) identify Beth-anoth with Beit 'Ainūn, 5 m. N. of Hebron, near the sites of HALHUL and BETH-ZUR (cp BETANE). This appears reasonable, and suggests a doubt whether the ancient name may not have been $\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$, Beth-'enun. It is true that Θ ^b favours $\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ and Θ ^a $\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ (in the first syllable being unexpressed); but the case of Anem (see EN-GANNIM, 2) shows that the absence of α both in MT and in the text implied by Θ is not decisive. A spring is mentioned to the west of the ruins of Beit 'Ainūn.

T. K. C.

BETHANY ($\beta\eta\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ [Ti. WH]). 1. A small village first referred to in the Gospels, 15 furlongs to the E. of Jerusalem on the road to Jericho (Jn. 11 18 Lk. 19 29, cp v. 1), and commonly identified with the Beth-Hini¹ of the Talmud. It is no doubt the mod. el-'Azariyeh (from Lazarus or Lazarium—the l wrongly taken as the article). El-'Azariyeh lies on a spur SE. of the Mt. of Olives (cp Mk. 11 1 Lk. 19 29). Its fig, olive, and almond trees give one at first a pleasant impression; but a nearer inspection of the few houses is disappointing.

There are various romantically interesting spots connected by old tradition with Lazarus (cp the Itin. Hieros. ed. Wessel, 596, the Bordeaux Pilgrim, and OS⁽²⁾ 108 3 230 10). The Castle of Lazarus (based on castellum, the Vg. translation of the Gr. $\kappa\alpha\sigma\tau\epsilon\lambda\lambda\eta$) is a ruined tower, presumably anterior to the time of the Crusaders, and hard by is the tomb of Lazarus; the house of Simon the Leper also is shown.

2. The Bethany where John baptized (Jn. 1 28, Ti. WH after $\kappa\alpha\tau'\ \alpha\beta\alpha\kappa$, edd., RV) is distinguished from the Bethany mentioned above by the designation 'across Jordan' ($\pi\epsilon\rho\alpha\nu\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \text{'Iop.}$); its exact situation is unknown. The reading of TR and of AV is BETHABARA (q.v.). Another suggestion is that Bethalara ('house of the ford') and Bethany (= $\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$, 'house of the ship') are one and the same place (see GASm. HG 542, n. 12).

The analogy of some corrupt OT forms (cp KISHION) suggests, however, that the true reading in the traditional source of Jn. 1 28 would be one combining in the second part of the name the letters N, B, and R—such a name as $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$. We actually find $\beta\alpha\eta\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ in Θ ^b Josh. 13 27 for the Bethnimrah of the Hebrew text. Now, the site of BETH-NIMRAH [q.v.] is well known. It is accessible alike from Jerusalem and from the region of Jericho (cp Mt. 3 5), and the perennial stream of Nahr Nimrin, which flows into the Jordan, would supply abundance of water. This theory belongs to Sir George Grove; it has been adopted by Sir C. W. Wilson (Smith's DB,⁽²⁾ s.v. 'Bethnimrah'), and has strong claims to favourable consideration. Of course, the insertion of the words $\pi\epsilon\rho\alpha\nu\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \text{'Iop.}$ would be a consequence of the faulty reading $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$. T. K. C.

BETH-ARABAH ($\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$ or $\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$; once, Josh. 18 18, by a scribe's error [see Θ] simply $\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$; Josh. 18 18, $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ [BAL]; 1561 $\theta\alpha\rho\alpha\beta\alpha\delta\alpha\mu$ [B], $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ [AL], 1822 $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ [B], $\alpha\beta\alpha\beta\alpha$ [AL]). 1. One of the six cities in the 'wilderness' of Judah (Josh. 15 61), mentioned also as on the boundary lines of Judah and Benjamin (156 $\beta\alpha\iota\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ BA; $\beta\eta\theta\alpha\beta\alpha\rho\alpha$ ¹ We may therefore dismiss the interpretation 'place of the wretched one' (cp the play upon Anathoth, Is. 10 30 MT). Beth-Hini is generally explained 'place of unripe fruit' (cp $\alpha\eta\alpha\theta$, 'unripe fruit', esp. of figs). The Talmud, however, says that figs ripened better at Beth-Hini than anywhere else (Neub., Geog. Talm. 150). If so, these figs may have led to the name BETHPHAGE—i.e., possibly, 'house of young figs'—but the name Beth-Hini remains unexplained. Another form of the name is Beth-oni ($\beta\eta\tau\ \alpha\eta\alpha\theta$).

BETH-ARAM

[L] 1818); see also BETH-BASI. The reference in 1822 must be considered separately (no. 2). The wilderness of Judah in 1561 is the deep depression adjoining the Dead Sea, together with the overhanging mountains and the barren country beyond, including probably a district in the neighbourhood of Arad (see SALT, CITY OF). Beth-arabah may have been the first or principal settlement in that desolate corner of the Arābah or Jordan valley which forms the N. end of the Dead Sea. Though mentioned twice, if not thrice, with Beth-hoglah, it must have been considerably to the S. of that place, for unless, with Knobel, we put it at Kāsr Hājla (which seems rather to have been Beth-hoglah), there is no other suitable site for it till we come to the copious fountain of 'Ain el-Feshkha, near the NW. corner of the Dead Sea (31° 43' N., 35° 26' E.). The name Beth-arabah ('the house, or homestead, in the Arābah') has, therefore, a special significance (cp that of BETH-JESHIMOTH, g.v.). This indication of the site was made in writing by Robertson Smith. Perhaps, however, it is best to suppose that there were two settlements: one near the fountain (viz., Beth-arabah), the other (see MIDDIN) at the fountain.

2. It will be still easier to adopt this identification if we may follow ⁵ in reading not 'Beth-arabah' but 'Beth-abarah' in Josh. 1822. The ford ('āḏārāh') referred to in the name ('house or place of the ford') might then be the famous Makhāḏet Hājla near the mouth of the Wādī el-Kelt, the bathing-place of the pilgrims, where tradition places the baptism of Jesus Christ. Such a Beth-abarah would be more naturally mentioned between Beth-hoglah and Zemairam than a place situated at 'Ain el-Feshkha. The confusion of the two names was very easy (note the variant Bḡṡ-αραβα in Jn. 128). Cp BETH-ABARA. T. K. C.

BETH-ARAM (בֵּית אֲרָם), Josh. 1827 AV, RV BETH-HARAM (g.v.).

BETH-ARBEL (בֵּית אֲרֵבֶל; ΕΚ ΤΟΥ ΟΙΚΟΥ ΙΕΡΟΒΟΑΜ [B]. . . . ΤΟΥ ΙΕΡΟΒΟΑΜ [Q*], . . . ΙΕΡΟΒΑΔΔ [A], ΤΟΥ ΙΕΡΟΒΑΔΔ [Q*], Symm. τῆς οἰκίας τοῦ ἀρβηλ), a place cruelly destroyed by 'Shalman' (Hos. 1014†; שְׁלֹמֹן, Baer שְׁלֹמֹן; αλαμαν [BAQ]). Robertson Smith in 1881 (*EB*¹⁰ 12296) favoured an identification of Beth-arbel with the trans-Jordanic Arbela (see *OS*¹² 21472 886), now Irbid, in which case there might be a reference either to Shalmaneser III. or to a Moabite king Shalamanu mentioned in an inscription (KB 220) as a tributary of Tiglath-pileser III. Schrader (*KAT*¹² 440-442) argues ably for identifying Shalman with the latter king, who very probably made an incursion into Israelite territory. The combination of Beth-arbel with the trans-Jordanic Arbela (Irbid), however, is improbable: Shalman should be a more important king, and Beth-arbel (if this compound phrase may be accepted) a more important fortress, than Schrader's theory supposes. Wellhausen and Nowack think that Shalman may be Shalmaneser IV.—the first Shalmaneser known to the Israelites. If so, the latter part of Hos. 1014 will be a later insertion. The reference to Beth-arbel, however, remains a difficulty. Surely the reading must be corrupt.

⁵ suggests a correction. Read בית ירבעם, and, as a consequence, for שְׁלֹמֹן read שְׁלֹמֹם. The murder of Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II., by SHALLUM [g.v., 1] is probably referred to (שָׁר, or שָׁרָה?, points to a fate like that of Sisera; cp שָׁרָה, Judg. 527). A reader of Hosea justly assumed that Zechariah was not the only person who was murdered, and took the massacre of the royal family to be a fulfilment of the stern prophecy in v. 15, which ends: 'in a storm (בְּעָרָב, We.) the king of Israel shall be cut off.' The words 'mother and children were dashed to pieces' may, however, refer to the cruelty of Menahem to the women of TAPPUAH

BETH-BASI

[g.v., 2], as related in 2 K. 1516. If so, the interpolator combines two striking events which equally formed part of the divinely threatened judgment upon Israel. See Che. Expos. Nov. 1897, p. 364.

For a new but difficult theory of Hos. 1014 see Herz, Amer. J. Sem. Lang. 14207 f. [98]. The versions give little help except as to 'Arbeel' (⁵). ⁵A preserves a trace of a theory that the reference is to the slaying of Zalmunna by Gideon, in which case Ps. 8811 [12] would be parallel. Σαλαμάν [⁵BAQ], it is true, does not accord with this theory; but Syro-Hex. points to זלמון; σαλμανα is ⁵NAR's rendering of Zalmunna, and has some authority in Hosea. Vg. gives Sicut vastatus est Salmana a domo eius qui iudicavit Baal. The conclusive exegetical objections to this view need not here be stated. See also Field's Hexapla. T. K. C.

BETHASMOTH (ΒΑΙΘΑΣΜΩΘ [A]), 1 Esd. 518 RV. See AZMAVETH (i.).

BETH-AVEN (בֵּית אֲוֵן, cp. Benj. 'ben-Oni'), a place to the E. of Bethel near Ai (Josh. 72, βηθαν [A], βηθαν [L], from which, indeed, it has been proposed, following ⁵BF, to eliminate the name, but on insufficient grounds¹), and to the W. of Michmash (1 S. 185; where ΒΑΙΘΑΩΡΩΝ [B*^L], ΒΑΙΘΩ. [B^{ab}] are obviously wrong; 1 S. 1423 ΒΑΜΩΘ [B], ΤΗΘΑΥΝ [or τῇ θανν, A^{vid}], ΒΑΙΘΩΡΩΝ [L]). The site has not been identified,² but it must have been the last village on the edge of the desert country, for to this it gave the name Wilderness of Beth-aven (Josh. 1812 βαθαν [A]; -σαν [B]; -θαουν [L]). All the data point to the neighbourhood of Deir Dīwān—either that village itself, or Kh. Haiyān, immediately to the S. For the rest see BETHEL, § 4. G. A. S.

BETH-BARAH (בֵּית בָּרָה, ΒΑΙΘΗΡΑ [BA], -ΒΗΡΑ [L]; the form of the second part of the name is obscure) is not to be identified with the Bethabara of Jn. 128 (Reland); it occurs only in the story of Gideon (Judg. 724), who sends to his fellow-tribesmen in the hill country of Ephraim, bidding them cut off the Midianites' retreat by holding against them 'the waters as far as Beth-barah, and (also) the Jordan.' The latter words (וְאֶת־הַיַּרְדֵּן) seem to be a gloss on 'the waters' (הַמַּיִם). By 'the waters,' however, are really meant, not the Jordan, but the streams emptying themselves into the Jordan which the Midianites would have to pass. Beth-barah must have been situated somewhere in the wādy formed by one of these streams, and there are points in the narrative which suggest locating it near the mouth of the Wādī Fāri'ah, between which and the Jordan the Midianites would find themselves in a cul-de-sac (Moore).

BETH-BASI (ΒΕΘΒΑΣΙ [A], ΒΑΙΘΒΑΣΙCΕΙ [N], -BACC. [NV], -ΒΑΣΙ [V], حَصْلَ نِمْ [Pesh.], Beth-bessæen [Vet. Lat.]), a fortified city in the desert (ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ), the ruinous parts (τὰ καθηρημένα) of which Jonathan and Simon repaired, when menaced by Bacchides (1 Macc. 962 64). The Syriac (see above; cp Vet. Lat.) reads Beth-yashan (cp JESHANAH). This is probably correct; the corruptions can be easily accounted for. Jos. (Ant. xiii. 15) calls the place Beth-alaga (i.e., Beth-hoglah), which is too far from the MS readings, but may be a correct identification, though BETH-ARABAH also suggests itself. G. A. Smith, however, thinks that the second β in Beth-basi may be correct. 'In the wilderness of Judea, E. of Tekoa, there is a Wādī el-Bassah, which name as it stands means "marsh," an impossible term, and therefore probably an echo of an ancient name.' T. K. C.

BETH-CAR (בֵּית-כָּר; Βαιθκαρ [BL], Βελχ. [A], [μεχρη] κορραιων, Jos. Ant. vi. 22; שִׁרְיָן [Targ.]), a place, presumably in the district of Mizpah, to which the Israelites pursued the defeated Philistines (1 S. 7:11 [Dt.]). The phrase 'under Beth-car' is remarkable. Does it mean 'under the gates of Beth-car' (so We. TBS 68)? or does it mean 'to the foot of the hill on some part of which Beth-car stood'? No such name as Beth-car is mentioned elsewhere; hence it is at first sight too bold to identify it (as PEF, not disapproved by GASm. HG 224) with 'Ain Kārim, the name of a flourishing village a good way to the S. of Nebi Samwīl, and W. of Jerusalem. The name Beth-car, however, is self-evidently corrupt, and if we may emend it into 'Beth-haccerem' the identification with 'Ain Kārim' becomes probable (see BETH-HACCEREM). Only 1½ m. to the N. of 'Ain Kārim is Dēr Yāsīn, not improbably to be identified with the Jashan or Jeshanah of v. 12 (see SHEN), which need not be the same as the Jeshanah of 2 Ch. 13:19.

The alternative is to read 'Beth-horon' (Klo.); כ and ה were, from phonetic causes, easily confounded. 'Under Beth-horon' would be a very intelligible expression; but Beth-horon is certainly too far north. The reading 'Beth-jashan,' quoted from Pesh. (not 5) by G. A. Smith (HG 224), is no reading at all, but a corruption of the text of 1 S. 7:11, as We. has pointed out. T. K. C.

BETH-DAGON (בֵּית דָּגוֹן, § 95, 'house of Dagon,' Βηθδαγων [AL]). 1. A city of Judah, enumerated in the third group of 'lowland' towns (Josh. 15:41, βαγαδιλ [B]). The list is so scattered and irregular that nothing can with certainty be inferred from it as to the site of Beth-dagon; but MAKKEDAH (q.v.), which is mentioned in the same verse, must have lain off the mouth of Aijalon (Josh. 10:28). Here we find, 6 m. SE. from Joppa, a Beit-Dejan, and, 1½ m. farther S., Dājūn. Each of these has been identified with Beth-dagon (see Rob. BR 3298, Clermont Ganneau, PEFQ, 1874), and one of them (the former, according to Friedr. Del.) is probably the Bit-daganna mentioned in Sennacherib's prism-inscription (col. 2 L 65; KB 292). It must be remembered, however, that the name occurred in several places through Palestine—Beit Dejan nearly 7 m. E. of Nāhūs (see PEF map), and, according to Jos. (Ant. xiii. 8:1 Bf. 23), Dagon near Jericho, each on an important trade route from Philistia to the Jordan Valley. There may, then, have been more than one Beth-dagon on the borders of Philistia, and it ought not to be overlooked that neither Dājūn nor Beit Dejan lies in the Shephēlah proper. On the doubtful phrase 'land of Dagon' in Eshmunazar's inscription, and on the god Dagon, see DAGON, § 1. On Dājūn see especially Cl. Ganneau, Arch. Res. in Pal. 126 ff.

2. A locality not yet identified (but cp Conder, Hdšk. to the Bible, 268), on the border of Asher (Josh. 19:27; βαβεγενεθ [B]).

3. The temple of Dagon in Ashdod (1 Macc. 10:83, Βηθδαγων [AN. a c b v], Βοδαγων [A*]). G. A. S.

BETH-DIBLATHAIM (בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם; cp Ass. dublu, 'foundation'; but see NAMES, § 107), a town in Moab mentioned along with Dibon [1] and Nebo [iii.] (Jer. 48:22=5 31:22, ΕΠΙ ΟΙΚΟΝ ΔΑΙΒΛΑΘΑΙΜ [BQ], e. o. ΔΕΒΛΑΘΑΙΜ [NA]), evidently the same as ALMON-DIBLATHAIM, which also occurs in connection with Dibon (Nu. 33:46f.). This place (called בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם, Mehedebe, and Ba'al Me'on are stated by Mesha on his stele to have been fortified by himself (l. 30).

BETH-EDEN, AV^{mg}, EV 'house of Eden' (בֵּית עֵדֶן; eZ ANΔPΩN χAPPAN [BAQT]), an Aramæan city or land, with a ruler of its own, but presumably allied to Damascus (Am. 1:5). No satisfactory identification of this place has been made. The vocalisation (עֵדֶן not עֵדֶן) forbids us to see in it the Παράδεισος of Strabo and Ptolemy, and equally forbids us to regard it with Wetzstein (Del. Jes. (3) 702; cp Vg. de domo voluptatis) as a poetical name of Damascus. The view, however, adopted by Schrader (ALT (2) 327) and favoured by 5^{BAQT} (see above), that Beth-eden is the Bit-adini of the inscriptions (see EDEN), is not less inadmissible, for this is too far to the N. of Damascus, and had, in the time of Amos, long been subject to Assyria (Wi. AT Unters. 183; cp Nöld. ZDMG 33:326 [79]). No doubt there were other places called EDEN (q.v., ii.). There is equal uncertainty as to the name Bikath-aven (see AVEN, 3), which corresponds to Beth-eden in the parallel line. T. K. C.

BETH-EKED (בֵּית עֵקֶד, EV 'shearing house'; RV^{mg}, 'house of gathering'),¹ where Jehu met Ahaziah's brethren, is either a place-name or (more probably) the designation of an isolated house used on certain occasions by the shepherds of the district (2 K. 10:12 14; ΒΑΙΘΑΚΑΘ [B]; but in v. 14 ἐν τῇ σκαυῇ [B^{ab} mg], -καθ [AL]; Pesh. has 'and he was overthrowing the altars that were on the way' [v. 12], and in v. 14 בית עקר, cp Cod. Vind. of Vet. Lat. Bethacar).

A town on the border between Benjamin and Ephraim, W. of the wilderness of Beth-aven (Josh. 18:12; on 12:16, where 5^A omits the clause, and 5^W has Ηλαθ for Bethel or Makkedah, see TAPPUAH, 2), without doubt the present Beitūn (from Beitol, by the common interchange of l and n), a small village (said to have 400 inhabitants), with ruins of early Christian and Crusaders' buildings, about 10 m. N. of Jerusalem. It lies on the backbone of the central range, a little E. of the watershed, and 2890 ft. above the sea. From the village itself the view is confined to the plateau, which, like most of the territory of Benjamin, presents a bleak prospect of gray rocks and very stony fields, relieved by few trees and a struggling cultivation. A few minutes SE., however, lies one of the great view-points of Palestine, the Burj-Beitin or Tower of Bethel (probably the ruin of an early Christian monastery), supposed to mark a traditional site of the tent and altar of Abraham 'to the E. of Bethel' (Gen. 12:8), and of Lot's view of the 'Circle of Jordan' (13:3-10). Four good springs

2. Traditions. and a great reservoir amply certify the present village as the site of the city, which 'was called Luz at the first' (Gen. 28:19; οἶκος θεοῦ [ADEL]). The sanctuary, 'God's house,' the 'place' (as it is called in Gen. 28:11, where it is distinct from the city) which grew famous enough to absorb the city's name in its own, may have lain either on the site of the Burj-Beitin, or on one of the neighbouring slopes, where there is a natural stone circle (PEFQ, 1881, p. 255); and the curious formation of the rocks in terraces and ramparts has been taken as the material suggestion of the 'flight of steps' (see LAIDER) which Jacob saw in his dream (Gen. 28:10 ff.).² There he raised a pillar, or massēlah, to Yahwē, and afterwards is said (Gen. 35:1-8) by the same narrator, E (it is J who gives the previous story of Abraham's altar), to have built an altar and called the 'place' (not yet 'city') 'God of Bethel' (for which 5^{ADEL}, Pesh., and Vg. read 'Bethel'). Here Deborah, Rebecca's foster-mother, died. She was buried below the town, beneath an oak called 'the oak of weeping' (see ALLON-BACUTH, MULBERRY): trees, it is probable, would not be found on the stony plateau above. The next notice of Bethel is in the JE narrative of Joshua's conquests (Jos. 7.2 89.12 [om. BAF; βῆθαν L]), in which Bethel is not yet the name of a city (so also the Deuteronomist in Jos. 12.9 [Γεθ A]; in v. 16 'Bethel' is with ἑβῆ to be omitted), but is still distinct from Luz (16.2 [ἑβῆ does not distinguish them, reading λουζα (B in v. 1, A in v. 2) after βαιθηλ]). The later priestly writer, however, makes them the same (18.13, cp 22 [βῆσανα B], βῆθηλ (A)); in Judg. 1.23 the parenthesis is probably a gloss.¹ In Judg. 4.5 the prophetess Deborah is said to have sat under the palm-tree of Deborah between Ramah and Bethel—a statement which the critics who understand the song of Deborah to imply that she belonged to the tribe of Issachar suppose to have arisen from confusion with the other Deborah (see DEBORAH). There is no cogent reason, however, for their inference from the song, and while a palm is an unusual, it is not an impossible, tree at the altitude of Bethel: there is one at Jerusalem. In the story of the crime of the Benjamites the priestly writing tells of a national gathering before God at Bethel (Judg. 21.2).

In the records of the period after the Judges the name Luz does not occur; we may suppose it by this time to have been absorbed in that of

3. History.

Bethel, which was still a sanctuary (1 S. 7.16 10.3). The division of the kingdoms brought Bethel a new opportunity: its ancient sanctity was taken advantage of by Jeroboam for political ends, and he made it one of the two national shrines which he established in North Israel in order that his people might not go over to Jerusalem. In these shrines he set up the golden calves—'Thy God, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt' (1 K. 12.29). A priesthood, not Levitical, was established, and a new altar, pilgrimages, and feasts were ordained (1 K. 12.30 f.). In the words of Amaziah to Amos, Bethel became a royal and national temple ('sanctuary of the king,' 'house of the kingdom,' Am. 7.13).²

A later (perhaps post-exilic) narrative records a prophecy as made by a prophet from Judah, by which Jeroboam was judged according to the Deuteronomic standard, and Yahwe's overthrow of Bethel was predicted (1 K. 13; cp 2 K. 10.29). There was no such feeling of guilt or foreboding of doom, however, among the prophets of the northern kingdom, for we find a company of them settled in Bethel, and the place visited by Elijah and Elisha (2 K. 2.2 f. 23).

For a national sanctuary the position was convenient. The present village lies about a furlong off the most easterly of the three parallel branches into which the great north road here divides, very near its junction with the road by Michmash to Jericho, and not many miles from the heads of those two other roads which come up from the coast by the Beth-horons, and by Gophna, respectively, to meet the north road just mentioned. That is to say, the main lines of traffic N. to S. and E. to W. crossed at the gates of Bethel. Like other ancient sanctuaries, it must have had a market; its mercenariness and wealth are implied by Amos (8.4, etc.). Moreover, Bethel lay upon the natural frontier between the two kingdoms on the plateau between the passes of Beth-horon and Michmash (on the Chronicler's story of its capture by Abijah of Judah, see ABIJAH, 1). The prophets Hosea and Amos appear in opposition to Bethel, not on the ground (taken by the later Deuteronomists) that it was the seat of a schism, but because of the superstitious and immoral nature of its cult, even though the object of this was Yahwe himself. They regard it as apostasy from Yahwe (Am. 4.4, 'Come to Bethel and revolt'; 5.5 [βαθηλ Q*vid], 'Seek not Bethel, seek Yahwe'), and its crimes culminate (Am. 7.13) in the silencing of his prophet Amos by its priest Amaziah (see AMOS, § 20). It shall, therefore, bear the brunt of the impending doom (Am. 3.14 Hos. 10.15 [ὄλκος τοῦ ἱσραηλ BAQ]). In scorn Amos had said 'Bethel shall become AVEN'—i.e., vanity, falseness, false worship, idolatry (5.5):—so Hosea calls it Beth-aven (4.15 5.8 10.5) oftener than he calls it Bethel. The nickname was the readier because of the actual BETH-AVEN (q.v.), which once stood, and perhaps in the eighth century still stood, in the neighbourhood. After the fall of the northern kingdom the heathen colonists naturally adopted the cult of the 'god of the land,' and Bethel retained its importance as a religious centre (2 K. 17.28). Isaiah and Micah do not mention Bethel; it is very doubtful if Jeremiah does so (Giesebrecht on Jer. 48.13). The frontier of Judah, however, must have been gradually pushed N. so as to enclose it, for when Josiah put down 'the high places in the cities of Judah' he destroyed the altar in Bethel and desecrated the site (2 K. 23.4.15). The city itself must have been inhabited by Jews, for its families are reckoned in the great post-exilic list [see EZRA, ii. §§ 9, 8 c; Ezra 2.28 (γαιθηλ [B]) = Neh. 7.32 (βῆθηλ [BN*]) = 1 Esd. 5.21 (βερτολιω [B], βῆτ. [A])]. It was the most northerly site reoccupied by Jews (Neh. 11.31; βῆθηρ [N^{ca} mg. inf.; om. BN* A]).¹ We hear nothing more of Bethel till it is described as one of the strong places of Judah which Bacchides re fortified in 161 B.C. (1 Macc. 9.50; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13), and then it disappears from OT history.

In 69 A.D. Vespasian garrisoned Bethel before his advance on Jerusalem (Jos. B. J. iv. 9.9); and circa 132 Hadrian placed a post there to intercept Jewish fugitives (Midrash, Ekhah, ii. 3; Neub. Géog. Talm. 115). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (333) gives it as Bethar 12 R. m. from Jerusalem. Robinson's theory (LBR, 270), that Bethel is therefore the Bether of Hadrian's war, is unfounded. Euseb. and Jerome call it a village; the latter adds (under Aggai) that where Jacob dreamed there was built a church—perhaps part of the ruins at Burj-Beltein. The Crusaders exhibited the rock under the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem as Jacob's Stone; but the 'Cartulary of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre' gives Bethel as a casale ceded to that church in 1160, and the site of a tower and chapel built by Hugues d'Ibelin (Rey, 378). BETH-EMEK (בֵּית הָעֶמֶק, § 99, 'house in the valley'), a place on the boundary of Asher (Josh. 19.27).

Before Beth-emek some words appear to have dropped out: perhaps they are represented by ἑβῆ's καὶ εἰσελεύσεται [τὰ] ὄρια. (After ὄρια ἑβῆ continues σαφθαβαθμε, where σαφθα seems to be a corruption of γαιφθαηλ [= γαι ιερθαηλ], prefixed wrongly to βαθμε [= βαθεμεκ]; ασφαθα βηθεμεκ [A], ασφα βηθεμεκ [L]; Symm. εἰς τὴν κοιλάδα). The description in v. 27 f. is not clear; there would seem to be two descriptions of the northern boundary (if 'on the left hand,' v. 28, means 'northward,' and if the equivalent of καὶ εἰσελ. ὄρια is to be inserted before 'northward' in v. 27).

Robinson was struck by the resemblance of the name to that of 'Amka, 6½ m. NE. of 'Akka (Acre); but, as he himself points out (BR 4.103.103), the situation of 'Amka is too far N. of Jēfāt (Jiphtah-el?), and, even if this objection be waived, 'Amka is at any rate too far N. of Kābūl (which must be the ancient Cabul).

BETHER (ΘΕΘΗΡ [BL], ΒΑΙΘΗΡ² [A]), one of the additional cities of Judah in Josh. 15.59 ἑβῆ (cp SBO), mentioned after Karem ('Ain Kārim) and Gallim (cp GIBBAR). No doubt it is the modern Bittir (7 m. SW.

of Jerusalem), which stands on the slope of a steep projecting hill between the Wādy Bitūr and a smaller valley. If we ascend higher we shall reach a site admirably adapted for a fortress, where there are still some ruins connected by popular legend with the Jews. On the E. side are chambers in the rock and old cisterns. Neubauer (Géog. Talm. 103-114, cp 90) and Guérin (Jud. 2387-395) had all but demonstrated that this was the Bether (בֵּיתֶר) or rather Beth-ter (בֵּיתֶתֶר), within whose walls Bar Cochba so obstinately resisted the Romans under Julius Severus (A.D. 134-5). The proof has now been completed by the discovery of an inscription stating which divisions of the Roman army were stationed there.¹ It is, therefore, no longer possible to maintain with Grätz (Hist. 247) that the Beth-ter of Bar Cochba was identical with the Beththar of the itineraries, which was situated between Antipatris or Diospolis and Caesarea (see ANTIPATRIS, § 2, end). See GIBBAR.

Only two ancient statements respecting the position of Bether need be here quoted. Eus. (HE 56) describes βιθηθρα in these terms: πολίχνη τις ἥν δαχρυωτάτη, τὸν Ἱεροσολύμων οὐ σφόδρα πόρρω διεστώσα, and the Talm. of Jerus. (Taanith, 48), 'If thou thinkest that Beth-ter [spelt with two ת almost always in this section] was near the sea, thou art in error: truly it was 40 m. away from the sea.' T. K. C.

BETHER, The mountains of (בֵּיתֶר בְּתָר), Cant. 2:17 EV, following Vg. (Bether). The word Bether, however, all recent critics agree, is not a proper name: it qualifies the preceding words. Putting aside the old, forced explanations of the phrase, such as 'mountains of ravines' (ἄβυσσος ἐρη κοιλωμάτων—i.e., הרי בְּתָרִים; cp BITHRON), and 'mountains of separation' (between the lovers), one might conjecture that 'Bether' was the Syrian plant malobathron, from which a costly oil was procured, used in the toilet of banqueters (Hor. Od. ii. 77), and also in medicine (Plin. NH xxiii. 448). So Symm. (Field, Hex. on Cant. 2:17), RV¹⁹; Wellh. Proz. (4) 399; ET 391. Others emend בְּתָר into בְּשָׁתִים, 'spices,' in conformity with 8:14 (so Pesh., Theod., Meier, Grätz). The best solution, however, has yet to be mentioned: בְּתָר is miswritten for בְּתָרִים, 'cypresses'; cp 1:17 (Che.). 'Mountains of cypresses' is an appropriate term for Lebanon; cp 'mountains of panthers' (48). See JQR 10:571, and cp CANTICLES, § 15 n.

BETHESDA (ΒΗΘΕΣΔΑ [cod^{leid}])—i.e., בֵּית חַסְדָּא —'house of mercy'; ΒΗΘΣΑΘΑ [Ti. WH]), the reading of TR in Jn. 5:2, for which the best authorities have BETHZATHA or BETHSAIDA. On the topographical question, see JERUSALEM.

BETHEZEL (בֵּית הָאֵל; ΒΑΘ οἶκον ἐχόμενον αὐτῆς, i.e., אֵלָהּ, 'near her'), an unidentified place in the Shephelah mentioned by Micah (1:11), who foresees the captivity of its noble ones (עֲצֻמָּתוֹ, emended from עֲצֻמָּתוֹ, G's reading [δδύνης], where MT has עֲצֻמָּתוֹ: so Che., JQR, July '98). It is scarcely the same as Azel (cp AZAL).

BETH-GADER (בֵּית גָּדֶר; Βαιθγαδων [B], -Γεδωρ [A], ΒΗΘΓΕΔΔωρ [L]), a town, whose 'father' Hareph was of Calebite origin (1 Ch. 25:14); the genealogy seems to represent post-exilic relations. On the analogy of the other great divisions Shobal abi Kirjath-jearim and Salma abi Bethlehem, Beth-gader was perhaps no unimportant place, and we may possibly identify it with GEDOR, 1:2. It is noticeable that the further divisions of Hareph are not enumerated, as they are in the cases of Shobal and Salma.

BETH-GAMUL (בֵּית גָּמֻל, 'place of recompense'?) [cp Gamaliel, גַּמְלִיָּה; ΟΙΚΟΝ ΓΑΜΩΛ [B], Ο. ΓΑΜΩΛΑ [A], Ο. -Λ [Q], Ο. -ΩΔΒ [N^{c-a}], om. N*]. In Moab on the table-land E. of the Jordan (Jer. 48:23), identified by some with Kh. Jemal, which lies to the east of the well-known DIBON; according to others, it finds its modern representative in Umm ej-Jemāl, about five hours S. of Bosra.

BETH-GILGAL (בֵּית הַגִּלְגָּל), Neh. 12:29 RV; see GILGAL, § 6 (5).

BETH-HACCEREM, AV Beth-Haccherem (בֵּית הַחֲכֶרֶם, § 103, 'vineyard place'), is expressly called, not a town, but a 'district' (מְקָרָה), near Jerusalem, Neh. 3:24 (ΒΗΘΑΧΑΜ [B], -ΘΑΧΧΑΡΜΑ [A], -ΘΑΚΑΜ [N], -ΑΧΧΑΡΑΜ [L]). From Jer. 6:1 it appears to have included a conspicuous height to the S. of Jerusalem which was used as a beacon-station (Βαιθαχαρμα [B], Βεθθ. [N], Βηθα. [Q], Βηθθαχαρ [A]).

Jerome (in his comment on the latter passage) says that it was one of the villages which he could see every day with his own eyes from Bethlehem, that it was called Bethacharina, and that it lay on a mountain. Hence, many since Pococke have placed it on the so-called Fureidis or 'Frank Mountain' (2487 ft. above the sea-level), between Bethlehem and Tekoa, and very near the latter (so even Giesebrecht). Jerome's statement we are unable to criticise; but there is now no name near the 'Frank Mountain' which confirms this theory, and the special fertility which the name Beth-haccherem implies to have characterised the district suggests looking elsewhere. After all, it was rather hasty to infer from Jer. 6:1 that Beth-haccherem was bound to be near Tekoa.

Since we have found reason elsewhere (BETH-CAR) to correct 'Beth-car' in 1 S. 7:11 into Beth-haccherem, and to identify this with the beautiful village of 'Ain Kārim, about an hour and a half W. of Jerusalem, it becomes difficult to resist the conclusion that the hill referred to by Jeremiah was the Jebel 'Alī, at the foot of which lies the village in question. The fruitful olive-groves and vineyards of 'Ain Kārim are watered from a superb fountain, and would justify the name Beth-haccherem. The summit of the Jebel 'Alī commands a view of the Mediterranean, the Mount of Olives, and part of Jerusalem (Bied. (3) 112). Conder mentions that there are still cairns on the ridge above 'Ain Kārim which may have served as beacons (PEEFQ, 1881, p. 271). One is 40 ft. high and 130 ft. in diameter, with a flat top measuring 40 ft. across.

Two more references to Beth-haccherem may be indicated. In the Mishna treatise, Middoth 3:4, it is stated that the stones for the great altar in the second temple came from the valley of Beth-cerem, which Adler (JQR 8:390) identifies with Beth-haccherem and 'Ain Kārim; and among the eleven towns which G^{HAL} has (but not MT) in Josh. 15:59 occurs Karem (Καρεμ), which, from the context, can only be 'Ain Kārim. Cp TAHCHEMONITE. For another (probable) Beth-cerem see BATH-RABHIM.

BETH-HAGGAN (בֵּית הַגֶּן, domus horti [Vg.], EV 'the garden-house'; better in G as a proper name, ΒΑΙΘΑΝ [B], ΒΑΙΔΤΑΝ [A^{vid. supras}], ΒΑΙΘΩΡΩΝ = Beth-horon [L]), a place, apparently to the S. of Jezreel, on the road to which Ahaziah fled in his chariot when he saw Jehoram slain by Jehu (2 K. 9:27). Jenin, the first village which one travelling southwards would encounter, may very well be Beth-haggan (= Beth-haggannim, 'place of gardens'), i.e., EN-GANNIM (q. v., 2). If, however, we hold with Conder that Megiddo, which Ahaziah reached at last—to die—was Mujeddā at the foot of Gilboa, a little to the S. of Beisān, it will become natural to identify Beth-haggan with a northern Beit Jennn, between Mt. Tabor and the S. end of the Lake of Gennesaret (Beit Jenn is, in Arabic nomenclature, a favourite name). Against this view of the flight of Ahaziah, see GASm. HG 387, n. 1.

BETH-HARAM, AV incorrectly BETH-ARAM (בֵּית הָרָם; ΒΗΘΑΡΑΜ, or perhaps -ΑΔΩΑΜ [B], ΒΗΘΑΡΑΜ [AL]), Josh. 13:27 (P). For the true form of the name see BETH-HARAN.

BETH-HARAN

BETH-HARAN (בֵּית הָרָן, probably 'house of HARAN,' ΒΑΙΘΑΡΑΝ [B], -appa [A], -n [FL], Nu. 32:36 [E]), the correct and original pronunciation of the name of the place also called BETH-HARAM (cp GERSHOM for GERSHON). The place thus designated was an ancient Amorite city, fortified by the conquering Gadites. The site is occupied by the modern Tell er-Rāmeḥ, which stands up in a wādy of the same name, between Hesbān and the Jordan, at no great distance from the river. The objection to this raised by Guthe (ZDPV 23, n. 1) is not decisive.

Rāmeḥ does indeed imply a form, Beth-harāmāh; but this form is vouched for by the existence of the Aramaic Beth-ramtha (see below). It arose out of BETH-HARAM (a phonetic modification of Beth-haran) when the older and correct form of the name had passed out of use, and so the later form, Beth-haram, came to be misinterpreted. Moreover, Tristram's discovery of a 'conspicuous mound' called Beit Harran (Land of Moab, 348) has not been verified by subsequent travellers,¹ though it is still recognised in Baed.⁽³⁾ (map of Peraea), and the identification (which stands in Di.'s comm.) is retained by von Riess in Bibel-Atlas⁽⁵⁾, on the assumption that Beit Harran (or Haram) is nearer to the outlet of the wādy than Tell er-Rāmeḥ.

The really conspicuous mound is surely that of Tell er-Rāmeḥ, which is 673 ft. above the sea-level, and certainly marks the site of an ancient town of importance (Conder, PEF Mem., E. Pal. 1238). Such a town was the Beth-ramtha of the Talmud (Neubauer, Glog. Talm. 247), the name of which is attested by Josephus, Eusebius, and Jerome.²

Herod had a palace here (Jos. Ant. xvii. 106; BJ ii. 42); Herod Antipas walled it and called it Julius after the wife of Augustus, at the same time that Herod Philip rebuilt Bethsaida and gave it the same name after the emperor's daughter (Jos. Ant. xviii. 21; BJ ii. 91). Jerome, however, enables us to correct this statement (OS 10817). The older name of the city was Līvias; the name was changed to Julius when Livia was received into the gens Julia by the emperor's testament (see Schürer, Hist. ii. 142). Eus. (OS 28488) and Theodosius (530 A.D.) also call it Līvias; the latter (De Situ Terrae Sanctae, 65) describes it as 12 R. m. from Jericho, near warm springs that were efficacious against leprosy. T. K. C.

BETH-HOGLAH, once (Josh. 156) AV Beth-hogla (הֶגְלָה בֵּית, § 104, 'place of partridge,' cp HOGLAH),³ a Benjamite city on the border of Judah (Jos. 156, ΒΑΙΘΑΓΛΑΑΜ [B], -λα [L], -θαλα [A]; 18:21, θαλαακκαν and Βεθεγαίω [B], Βαιθαλαγα [A], Βηθαγλα [L, and A in 21]). It is the modern 'Ain (and Kaṣr) Hajla, a fine spring and ruin situated between Jericho and the Jordan S. of Gilgal (cp Di. on Gen. 1:11 and Baed.⁽³⁾ 154). Under the form Beth-alaga it is, according to Jos. (Ant. xiii. 15), the place to which Jonathan fled before Bacchides, 1 Macc. 9:63 (but see BETHBASI). The Onom. erroneously identifies Beth-hoglah with Atad (see ABEL-MIZRAIM, end). The interpretation 'Bethagla, locus gyri' of Jer., according to WRS (Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 191, n. 1), may rest upon a local tradition of a ritual procession around some sacred object there (cp Ar. hajala, 'hobble, hop')—similar perhaps to the Ar. ceremonial ḥawāf (for which see We. Heid.⁽²⁾ 110).⁴ The form hajla survives also in Makhādet Hajla (see BETH-ARABAH, 2), a noted bathing-place for pilgrims at the mouth of the Wādy el-Kelt (Baed. 169).

2. Beth-horon some see Uzzen-sheerah : see SHERAH), 840 ft. above sea-level, on the high plain of Ajalon; climbs up the spur of the Benjamite hills in about 50 minutes to the lower Beth-horon, 1240 ft.; and thence, dropping at first for a little, ascends the ridge, with the gorges of Wādy Selmān to the S., and Wādy es-Sanṭ and Wādy el-'Imeish to the N., to the upper Beth-horon, 1½ m. from its fellow and 2022 ft. above the sea; and thence, still following the ridge, comes out on the Benjamite plateau about 4½ m. farther on, to the N. of el-Jīb (Gibeon), at a height of about 2300 ft. The נָקְלָה or ascent to Beth-horon (Josh. 10:10) may be the road towards the upper Beth-horon from Gibeon: it does rise at first from the plateau before descending; the מוֹרֵד or descent to the two Beth-horons (Josh. 10:11, 6^B) is the whole road from the edge of the plateau. More probably, the two are the same taken from opposite ends. This Beth-horon road is now no longer the high road from Jerusalem and the watershed to the Maritime Plain; but it was used as such from the very earliest times to at least the sixteenth century of our era, and indeed forms the most natural, convenient, and least exposed of all the possible descents from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem to the plain of Sharon. The line of it bears many marks of its age and long use. Carried for the most part over the bare rock and rocky debris, it has had steps cut upon it in its steeper portions, and has remains of Roman pavement. Standing as they do upon mounds, the two Beth-horons command the most difficult passages of this route and form its double key.

The constancy with which the Beth-horons appear in history is, therefore, easily explicable (they do not occur,

3. Military history. however, in either the lists of the conquests of Thotmes III. or the Amarna letters). According to JE, after Joshua had won for Israel a footing on the Benjamite plateau and made peace with Gibeon, the latter was threatened by the Canaanites. Joshua defeated them at Gibeon, and pursued them all the way down by the Beth-horons (Josh. 10:10 ff.). In the days of Saul the Philistines must have held the pass from their camp at Michmash (1 K. 13:18).² Solomon fortified Beth-horon the nether, along with Gezer, on the opposite side of Ajalon (1 K. 9:17 [om. BL, Jos. Βηθχωρα; in 1 K. 2:35 Βαιθωραθ, A]; 2 Ch. 8:5 adds Beth-horon the upper [Βαιθωραθ, B]). During his son Rehoboam's reign Shishak or Šošenq of Egypt invaded Judah by the Beth-horon passage, it would appear, for both Ai-yu-ru-u (Ajalon) and Bi-tj-ḥ-va-ru-n (Beth-horon) occur in his lists of the towns he conquered (Nos. 26 and 24; see WMM, As. u. Eur. 166).

In the Syro-Maccabean wars, Seron, a Syrian general, advanced on Judah by Beth-horon; Judas with a small force met him on the ascent, defeated him, and pursued him out upon the plain (1 Macc. 3:13-24 [5^A v. 16, μεθωρων]; Jos. Ant. xii. 71). A few years afterwards, Nicanor having retired from Jerusalem upon Beth-horon, Judas attacked and slew him, and routed his army as far as Gezer (1 Macc. 7:39 ff.; Jos. Ant. xii. 105). Beth-horon was among the places fortified by Bacchides (1 Macc. 9:50 [Βηθωρων, V*], Jos. Ant. xiii. 13). See also Judith 44 (Βεθωρα [A]).

² It was probably by the Beth-horons that the Philistines were routed by Saul (1 S. 13:14) and 'from Gibeon south to Gezer,' by David (2 S. 5:25).

BETH-JESHIMOTH

In 66 A.D. a Roman army under Cestius Gallus, ascending by Beth-horon, had their rear disordered by the Jews, and after a short and futile siege of Jerusalem retreated pell-mell by the same way. Josephus describes the difficulties of the ground in a manner that leads us to suppose that the Romans in their haste cannot have kept to the high road to the Beth-horons, but were swept down the gorges on either side (B/ii. 19). Perhaps because of this experience, Titus, in his advance upon Jerusalem two years later, took another road; and Beth-horon is not again mentioned in the military history of Palestine.

In the division of the land among the tribes of Israel, the border line between Benjamin and Ephraim ran by the Beth-horons (Josh. 16:35 [L v. 5, 4. Population. βηθωρων], 18:13 f.) which were counted to Ephraim (Josh. 21:22). They remained part of the N. kingdom; and we do not read of any Jews settled there in post-exilic times. That is to say, they were held by the Samaritans. Sanballat, one of the chief foes of the Jews in Nehemiah's day, is called 'the HORONITE' (Neh. 2:10, αρω[ε]ι [BA], αρωναι [N^{vid}], αρωνιτης [L 19 13:28, om. BNA, αρωνιτης [N^{ca} mg.], etc.). Schlatter (Zur Topog. u. Gesch. Pal. 4, 'War Beth-horon der Wohnort Sanballat's?') seeks to prove that Horonite means 'from Horonaim,' the town in S. Moab (Is. 15:5 Jer. 48:35 34, and Moabite stone), partly on the ground that Sanballat is associated with Tobiah the Ammonite; but Ammonite may mean 'from CHEPHAR-AMMONI' (a town of Benjamin, Josh. 18:24); and Buhl (Geog. 169) points out that β's form of Beth-horon ὠρωνειν (Josh. 10:10 [B], cp 2 S. 13:34) confirms the possibility of Horonite meaning 'from Beth-horon.' By 161 B.C. Beth-horon had become a city of Judaea (1 Macc. 9:50; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13, cp 71).

According to the Talmud, it was the birthplace of many rabbis (Neub. Geog. Talm. 154). Jerome gives it in the itinerary of S. Paula, who came to it from Nicopolis (Epit.

5. Post-biblical S. Paul, Hier. Op., ed. Migne, i. 883). There are the ruins of a mediæval castle in upper references. Beth-horon, but the substructions in both villages are probably more ancient. The name is given by very few mediæval travellers (Brocardus, ch. 9; Marin. Sanutus, 249), and not at all, it would appear, by the Arab geographers—unless the 'Urāmāh mentioned by Yāqūt, but not located, be the same place. The mediæval pilgrims went to Jerusalem by Ramleh and the present line of road. In 1801 Dr. Clarke (Travels, pt. ii. vol. i. 628) rediscovered the name.

BETH-JESHIMOTH, once (Nu. 33:49) AV Beth-jesimoth (בֵּית יֵשִׁמוֹת), BHCIMOTH [AL], is assigned in Joshua (12:34c[ε]μωθ [BA], ΔΙCΙM. [F^{vid}], BHΘ-AC[ε]μ. [L], 13:20 BAIΘACCEINΩθ [B]) to the Reubenites (cp Nu. 33:49, ἀνὰ μέσον αἰσιμωθ [BFL], Δ. M. AC. [A]); but probably it was, like most of the neighbouring places, in the possession of the Moabites during a considerable period of the Hebrew monarchy. We know that it was Moabite in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 25:9, οἶκον θασιμουθ [B], ο. βεθασ. [Bb.^(vid)A], ο. βαιθα. [Q*], ο. βαιθ' ιασ. [Q*]), who speaks of it along with Baal-meon and Kirjathaim as 'the glory of the country.' As βηθσιμωθ it is mentioned by Josephus (B/iv. 7:5) as having been taken by Placidus; Eus. writes βηθσιμουθ (OS 266:27) and βηθασιμουθ (233:81); Jerome (ib. 103:9), writing Bethsimuth, describes it as a village bearing in his day the name Isimuth, opposite Jericho at a distance of 10 R. m. 'in meridiana plaga, juxta mare mortuum.' The name and description point to the modern Khirbet es-Suweimeh. The name Jeshimoth may be compared with the Jeshimon 'on the face' of which 'the headland of Pisgah looked down' (Nu. 21:20); for probably this Jeshimon (is 'desolation') is not the Jeshimon of Judah, but the barren land off the NE. end of the Dead Sea. With this name Hommel (AHT 197) compares Yasumānu, the name of a Palestinian district mentioned by an early Assyrian king. Cp GASm. HG 564, n. 1.

The parallel passage in 1 Ch. 4:31 has BETH-BIRI (בֵּית בִּרְיָ), which has probably arisen from a corruption of the text. 1. Site. a little off the high road to Hebron, on a spur running E. from the watershed, surrounded by valleys among the most fertile of Judaea. The site is without springs (the nearest being one 800 yards SE. of the town, and others at Artās 1½ m. away), but receives water from an aqueduct from the Pools of Solomon (CONDUITS, § 3) compassing the SE. end of the spur, and from many cisterns—of which the greatest are three in front of the great basilica; there are three others from 12 to 21 ft. deep, on the N., called B'ār Dā'ūd. The immediate neighbourhood is very fertile, bearing, besides wheat and barley, groves of olive and almond, and vineyards. The wine of Bethlehem ('Talhami') is among the best of Palestine.

So great fertility must mean that the site was occupied, in spite of the want of springs, from the earliest times;

2. OT refer- but the references to it in Judges—as the ences. home of the Levite who sojourned in Micah's house (17:9), and of the young woman whom the Benjamites maltreated (19:1 f. 18)—and in the Book of Ruth are of uncertain date, and into the clear light of history Bethlehem first emerges with David.¹ It was his home (1 S. 20:6 28, very early), for the waters of which, when it was occupied by the Philistines, he expressed so great a longing—probably as a pledge of his fatherland's enfranchisement—that his three captains broke the enemy's lines, and drew water from the cistern 'in the town's gate' (2 S. 23:14 ff., from the same early source), which tradition has identified with the B'ār Dā'ūd (but Guérin, Jud. 1:130 ff., following Quaresmius, prefers those in front of the basilica). Other references to Bethlehem as David's home are 1 S. 16:14 17:12 15:53 (from later strata). Asahel, brother of Joab, was buried in Bethlehem in his father's grave (2 S. 2:32). Thus, Joab, like his leader, was a Bethlehemite. Except for a statement of 2 Ch. 11:6 (βα βαθσεεμ), that Rehoboam fortified Bethlehem, the town is not mentioned again till Micah, who describes it (5:2) as still one of the smallest of the townships of Judah, but illustrious as the birthplace of the Messianic king (see MICAH, ii. § 2 b). According to Jer. 41:17, the Jews who in 586 B.C. fled to Egypt rested at Gidroth-chinham (see CHIMHAM), near Bethlehem. The Bethlehemites carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar reoccupied their town after the return (Ezra 2:21 βαρθαλαεμ [B], βεθλαεμ [A]; Neh. 7:26 B om., βεθλλεεμ [N], βαυσαλεεμ [A], cp v. 6; 1 Esd. 5:17 μαγθλωμων [B], βαυθλωμων [A], βιθλαεμ [L]). Bethlehem is the scene of the beautiful story of Ruth, in connection with which it is necessary to note that Moab is clearly visible from about Bethlehem: thus, Ruth in her adopted home must often have had her own fatherland in sight. In the lists of the MT of Joshua (19) Bethlehem is not given; but it is added with ten others in the CHAL text of 15:59 (καὶ εφραθα αὕτη ἐστὶ βαιθλεεμ): β's reading must be genuine, since the group which it includes is too important to have been omitted from the original.

The name Ephrathah or Ephrath of this passage is assigned to Bethlehem also in Mic. 5:2 [1] (the reading

3. Ephrath. אֶפְרַתָּה or אֶפְרַתָּה is not certain; but the reference to Bethlehem is clear, in Ru. 4:11, virtually in Ru. 1:2 (L om.) in 1 S. 17:12 (B om.),¹ and probably also in Ps. 132:6. Apart from Micah, the documents in which Ephrath[ah] occurs are probably so late that we might reasonably suppose that Bethlehem was the earlier name of the town. On the other hand, these documents are probably based on very early material: Micah (if Mic. 5:2 is his work) takes the name as well known. It is possible to argue from 1 Ch. 2:1950 44 (βαῖθλαδεν [B], βαῖθλαεμ [A]), that Ephrath[ah] was the name of the whole district in which Bethlehem lay.

Bethlehem is not mentioned by Josephus after Solomon's time, nor in the Books of Maccabees; which proves how insignificant it continued to be. As the place commanded the fertile wādies and water-supply around it,—the Philistines had deemed it important enough to occupy—this silence is very remarkable.

4. Christian times. Bethlehem reappears in Mt. 2 Lk. 2 as the birthplace of Jesus, distinguished still as Βηθλεὲμ τῆς Ἰουδαίας (Mt. 2:15, cp 6:8 16), 'the city of David' (Lk. 2:4 15 cp Jn. 7:42). Lk. describes the new-born child as having been laid in a manger (MABDLX omit the definite article of TR), 'because there was no room for them in the Khān'; they had retired then 'to a stall or cave where there was room for the mother and a crib for the babe.'

It is significant that Bethlehem appears to have been chosen, along with the sites of the crucifixion and the resurrection, for special treatment by the Emperor Hadrian. As he set up there an image of Jupiter and an image of Venus, so he devastated Bethlehem and planted upon it a grove sacred to Adonis (Jer. Epist. ad Paul., 583). This proves that even before 132 A.D. Bethlehem was the scene of Christian pilgrimage and worship, as the birthplace of Jesus. (The Talmud also admits that from Bethlehem the Messiah must come: Berachoth, 5a.) About 150 A.D. Justin Martyr (Dial. c. Tryph. 70 78) describes the scene of the birth as in a cave near the village. This tradition may be correct: there were many ancient cave-stables in Palestine (Conder, Tent Work, chap. 10), and caves are still used as stables. In 315 A.D. the site of Bethlehem was still 'a wild wood' (Cyr. Jerus. Catech. 1220). Constantine cleared it and built a basilica. Soon after, in Jerome's time, a cave in the rock near the basilica was venerated as the stable, and in a neighbouring grotto Jerome himself prepared his translation of the Bible. From that day to this the tradition has been constant.

The centre of interest in modern Bethlehem is, therefore, the large basilica S. Maria a Præsepio, surrounded and fortified by the Latin, the Greek, and the Armenian monasteries. Although the architecture is mixed and of many periods, the bulk of the church is that built by Constantine. Cp De Vogüé, Églises de la Palestine, 46 ff.

Eutychius (circa 937, quoted by Guérin, 2:161) asserts, indeed, that the church is a building of Justinian, who pulled down Constantine's as too small and raised a grander edifice. Procopius, however, in his De Edific. Justin., whilst recording that this emperor built the walls of Bethlehem (58), does not mention any basilica there of his construction, as, had there been one, he must have done. Probably Justinian only added to Constantine's church, and the building is, therefore, the most ancient church in Palestine and one of the most ancient in the world. The fine mosaics are from the court of the Emperor Manuel Comnenus (circa 1169 A.D.), and the rafters by Philip of Burgundy (in 1482).

BETH-MERHAK

Under the chancel is the Grotto of the Nativity, called also the Milk-Grotto and the Grotto of our Lady, 'mghāret el ḥalīb' and 'mghāret-es-Seiyide.' We have seen the precariousness of the tradition which sanctions it: it is only probable that Jesus was born in a cave, and there is nothing to prove that this was the cave, for the site lay desolate for three centuries.

Among recent works, consult Tobler's monograph, Bethlehem in Palästina, and Palmer, 'Das jetzige Bethlehem,' ZDPV 1789 ff., with map and name-lists.

2. Bethlehem of Zebulun (Josh. 19:15, Βαιθμαρ [B]), now Beit Lahm, 7 m. NW. of Nazareth, 'a miserable village among oak woods' (Guérin, Galilée, 1303; Rob. BR 3:113). In the Talmud it receives the designation נְצִייה, perhaps a corruption for נְצִייה, 'of Nazareth' (Neubauer, Géog. Talm. 189 f.). The combination of two names so famous in the Gospel history is remarkable. Most scholars take this Bethlehem to have been the home and burial-place of the judge Ibzan (Judg. 12:8 10). Josephus and Jewish tradition assign him to Bethlehem Judah (Ant. v. 7:13). G. A. S.

BETH-MARCABOTH (בֵּית הַמָּרְכָבוֹת), § 96—i.e., 'the house of chariots' and HAZAR-SUSAH (חֲזַר שִׁשָּׁה סוּסִים, —i.e., 'station of horses') are mentioned together in Josh. 19:5 f. (P) in the list of Simeonite towns.

The G readings are: for Beth-marcaboth; in Josh. 19:5 Βαιθμαχερες [B], -θαμμαραχασωθ [A], -βηθαμαλαχασωθ [L]; in 1 Ch. 4:31, where the Hebrew article is omitted, Βαιθμαρεμωθ [B], -ραχσθ και εν μαριαβωθ [L], -θ' μαρχαβωθ [A]. For Hazar-susah; in Josh. 19:5 σαρσουσειν [B], σαρσουσιμ [A], Α[σ]α[ρ]σουσιν [L]; in 1 Ch. 4:31, HAZAR-SUSIM [see below] ημιουσεσσοραμ [B], ημιους εως οδρου [Bab], ημιουσεσσιμ [A], σαρσουσι [L].

The names seem to indicate posts of war-horses and chariots, such as Solomon is said to have established (1 K. 9:19 10:26). The two places may possibly be identical respectively with MADMANNAH and SANSANNAH, 'cities' in the Negeb towards Edom. The latter are the older names; for Madmannah, at least, appears in 1 Ch. 2:49 (which belongs to the list of pre-exilic settlements of the Calebites), whilst it is impossible to assign a very early date to 1 Ch. 4:31, where Beth-marcaboth and HAZAR-SUSIM (חֲזַר שִׁשָּׁה סוּסִים) are mentioned as Simeonite towns 'before the reign of David.' That the two places actually were regular stations for horses and chariots may be taken for granted; but it may be questioned whether they were so before post-exilic times, when the Persians established post-stations on the route from the Shēphēlah into Egypt (by Gaza to Pelusium).¹ On this view Sansannah may very well be the modern Simsim, a village in an olive-grove on the road from Eleutheropolis to Gaza (9½ m. NE. from the latter town), and Madmannah may be conjectured to be the modern Khān Yūnus, 14 m. SW. from Gaza (so Guérin, Jud. 2:230). Khān Yūnus has always been an important station. It may be noted that in the time of Micah (1:13) Lachish (about 8 m. from Simsim) also was a chariot city. Cp MARCABOTH. W. R. S.

BETH-MERHAK, AV 'a place that was afar off,' RV^{mg} 'the Far House,' (בֵּית הַמֶּרְחָק, EN ΟΙΚΩ ΤΩ ΜΑΚΡΑΝ [BAL], procul a domo). Beth-merhak is either the proper name (so Ges.²³, BDB doubtfully),—in which case the name is Beth-hammerhāk, like Beth-hacerem,—or a description (Ew., The., Ke., Kau. HS, 'the last house') of the place outside Jerusalem where David waited with his attendants until the people and the body-guard had passed, 2 S. 15:17 (on the text, which is doubtful, see Dr. HPSm. and Klo. ad loc.).

[F], אַמְבְּרָא [A], מַאמְ-ΒΡָא [L]), one of the Amorite cities which were afterwards 'built' by Gad (Nu. 3236), is the βηθναμβρις and Bethammaris of Eusebius and Jerome (OS 23243; ib. 1021), a village still extant in their day, about 5 R. m. N. from Livias (BETH-HARAN, q.v.), the בית נמר and בית נמר of the Talmud (cp Del. ad loc.), the modern Nimrin, a well-watered oasis on the brink of the Jordan valley some 13½ miles E. of Jordan (cp Baed. Pal. (3) 162). Beth-nimrah is nowhere mentioned under this name in OT outside of Numbers and Joshua, but it is identified by many modern critics with the waters of NIMRIM (q.v.), and, as stated elsewhere (BETHANY, 2), Beth-nimrah may be the original of the variants Bethany, Bethabara, in Jn. 128.

BETHORON (Judith 44), RV BETH-HORON (q.v.).

BETH-PALET, or (Neh. 1126) BETH-PHELET, RV always Bethpelet (בֵּית פֶּלֶט, 'house of escape'), an unknown Calebite town (cp PELET [I], 1 Ch. 247), on the Edomite border of Judah, Josh. 1527 (ΒΑΙΦΑΛΛΑΔ [B], ΒΑΙΘΦΑΛΕΘ [A], ΒΗΘΦΕΛ. [L]), mentioned in the list of Judahite villages (see EZRA, ii. § 5 [δ], § 15 [12]); Neh. 1126 (ΒΗΒΦΑΛΤ [N^{ca.mg.}], ΒΗΘΦΑΛΑΤ [L], om. BN*A). BETH-PAZZEZ (בֵּית פֶּצֶז), an unknown point on the border of Issachar, Josh. 1921 (ΒΗΡΣΑΦΗC [B], ΒΑΙΘΦΑCΗE [A], ΒΗΘΦΑCΗC [L]). Compare the equally obscure name HAPPIZZEZ.

BETH-PEOR (בֵּית פְּעוֹר), οἰκος φογωρ [BAFL], a place named in Dt. 329 446 346 Josh. 1320. In Josh. 1320 (ΒΑΙΘΦΟΓΩΡ [BL], Βεθ. [A]) it is enumerated among the cities of Reuben; in Dt. 329 446 the ravine (גַּי) in front of (מִלְּפָנֵי) it is mentioned as the place where Israel was encamped when the Deuteronomy discourses were delivered; and in Dt. 346 the same ravine is mentioned as the place of Moses' burial. The exact site is uncertain; but it seems clear that it cannot have been very far from the Pisgah ridge. Eusebius states (OS (2) 23378) that Βεθφογορ was near Mount Φογορ (cp 'the top, or head, of Peor,' ראש פְּעוֹר, Nu. 2328), opposite to Jericho, 6 m. above Livias (i.e., Tell er-Rāmeḥ; see BETH-HARAN); and (OS (2) 21347) that Mount Φογορ was opposite to Jericho, on the side of the road leading up from Livias to Heshbon, a part of it being 7 m. from the latter place (1151-2). If we may judge from the map in the Survey of E. Palest., the ascent from Livias to Heshbon would be made naturally either along the Wādy Ḥesbān (cp Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 525 f.; Tristram, Moab, 346) or along the more circuitous road N. of this, said by Tristram (p. 343) to be the one ordinarily used. The statements of Eusebius, if correct, would thus point to a site near one of these two roads, some four or five miles N. of Nebā. The 'head of Peor' (Nu. 2328) might be an eminence in the same locality. The opinion that this was the site is supported by the mention, in Josh. 1320, of Beth-peor next to the 'slopes (אֲשֵׁר) of Pisgah,'—i.e., in all probability, the declivities on the S. side of the Wādy 'Ayūn Mūsā. The 'ravine in front of Beth-peor' might thus be the Wādy Ḥesbān. Conder (PEFQ 1882, p. 85 f.; Heth and Moab, (3) 146 f.) suggests a site farther to the S.—e.g., on the crest of a hill above 'Ain el-Minyeh, 8 m. SW. of Nebā, commanding (see Nu. 2328; and 242 compared with 251) an extensive view of the lower valley of the Jordan. Peor, however, the spot at which Baal of Peor was worshipped (which can hardly have been far from Beth-peor), would seem (Nu. 251-3) to have been more readily accessible from the plain of Shittim (the Ghōres-Seisebān) than 'Ain el-Minyeh would be; Nu. 2328 compared with v. 14 makes it probable also that it was less distant from Pisgah; whilst, as we have seen, whatever other indications we possess point to a site N. of the Nebo-Pisgah ridge (the modern Nebā, Rās Ši'āghah), rather than to one S. of it. Until, therefore, it has been shown that there is no eminence in the neighbourhood of the Wādy Ḥesbān commanding the prospect implied in Nu. 2328 and 242 (cp 251), it is here that the ancient Beth-peor must be sought. Travellers will perhaps explore this region with the view of ascertaining whether there is such a height. Cp PEOR. S. R. D.

BETHPHAGE (ΒΗΘΦΑΓΗ [Ti. WH], BETHPHAGE), a locality near the Mt. of Olives, on a small hill on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. It is mentioned together with BETHANY (q.v., 1), and probably lay to the E. of it (Mt. 211 Mk. 111 Lk. 1929). Origin in Mt. (vol. xvi. chap. 17) describes it as a place of priests¹ (cp OS (2) 18875). According to various passages of the Talmud, Beth-phagē was the name of the district extending from the base of Olivet to the walls of Jerusalem, and, according to the Talm. Bab. (Men. xi. 2, 78 δ), Beth-phagē was one of the limits of the Sabbath zone around Jerusalem (cp GEZER), whence Cl. Ganneau would identify it with Kefr et-Tūr (see PEFQ 1873, p. 60; but see BETH-ZUR).

The current explanation of the name is a little more plausible than that of BETHANY (q.v.). Βηθφαγη (the פֶּתַח of Talm.) would naturally mean 'place of young figs'; cp 25 in Cant. 213 with Delitzsch's note. This, however, may be no more than a popular etymology. Nestle (Phil. Sac. 1896; cp ZWT, etc. xl. 148) is convinced that the narrative of the barren fig-tree, which in Mt. 2117-19 Mk. 1112-14 is localised in Bethany, has arisen out of this faulty popular explanation of Beth-phagē. It has often been remarked that there is a startling peculiarity in this narrative as compared with the other evangelical traditions. See also A. Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache, 166.

The mediæval Bethphagē was discovered by Guillemot and Clermont-Ganneau in 1877 between the Mount of Olives and Bethany. In his account of this discovery the latter scholar offers the suggestion that the 'Village of the Mount of Olives' (Kefr et-Tūr), which admittedly stands on the site of some important ancient village, may be the Bethphage of the Gospels and of the Talmud. This view would clear up the Talmudic statement respecting the Sabbath zone already mentioned. See PEFQ 1878, pp. 51-61.

BETH-RAPHA (בֵּית רָפָה), in an obscure genealogy of Chelub (= Caleb), 1 Ch. 412 (ΒΑΘΡΑΙΑΝ [B], -ρεφα [A], ΒΗΘΡΑΦΑΝ [L]). No place of this name is known; Rapha appears to be a clan-name, unconnected of course with 'Rephaim.' RAPHA [2] appears to occur as a name in BENJAMIN (§ 9, ii. β).

BETH-REHOB (בֵּית רְהוֹב, ΡΩΒ [BAL]), an Aramæan town and district, which with ZOBAN and MAACAH sent men to the help of Ammon against David (2 S. 106, ib. 8, REHOB [ρωβ [A]; ΒΑΙΘΡΑΔΒ [L in both]).² See ARAM, §§ 5, 6. It is stated in Judg.

BETHSAIDA

1828 that Laish-Dan was in 'the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob' (οἶκος ρααβ [B], ο. ρωβ [L], ο. τωβ [A]). Beth-rehob is doubtless the ΡΕΗΟΒ of Nu. 1321, which, according to P, was the most northern point reached by the spies¹ (ρααβ [B], ρωβ [F]). A connection with the Asherite ΡΕΗΟΒ (i. 2, 3) is improbable (though not impossible, see ARAM, § 5).²

The exact site of Beth-rehob is uncertain. It can hardly be the Jebel Hūnīn, finely situated above the great plain of Hūleh to the W. of Bāniās, and remarkable for the remains, partly ancient, of a fortress (so Rob. BR 4370 f.). Others have thought of Kal'at Buṣra, about 1 hour N. of Dan; but may not the site of the town Beth-rehob be placed quite as reasonably at Bāniās itself³ (see CÆSAREA, § 7 f.)?

BETHSAIDA (ΒΗΘΣΑΙΔΑ [Ti.], ΒΗΘΣΑΙΔΑ [WH]; Syr. ܒܝܬܫܝܕܐ; place of fishing or hunting). Josephus

1. Julias. tells us (Ant. xviii. 21) that the Tetrarch Philip raised a village (κώμη) Bethsaida on the Lake of Gennesareth to the rank of a city, and called it Julias, after Julia the daughter of Augustus. Elsewhere he describes Julias as in the Lower Gaulonitis (B./ii. 91), close to the Jordan (Vit. 72), near where the latter runs into the lake (B./iii. 107). Pliny (v. 15) and Jerome (Comm. Mt. 1613) also place it E. of Jordan. In conformity with these data, the site has been fixed on the fertile and very grassy plain El-Buteiha, in the NE. corner of the lake, either at et-Tell, a mound with many ruins, close to the Jordan where the latter issues from the hills, or at Mas'adiyeh, by the mouth of the river (to which Thomson [Land and Book, ed. 1877, 360] heard the name Bethsaida attached by Bedouin). Fish abound on either side of the Jordan's mouth and (presumably) in the river itself. There can be little doubt that this was the 'city called Bethsaida' (Lk. 920; εἰς τόπον ἑρημον πόλεως καλουμένης βηθ. is not found in N^ε-B^αL, etc., which reads εἰς πόλιν καλουμένην βηθ.; so Ti. WH, etc.) to which Jesus withdrew, as being in Philip's jurisdiction, when he heard of John's murder by Antipas (cp Mt. 1413). Lk. places near it the feeding of the five thousand, which Mt. (1414 ff.) and Mk. (631 ff.) describe as in a desert (i.e., uninhabited) but grassy place (Mt. 1419 Mk. 639 'green grass,' such as grows in the Buteiha, in contrast to the paler herbage of the higher and drier parts), to which Jesus proceeded by boat, followed by multitudes on foot. J. also describes the scene on the E. shore of the lake (61), and says 'there was much grass in the place' (v. 10). A site on the Buteiha suits also the Bethsaida of Mk. 822, for Jesus was already E. of Jordan (v. 13) and went thence to the villages of Caesarea Philippi (v. 27). All interpreters of the Gospels are virtually agreed about this.

The question has been raised, whether there was not a second Bethsaida. After the feeding of the five thousand, Jesus, it is said, constrained his

2. Mk. 645. disciples to go before him to the other side to Bethsaida (Mk. 645, εἰς τὸ πέραν πρὸς βηθ.). This has forced some scholars, one or two much against their will (Reland, Pal. 653 ff., Henderson, Pal. 156 f.), to conclude that there was a Bethsaida to the W. of Jordan, either a suburb of Julias, separated from it by the river, or at 'Ain Tābigha (Rob. LBR 358 f.), 4 m. along the coast, where there is a bay containing fish in abundance, and the modern shrine of Sheikh 'Aly es-Saiyād, 'Aly of the Fishermen, and strong streams (Ewing). But, in the first place, the phrase 'to go to the other side' does not necessarily imply the passage from the E. to the W. coast of the lake, for Josephus speaks of 'sailing over' (διεπαραυῶθην) from Tiberias to Taricheæ

BETH-SHEAN

(Vit. 59), though these towns lay on the same side; and, secondly, Jesus would not seek again the territories of Herod Antipas so soon after leaving them for those of Philip, but would most probably return to what Lk. tells us he had just chosen as his headquarters. We may be certain, then, that the Bethsaida of Mk. 645 is still Bethsaida Julias.

Nor need we seek for another in the 'Bethsaida of Galilee' to which the Fourth Gospel (144 [45] 1221) says that Andrew, Peter, and Philip belonged.

3. John 144 In the time of the Great War (66-70 A.D.) [45] 1221. the name Galilee appears to have been extended round the Lake—Josephus calls Judas of Gamala the Galilean (Ant. xviii. 16)—and at even an earlier date the jurisdiction of the ruler of Galilee may have comprised part of the E. coast (cp B./xx. 4). Besides, a town which lay so immediately on the Jordan might easily be reckoned to Galilee. In any case, by 84 A.D. the E. coast was definitely attached to the province, and Ptolemy (v. 15), writing about 140, places Julias 'in Galilee.' That being so, it is significant that it is only the Fourth Gospel that speaks of 'Bethsaida of Galilee.' There is, therefore (as held by Wilson, Recov. of Jerus.; Thomson, Land and Book, ed. 1877, 372 ff.; Holtzmann, JPT. 1878, pp. 383 f.; Furrer, ZDPV 266 ff.; Socin and Benzinger in Baed. ed. 1891, p. 256; GASm. HG 457 ff.; Buhl, Pal. 241 ff.) no reason compelling us to the theory of a second or western Bethsaida. It is interesting that the disciple of Jesus called Philip should come from Philip's Julias.

Early Christian tradition and the mediæval works of travel agree in showing no trace of more than one Bethsaida. The site shown for it, however, is uncertain, and may have varied from age to age. Eusebius and Jerome define it only as on the Lake (OS.). Epiphanius (Haer. ii. 51 13) merely says it was not far from Capernaum. Willibald's data (722 A.D.), which place it on his journey between Capernaum and Chorazin, suit the E. bank of the Jordan (in spite of what Robinson says even if Chorazin (q.v.) be Kerāzeh, but Gergesa (Kheresa) may be meant.

In all probability Bethsaida remained locally distinct from Julias after the erection of the latter by Philip. The custom of Jesus was not to enter such purely Greek towns as Julias must have been; yet, according to Mt. 1121, he did many 'wonderful works' in Bethsaida. Julias had fourteen villages round about it (Jos. Ant. xx. 84). Schumacher suggests for Bethsaida some ruins on the Lake called el-Araj, which were joined with et-Tell (Julias) by a Roman road (ZDPV 919).

BETH-SHEAN (בֵּית שֵׁאן, § 90, cp Bay-ti-Ša'-ā-ry, i.e., בֵּית שֵׁאן, WMM As. u. Eur. 153; ΒΑΙΘΑ[Α]Ν

1. Position. [BAL], or Beth-shan (בֵּית שֵׁאן, in pause בֵּית שֵׁאן; BHOCAN [A], ΒΑΙΘ. [L]), or Beth-san (1 Macc. 5521240 [βεθσα [A]] f.), mod. Beisān, 320 ft. below the sea-level, was finely situated on a low table-land above the Jordan valley, at the mouth of the W. Jālūd, which leads gently up from the Jordan to Zer'in (Jezreel). The Jordan itself is three miles off (cp ZARETHAN, § 1); but Beth-shēān was unusually well supplied with water, being intersected by two streams. Amid the extensive ruins rises the tell of the ancient fortress, 'a natural mound, artificially strengthened by scarping the side' (PEF Mem. 2108).

The illustration given in the Memoirs of the Survey will enable the reader to divine the grandeur of the prospect from this eminence. 'The eye sweeps from four to ten miles of the plain all round, and follows the road westward to Jezreel, covers the thickets of Jordan where the fords lie, and ranges the edge of the eastern hills from Gadara to the Jabbok' (GASm. HG 357).

This 'farthest-seeing, farthest-seen fortress' must have been hard for the Israelites to conquer; yet

2. History. till it was in their hands they were excluded from one of the main roads between western and eastern Palestine, and from the occupation of a coveted portion of the Jordan valley. That Beth-shean was included in one of the prefectures of Solomon's kingdom is certain (1 K. 4:12, ὁ οἶκος δαν and βαϊσαφούρ—i.e., בֵּית שֶׁאן [B], δ οἶκος σαν and βεθσαν [A], οἶκος σαν and βαϊθσ. [L]).¹ On the death of Saul, on the other hand, we find it in the hands of the Philistines (1 S. 31:10, βαϊθεμ [B], 12, -θσαμ [B], 2 S. 21:12, βαϊθ [B]); and, though Beth-shean may be one of the 'cities of the Jordan' (1 S. 31:7, corr. text) which the Israelites deserted after the battle of Gilboa, it is equally likely that it was still a Canaanitish city when captured by the Philistines. We know, at any rate, that it retained its Canaanite population for some time after the Israelite occupation of Palestine (Judg. 1:27, βαϊθηλ [B], βεθσαν [L]; Josh. 17:11, καϊθσαν [B*^b], βαϊθσαν [B*^a m^a], 16 βαϊθαισαν [B]). It may possibly have been as late as the time of David that this great fortress fell into the hands of the Israelites. Standing on the road from Damascus to Egypt and also from Damascus by Shechem to Jerusalem and Hebron, it had a commercial as well as a military importance which would have attracted the notice of such a keen-sighted king as David.

From the Macedonian period onwards Beth-shean bore the strange Greek name Scythopolis (see Judg. 1:27, ἡ ἐστὶν Σκυθῶν πόλις; 2 Macc. 12:29-31, etc.), which probably records the fact (or belief) that some of the Scythian invaders of the seventh cent. B.C. (see SCYTHIANS) had settled here. In NT times it was one of the most important cities of the DECAPOLIS (q.v., § 2).

BETH-SHEMESH (בֵּית שֶׁמֶשׁ) § 95 f.—i.e., 'temple of the sun'—ΒΑΙΘΑΜΥΣ [BAL]; gentilic ΒΑΙΘΑΜΥΝΣΙΤΗΣ [BL], δ ἐκ β. [L], in 1 S. 6:14, v. 18 βαϊθσαμυσιτῆς [BL], βεθθαμυσιτῆς [A], EV Beth-shemite). 1. Bethshemesh or IR-SHEMESH (בֵּית שֶׁמֶשׁ, Josh. 19:41, ΠΟΛΙΣ ΑΜΕΣ [AL], ΠΟΛΕΙΣ ΑΜΜΑΥΣ [B]), a Levitical city (Josh. 21:16, ΒΕΘΑΜΕΣ [A], ΤΗΝ ΑΜΕΣ [L]; 1 Ch. 6:59 [44], ΒΑΘΑΜΥΣ [B]) on the borders of Judah (Josh. 15:10, ΠΟΛΙΝ ΗΛΙΟΥ [BAL]) but assigned to Dan (Josh. 19:41), is the modern 'Ain Shems, 917 feet above sea level, on the south side of the broad and beautiful and still well-cultivated W. eş-Sārār, opposite Zorah and two m. from it: 'a noble site for a city; a low plateau at the junction of two fine plains' (Robinson). It is a point in the lowland on the road from Philistia (Ekron) to the hill-country of Judah (1 Sam. 6:9 12^b 13 15 19 βεθθαμυς [A], 12^a 20 βεθσα. [A]), and probably was an ancient sanctuary, since the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite was for some time during the Philistine domination the resting-place of the ark. In truth, it is difficult not to identify it with the Šamašana of the Palestinian lists of Rameses II. (*RP*² 627; WMM A.s. u. Eur. 166) and Rameses III. (*RP*² 639), whose sanctuary may be presumed to be connected with the myth of SAMSON (q.v.). It was at Bethshemesh that Amaziah of Judah was defeated and made prisoner by Jehoash, king of Israel (2 K. 14:17-18, 11 βηθσαμυε [A], 13 βεθ. [A], 2 Ch. 25:21-23). According to the Chronicler, it was one of the cities in the lowland of Judah taken by the Philistines from Ahaz, 'king of Israel' (2 Ch. 28:18). The place was still shown in the days of Eusebius and Jerome, who give its position as 10 R.m. E. of Eleutheropolis on the road to Nicopolis—a statement which suits the identification given above. There are many traces of ancient buildings.

2. An unidentified city within the territory of Naphtali, apparently in its northward portion (Josh. 19:38, θεσσαμυς [B], θασμους [A], βιθσαμυς [L]). From Judg. 1:33 (βεθθαμυς [A]) we learn that, along with Bethanath, its population continued to be chiefly Canaanite.

4. A city of Egypt, mentioned in Jer. 43:13, (ἡλιου πολέως [BNAQ]) 'he shall break the obelisks of Bethshemesh in the land of Egypt.' It is commonly supposed (e.g., by Griffith in Hastings' DB) that what is meant is Heliopolis, the city of the sun (see ON); but בֵּית is simply dittographed from בָּת in בְּתוֹב שֶׁמֶשׁ, 'pillars of the sun' or obelisks (Wi. AT Unters. 80 f.; Che. Intr. Is. 102, n. 2).

BETH-SHITTAH (בֵּית הַשִּׁטָּה)—i.e., 'place of acacias' is mentioned in Judg. 7:22 (ΒΗΘΣΕΛΤΑ [B], ΒΑΘΣΕΤΤΑ [A], ΒΑΙΘΑΘΕΤΤΑ [L]) as a point to which the panic-stricken Midianites fled before Gideon. It was on the way toward ZERERAH (see ZARETHAN, begin.), but has not been identified; probably it was well down in the Jordan valley, at the mouth of some wady where acacias flourished. The identification with Shaṭṭa on the north side of the W. Jālūd, 5 m. NW. of Beisān and 6 m. E. of Zer'in (cp Rob., Conder, etc.) has little to recommend it: it lies much too near the supposed scene of the surprise. More, perhaps, could be said for Beisān. Others compare el-Meshetta (see MDPV, 1895, pp. 81 f.; Schumacher, ZDPV, 1864 writes mashatta) 14 m. SSE. of Jogbehah. The whole narrative is, however, composite (see JUDGES, § 8), and the Heb. construction favours the assumption that Zererah does not belong to the same source as Bethshittah. In J Midian flees east from Shechem to the other side of the Jordan, whereas from v. 24 it appears that in E's narrative they turn S. (to Zarethān) through the Jordan valley, where they are intercepted by the Ephraimites (cp Moore, Judg. 212).

BETH-SURA (ΒΕΘΣΟΥΡΑ [A]), 1 Macc. 4:61; 2 Macc. 11:5 RV Bethsuron. See BETH-ZUR.

BETH-TAPPUAH (בֵּית תַּפּוּאָה), § 103—i.e., 'place of tappūāh'; see APPLE), a town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. 15:53, ΒΑΙΘΑΧΟΥ [B], ΒΕΘΘΑΠΦΟΥΕ [A], ΒΗΘΘΑΦ. [L]), having a traditional connection with its greater neighbour Hebron (1 Ch. 2:43, see TAPPUAH, 1), and very possibly identical with the fortified town called TAPHON (q.v.) in 1 Macc. 9:50. If the similarity of names, the vicinity of Hebron, and the fruitfulness of the district prove anything, the modern Teffūh is the ancient Beth-tappuah. The village so named is 3½ m. W. by N. from Hebron, and stands on a high hill, the slopes of which are planted with aged olive-trees; indeed, the whole of the Wādy Tuffūh abounds in fruit-trees of all kinds. Traces of old buildings remain, and there are two ancient wells (Rob. LEB 2:428; Guérin, Judee, 3:374). Several ancient sites named Beth have lost this prefix. Thus the בֵּית נִמְרִים of Nu. 32:36 is modern Nimrin.

The notices of Eus. and Jer. (OS 235:17 104:17; cp 156:20) are of interest only as showing that there was another place on the confines of Palestine and Egypt bearing the same name. Whatever the fruit called tappūāh was (see APPLE), it was as common in Palestine as quinces and apricots are now.

BETHUEL (בֵּיתוּאֵל, for בְּתוּאֵל, 'man of El'—cp Methushael, and see CAINITES, § 7; hardly for Ass. bit ilī, 'house of a deity'; ΒΑΘΟΥΗΛ [ADEL]).

1. B. Nahor; father of Laban and Rebekah (Gen. 22:22 f. 24:15 [J]). In Gen. 25:20 28:5 [P] he is called an 'Aramæan,' as is also his son Laban in 31:20 24. See ARAM, § 3.

BETHUL (בֵּיתוּל), a Simeonite town (Josh. 19:4, ΒΟΥΛΑ [B], ΒΑΘΟΥΛΑ [AL]), called BETHUEL (בֵּיתוּאֵל, ΒΑΘΟΥΛ [B], -ΟΥΛ [A], -ΟΥΗΛ [L]) in 1 Ch. 4:30, and corruptly CHESIL (כְּסִיל) in || Josh. 15:30 (ΒΑΙΘΗΛ [B], ΧΑΘΕΙΡ [A], CEIEIA [L]). The form בְּתוּלָה may perhaps be classed with Penuel; for elision of נ cp HAMUL. It is doubtless the BETHEL (בֵּית־עֵל, βαϊθηλ [AL], βαϊθσουρ—i.e., Beth-zur [B])¹ of 1 S. 30:27, mentioned along with

Jattir and other places in the Negeb; but the site has not yet been identified. There was probably a Bethel near Gaza.¹

BETHULIA (Βετυλοῖα [BNA], [the preferable reading; but Βαιτοῦλοῖα [BN], Βαιτυλοῖα [BNA] are also found]; BETHULIA [Vg.]; בֵּית הַבְּתוּלָה), the centre of the action in the book of Judith (22x [N*] 46 [N], Βαιτοῦλια 610 f. 1471 f.). In the shorter version of the narrative its place is taken by Jerusalem, and there is little doubt that Bethulia (properly Betylua) represents בֵּית הַבְּתוּלָה,² the house of God—viz., Jerusalem (see JUDITH, ii.). So already Reuss, who, however, together with Welte, derived the name from בֵּית הַבְּתוּלָה. Bertholdt's conjecture בֵּית הַבְּתוּלָה, 'virgin of Yahwè,' may be worth noticing.³

According to the representations of the book (cp 4673), Bethulia lay near Jezreel, upon a rock by a valley, commanding the passes to the S. (so Buhl, Pal. 201, n. 627). Various identifications have been suggested.

Some have sought for it near the modern Kefr Kūd, formerly Caphtarotia, N.E. of the plain of Dothan (Hil., cp also Riehm); other suggestions are the fortress Sānūr (Grove in Smith's DB), Kh. Hārūk el-Mellāh (Marta, quoted in ZDPV 12117), Jenin (Ew.), Beit Ilfa (Schultz), and plausibly no doubt (b and m being often confounded), Mithiliyeh or Misilia (Conder; Socin also inclines to this view, Bād. (2), 226). More recently, Torrey (Journ. Am. Or. Soc. 20 160 ff. [199]) argues ably in favour of Shechem.

So large and important a place as Bethulia—with its rulers and elders (614 16), its streets and towers (722 32), and its siege, lasting for four-and-thirty days, by an immensely superior army (720)—cannot reasonably be identified with any small and insignificant locality. It remains to be added that the mention of Jerusalem and Bethulia as two distinct places (cp 46 155 f.) is probably to be assigned to a time when the identity of the ideal Bethulia with Jerusalem was forgotten.

BETHZACHARIAS, AV (by misprint?) BATH-ZACHARIAS (Βεθζαχαρία [A], Βαιθ. [NV]; Jos. Βεθζ., ΒΗΤΖ.), the scene of the defeat of Judas the Maccabee by Lysias, and of the death of his brother Eleazar (1 Macc. 632 f.). Its position is defined by Josephus (Ant. xii. 94) as 70 stadia (N.) from Bethsur; it is thus represented by the modern Beit-Sakāriā (described by Robinson (2) 3283 f. and PEF Mem. 3 35 108).

BETHZATHA (Βηθζαθα), the reading adopted by Ti. WH in Jn. 52, where TR has BETHESDA. For the evidence, see WH. ii. App. 76: perhaps the purest form would be Βηθζαθα, 'the place of the olive' (cp BEZETH).

BETH-ZUR (בֵּית הַזֹּרֶה, Βεθζοῦρ [AL], § 96, 'house of rock,' or, on the analogy of Beth-el, 'house of Zur'—a divine name, Nestle, Eigenamen, 47, n. 1; Hommel AHT 319; see ZUR), a city in the hill-country of Judah, mentioned between Halhul and Gedor⁴ (Josh. 15 58, Βαιθζοῦρ [B]; cp 1 Ch. 245, where Bethzur—γεδσοῦρ [B], Βηθζοῦρ [AL]—is the 'son' of Maon), is stated in 2 Ch. 117 (Βαιθζοῦρα [B], ἡν βαῖθζ. [A], τὴν βαῖθζοῦρ [L]) to have been fortified by Rehoboam. It was head of a district in Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3 16, Βηθζοῦρ [BN], Βηθζοῦρ [A]). Frequently an object of struggle in the Maccabean wars (ἡ βαῖθζοῦρα, τὰ [B. [NV], ἡ Βεθζ., τὰ β. [AN], 1 Macc. 4 2961 6726314950 952; 10 14 βαῖθζοῦρος [V*]; 11 65 14733),⁵ it was in the time of Josephus (Ant. xiii. 56) 'the strongest place in all Judæa,' and was still an inhabited village (Βηθσωρ Βηθσωρο) in the days of Eusebius and Jerome (OS 104 27; 326 26). It is represented by Bēt Sūr (Burj Sūr), and occupies a position of strategic importance as commanding the road from Jerusalem to Hebron, 4½ m. N. from the latter city. The modern village has a ruined tower, and 'there are hewn stones scattered about, as also some fragments of columns, and many foundations of buildings. . . . It must have been a small place' (Robinson).

If the statements in 2 Macc. 115 (RV BETHSURON) are reliable there must have been a second Beth-zur in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. Grimm suggests the modern village of Bēt-Sāhūr, half-an-hour SE from Jerusalem. Schick, with more probability, identifies it with the modern Kefr-el-Tūr (the Ar. form of Beth-zur) on the central height of the Mount of Olives (PEFQ, Jan. 1895, p. 37; see Camb. Bible on 1 Macc. 429). See, however, BETHPHAGE.

BETOLIVS (Βετολιω [B]), 1 Esd. 5 21 AV; RV Betolion = Ezra 2 28, BETHEL.

BETOMESTHAM, RV Betomesthaim in Judith 46, or Betomasthem, RV Betomasthaim in 154 (Βαιτομα[Ι]CΘΑΙΜ [B], -ACΘEN [N], ΒΕΤΟΜΕCΘΑΙΜ [A]; בֵּית מֶסְתָּהִם; om. ὧς Vg. in 46 and ὧς Vg. Syr. in 154) lay 'over against Jezreel in face of the plain that is near Dothan.' If 'toward' (κατὰ πρὸς ὡρον) can be taken as meaning 'eastward of' the plain of Dothan, we are able to determine its position pretty nearly; but the exact site has not been identified.

BETONIM (בֵּתְנִים, § 103—i.e., 'pistachio nuts,' BOTANEI [B], -NIN [A], -NEIM [L]), in Gadite territory (Josh. 13 26), may perhaps be Bātanah, 3 m. W. from es-Salt (Ramoth-gilead).

BETROTHAL. The Heb. verb is אָרַשׁ 'arash (ἁ ΜΗCΤΕΥΕCΘΑΙ), on which see MARRIAGE, § 1. In 2 S. 3 14, RV rightly has 'betrothed' instead of AV 'espoused.' So also in Mt. 1 18 Lk. 1 2 25. In Lev. 19 20† the verb is וָתַר, and seems to denote marriage by capture rather than marriage by purchase. In Ex. 21 8 f.† it is יָרַח, RV 'espouse.' There is some disorder in the text.

BEULAH (בְּעוּלָה, 'married'; ΟΙΚΟΥΜΕΝΗ [BNAQ], Aq. ΕCΧΗΜΕΝΗ, Symm. Theod. CΥΝΩΚΙCΜΕΝΗ), the symbolical name (Is. 624) by which Zion may fitly be called when her land is 'married' (בְּעוּלָה; cp BAAL). Two primitive and related ideas underlie the expression. The first is that the people of a land, as well as all other 'fruits' (Dt. 284), arise from the fertilising influence of the land's Baal or divine Husband (cp RS (2) 107 f.); the second, that a people which remains faithful to the land's divine Husband is sure of his protection. The former is merely hinted by means of the contrast of the two names 'Desolate' and 'Married' (Is. 624); in Is. 54 1-6, on the other hand, it engrosses the mind of the prophetic writer. It is on the latter, as the context shows, that the writer of Is. 62 (who is not the author of Is. 54) wishes to concentrate our attention. Zion is at present despised (v. 7), and her harvests are plundered by the heathen (v. 8 f.); but when her land is once more 'married,' she will be entitled to the protection of the God of the whole earth.

The sense of the passage has been obscured by an error in the vowel points. For בְּנֵי 'thy sons' (v. 5), read בְּנֵי 'he who buildeth thee up' (cp 54 11 f. Ps. 1472). See Du., Che. (SBOT), and on the other side Di., who gives no parallel, however, for the startling play upon meanings which he assumes.

BEZAANANNIM (בְּזַאנָנִים) occurs in Josh. 19 33 RV^{mg}, 'the oak of Bezaanannim,' where EV has 'the oak in ZAAANANNIM,' a view of the text now pretty generally abandoned. The 'oak (or sacred tree) of Bezaanannim' is a landmark on the W. border of Naphtali, following Heleph, and preceding Adami-nekeb and Jabneel, and is usually identified with 'the oak of Bezaanaim' (following the points), or of 'Bezaanim,' or 'of Bezaanannim (K'rē) in Judg. 4 11, where RV has 'the oak in Zaanannim,' and has inconsistently omitted to record the modern view of the text in the margin. \S reads in Josh. 1933 $\kappa\alpha\iota \mu\omega\lambda\alpha \kappa\alpha\iota \beta\epsilon\sigma\epsilon\mu\epsilon\iota\omega\nu$ [B], $\kappa. \mu\eta\lambda\omega\nu \kappa\alpha\iota \beta\epsilon\sigma\epsilon\alpha\nu\alpha\iota\mu$ [A], $\kappa. \omega\lambda\alpha\mu \sigma\epsilon\epsilon\nu\alpha\nu\epsilon\iota\mu$ [L]; in Judg. 411 $\epsilon\omega\varsigma \delta\rho\upsilon\delta\varsigma \pi\lambda\epsilon\omicron\nu\epsilon\kappa\tau\omicron\upsilon\gamma\omega\nu$ [B; so Theod.], $\pi\rho\omicron\varsigma \delta\rho\upsilon\nu \alpha\nu\alpha\pi\alpha\nu\omicron\mu\epsilon\nu\alpha\nu$ [AL]; see Field's Hexapla.

The difficulty connected with the phrase is twofold. (1) In Joshua l.c., this famous tree is placed on the border of Naphtali; but Judges l.c., read in the light of Judg. 417 524, makes the tree much nearer to the battlefield, which, according to Judg. 51921, was by the stream Kishon. (2) The name is inexplicable, whether we read $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha\nu\iota\mu$ (Bezaanim?) or $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha\nu\alpha\iota\mu$ (Bezaananim?). If, however, several times in Judges (see KADESH), and once in Judg. 4 (see HAROSHETH), the name $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha$ has been correctly restored, it is plausible to suppose that the incomprehensible name, pronounced sometimes Bezaanaim or (better) Bezaanaim, sometimes Bezaananim, may conceal the same old name, especially as in Judg. 411 the words 'which is by Kedesh' are added. It is extremely probable that both in the far north (see KADESH, 2) and in the territory of Issachar there was a place which bore the name of Kadshon (Kidshon); the people of either place could be called Kadshonim (Kidshonim). Nor need we hesitate to emend $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha\iota\mu$ (the form which the best critics prefer) to $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha\iota\mu$, a form which should be restored, as the present writer has sought to show, in Judg. 522b (see KADESH). It is easier to suppose that the 'oak' or 'sacred tree' which forms the subject of this article was near the Kidshon (Kedesh) of Issachar than to follow the Priestly Writer in Joshua, who places it on the border of Naphtali. The error of the latter seems to have arisen from the statements in Judg. 469f., which place the mustering of the Israelitish warriors at Kedesh-Naphtali. The error of the scribe who wrote $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha\iota\mu$ was facilitated by an inopportune recollection of the form $\kappa\epsilon\alpha\alpha\iota\mu$ Kēna'anim (Canaanites). Whether he also thought of the new Heb. $\beta\epsilon\alpha\alpha$, 'ditch, dike, pond' (cp $\mu\epsilon\alpha\alpha$, 'marsh,' Job 811 4021), cannot be determined (cp Neub. Géogr. Tabn. 225).

An identification of 'Bezaanim' with Khirbet Bessūm, E. of Tabor, on the plateau of the Sea of Galilee, was proposed by Conder in PERQ 77, p. 25 (so Tent Work, 2132); cp GASM. HG 306, who considers it 'well supported.' But we must first of all be sure of the reading of the name. It is remarkable that tradition still affirmed that the 'oak of . . .', which was a fixed element in the story, was 'by Kedesh.' Of course, $\kappa\epsilon\alpha\alpha\iota\mu$ is not required when we read $\kappa\epsilon\alpha\alpha\iota\mu$, 'to the sacred tree of the Kidshonim.'

BEZAI ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\iota$, § 52; Hilprecht has found the Jewish name Bišā on a tablet from Nippur [PERQ, Jan. 1898, p. 55]). The b'ne Bezai, a family in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii., §§ 9, 8c), Ezra 217 (BACQY [B], -cc. [A], BACEI [L])=Neh. 723 (BECEI [BN], BACI [A], -cch [L])=1 Esd. 516 BASSA, RV BASSAI (BACCBI [B], -ccā [A], -ccei [L]); represented among the signatories to the covenant (see EZRA, i. § 7), Neh. 1018 [19] (BHCEI [BA], BHΘEI [N], BECEI [L]).

BEZALEEL, RV Bezalel ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\lambda$, §§ 22, 29, 'in the shadow of God'; cp BESODEIAH; $\beta\epsilon\sigma\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\eta\lambda$ [BAL]). The form is improbable. Sil-Bel, 'Bel is a shelter,' the name of a king of Gaza in Sennacherib's time (KA T² 162), even if correctly represented, is not parallel. Read $\beta\epsilon\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\lambda$, 'God rescues,' and cp the Phoen. names $\beta\epsilon\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\lambda$, $\beta\epsilon\alpha\lambda\epsilon\iota\lambda$. The number of the artificial religious names of later times has been exaggerated.

1. b. Uri b. Hur of the tribe of Judah, a Calebite (1 Ch. 220), a skilled workman in gold, silver, and brass, who together with Aholiab executed the work of the tabernacle (Ex. 312 3530 361f. 371 3822, all P). He is mentioned in 2 Ch. 15 as having made the brazen altar.

BEZEK ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\kappa$, cp § 100, 'gravel'? cp Syr.; Bezek [BAL]; BEZEK). 1. A place at which Saul mustered the force he had raised for the relief of Jabesh-gilead; 1 S. 118 ($\alpha\beta\iota\epsilon\zeta\epsilon\kappa \epsilon\nu \beta\alpha\mu\alpha$ [B]; $\epsilon\nu \beta\epsilon\zeta\epsilon\kappa$ [A]; $\Sigma\alpha\upsilon\lambda \epsilon\nu \rho\alpha\mu\alpha$ [L]). Eusebius (*OS*² 23752) locates two neighbouring villages of this name 17 R. m. from Neapolis on the road to Scythopolis; beyond doubt Khirbet Ibzik, 14 Eng. m. from Nābulus and nearly opposite the lower end of Wādy Yābis, with which Eshtori Parchi (A.D. 1322) identified it. See PEF Mem. 2231 237.

2. A place at which Judah and Simeon, in invading the S. of Palestine, encountered and routed the Canaanites under Adoni-bezek; Judg. 14 f. ($\beta\alpha\zeta\epsilon\kappa$ [A]; om. B* in v. 5). Many scholars, from Eusebius onwards, identify this with No. 1; but this is inadmissible.

Judah and Simeon set out from the neighbourhood of Gilgal (Judg. 116f. 21) to invade the region in which they afterwards settled; the end of the story of Adoni-bezek conducts him to Jerusalem, which was probably his own city (Adoni-zedek, king of Jerusalem; see ADONI-BEZEK and ADONI-ZEDEK). Ibzik lies wholly out of this sphere of action and in a quite different direction.

The Bezek of Judg. 1 must be sought much farther south. Conder would find it at Bezkeh, 6 m. SE. of Lydda (PEF Mem. 336); but this view is scarcely probable. In view of the change which the name of the king has suffered, it may be questioned whether the name of the place has been correctly preserved.

BEZER ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\kappa$, § 106, 'fortress'; BOQOP [BAL]), a levitical city and city of refuge, Dt. 443 Josh. 208 2136 (om. MT; BOQOP [L]), 1 Ch. 673 [63]—the BOZRAH [1] ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\kappa$) of Jer. 4824 ($\beta\epsilon\sigma\alpha\alpha\kappa$)—is described in Josh. 203 as lying in the wilderness on the (Amorite) 'Mishor' or Tableland, and is usually identified with the modern Kesir el-Beskir (or Beskir), about 2 m. SW. of Diban, and about the same distance N. of Aroer. King Mesha of Moab in his inscription (L 27) says: 'I built Bezer, for ruins had it become.' With this place some have identified BOSOR (q.v., 2).

BEZER ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\kappa$; COBAA [B], BACAP [AL]), in genealogy of ASHER [§ 4 (ii)], 1 Ch. 737f.

BEZETH (BHZEΘ [A], BHΘZAIΘ [N], BAIΘZHΘ [V], BHPZHΘW [Jos. Ant. xii. 102; but BHΘZHΘW, ib., BHPZHΘW, xii. 111; Schlatter, ZDP¹ 19224]), a place near Jerusalem where Bacchides encamped, and, having slain some deserters and prisoners, threw them into 'the great pit' which was there (1 Macc. 719). The readings of \S and Syr. in this passage ($\beta\epsilon\alpha\kappa$ [ed. Lag.]) point to an original Beth-zuth (house of the olive). Hence it is possible that Bezeth may be the later Bezetha ('place of olives'), the name given to the N. end of the plateau, on the S. part of which lay Jerusalem. See BETHZATHA, JERUSALEM, OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

BICHRI ($\beta\iota\chi\epsilon\iota$, § 61; BOXOPEI [BA], BēΔΔΔΔ [I]) in Sheba b. Bichri (2 S. 201 f.), a gentile from BECHER [q.v.]. The plural Bichrites ($\beta\iota\chi\epsilon\iota\tau\epsilon\varsigma$) is postulated by \S BA ($\kappa\alpha\iota \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\epsilon\varsigma \epsilon\nu \chi\alpha\pi\epsilon\iota$) in 2 S. 2014 in place of BERITES [q.v.]. See SHEBA, ii. (1), BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. 3.

BADKAP [B³MS], Jehu's adjutant ($\beta\iota\delta\kappa\alpha\varsigma$, 2 K. 925). The name is noteworthy, because the chief support of the theory that β at the beginning of proper names sometimes stands for 'son of' is that Pesh. here has bur-dēkar (hence β = $\beta\epsilon\alpha\kappa$, 'son of piercing'—a suitable name for a warrior; cp Lanzknecht; cp Ass. bindikiri [Del. ZAF

BIGTHA (בִּיגְתָּה ; βωραζη [BNL²], [οαρε] βωα [A]), a chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Esth. 110). Marq. (Fund. 71) finds its Gr. equivalent in βιγαθαθα [A], for βιγαθαθα , whence he restores בִּיגְתָּה (misread בִּיגְתָּה) = O. Pers. bagadāta, 'given by God'; cp BAGOAS, and see ESTHER, ii. § 3.

BIGTHAN (בִּיגְתָּן , etymology doubtful; βαγαθαν [Nca mg. sup.]; BNAL om.; Jos. βαγαθωος), Esth. 22, or Bighthana, Esth. 62 (בִּיגְתָּן); בִּי as in 22; Jos. βιγαθαθωος , a chamberlain of Ahasuerus, who, in Esth. 12, is called GABATHA (γαβαθα [BNAL²]). See ESTHER, ii. § 3.

1. A leader (see EZRA, ii. § 8e) in the great post-exilic list (ib. ii. § 9), Ezra 22 (βιγουαι [B], βιγουαι [L]) = Neh. 77 (βιγοει [B], βιγουαι [A]) = 1 Esd. 58, AV REELIUS (βορολειου [BA], βιγουαι [L]); signatory to the covenant (see EZRA, i. § 7), Neh. 1026 [17] (βιγουαι [B], -οει [NA], βιγουαι [L]).

2. Family in great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. §§ 9, 8c), Ezra 214 (βιγοει [B], βιγουαι [Avid], -ουαι [L]) = Neh. 719 (βιγοει [BNA]) = 1 Esd. 514, BAGOI (βοσαι [B], βιγοει [A], -ουαι [L]).

3. Family in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA, i. § 2, ii. § 15 [i. a], Ezra 814 (βιγο [B], γαβουαι [A], γαβουια [L]) = 1 Esd. 840 BAGO (βαβαι [B], βιγο [A]). Cp HEGAI.

BILDAD (בִּלְדָּד , § 43, βαλλὰδ [BNAC], -δαδ [A]), the Shuhite (see SHUAH), one of Job's friends (Job 211 and elsewhere). The name either means 'Bel has loved' (cp Nöld. ZDMG 42 479 [188]), or is a softened form of Bir-dad, which appears to lie at the root of BEDAD (so Del. Par. 298). See ELIDAD, and cp DOD.

BILEAM (בִּלְעָם , § 77), 1 Ch. 670 [55]. See IBLEAM.

BILGAH (בִּלְגָּה , 'cheerfulness'?).

1. Head of the fifteenth course of priests, 1 Ch. 2414 (βελγα [A], -αδ [L]). בִּלְגָּה has εμμηρ , which must represent Immer, the head of the sixteenth course. (γελβα , the name of the head of the fourteenth in בִּלְגָּה [MT בִּלְגָּה]), is merely a transposed form of Bilgah in a different place in the list.)

2. A priest (βαλγας [Nca mg.], βελ [L]; om. BNA) in Zerubabel's band (EZRA, ii. § 62), Neh. 125; in v. 18 (βαλγα [Nca mg.], βελγας [L]; om. BNA) a 'father's house.' Cp also BILGAI.

BILGAI (βελγα[ε] [AL], -λγ[ε]ια [BN]), a priestly signatory to the covenant (see EZRA, i. §§ 6, 7), Neh. 108 [9]. No doubt the same as BILGAH.

BILHAH (בִּלְהָה ; βαλλα [BADEL], but 1 Ch. 713 βαλαμ [B], -λααμ [L]).

1. The 'mother' of the tribes Dan and Naphtali, according to J; also represented as the maid of Rachel (mother of the house of Joseph) and concubine of Jacob and his eldest son Reuben.

We have not, unfortunately, the means of determining how far we are warranted in regarding these relations as representing traditions of fact, and how far they may be imaginative incidents of the story. Was Bilhah, e.g., a tribe (Canaanitish? Aramean?), elements of which were taken up into some of the clans of the house of Joseph (the first Israel) in the earliest days after their arrival in W. Palestine before they crystallized into the three well-known branches (Manasseh-Machir, Ephraim, Benjamin)? Or does the name, which occurs nowhere outside of Genesis (and the equivalent 1 Ch. 713), simply indicate that not only Dan but once also Naphtali tried unsuccessfully to settle somewhere in the Highlands of Ephraim before betaking itself to the extreme north? Or, once more, is this true only of Dan, the inclusion of Naphtali being then due simply to its geographical nearness to Dan in its later seat, and to its worthiness to stand by the side of the noble Rachel tribes (Judg. 518)? Again, is the Reuben story (Gen. 3522 1 Ch. 51) to be brought into connection with the other traces of the extension of the house of Joseph (cp Reuben's interest in the fortunes of Joseph: Gen. 3722 29: E.) beyond Jordan (MACHIR; EPHRAIM, WOOD OF), or is it to be explained, as Stade (Gesch. 1119) explains it, as a memorial of the primitive society that survived E. of the Jordan when there had been a change in W. Palestine? Or are we to give serious consideration to a combination (G. H. B. Wright) with the story of BOHAN (cp BILHAH, 2) the son of Reuben (Josh. 156 1817), as an indication that Reubenite elements were once actually to be found W. of the Jordan ('in that land': Gen. 3522)? That there really was contact between Benjamin and the Bilhah tribe Dan was a matter of course; Ono and Lod ultimately became Benjamite (cp BENJAMIN, § 3; We. De Gent. 12 n. 1). It was Rachel, however, not Bilhah, that died when Ben-oni was born.

2. In Simeon (1 Ch. 429). See BAALAH, 2.

1. A HORITE (g.v.), Gen. 3627 (βαλαμ [D^{SH} EL]); 1 Ch. 142 (-αμ [BL]).

2. In genealogy of BENJAMIN (§ 9, ii. a): 1 Ch. 710 (βαλαμ [L]).

BILSHAN (בִּלְשָׁן , § 83; perhaps Bab. Belšun; but more probably we should read Bel-šar, a mutilated form of Bel-šar-ēzer—i.e., Bab. Bel-šar-usur;—cp בִּלְשָׁן in 1 Esd.). A name in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9), borne by one of the ten (Ezra), or eleven (Neh., 1 Esd.), persons who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon (see EZRA, ii. § 8e). Ezra 22 (βισσαν [B], βαλασσαν [A], -λασαν [L]) = Neh. 77 (βισσαν [N], βαασσαν [A], βαλσ. [B], L om.) = 1 Esd. 58 BEELSARUS (βελσαρου [BA], βαλσαρ [L]). If Bel-šar is correct, may not this be the Sharezer of Zech. 72 (see SHAREZER, 2)? This undesigned coincidence (if accepted) may have important bearings on criticism. T. K. C.

BIMHAL (בִּמְהָל), in genealogy of ASHER (§ 4 [ii.]), 1 Ch. 733 (ιμαβαηλ [B], βαμαηλ [A], βααμαθ [L]).

BINDING AND LOOSING (Mt. 1619 1818). The explanation given under MAGIC (§ 3 [4]) may account for the origin of the Jewish phrase 'binding' (אָמַר) and 'loosing' (הִתִּיר); but in usage 'to bind' and 'to loose' mean simply 'to forbid' and 'to permit' by an indisputable authority, the words of authoritative prohibition and permission being considered to be as effectual as the spell of an enchanter (cp אָמַר , Targ. Ps. 585[6]). The wise men or rabbis had, in virtue of their ordination, the power of deciding disputes relating to the Law. A practice which was permitted by them was said to be 'loosed' (מְהִיר), and one which was forbidden was called 'bound' (אָמַר). Such pronouncements were made by the different schools; hence it was said, 'The school of Shammai binds; the school of Hillel looses.' Theoretically, however, they proceeded from the Sanhedrin, and there is a Talmudic statement that there were three decisions made by the lower 'house of judgment' to which the upper 'house of judgment' (i.e., the heavenly one) gave its supreme sanction (Massoth, 23b). Probably, therefore, Jesus adopted a current mode of speech when he said to the disciples that whatsoever they bound or loosed on earth (i.e., in expounding the new Law) should be bound or loosed in heaven (Mt. 1818). Probably, too, it is a less authentic tradition which makes Jesus give the same promise to Peter individually (Mt. 16:19). Nowhere is it recorded that the great Teacher made Peter the president (רִאשׁוֹן) of his council of wise men. The words which immediately precede Mt. 16:19—self-evidently taken by the editor from another context—represent Peter, not as an expounder of the new transfigured Law, but as a practical administrator (cp Is. 22:22). It is in favour of the view here adopted (viz., that the words on 'binding' and 'loosing' were addressed to the disciples in general and not to Peter individually) that in Jn. 20:23 the power to remit and to retain is granted to the disciples collectively, not to any one of them individually. Though the use of κρατεῖν in that passage has no exact Hebrew or Aramaic equivalent, the saying is not a new one, but a paraphrase of Mt. 18:18.

BIRD. References to birds generally are very frequent in OT and NT.

The following terms (translated in EV 'bird' or 'fowl') are used to denote the members of the family Aves collectively:

1. Kinds referred to. ῥῆς, Eccles. 10:20 Is. 16:2 Hos. 9:11; רִיב, Gen. 7:14 Lev. 14:6 f. 51 f.; רִיב לְעַלְעַל, ba'al kânâph, Prov. 1:17; and [of birds of prey] רִיב, ayîf, Gen. 15:11 Is. 18:6 46:11 Jer. 12:9 Ezek. 89:4 Job 28:7 (|| רִיב, ayyâh); πετεινὰ and τὰ πετεινὰ, Mt. 8:20 13:32 Lk. 9:58 Rom. 1:23 Jas. 3:7; τὰ πτηνὰ, 1 Cor. 15:39, and [of birds of prey] ὄρνιθον, Rev. 18:2 19:17 21.

Birds of the smaller kinds are not so often distinguished as the larger; but special reference is made to several species, both large and small. Mention seems to be made, for example, of the BITTERN, Buzzard (see GLEDE), Blue Thrush (see SPARROW), CORMORANT, CRANE, DOVE, Egyptian Vulture (see GIER EAGLE), Griffon (see EAGLE), HAWK, HERON, HOOPOE, Sacred Ibis (see SWAN), KITE, NIGHT HAWK (?), OSPREY, OSSIFRAGE, OSTRICH, OWL, Pigeon (see DOVE), PARTRIDGE, PEACOCK, PELICAN, QUAIL, RAVEN, STORK, SWALLOW, Tern (see CUCKOW), Black Vulture (see VULTURE), and the domestic fowl (see COCK), details and discussions concerning all of which will be found in the special articles. SPARROW occurs occasionally in the EV as a translation of the word (צֹרֶף) which denoted any small passerine bird.

That feathered animals (חַיָּוִת אֲרָבִים) abounded in Palestine is clear from the many references to them in OT

2. Use. and NT, and lapse of time has produced no change in this respect (see PALESTINE). Naturally the eggs and the birds themselves were used for food (Ex. 16:12 f. Nu. 11:32 Job 66 Neh. 5:18 Ps. 78:27 Lk. 11:12 Acts 10:12 11:6; see FOWLS, §§ 4, 6, and cp FOOD, § 8); the Torah divides them into clean and unclean (Lev. 11:13 Dt. 14:20; see CLEAN and UNCLEAN, § 9). Many contrivances for capturing birds were in common use (Ps. 91:3 124:7 Prov. 1:17 6:5 7:23 Am. 3:5 Eccles. 9:12 Jer. 5:27 Hos. 7:12 9:8 Eccles. 11:30). The Torah protects them against cruelty (Dt. 22:6 f.). Sometimes the captives were tamed and treated as pets (Job 41:5 [40:29], Bar. 3:17 Eccles. 27:19 Jas. 3:7). Only in cases of extreme poverty does the Torah allow birds to be used for sacrifice (see SACRIFICE). Naturally, common small birds, on account of their abundance, were of little value; they were probably so numerous as to prove a nuisance (Mt. 10:29 31 Lk. 12:6 f.; cp Land and Book, 43). To what extent—if any—birds were studied for omens in Israel as in Babylonia (see BABYLONIA, § 32, MAGIC, BABYLONIAN, § 3) it is difficult to determine (see Lev. 19:26 Dt. 18:10 2 K. 21:6 2 Ch. 33:6 1 K. 4:33 [5:13], and cp DIVINATION, § 2, beg., and Schultz, OT Theol. 1:250 ff. ET).

Allusions to their habits in metaphors, similes, and proverbial expressions prove how prominent they were

3. Literary and popular allusions. in the life and thought of the people (cp AGRICULTURE, § 15, and see Lowth, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, Lect. vii. vol. i. ET 1787).

They were evidently observed with the keenest interest as being links between earth and heaven, and regarded with a certain awe (Job 12:7 28:21 35:11 Eccles. 10:20). It was noticed how they cared for and protected their young (Dt. 32:11 Ex. 19:4 Is. 31:5 Mt. 23:37); how and where they made their nests (Ps. 104:12 17 Ezek. 31:6)—sometimes (according to a pleasing but very doubtful interpretation) in the very temple itself¹ (Ps. 84:3 [4]); in what sad plight they wandered about when cast out of the nest (Prov. 27:8 Is. 16:2 Ps. 102:7 [8]); how swiftly they flew away when scared (Hos. 9:11 Ps. 11:1); how eagerly they returned to their nest (Hos. 11:11); how free from care they were (Mt. 6:26); how regularly they migrated (Jer. 8:7 Prov. 26:2); how voracious they were (Gen. 40:17 Mt. 13:4 Mk. 4:1 Lk. 8:5); how they descended from the clouds in a bevy (Eccles. 43:17), and with what delight they gathered in a leafy tree (Dan. 4:9 [12] Eccles. 27:9 Mt. 13:32 Lk. 13:19); how sweetly they warbled (Eccles. 12:4 Wisd. 17:18 Cant. 2:12 [see, however, VINE] Ps. 104:12); how God recognises and protects them (Ps. 50:11 Lk. 12:24); and how they praise and reverence him (Ps. 148:10 Ezek. 38:20). Further, Israel's enemy is often pictured as a rapacious bird that sights its prey afar off and swoops down upon it (Is. 46:11 Jer. 12:9² Dt. 28:49 Rev. 19:17 21). Thus, 'to destroy' is to give a man's flesh to the birds of the air for meat (Gen. 40:19 Dt. 28:26 1 S. 17:44 46 1 K. 14:11 16:4 21:24 Ps. 79:2 Jer. 7:33 16:4 19:7 34:20 Ezek. 29:5). A place is desolate when its only inhabitants are the birds of the air (Jer. Ezek. 31:13 32:4 Is. 18:6), and an utter desolation when even these too have perished (Jer. 4:25 12:4 Hos. 4:3 Zeph. 1:3). The saying in Mt. 8:20, where Jesus contrasts himself with the birds which have nests, has not yet been made perfectly clear (but see SON OF MAN).

¹ Cp WRS Rel.Sem. (2) 160, and Che.'s note, Psalms (1). The common view of the meaning is untenable on all grounds—exegetical, historical, metrical. 1. No natural exegesis can be given, if בִּרְשָׁא, 'thine altars', has any relation to the birds. 2. The sanctity of the temple proper would certainly have excluded the winged visitors; Jos. B/ v. 56 speaks of pointed spikes on the top of the (Herodian) temple to prevent birds from sitting even on the outside. This seems to have been generally overlooked. 3. The psalm consists of long verses (lines) divided by a caesura into two unequal parts. 'Thine altars, my King and my God,' is too much to form the second and shorter portion of one of these verses. See Che. Psalms, (2) and cp Baethg. ad loc. who attempts an exegetical compromise.

BIRTHDAY (יֹם הַיּוֹם, ἡμέρα γενεσεως [ADE], ἱ. H. [L], Gen. 4020; ΓΕΝΕCΙΑ [Ti. WH], Mt. 146 Mk. 621). The only express mention of the celebration of the anniversary of birth in OT or NT is in connection with kings: Pharaoh's birthday (Gen. 4020), when the 'chief butler' was restored to his office and the 'chief baker' hanged; Antiochus Epiphanes' birthday (2 Macc. 67);¹ and Herod's birthday (Mt. 146 Mk. 621), when Herodias's dancing was the occasion of the execution of John the Baptist. When it is said in Job 14 that Job's sons 'were wont to go and feast in the house of each one upon his day,' 'his day' denotes a weekly and not an annual feast; and in Hos. 75 'the day of our king' may refer to the anniversary of his succession quite as well as to a birthday. However, this silence on the subject is no warrant for us to conclude that the Israelites did not follow the general custom of observing birthdays, especially those of kings (see, for Egypt, R^P 477, and for Persia, Herod. 9110). The curses invoked by Job (31-12) and Jeremiah (2014-18) on the days of their birth imply that under happier conditions these days would have been remembered in more cheerful fashion.

Doubts have been raised as to whether Herod's γενέσια meant his birthday or the anniversary of his accession. The Mishna (Aboda Zara, 13) mentions as heathen festivals, calends, saturnalia, κρατήσεις, kings' days of γενέσια (יום גניסא), and the day of birth and the day of death. It is probable that the last two mean the actual days and not the anniversaries; the κρατήσεις would naturally be the anniversaries of accessions and the יום גניסא the birthday. So Talm. Jer. Aboda Zara, 139c takes יום גניסא as יום הלידה (birthday), but Bab. Aboda Zara, 10a understands יום גניסא as anniversary of accession. Γενέσια is used as birthday in late Greek (in classical Greek it is anniversary of death) and never as anniversary of accession; thus the sense of birthday seems well established. It either means 'in peace,' cp BEZALEEL, BIRSHA, or, more probably, like those names, it is a corruption. The true name may be Babylonian. It may perhaps be recovered if we start from one or the other of the forms presented in the MSS of 1 Esd., where the proper names are sometimes more accurately preserved. Ball (Var. Apocr. ad loc.), adopting βήλεμος, supposes a corruption of Bab. Bel-ibus—i.e., 'Bel made.' It would seem, however, that the βεελσιμος of EB^A must be more original, and this form may have arisen from Bel-šum-iškun—i.e., 'Bel made a name' (Nestle, Marg. 23, 29).

The elders of the church, summoned from Ephesus to Miletus to receive Paul's farewell charge (Acts 2017), are thus addressed: 'Take heed to yourselves and to the whole flock, wherein the Holy Ghost hath set you

1. Occurrence of name in NT. as overseers (ὡς . . . ἑθετο ἐπισκόπους) to feed (or rule: ποιμαίνειν) the church of God' (v. 28). It is not clear from this passage whether the word is used as a definite title, or merely as a description implying that ἐπισκοπή, oversight or superintendence, was a function of the presbyterate. In the address of the Epistle to the Philippians, however, we have 'bishops and deacons' formally mentioned; it is difficult, in view of the later usage of the words, to suppose that this is merely a general description of 'those who rule and those who serve.' In 1 Tim. 31ff. the bishop and the deacon are again brought together. The qualifications of a bishop are enumerated: δὲ οὖν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ., where the article is commonly regarded as generic, or at least as not implying that there was only one bishop in the Ephesian church. In Tit. 15ff., in connection with the duty of appointing presbyters in the towns of Crete, a similar description of a bishop's qualifications is given (δὲ γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ.); but no reference is made to deacons. The only other occurrence of the word is in 1 Pet. 225, where it is applied to Christ himself, 'the shepherd and bishop of your souls.' It is not necessary to interpret these titles as metaphors drawn from the Christian ministry.

We note, then, that the word is found in all cases on Greek ground, and it would seem as if those who in the Palestinian churches were called 'presbyters' were in the Greek churches spoken of at first as 'bishops' and then indifferently as 'presbyters' or as 'bishops.' This view, however, assumes that ἐπίσκοπος was already at this time in use as a title of office; and the assumption requires a careful examination. It will be best to begin such an examination with what is admittedly the latest portion of the NT evidence.

1 Tim. 31ff. 'If a man seeketh ἐπισκοπή he desireth a good work. The bishop, therefore, must be without reproach,' etc. (εἴ τις ἐπισκοπῆς

2. (a) Pastoral Epistles. ὀρέγεται καλοῦ ἔργου ἐπιθυμεῖ. δὲ οὖν τὸν ἐπίσκοπον ἀνεπίλημπτον εἶναι κ.τ.λ.). The whole conception of the function of an ἐπίσκοπος, as it is here described, suggests that the authority which he wields is independent, not merely that of a member of a governing board. To begin with, ἐπισκοπή does not give any idea of assessors: it is distinctly personal. It is a position of independent importance and control, such as a man may naturally desire. Secondly, the epithet 'given to hospitality' (φιλόξενος) suggests a personal responsibility; the Church's duty of showing hospitality to Christians from other parts seems naturally to centre in some one person; we could scarcely have had 'Presbyters must be given to hospitality' (δὲ οὖν πρεσβυτέρους φιλοξένους εἶναι). In like manner, 'apt to teach' (διδασκτικός) would scarcely be a qualification for a member of the presbyterial body as such; and the same may be said of the epithets μὴ πάροινος, μὴ πλῆκτης, 'not passionate or ungoverned in temper.' The control of his own house, again, gives the thought of independent jurisdiction in the case to which it is made a parallel—'how shall he act as ἐπιμελητής of the church of God?'

The singular noun with the article may, according to Greek usage, be taken generically; but we must observe that (1) when the writer passes on to give a similar list of qualifications for a deacon the plural is used: 'Deacons in like manner . . . Women in like manner . . . Let deacons be husbands of one wife' [διακόνους ὡσαύτως . . . γυναῖκας ὡσαύτως . . . διάκονοι ἑστῶσαν μίᾱς γυναίκος ἄνδρες (in the last case the use of the singular with the generic article would have avoided an awkward phrase)]; (2) in Tit. 17, we have an exact parallel: δὲ γὰρ τὸν ἐπίσκοπον κ.τ.λ., where we might easily have had δὲ γὰρ ἐπισκόπους κ.τ.λ.; (3) the usage of the article in the Pastoral Epistles is a further reason for hesitating to explain it here as generic, for the article is very sparingly employed, and there seems no example at all parallel to these in any of the three Epistles.

The difficulty is to some extent met by insisting on the use of ἐπισκοπος as a descriptive epithet rather than as a formal title: 'He who exercises ἐπισκοπή.' In so far as his status in the Church is dwelt on, such a man would be spoken of most naturally as 'one of the elders'; but here the subject in hand is the function to be exercised by him individually. That function is ἐπισκοπή: in the exercise of it he is ἐπίσκοπος. The watchful oversight which is regarded as 'an excellent work' is not an eminent position, but a responsible activity. He who is to exercise it needs to have certain special qualifications. We feel the contrast when we come to διακόνους ὡσαύτως, which introduces in an ordinary way the members of a large and subordinate class.

The passage in Acts 20 is, as we have seen, quite indeterminate. If ἐπίσκοπος can be shown to be a title in use at the time in question, we may render the words, 'hath set you as bishops.' Otherwise we should perhaps render them, 'hath set you for oversight.' The phrase in the Epistle to the Philippians, if taken quite by itself, would, in the light of later history, be naturally rendered 'with the bishops and deacons' (σὺν ἐπισκόποις καὶ διακόνους), notwithstanding the absence of the definite article. If, however, ἐπίσκοπος be not yet found as a title, a less definite interpretation may be allowed. The decision between the two views must depend on a further consideration which shall include the use of the term διάκονος at this period [see DEACON, § 6], and the use of ἐπίσκοπος outside the NT, in other than Christian contexts, and in the earliest Christian writings.

In the use of ἐπίσκοπος, ἐπισκοπεῖν, in other than Christian contexts, a great width of meaning is noticeable, due, no doubt, to the original significance which fitted the words for application to any person who exercised an office of superintendence. The commissioners who superintended Athenian colonies, various other commissioners or inspectors, magistrates who regulated the sale of provisions, and, apparently, financial officers of a temple or of a guild (Lightf. Phil. 95; Hatch, Organisation of Early Christian Churches, 37 f.)—all these are spoken of as ἐπίσκοποι, or are said ἐπισκοπεῖν. Nor was this the only term which had a similar largeness of reference: quite parallel is the usage of ἐπιμελεῖν and ἐπιμελητής (Hatch, see above).

In the LXX the word ἐπίσκοπος is equally wide in the persons and offices which it embraces. Taskmasters, captains or presidents, and commissioners, are in turn so entitled; and as a synonym in the last of these cases we find also ἐπίσταται (Lightf.; see above).

All this evidence points to the fact that ἐπίσκοπος and ἐπισκοπεῖν were words which naturally offered themselves as descriptions of any persons charged with responsible oversight, and were the more available in that they had no predominant association with any one class of officers in particular. The words were, as far as possible, colourless, much as our words 'preside' and 'president' are to-day.

Hatch's position, adopted by Harnack, in reference to ἐπίσκοποι is as follows:—The most important corporate function of the earliest Christian communities was that of providing for their poor and sick members. They were, in fact, benevolent societies, and as such they had parallels all around them in the heathen world, in the countless clubs and guilds which combined social purposes with certain religious practices. The finance officers of these heathen societies were called ἐπίσκοποι. Now, the duties which the Christian ἐπίσκοπος had to perform are described as intimately connected with the care of the poor, with hospitality to travelling brethren, and with the management of the common fund which was devoted to these and similar purposes. It is probable, therefore, that both the title and the functions of the Christian ἐπίσκοπος are directly derived from his heathen counterpart.

The best examination of this theory is that by Loening (Gemeindeverfassung des Urchristentums, 21 ff.).

6. Criticism of it.

After pointing out the very general signification of the word ἐπίσκοπος in Greek literature—a signification which enabled it to be applied to any person in authority for whom there was no fixed title already, and so to be used with great freedom by the LXX as a rendering for various officers mentioned in the OT—he takes up the evidence of the inscriptions on which Hatch's theory mainly rests. They fall chronologically into two classes. The first class is pre-Christian: one inscription of the Macedonian period in the island of Thera, which contains a decree ordering certain ἐπίσκοποι to receive moneys and invest them; and two inscriptions of the second century B.C., in the island of Rhodes, relating to municipal officers not further defined. Those of the second class belong to the second and the third century A.D., and are found in a district E. of the Jordan. They are ten, and refer to municipal officers. In one case the officers are charged with some responsibility for the moneys of a temple. In this district they seem to have formed a kind of municipal board, chosen from various tribes or divisions of the community. Further, in a Latin inscription of the fourth century certain episcopi regulate prices in the market.

This appears to be the whole of the evidence on which the statement that ἐπίσκοποι were the finance-officers of clubs and guilds is found to rest. In Loening's opinion it points exactly in the opposite direction.

As to the other part of the argument,—viz., that the Christian ἐπίσκοπος is, as a matter of fact, a finance-officer,—that is no peculiarity of function linking itself especially to the title. To the presbyters at Jerusalem gifts are brought; and presbyters are warned not to exercise their office 'for filthy lucre' (EV; αἰσχροκερδῶς, 1 Pet. 5a); moreover, in Polycarp's letter to the Philippians (chap. 11) presbyters are charged with duties towards the poor and are warned against covetousness. The word ἐπίσκοπος in itself suggests a far wider responsibility than the mere charge of finance: it implies superintendence of persons as well as of things.

Loening even goes so far as to suggest that the word ἐπίσκοπος was chosen just because it had no fixed associations either in the Jewish or in the Greek world, and was, therefore, free to be used in a community which stood in contrast to all other communities surrounding it.

In the extreme scarcity of evidence, we may be content to say that the theory that the Christian ἐπίσκοπος derived his title and functions from those of the officers of the Greek guilds or of the Greek municipalities has not been established.

We may say, then, that the NT evidence seems to point to the existence in the apostolic age of two classes of administration—a class of rulers and a class of humbler ministrants who acted under their orders. As far as the first of these has a distinctive official title its members are called Elders; but, since their function was summed up in the general responsibility of oversight (ἐπισκοπή), they could be spoken of as 'overscers' (ἐπίσκοποι), a term which was already passing from a mere description of function into a definite title. The men of the second class aided those of the first in the humbler parts of their ministration. They were naturally described by the general designation of 'servants' (διάκονοι); but this term too is passing in the apostolic age into a recognised title. On the whole, it seems simpler to suppose that the latter stage has been reached in Phil. 1:1 and in the Pastoral Epistles; but the decision of this point is not a matter of serious importance.

In the later history, the second class retains its designation, which in some localities comes to be a title of considerable dignity. The first class, on the other hand, presently undergoes a subdivision: one member comes to stand out above his fellows, and, whilst all continue alike to be Elders, the title of ἐπίσκοπος, which in itself connotes an individual responsibility and importance, is not unnaturally appropriated as the designation of the one who has come to be the supreme officer of the community. The causes which led to a monarchical development are still wrapt in obscurity; but the appropriation of the name ἐπίσκοπος to the chief ruler is not hard to understand. We are fortunate in possessing a document of the last decade of the first century, by which we can, to some extent, test the position which we have taken up. The Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians was occasioned by the ejection from their office of certain Elders of the church in Corinth. As the writer may quite well have had personal knowledge of one or more of the apostles, his evidence is of high importance, not only for determining the existing organisation of the church in Corinth (and probably in Rome as well) in his time, but also as indicating the belief that this organisation was instituted by the apostles themselves.

First let us consider the use of the designations in question in the most important passage.

(§ 42) 'The apostles . . . appointed their first fruits (cp 1 Cor. 10:15), having tested them by the Spirit, to be overseers and servants (ἐπισκόπους καὶ διακόνους) of them which should believe.' The words have clearly become titles, and their use as such is justified as being not new, but foretold in Is. 61:6. It is curious that διακόνους in this citation is an insertion of Clement's, and is not found in the LXX. He is clearly quoting from memory, and his memory has played him false. (§ 44) 'The apostles foresaw that there would be strife about the title (or 'office') of oversight (περὶ τοῦ ἐνόςματος τῆς ἐπισκοπῆς).' Hence they appointed the aforesaid and provided for successors to them. It is a sin to turn such, if they have discharged their ministry blamelessly, out of their ἐπισκοπή. 'Blessed,' he goes on at once, 'are the Elders who have gone before,' and are safe from such treatment. In § 47 we have the offence described as a revolt 'against the Elders'; in § 54 we read 'Let the flock of Christ be at peace along with the appointed Elders'; and in § 57, 'Do ye who began this sedition submit yourselves to the Elders.'

It is plain, then, that the persons whom the apostles 'appointed as ἐπίσκοποι,' and as their successors, are spoken of also as 'the appointed Elders.' These Elders are not to be rashly ejected from their λειτουργία or ἐπισκοπή.

The difficulty which Clement's epistle presents in the matter of these designations belongs to the earlier chapters, before he has come to speak definitely of the Corinthian disorders: he seems to use the term 'elders' as though he referred not to an office, but only to a grade of persons dignified by that name in contrast to the young (οἱ νέοι).

In the first of the passages in question (§ 2) he praises their former orderliness, 'submitting yourselves to your rulers (or "leaders," τοῖς ἡγουμένοις ὑμῶν), and paying the due honour to the elders that were among you: and on the young ye enjoined modesty and gravity; and on the women' certain appropriate duties. Similarly, in § 21 we have, 'let us reverence our rulers (τοῖς προηγούμενοις ἡμῶν), and let us honour our elders, let us instruct the young . . . let us guide our women aright.' Here we seem to have a contrast between 'rulers' and 'elders': and it has been held (e.g., by Harnack) that the 'rulers' are a class of persons whose authority came from their possessing the charisma of teaching (cp Heb. 13:7 24), whilst the Elders are an undefined grade of senior members of the Church to whom honour is due on account of age and length of discipleship. But the word νέοι, occurring in both passages (not νεώτεροι, as elsewhere so often), is an important clue, which has not been sufficiently attended to. Clement is in fact alluding to a passage of Isaiah, which he cites with some additions in § 3: 'so,' he says, 'of old the mean rose up against the honourable, the young against the elder (οἱ νέοι ἐπὶ τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις),' Is. 35:10. It would be possible to interpret 'the rulers' as the civil rulers to whom Clement several times applied the term ἡγούμενοι (§ 37); but on the whole it seems most natural to suppose that at first he is carefully avoiding definite references to the Corinthian revolt, and only preparing the way for its direct rebuke. Thus he speaks in the most general terms of 'the rulers,' and passes rapidly away from the word 'elders,' just introducing it as a hint beforehand, but dwelling on the root-meaning which was still strongly felt in the word, and contrasting it with οἱ νέοι in accordance with the OT passage which is in his mind.

No argument, therefore, can safely be based on the rhetorical use of the word 'elders' in the opening part of the letter. No doubt the Elders were elder men; and no doubt the revolt came from some of the younger men: this was a part of its heinousness, and the covert allusion would be understood by those to whom the letter was addressed.

The development of the monarchical episcopate lies outside the limits of the NT; but even 9. Later development. within the Canon we find indications of a tendency which the later history enables us to interpret as moving in this direction.

We have noticed that all passages which describe the functions and responsibilities of Elders speak of them as a class and in the plural number; whilst, on the other hand, where the duties of oversight (ἐπισκοπή) are portrayed, the ἐπίσκοπος is spoken of as a single person, charged with responsibility—and this in one place in sharp contrast to the διάκονοι, and in the other immediately after Elders have been mentioned in the plural number. From this we may gather that, in as far as a member of the ruling class was thought of as ἐπίσκοπος, it was natural to consider him by himself as exercising an independent control and holding a position of eminent authority.

As far as terminology, then, is concerned, the way was prepared for the distinction that presently came into force.

10. 'Episcopos' easily individualised. The word ἐπίσκοπος suggests an individual, just as the word πρεσβύτερος suggests the member of a ruling class, or the word διάκονος the member of a serving class. The class of rulers, however, did not need two designations, and when the course of development led to a supreme officer it was easy and natural to appropriate to him the word ἐπίσκοπος, while his inferior colleagues were simply termed πρεσβύτεροι.

But this consideration does not really give us any guidance as to the causes of the change from government

11. Change foreshadowed in NT. by a body of co-ordinate ἐπίσκοποι or πρεσβύτεροι to government by a single ἐπίσκοπος with a consultative college of πρεσβύτεροι, among whom he is primus inter pares. The apostolic age, however, presents us with several foreshadowings of the monarchical rule which presently became universal. In the church in Jerusalem the position of James, the Lord's brother, was one of real if undefined authority, and, though not marked by any special title, it closely resembles that of the bishop of the second century. We have the statement of Hegesippus that on the death of James his cousin Symeon was appointed by general consent to fill his place (Eus. HE iii. 11). Here, then, was a monarchical type of government, naturally evolved and continuously recognised; and such an example could not fail, as time went on, to exercise an influence on other communities.

In the Greek world the churches of Paul's foundation were from the first controlled by the strong hand of their founder. It is true that he urged them to corporate action of their own in the exercise of jurisdiction and discipline; but he himself commanded them with an authority beyond challenge, and his commands were obeyed. In certain cases he transferred this his apostolic authority to delegates, such as Timothy and Titus; but only, it would seem, for a period, and in order to cope with special needs. Still, in doing this, he had given a practical proof of the advantage gained by the presence in a community of one who could rule with supreme authority; and this temporary sway would doubtless help in determining the tendency of subsequent development.

These examples, however, would have been powerless

by themselves to produce so great a change, had there not been elements in the life of the communities which made for the concentration of authority in particular hands. It is often said that such an element is discoverable in the working of the presbyteral college itself. Any board which meets for the transaction of business must needs have a president. The holder of this position would naturally acquire a large share of the authority of the board itself; in time he would tend to become a supreme officer over the whole community. This suggestion is open to two serious criticisms. On the one hand, there is no ground for thinking that in parallel cases at that period such a development from oligarchical to monarchical rule came about. Presidents of this kind were often elected for a month or for a year, and in any case did not acquire an independent authority. Moreover, the term 'presbyteral college' may be challenged, if it is intended to suggest that the practical administration of the Church was carried on by means of formal meetings of the Elders as such. We have no evidence of any kind that they regularly met in this way. It is probable that they had special seats in the assembly of the community; but that they met by themselves for the transaction of business and required a chairman is a hypothesis for which no evidence has yet been given.

It is only when we turn our attention away from the administration and fix it on the common worship of the church, that we begin to get any rays of light on this problem. If we knew better the history of the eucharist, it is not unlikely that the history of the episcopate would cease to be so perplexing. In the disorders which disgraced the Lord's Supper in Corinth, and in Paul's regulations for checking them, we hear nothing at all of any kind of presidency or leadership. In the same church before the end of the century we find elders spoken of as the leaders of the eucharistic worship and as 'offering the gifts.'

The picture which, fifty years later, Justin draws of the eucharist in Rome, shows us a single officer, spoken of simply as 'the president' (ὁ προεστὼς τῶν ἀδελφῶν), receiving and offering the eucharistic elements, and making the eucharistic prayer, to which the whole congregation responds with the AMEN (§ 3). Likewise, after the reading of the Gospels or the Prophets 'the president' makes an exhortation based upon what has been read. He is, moreover, the depository of the collection made in behalf of the poor, and has a general responsibility for widows and orphans, for the sick and needy, for prisoners, and for travelling brethren from other communities (Ap. i. 65-67). This president is clearly the bishop, though Justin's language does not help us to decide whether he was at that time known in Rome by the title ἐπίσκοπος or not. If he was, it by no means follows that Justin would have said so. He is writing for heathen readers, and he avoids technical terms; or, if he finds it convenient to use them, he explains them. Thus, in speaking of the deacons, he describes them as 'those who with us are called διάκονοι' (οἱ καλούμενοι παρ' ἡμῶν διάκονοι); and his usual term for the Gospels is 'the memoirs of the apostles,' to which in one place he adds 'which are called gospels' (ἃ καλεῖται εὐαγγέλια). We can argue nothing from the absence of the designation 'bishop': had he cared to introduce it, he would no doubt have done so by the phrase 'he who with us is called ἐπίσκοπος' (ὁ καλούμενος παρ' ἡμῶν ἐπίσκοπος). But the person is there, if the name is not; and we see that important collateral functions belong to the officer who presides at the eucharistic service. He appears as at once the instructor and the almoner of the whole community.

It is a long step, however, from Clement to Justin, and it is of some importance to us that we should have evidence of a like development in other parts of the Church. Two passages may be cited which point in the same direction for the eastern side of the Mediterranean.

15. Eastern Church. 1. In the Didache (chap. 10 f.) the prophets are spoken of as holding a position of special importance in reference to the eucharist: they are not bound by the prescribed formulae of thanksgivings, but may 'give thanks as they will.' This implies that, if present, they naturally take a prominent part in the service. They may order an agapē to be held (ὁρίξω τράπεζαν); and to them the first fruits are to be given, 'for they are your chief-priests' (chap. 13). The same document declares, however, that the ministry (λειτουργία) of the prophets and teachers was likewise exercised by the bishops and deacons (chap. 15). It is safe to suppose that if no prophet were present the conduct of the service would be in the hands of the permanent local ministry, although in this case there would be no exemption from the duty of using the prescribed formulae.

2. The Ignatian Epistles, as is well known, portray the completed development of the three orders for certain Asiatic churches at a comparatively early period. It is noteworthy that the one bishop is expressly connected with the one eucharist (for references, see EUCHARIST). No eucharist is to be held without the bishop, or some person deputed by him to conduct it. There is 'One bishop, one altar, one eucharist' (εἰς ἐπίσκοπος, ἐν θυσιαστήριον, μία εὐχαριστία).

We may feel confident, then, that in the development of the eucharistic service we have an element—perhaps the most important element—of the development of the monarchical episcopate.

As soon as this monarchical rule had been established in a church various sacred parallels which would be taken as confirmatory of the divine order of the institution, would be observed. The bishop and his presbyters might be compared with Christ and his apostles. Or again, the three orders of the Christian Church—bishop, presbyters, and deacons—would find a ready analogy in the high priest, priests, and Levites of the Jewish ritual. Such parallels would serve to confirm the validity of the institution, and would facilitate its adoption in other localities.

Meanwhile, the extraordinary ministry of apostles and prophets had passed or was rapidly passing away. Some of the functions which they had exercised were essential in the Church; and these devolved as a heritage upon the permanent ministry. The prestige which had attached to their exercise passed over in the main to the chief officers of the community, who thus came to be regarded, with a large measure of truth, as the successors of the apostles, wielding apostolic authority as the rulers of the Church and the defenders of the Christian faith.

BITHIAH (בִּיתְיָה; פֶּלִיא [U], בֶּעֱתִיָּה [A], פֶּלֶא-תְּוִיָּה [L]), 'daughter of Pharaoh,' and wife of Mered ben Ezra, in the genealogy of JUDAH (1 Ch. 4.18). On the assumption that 'Pharaoh' (פֶּלֶא) is correctly read, Bithiah (which might be explained 'daughter—i.e., worshipper—of Yahwe' [Olsh. § 277 b]) might be a Hebraised form of an Egyptian name such as Bint-Anat, 'daughter of Anta' ('Anath), to indicate that the bearer of the name had entered the Israelitish community.

This, however, does not accord with the view implied in the vowels of the name of Bithiah's husband. Mered apparently means 'rebellion,' and suggests a warning against the wickedness of taking foreign wives (see Ezra 9.1, and cp 2 Ch. 24.26). It would be inconsistent with this that Mered's wife should bear the honourable name 'daughter of Yahwè': we should expect to find the old heathen name retained. Perhaps, then, Bithiah is not the right name; Θ 's $\gamma\epsilon\lambda\iota\alpha$ suggests to Kittel $\epsilon\lambda\iota\alpha$, and Θ 's $\phi\alpha\theta\theta\upsilon\alpha$ may conceivably be based on $\beta\alpha\theta\iota\alpha$, which in turn may have sprung from $\beta\alpha\theta\iota\alpha$, producing a description of Mered's non-Jewish wife as 'a young Egyptian princess' (Mered's other wife 'the Jewess' [Jehudijah (q.v.)] is not named). However, the corruption is antecedent to Θ , and the whole story (half-told, half-implied, by the text as it now stands) is imaginary. The idea of the double marriage of Mered had not occurred to the original compiler; the true text conveys no warning against mixed marriages. Four at least out of the five names, Mered, Bithiah, Pharaoh, Jehudijah, and Hodiah, are corrupt; perhaps indeed all five are. Mered, or, more strictly, M-R-D, has probably come from M-R-TH, which is an incorrect form of R-M-TH—i.e., Ramoth—or rather of Jarmuth (see MERED). 'Bithiah' is not improbably a corruption of 'Bealiah' ($\beta\epsilon\lambda\iota\alpha$, 1 Ch. 12:5 [Gi. Bā. 6]). Pharaoh should rather be $\beta\epsilon\lambda\iota\alpha$, a clan name (cp PIRATHON). Ha-Jehudijah (RV^{ms}) and Hodiah are plainly the same name (in v. 19 read $\alpha\eta\omega\eta$, 'his wife'). Accepting this view, we have two accounts of the family of Mered. It is not quite certain, however, that the person mis-called Mered is represented as having two wives. Hodiah may have been deliberately substituted for Bealiah, from a dislike to the first element in that name.

We are now rid of the only case in the OT of a name compounded with Jah ($\gamma\alpha$)—of such names there are 157—being borne by a foreigner (cp Gray, HPN 158). Next, another mistake has to be noted. It is plain that 1 Ch. 4:17 as it stands is not right. The remedy is (with Berth. and Kitt.) to transpose v. 18b to the middle of v. 17, inserting of course $\eta\gamma\lambda\iota\alpha$ after $\mu\alpha\eta\iota\mu$. This gives us, as the children of Bithiah or Bealiah, Miriam (?), Shanumai, and Ishbah the father of Eshtemoa. Eshtemoa also occurs (together with Keilah) in the list of the children of Hodiah (v. 19), while Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah are connected with Mered through Hodiah's double, Ha-Jehudijah—an important notice (see MERED). It is perhaps sad to have lost what was supposed to be an early testimony to the presence of an Egyptian element at and about Eshtemoa, as contrasted with the more purely Jewish character of Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah; but we gain an attestation of the traditional importance of Jarmuth. It may be added that in Jewish legend Bithiah becomes the foster-mother of Moses (Vayyikra, R., par. 1).

For the sense of Bithron cp Θ 's rendering of $\beta\alpha\theta\iota\alpha$ in Cant. 2:17 (67q) $\kappa\alpha\iota\omega\mu\acute{\alpha}\tau\omega\upsilon$ (like $\kappa\alpha\iota\lambda\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$ in Θ for $\epsilon\kappa\kappa$). The reading Bithron is not certain, and the Vss. give little help,¹ although Vg. 1. Geography. of the Rhyndacus (Edrenos Chai) eastwards to that of the Sangarius.

The boundary between Bithynia and the province of Asia coincided, not, as might have been expected, with the line of the Rhyndacus, but with that of the range of the Mysian Olympus (Keshish Dag) lying N. of the river (Pliny, HN 5:142). The eastern frontier is often made to coincide with the Billaos or with the Parthenios, or even to extend beyond the latter river, in spite of Strabo's statement that the mouth of the Sangarius marked the boundary (543, $\tau\eta\eta\ \beta\iota\theta\gamma\iota\alpha\ \delta\epsilon\iota\chi\epsilon\iota\ \pi\acute{\rho}\sigma\ \tau\alpha\iota\varsigma\ \epsilon\kappa\beta\omicron\lambda\alpha\iota\varsigma$). Inland, it ran out far E. of the river; but the line is indeterminate. According to Pliny (HN 5:140), the Hieros or Siberis separated Bithynia from the province Galatia; but the boundary fell some 12 m. E. of that stream (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of A.M. 195), whence it ran W. between the Sangarius and its tributary, the Tembris.

The will of Nicomedes III., the last of its kings, left Bithynia to the Romans in 74 B.C.; but it was not until 64 B.C., when the sultan of Pontus had been finally expelled from Asia, that Pompeius could undertake the organisation of the province (cp Plin. Ep. ad Trai. 79). With it was now combined the whole of the kingdom of Pontus, with the exception of those districts towards the E., as well as those in the interior (Paphlagonia), which were assigned to native dynasts in recognition of their services to Rome (Str. 541. See Niese in Hermes, 1839, and Rhein Mus. 38:567 [83]). Amisos, which lay immediately E. of the Halys (Kizil Irmak), was the most easterly community of that part of Pontus which was combined with the old kingdom of Nicomēdes to form the Roman province.

This dual origin of the province was recognised in its official title, Pontus et Bithynia (so generally in inscriptions, both Lat. and Gr.; cp Appian, Mithr. 121, CIG 3532 3548, CIL 55262). The reverse order is perhaps upon the whole later, encouraged by the gradual growth in importance of the western section. Either name, apparently, might be used to denote the entire province (cp Tac. Ann. 12:21 with Dio Cas. 60:33; CIG 2590, Bull. Hell. 11212). In administration also the two parts retained a certain degree of formal independence, each having its own metropolis and Diet (concilium).

In the distribution of provinces by Augustus in 27 B.C. Pontus-Bithynia remained senatorial—i.e., its governors, who were of Praetorian rank, bore the title 'proconsul' (Str. 840, Tac. Apostolic Ann. 174 1618). The official residence was Nicomedeia. Under the ineffective supervision of the Senate the province gradually became disorganised: its finances fell into disorder, and unregulated collegia gave birth to turbulence and faction. In order to carry out the necessary reforms, the younger Pliny was sent into the province in 112 A.D. His importance arises from his official contact with Christianity (Epp. ad Trai. 96 and 97. See Hardy, Pliny's Correspondence, 51 f., Rams. Church, 196 f., and cp CHRISTIAN, § 6 f.).

In the early period of post-apostolic history Bithynia is illustrious; but it has little connection with the apostles themselves. The salutation of 1 Pet. 1:1, where Pontus and Bithynia are mentioned separately, bears witness to the rapid evangelisation of the province. Before 112 A.D. Christianity had made such progress in Bithynia that pagan ritual was interrupted and the temples in great part deserted (Pliny, Ep. ad Trai. 96). We get a hint that there, as in Ephesus, trade interests were at the bottom of the attack then made upon the Christians. The contagio istius superstitionis (superstitio prava immodica), as Pliny calls the faith, would most easily enter the province by way of Amisos, along the route leading from the Cilician Gates by Tyāna and Caesarea Mazāca in Cappadocia. Ramsay (Church, 225) conjectures from Pliny's letter that its introduction must fall about 65-75 A.D.

Amisos is now Samsūn. Even in Strabo's time it was gradually displacing Sinōpe (Sinub) as the great harbour on the north coast. The route from Caesarea Mazāca northwards via Aque Saravene, Euagina, and Amāseia, to Amisos, is even to-day 'the only road practicable for arabs, and must always have been a great trade-route' (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of A.M., 268).

The interpretation of the word Bithynia in Acts 16:7 is connected with the question concerning the Galatian churches (see GALATIA). On the N.

4. Acts 16:7. Galatian theory, the object of Paul's vain attempt to enter Bithynia must have been to reach either Amisos or Amastris; for a design of preaching in the barbarous interior is improbable. The direct route to Amastris went, it is true, by way of Ancyra in Galatia;

but on the other hand no such route could have brought the apostle 'over against Mysia' (so RV; κατὰ ῥῆν Μυσίαν). Further, both in Roman and in ordinary usage Amastria, and still more Amisus, was a city of Pontus, not of Bithynia; and only the word Pontus could have been allowable as a single term to express the dual province to which it belonged (as is clear from Str. 541 compared with 543, in speaking of Heraclea). The expression 'to go into Bithynia' can only be taken to imply W. Bithynia—i.e., the district round Nicæa and Nicomedeia, where the wealth and administrative machinery of the province were centred. Dorylaion (Eski-shehr), only a few miles S. of the Bithynian frontier, was the point to which all the roads from the south converged; Paul and his companions must have been somewhere in this neighbourhood when they were suddenly diverted westwards (Acts 167). BITTER HERBS, BITTERNESS (מְרִירִים; ὀκρίδες.¹ lactuca agrestes, Ex. 128 Nu. 911; ὀκρίδια, amaritudines, Lam. 315; in Mishna also in sing.) are twice mentioned along with מַצּוֹת as the accompaniment of the paschal feast. Probably such herbs—whether separately or mixed—as lettuce (Lactuca Scariola, var. saliva), chicory (Cichorium Intybus), and endive (Cichorium Endivia) are meant. Doubtless they originally came into use simply as a relish or salad,² though the prescription of them in the Law may have to do with the atoning significance of the Passover; their association with the sufferings of the people in Egypt is probably a later view (Nowack, HA 2173). See, further, PASS-OVER.

'Bitter herbs,' rather than 'bitterness' (עַרְבָּרִים, EV), seems to be the proper rendering in Lam. 315, where מְרִירִים answers to מַעֲכָה, 'wormwood,' in the parallel clause.

BITTERN, RV Porcupine (בִּטְמֶן, εχίνος,³ ericius; Is. 1423 3411 Zeph. 214†). The identity of this animal (Heb. kippod) is far from certain: opinions of great variety have been held.

The ancient versions unanimously render 'Hedgehog' (or 'Porcupine'—the two were scarcely distinguished), and this is in general supported by Jewish tradition, though Rashi thinks that in Is. 3411 Zeph. 214 a bird is meant, and D. Kimhi interprets 'Tortoise' in all three passages (see their commentaries in loc.). Of modern Bibles Wycliffe's has in all three places 'Urchin,' and so Luther (followed as usual by the Dutch), 'Igel.' Junius and Tremellius in their Latin OT render anataria ('duck-eagle'); Coverdale, followed by the Great Bible, has 'Otter' in Is. 1423 and 'Stork' in Is. 3411 Zeph. 214, while the Geneva Bible has in Isaiah 'Hedgehog' (1423 mg. or 'tortoise'), and in Zephaniah 'Owl' (mg. or 'hedgehog'). The French Protestant version seems alone to have anticipated AV in the rendering 'butor' (mg. ou 'bièvre'). The Roman Catholic Bibles follow the Vulgate.⁵

The etymology of the Hebrew word is not, however, uncertain.

It is derived from a verb which in Assyrian means 'to plot,' transitively (Sargon, ATB 266 f.), and in Arabic (r) 'to inflict a blow on the neck of another'; (2) 'to have a thick or loose neck.' The original sense is perhaps better seen in Syriac, where the same verb means 'to gather into a heap or ball (trans. or intrans.); the sense of drawing together also underlies the Assyrian use (cp 'intrigue,' intricare). The verb occurs but once in OT Hebrew (in Piel form), Is. 3812—'I have rolled up (or possibly 'shortened,' see Dillmann ad loc.) like a weaver my life,'—a simile referring to the treatment of the finished

web:1 the use of the noun בִּטְמֶן in Ezek. 725 accords well enough with this derivation.

Kippod is equivalent in form to Aram. kuppūdā, Ar. kunfudh;² and that these are the words for 'hedgehog' in their respective languages is made clear for Ar. (e.g.) by Damiri's account (Hayāt al-Haiwān, Būlak edition, ii. 219) and for Aram. by the Syr. Physiologus (Land's Anecdota Syriaca, 442 f.).³ The instances of בִּטְמֶן, קִיפּוּדָא, in late Heb. and Aram. prove the same for post-biblical Jewish usage (see Lewysohn, Zoologie des Talmuds, 100).

Whilst the philological evidence is thus entirely in favour of the rendering 'hedgehog' or 'porcupine,' it

2. Zoology. there are considerable difficulties. The animal is always spoken of in connection with desolation, and once in relation to pools of water; and, whilst both these conditions would be natural in the habitat of the Bittern, they have no particular association with either the Hedgehog or the Porcupine. Again, in Is. 3411, the בִּטְמֶן is mentioned among birds; and in Zeph. 214 it is prophesied that the Pelican and the kippod shall lodge together in the capitals of ruined Nineveh, while 'a voice' (if the text may be trusted) shall sing in the windows. The answers made by Bochart to these objections—that the Porcupine or Hedgehog was regarded as an unfriendly, desert-loving animal on account of its formidable equipments; that we can find parallels to the mention of a beast among birds in such enumerations as Lucian's 'large oxen, and horses, and eagles, and bears, and lions'; and that the capitals on which the animal is to sit may be those of fallen columns—are ingenious, but perhaps scarcely satisfying. It has been suggested that the translation 'bittern' may be reconciled with the etymology by considering the fact that this bird has the power of drawing in its long neck so that its head almost rests upon its breast.⁴ Still, it is not easy to set aside the argument derived from the meaning of the word in the cognate languages.

The Bittern, Botaurus stellaris, is found in marshy and reedy places throughout Europe, Asia (including India), and Africa. Canon Tristram records its occurrence in the marshes of Huleh. It is a nocturnal bird of considerable size, and is remarkable for its loud booming note. Formerly a common bird in suitable localities in Britain, it is now but a winter visitor. It is grouped with the Herons in the family Ardeidae. (Cp also CORMORANT and PELICAN.)

² So Ethiopic kenfez. It seems more probable that the Arabic word is a loan-word from Aramaic, than that בִּטְמֶן is borrowed. Fränkel, however (Aram. Fremdw. xiv.), holds that the latter is the case.

'slime') in Gen. 11:3 14:10 Ex. 23:†; but also (2) of ܒܝܝܬ, which, like its Aram. cognate, is an Ass. loan-word (EV PITCH) in Gen. 6:14†, where its occurrence furnishes one of the proofs of the Babylonian origin of the Deluge-Story (see DELUGE, § 13). In the Bab. Deluge-Story six 'sars' of ܕܝܕܘ [ܕܝܕܘ, 'bitumen'] and three of iddu¹ (naphtha: Jensen) are poured upon the outer and inner sides of the ship, respectively. Iddu, 'naphtha,' is the word used in the legendary account of the infancy of Sargon I. (3 R. 458a; RP¹ 556):—'she placed me in a basket of reeds, with iddu my door she shut'; in the similar story of Moses the words ܕܝܕܘ, 'bitumen,' and ܡܫܝ, PITCH (q.v.), are combined (Ex. 23 ܕܫܫܐܠܬܝܫ ܡܝܫܬܐ [Ba'ab], but ܕܫܫܐܠܬܝܫܬܐ [B*AF]). The origin of bitumen, or asphalt, and naphtha need not delay us long. Together with petroleum and mineral tar, they form a series of substances which are the result of certain changes in organised matter. These substances merge into each other by insensible degrees, and it is impossible to say at what point mineral tar ends and asphalt begins.

Naphtha, which is the first of the series, is in some places found flowing out of the earth as a clear, limpid, and colourless liquid. As such it is a mixture of hydrocarbons, some of which are very volatile and evaporate on exposure; it takes up oxygen from the air, becomes brown and thick, and in this state it is called petroleum. A continuation of the same process of evaporation and oxidation gradually transforms the material into mineral tar, and still later into solid glassy asphalt.

Asphaltic deposits are widely diffused throughout the world, more especially in tropical and sub-tropical regions—for example in the basin of the DEAD SEA (q.v., § 6). The asphalt of the Dead Sea (which was very well known to the ancients) is not at present of commercial importance; but the sources of the supply of ancient Babylon, the bitumen springs of Hit (the Is of Herod. 1:79), are still used. At this very old city on the Euphrates the shipwrights adhere to the ancient fashion of boat-building. Tamarisk and mulberry branches form the substratum, which is covered with mats and thickly besmeared with bitumen (cp Ex. 23).² Bitumen was much used in architecture (see Gen. 11:3). Unburned brick protected by a plaster of bitumen proved the most indestructible of materials (see ASSYRIA, § 6, BABYLONIA, § 15, and cp Peters, Nippur, 2:162). Bitumen was used in ancient times as a fuel (Verg. Eccl. 8:83), for medicinal purposes (Jos. BJ iv. 8:4) and for embalming (see EMBALMING).

BLASPHEMY (ܠܝܬܝܐ 2 K. 19:3 Is. 37:3; ܠܝܬܝܐ Neh. 9:18 26; ܠܝܬܝܐ Ezek. 35:12; ܠܝܬܝܐ Tob. 1:18 1 Macc. 26: Mt. 12:31 26:65). The word so translated is derived from a root (ܠܝܬܝܐ) meaning literally 'to scorn or reject' (see 2 S. 12:14 Ps. 74:10 18 Is. 52:5). In Hebrew, therefore, it can naturally be used to describe an attitude of hostility towards God or man, things holy or things profane (Jer. 33:24 Is. 60:14 1 S. 2:17).

'Blasphe'me' (cp the verb 'to blame,' Romanic blasimare, L. blasphemare, and see Murray, s.v.), however, occurs in the EV as a rendering also of the following words: ܠܝܬܝܐ 21:10 13 AV (RV 'curse' 1 RVmg. 'renounce'; cp Dav. on Job 15); ܠܝܬܝܐ 2 K. 19:622 EV=Is. 37:23 EV, Ezek. 20:27 EV, Nu. 15:30 RV (AV 'reproach'), Ps. 44:16 [17] EV; (ܠܝܬܝܐ) ܠܝܬܝܐ 24:11 (' ܠܝܬܝܐ) v. 16 EV, and the Gk. ܠܝܬܝܐ 2 Macc. 10:34 (not V) 12:14 Mt. 27:39 Mk. 3:28 (followed by τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ θεοῦ), Rev. 18:6, 1 Pet. 4:14.

In 1 Macc. 7:38 'blasphemies' is the rendering of ܠܝܬܝܐ; in v. 41 'to blaspheme' represents the related verb ܠܝܬܝܐ; the object of the blasphemies is the temple. It is important to determine the sense of ܠܝܬܝܐ accurately, because the sense of 'to blaspheme' in EV follows this exactly. In a word, the conception of 'blasphemy' in current English is narrower than the conception that we find in this supposed pattern of English speech, which includes all modes of reviling or calumniating God or man (see ܠܝܬܝܐ on 2 K. 19:6 [Heb. ܠܝܬܝܐ] 19:4 [Heb. ܠܝܬܝܐ] and Is. 52:5 [Heb. ܠܝܬܝܐ uncertain conj.], and cp Acts 13:45 18:6 Jude 9 with Lk. 5:21 Jn. 10:36).

Among the Hebrews (whose view, it is needless to say, profoundly affected our own common law) blasphemy or the expression of unjust, derogatory opinions regarding God or his government of the world was made a capital offence (Lev. 24:11; cp 1 K. 21:13, and see Jos. Ant. iv. 86); the blasphemer must be 'cut off' from his people (Lev. 24:15 P; see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 13). It was forbidden to use the name of God lightly (Num. Dt. 5:11), whether to ask a blessing or to invoke a curse (cp Ex. 20:7, and see BLESSING AND CURSING, § 1, and Schultz, OT Theol. 2:122 ff. [ET]). Whenever Israel is brought to shame God's name is scoffed at by the heathen (Ps. 74:10 18). At a later date it was held to be a mark of profanity even to pronounce the real name of the God of Israel (see Lev. 24:11 and cp NAMES, § 109). Josephus (Ant. iv. 86), and the Rabbis interpret Ex. 22:28 as a prohibition of blaspheming 'strange gods'; but the interpretation, however much in the interests of the Jews themselves, implies a misunderstanding of the use of ܠܝܬܝܐ (see Schultz, 2:127). It was on a charge of blasphemy—claiming to be the Christ, the

3. NT. Son of God—that Jesus was found worthy of death (Mk. 14:61-64 Mt. 26:65; cp Jn. 10:33), and for blasphemous words against 'the holy place and the law' Stephen was condemned to be stoned (Acts 6:13 7:56 ff.). See STEPHEN. By blasphemy against the Holy Spirit in Mk. 3:29, Mt. 12:32, was meant originally a definite offence of the scribes and Pharisees, who had ascribed Jesus' cures of demoniacs to a power derived from the prince of the demons. This was blasphemy against the divine power which had come upon Jesus at his baptism (Mk. 1:10 Mt. 3:16 Lk. 3:22). In Mt. 12:32, however, a later interpretation is given, which implies that the disciples of Jesus had thoroughly absorbed the idea of the indwelling Spirit. The Holy Spirit is put in antithesis to the 'Son of Man.' One who fails to pierce below the humble exterior of Jesus may be forgiven. One who not merely rejects, but openly disparages, that great gift which 'the Heavenly Father will give to those who ask him' (Lk. 11:13) cannot be forgiven: the inward impediment in the man himself is too strong. The idea of the original distinction was suggested by that in the Law (Num. 15:27-31). A parallel to it will be found in the Mishna (Sanhedr. 10:1)—'He who says that the Law is not from Heaven has no part in the world to come' (עולם הבא). The later interpretation, however, has no parallel, and is a

BLASTING (בִּשְׂפָן; ^{BAFL} ἀνεμοφθορία [Dt. 28 22 2 Ch. 6 28], ἐντυγμωσ [1 K. 8 37]; ^{BAQ} πύρωσις [Am. 4 9]; ^{NCB} QΓ, ἀφορία, ^{GA} ἀφθο. ^{GN*} απο. [Hag. 2 17]) is, as we learn from Gen. 41, a term specially applied to the blighting effect of wind upon corn. The root in Arabic means blackness; and the Heb. word thus describes a blackening (almost burning) process which is regarded as due to a severe wind—a sense which is expressed by the various renderings of ^{GA}. The word is in each passage coupled with יָקֵן 'mildew.' Nevertheless, it is doubtful whether wind is in itself sufficient to account for such a blackening. In the British Islands wheat when young assumes a yellow colour from cold, a well-known physiological effect. Under a burning drying wind, it might turn brown, but scarcely black. Further, it must be noted that in Gen. 41 6 the corn was in ear; it had made its growth, but the ears were thin—i.e., diseased. It seems probable, then, that the effect conceived in the dream was that produced by 'corn smut,' Ustilago Carbo; and that this is the real meaning of בִּשְׂפָן. 'Mildew' is the other common disease of corn, Puccinia graminis.

^{GA} represents בִּרְךְ by εὐλογεῖν, בִּרְכָה by εὐλογία (also NT words). In Hebrew for 'cursing' we find also (א) קָלַל (prop. to belittle?) frequently. (β) אָלַח, verb and noun, cp שָׁבַע 'oath of cursing' Nu. 5 21 (RVmg. 'adjuration'), rendered 'execration,' Jer. 42 18 44 22, and RV only Jer. 29 18; its derivative אָלַח occurs in Lam. 3 65f. (γ) הָקִיר, see BAN. (δ) קָרַב only in the Balaam stories (Nu. 23 11 23 8 24 10) and possibly to be connected with קָרַב (prop. 'to pierce') rendered in Lev. 24 11 16 'blaspheme.' From the Jewish tradition which explained it to mean 'pronounce, speak aloud' arose the deep-rooted belief that the divine name was not to be uttered under any circumstance (see NAMES, § 109 n.), IDOLATRY, § 8. (ε) שָׁבַע, Is. 65 15, EV 'curse,' properly 'oath' as in RVmg.; see OATH and cp COVENANT, § 5.

The NT words are (α) ἀναθεματίζω Mk. 14 71 (in ^{GA} for הָקִיר; καταναθεματίζω), Mt. 26 74 Rev. 22 3; see BAN. (β) καταράσθαι Rom. 12 14 Jam. 3 9 (in ^{GA} for קָלַל, אָרַר, also κατάρα Gal. 3 10 13 and καταθέμα (RVmg. 'anything accursed') Rev. 22 3; cp also ἐπικατάρατος 'under a curse,' Gal. 3 10. (γ) κακολογεῖν Mt. 15 4 Mk. 7 10, RV 'speak evil of' (in ^{GA} for קָלַל; see OATH).

In the primitive sense of the word, a blessing or a curse was a spell, pronounced by 'holy' persons, and containing a divine name, or divine names, which drew down the divine favour or disfavour (i.e., prosperity or adversity), as the case might require, on certain other persons. It was a consequence of the hardness of life that curses were more frequently in demand than blessings. Thus (α) the breaking out of hostilities between states naturally led to the solemn utterance of formulæ of cursing against the enemy. These invocations would be uttered at the opening of a campaign, and especially when the warriors were on the point of advancing against the foe. Goliath, we are told, 'cursed David by his gods' (1 S. 17 43). The battle-shout certainly had a religious character; and, if it did not always devote the enemy to destruction, at any rate it invoked a blessing on the national side. Cp Ps. 68 1-3 and the story of BALAAM [q.v.].¹ (β) The laws too had sometimes an increased sanction through the cursing formulæ attached. Thus KZ iv. mentions a statute respecting the maintenance of boundaries, which is enforced by a curse on any one who should violate it. To this category of curses belong those in Dt. 28.

It is true that a series of blessings is attached to the series of cursings. Moses, from his close connection with the Deity, had a special power of blessing and cursing. After him the priests had a similar power, which they exerted in the interests of the faithful community (cp URIM AND THUMMIM, § 6). The uplifted hands of the priest drew down (as it were) a blessing on Israel (cp Lev. 9 22 Nu. 6 23-27) and a curse on Israel's enemies. So potent, indeed, were the blessings and the curses of the reputed founder of Israel that they could be said to lie on the two sacred mountains which enclose the original centre of the people—the valley of Shechem—ready to descend, as the case might be, with rewards or punishments (Dt. 11 29).¹

Within the family it was the father who (according to primitive ideas not unconnected with the worship of ancestors) had the mystic privilege of determining the weal or woe of his children (Gen. 9 25 ff.), and more especially when his days were manifestly numbered (see ESAU, § 2, ISAAC, § 5, JACOB). Nor does it appear that the early Israelites limited this power by moral considerations (see Gen. 27 35). Obviously, however, such a limitation was a necessary consequence of a pure monotheism. The post-exilic writers declare that only the offspring of the righteous can be blessed (Ps. 37 26), and that the observance of God's laws ensures his favour without the aid of priests or enchanters. Fear not, then, said the later sages to their pupils, if thine enemy curses thee: 'the curse causeless shall not come' (Prov. 26 2).

Still, even in post-exilic time we sometimes find a strange half-consciousness that curses had an inherent power. It was worth while to curse a bad man, to ensure his full punishment—such is the idea of Ps. 109—a strange survival of primitive superstition.

In the discourses of Jesus we find blessings and curses. They are, however, simply authoritative declarations of the eternal connection between right-doing and happiness, wrong-doing and misery (e.g., in the case of Judas).

Parallels to the Israelitish view of blessings and cursings outside of the Semitic peoples hardly need to be quoted. The objective existence of both, but especially of curses, was strongly felt by the Assyrians and Babylonians, as the magical texts show. The Arabian beliefs on the subject are also very suggestive, as Goldziher has pointed out. See MAGIC, § 2 n., and on the 'curse-bringing water' (Nu. 5 18 ff.) see JEALOUSY, WATER OF. T. K. C.

1. The difficulty in taking Boane- to be בני, b'nē, 'sons of,' is to account for oa = shevā.

Attempts to explain it as a phonetic 'corruption' have been unsatisfactory. There does not appear to be any historical foundation² for Bretschneider's explanation³ of oa as a corrupt pronunciation of a provincial (Galilean) a, or for Hugh Broughton's statement⁴ (Works, 620) that the Jews pronounced shevā as oa.

It is more plausible to regard the corruption as textual. Since shevā = a is natural enough (cp βανη-βαρὰκ, Josh. 19:45 [A]), and shevā = o is not unknown (cp e.g. ἑρποδοῦν), oa might be a conflate reading.⁵ Dalman (Gram. 122, n. 2)⁶ supposed the transposition of an o which originally stood after p (see below). He now prefers to regard either o or a as a gloss (Verf. Jesu, 39, n. 4). In some such way the double vowel must have arisen; it is strange that the MSS⁷ have not preserved any trace of variation in the first syllable.

The orthography, therefore, cannot be explained quite satisfactorily. We may be reasonably certain, however, about the signification.

2. This cannot be said of the second element in the word. The evangelist (or a scholiast) understood pyes to mean βροντῆ, 'thunder'; but we do not know what Semitic word it was supposed to represent, nor can we say whether the interpretation was an original hypothesis or a really current belief.

(a) In the Syriac versions (Pesh. and Sin.) pyes appears as ܡܢܬܐ. That may, however, be nothing more than a transliteration. Only in Arabic does ܡܢܬܐ mean 'thunder.' If it occurs in the OT at all⁸ it probably means 'throng.' In Aram. it means 'tumult,' 'rushing,' etc. If pyes is ܡܢܬܐ, therefore, it can hardly mean 'thunder.'⁹

Jerome, indeed, conscious of this, declares (Comm. ad Dan. 1:7) that the true reading is (emendatus legitur) benereem (var. banerem, banarehem)—i.e., sons of re'em, רֵעִים (cp Ex. 19:16 Pseudo-Jor.)—and this reading he quietly assumes in his Lit. de nomm. Heb. under 'John.' That he ignores it in the Comm. on Mk., however, probably shows that it is a mere hypothetical emendation,¹⁰ not a variant reading (cp BARTIMAEUS, § 2). Apparently, therefore, we must adhere to pyes.

(β) The second letter of pyes, however, might represent not y but p, as in peyasa = ܡܢܬܐ, רַעַשׁ, but reš is no nearer βροντῆ than רַעַשׁ. Besides, y becomes p, as a rule, only when it is represented in Arabic by g, not by y; but although there is in Ar. a word ragasa, the phonetic equivalent of which in Hebrew would be רַעַשׁ, ra'asa (not ragasa) agrees most closely with רַעַשׁ in meaning, and a רַעַשׁ = ra'asa would not as a rule appear as pyes.

The common word for 'thunder' in Hebrew and Aramaic would not conflict with this phonetic principle; the nearest word in Arabic to Hebrew ra'asa is ragama. Drusius (Ad voces NT Comm. prior 39 [1616]) therefore and Glassius (Phil. Sacra, [1625]) revived the theory of Jerome that pyes should be pyeu, regarding the s as merely a Greek termination substituted for a final consonant, dropped as, e.g., in Gehenna. No doubt -es would be rather a strange termination for a man's name; but Boanerges is not a man's name: it is the name of two men. Indeed Suidas gives the name as βοανεργεις (as if the plural of βοανεργης). Beza, on the other hand (Adnotationes majores, ad loc. [1594]), tried to improve on Drusius by suggesting that a mistake had occurred in a Semitic text: רַעַשׁ was misread רַעַס. It is difficult to see how this could be. A Semitic text containing the name רַעַס would not need to give an explanation of the name (cp col. 490, n. 1). On the other hand, a Greek translator could not have given the supposed correct translation if he had misread the word.¹

(γ) There remains the possibility that s = i (see e.g. AHAB, BOAZ). Kautzsch (l.c.) suggests that pyes may represent יָרִיץ (יָרִיץ), 'anger' (cp Dan. 3:13 and, as used of thunder, the Ar. irijaza 'ir-rā d''); and this solution is adopted by Dalman (l.c.), who further accounts for the translation βροντῆ by comparing Job 37:2, קָלוּ, used of thunder² (קָלוּ = ܡܢܬܐ).

The historical origin of the name not being known (cp JAMES, i. § 1), we cannot determine the second Semitic element with certainty. There is no evidence that 'Boanerges' can ever have meant strictly 'sons of thunder.' On the other hand, what is said in the Gospels of the sons of Zebedee gives a certain appropriateness to such a title as בני ירו, taken in the sense of 'angry,' 'soon angered' (or the like). H. W. According to the post-exilic genealogy, Ru. 4:18 ff. (cp 1 Ch. 2:11 ff.), he was the son of SALMON or SALMAH, and the ancestor of DAVID (§ 1, n. 2). See RUTH, BUZITE.

BOCHERU (בֹּכְרִי, § 61; for the ending -u, cp JETHRO and see GESHEM), a son of Azrikam, Saul's descendant (1 Ch. 8:38 = 9:44). ⁶BRAL, however, punctuated and read—doubtless correctly—'Azrikam his firstborn' (πρωτότοκος αὐτοῦ: בֹּכְרִי).

⁶BR makes up the six sons of Azel by enumerating σ[α]ρία in the fifth place, besides ἀζάριος in the third.

BOCHIM (בֹּכִים, § 103, 'weepers,' ΚΛΑΥΘΜΩΝ [BAL]), the name of a place near Gilgal, where the b'ne Israel sacrificed after the visit of the angel of Yahwē (Judg. 2:1a בֹּכִים; 5a ΚΛΑΥΘΜΩΝΕC [B]), and also probably of a place in Judah (Mic. 1:10 emended text; see below). The name of the former place is interpreted 'Weepers'; but the passage which refers to this (vv. 1b-5a) is an insertion (see JUDGES, § 4) based upon 1a, where we may expect to find the older and more generally used name of the place. Here, however, ⁶ combining two readings gives ἐπὶ τὸν κλαυθμῶνα καὶ ἐπὶ βαθλῆλ (on the corrupt καὶ [ἐπὶ] τὸν οἶκον ἰσραηλ, see Moore ad loc.), and the latter, which suits the context well, is accepted as correct by most critics (Bu. Ri. Sam. 20 ff., We., Mey., Kue., Bu., Kitt.). We must therefore correct Bochim in 1a to 'Bethel.' The explanation of 'Bochim' in v. 5a suggests a doubt as to the correctness of the present form, which may have been changed to agree with a more than half sportive derivation from בָּכָה, 'to weep.' The correct pronunciation must have been Bēkā'im (בֹּכָאִים, בֹּכְאִים)—i.e., 'Baca-trees' (see MULBERRY). These trees were probably abundant near Bethel, and it is possible that the 'Tree of Weeping' (ALLON BACUTH) grew near them. The play on the name would, at any rate, be familiar to the ancient Israelites, and may have led to a variety in the pronunciation of the name (cp Mareshah, Moresheth).

² J. F. K. Gurlitt had considered this word in his careful discussion in St. A. r. (1829, pp. 715-738).

³ So now also Arnold Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache, 51 f.

⁹ There is no reason to suppose that in the passage cited by Lightfoot (Megillah B. 29a, mid.) the word means 'thunder.'

There is an early testimony to the form Bochim in Mic. 1.10, בוך אל-חבנו (EV 'weep not at all') may be emended into בוכים חבנו (EV βαχέμ), 'in Bochim (Bekā'im) weep' (Elhorst, We., Now., Che., omitting the intrusive אל, 'not'; cp Che. JQR, July 1898). No locality called Bekaim near Micah's native town is known to us. This causes no difficulty. There may have been many places where Baca-trees grew. The alternative correction, 'In Acco weep not' (Reland, Hitzig, etc.), is geographically inadmissible. We cannot well suppose a Philistine city of that name (G. A. Smith), nor does Micah concern himself with Philistia (cp GILOH).

BOHAN, THE STONE OF בֹּחַן אֶבֶן, ΒΑΙΩΝ [BA]), an unknown point on the boundary between Judah and BENJAMIN (§ 3), Josh. 15.6 (Βεων [L]), 18.17 (Βααμ [A], -N [L]). Bohan is called in both places the son (sometimes sons (בָּנָי in 18.17)) of REUBEN; possibly, however, the stone or rock was a well-known landmark, thus designated on account of its supposed resemblance to a thumb (בֹּחַן).

1. OT names in the sixth plague of Egypt, and the 'botch of Egypt' in Dt. 28.27, is applied again to the 'boil' of Hezekiah and to some diagnostic sign that occurred in one or more of the various contagious and mostly parasite skin-affections included under the common name of צָרַעַת (see LEPROSY) in Lev. 13.18 f. 20-23—the variety called 'burning boil'² (really a pleonasm) being clean, and the variety of boil which gave place to a white or bright spot being unclean. The reference is almost certainly to local or limited spots of inflammation, although it is hardly possible to give a modern name to them or to identify them.

In Dt. 28.35 and Job 2.7,³ the same word is applied to a skin-disease 'from the sole of the foot to the crown of the head'; but probably it is so used without any precise nosological intention, and merely to express a peculiarly loathsome affliction.

It is only the boil disease specially associated with Egypt that is here considered.

There occur four other references to diseases specially Egyptian but not called šēḥīn. Two of these (Dt. 7.15 and 28.60, מִצָּרִים מְרִיבֵי מִצְרָיִם [מִצְרָיִם], 'the evil diseases of Egypt,' and 'all the diseases of Egypt') are in admonitory passages written in a popular style. In the third (Zech. 14.18), a plague is to smite the Egyptians if they do not come up to keep the Feast of Booths. It is the same affliction that is to befall the other peoples who neglect this ordinance, and there is nothing, as the text now stands,⁴ to indicate that the writer is

thinking of the 'botch of Egypt.' The reference in the fourth (Am. 4.10), however, may possibly be to some actual epidemic in the history of the northern kingdom. The 'pestilence in the manner of Egypt' may well be equivalent to the שִׁחִין or 'botch' of Dt. 28.27, which should mean some specific disease, such as the 'emerods' (RV 'tumours'; or plague-boils) of 1 S. 5.6, with which it is coupled, certainly means. As the sixth plague is specially called one of 'boils and blains,' this also may be taken to stand for some definite boil-disease of Egypt.

We must now consider which of the boil diseases of Egypt is meant by šēḥīn. It is stated that the boil

2. Shēḥīn accompanied by blains broke forth upon both man and beast. This, if nosologically meant, would exclude bubo plague, as being unknown in cattle. On the other hand, anthrax, which might be correctly described as the boil of cattle, is equally excluded, inasmuch as in man it is never epidemic, but only sporadic. If we might suppose the narrative, or (as the critics say) the interwoven narratives, of the plagues to be based on a simpler narrative, or simpler narratives, which would bear to be treated as matter-of-fact description, we might expect that in the original narrative the sixth plague represented the plague proper (bubo plague), which is confined to man, whilst the fifth stood for epizootic disease in general.¹

Certainly the special association of bubo plague with ancient Egypt is historically correct, so that the word 'botch' in the AV is a happy choice (cp § 1, n. 1). Besides the constructive evidence as to the disaster which is said to have befallen Sennacherib's army before Pelusium (see PESTILENCE, and, on the historical points, HEZEKIAH, 1), there is, indeed, no extra-biblical testimony to bubo plague in Egypt earlier than about 300 B.C., and even this testimony has been only indirectly preserved.

Oribasius, who was physician to the Emperor Julian, cites a passage from Rufus of Ephesus, a physician in the time of Trajan, wherein he describes bubo plague with singular clearness; it is indeed rare, as Daresburg remarks, to find in ancient authors such positive marks of the identity of a pestilential type. Rufus says that the disease was most common, and very mortal, in Libya, Egypt, and Syria. He adds that Dioscorides and Poseidonios had enlarged upon pestilential buboes in writing upon the pestilence which in their time ravaged Libya—supposed to have been the same great epidemic, about 127 B.C., which is mentioned by Livy, Julius Obsequens, and Orosius. Rufus further says that the pupils of one Dionysius, ὁ κρυπτός, make mention of these pestilential buboes. An ancient Greek gloss to the Vatican codex of Oribasius explains that Dionysius with the above surname ('Hunchback') comes into the biographies of Hermippus. This would fix his date prior to 280 B.C.

Whilst the botch of Egypt cannot, upon independent testimony, be traced farther back than 300 B.C., it is highly improbable that it was first seen then. As Lorinser points out, the endemic influences favouring plague in Egypt, depending upon the peculiar alternations of wet and dry soil (caused by the periodic rise and fall of the Nile), were there long before.

Pariset (Causes de la Peste, etc., Paris, 1837) has argued with great cogency that the elaborate pains taken in the best period of ancient Egypt to preserve the soil from putrefying animal matters, human and other, were inspired by the risk of plague, and must have been in a high degree effective. It is clear, however, that any failure of the sanitary code would give plague its opportunity, the pressure of population and the climate or hydrology being constant, and that such failure may reasonably be assumed at first as an occasional thing, and then— from the time that the ancient civilisation, with sanitation (enforced by religious sanctions) a principal part of it, began to decay under the influence of Persian, Greek, and Roman conquests—as permanent.

without the negative particle, but it has the second insertion. A critical edition should give the text thus: 'And if the Egyptian people go not up nor come, upon them will the stroke come with which Yahwē will strike. . . . The close of the sentence may early have become effaced. The plague intended was, at any rate, not that of the other nations, which was want of rain.]

¹ The qualification ('in general') is designed. What is said of the 'murrain' upon the horses, camels, asses, oxen, and sheep is expressed in a sense too comprehensive for any single epizootic malady (e.g., anthrax is a disease that oxen and sheep suffer from in common, but not horses, nor, so far as is known, asses and camels).

BOILS, PLAGUE

That the sanitary precautions did utterly break down under Mohammedan conquest, and that bubo plague did become for fourteen centuries the standing pestilence of Egypt, we know as matter of fact. We know also that it was from Pelusium that the great plague of Justinian's reign (542 A.D.) started—to overrun the whole known world. It is probable, further, that the pestilence in Lower Egypt at the time of the massacre of Christians in the episcopate of Cyprian included bubo plague. The valuable testimony preserved by Oribasius as to Egyptian, Libyan, and Syrian pestilential buboes, as early as 300 B.C., has been already cited. If beyond that date we are left to conjecture, there is still a high probability that the plague was known in Egypt at a much earlier date.

This historical bubo plague of Egypt answers best to the sixth plague. The boil breaks out in the manner of the plague bubo, which may be single or multiple. Its situations are the armpits, groins, and the sides of the neck; and it consists of one (or of a packet) of the natural lymphatic or absorbent glands of those regions enlarged to the size of a hen's (or even a turkey's) egg, often of a livid colour, hard, tense, painful, and attended with inflammatory swelling of the skin for some distance around it. Just as in Asiatic cholera and yellow fever there are 'explosive' attacks so suddenly fatal that the distinctive symptoms have hardly time to develop, so there may be death from plague without the bubo or the botch. Still, the latter is the distinctive mark of plague, the same in all countries and in all periods of history.

Other signs of plague were livid or red hæmorrhagic spots of the skin (called 'the tokens' in English epidemics), large carbuncles (especially on the fleshy parts), and blains (חֲבָצֵה), which were really smaller carbuncular formations or cores with a collection of fluid on their summits. Besides the pain of the hard and tense buboes, there were often delirium, gentle or raving, vomiting, quivering of muscles (affecting gait and speech), and many other symptoms as if from a deadly poison. About three days was perhaps the average duration of fatal cases.

Usually half the attacks were mortal. In the beginning of the epidemic there would be but few recoveries, while at the end of it as many as four out of five might recover. Recovery was most likely when the buboes broke and ran; sometimes the suppuration, especially in the groin, would continue for months, the victims being able to go limping in the streets. In the history of plague in London, which is continuous from the Black Death of 1348 to 1666, the great epidemics came at intervals, and, in those for which we have the statistics, carried off from a fifth to a sixth of the population, including but few of the richer class. With a population of nearly half a million in 1665, the highest mortality from plague was 7165 in the week 12th-19th September. Sometimes for a succession of years the deaths from plague kept at a high annual level, especially during the summer and autumn months. During the whole three centuries of plague in London there were few years which did not have some deaths in the warmer months. From what is known of the mediæval history of plague in Cairo (from Arabic annals; cp von Kremer in SWA W, Phil. Hist. Class. Bd. xvi.), and of its modern history (cp Pruner, Krank. des Orients), it appears to have come, as in London, in terrific outbursts at intervals of years, and to have been at a low level or apparently extinct in the years between.

The plague season in Egypt, within the period of exact records, has begun as early as September and as late as January, has reached its height in March and April, and has ended with great regularity, almost suddenly, about St. John's day (24th June), the height of the epidemic corresponding with the lowest level of the Nile. There has been no plague since 1844. The last great epidemic was that of 1835, described by Kinglake in 'Eothen'.

BOTTLE. The statement that 'what we call bottles were unknown to the Hebrews' (Riehm, HWB (2), art. 'Flasche') needs qualification. It has long been known that the Egyptians manufactured glass from an early period. The Phœnicians and the Assyrians were well acquainted with glass (see the relative volumes of Perrot and Chipiez, Hist. de l'Art, etc.), that manufactured by the former being of special repute in antiquity (see GLASS). It is impossible, therefore, that among the imports from Phœnicia, glass bottles should have had no place. They must always, however, have been a luxury of the rich (cp Job 2817 [RV]).

The 'bottles' of Scripture fall into two very different classes: (1) leather skins for holding and carrying water, wine, and other liquids, and (2) earthenware jars for the same and other purposes.

For the Hebrews in the nomadic stage of civilisation, as for the Bedouin of the present day, the skins of beasts of their flocks supplied the readiest and most efficient means of storing and transporting the necessary supply of water in the camp and on the march. This method was found so simple and so satisfactory that it was retained in a more settled state of society, and, indeed, has prevailed throughout the East until the present day. The writers of classical antiquity, from Homer downwards, contain many references to this use of the skins of domestic animals. The skins used by the Hebrews for this purpose, as in modern Syria and Arabia, were chiefly skins of the goat and of the sheep. When a smaller size than ordinary was required, the skin of a lamb or of a kid sufficed; for larger quantities there was the skin of the ox,¹ and, perhaps, of the camel (Herod. 39). Among the Hebrews the pig-skin was, of course, excluded.

The method of preparation varied in complexity and efficiency according as the peasant prepared his own skins (cp Doughty, Ar. Des. 1227) or employed a professional tanner. The head and the lower part of the legs are cut off (such is the method at the present day), and the animal is skinned from the neck downwards, somewhat as one removes a tight-fitting glove, care being taken that no incision is made in the skin of the carcass. When the tanning process is completed (cp Tristram, NHB (2) 92, Robinson, BR (1) 2440), all other apertures having previously been closed, the neck is fitted with a leather thong, by means of which the skin is opened and closed (cp LEATHER).

Such are (a) בֹּתְלָה, hemeth (ἀρκός [ADL]), the water-skin (probably of a kid) which Abraham put upon Hagar's shoulder (Gen. 2114*f.*). The Bedouin name is girby—i.e., kirbatun (Doughty, op. cit. index). In Hos 75 (RV 'heat'), and in Hab. 215 (RV 'venom,' mg. 'fury'), the RV more advisedly finds another word of similar sound (נִבְלָה). (b) נִבְלָה, nבלh, like the smitly (samlatun) of the modern Bedouin, is the milk-skin of the nomad Jael (Judg. 419; cp Doughty op. cit. passim). It also occurs frequently as a wine-skin—Josh. 9413 1 S. 1620, etc. As a water-skin it is used metaphorically in Ps. 568[9] ('put my tears into thy bottle'), where there is no reference to the much later 'tear-bottles,' so called, and where the text is doubted (see 56). The exact sense of Ps. 11983, where the poet likens himself to a 'bottle' (RVmg. 'wine-skin') in the smoke, is doubtful (see the comm. in loc.). (c) בֹּתְלָה, nבלh, and בֹּתְלָה, nבלh, also frequently of the ordinary wine-skin (ἀρκός [BAL]), 1 S. 103, etc. (d) בֹּתְלָה, nבלh, has the same signification in Job 3219, where we read of 'new bottles . . . ready to burst.' Budde (96) renders 'skins with new (wine),' which gives us an OT parallel to the familiar passage in the NT (Mt. 917=Mk. 222=Lk. 537*f.*)—'Neither do men put new wine into old wine-skins,' etc.—where the RV has rightly discarded the misleading rendering 'bottles.' In Judith 105 we have the curious word ἀσκοπυτήν [BA],—RV 'a leathern bottle' of wine.

Vessels of earthenware also are mentioned in the OT as receptacles for wine. Such was (a) the בֹּתְלָה, Jer.

19110 (ἑρπᾶς, βυκός), made by the potter, perhaps with a narrow neck which caused a gurgling sound (Ar. baḥḥakatun) when the jar was being emptied. It was also used to hold honey, 1 K. 143 (στᾶμνος [AL; om. B]; EV CRUSE [q.v., 2]). (b) The name בֹּתְלָה was also given to wine-jars or ampullae of earthenware, as is clear from Is. 3014 (EV '[potters'] vessel'; AVmg. 'bottle of potters'), and Lam. 42 (EV 'pitcher'). In both these passages 5 has ἀγγιον. We have no indication of the size or even of the shape of the earthen nבלh (see POTTERY; also CRUSE). A. R. S. K.

2. For the 'alabaster box' (ἡ ἀλάβαστρος) of Mk. 143, etc. AV (RV 'alabaster cruse'), see CRUSE, 4, ALABASTER.
3. In RVmg. of Jn. 1261329, where EV has BAG, 'box' is suggested as an alternative rendering of γλωσσόκομος, which originally and etymologically signified a case in which the mouth-pieces (γλωσσάι) of wind instruments were kept. Later it assumed a more general significance and denoted any similarly shaped box or case. 5 BAL employs it to indicate the chest (אֲרוֹן) set up by Josiah in the Temple (2 Ch. 242*f.*), whilst Josephus uses it of the 'coffer' (κίστη 1 S. 62*f.* EV; see COFFER), or small chest, in which the Philistine princes deposited the golden mice. In the Mishna it is used to signify a case for books (לְבוֹקְסָה; in Lexx.) and even a coffin (cp the parallel use of loculus); in the latter sense also in Aquila (Gen. 5024, of Joseph's mummy-case; see COFFIN). Thus it would appear that the preferable rendering in John (loc.) is that of RVmg.

κεδρος¹ Is. 41:19 60:13) is by several modern scholars identified as the 'sherbin' (Ar. and Syr.), a kind of juniper, = Ass. šurmēnu (see below). RVmg. and SBOT, however, give 'cypress'; the sherbin resembles the cypress in its habit and general appearance (Tristram). Cp note 4, below.

The Hebrew word was formerly explained as derived from the root אָשַׁר (akin to יָשַׁר, Ar. yasara, 'to be straight' (Ges. Thes.), and so as denoting a tall straight tree; but such different views have recently been put forward as to the affinities and meaning of the root that it is unsafe to form any inference from this etymology.² Hoffmann,³ indeed, rejecting the traditional vocalisation of תְּאֵשֶׁר, suggests that it is philologically akin to Assy. šurmēnu (Del. Par. 107), Aram. šarvaina or šurbinā.⁴ If this were made out we should be tolerably certain that תְּאֵשֶׁר is the sherbin or a similar tree; but the philological step is difficult. Cheyne (Is., SBOT [Heb.] 129) 'can hardly doubt that the obscure מִסְכָּךְ in Is. 40:20 is a corruption of שֶׁרְבִין—i.e., sherbin.' If so, תְּאֵשֶׁר would seem to be distinct from the sherbin.

The interesting mention of this tree in Ezek. 27:6 (RV 'box-wood') is concealed in AV by a false division of the word in MT;⁵ the second clause most probably means 'thy deck they have made of ivory inlaid in laššār-wood from Cyprus' (see CHRTIM).

It is clear from Is. 60:13 that תְּאֵשֶׁר was a familiar tree in the forest growth of Lebanon; and this favours the identification with the box (Buxus longifolia), which grows there as a small tree about 20 ft. high (Tristram, NHB, 339). In support of this Rosenmüller (Mineral. and Bot. of Bible [ET], 301 f.) aptly compares Verg. Æn. 10:137 ('quale per artem inclusum buxo . . . lucet ebur') with Ezek. 27:6. Others (Ges.⁽¹³⁾—Bu.⁽²⁾) have thought that the latter reference rather points to a pine tree, so often used in antiquity for ship-building; but תְּאֵשֶׁר is at least distinct from קִרְשֵׁן (fir) and תְּרָרָךְ (pine?), along with which it is twice mentioned in Is. 40:66.

The sherbin, according to Tristram (l.c.) is Juniperus phoenicea, but in the Survey of W. Palestine he expressly says of this non vidi; nor does it, according to the authorities, grow on Lebanon. It seems more probable that the sherbin is Juniperus oxycedrus, which is known to grow on Lebanon.

On the whole there seems no sufficient reason for abandoning the tradition that תְּאֵשֶׁר is the box.

Zerah, king of Edom, and less certainly, though still probably, under the name MIBZAR (g.v.) in Gen. 36:42. All these passages may be exilic or even post-exilic; but it is hardly safe to infer that Bozrah was not known to the Jews before the Exile; indeed, Gen. 36:33 may be ultimately derived from a pre-exilic document. Bozrah is the Bosor (Bozrop) of OS⁽²⁾ 232:8 102:18, described as 'in the mountains of Idumaea'. It seems to be the modern Buṣayra, in the district of Jebāl (Gebalenè), northward from Petra, and 2½ hours SSW. from Ṭafilah, called 'little Bozrah' to distinguish it from the more famous Bozrah in the Haurān. BRACELETS. Bracelets were worn to protect the exposed parts of the arm and hand against physical injury, and as amulets against the malign influences which were believed to affect the organs of action (WRS, Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 453). They served also as ornaments. They were made of gold (Gen. 24:22 Nu. 31:50); but doubtless, like other ancient peoples, the Hebrews employed other less precious materials, as horn and enamelled earthenware. Signet rings were sometimes worn round the wrist (see RING). Bracelets were worn by men and women; the finer forms were among the insignia of royalty and the adornments of brides (for references see below).

Five words have to be considered.

Of these we may first of all reject two words, (1) חָוָה (Ex. 25:22), and (2) חֲתָלִית (Gen. 38:18 25), which are wrongly rendered 'bracelet' in AV. See HOOK, 2; RING, § 1, and cp CORD.

3. צִמְדִּים, ṣamīd (Gen. 24:22, etc. Nu. 31:50 Ezek. 16:11 23:42 EV 'bracelets', G ψέλια); cp Ass. ṣamīdu, to bind on; the same root appears in the Heb. צִמְדִּים, yoke. Golden צִמְדִּים, weighing ten shekels, were given to Rebekah by Eleazar, who placed them on both her hands. So in Ezek. 16:11, the bracelets are worn on both hands. In Nu. (l.c.), צִמְדִּים are conjoined with אֶזְרָתָהּ, and the Commentators mostly explain the former as an ornament for the wrist, the latter for the upper part of the arm. Targ. usually renders 'צ' שְׁרָיָה, 'chains.' The form of these bracelets varied, a favourite device being the serpent. On Egyptian bracelets see Wilk., Anc. Eg. 2:342; on Assyrian, Per. and Chip., Art in Chaldaea, 2:357, and see fig. 241.

4. שָׁרָה, šārāh, Is. 3:19 (EV 'bracelets', RVmg. 'chain.' Targ. יָרָה, 'chains of the hands'). Cp modern Arabic ornament šivār (Fränk. 56). The root is שָׁרָה, to twist. Perhaps a row of spirals made of twisted gold is meant. In the Mishnah שָׁרָה is applied to chains round the necks of horses and also to bracelets worn by women.

5. אֶזְרָתָהּ, ʾeṣratāh. This word occurs in MT in Nu. 31:50 (AV 'chains', RV 'ankle-chains') and 2 S. 1:10 (EV 'bracelet'; G in both places ἀγκυλῶν). Wellhausen's suggestion to read הַזֶּרְקָה, after Is. 3:20, has been widely accepted; but Nestle (Marg. 15) defends MT and supposes that Saul was despoiled by the Amalekite of only one of the several bracelets that he wore. Budde in SBOT accepts Wellhausen's correction, but (on the basis of Nu. 31:50) regards הַזֶּרְקָה as also possible. That kings went into battle with various ornaments is well attested (see CROWN); this is further supported by 1 K. 22:30. It may be that Saul's bracelet contained his signet (King, Antique Gems, 1:38). As with Saul, so with Joash, the crown and bracelet are associated as royal insignia if (with We.) הַזֶּרְקָה is read for הַזֶּרְקָה, 2 K. 11:12 (WRS, OT/C⁽²⁾ 311, n.).

BRAMBLE

Kimhi, however, obtained much the same sense by connecting עֵרָה with עֵרָה, 'ornament.' The Targum on 2 S. 12 renders by עֵרָה, which is usually applied to the phylactery (Dt. 68). A phylactery was, however, also worn on the left arm. עֵרָה is apparently connected with עֵרָה (occurring only in Is. 320), into which We.'s emendation reduces עֵרָה. If the arrangement in Is. 318-23 is suggested by the natural order of the parts of the body, עֵרָה may be an ornament rather of the arm than of the leg. Barth, NB 151, compares Ar. 'adud, 'arm,' which removes some of the difficulty presented by the usual derivation from עָרַץ, to step or walk. See, however, ANKLETS. I. A.

BRAMBLE has in EV three meanings.

1. עֵרָה, 'ālad (βάρνος, rhannus); Gen. 50 10 f. (EV ATAD as in 6), Judg. 9 14 f., EV 'brambles,' and Ps. 58 9 [10], EV 'thorns.' It is a genuine Semitic word, found also in W. Aramaic as עֵרָה or עֵרָה, in Syriac as hattā 1 (? hattā), in Arabic as atād (ligna rhanni nigri, Fr.), and in Assyrian as etidu, etidu (Ges.-Bu., s.v.). The root with which it appears to be connected (עֵרָה) has in Arabic the sense of 'uttering a rasping, though not loud,² sound'; and the possibility of a connection with the sense of pricking or tearing like a thorn is apparent. There is general agreement that βάρνος was about equivalent to the modern botanical genus Rhamnus. Dioscorides³ distinguished three sorts (cp Fraas, Syn. Plant. Flor. Class.); while in modern times Tristram (FFP 264 f.) has enumerated sixteen species of Rhamnea as found in Palestine.

Perhaps the most likely identification for עֵרָה is with Rhamnus palaestina (Boiss.), which represents in Syria the R. oleoides of Greece and S. Europe.

2. עֵרָה, hārah, very frequent; EV usually 'thorn' or 'thistle,' AV once (Is. 34 13) 'bramble.' It denotes a plant of the thorn or perhaps of the thistle kind: see THORN.

3. βάρος, which occurs seven times in 6 (in six of these as the rendering of עֵרָה) and five times in NT, is once (Lk. 6 44) rendered 'bramble bush,' elsewhere BUSH (g.v., § 1 [1]).

BRAN (τὰ πύριπα [BAQ]). The 'burning of bran for incense' (θυμιάσαι τ. π.; to Mylitta?) is mentioned in Bar. 6 (Ep. Jer.) 43 [42]† as one of the incidents in the unchaste idolatrous worship of the women of Babylon. See INCENSE, § 8.

BRASEN SEA (יָם הַנְּחֹשֶׁת), 2 K. 25 13; see LAVER; SEA, BRAZEN.

BRASEN SERPENT (נָחָשׁ הַנְּחֹשֶׁת), 2 K. 18 4. See NEHUSHTAN, § 2.

BRASIER (חָפֶזֶת), Jer. 36 22 f. RV. See COAL, § 3.

BRASS, or BRASEN, EV's rendering of נְחֹשֶׁת, nehōšeth (Gen. 4 22 and often), נְחֹשֶׁת, nāhāš (Job 6 12†), נְחֹשֶׁת, nehāšeth (Lev. 26 19, etc.), נְחֹשֶׁת, nehāš (Dan. 2 32 etc.), χαλκός (Mt. 10 9, 1 Cor. 13 1, Rev. 18 12), and χαλκίον (Mk. 7 4).

EV invariably renders thus except in Ezra 8 27 AV (see COPPER), in 2 S. 22 35 AV, where נְחֹשֶׁת, nehōšeth, is rendered 'steel,' and in Jer. 15 12 AV has 'steel,' see IRON, § 2; cp 2 Tim. 4 14, where χαλκός is 'coppersmith.' In Gen. 4 22 RVing, gives copper, and so elsewhere, as a note on 'brass.' In Ezek. 17 15 נְחֹשֶׁת is rightly rendered 'burnished brass' (ἑξαστράπτων χαλκός; Tg. below), as also is χαλκολίπανος in Rev. 15 2 f. In Ezra 8 27 נְחֹשֶׁת is qualified by the epithet כְּצֶהָבִית (RV 'bright'), which we should probably point כְּצֶהָבִית, 'glittering' (in Tg. Ezek. 17 for כְּצֶהָבִית, 'polished'). נְחֹשֶׁת, which follows (EV 'fine'), arises out of dittography, and should not be rendered (Che.).

That copper is meant is shown by the words, 'out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass' (Dt. 8 9); cp the chapter in Holland's Pliny (1601), headed 'Mines of Brass.' See COPPER and cp EGYPT, § 36 end.

² From the absence of loudness in the sound is derived the sense of Heb. נָחָשׁ—properly a 'whisper,' and thence 'softness,' 'stillness.' See also DIVINATION, § 4, iv.

BREAD

BREAD. From the earliest times of which we have any record, bread was the principal article of food among the Hebrews, a fact which ex-

1. Preparation. explains the use of עֵרָה both for bread and for food in general. The primitive custom of making the ears of wheat and barley more palatable by the simple process of roasting (עֵרָה, 'parched corn'; 1 S. 17 17, etc.) was still common in historical times. For the preparation of bread, however, the ears must be crushed or ground so as to admit of being kneaded into a paste. In early times the flour was produced by crushing the ears between two stones (see illustrations of these primitive 'corn-grinders' found in Palestine in Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, 85), a process common in Egypt under the Old Empire and later (see Erman's Egypt, 190), and still practised in the East. The mortar and pestle were a later development. The preparation of flour by pounding the ears in a mortar (עֵרָה, Nu. 118) is a familiar scene on Egyptian monuments. The flour obtained by these processes must have been of a coarser grain (עֵרָה) than that procured by the use of the handmill (עֵרָה; see MILL). A still finer quality than the ordinary עֵרָה was named עֵרָה (see FOOD, § 3 [b]).

In the earliest times bread was entirely unleavened. The requisite quantity of flour or barley-meal, which varied, naturally, according to the size of the household, was placed in a shallow wooden basin (עֵרָה; Ex. 7 28)—earthenware, for obvious reasons, is little used by nomads—well mixed with water and kneaded. Salt was no doubt added when procurable (cp Lev. 2 13 b). When the kneading was completed, the dough (עֵרָה) was ready for the firing. Cakes thus prepared were named עֵרָה, 'unleavened cakes,' and these still form the usual bread of the Bedouin. In a more advanced stage of society, the bread was made in this way only in cases of emergency (Gen. 19 3), or for purposes of ritual, as at the Passover. The ordinary bread of the Hebrews was made lighter by fermentation. A small piece of to-day's 'batch' was laid aside, and when the time for the next baking arrived this piece of leaven (עֵרָה) was broken down into the water in the כִּשְׂמֵרָה, the flour was mixed therewith, and the whole thoroughly kneaded and allowed to stand 'till the whole was leavened.'

The next stage is the process of firing, or rendering 2. Firing: the dough more digestible by the application of heat. Three modes of kinds of cakes. firing are found in the OT, as in the East at the present day.

(a) The simplest method is that still in use among the Bedouin. A fire of wood, or of wood mixed with camel's dung, is kindled on the sand, or on extemporised hearthstones. When these have been well heated, the embers are raked aside, and the flat pieces of dough laid on the hot stones and covered with the ashes just removed. After a few minutes, the ashes are again raked aside, the cakes turned, and the ashes replaced. In a few minutes more the cakes are ready (see Rob. BR 2 416 f., Doughty, Arab. Des. 1 131 etc.). Such 'a cake baked on the coals' was termed עֵרָה (1 K. 19 6; cp Gen. 18 6 Hos. 7 8, עֵרָה, ἐξερφίας, by the Vg. correctly rendered panis subincineratus, 'ash cakes').

(b) A second mode of firing bread is one much in vogue at the present day among Bedouin and fellahin alike. A girdle or thin iron plate (עֵרָה; Lev. 25 Ezek. 4 3, עֵרָה, τήγανον), slightly convex in shape, is laid over a small fire-pit, in which a fire has been kindled as before, and on this plate or girdle the cakes are fired. Its Syrian name is siḡ (Landberg, Prov. et Dict. du Peuple Arabe, 14). Cakes baked in this way seem to have been called by the Hebrews הַבֶּקֶת (1 Ch. 9:37).

(c) The most usual mode of firing, however, especially in towns, was no doubt by means of the oven (תַּנּוּר). The tannūr, then as now, was a large earthenware jar in the bottom of which the fire was placed. As represented on Egyptian monuments, the cakes were fired by being applied to the outside of the jar (Wilkinson 234; Erman, Egypt, 191). The usual method at the present day, however, is to allow the fire to burn down, and, while the embers are still glowing, to apply the cake to the inside of the jar. The dough is first pressed into flat round cakes (like a Scotch bannock); each of these in its turn is made to revolve by a rapid movement of the hands, till it has expanded to a diameter of about 18 inches, and become as thin as a sheet of thick paper. It is then laid on a cushion, by means of which it is applied to the wall of the tannūr. These thin wafer-cakes are called in the OT בֶּקֶת (in Syria, marḥūḥ). The tannūr may be larger, and consist of a pit, wider at the bottom and narrowing towards the top, plastered with clay. The ovens used by the bakers of the street in Jerusalem named after them (Jer. 37:21) were probably of this sort. (For further details see FURNACE, 5).

The preparation of the daily supply of bread for the household was essentially the care of the women (Gen. 18:6 1 S. 28:24 etc.). In the wealthier households this duty would devolve on slaves, male and female (1 S. 8:13). In later times baking became a special trade in the cities (Jos. Ant. xv. 92), and especially in Jerusalem (see above and cp the 'oven tower,' Neh. 3:1 12:38), where the large influx of pilgrims at the great festivals would promote the industry.

It is impossible now to identify the various species of cakes mentioned in the OT. If to those mentioned in the course of this article we add בֶּקֶת the ordinary round cake or bannock (1 S. 2:36), and הַבֶּקֶת, the etymology of which points to its being pricked or perforated, like the modern passover cakes, we have exhausted the varieties that can be identified with any approach to certainty. See further BAKEMEATS, also FOOD, §§ 1-3.

BREASTPLATE, COAT OF MAIL (שָׁרִיטָן [שָׁרִיטָן] 1 K. 22:34 1s. 59:17, or שָׁרִיטָן Jer. 46:4 51:3, Syr. ܫܪܝܬܐ). We find the kyriōn mentioned as part of the defensive armour of Goliath and David. That it was commonly worn by Israelite kings is evident from 1 K. 22:34 (2 Ch. 18:33). In the description of Goliath's armour in 1 S. 17:5 ('coat-of-mail' EV) the addition of the word שָׁרִיטָן gives a valuable clue: Goliath's coat of mail was covered with bronze scales.

This meaning is certified by Dt. 14:9 (Lev. 11:9), where שָׁרִיטָן denotes the scales of a fish. Moreover, it is derived from a root, שָׁרַט, that signifies rubbing or peeling off. Ar. kašša in conj. iv. expresses the peeling off of skin during recovery from disease.¹

The weight of Goliath's armour, according to 1 S. 17:5, was 5000 shekels, which may be roughly computed as about 200 lbs. The close intercourse that there was between Egypt and Philistia² makes it not improbable that the heavy coat of mail worn by Goliath resembled the Egyptian cuirass worn by a royal personage, in which yellow, blue, red, and green metallic scales were tastefully arranged in symmetrical rows (Weiss, Kosmikhunde, Abth. 156). Wilkinson has described the Egyptian cuirass as consisting of about 'eleven horizontal rows of metal plates well secured by bronze pins.' At 'the hollow of the throat a narrower range of plates was introduced. The breadth of each plate or scale was little more than an inch, twelve of them sufficing to cover the front of the body, and the sleeves, which were sometimes so short as to extend less than half-way to the elbow, consisted of two rows of similar plates.'

The Assyrian warriors in earlier times wore a heavy coat of mail covering the entire body with the exception of the arms. Occasionally the coat of mail did not reach farther than the knees. In later times the leading warriors were protected by jackets made of leather or of stout material, on which metal plates were sewn or rivetted (or they were provided with iron or bronze studs). Broad girdles were used for tying in the long coats of mail. Upon a bas-relief, from Nimrud, portrayed in Layard's work we see an Assyrian chariot in which the bowman is mail-clad even around his neck and ears. It is not improbable that Ahab wore a heavy coat of mail somewhat resembling the Assyrian (but shorter), as we know that he took every precaution for personal protection.

The statement that he was mortally wounded by an arrow which pierced 'between שָׁרִיטָן and the coat of mail' has been variously interpreted. Θ ἀνὰ μέσον τοῦ πνεύματος κ.τ.λ. does not yield any satisfactory sense. The use of שָׁרִיטָן in Is. 41:7 (Θ σύμβλημα), and the fundamental signification of the root, point to 'rivets' as a probable rendering, if it could yield any adequate sense in the context. Thenius and other authorities follow Luther in holding that what is meant here is an attachment or appendage to the coat of mail. The coat of mail protected the breast, whereas the appendage guarded the lower portion of the body, and the arrow penetrated through the interval that separated them (so Riehlm, HWB). This appears to be the only intelligible explanation, and etymology warrants the rendering of the word שָׁרִיטָן by 'attachments' or 'appendages' (i.e., to the cuirass).

Respecting the coats of mail or corslets with which Uzziah is said to have provided his troops (2 Ch. 26:14) we have not definite information or any sufficient clue to guide us. The corslets (AV 'brigandines') which Jeremiah (46:4) bids the cavalry of Pharaoh Necho put on may have consisted of some thick woven material covered with metal scales; but here, as in the case of Neh. 4:16 [20], we are left in much uncertainty. For Neh. 4:16 [20] a useful hint may be derived from Herod. 7:63, where we learn that the Syrian (or Assyrian) contingent of Xerxes' army wore ἀλυσσοὶ θώρακες, which were probably close-fitting sleeveless jackets of coarse felt. Probably the tahrā (תַּחְרָא), AV 'habergeon,' RV 'coat-of-mail,' of Ex. 28:32 (cp 39:23, both passages from P), was a corslet of this character.

Etymology here does not help us as the word is from the Aramaic root שָׁרַט (ethpeal 'to fight') and therefore means simply 'fighting garb.' Targ. Onk. renders it שָׁרִיטָן, 'breastplate.' Θ (Ex. 28:28) is based on another text. Knobel is on the right track when he says in his comment (cited by Di., ad loc.): 'We are reminded of the ἀλυσσῶρας of the Greeks (Il. 2:529 8:30). Egypt excelled in its manufacture.'

In the Greek period (300 B.C. and later), the ordinary heavy-armed soldiers wore coats of fine iron chain-mail (θώραξ ἀλυσσιδωτός), a series of links connected into a continuous chain (Rich).

It is significant that Θ gives this interpretation in 1 S. 17:5, and we may conclude from 1 Macc. 6:35 that during the entire Greek period this was the kind of cuirass usually worn. What form of breastplate was pictured before Paul's imagination as a symbol for the righteousness of a Christian warrior (Eph. 6:14, cp Is. 59:17 and 1 Macc. 5:8)—whether a corslet of scale armour (column of Antoninus), or a cuirass of 'broad metal plates across the chest and long flexible bands (lamina) of steel over the shoulders' (depicted on the column of Trajan)—can only be conjectured. Excellent woodcuts representing both may be found in Rich's Dict. of Roman and Greek Antiquities. Compare also Warre-Cornish's Concise Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiquities. O. C. W.

BREASTPLATE, Priestly (חֹשֶׁן; Ex. 284, ΠΕΡΙ-CΤΗΘΙΟΝ [BAL]; elsewhere to ΛΟΓΕΙΟΝ [BAF], TO ΛΟΓΕΙΟΝ [L], 'oracle'; but twice [Ex. 256 (7) 358 (9)]
Ⓢ^{BAL} has ΠΟΔΗΡΗΣ where MT has חֹשֶׁן or BREAST-PLATE OF JUDGMENT (חֹשֶׁן הַמִּשְׁפָּט, Ex. 2815;
λ. τῶν κρίσεων [BAL]; often in Ⓢ), an object worn on the ephod of the High Priest. It seems to have been a square piece attached by its corners to the shoulder-straps of the ephod (see EPHOD, § 3) and of like material—probably a species of pocket whose outer side was adorned with precious stones. The etymology of the word is uncertain.

Di. rejects the probable derivation from the root hasuna, 'to be beautiful,' and would prefer to connect it with חָשַׁן, sinus or 'fold' in which something is carried; cp Ewald, Alterth. 390.

BREECHES, in the proper usage of the word, denotes the divided garment reaching from the waist to just below the knees, equivalent to the Lat. feminalia and Gr. περισκελη, as distinguished from bracæ (braccæ) or ἀναζυγιάδες, which reached to the ankles
—the garment ordinarily denoted by the word 'hosen' at the time when the AV was made. The earliest form of the garment seems to have been simply a loin cloth (cp GIRDLE, 1). Generally, however, the long mantle worn in the East made a special covering for the legs unnecessary, and even the warriors who are depicted upon the monuments with their short tunics have the leg below the knee wholly bare with the exception of sandals. Noteworthy, on the other hand, are the lacings which protect the shins and knees of the follower of Asur-bāni-pal (Per. and Chip., Art in Chald.
ii. pl. x.); see further SHOES. Breeches, in fact, seem to be a distinctively Persian dress (see Herod. 171 761), and do not appear to have been known among the Israelites—at all events not before the exile.¹ Apart from the characteristic priestly breeches (see below, 3), garments of this nature are mentioned only in Dan. 321
[EV].

1. סַרְבָּל, sarbāl (Dan. 321 27), RV 'hosen,'² supported by a consensus of opinion (Theod., Aq., Sym.
Pesh., Hi., Ew., Behrmann, etc.).

In this case the word is derived from Gr. σάρβαρα, saraballa (Lag. Ges. Abh. 207, Frä. Aram. Lehnw. 48), probably of Pers. origin (cp mod. Pers. shakwār). In Targ. and Talm., on the other hand, סַרְבָּל (originally not connected with the above) denotes a 'mantle'; so Jewish exegetes (Aben-Ezra, etc.) and AV (‘coats,’ mg. ‘mantles’) in this passage.

For more than one reason the AV is probably better. ‘Coats’ or ‘mantles’ suits the climax in v. 27, which describes the powerlessness of the fire over the Three, better than RV—their bodies were uninjured; nor was their hair singed; their mantles (flowing loose robes, easily inflammable) were unchanged, nor had the smell of fire passed on them.

2. פָּשִׁיט, paššūt, in פָּשִׁיטוּן (or rather פָּשִׁיטוֹן [Bä. Gi.]), Dan. 321, is an exceedingly obscure term for which are offered such diverse renderings as ‘hosen’ (AV), ‘tunics’ (RV), ‘turbans’ (RV^{mg.}).

‘Turbans’ may be safely dismissed as unphilological and improbable (see TURBAN); for the rest cp Syr. ܦܫܝܬܐ (a) Persian tunic (cp RV) (b) breeches, also a kind of leggings (cp AV); see Payne-Smith, Thes. The Jew.-Aram. פָּשִׁיט occurs in only one passage independent of Dan. 321, and apparently denotes some-

¹ Much later, in the Roman period, bracæ, feminalia, and fasciæ all found their way into Judæa (Brüll, Trachten d.
Juden, 87).

² Evidently retained in its older sense. The modern ‘hosen’ is applied to stockings.

thing worn upon the feet; but the text is probably corrupt (see Levy, NHWB, s.v. פָּשִׁיט), although Kohut (Aruch Completum, s.v. פָּשִׁיט) argues for its authenticity. It is not improbable that פָּשִׁיט is a gloss on סַרְבָּל; this is indirectly suggested by the philological evidence and the versions (Ⓢ⁸⁷ reads only two of the three terms), and is directly supported by quotations in the old Latin fathers. For a discussion of סַרְבָּל and פָּשִׁיט, see further Journ. Phil. 20307 ff. [199].

3. The priestly linen breeches (חֹשֶׁן-יִרְדֵּי [כָּנָן to cover, hide], περισκελή λινά, feminalia, Pesh. transliterates περίσκιμα) were to be worn along with the holy linen coat, the linen girdle, and the linen turban by Aaron on the Day of Atonement as he entered the holy place within the curtain (Lev. 164 [P]). It is probably by an oversight that they are specially mentioned in Ecclus. 458 along with the long robe and ephod (or rather the kuttôneth and me'il; so Heb.) as part of his 'apparel of honour.' Ordinary priests also wore them on sacrificial occasions (Ex. 2842 3928 Lev. 610 [3] [all P], Ezek. 4418 [the b'nē Zadok]).

According to Jos. (Ant. iii. 71) the μαναχόρη [Niese] was a girdle (διάζωμα)¹ of fine twisted linen. It was the undermost of the priestly garments and possibly the most primitive, since the older law of Ex. 2026 (JE [according to Bacon, E]) seems to imply that the wearing of the garment was not originally compulsory for priest or layman. The change seems to be due to a primitive conception of holiness. Clothes which had come in contact with a holy place or function became taboo (Ar. harim), and therefore useless in ordinary life. The way to avoid this misfortune was to perform holy ceremonies naked (just as the Bedouins made the sacred circuit of the Kaaba at Mecca in a nude condition), or in holy vestments borrowed from the priests (cp 2 K. 1022). The law of Ex. 2026 is apparently aimed against the former custom (for which see further WRS, *RS*¹² 451 f.). See DRESS, PRIEST. I. A.—S. A. C.

BRICK (לֵבֶנָה), derived by Ges. from לָבַן, 'to be white,' as if bricks were originally made of a whitish clay; but this is a forced etymology; Ⓢ

1. Of the Hebrews ΠΛΙΝΘΟΣ.² The Hebrew word for brick is not limited to sun-dried bricks. There is no doubt, however, that the Israelites, like most Eastern nations, used this kind almost exclusively; in Gen. 113 burning bricks is mentioned as a foreign custom, analogous to the use of asphalt (see BITUMEN) for mortar, and we may safely disregard EV's rendering 'brickkiln' in 2 S. 1231, Nah. 314.³ Sun-dried bricks of a very early period have been found in Palestine; burnt bricks seem to date generally from the Roman period. It will be remembered that the houses of the mass of the Israelites were made of sun-dried clay (see HOUSE); it was of the same material that their bricks were composed.⁴

The true countries of brick-makers and brick-builders were Egypt⁵ and Mesopotamia. In Egypt, not only all houses, but also all palaces, many tombs (including several of the smaller pyramids), and some temples, were constructed of Nile-mud bricks.

The representations of brick-making which are to be found in Egyptian wall-pictures are very instructive.

2. Brick-making They not only show the process with great clearness, but also illustrate most vividly the serfdom of the Israelites on Egyptian ground. The most famous picture, for example, represents foreigners—chiefly of a Semitic type—at work,

¹ We are reminded of the manner in which the Ar. misar has evolved from the simple isār; see GIRDLE, 1.

² Some scholars consider πλινθος, the Greek term for brick, to have been borrowed by the Greeks from the Phœnicians in the form λεβινθ. [לֵבֶנָה, Ass. libittu, seems to come from labinnu, 'to throw down flat'; see LAMIN, and cp Del. Prod.

Jer. 439 alters the unintelligible 'brickkiln' of AV into 'brick-

⁴ Altars, also, were made of earth: cp the obscure Is. 453
(see SACRIFICE). On the law in Ex. 2026 (E2) see ALAM, § 3.

BRICK

superintended by Egyptian 'task masters' armed with sticks.

The analogy to the labour of Israel as described in Ex. 1 is so striking that many writers have ventured to regard the picture as referring to the circumstances with which that record deals. The scene, however, represents 'brick-making for the great magazine in Eastern Thebes' (Opet, mod. Karnak), and the explanatory legend states that the labourers are 'captives' brought by his majesty (Dhutmoser or Thotmes III.) for work on the temple of Amon; many (not the majority) of the working men seem to be African captives.

The picture illustrates the whole process of brick-making.

We see the labourers hoeing the ground with the wooden Egyptian hoe (see AGRICULTURE, fig. 3), carrying the black earth (Nile-mud deposited at the annual inundation) in baskets¹ to a clean (sandy?) place, moistening it with water taken from shallow ponds, evidently at some distance from the Nile, and kneading it with their feet. The wooden moulding-frame is filled with material of the right consistency, and emptied on the ground; then the square heaps of mud, placed in rows side by side, are left to dry.²

These Egyptian bricks were usually twice the size of our modern ones. Many of them (from dynasty 18 onwards) were stamped with the name of a king, to show that they belonged to public buildings; sometimes the stamp shows the name of the building, and sometimes in addition to this the name of the officer charged with the construction of the building.³ Stamps as well as moulds have been preserved to modern times, and bricks with the name of Rameses II., 'the Pharaoh of the oppression' (but see EGYPT, § 58 ff.), are shown in our museums. We often find chopped straw or reed mixed with the mud to make it more consistent and to prevent cracking during the drying. According to Ex. 5:18 the pharaoh showed his malice by doubling the work of the Israelites. Apparently we are to understand that, instead of furnishing straw from the royal domains and from the magazines of a fifth part of the other fields, he forced the oppressed strangers to gather the straw from the fields themselves. This, however, they could not well accomplish during their scanty leisure time; besides, the stalks were used (and are still used) as fodder, especially when not quite dry. Nor is it any easier to see how they could get old straw of the previous year (from the refuse heaps of farmyards, etc.?) in quantities sufficient for their 'tale of bricks.' For the rest, we frequently find not only foreign captives, but also the Egyptian serfs, referred to in Egyptian texts as making bricks under constraint.

We now turn to the second brick-building country—Mesopotamia. Owing to the scarcity of stone in

4. Babylonian. Babylonia proper, brick was the only building material, stone being reserved for the ornamentation of edifices, and the construction of certain parts, such as the threshold (see BABYLONIA, § 15). Whilst in Egypt rain is so scarce that buildings of sun-dried brick have a certain durability, the climate of Babylonia is less favourable. The Babylonians, accordingly, made their constructions more solid. They built walls of an enormous thickness: for example, the great enclosure of Babylon which Nebuchadrezzar erected with the clay dug from the ditch of the city (cp BABYLON, § 5). Moreover, their unfavourable climate forced the Babylonians, though wood was at least as scarce in their country as in Egypt, to use burnt bricks, especially for the outer layers of their thick walls. This led to a high development of the art of glazing and colouring bricks. We find large walls covered with elaborate paintings, whilst in Egypt such enamelled tiles were used much more rarely and always on a smaller scale. Crude bricks, however, sometimes of enormous size and always without straw, were the common material, especially in the earlier times. Hence we have brick stamps with, for example, the name of such old kings as Sargon of Agadé and Naram-sin.

² The Egyptian method of representing objects in perspective is likely to give the impression that the bricks are placed one above another.

In Nineveh, sun-dried bricks seem to have been the building material in general use. On Ezek. 41, which mentions Ezekiel as portraying the siege of Jerusalem on clay-tiles, see Ezek. SBOT (Eng.), p. 98 ff.

BRIDLE. The various Heb. and Gr. words will be found dealt with in the articles specified below.

1. מִסְחָר, maḥsēm (φύλακς), Ps. 39:1[2] EV, EVmg. 'muzzle' (cp CATTLE, § 9). Most inappropriate; read מִשְׁרָץ, 'a guard' (Ps. 141:3 מִשְׁרָץ), with Herz, Che.

2. מִשְׁלֹחַ, mešlōḥ, Zech. 14:20 AVmg., EV BELLS [q.v., 2].

3. מֶתֶחַג, metheg, 2 K. 19:28 (χαλινός) || Is. 37:29 (EVmg., Prov. 28:3 (κέντρον). EV is no doubt correct. Cp the place-name in 2 S. 8:1, METHEG-AMMAH.

4. רֶסֶן, resen, Is. 30:28 (⊗ doubtful), Job 30:11 (χαλινός), Ps. 32:9 (κνημός), Job 41:13[5] EV (θώραξ). Perhaps 'bit' would be a better rendering.

5. χαλινός Jas. 3:3 RV, AV 'bit'; Rev. 14:20 EV (cp Eur. Alceſtis, 492); cp HORSE, § 2.

BRIER. Six Hebrew words have to be considered.

1. בַּרְקָנִים, barḳānīm (Judg. 8:7 מִסְחָר), are mentioned along with 'thorns of the wilderness' as the instruments with which Gideon 'taught,' or rather 'threshed' (v. 7; cp Moore's comm. ad loc.), the men of Succoth. The etymology of the Hebrew word being unknown and its occurrence so rare, it is scarcely worth while to speculate as to the kind of thorn intended.

We may notice that according to Boissier, 3602 (quoted by Ascherson in Löw, 429), barḳān is in modern times an Arabic name for Phaeocephalus scrofastris, Boiss. The parallelism with 'thorns of the wilderness' in both places is enough to refute the absurd idea invented by Michaelis and adopted by Gesenius that בַּרְקָנִים meant 'threshing-wains.' The method of torture alluded to is that of carding (see Moore).

2. שָׁמִיר, šāmīr, occurs eight times in Is. (56:7 23 24 25 9:8 [17] 10:17 27:4 32:13),² in seven of these along with מִשְׁרָץ, a word of similar meaning. שָׁמִיר is a genuine Semitic word, and Celsius (2:188 cp Fränkel, 89) pointed out its affinity with Ar. samur, some kind of thorny plant. The Hebrew word seems a general one for thorny plants, of which there are many kinds in Palestine (Tristram enumerates sixteen species of Rhamnus, FFP 263 ff.). The ancient versions give no help towards a nearer determination of the species.

3. מִשְׁרָץ, mišrāṣ (κόρυφα [Sym. κρίς] Is. 55:13†), a wilderness-plant, probably of the nettle kind, as its name is apparently connected with שָׂרַץ = שָׂרַץ, 'to burn.'

⊗ Aq. Theod. took it to be the 'fleabane'; Sym. and Vg. the 'nettle'. Pesh. renders gāthra, probably 'savory.' Any of these will suit the passage well enough; under the new dispensation this plant was to give place to the myrtle.

4. מִרְבֵּב, sārābhīm, AVmg. 'rebels' (παροιστρήσουσι [Sym. ἱταμοί, Th. δύσκολοι] Ezek. 26†), is not a plant name.

According to the testimony of all the ancient versions, the word is almost certainly to be read as the participle (מִרְבֵּב) of a verb common in Aram., 'to gainsay falsely' or 'idly'; and the following word, מְלִינִים, is perhaps a mistake for מְלִי' ('despising') or some such word, so that the clause would read 'though they gainsay and condemn thee' (see Co. ad loc.). There is no support anywhere for a word מְלִינִים meaning 'briers.'

² In the other three places where מִשְׁרָץ occurs (Jer. 17:1 Ezek. 8:9 Zech. 7:12) it is rendered 'diamond' or 'adamant' (see ADAMANT, § 3).

BRIGANDINE

5. סִלְוֹן, sillōn (σάλοψ, Ezek. 28:24),¹ is connected with Jewish Aram. מִלְוָה, Syr. sahwā, Ar. sullā, Mand. מִלְוָה (Lōw, 150), all of which mean a 'thorn' or 'pricking point.'

6. תְּהַרֵּק, hēdeḳ (ἀκανθαί, ² Prov. 15:19 [where EV 'thorns'] Mic. 7:4†), is by Wellhausen (KL Proph. (3) 149) connected with Ar. hadika, an enclosed garden or orchard; he reads in Micah תְּהַרֵּק תְּהַרֵּק תְּהַרֵּק (ihr Bester ist aus der Dornhecke und ihr Gradester aus dem Gestrüpp'), thus producing a good parallelism. On the other hand, Lōw (147), following Celsius (ii. 35 ff.), explains the word by reference to Ar. hadak, which, according to Lane (s.v.), is Solanum cordatum. Tristram (FFP, 368) identifies it with Solanum sanctum, L. (sometimes called the apple of Sodom: see Bāid. (3) 152). We may at all events gather from Prov. 15:19 that a thorny plant capable of forming a hedge is intended. For Heb. 68 AV [τρίβολοι], see THISTLE [4]. N. M.

BRIGANDINE (מִלְוָה), Jer. 46:4, RV 'coats of mail'; see BREASTPLATE (i.).

BRIMSTONE (i.e., brinston, 'burning stone'; מִלְוָה, gophrith; θείων; ³ SULPHUR).

The passages are Gen. 19:24 Dt. 29:23 [22] Job 18:15 Ps. 116 [7] Is. 30:33 34:9 Ezek. 38:22 Lk. 17:29 Rev. 9:17 f. 14:10 19:20 20:10 21:8†). Gophrith is apparently connected with מִלְוָה, 'bitumen' (cp the Aram. and Ar. forms with initial h), but surely not of Bactrian origin, as Lagarde⁴ supposed.

Almost invariably the passages in which brimstone is mentioned relate to divine judgments; there is no direct statement of any use to which sulphur was put by the Hebrews. They cannot have known anything of the industrial uses of that mineral, which have so largely added to the wealth of the regions where it is most easily obtained (e.g., Sicily). The only objects to which it was applied by the ancients, according to Plin. HN 35:15, are the making of lamp wicks (ellyphnia), the fumigation and cleansing of wool, certain medical remedies, and, lastly, religious purifications⁵ (cp Od. 22 48:483; after the slaughter of the suitors).

It may be conjectured, however, that sulphur was used in the so-called TOPHETH (q.v.) of the Valley of Hinnom (cp Is. 30:33), and one conclusion may safely be drawn from the many descriptions in which brimstone is referred to—that the Israelites were not unacquainted with the volcanic phenomena known as 'solfatara' or those known as 'fire-wells' (as emanations of carburetted hydrogen, when they take fire, are frequently called). These 'fire-wells' occur in many of the districts where mud-volcanoes appear, in Europe, Asia, and N. America.⁶ Reminiscences of phenomena of this kind apparently underlie certain parts of the account of the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah in Gen. 19 and the other passages (see above) where the same narrative is directly or indirectly alluded to.

It is probable that the Hebrews, like the Greeks (see IL 14:15 Od. 12:17) and the Romans (Plin. HN 35:15),⁷ associated the ozonic smell which often so perceptibly accompanies lightning discharges with the presence of sulphur. This may help to explain the passages which describe or allude to the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah as having been brought about by a rain of fire and brimstone from heaven (Job 18:15 Gen. 19:24 Ps. 116 Ezek. 38:22 Lk. 17:29).

BROOK. The Hebrew word usually thus rendered is נַחַל, nahal (χευμάβρους; cp in NT Jn. 18:1), which, like the Ar. wādī, denotes not only the flowing brook itself (cp נַחַל אֵיתָן, Am. 5:24), but also, like the Ar. wādī, the dried-up river bed¹ (cp the term נַחַל, Jer. 15:18). Hence Job likens his unstable brethren to a brook whose supply of water cannot be counted on (Job 6:15).

In Is. 19:6, יְאֵרֵי מִצְרָיִם māzār, 'the brooks of defence,' means rather 'streams of Egypt' (so RV). יְאֵר, a word which bears resemblance both to the Eg. 'io(du)', 'river,' and to the Ass. ia'uru, 'stream,' is applied usually to the Nile.

מַיִם, mayim, in מַיִם מְרִימִים, mayim merimim, 'water-brooks,' Ps. 42:3 [Joel 1:20 (πηγαί, ἀφείρετε ὑδάτων)], is a poetical word which, from its radical idea of holding or confining, denotes properly a channel (cp Is. 8:7). It is otherwise rendered 'stream,' 'river,' 'waters,' etc., and occurs in various involved figurative meanings, in Job 12:21 (AV 'the mighty'), 40:18 (AV 'strong pieces'), 41:15 [7] (מַיִם מְרִימִים, AV 'scales').

מִכְנַל, mikhāl, rendered 'brook' in 2 S. 17:20, is a word of unknown etymological history (for Fr. Del.'s identification with the Ass. mikhālu, 'a canal,' cp Dr. ad loc. and ZA TW 40:724). The word, if not corrupt (We. conjectures some such word as מִכְנַל or out of its place, is quite unknown.²

3. πόρπη (1 Macc. 10:89 11:58 14:44) was a gold buckle, bestowed in one instance as an honourable distinction on Jonathan by king Alexander Balas, 'as the use is to give to such as are the kindred of the king' (1 Macc. 10:89).

Such buckles or brooches formed the fastenings of the outer garment on the breast or over the shoulder. They were of various shapes, the commonest being a flat circular ring with a pin passing through the centre (Rawlinson). The use of golden buckles (like that of the purple robe) was reserved to men of distinction (see passages cited, and cp Livy, 39:31); see CROWN, § 4.

BUKKI (בִּקְיָה), § 52; abbreviated from בִּקְיָהוּ; BOUKY[ε] [L]; see BUKKIAH).

1. Said to have been the fourth in descent from Aaron in the line of Eleazar: 1 Ch. 6:51 [53:1 6:36] (cp 5 Bue [B], waki [A]).

2. Is accordingly sometimes rendered 'valley': cp, e.g., Dt. 2:36 2 Ch. 20:16 33:14 in RV.

3. The Targ. identifies בִּקְיָה with the Jordan. No help can be obtained from the Versions, unless the διεληλυθασι σπυδοντες of Θ L be correct, in which case מִכְנַל may be a corruption of some such word as מִכְנַל or מִכְנַל (elsewhere late). See also H. P. Smith, ad loc.

BUKKIAH

v. 51 -καί [BA]; Ezra 74 (Βοκκ[ε] [BA])=1 Esd. 82, BOCCAS (Bokka [BA]). In 4 Esd. 12 the name appears as Borith (Borith).

2. Danite; one of the chiefs chosen to divide Canaan (Bakeip [B], -XXI [F], -κακ[ε]p [L], Bokk[ε] [A], Nu. 34 22 [P]).

BUKKIAH (בִּקְיָהוּ), perhaps connected with the Syr. verb בִּקַּח, and, if pointed בִּקְיָהוּ, signifying 'Yahwè has tested,' §§ 39, 52; one of the sons of Heman, 1 Ch. 25 4 13 (Βογκειας [B], ΒΟΚΚΙΑΔ, KOKK. [A], ΒΟΚΥΙΑΔ [L], בִּקְיָהוּ). See BAKBUKIAH.

BUL (בֹּל), perhaps 'rain-month,' from בֹּל; cp in Ph. בֹּל, CYS i. no. 31; its identification with the Palmi. divine name בֹּל (in עֲבֹדְבֹל, etc.) is not certain; Βαδδ [BA], Βογλ [L], 1 K. 6 38. See MONTH, §§ 2, 5.

BULL (בָּקָר, Jer. 52 20; פָּר, Gen. 32 15 [16]; שֹׁר, Job 21 10; אֶפְרַיִם, Ps. 50 13, and ΤΑΥΡΟΣ, Heb. 9 13). See CATTLE, § 2. For the bull in mythological representations, see CALF, GOLDEN; CATTLE, § 14; CHERUB, § 7; and cp STARS, § 3 a. For the brazen bulls (2 K. 16 17), see SEA, BRAZEN. It is worth adding that bull-fights are often represented on wall-paintings in Egyptian tombs (see P. E. Newberry, El Bersheh, pt. i., p. 28, n. 1).

BUNNI (בִּנְיָ, בִּנְיָ and בִּנְיָ, §§ 5, 79; cp BANI).

1. A Levite, Neh. 9 4 (Βουνια [L]; transl. νιός [BNA]), see Ezra, ii. § 13 (F); possibly identical with the signatory to the covenant (see Ezra, i., § 7), Neh. 10 15 [16] (Βαυ [BNA], Βοκχ[ε] or νιός [L]), whose name, however, is perhaps due to dittography of BANI [n. 4] in v. 14 [15].

2. Another Levite, one of the overseers of the temple, Neh. 11 15 (BNA om., Βοννα [L], -αι [No. amg. sup.]); not mentioned in 1 Ch. 9 14.

BURDEN (מַשָּׂא, massā—i.e., 'lifting up'; hence either 'burden' or 'utterance' ['to utter' is 'to lift up the voice']). 'Burden' in EV, when used of a prophetic revelation, should rather be 'oracle' (as RV mg. 2 K. 9 25 etc.). Cp PROPHECY. The term massā became a subject of popular derision in the time of Jeremiah, owing to its double meaning (see above), so that Jeremiah pronounces a divine prohibition of its use (Jer. 23 33 f.). It continued, however, to be used in the headings of prophecy. As to the application of massā, once only it denotes divine judicial sentence (2 K. 9 25; cp Jer. 23 36); elsewhere there is no such limitation of meaning. In Prov. 30 1 beyond doubt מַשָּׂא should be emended to מַשָּׂל, in 31 1 to מַשָּׂל (see AGUR, LEMUEL).

ΘΒΑΩ renders variously λήμμα (in the Minor Prophets regularly), ῥήμα (Is. 15 1 17 22 1 and 21 1 [Q]), ῥαμα (Is. 21 1 also ῥβ. 15 1 [A], 22 1 [A], and 23 1 [MAQ mg.]), and ῥπασις (Is. 19 30 6).

BUSH represents in AV three different Hebrew words.

1. קִנָּה, śēnāh (βάρτος, rubus: Ex. 3 2-4 Dt. 33 16 Mk. 12 26 Lk. 6 44 [EV 'bramble bush'] 20 37 Acts 7 30 35 f.) denotes a rough thorny bush—which is

1. Hebrew the original sense of our 'bramble'—as terms. is shown by the use of the same word in later Hebrew, in Aramaic, Arabic, and Assyrian, and confirmed by the rendering of the ancient Versions. Löw (275), following Forskål (Flor. Æg. Ar. cxiii.), identifies it with Rubus fruticosus. Some, on the ground that the bramble is not found on Sinai, assume that a kind of acacia is referred to. These Hebrew and Greek words are used in OT and NT respectively only in connection with the theophany to Moses in Horeb (Sinai), except in Lk. 6 44. 1 In OT (Ex. 3 2-4 Dt. 33 16), and in Acts 7 30 35, the term refers to the actual bush; in Mk. 12 26=Lk. 20 37 (see RV) to the section of Exodus containing the narrative (see below, § 2).

2. קִשְׁיָה, śīḏḥ (χλωρόν, virgultum, EV 'plant,' Gen. 25; ἐλάτη, arbor, EV 'shrub,' Gen. 21 15; also Job 30 4 7 f. 2) is in Gen. 25 probably used in a general sense of any wild-growing shrub; in the other passages the reference may be more specific. Löw (78), who cites the Syriac and Arabic equivalents—śīḥā and śīḥ—identifies it with Artemisia judaica L, but allows that the Arabic word is used by Syriac lexicographers for various species. See also Wetzstein, Reiseber., 41.

3. נַחְלִים, nahālīm (παράς, foramina, AV 'bushes,' RV 'pastures,' mg. 'bushes,' Is. 7 19 f.) is almost certainly connected with the root נָחַל, Ar. nahala (see Barth, NB 215), whose proper sense is that of leading cattle to the drinking-place. The noun, therefore, means 'drinking-places'—like Ar. manhal or maurid. This is better than the more general rendering 'pastures.' 'Clefs' (Θ, Vg.) rests on a false etymology; and 'bushes' (Saad. etc., AV) is seemingly due to conjecture (Ges. Thes.).

The theophany in the bush (Ex. 3 2-4) is remarkable. Elsewhere the 'angel of Yahwè' is a theophany in human

2. The 'burning form; but here apparently (note vv. 2 3) the only special appearance bush.' is that of fire. The nearest parallel is Judg. 13 20, where the angel ascends in a flame of fire; but the human form of the appearance is there unmistakable. The story in the form which it assumes in Exodus appears to have resulted from a fusion of two widely current beliefs—that fire indicated the divine presence (see THEOPHANY, § 5), and that certain trees were the permanent abodes of deities. It seems probable from the character of the reference in Dt. 33 16 that there was current a different form of the story, according to which the bush was Yahwè's permanent dwelling; for the phraseology שָׁכַן בָּהּ, 'who dwelt in the bush' indicates the same permanency of the divine presence as was subsequently supposed to characterise the temple. Renan, however, would read שָׁכַן סִינַי, 'who dwells in Sinai' (cp v. 2), and certainly in Exodus the fiery appearance is clearly regarded as, like other theophanies, temporary. Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem. (2) 193 f.) cites some parallels from non-biblical sources, and argues that 'the original seat of a conception like the burning bush, which must have its physical basis in electrical phenomena, must probably be sought in the clear dry air of the desert or of lofty mountains.' We need not rationalise and suppose a bush of the nebk, overgrown with the Loranthus acacia, which has an abundance of fire-red blossoms (so the botanist traveller Kotschy, in Furrer's art. 'Dorn,' BL 213). Cp further Baudissin, Stud. zur sem. Religionsgesch. 2223; Jacob, Altarab. Parallelen zum AT 7 f. N. M., § 1; G. B. G., § 2.

1 קִנָּה occurs also as the proper name of a Rock, 1 S. 14 4 (see MICHMASH).

2 Where Θ (ἡχοῦντι, εὐχων) has been led astray by the likeness of the word to the verb שָׁחַח; but Aq. and Sym. have φωτά (in v. 7 Sym. φωτὰ ἀγρία).

BUSHEL (ΜΟΔΙΟC, modius), a measure of capacity; Mt. 5:15 Mk. 4:21 Lk. 11:33.† See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BUTTER (הַחֲמֶץ), Gen. 18:8. See MILK.

BUZ (בִּז). 1. Second son of Nahor, Gen. 22:21 (Bavξ [A] -ξ [L]). As Buz is mentioned in connection with Dedan and Tema in Jer. 25:23 (Pws [BN²AQ], -θ [N*], Bwξ [Q^mg-]), it must have been an Arabian people. Buz and HAZO (q.v.) are connected by Del. (Par. 307; Riehm's HWB⁽²⁾, 124) with the Bāzū and Hāzū of the annals of Esarhaddon (Budge, Hist. of Esarh. 59-61, KB, 2130 f.), two districts not to be exactly identified, but evidently in close proximity to N. Arabia. Esarhaddon's description of the land of Bāzū is not an inviting one; it was a desolate, snake-haunted region. Probably Buz should be vocalised Bōz (בֹּז), to accord with Bāzū and the vowels av and o in the Gk. forms (cp Frankel, Vorstudien zu der Sept. 116).

2. A Gadite (Ζαβουχαμ [B], Βουξ [L], Αχιβουξ [A]; see ANI, 1), 1 Ch. 5:14†.

BUZI (בִּזִּי), probably a gentilic; see BUZ, father of the prophet EZEKIEL (q.v., § 1), Ez. 1:3 [2] (BOYZ[ε] [BAQ], ΠΕΦΑΥΛΙCΜΕΝΟC [Q^mg-]).

BUZITE (בִּזִּי, ο ΒΟΥΖ[ε]ΙΤΗΣ [BNC], ο ΤΟΥ ΒΟΥΖΙ [A]; ^ΘΒΝΑC adds ΤΗΣ ΔΥC[ε]ΙΤΙΔΟC ΧΩΡΑC), a gentilic noun from BUZ (q.v.), applied to ELIHU, the fourth speaker in the poem of Job (Job 32:2), who is also said to have been 'of the family of Ram.' From the fact that Ram is the name of a Judahite family, to which Boaz and David are said to have belonged (Ruth 4:19:21), and that an Elihu appears in 1 Ch. 27:18 as 'one of the brethren of David,' Derenbourg (REJ 16) conjectures that 'Buzite' should rather be 'Bozite' = 'Boazite' (בֹּזִי). To complete this theory Elihu ought, it would seem, to be David's brother. Unfortunately 'Elihu' in 1 Ch. 27:18 is most probably corrupt, and, even if not, 'brethren' is a vague and uncertain term (see ELIHU, 2). Moreover, dramatic propriety naturally suggested the description of Elihu as an Aramaean Arab. RAM (q.v., 2) is probably a fictitious name, like Elihu and Barachel. T. K. C.

C

CAB, RV Kab (כָּב; καΒΟC [BAL]), 2 K. 6:25†, a dry measure, one-sixth of a seah (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). So at least Jewish authorities (see Buxtorf, s.v. כָּב); but in this passage כָּב ('cab') is probably a scribe's error for כֶּרֶךְ ('cor'). See DOVE'S DUNG, HUSKS.

CABBON (כַּבֹּן, χαβρα [BA], χαββω [L]), an unidentified city in the lowland of Judah, mentioned between Eglon and Lahmas (Josh. 15:40). It is possibly the same as the MACHBENA—AV MACHBENAIH (מַכְבְּנַיִם; μαχαβηνα [B], -αμνηνα [A], μαχβανα [L])—mentioned among the Calebite towns enumerated in 1 Ch. 2:49, and may perhaps be represented by the present el-Kubeibeh, lying between Kh. 'Ajlān and Kh. el-Lahm, sites that have been proposed for Eglon and Lahmas.

CABINS (כִּבְיִין), Jer. 37:16†, AV; RV CELLS (q.v.).

CABUL (כַּבּוּל; χωβα [MACOMEL] [B], χαβωλ [A], χο. [L]), a town in the territory of Asher (Josh. 19:27), the χαβωλ (variants -υ, -βωλ, -βαλ, γαμωλ) mentioned by Josephus (Vit. 43, 44, 45) as a village on the confines of Ptolemais, 40 stadia from Jotapata (modern Jēfat), may safely be identified with the modern Kābūl, 236 ft. above sea-level, 9 m. SE. from Acco. It is probably the χαβουλω (but other codd. read ζαβουλω), which Josephus (B/33) gives as on the sea coast of Tyre and forming the E. frontier of Lower Galilee. The name was current at the time of the Crusaders as Cabor or Cabour, a fief presented in 1186 to Count Joscelin by King Baldwin IV., and it gave its name to a family (Rey, Colonies Franques en Syrie).

In 1 K. 9:10-13 it is told how Solomon, on the completion of his buildings in Jerusalem to which Hiram contributed, gave to the latter 'twenty cities in the land of Galilee,' but Hiram was dissatisfied with them and 'they were called the land of Cabul unto this day' (Heb. כַּבּוּל אֶרֶץ, ^ΘBAL δριον for כַּבּוּל; Jos. Ant. viii. 53, χαβαλων, described as bordering on Tyre; c. Ap. 1:17, χαβουλων, 'a piece of land in Galilee').¹ For the statement of Josephus that in Phœnician the name means 'unpleasing' (ὀκ ἀρεσκον) there is no evidence. Yet the true explanation ought not to be far away. If we could recover it we should see that the popular wit was not so poor as Hiller, Ewald, and Thémis supposed (כַּבּוּל = קַבְּל, 'as nought'). Cheyne (PSPL, 21:177 f. [199]) would correct 'land of Cabul' into 'land of Zebulun'; כַּבּוּל may have been written 'כַּבְּל', and when the mark of abbreviation had been lost, some learned scribe may have corrected כַּבּוּל into כַּבְּל. The witticism would be like that which explained Beelzebub as 'lord of dung,' and 'Izabel' as 'what dung' (see BEELZEBUL, JEZEBEL); it would be a new popular etymology of Zebulun. The 'twenty cities,' on this hypothesis, were in the lower part of the Gālil, which, in the time of Josephus, and probably also when 1 K. 9:11-13 was edited, extended as far as Χαβουλω or Cabul. Of course the writer does not mean to say that the name Zebulun was now given for the first time; he only offers a new justification for the name. For a less probable view (כַּבּוּל corrupted from כַּבְּל; cp כַּבְּל, 'dung'), see Klostermann. (Cp also Böttg., Topogr.-hist. Lex. zu Josephus, s.v. 'Chalabon.') By its own evidence ('unto this day') the story, in its present form, is by no means contemporary with the events with which it deals.

The Chronicler, whose views would not allow him to record the cession of a part of the Holy Land to the Gentile, so alters the story as to make it appear that it was Hiram who 'gave the cities to Solomon' (2 Ch. 8:2). The AV translators have attempted to reconcile this with the story in Kings by rendering 'gave' 'restored' (RV 'had given').

CADMIEL (καδμιαλ [A]), 1 Esd. 5:26 AV, RV KADMIEL.

CÆSAR (καίσαρ [Ti. WH]) is used in the NT as a title of Augustus (Lk. 2:1) and Tiberius (ib. 3:1). The latter emperor is, moreover, the 'Cæsar' of Mt. 22:17 ff. Mk. 12:14 ff. Lk. 20:22 ff. (cp 23:2) and Jn. 19:12 ff. Claudius Cæsar is named in Acts 11:28 (AV, but RV om. Cæsar with Ti. WH), and is alluded to in Acts 17:7. The 'Cæsar' of Paul (Acts 25:8 ff. 26:32 27:24 28:19) is Nero, whose 'household' is mentioned in Phil. 4:22 (οἱ ἐκ τοῦ οἴκου τοῦ καίσαρος οἰκίας). The reference here is hardly to members of his family, but, as in the case of Stephanas in 1 Cor. 16:15, to the familia or household slaves. See further APOCALYPSE, § 43 ff., ISRAEL, §§ 87-115.

CÆSAREA. 1. Cæsarea Palæstinæ (καίσαρια [Ti. WH], -εία [Jos.]; in Talm. קיסרי, mod. Arab. El-Kaysariyeh), the only real port south of

1. Earlier history. Carmel, was built by Herod the Great (on the name, see § 3) in time for it to become the capital of the Roman province of Judæa, and to play the great part in the passage of Christianity westward from Palestine which is described in Acts. The site was that of a Phœnician (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 154) settlement with a fortification called the Tower of Straton (Στρατωνος Πύργος)—a Hellenic form of a Phœnician proper name, Astartyatton (Pietschmann, Gesch. der Phön. 81; Hildesheimer, Beitr. z. Geog. Palest. 4 ff., where the variant reading מנרל שר or שר, 'Devil's-Tower,' given in Talmud B Megilla, vi. 136, and in Talmud B Megilla is explained as a Jewish nickname for a town called after a worshipper of Astarte). There was, according to Strabo, a landing-place (πρόσπορον ἔχων). At the end of the second century B.C., the town was under a 'tyrant,' Zoilus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 122); but Alexander Jannæus took it for the Jews, along with the other coast towns (ib. 15). These were enfranchised by Pompey and made subject to the province of Syria (ib. xiv. 44). After the Battle of Actium they were presented to Herod the Great along with Samaria and other places by Augustus (ib.

2. Rebuilt by Herod. xv. 73). Up to this time Herod had confined his building designs to the E. side of the Central Range. Now, however, in alliance with Rome, he came over the watershed, and out of Samaria built himself a capital which he called after his patron, Sebastê. Requiring for this a seaport that should keep him in touch with Rome, he chose Straton's Tower as the nearest suitable site to Sebastê. He laid the lines of a magnificent city, which took him twelve years to build (ib. xv. 96; 'ten years,' xvi. 51).

Josephus describes the thorough and lavish architecture. In the usual Greek fashion, there were palaces, temple, theatre, amphitheatre, and many arches and altars. There were also vaults for draining the city—as carefully constructed as the buildings above ground. A breakwater 200 ft. wide was formed in 20 fathoms depth by dropping enormous stones. The south end was connected by a mole with the shore, and the mouth of the harbour looked N., the prevailing winds on this coast being from the SW. (ib. xv. 96; EJ i. 215-8). To-day the remains of the breakwater are 160 yards from shore, and the mouth of the harbour measures 180 yards (PEF Mem.).

Herod called his city, like Sebastê, after Augustus, Καيسάρεια Σεβαστή, and his harbour Λιμὴν Σεβαστός. When Cæsarea Philippi was built (see below, § 8), Herod's seaport came to be distinguished from it by the names Καيسάρεια παράλιος, K. ἡ ἐπὶ θάλατταν, and even K. ἡ πρὸς Σεβαστῶν Λιμὴν (on a coin of Nero, De Saulcy, Nomism. de la Terre Sainte, 116), and Cæsarea Palæstinæ. The name of Straton survived long (Jos. Ant. xvii. 114, Strab. xv., Epiphanius De pond. et mens. 125, Ptol. v. 16). The Talmud calls the city after the harbour, Leminah.

Cæsarea became the virtual capital of all Palestine.

'Cæsarea Judææ caput est,' says Tacitus (Hist. 2:78).

4. A Roman city. It was thoroughly Roman; the Talmud (B. Megillah, 6a) calls it daughter of Edom, the mystic name for Rome. The Procurator lived there; there was an Italian garrison (Acts 10:1; cp CORNELIUS, § 1); and in the temple there were two statues—of Augustus and of Rome.¹ Though there were many Jews (Jos. Ant. xx. 879, EJ ii. 137 144 f. iii. 91), the inhabitants were mainly Gentile.

Here, then, very fitly, was poured out upon the Gentiles the gift of the Holy Ghost (Acts 10:45). There

5. NT references. had been a Christian congregation from the earliest possible time. Philip, one of the seven Deacons, took up his residence there (Acts 8:40; cp 21:86). About 41 A.D. there came to a Roman centurion CORNELIUS (g.v.) a divine message to send to Joppa for Peter, who was prepared for this by a vision which taught him that God would make clean all that the Jewish law had hitherto prohibited as unclean. Peter came to Cæsarea, made the profound and decisive acknowledgment that God accepts in every nation him 'that feareth him and worketh righteousness,' preached Jesus, saw the descent of the Spirit upon the little Gentile company, and baptized them (Acts 10). This proved the turning-point in the opinion of the church at Jerusalem (chap. 11), and prepared the way for the acceptance of the missionary labours of Paul, to which from this stage onwards the Book of Acts is devoted.

Cæsarea is next mentioned as the scene of the awful death of Herod Agrippa I. (12:19), to whose government it had been given over: some of its coins bear his superscription (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 133, 136). After him it passed again to the Roman procurator of Judæa, and became the chief garrison of the troops under him. Paul arrived at Cæsarea on his voyage from Ephesus (Acts 18:22), and there he was tried with a fairness and security that were impossible in Jerusalem (chap. 25). The contrast between the two cities, which is so evident in this story, proves how thoroughly Roman and imperial Cæsarea was. Besides receiving so fair a trial, Paul, during his two years of residence in the town, was not threatened by the Jews, as he had been in Jerusalem. From the harbour of Cæsarea Paul sailed on his voyage to Italy (27:1).

The subsequent history of the town is soon told. Contests between its Jewish and Gentile inhabitants led to, and were

6. Later history. among the first incidents of, the great revolt of the Jews against Rome, 66 ff. A.D. (Jos. Ant. xx. 879; EJ ii. 137 144 f. 181 vii. 87). Vespasian made the town his headquarters, and was there proclaimed emperor in 69. He established there a colony, but without the 'jus Italicum,' under the title Prima Flavia Augusta Cæsarea, to which, under Alexander Severus, was added Metropolis Provinciæ Syriæ Palæstinæ (Pliny, HN v. 136; and coins in De Saulcy, Num. de la T.S. 112 ff. pl. vii.). This determined the rank of Cæsarea in the subsequent organisation of the Church. Its bishop became the Metropolitan of Syria: Eusebius occupied the office from 315 to 318. Origen had made it his home. Procopius was born there. When the Arabs came it was still the headquarters of the commander of the imperial troops; in 638 it was occupied by 'Abu 'Obeida. Like all the coast towns, it lost under Arab domination the supremacy which the Greek masters of Syria, in their necessity for a centre of power on the sea, had bestowed upon it. It became a country town, known only for its agricultural produce (Le Strange, Pal. under the Moslems, 474). The advent of a western power with the Crusaders revived it for a little; Baldwin II. took it in 1102, and rebuilt it; the present ruins are mostly of Crusaders' masonry. Saladin took it in 1187, Richard I. in 1191; and St. Louis added to its fortifications. It was finally demolished by the Sultan Bibars in 1265, and since his time has lain in ruin. (See further on details Reland, Pal. 670 ff.; Schürer, Hist. 484 ff.; GASm. HG 138 ff.).

and military importance from remote antiquity. Just under the S. buttress of Hermon, at the head of the Jordan valley, about 1150 ft. above the sea, is a high cliff of limestone ('from 100 to 150 ft.', Robinson, LBR 406) reddened by the water, infused with iron, that oozes over it from above. A cavern occupies the lower part of the cliff, filled with the debris of its upper portion, and from this debris there breaks one of the sources of the Jordan. It is probably the sanctuary known as BAAL-GAD (q.v.) or Baal-hermon.¹ Close by is a steep hill, crowned with the ruins of a mediæval castle, Kal'at es-Sübēbeh, and at its foot the miserable village of Bāniās. Probably here (GASm. HG 480), rather than at Tell el-Qādi, the site favoured by most authorities, lay the city of Laish that was afterwards DAN (q.v.).

The place must have been early occupied by the Greeks, both because of its sanctity, and because of its strategic position. Polybius (16:8

8. Its history

281) mentions it as the scene of the great battle in which Antiochus the Great won Palestine from the Ptolemies. The Greeks displaced the worship of Baal by that of Pan.

The cave, in which there is still legible an inscription, Παρι τε καὶ Νυμφαῖς, was called τὸ Πάνειον (Jos. Ant. xv. 103, BJ i. 213 iii. 107), a name afterwards extended to the whole hill (Eus. HE i. 17). The village and the country around were designated by a feminine form of the same adjective, Πανίας or Πανείας (Jos. Ant. xviii. 2 i xv. 103 xvii. 8 i, etc.; Pliny, v. 1874).

In 20 B.C. Herod, having received the district from Augustus on the death of Zenodorus, the previous lord of these parts (Ant. xv. 103 BJ i. 213), built a temple to Augustus and set in it the emperor's bust. The first year that it came into his possession, 3-2 B.C., Philip the Tetrarch founded his new town, and called it Cæsarea after Augustus (Ant. xviii. 2 i BJ ii. 9 i; coins in De Saulcy, Num. de la T.S. 313 ff. pl. xviii.). So it came to be known as Philip's Cæsarea (Ant. xx. 93), or as Cæsarea Panias (see the coins). When Philip died the Romans administered the district directly, both before Agrippa I. to whom it was given, and in the interval between him and Agrippa II., who embellished it and changed the official designation to Nepwvās in honour of Nero (Ant. xx. 94). The town's full title was 'Cæsarea Sebastī, Sacred and with Rights of Sanctuary under Paneion' (De Saulcy, pl. xviii. 8). Later the name Cæsarea was dropped and Paneas survived, the Arabs when they came changing it to its present form of Bāniās. A shrine of El-Khidr (= Elias = St. George) now occupies the site of the temple to Augustus.

Cæsarea Philippi is twice mentioned in the Gospels. Jesus is said to have come not to the town itself, but to the parts (τὰ μέρη, Mt. 16:13) or villages thereof (Mk. 8:27). Probably he avoided it as he avoided other Gentile centres (e.g., Tiberias) established by the Herods, but in the great saying which he is said to have uttered in this neighbourhood, 'Thou art Peter and on this rock will I build my church,' it is possible to see some reference by contrast to the heathen worship founded upon that cliff of immemorial sanctity above the source of Jordan.

In the Jewish war Vespasian rested his troops in Cæsarea (Jos. BJ iii. 97), and in celebration of the close of the war Titus and Agrippa II. exhibited shows on a large scale (ib. vii. 21). In Christian times Cæsarea Philippi was the seat of a bishop; and Eusebius (HE 6:18) relates that the woman whom Christ healed of an issue of blood (Lk. 8:43) was a native of the town, where a statue commemorated her cure. Castle and town were the subject of frequent contests by both sides during the Crusades. For further details see Rel. Pal. 'Panaeus'; Schürer, Hist. iii. 132; Stanley, SP 395; *GASm. CAGE. Cages (or rather wicker-baskets, cp Am. 8:2) for confining birds in are mentioned twice in EV (see FOWLS, § 10): (1) in Jer. 5:27 the houses of the wicked are as full of (the grains of) deceit as a cage (קִיבּוֹת kēlūb = κλωβός, AVMS. 'coop,' παγυς [BNAQ]) is full of birds; and (2) in Eccles. 11:30 the heart of a proud man

(3) φυλακή, rendered 'hold' and 'cage' in Rev. 18:2 (RV 'hold'), denotes rather a prison (so RVMS).

CAIN (קַיִן; [zā]KANAEIM [B], [zanō] AKEIM—i.e., קַיִן: קַיִן [A], [zanōy] AKEIN [L]), a town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. 15:57), may possibly be the mod. Yaqin, 3 m. SE. from Hebron (PEF. Mem. ii. 312, 371; but see GASm. HG 278). Cp AMALEK, § 6.

CAIN (קַיִן; KAIN [ADEL], CAIN). In Gen. 4 we have accounts of two different Cains, linked together by the editor. The proof of this will be briefly indicated below (§§ 2-4); it will be convenient to treat first the more ancient and simpler of the two stories.

1. Cain is the name of the hero who in Gen. 4:17 is represented as the founder of the city of Enoch¹ (Hānōk). The name evidently comes from an early, though not

Gen. 4:17 ff. 5:9 ff. a genuine Hebrew, tradition; another document (5:9 ff.) gives it as CAINAN (q.v.). Its natural meanings are 'smith,' 'artificer' (Ar. ḥāin, Aram. ḥāināyā);² for the connection with ḥānāh, 'to produce' (also 'to acquire'), suggested in Gen. 4:1,³ is philologically difficult. The more general sense 'artificer' suits best for Cain the city-builder, and the more special one 'smith' for the second part of the compound name Tubal-cain. Both these names are attached to heroes who at the outset of the tradition must have possessed a divine character (see CAINITES, §§ 5, 10).

2. The central figure of the narrative in Gen. 4:2b-16 also is called Cain.

2. The nomad of Gen. 4:2b-16. The story has come to us in a somewhat abbreviated form. Its substance is as follows. Once upon a time Cain and his brother Abel sacrificed to Yahwē. Cain, being a husbandman, brought of the fruits of the ground; Abel, as a shepherd, offered the fat parts of some of his first-born lambs (cp Nu. 18:17). Both, as was usual in ancient religion, looked for a visible sign that their gifts were accepted. What the expected sign was at the sanctuary to which they resorted, we are not told (cp WRS, Rel. Sem. (2) 178), and we may pass over later conjectures. At any rate, we learn that only Abel's sacrifice was accepted (see ABEL, [i.]). Now Cain, had he been wise, would have demeaned himself humbly towards Abel, for who can say to God, 'What doest thou?' (Job 9:12). Instead of this, he cherished evil thoughts,⁴ as an oracle, perhaps sought by Cain, warned him. 'And Yahwē said to Cain, Why art thou wrath? and why is thy countenance fallen? Surely, if thou doest well, thou canst lift up thy head, and if thou doest not well, thy sin must cause it to fall: from irritating words abstain, and thou take heed to thyself? And Cain quarrelled with his brother Abel, and when they were in the open country . . .; and Cain assaulted his brother Abel, and slew him.' Then follows a fresh oracle, containing a curse upon Cain, who is condemned, not only to banishment (cp Hom. IL 2:665), but also to a life of restless wandering. The curse, however, is mitigated by the promise of protection against outrage, by means of a 'sign' which will indicate that Cain is under the care of Yahwē.

According to the older commentators, with whom

even Delitzsch must be grouped, this is the same Cain as the builder of the first city, and he is also the first-born son of the first man, of 'Adam.' This view is critically untenable (see CAINITES, § 2), mainly on account of the improbabilities of the course of events which it assumes.

The first man has been, as we know, driven out of Paradise for transgressing a divine command. According to the traditional view, however, his first-born son Cain is so little impressed by the punishment that he murders his own brother. More than this, he becomes the direct ancestor of another murderer, who apparently goes unpunished, and who is also (contrary to the spirit of 2:18) a polygamist. Now note another point. The original dwelling of Cain is not, as we are to suppose was that of the first man and his wife after their expulsion from Paradise, to the east of the garden of Eden (see 3:24), but in a cultivated and well-peopled land where Yahwè is worshipped with sacrifices, and holds familiar intercourse with men (even with Cain)—apparently S. Palestine (on 4:16 see later). Nor is there any curse upon the ground which Cain tills; it is his own self-caused curse that drives him unwillingly into the land of wandering—i.e., into the desert. There, however, without any explanation, he gives up his unsettled life, and advances further in civilisation than before. He builds a 'city.' This is not to be explained by the ingenious remark¹ that even nomad tribes in Arabia have central market stations (Ar. ḥarṣa, plur. ḥurā), for 'city' is evidently used as a general term; Cain is as much a city-builder as Nimrod, and only as such (or, upon Budde's theory, as the father of a city-builder) could he find a place in the Hebrew legend of civilisation. How are these inconsistent statements to be reconciled? Every possible way has been tried and has failed. It was high time to apply the key of analysis; and no one who has once done this will wish to return to past theories (see CAINITES, § 2).

It may be assumed, then, that the story of Cain and Abel once had an independent existence, and circulated

4. Origin of story. at one of the sanctuaries of Southern Palestine. It is probably not a borrowed Canaanitish myth, but an independent Israelitish attempt to explain the strange phenomena of nomad life—the perpetual wandering in the desert and the cruelly excessive development of the custom (in itself a perfectly legitimate one, according to the Israelites) of vengeance for bloodshed. As Robertson Smith (following Wellhausen) rightly remarks, Cain is the embodiment of 'the old Hebrew conception of the lawless nomad life, where only the blood-feud prevents the wanderer in the desert from falling a victim to the first man who meets him,' and the mark which Yahwè sets on Cain's person for his protection is 'the šarṭ or tribal mark (cp שֵׁרֵט), without which the ancient form of blood-feud, as the affair of a whole stock, however scattered, and not of near relatives alone, could hardly have been worked.'² (cp CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, § 1). Now we can guess why the nomad of the story is called

5. Source of name. Cain; Cain is the eponym of the Kenites (who are in fact called קַיִן; but cp AMALEK, § 6 f.), whose close alliance with the Israelites and location in the wilderness of Judah are well known. That the Kenites should be so well acquainted with a more civilised mode of life, and yet adhere to their nomadic customs, was a surprise to the Israelites,³ and the story of Cain and Abel grew up to account for it. Nothing but a curse seemed to explain this inveterate repugnance to city life, and a curse implied guilt; while the unbridled vindictiveness of the nomads (see GOEL, § 2 f.) was explicable only by a compassionate command of Yahwè, who after all was the God of the Kenites as well as of the Israelites, so that the distinguishing mark of this tribe was also a sign that its members worshipped Yahwè and were under his protection. Cain, then, represents the nomad tribe best known to the Israelites. He is contrasted with Abel (i.e. the 'herdman'; see ABEL [i.]), because the pastoral

So independently Zeydner [ZATW 18 120 ff. (98)], but the sign is surely not circumcised. See Stade, op. cit. 267.

life, when combined with a fixed domicile, seemed to the Israelites the ideal one. That the Kenites themselves would have sanctioned this portrait of their eponym is not probable. They presumably represented him with some of the noble features natural to a hero of solar origin. We cannot, therefore, say with Neubauer (PSBA 11:283) that the story of Cain and Abel is a fragment of Kenite folk-lore.

To the member of the Yahwist circle who worked up the two (not to say three) Cain stories together we may ascribe 4:1 2a, and the words 'on the east of Eden' in v. 16. The addition of the latter words converts נֶחֱ in the poetical phrase אֶרֶץ נֶחֱ, 'land of wandering'—derived presumably from the old tradition—into a prosaic proper name, which is boldly identified by Sayce and Boscawen with the land of the Manda or nomads—i.e., the mountain ranges of Kurdistan and Luristan. The original narrator meant presumably the land between Judah and Edom, where the Kenites lived.

The above contains some fresh points; but Stade's essay, 'Das Kainszeichen,' ZATW 14:250 ff. 15:157 ff. [94-95] = Akademische Reden [99], 229-273, gives the most complete critical treatment of the subject. Cp Houtsma, 'Israël en Qain,' ThT, '76, pp. 82-98.

CAINAN, or rather, as in 1 Ch. 12 and RV, KENAN (קֵינָן; קַיְנָנָא [BAL]). 1. The son of Enosh (Gen. 5:9-14). That Kenan is a humanised god has been shown already (see CAIN, § 1); Cain and Kenan are forms of one name (cp Lot and Lotan). קֵינָן or קַיִן, it may be added, is the name of a god in Himyaritic inscriptions (ZDMG 31:86; CIS 4, no. 20; WRS, Rel. Sem. (2) 43). 2. A son of Arphaxad in GENEL of Gen. 10:24 (Kavaq [A]) 11:13, and therefore in Lk. 3:36. The name is due to an interpolation, made in order to bring out ten members in the genealogy of Gen. 11:10-26. The real tenth from Noah, however, is Terah, the father of Abraham.

commencement and the native soil of all narrative and of all history, and its circle tends continually to expand, as the curiosity of a people awakens to fresh objects, and as foreign traditions are intermixed with those of home growth. Questions about the origins of things are especially prone to crowd into the circle of tradition, and, when the various traditions respecting remote antiquity come to be arranged, it is natural to connect them by a thread of genealogy. There is a real, though but half-conscious, sense among the arrangers that what is being produced is not history but a working substitute for it, and so there is the less scruple in taking considerable liberties with the form of the traditions, many of which indeed, being of diverse origin, are inconsistent. The Hebrew traditionists, in particular, were evidently filled with a desire to bring the traditions into harmony with the purest Hebrew spirit. In minor matters they agree with the traditionists of other nations: in particular they limit the superabundant material for genealogies by the use of round numbers, especially ten.

Much progress has been made in the study of Gen. 4 and 5 since Ewald's time; but that profound critic has the credit of having already noticed the story of Cain and Abel is not as early as the genealogy which follows. This conclusion may now be taken as settled: Gen. 4:1-16 and 17-24 are, generally speaking, derived from separate traditional sources.¹ Both sections are indeed Yahwistic; but the tone and character of their contents is radically different.

The true meaning of Gen. 4:17-24 was seen first by Wellhausen. The section contains relics of an Israelitish legend which made no reference to the destruction of the old order of things by a deluge, and traced the beginnings of the existing civilisations. The legend is partly based on nature-myths, for the Hebrews were not as unmythological as Renan once supposed. Their myths, however, were to a large extent borrowed: when the Hebrews stepped into the inheritance of Canaanitish culture, they could not help adopting in part the answers which the Canaanites had given to the question, 'Whence came civilisation?'

The Canaanitish culture-legend is unhappily lost; but the fragments of Philo of Byblus (Müller, Fr. Hist. Gr. 3 566 f.), when critically treated, reveal some of the elements of two Phœnician culture-legends, in one of which the invention of the useful arts and of occupations was ascribed to divine beings, whilst in the other it was ascribed to men (Gruppe, Die griech. Culte u. Mythen, 1407 ff.; cp PHœNICIA). Bērōssus, too, as far as we can judge from fragmentary reports, appears to have accounted for knowledge of the arts by a series of manifestations of a divine being called Oannes, which took place in the days of the first seven antediluvian kings of Babylon (Lenormant, Les Origines, 1588 f.). This substantially agrees with the statements of the tablets that the bringers of culture were the great gods, such as Ea, 'the lord of wisdom,' and his more active firstborn son Marduk (Merodach), the creator. A striking confirmation of this is supplied by the mythic story translated by Pinches [see CREATION, § 16 (c)], where Marduk is said to have made, not only the Tigris and the Euphrates, but also cities and temples.¹ City-building is in fact everywhere one of the characteristic actions of humanised nature-deities (Osiris, Jemshid, etc.), and it would be inevitable that the civilised Canaanites should trace the origin of cities to semi-divine heroes (ἡμιθέων γένος ἀνδρῶν, IL 1233), if not to the creator himself. Still, though the Canaanitish culture-myth is lost, we may be sure of one point—viz., that it was largely influenced by Babylonian myths, the supremacy of Babylonian culture in Palestine at a remote age being amply proved by the Amarna tablets.

When, therefore, we find in Bērōssus² a list of ten antediluvian kings at the head of the mythic history of Babylonia, it is not unnatural to suppose that the genealogy of the ten patriarchs in Gen. 5, to which the shorter one in Gen. 4 is so closely allied, is derived from it, and to attempt conjectural identifications of the Hebrew and of the Hellenised Babylonian names. This course, which has been adopted by Hommel, the present writer does not think it prudent to take, (1) because we are ignorant of the phases through which the Berosian list has passed, and (2) because of the violent hypotheses to which this course would often drive us.

By taking the Hebrew names, however, one by one, and using Babylonian clues, it does not seem hopeless to reach probable results. CAIN, for instance—the name which meets us first—means 'artificer.' Can we avoid regarding this as the translation of a title of the divine demiurge, borrowed from Babylonia through the medium of the Canaanites?

Moreover since ENOCH, the son of Cain, evidently belongs to the same legend, and indeed shares with his father the honour of the foundation of the first city³ (to which his own name is given), we cannot hesitate to regard Enoch too as of divine origin. This view, indeed, is as good as proved if the statements in Gen. 5:22-24 (P) are traditional.¹ We are told that Enoch lived 365 years (a solar number),² that he 'walked with God, and (then) disappeared, for God had taken him.' The number is attested alike by the Hebrew, the Sam. and the LXX text, and even if we lay but little stress on that, the phrases quoted seem unmistakably primitive, and imply that, in the original form of the story, Enoch was a semi-divine hero who, at the close of his earthly days, was taken to the paradise of God.³ When, too, we consider the clear parallelism between Enoch and Noah, and between Noah and Xisuthrus or Pār-napištim (the hero of the Babylonian Flood-story; see DELUGE, § 2), it becomes reasonable to identify Enoch with Pār-napištim's great visitor in Paradise (he went there to obtain healing for his leprosy), whose name is perhaps most correctly read Gilgameš. Gilgameš, like Enoch, is a divine being—whether we regard him as a hero who becomes a god, or (more plausibly) as a god who becomes a hero, is a matter of indifference—and like Enoch he is associated with the sun.⁴ As Enoch in the Hebrew tradition is the ancestor of Noah, so (inverting the relation) Pār-napištim, the Babylonian Noah, is the ancestor of Gilgameš. The latter is said to have crossed the 'waters of death'⁵ to pay a visit to Pār-napištim in Paradise, and we may presume that, in the earlier form of the Hebrew narrative, his counterpart (whose original name was certainly not Noah) received the same reward as Enoch for 'walking with God.' Both Pār-napištim and Enoch are distinguished for their piety, and not only Gilgameš but also Enoch (as we may infer from the emended text of Ezek. 28:3, and as is expressly stated in the Book of Enoch, which has a substratum of genuine, even if turbid, tradition),⁶ has been initiated into secret lore, and knows both the past and the future. Lastly, Enoch gave his name to the city of Enoch, which at any rate implies lordship (cp 'city of David,' 2 S. 5:7; 'castle of Sennacherib,' KB 289; and see 2 S. 12:28); and perhaps in the primitive myth was even represented as its builder. So Erech, of which the ideographic name is Unuki or Unuk (i.e. the dwelling), is incidentally called in the epic 'the city of Gilgameš,' Gilgameš being at once its king and (according to an old text) its builder.⁷ Why the Hebrew compiler did not adopt Gilgameš as well as Unuk from his Babylonian informant,⁸ we cannot tell. The foundation of the 1 It is plain that there must have been some fairly complete account of Enoch in P's time; indeed, the references in Ezek. 14:14, 28:3 (emended text) imply such an account in exilic times. See ENOCH, § 1.

2 The Chaldeans at first estimated the duration of the astronomical revolution of the sun at 365 days, afterwards at 364½ days. To this they accommodated their civil year of 360 days by means of an intercalated cycle (Lenormant, Les Origines, 1250). Cp YEAR, § 5.

3 The Egyptian kings, as sons of Rē, were said (as early as the Pyramid Texts) to ascend to heaven, borne by the mystic griffin called sewef (see SERAPHIM).

4 We know from another text that Gilgameš was the vicegerent of the sun-god (Jeremias, op. cit. 3). Hommel makes Gilgameš a form of Gibil the fire-god (Gibilgameš). On the epic of Gilgameš see DELUGE, § 2, and Jastrow, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, chap. 23, p. 467 ff. [The present article was written before the appearance of Prof. Jastrow's work.]

5 On the 'waters of death' in the legend see Maspero, 585; Jeremias, 87. The same mythic stream is found in a very mythological section of a psalm (Ps. 18:5[4]), where the 'floods of Death' (שְׁבִילֵי מוֹת) are parallel to the 'floods of Perdition' (שְׁבִילֵי בְּלִיָּה); see BELIAL, § 2. So Che. Ps. 12.

6 On both points see ENOCH, § 2. Id. was before his time when, in 1853, he admitted that the late legend of Enoch might conceivably have some traditional basis (Das Buch Henoch, p. xxvii).

7 See Jeremias, op. cit. 17, and cp the inscription quoted from Hilprecht by Winckler (AOP 377) and Hommel (AHT 129), in which occur the words 'the walls of Erech, the ancient building of Gilgameš.'

8 The theory here advocated is that David's Babylonian scribe SHAVSHA brought several Babylonian myths and legends to Palestine, including that of the hero Gilgameš, king of Unuk or Erech. He thus opened a fresh period of Babylonian influence on Palestine. Hilprecht's discoveries give increased probability to the identification of Enoch with Unuk, which was already proposed by Sayce in 1887 (Hib. Lect. 185).

extremely ancient city of Erech (before 4500 B.C., Hilprecht), however, was at any rate well worthy of mention in the Hebrew culture-legend. It is, in the present writer's opinion, not improbable that Enoch once occupied a still more dignified position as hero of the Israelitish Flood-story (see NOAH, DELUGE, § 17).

We take the next three names together. The last of them is evidently not a divine title, but a simple hero-name.

7. Irad, Mehujael, Methuselah. This prepares us to expect that the first and second may be so too. In Babylonia, if Alorus, the first king in the Berossian list, may be identified with some one of the great deities, his successors at any rate are only demi-gods or extraordinary men. Moreover, to appreciate the Hebrew culture-legend, it is necessary to remind ourselves that when the city of Enoch had, by divine help, been erected, there was still plenty of work for semi-divine men to do in triumphing over wild beasts and barbarians. The hunting exploits of Gilgameš (who was first reduced from being a fire-god to the proportions of a heroic man, and then restored in the same legend to the divine company) have in all probability a historical kernel. It is easy to believe, too, that the hero called METHUSAEΛ (𐎢𐎠𐎶𐎶𐎶; as if Mutu-ša-ili, 'the liegeman of God'; Μαθουσαλα [AL]; Mathusael; Gen. 4:18), or, following the better reading of GAL, Methuselah ('the liegeman of šarhu'), was originally viewed as a king who taught men good laws and restrained wild animals and wild men.

The origin of the first of these names is obscure. Jered (so 1 Ch. 12 AV) or JARED (q.v. for Gr. readings; Gen. 5:15) might indeed be an adaptation of the Babylonian Arad in Arad-Sin ('servant of Sin, the moon-god'), which would be a possible title of the hero Gilgameš (see tablet ix. of the epic). IRAD (q.v.; Gen. 4:18) or rather Ērad (cp GADEL Γαῖδαδ) is, however, text-critically a better reading, and to connect this with the city of Eridu¹ is not free from objections. Probably the word is based on a contraction of some Babylonian name. The next name, which is best read, with Lagarde and Robertson Smith, not MEHUJAEΛ (q.v.) but Mahalalel, can be well explained by the help of the Berossian hero-names Ἀμῆλων, Ἀμύλλαρος. Mahalal is a Hebraised form of the common Babylonian word amīl, 'man' (cp EVIL-MERODACH); the final syllable, -el, is a substitute for some Babylonian divine name. Šelāh in METHUSELAH (𐎢𐎠𐎶𐎶𐎶, Gen. 5:21 f. 25 ff. 1 Ch. 13†; μαθουσαλα [AL], μαθθ. [B in 1 Ch. 13]; Mathusala) is doubtless Babylonian; it is reasonable to see in it a Hebraised form of šarhu, 'brilliant' (Jensen) or 'gigantic, very strong' (Del.), which is an epithet of Gibil the fire-god, and Ninib (?) the god of the eastern sun.² One of the royal names in the Berossian list is Ἀμῆψιμος, which Friedr. Delitzsch and Hommel explain Amīl (Amēl) Sin—i.e., 'liegeman of Sin,'—and, with great probability, identify with Methuselah. The moon-god in fact well deserves the title šarhu, and the traditional connection of the Hebrews with Haran and Ur makes some veiled references to the moon-god almost indispensable in the culture-legend.

Lamech (𐎢𐎠𐎶; λαμεχ [BAL; Ti. WH]; Lamech; Gen. 4:18-24 5:25-31 1 Ch. 13 Lk. 3:36†) must have been an important personage in the old Hebrew

8. Lamech. culture-legend, for in the earlier of the two genealogies not only his three sons, but also his two wives and his daughter, are mentioned by name. His own name admits of no explanation from the best-known Semitic languages, nor is it at all necessary that it should be specially appropriate for the barbaric eulogist of blood-vengeance who speaks in Gen. 4:23 f. It is a needless assumption that the song of Lamech is 'an exultant boast and menace called forth by Lamech's savage delight at finding himself possessed of the new and effective weapons devised by his son Tubal-cain.'¹ The song must be interpreted by itself, without preconceived opinions. In it the hero declares that not only seven lives (as in the case of 'Cain'), but seventy-seven, will be required to avenge the blood of murdered 'Lamech.' This implies that Lamech's story was once told in connection with that of Cain the murderer: in fact, that Lamech, like Cain, is the representative of a tribe, and speaks thus fiercely out of regard for tribal honour, which to him consists in the strict exaction of vengeance for blood.² Still, the Lamech who is descended from Enoch ought to have some importance in the development of culture; he cannot be merely a bloodthirsty nomad. It would seem, then, that the Lamech of Gen. 4:18 was originally distinct from the Lamech of 23 f. The latter is, properly, the personification of a nomad tribe which named itself after the divine hero Lamech, just as Kain (or the Kenites) named itself after the divine hero Kain or Cain. What, then, does the divine hero's name mean? Sayce and Hommel connect it with Lamga (= Ass. naggur, 'artificer'), a non-Semitic title of the moon-god. This is plausible, though the Assyrian title naggur is applied also to Ea. A fragment may have been introduced here from a fresh culture-legend which took for its starting-point another divine teacher, the 'begetter of gods and men,' 'whose will created law and justice.'³

² Jensen, Kosmol. 105, 464. So Hommel (e.g. Exp. Times 8 463), who adopts the form Šarrahu (this is found with the determinative ilu, 'god').

The names of Lamech's two wives are, of course, derived from the poem in Gen. 4:23. Sayce and Boscauwen

9. Lamech's wives. would make them feminine lunar deities—one named Darkness, the other Shadow

—but without indicating any similar titles of the moon in the tablets. Probably the poet simply gave the tribal hero's wives the most becoming names he could think of. ADAH (𐎠𐎡𐎢; Ἀδᾶ [AE], Ἀδδᾶ [L]; Ada; Gen. 4:19-23) may have been known to him already as the name of a wife of Esau (Gen. 36:2, P; but from an older source; see ADAH, 2), and ZILLAH (𐎶𐎠𐎵; Σελλα [AEL]; Sella; Gen. 4:19-23) was a suggestive description of a noble chieftainess, whose presence was like a refreshing and protecting shade (Is. 32:2). NAAMAH (𐎢𐎠𐎶𐎶; νοεμα [AE], -μια [L]; Noema; Gen. 4:22), too, the daughter of Zillah, may derive her name ('gracious') from her supposed physical and moral charms; another of Esau's wives bears the equivalent name Basemath (Gen. 36:3). It is possible, however, that, as she is the sister of Tubal-cain, her name may be of mythic origin,⁴ and that she had a rôle of her own in the original story.

TUBAL-CAIN is described in Gen. 4:22 (emended text) as 'the father of all those who work in bronze and iron.'

10. Tubal-cain. At first sight the name might seem to belong to the heros eponymus of Tubal (so Lenormant), which was a people famous for its 'instruments of bronze' in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 27:13). Tubal, however, was much too far from Palestine to be mentioned here, and Tabal in the time of Ašur-bāni-pal seems rather to have been famous for horses (COT 166). Above all, it is difficult to disregard the general tradition of antiquity that the first worker in metal was a divine being (cp Enoch 8:1, where the fallen angel Azazel teaches this art). Tubal-cain, then, is probably like χουσαωπ (the Phoenician Hephaistos⁵), a humanised god, and the first part of the name is presumably not of Persian but of Babylonian origin.⁶ It should be noticed that -cain in Tubal-cain is wanting in ⚡ (⚡⚡⚡ [AEL]). Probably it was added to explain why the hero was regarded as the father of smiths. Tubal is, in fact, probably a pale form of the god of the solar fire, Gibil or Nusku; but, of course, he is not only a fire-god. Like Gibil and like Hephaistos (see Roscher, Lex.), he is the heavenly smith (⚡ fitly calls him χαλκεύς, a term which in Il. 15309 is applied to Hephaistos), and was perhaps once addressed in the words of a famous Babylonian hymn:—

'Gibil, renowned hero in the land,—valiant, son of the Abyss, exalted in the land,—Gibil, thy clear flame breaking forth,—when it lightens up the darkness,—assigns to all that bears a name its own destiny;—the copper and tin, it is thou who dost mix (?) them,—gold and silver, it is thou who meltest them.'¹

We may well suppose that in the earliest form of the Hebrew legend Tubal was the instructor of men in the art of getting fire. According to Philo of Byblus, fire was discovered by three 'mortal men' called Light, Fire, and Flame, and was produced by rubbing two pieces of wood together. 'This,' remarks Robertson Smith,² 'is the old Arabian way of getting fire, and indeed appears all over the world in early times, and also in later times in connection with ritual. Probably some ritual usage preserved the memory of the primeval fire-stock in Phoenicia.' There was no such ritual usage among the Israelites, and so the legend of the invention of fire disappeared.

Jabal and Jubal have names descriptive of occupations, and evidently of Palestinian origin. The former (יָבֵל;

11. Jabal, יָבֵל [A], -יָבֵל [L], -יָבֵל [E]; Jabel; Gen. 420f. is the reputed ancestor of tent-dwelling shepherds. His name describes him, not as a 'wanderer' (Dillm. very questionably), but as a herdsman (cp Heb. יָבֵל, Phoen. יָבֵל, 'ram'); it is another form of the name ABEL (q.v., end). The latter, Jubal (יָבֵל; יוֹבָאֵל [AEL]; Jubal; Gen. 421f.), is the 'father' of the guild or class of musicians (cp יָבֵל, Ex. 1913, 'ram's horn'). That the inventor of the kinnōr and the 'ūd should be the younger brother of the first shepherd, is certainly appropriate. One of the thirty-seven Amu, or Asiatics, represented in the tomb of Hnum-hotep (see MUSIC, § 8, JOSEPH, § 10) as desiring admission into Egypt, carries a lyre. (We must not quote the parallel of David, for 1 Sam. 1614-23 does not recognise him as a shepherd; see DAVID, § 1 a, note). Tubal, however, is less appropriate in this company, partly because of his lofty origin, partly because smiths belong more naturally to agricultural and city life.

The three names Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal stand outside the genealogy proper, just as Shem, Ham, and

12. Original Noah, and Abram, Nahor, and Haran form of list. outside that of Terah. By this knot in the genealogical thread the editor indicates that a new and broader development is about to begin (Ewald). How is it, then, that the Cainite genealogy as it stands contains but six names? The parallel table in chap. 5, which has virtually all these names, adds three to them at the beginning, and one at the end. Now it is remarkable that the three prefixed names are also given in 425 f. It is not improbable (cp ⚡) that this passage in a simpler form—omitting 'again,' 'another,' and 'instead of Abel,' etc., and adding 'and Enos begat a son, and called his name Cain'—once stood before 417, and that Noah, who is the son of Lamech in 528 f., once took the place of Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal. This would make the table begin Adam, Seth, Enos, Cain, and close Lamech, Noah. We might also restore it thus,

Persian means (1) dross of metal, (2) copper or iron. 'I regard the δ as resulting from a radical w or v, and as changing later to p and f' (Mr. J. T. Platts).

Enos (= ādām), Seth, Kenan . . . Lamech, Jabal, Noah. This would have the advantage of retaining the founder of the pastoral mode of life as the father of the founder of agriculture, but seems to involve the excision of Jubal and Tubal. We might, more naturally perhaps, suppose that Jabal and Jubal were later additions from another cycle of legends, and that the earliest genealogy began with Cain and ended with Tubal, both originally divine beings. We should then get a genealogy of seven. In any case we must reject the common view that 425 f. is a fragment of a Yahwistic table which traced the genealogy of the Sethite side of the first family, and that the Sethites, according to the Yahwist, were good, the Cainites bad. There is no valid evidence that the genealogist wished to represent any of the Cainites as wicked, or that culture was opposed to religion. Cain, the city-builder, was a worthy son of Enos, who was the first to use forms of worship (see ENOS). For there was no more truly religious act, from a primitive point of view, than the building of a city. (For the continuation of this subject see SETHITES.)

Buttmann's Mythologus, vol. I. (28), first led the criticism of the genealogies into the right track. For recent discussions, besides Stade's article already referred to, see Dillmann's Gen., see Lenormant, Les Origines, 15; Boscaen, Exp. Times, 5 351 f. (May '94); Goldäher, Heb. Myth. 32, 113, 127-133, 200; Bu. Urgesch. 181-247; Ryle, Early Narratives of Genesis, 78-83. On the Berossian list of ten antediluvian patriarchs see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 564 f.; Del. Par. 149; Hommel, PSBA. 15243-246. The last-named scholar holds that his identifications, especially Amih = Enosh, Ummannu = Kainan, and Nūhnapisti = Noah, prove that there is the closest relation between the ten Hebrew patriarchs and the ten Babylonian antediluvian kings. He infers from this that the author of the so-called priestly code must have written centuries before the exile. This hasty inference will not captivate a careful student. That the priestly writer had access to early traditions is a part of the critical system here advocated. The identifications of Hommel, however, need very careful criticism (see NOAH).

CALAH (כַּלָּח; χαλαχ [A], -κ [EL], καλαχ [D]; vs 12 χαλεκ [E]; Chale; Ass. Kalhu, Kalkah) is named in Gen. 1011 f. as one of the cities originally founded by Nimrod in Assyria. Asur-nasir-pal, king of Assyria, ascribed its high standing, at any rate as a capital, to Shalmaneser I. (KB 116 Il. 132-135). Layard, Rassam, and G. Smith proved by their excavations of the mounds of Nimrud 20 m. S. of Nineveh (Kuyunjik) that the city lay in the fork between the Tigris on the W. and the Upper Zab on the E. Protected on two sides by these rivers and on the N. by hills, fortified by a long N. wall with at least fifty-eight towers, it was a strong city.

The town was an oblong, well supplied with water by a canal led through a covered conduit from the Upper Zab, and richly planted with orchards and gardens. At the S.W. are the remains of a platform, built of sun-dried bricks faced with stone, 600 yards from N. to S., by 400 yards wide, and 13 feet above the level of the Tigris, which once washed its western face. On this platform stood palaces built or restored by the kings Shalmaneser I., Āšur-nāṣir-pal, Shalmaneser II., Tiglath-pileser III., Sargon, Esaraddon, and Āšur-ētil-ilāni. At its NW. corner stood the zikkuratu or temple-tower, 167½ feet square at the base and still 140 feet high. Next to it was the temple of Nebo, but in the Sargonid period Ninip was the town-god (KB 4133, no. 1, l. 16).

Of municipal history, apart from the history of the country, we know little.

Calah was faithful to Shalmaneser II. during his son's rebellion (KB 1176, ll. 45-50), but revolted from Āšur-nirari in 746 B.C. (KB 1212). It was clearly the court residence under the above-mentioned kings; but in the official lists it never stands first (cp Eponym lists KB 1208 ff.). As a centre of population it evidently was inferior to Āššur, and totally eclipsed by Nineveh. When Āšur-nāṣir-pal rebuilt the town and palace, finished the great wall, and endowed Calah with its canal, he peopled it with captives.

Like other great cities of Assyria and Babylonia, Calah probably had its archives which, with the literary collections of the kings, formed the nucleus of a library.

Few tablets have hitherto been found at Nimrud, and it is inferred that Sennacherib removed the Calah library to Nineveh. Many astrological and omen tablets in the Kuyunjik collections were executed at Calah for Nabū-zukūp-kēni, 'principal librarian,' rab-dub-sarri, 716-684 B.C. For explorations and identification of site cp Layard, Nineveh and its Remains, G. Smith's Assyrian Discoveries. For further conclusions respecting library, see G. Smith, Chald. Genesis.⁽²⁾ C. 1. Name. Dog-totems, nevertheless, were not impossible in the ancient Semitic world (see DOG, § 4), and a connection with כָּלֵב was early surmised (see NABAL, n.). We find the name Kalbā in Babylonian contract-tablets as late as the times of Nebuchadrezzar II. and Cambyses (KB 4199 293). Hommel (AHT 115) makes kalibu or kalabu mean 'priest'; while Sayce (Early Hist. Heb. 265) compares kalbu as used in Am. Tab. (e.g., 54, 18) for 'officer, messenger' (but this is improbable). The name seems to be primarily tribal.

Caleb was a Kenizzite clan which at, or shortly before, the Israelite invasion of Western Palestine established itself in Hebron and the region

2. Early History. south of it, and in the course of time coalesced with its northern neighbour, the tribe of Judah (naturally, not without admixture of blood; cp. Maacah, Caleb's concubine, 1 Ch. 2:48). The b'ne KENAZ, to whom Caleb and OTHNIEL belong (Nu. 32:12 Judg. 1:13 J), were of Edomite extraction, and the Calebites were nearly related to the nomadic Jerahmeelites in the south-eastern quarter of the Negeb (1 Ch. 29 etc.); see JERAHMEEL. (On the Kenites, see below, § 4.)

How Caleb came to be settled in what was regarded as the territory of Judah, is variously described (Josh. 15:13, cp 14:6 ff. D₂, etc.). According to Josh. 15:13 ff. (cp Judg. 1:10 ff.), Caleb invaded from the N., in company with Judah, the region which he subsequently occupied (see ANAK); but in the story of the spies, in the oldest version of which Caleb alone maintains the possibility of a successful invasion of Canaan from the S. and receives Hebron as the reward of his faith¹ (see NUMBERS), we seem to have a reminiscence of the fact that Caleb made his way into the land from that quarter. In David's time Caleb was still distinct from Judah (1 S. 30:14 γελβουε [B], χελουβ [L]); for the conjecture that David was a Calebite prince, see DAVID, § 4, n.).

On the other hand, in the list of the spies (Nu. 13:6 P), and in the commission for the division of the land

3. Pre-exilic. (Nu. 34:19 P), Caleb b. JEPHUNNEH appears as the representative of Judah, a chief (nāṣi) of that tribe:² and in the post-exilic genealogical systems, Caleb and Jerahmeel, 'sons of HEZRON' (q.v., ii. [1]), are great-grandsons of the patriarch Judah (1 Ch. 29 [CHELUBAI = 1 Ch. 4:1, CARMi (1)], 18 ff., 42 [χαλεμ, A] ff.), whilst Kenaz becomes a son of Caleb (4:15).

These representations reflect the fact that, in uniting with Judah, Caleb became the leading branch of that exceedingly mixed tribe. The Chronicler indeed hardly knows any other Judahite stocks than these Hezronites.

The seats of the Calebites in pre-exilic times are to be learned most fully from 1 Ch. 2:42 ff., where we find set down as sons and grandsons (branches) of Caleb the well-known cities and towns, Ziph, Mareshah (so read for MESHA), Hebron, Tappuah, Jokdeam (so for JORKOAM), Maon, Beth-zur; for Maon and Carmel cp also 1 S. 25:2 ff. The clan had possessions also in the Negeb (1 S. 30:14).

After the Exile their old territory was chiefly in the possession of the Edomites, and the Calebites were

4. Post-exilic. pushed northwards into the old seats of Judah. This situation is reflected in another stratum of the composite genealogy (1 Ch. 2:18-24, 50-55, cp 19), where Caleb takes Ephrath (the region about Bethlehem) as a second wife (observe the significant name of the former wife AZUBAH [q.v.]; cp also JERIOTH). Through his son Hur the clan falls into three divisions: Shobal, Salma, and Hareph, the fathers of Kirjath-jearim, Bethlehem, and Bethgader. The further notices of the subdivision of these clans are fragmentary and complex (see BETH-GADER, JABEZ, SHOBAI). It is at all events noteworthy that the passage concludes with the end of a list of Kenites, and a connection between these and the Calebites becomes plausible if CHELUB and RECHAH in 1 Ch. 4:11 f. are indeed errors for Caleb and Rechab (cp Meyer, Entsteh. 147).³

It is not improbable that the names Azbuk, Colhozeh, Rephaiah b. Hur (temple-repairers, etc., temp. Nehemiah) are of Calebite origin (ib. 147, 167).

See further KENAZ; also Kuenen, Rel. Isr. 1:135 ff., 176 ff., Grätz, 'Die Kelubaiten oder Kalebiten,' MGWJ 25:461-492, and especially We. De Gent.; CH 337 f.

CALEB-EPHRATAH, RV Caleb-Ephrathah (כָּלֵב עִפְרָתָה), is mentioned in 1 Ch. 2:24† as the place where Hezron died. Klostermann (Gesch. 112) thinks it more natural to read SEGUB (for Caleb).

CALF, GOLDEN. Portable images of a bull overlaid with gold occupied, down to the time of the prophets, a prominent position in the equipment

1. References. of the Israelitish sanctuaries. We hear of them in the great sanctuaries of the northern kingdom: in Dan¹ and Bethel, where they are said to have been set up by Jeroboam (1 K. 1228 ff. 2 K. 1029 Hos. 105); in Samaria, the capital of the kingdom (Hos. 85 f.); and perhaps also in Gilgal (Am. 54 f. Hos. 415 915 1211 [12]). On the other hand, there were none in the temple of Jerusalem (which had the brazen serpent: see NEHUSHTAN), and, strange to say, we do not find any allusion to such images as existing in the other sanctuaries of Judah—either in 1 K. 1421-24, where such reference would have been apposite, or in Amos or Hosea. The last named in particular, who pursued the calf-worship of the northern kingdom with such bitter invectives (85 f. 105), would hardly have been silent on the subject had the same worship prevailed in Jerusalem also. Though Judah appears to have participated, more or less, in the cultus at Bethel, the worship of such images seems to have been confined chiefly to the northern kingdom.

The bulls belonged to the class of images called כֶּלֶב ('molten images'; see IDOL, § 1 e), which might be either solid or merely covered with a coating of metal. To the latter class the golden bull of Jeroboam (Hos. 132) probably belonged (see IDOL, § 4 f.). Because of the value of the metal it is not probable that the images were of great size. Hence we can understand the choice of the word כֶּלֶב, 'calf': not the youth but the small size of the animal represented is the point to be conveyed—not perhaps without an implication of contempt.

As for their origin, these images were originally foreign to the Yahwè religion. To the nomads of the

2. Origin. wilderness, who did not breed cattle, the idea of choosing the bull as an image of divinity could hardly have occurred. On this ground alone the narrative of the golden calf made by Aaron in the wilderness (Ex. 32 JE) can prove nothing for the origin of this form of worship in Mosaic times. Apart from the impossibility of making such an image in the wilderness, the narrative seems rather to be intended as a scathing criticism on the absurdity and sinfulness of bull-worship, as viewed from the prophetic standpoint. According to the Deuteronomist, Jeroboam was the originator of bull-worship; but it is hardly likely that he would have introduced an entirely strange image into the sanctuaries of his kingdom. Probably the older Decalogue (Ex. 3417; cp 2023), in speaking of 'molten images' as distinguished from plain wooden images, referred to images of this description, which also are intended perhaps by the images of Micah (Judg. 18).

It has often been held (e.g. by Renan and Maspero, and doubtfully by König) that bull-worship may have been an imitation of the worship of Apis at Memphis or of Mendes at Heliopolis; but the Egyptians worshipped only living animals, and in any case the adoption from Egypt is unlikely. The nomad inhabitants of Goshen took over from the Egyptians hardly anything of their culture and religion. On the other hand, the religion of Israel shows the strongest evidence of Canaanite influence. Among the Canaanites the bull was the symbol of Baal; ¹ the cow, the symbol of Astarte; and these symbols were taken over from the Phœnicians by the Greeks. Thus the probabilities are that the Israelites derived the practice from the Canaanites. They changed the significance of the symbols, seeing in them a representation of Yahwè and his conquering might and strength (Nu. 2322 248). Though in the time of Jeroboam such worship was regarded as allowable, the so-called older decalogue certainly forbids molten images (see above). The later decalogue, which may be regarded as representative of prophetic times, forbids all idolatrous worship of Yahwè. Hosea rails at the worship of the bull (85 105). The Deuteronomistic narrator, too, in the Book of Kings regards the conduct of Jeroboam as an apostasy to idolatry. He emphatically describes bull-worship as 'the sin of Jeroboam, wherewith he made Israel to sin' (1 K. 1416 1526 1626 2 K. 1029 etc.). To the Apis-worship of Egypt we have but one reference—in Jer. 4615, where we should probably read 'Why hath Apis fled? (why) hath thy steer not stood firm?' See APIS.

CALNEH (כַּלְנֵה). 1. (χαλάννη [A^DaL], γαλάννη [E]). A city included in the earlier kingdom of Nimrod, Gen. 1010 (J). See NIMROD, § 1, SHINAR.

Rawlinson (Anc. Monarchies, 118) identifies it with Nippur, supposing that the Talmudic statement, 'Calneh means Nippur' (Yoma, 10a), represents a genuine tradition. The context, however, shows that it is a pure guess; כַּלְנֵה is connected with כִּנְיָה, a Greek loan-word (νύμφη) meaning 'bride,' and כִּנְיָה with כַּלְנֵה, the old Hebrew for 'bride' (see Levy). Pressel (PREE 23) claims a consensus of critics for identifying Calneh with Ctesiphon NE. of Babylon, on the left bank of the Tigris (so Targ. Jer., Ephr. Syr., Eus., Jer.), which Pliny (630) places in the province of Chalonitis. This conjecture, too, may be dismissed.

The inscriptions alone should be consulted; and, since none of the ordinary names of the Babylonian cities resembles Calneh (or Calno), we are justified in examining the non-Semitic (ideographic) names. Among these we find Kul-unu ('dwelling of offspring'), which, in Assyrian times, was pronounced Zir-la-ba or (in an inscription of Hammu-rābi) Za-ri-lab. The situation of Zirlaba is uncertain (see Del. Par. 226); but the fact that Sargon mentions Zirlaba at the end of a list of Babylonian cities which apparently proceeds from south to north (AB 252 f.) suggests to Hommel that it was not far from Babylon (Die semit. Völker, 1234 f.). To Fried. Del. in 1876 (Chald. Gen. 293) this identification appeared certain. It is, indeed, not improbable, especially if we may point כַּלְנֵה (cp G as above, and כַּלְנֵה); but we should like some fuller evidence that Kul-unu was really remembered as the old name of Zirlaba.

Doubtless Calno is Kullani, a place near Arpad, conquered in 738 by Tiglath-pileser III. (Tiele, Wi., Fried. Del., Che., Kittel).

CALPHI, RV CHALPHI (a name formed from the root חָלַף, whereby a child is designated as a substitute for one lost; cp Ἀλφαιός, and see NAMES, § 62), father of Judas [3], 1 Macc. 11 70 (ο τοῦ χαλφει [AV], ο τοῦ χαφ. CAMEL (כֶּמֶל, ἡ καμηλοσ; Gen. 12 16 24 10 14 etc., Ex. 9 3 Judg. 6 5 1 K. 10 2 1 Ch. 27 30 Ezra 2 67 Tob. 9 2, and elsewhere, including six prophetic passages; Mt. 8 4 Mk. 16 etc.; see also DROMEDARY). The Hebrew name¹ is common to all the Semitic languages, which proves that the animal was known before the parent stock divided—one of the facts from which Hommel and others have inferred that the original home of the Semitic race was in Central Asia.² The name was borrowed by the Egyptians; it passed also into Greek and Latin, and most modern languages. The origin of the word is uncertain; von Kremer (Sem. Culture-Entwicklungen, 4) connects it with Ar. jamala, 'to heap,' as meaning the 'humped animal'; whilst Lagarde (Uebers. 49) follows Bochart in his etymology from כָּמַל, 'to requite,' the name thus indicating the revengeful temper often shown by the animal.

In the frequent mention of the camel in the historical books of the OT there can be little doubt that Camelus 2. Biblical dromedarius is meant (see below, § 6), though an Israelite ambassador may conceivably have seen a two-humped camel at Nineveh or Babylon.³ We naturally expect to hear of its use by the Arabian⁴ and other nomad tribes; and accordingly the Ishmaelites (Gen. 37 25 [J]), the Midianites (Judg. 6 5),⁵ and the Amalekites (1 S. 15 3 27 9) by turns come before us as possessors of camels. The mention of them in connection with Job (Job 1 3), and with the Queen of Sheba (1 K. 10 2), also needs no comment. David's camels (1 Ch.

1 כֶּמֶל, bikrah, like the Ar. bakr (Lane, 1240) and Ass. bakru (Del. Ass. HWB) denotes the 'young camel,' Is. 60 6 Jer. 2 23 (RVmg.). EV renders less aptly DROMEDARY (q.v.). The word חֲמֻסִּים, ahashtrānim (Esth. 8 10 14, AV 'camels,' RVmg. 'mules'), is rather an adj. qualifying 'swift steeds'; so RV 'swift steeds that were used in the king's service' (cp Pers. kshatrā, realm; BDB Lex.). The reading, however, is disputed. See HORSE, § 2.

4 For an account of the numerous references to the camel in Arabian literature, and of the many names of the camel in Arabic, see Hommel, Säugethiere, 139 ff.

5 'Both they and their cattle were numberless,' says the narrator. So too the Reubenites carry away 50,000 camels from the Hagrites (1 Ch. 5 21). Precisely so Tiglath-pileser II. states that he had taken 30,000 camels as prey from the Arabs (cp Hommel, GBA 665), and Ašur-bāni-pal says that he took so many camels from the Kedarenes that camels were sold in Assyria for from 1½ (silver) shekels to half a shekel (KB 2 225). On the notice in Judg. 8 21 see CRESCENTS.

CAMEL

27 30) may have been kept for purposes of trade; they were put under the charge of an Ishmaelite, who from his calling bore the name of OBIL. Other kings may have followed David's example; Hezekiah's camels were carried away by Sennacherib (Schr. COT 2 286). That Syrians should have used them (2 K. 8 9) is natural; but in the hilly region of Palestine the camel cannot have been a common quadruped. It is true this animal appears again and again in the patriarchal story, and there is no difficulty in supposing that Jacob acquired camels in Mesopotamia. There is, however, great difficulty in the statement (Gen. 12 16) that camels formed part of a present given to Abraham by the pharaoh (see below, § 3 f.).

The camel's saddle is mentioned only once, Gen. 31 34 (בִּרְזֵק, ἡ τὰ σάγματα, EV 'the camel's furniture'), and derives its name from its round basket-shaped form. See LITTER, SADDLE.

The flesh of camels was unclean food to the Israelites (Dt. 14 7 Lev. 11 4). By the Arabs, on the other hand, camels were both eaten and sacrificed (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 218).

[The assertion that the ancient Egyptians knew the camel is unfounded. The picture of a camel on one of the (Ethiopian) pyramids at Meroë¹ 3. Not known in Egypt. (Leps. Denkm. 5 28) and on Greek terra-cotta figures—e.g., of a travelling Arab (not, as has been supposed, an Egyptian) in Mariette (Abydos, 2 40)—and the references in Greek papyri,² prove nothing more than that the animal was known in Egypt in Roman times. It is surprising that it never appears earlier—e.g., in representations of battles with the nomadic Semites who rode on camels. The Egyptian artists evidently disliked to represent the animal—not because of its ungainly appearance, for they have rather a fancy for delineating strange creatures, but out of religious antipathy (WMM As. u. Eur. 142). The statement that the camel is mentioned in Pap. Anast. i. 23 5 is groundless. The passage contains an exclamation of the Asiatic princes, awe-struck at the bravery of an Egyptian soldier—'a-ba-ta ka-ma 'ā-r(ī) a ma-ha-īra n'-mu, which seems to mean, 'Thou art lost (אָרְיָהּ) like God (בְּמִיּוֹתָיִם) a hero (הִרְיָהּ) indeed (Ar. na'am).']

Even if this explanation³ be rejected, the idea of Chabas (Voyage, 220) that the Asiatics are here calling for 'camel's meat' is most ridiculous. The other passages appealed to refer not to the camel (the pretended hamaly) but to a large species of monkey (kay, ky), which is said to come from Ethiopia (where there were no camels in 1300 B.C.; see above), and is described as docile—learning an amusing kind of dance, and carrying its master's walking-stick. See the passages collected by WMM (As. u. Eur. 370),⁴ and the judicious remarks of Wiedemann, SBA 13 32. Even the Egyptian name of the camel X (or σ) ἀμογλ (plural ἡμαγλῆ) is foreign (not from gamul [Lagarde, Uebers. 49] but from an original gamōl*), and does not seem very old. W. M. M.]

[The difficulty of the narrative in Gen. 12 10–20 is very great so long as it is assumed that it correctly represents

4. OT ref. the Hebrew tradition. Supposing, however, that the mention of the pharaoh were due to a misunderstanding, and that the early Hebrew tradition knew only of a visit of Abraham

1 Roman period? Even in Persian times orthodox Ethiopians were apparently deterred from using the animal by fear of contracting ceremonial defilement. The more southern tribes had no camels; see, e.g., Mariette, Mon. d'Ég. 12, 87. The animal can hardly live in the regions S. of Meroë.

2 E.g., in Grenfell, Greek Papyri (245 etc.), camels appear frequently in the Fayūm after 100 A.D. It is, however, significant that they sometimes bear Ἀραβικὰ χαράγματα as brand-marks (1 L. 50 a). The camels on the roads to the Red Sea (Petrie, Koptos, 27, L. 21, Strabo, etc.) were driven by the desert-tribes.

to the land of Muṣri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 [3]), the difficulty arising from the mention of camels in Gen. 12:16 would disappear. The difficulty of Ex. 9:3 (J), where a murrain is predicted on pharaoh's cattle including 'the camels,' cannot, however, be removed by such an expedient. Here it appears simplest to suppose that the narrator gave a list of those kinds of animals which, from a Palestinian point of view, would be liable to the murrain.

Two proverbial expressions about the camel occur in the Gospels (the one in Mt. 19:24 Mk. 10:25 Lk. 18:25, the other in Mt. 23:24). The reading

5. NT reff. κάμηλος (a rope?) for κάμηλος has been suggested for the former. It is as old as Cyril of Alexandria and is evidently the conjecture of a non-Semitic scribe (see Nestle, Exp. T. 9474). κάμηλος is correct. Analogous proverbs can be quoted—e.g., 'In Media a camel can dance on a bushel' (Sebam. 45 a)—i.e., all things are possible. T. K. C.]

As has been indicated above there are two species of camel. One, the Camelus dromedarius, is found in SE. Asia ranging from Afghanistan and Bokhara through NW.

6. Zoology. India, Persia, Arabia, Syria, and Asia Minor, and in N. Africa; this species reaches its most southern point in Somaliland. The second, or Bactrian, camel, C. bactrianus, lives in the high plateaus of central Asia. Both species are said to exist wild, but it is generally thought that the herds found in a state of nature are descended from domesticated animals and are not truly feral. This view is supported by the recent observations of Sven Hedin. They have been introduced into many parts of both the Old and the New World, and where the climate has proved suitable have been very useful as beasts of burden.

Numerous breeds of the C. dromedarius are found in the East, and show as great diversities in character and use as do the various breeds of horse. The breeds, many of which are distinguished by a complex system of branding, may be roughly divided into two classes: the riding, called in Egypt and Arabia Hagin and in Indian Sawari, and the baggage animal, called respectively the Camal and Unt. The word dromedary is often restricted to the former animal, which often maintains a pace of 8-10 miles an hour for a long period, whereas the baggage camel rarely exceeds 3 miles an hour. Riding a camel for any length of time usually induces sickness, the movement of the two legs of each side together producing a most unpleasant swaying motion. Enormous herds, such as we read of in the OT, are still kept by the natives both of the Sudan and of NW. India, and breeding stables exist in many parts of the East. Camels produce but one young at a time and the period of gestation is twelve months; the young are suckled for a year or longer. The average length of life seems to be considerable—from forty to fifty years—and if well treated the camel will continue to work hard until well over thirty.

The power which it undoubtedly possesses of doing without food is to some extent dependent on the hump; when the animal is underfed or overworked this structure begins to disappear and the condition of the hump is thus an unfailing sign of the state of its health. Similarly the power of doing without water is due to a structural peculiarity of the two first compartments—the rumen and reticulum—of the complex stomach of the camel. Each of these chambers has its wall pitted into a series of crypts or cells which are each guarded by a special sphincter muscle, and in these crypts a certain amount of water is stored—perhaps two gallons at most. The fluid can be let out from time to time to mix with the more solid food. Camels ruminate, and their masticated food passes straight into the third division of the stomach. In spite of this provision for storing water, no opportunity should be lost of watering camels, as it is most inadvisable to trust to this reserve, and they are apt to overdrink themselves if kept without water for too long a time. The stories about travellers saving their lives by opening the stomachs of camels when dying of thirst are probably imaginary; the camel exhausts its own supply of water, and even if a little be left it is quite undrinkable. Their flesh is eaten at times by natives, who consider the hump a delicacy. Their dung is used for fuel in the desert.

From the earliest times the hair of the camel has been woven into fabrics. The hair from the hump and back is torn or shorn and woven into a tough, harsh cloth; but a finer, softer material is also prepared from the under-wool. The milk is consumed by the natives, who both drink it and convert it into butter and cheese.

Although the camel has been domesticated from a very early date, and although, without its aid, vast regions of the world would prove untraversable, and consequently it has always been the servant of man, there is considerable divergence of opinion as to the real character of the animal. Perhaps the latest writer, Major Leonard,¹ may be quoted as one who has had sixteen years' practical observation and experience of camels in India, Afghanistan, Egypt, and the Sudan; he says, 'To sum up the average specimen of a camel. He can abstain from food and water—the latter more especially—longer than any other animal. He is stupid and patient to excess, submissive and tenacious to a degree, docile and obstinate to a certain extent, vindictive and passionate when roused, not easily excited nor usually alarmed, though at times liable to a panic or stampede—an animal in fact whose characteristics are every bit as peculiar as his structural peculiarities.' Another admirable epitome of the character of the camel as a baggage animal is given in Rudyard Kipling's 'Oont.'

CAMON (חֶמֶן; ΠΑΜΝΩΝ [B], -ΜΜΩ [A], ΚΑΛ-ΚΩΝ [L]), an unknown locality in Gilead; the burial-place of JAIR (q.v. 1) (Judg. 10:5). It was doubtless one of the HAVVOTH-JAIR (q.v.). Reland (679) rightly combines it with the Καμούν which, in 217 B.C., Antiochus III. the Great captured along with Pella and Gefrun (Polyb. v. 70.12). To the W. of the place identified by Buhl with the ancient Gefrūn or EPHRON (q.v. i. 2) in N. Gilead, and 1 m. S. of the high road from Irbid (Arbela) to the Jordan, lies a village whose name, Kumeim, 'little summit,' is doubtless a corruption of the ancient Kamōn.

Eus. and Jer. (OS 272.66 110.20) identify Camon with a place in the 'great plain' called καμμώνα, Cimonia, situated 6 R. m. N. of Legio, on the way to Ptolemais. This καμμώνα, however, which is evidently Tell kaimūn (see JOKNEAM), is clearly on the wrong side of the Jordan.

CAMP (חֵיִם; ΠΑΡΕΜΒΟΛΗ [BADEFL], Gen. 32:3 [Ex. 14:19 Heb. 13:11]). A camp is so called from

1. Military. the curving of the tents over their occupants (חֵיִם; cp MH חֵיִם).² The term (חֵיִם) is applied primarily to an assemblage of tents of nomads (Gen. 32:21 [22], EV 'company'; Nu. 13:19, EV 'camps'). Of the early Israelitish nomad camps we have no contemporary records; Doughty (Ar. Des. 1:221 2:309) observes that some Bedouin tribes pitch dispersedly and without order; others in a circle, to protect the cattle. The latter style is that of the חֵיִם (Ar. duwār), of which we hear in Gen. 25:16 Nu. 31:10 1 Ch. 6:39 [54] Ezek. 25:4 (AV 'castle,' but in Ezek. 'palaces,' RV 'encampment').

The military camps of a later age are referred to elsewhere (see WAR). Suffice it to remark here (1) that the encampments of the Hebrews were probably round rather than square: this was a legacy from their nomad state (see above); the barricade which surrounded the camp was called חֵיִם (1 S. 17:20 28:5, AV 'trench,' RV 'place of the wagons,' mg. 'barricade'; in 17:20 28:5 and in 28:5 Aq. and Sym. or Theod. στρογγύλιος, Tg. חֵיִם—i.e., χαράκιωμα—i.e., a 'round' line of defence, cp חֵיִם, 'round').⁴ Also (2) that their camps have left no impress on names of places, as the Roman castra has on English place-names. MAHANAH-DAN (q.v.) owes its name to a misunderstanding. We do find, however, the strange archaizing phrases, 'the camp of Yahwē' (2 Ch. 31:2) and 'the camp of the Levites' (1 Ch. 9:18; cp Nu. 2:17 P), in connection with the description of the temple services. Is. 29:1 has been thought to describe Jerusalem as the camp—i.e., dwelling—of David (so BDB); but this is far from certain; the prophecy of Yahwē's encampment against Jerusalem is thereby obscured.

This leads us to speak of the camp in the wilderness, as conceived by P (Nu. 1-4). Of course, it must be

2. In the wilderness (P). historically true that there was a sacred tent in which the ark or chest containing the sacred objects of the Israelitish nomads was placed when the Israelites halted in their wanderings (see ARK, 4). This tent, glorified into the so-called Tabernacle (see TABERNACLE), forms the centre of the camp as described by P. The case is analogous to that of Ezekiel's ideal division of the Holy Land in the future (Ezek. 48), in which his sacerdotal conceptions find expression. The Tabernacle is the place of Yahwē's presence. This is why it is the central point, immediately round which the Levites encamp, forming an inner ring of protection for the ordinary Hebrew lest by inadvertently drawing near he should bring down upon himself the wrath of Yahwē (Nu. 150-53).

The positions of the various tribes are given in Nu. 2; on each side of the tabernacle, but separated from it by the Levites, three tribes encamp—a leading tribe flanked by two other tribes with their ensigns (נִסִּים). Thus on the E. is Judah flanked by Issachar and Zebulun; on the S. Reuben flanked by Simeon and Gad; on the W. Ephraim flanked by Manasseh and Benjamin; and on the N. Dan flanked by Asher and Naphtali. It has generally been held that the four leading tribes were distinguished by the possession of large standards (נִסִּים), whereas the other tribes had only smaller ensigns (נִסִּים); but this rests perhaps on a misinterpretation of נִסִּים, which, as the contexts and, in part the versions show, means a company; see the discussions in JQR 11 (98) 92-101; and cp ENSIGN.

The foregoing details are to be gathered from what have been generally regarded as parts of the primary narrative of P. Further details as to the Levites are given in 8:14-39, which has been attributed (e.g., by We. CH 179 ff.) to secondary strata of P. According to this section the various Levitical divisions encamped as follows:—Moses, Aaron and his sons (8:38) on the E., the Kohathites on the S. (8:29), the Gershonites on the W. (8:23), and the Merarites on the N. (8:35) of the tabernacle.

The Eastward is manifestly regarded as the superior position; the relative importance of the remaining three positions is less obvious; but it may be observed that the E. and S. sides are occupied by the children of Leah (exclusive of Levi) together with Gad; the W. by the children of Rachel, and the N. by the children of the handmaids (exclusive of Gad).

The priestly writers appear to have conceived of the camp as square, and this is probably another indication that we have to do with an ideal (not a historical) camp; for there is some reason for believing that the actual encampments of the Hebrews approximated to the round rather than the square form (cp § 1). Though the other hexateuchal sources furnish few details as to the camp, the direct statement of Ex. 33:7 (E) that the tabernacle was outside is quite irreconcilable with P's account that it formed the centre of the camp. The central position of the tabernacle, the intermediate position of the Levites between the tabernacle and the secular tribes, and the superior position assigned among the Levites to the sons of Aaron, are not matters of history, but the expression, in the form of an idealisation of the past, of a religious idea.

CAMPHIRE (כַּמְפִּיר; κῠπρος [BNAC]; Cant. 1:14 [om. B], 4:13), the earlier spelling of 'camphor,' should be HENNA (as in RV)—i.e., Lawsonia alba, Lamk., a plant described by Tristram (NHB 339 f.) as still growing on the shores of the Dead Sea at Engedi (Cant. 1:14). According to Boissier (Fl. Orient. 2744), it is frequently cultivated in Egypt, Arabia Petraea, and Persia; and it is probably indigenous to N. Africa, Arabia, Persia, and W. India (Bentham and Hooker, Gen. Pl. 1782). The 'cluster'¹ of Cant. 1:14 is that of the flowers.

Pesh. and Targ. have the same word as MT, with which κῠπρος also is identical; and the Syriac lexicographers state that this means the hannā of the Arabs—the plant from which they obtain the dye for the nails. The Greek references to κῠπρος will be found in Liddell and Scott, s.v.

CANA OF GALILEE (ΚΑΝΑ ΤΗΣ ΓΑΛΙΛΑΙΑΣ [Ti. WH]; Pesh. ḥaṭṭa) appears only in the Fourth Gospel, as the scene of Christ's first miracle (John 2:11 4:46), and of his healing of the nobleman's son lying sick at Capernaum (4:46-54), and as the home of Nathanael (21:2). The only evidence as to its position is that it lay higher than Capernaum; Jesus went down from it to the latter (21:2).

Tradition and present opinion are divided between the modern Kefr Kennā, a hamlet almost 3½ m. NE. of Nazareth, with a fine spring, and Khirbet Kāna or Kānat el-Gelil, on a promontory of Gebel Kāna over the plain of Buṭṭauf, about 8 m. N. of Nazareth, with ruins, tombs, cisterns, and a pool.

The data of Antoninus Placentinus, 570 A.D. (Itin. 4), suit Kefr Kenna, at which the medieval writers Phocas, John of Würzburg, and Quaresmius, place it; so also in modern times Guérin, De Saulcy, Porter, Tristram, and Conder. Eusebius and Jerome (OS) identify it with KANAH in Asher (Josh. 19:28); to them, therefore, it would not have been at Kefr Kenna, but may have been Kānat el-Gelil. The data of Theodosius (530 A.D.) suit Kānat el-Gelil, and so in the Middle Ages do those of Saewulf, Brocardus, Petellus, Marinus Sanutus; and others adhere. Robinson, who was the first modern to revive the claims of Kānat el-Gelil, describes the position, details the traditional evidence, and points out that the name is the equivalent of the NT one, while Kenna, with the double n, is not (BR 3:204-8). He has been followed by Ritter, Renan, Thomson, Stanley, and Socin.

The name Kānat el-Gelil is not above suspicion; it may be the creation of an early ecclesiastical tradition, just as Robinson himself points out that an attempt has been made by the native Christians in the present century to transfer it to Kefr Kenna. On the other hand, Josephus resided for a time in a village of Galilee, called Cana (Vit. 16); if this be the same as his residence in the plain of Asochis (id. 41), he means Kānat el-Gelil.

Conder (PEF Mem. 1:288) suggests another site for Cana in 'Ain Kānā, on the road between Reineh and Tabor.

CANAAN, CANAANITE (כְּנַעַן, כְּנַעֲנִי, ΧΑΝΑΑΝ, ΧΑΝΑΝΑΙΟΙ). Coins from Laodicea of the time of Antiochus IV. and his successors, bear

1. Phoenician usage.¹ the legend כְּנַעַן אֶם כְּנַעֲנִי, 'of Laodicea, a metropolis in Canaan'—probably the Phoenician town whose position is indicated by the ruins of Umm-el-'Awāmid, S. of Tyre. Well known, too, is the statement (wrongly assigned to Hecataeus of Miletus) that Phoenicia was formerly called χνᾶ (Herodian, περὶ μονήρων λέξεως, 19; similarly Steph. Byz. χνᾶ οὗτως ἡ Φοινίκη ἐκαλεῖτο). In accordance with this, Philo of Byblos (2, 27) calls the eponym of the Phoenicians 'Chna, who was later called Phoinix' (ἀδελφὸς χνᾶ τοῦ πρώτου μετονομασθέντος φοίνικος), and in Bekker, Anecd. iii. 1181, ὁ χνᾶς (gen. τοῦ χνᾶ) is identified with Agenor (the father of Phoenix), 'whence the Phoenicians also are called Ochna' (ὅθεν καὶ ἡ Φοινίκη ὀχνα λέγεται). Here we have the shorter form Kna' (כְּנַ; cp Olsh., Lehrb. d. hebr. Spr., 215a), so often met with in the Amarna tablets under the form Kīnaḥhi, side by side with the fuller form Kīnaḥni, probably with the article prefixed (כְּנַ) as in Egyptian inscriptions (see below, § 6).

As a geographical term Canaan shares the indefiniteness that characterises much of the OT, and indeed of all ancient, geographical nomenclature.

2. OT usage. In its widest sense the term seems to have been used to denote all of what may be roughly classed as Southern Syria, from the foot of Mt. Hermon to the lower end of the Dead Sea, including territory both to the E. and to the W. of the Jordan clear to the Mediterranean. Such appears to be the case in the Book of Joshua (11:3). More commonly, however, it is restricted to the lands lying to the W. of the Jordan—that is Judaea, Phoenicia, and Philistia proper. As Judaea, however, became more sharply marked off from Phoenicia and Philistia, it is natural that to Hebrew writers Canaan should have come to mean the latter districts more particularly. So in Is. 23:11 the term is applied to Phoenicia and perhaps to the entire coast, and in Zeph. 2:5 to Philistia. As an ethnic term, Canaanite is similarly applied to the inhabitants of the W. Jordan district in general, while at times—as in Nu. 13:29—the seats of the Canaanites are more specifically limited to the sea-coast and the Jordan valley. Corresponding to the identification of Canaan with Phœnicia, which is also in accord with the usage of the term Kināḥḥi in the Amarna Tablets (§ 10 below), the term Canaanite comes to be associated with the mercantile activity of Phœnicia, and in consequence appears occasionally—as, e.g., in Hos. 128 Is. 238—in the general sense of merchant. According to Targ. and many moderns, it has this sense likewise in Zech. 1421; Wellhausen and Nowack would add, emending in accordance with 5^{BA}, Zech. 11711.

The indefiniteness and the shifting character of both the geographical and the ethnical terms point to political changes in which were involved the people to whom the term Canaanites was originally applied: indeed, the indefiniteness is the direct outcome of these changes. Analogy warrants us in assuming as the starting-point a more limited district, and that with the extension of Canaanitish conquest or settlement the term became correspondingly enlarged, though it is not necessary to assume that the correspondence between actual settlement or possession and the geographical application of the term Canaan must have been complete. The predominance of Canaanites in important sections of the W. Jordan lands would have sufficed for imposing their name on the whole district.

3. Geographical inference.

The Egyptian inscriptions come to our aid in enabling us to determine where to seek for the origin of the term.

4. Egyptian evidence.

In the accounts of their Asiatic campaigns, which begin about 1800 B.C., the rulers of the Nile restrict the name Ka-n'-nq to the low strip of coast that forms the eastern limit of the Mediterranean; and, since it is only the northern section of this coast that affords a sufficiency of suitable harbours for extensive settlements, it is more particularly to the Phœnician coast-land that the name is applied. From the Phœnician coast it naturally came to be extended by the Egyptians to the entire coast down to the Egyptian frontier, the absence of any decided break in the continuity of the coast leading to the extension of the nomenclature, as it led in later times to the shifting character of the southern boundary of Phœnicia proper. The name of Philistia for the southern part of the coast does not occur in the

5. History of Name. Egyptian inscriptions. It was from the coast, therefore, that the name was extended to include the high lands adjacent to it; and it is interesting to note that, whilst the geographical term never lost its restricted application to the coast strip, the ethnographical term Ka-n'-ne-may—i.e., Canaanites—embraces for the Egyptians, according to Müller (As. u. Eur. 206 f.), the population of all of Western Syria, precisely as in biblical sources. The combination of the Egyptian with the OT notices seems to justify the conclusion that the coast population sent into the interior offshoots which made permanent settlements there. In this way both Canaan and the Canaanites acquired the wide significance that has been noted, whilst the subsequent tendency towards restricting the name to the sea-coast is an unconscious return to the earlier and more exact nomenclature.

The etymology of the term Canaan bears out these historical and geographical conclusions. In the Egyptian

6. Etymology. inscriptions (cp also above, § 1) the word appears with the article—'The Canaan'—which points to its being a descriptive term; and, even though we agree with Moore (PAOS, 1890, pp. lxvii-lxx) that the testimony is incomplete, the use of the stem 𐤑𐤍 in Hebrew in the sense of 'to be humbled' suggests the possibility that this stem may, in some other Semitic dialect, have been used to convey the idea of 'low,' even though that may not have been the original sense of the stem. If we keep in view the prefixing of the article to the term, and its original application to a strip of land between the sea and the mountains, no more appropriate designation than 'the lowland' can well be imagined; and this explanation of Canaan, though not unanimously accepted, is at any rate provisionally tenable.¹ Certainly it seems to be an ancient one; for when it is said that the Canaanite is the one who dwells by the sea and along the side of the Jordan (Nu. 1329)—i.e., in the two 'lowland' districts of Palestine—the very artificiality of the indicated limits suggests that it was the etymology of the word which led the writer to such a view in contradiction to so many other passages where Canaanites are spoken of as occupying mountainous districts also.

By the side of the term Canaan, however, there is in the OT another which is used, especially by the Elohist, to cover precisely the same population—namely, 'the land of the Amorite.' It is the merit of Steinthal (Z. f. Völkerpsychologie, 12267) and of E. Meyer (ZATW 1122 [81]) to have definitely demonstrated this important point. See AMORITES. At the same time, it is to be borne in mind that when the coast-land is specifically referred to, the term Amorite is not used, but, as already pointed out, either Canaan for the whole coast or Canaan for the northern and Philistia for the southern. Whether the Yahwist (J) is equally consistent, as Meyer claims, in using 'Canaanite' for the pre-Israelitish population of the W. Jordan lands is open to question. The theory cannot be carried through without a certain amount of arbitrariness in the distribution of the verses belonging to J and E respectively (see M'Curdy's note, Hist. Proph. Mon. 1406-8).

7. Amorites in OT.

Moreover, the cuneiform documents and Egyptian inscriptions furnish an explanation for the double nomenclature that places the facts in a somewhat different light. From the Egyptian side it is clear that the term 'Amoritic' land was limited to the mountain district lying to the east of the Phœnician coast-land but extending across the Jordan to the Orontes (WMM, As. u. Eur. 217 f.). The southern and the eastern boundaries are not sharply defined. The former is placed by Müller, on the basis of Egyptian inscriptions, at the entrance of the plain—the so-called Bekā'—between the Lebanon and the Antilibanus, and, whilst the Orontes might seem to furnish a natural eastern boundary, it would appear that the early Egyptian conquerors extended the limits still farther to the east. At the time of Thotmes III. the Hittites had not yet made their appearance. Later, in the days of Rameses III., when the Hittites form the most serious menace to Egyptian supremacy in Western Asia, the Orontes becomes a more definite boundary of the 'Amoritic' district, while as the Hittites encroach upon the territory of the Amorites, the term Hittite begins to displace 'Amorite' for the northern mountain district of Palestine. This process is completed about 1000 B.C. At that time, however, the term 'Amoritic' had already been extended to the southern range of Palestine—not by the Egyptians, but by the Babylonians and Assyrians. It is in cuneiform documents of (about) the twelfth century that we first come across the term 'land of A-mur-ri' (as the signs must be read, instead of A-har-ri, as was formerly supposed). Nebuchadrezzar I., king of Babylon, whose date is fixed at circa 1127, calls himself the conqueror of the 'land of Amor'; and Tiglath-pileser I. of Assyria, whose reign coincides in part with that of Nebuchadrezzar, names the great sea of the Amoritic land as the western boundary to his conquests.

Long ere this, however, as the use of the Babylonian language in the Amarna tablets (circa 1400 B.C.) shows,

¹ [So G. A. Smith, HG 5, whilst BDB and Buhl (Pal. 42) decline a decision. Moore and E. Meyer (GA 176) reject the derivation from 𐤑𐤍, 'humilis esse,' which is the property of the uncritical Augustine (Enarrat. in Ps. 1047). Augustine says (Expos. Ep. ad Rom.) that the peasants near Hippo, when asked as to their origin, answered in Punic, Chanani, id est, Chananaeos esse.]

CANAAN, CANAANITE

Babylonia had come into close contact with the Phœnician coast and the interior. As a matter of fact, one of the earliest rulers in Southern Babylonia of whom we have any record, Sargon I., whose date is fixed at 3800 B.C., is declared, in a tablet presenting a curious mixture of 'omens' and historical tradition, to have penetrated beyond the western sea (i.e., the Mediterranean), and there are indications that he actually set foot on the island of Cyprus (see Max Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, 83). Sargon speaks only in a general way of having proceeded to the 'west' land; but the ideographic designation in the text in question—MARTU—is the same as that which the later Assyrian rulers employ for the territory which includes Canaan in the proper sense. The same compound ideogram is the ordinary term for 'west' in the legal literature of Babylonia; and the suggestion that it is also to be read Amurru—MAR being a playful acrologism of Amur and TU, indicating perhaps direction—is plausible. In any case there appears to be some close connection between MAR TU and the name Amurru.¹ The text in which Sargon's western conquests are spoken of is probably of a very much later date than Sargon himself; but the value of the tradition, and at all events of the geographical nomenclature, is unimpaired by this fact. The Amarna tablets, which constitute the remains of

10. In Amarna tablets. Egyptian archives of the fifteenth century B.C., confirm the great antiquity of the term Amurru. In the letters to their royal master written by officers under Egyptian suzerainty, the term is of not infrequent occurrence, and an examination of the passages proves that it is applied, just like the corresponding term in the Egyptian inscriptions, to the mountainous district lying immediately to the east of the coast-land of 'Canaan' in the Egyptian sense—i.e., of Northern Palestine. The eastern limits are again not sharply defined. In the period to which the Amarna tablets belong, the Hittites are beginning to extend their settlements beyond the Orontes; but between 'Ḫatti' and 'Amor' land there was a district known as Nuḫaššī, which reached to Damascus. This may, roughly, be regarded as the eastern frontier of the 'Amurru' district. The agreement between the Egyptian and the Amarna nomenclature extends to the term 'Canaan,' which, under the form Kinahḫi, is limited in the Amarna tablets to the northern 'lowland' or sea-coast. It was quite natural that, from being applied to the interior district of Northern Palestine, the term 'Amurru' should come to be employed for the interior of Southern Palestine as well, just as the Egyptians extended the application of 'Canaan' to the entire Palestinian coast. When the Assyrian conquerors in the ninth century begin to threaten the

11. In later Assyrian. Hebrew kingdoms, they include the dominion of the latter under the land of 'Amurru.' The term 'land of Israel' occurs only once in Assyrian inscriptions, and even this passage is not beyond dispute. Again, since the 'Amurru' district in the proper sense was the first territory that the earliest Babylonian and Assyrian conquerors set foot in after crossing the Orontes, it also happens that the term becomes for them the most general designation for the 'West.' On the other hand, it must be noted that this development in the use of 'Amurru' is directly due to Babylonian influence, and forms part of the heritage bequeathed to later times by the period of early Babylonian control over the land lying to the west of the Orontes.

At the comparatively late period when Assyria, usurping the place formerly held by Babylonia, begins her conquests, the 'Amoritic' power in Northern Palestine was seriously threatened by the HITTITES (q.v.). In extending their settlements beyond the Orontes they encroached upon 'Amoritic' territory. The distinct traces of this westward movement of the Hittites are to be found in the Amarna tablets already mentioned. Indeed, the movement forms the key to the political situation of Palestine in the fifteenth century B.C. The Assyrian conquerors accordingly, when proceeding to the West, invariably began their campaigns by a passage of arms with the Hittites. This, taken together with the waning strength of the 'Amorites,' led to another change in the geographical nomenclature—the extension of the term Ḫatti or Hittite to Northern Palestine as far as the Mediterranean, so as to include, therefore, Phœnicia proper. For Southern Palestine the older designation 'Amurru' held its own, and the differentiation thus resulting between 'Ḫatti' and 'Amurru' assumed a practical significance which was quite independent of the original application of the two terms.

12. Land of Hittites.

¹ For a discussion of the subject and a somewhat different view, see Schrader, 'Das land Amurru,' SBAW Dec. 20, 1894. Cp also Wi. GZ (95), 51-54. An analogy for thus indicating 'westward' by a reference to a land lying to the west is to be found in the OT designation of Negeb for 'south.'

It will have become evident from this sketch of the early fortunes of Palestine that care must be exercised in drawing conclusions from geographical nomenclature. The Hittite power does not extend to the sea-coast because of the extension of the geographical term, and so the ethnographical application of Amoritic cannot be determined from the geographical usage.

That 'Amur' originally designated a particular tribe, or possibly a group of tribes, settled chiefly in the Anti-

14. Amorites. libanus district, is one of the few facts to be deduced from the early Egyptian monuments. These Amorites of Northern Palestine are frequently represented by the Egyptians as a blond people with a cast of countenance that marks them off from what are generally considered to be Semitic traits (see Petrie, Racial Types from the Egyptian Monuments). It would be hazardous, in the face of our imperfect knowledge, to enter upon further speculations as to their origin. There are good reasons for

15. Heterogeneous population. believing that already at a very early period the population of Palestine presented a mixture of races, and that through intermarriage the dividing lines between these races became fainter in the course of time, until all sharp distinctions were obliterated. Hence the promiscuous grouping—so characteristic in the Hexateuch—of Amorites with Perizzites, Hivites, Hittites, etc., of northern and southern Palestinians, without any regard to ethnic distinctions. The problem of differentiating between these various groups whom the Hebrews encountered upon settling in Palestine is at present incapable of solution. Future discoveries will probably emphasise still more strongly the heterogeneous character of the tribes. Their unorganised condition made them a comparatively easy prey to conquerors and yet difficult to exterminate. The early Babylonian and Egyptian conquerors were content with a general recognition of their supremacy on the part of the inhabitants. Native Palestinians were retained in control, and all that was demanded was a payment of tribute from time to time. When, however, the Hebrews permanently settled in Southern Palestine, about 1200 B.C., the early inhabitants lost much of their political prestige. In the course of time, also, many of the groups were reduced to a state of subjection, varying in degree, but in all cases, except in the case of the inhabitants of the coast, sufficiently complete to prevent any renewal of former conditions. With the successful establishment of the b'ne Israel in the lands to the west of the Jordan, the history of the pre-Israelitish inhabitants comes to an end in Southern Palestine, except so far as the influence of these Canaanitish groups upon the religious life of the Israelites is involved. The Hittites in the north, of course, survive; but the other groups, including the Amorites, gradually disappear, either sinking into a position of utter insignificance or amalgamating with the Hebrew tribes (see GOVERNMENT, § 15 f.; ISRAEL, § 8). The frequent injunctions in the Hexateuch warning the people against intermarriage with these conquered groups are clear indications that such intermarriages must have been common.

A new element in the ethnographical environment of Palestine that appears simultaneously with, or shortly before, the invasion of the Hebrews is represented by the Philistines, who, coming (it would appear) from some island or coast-land to the west of Palestine, succeeded as a sturdy seafaring nation in making settlements along the inhospitable southern coast of Palestine. Their non-Semitic character has been quite definitely ascertained; but, once in Palestine, they appear to have exchanged their own language for one of the Semitic dialects spoken in the land to which they came. It is rather curious that these Philistines, who generally lived in hostile relations with the Hebrews, and at various times threatened the existence of the Hebrew settlements, were eventually the people to give their name to a district which they never possessed in its entirety. In the latest Assyrian inscriptions, however, Pilaštu still appears in its restricted application to the southern coast-land, and it is not until the days of the Roman conquest that the equation 'Palestine = Philistia + Canaan' becomes established.

On the basis of the Egyptian and the Assyrian inscriptions and of the OT, the history of Canaan may be divided into three periods: (a) the pre-Israelitish period, from about 3800 B.C. to the definite constitution of the Israelitish confederacy; (b) the Israelitish supremacy from circa 1100 B.C. to circa 740; (c) decline of this supremacy, ending with the absorption of Canaan by Assyria and Babylonia 587 B.C. After the return of the Hebrews from the so-called Babylonian exile, the history of the north and south becomes involved in the various attempts to found a universal empire, undertaken in succession by Persia, Macedonia, and Rome.

The characteristic note in the history of Canaan down to the period of Persian supremacy is the impossibility of any permanent political union among the inhabitants. Even the Hebrews, united by a common tradition and by religion, yield to the inevitable tendency towards political division instead of union. This tendency stands in close relationship to the geographical conditions (see G.A.Sm. Hist. Geogr.). The land is split up into coast-land, highland, and valleys; in consequence of which, it presents climatic extremes sufficient to bring about equally sharp contrasts in social conditions. The resulting heterogeneous disposition of the population appears to have rendered united action (except in extreme necessity) impossible even among those sections most closely united by blood and traditions. [For further details regarding these three periods of Canaanitish history see the articles ISRAEL, § 6, HITTITES, PHOENICIA, PHILISTINES, etc.]

CANALS (כְּנָתִים), Ex. 7:19 Nah. 3:8 RV^{mg}. See EGYPT, § 6. The Hebrew word denotes the arms or canals of the Nile (כְּנָתִים). On artificial water-courses in Palestine see CONDUITS.

CANANÆAN (Ο ΚΑΝΑΝΑΙΟΣ [Ti. WH], cananæus [Vg.], כְּנַעֲנִי [Pesh.]), the designation applied to Simon the apostle (Mt. 10:4 Mk. 3:18 RV; mg. 'Zealot'). The word does not mean an inhabitant of Canaan (so AV CANAANITE, based upon TR κανανιτης), which in Gr. is usually expressed by χαναανιός (χ=2); nor has it anything to do with Cana. It is a transliteration of כְּנַעֲנִי, the pl. of כְּנַעֲנִי (cp Bib. Heb. כְּנַעֲנִי), which in Lk. 6:15 Acts 1:13 is represented by the Gr. equivalent ζηλωτής, ZEALOT (g.v.).

CANDACE (ΚΑΝΔΑΚΗ [Ti. WH]), queen of the Ethiopians (Αἰθίοπων), is incidentally mentioned in Acts 8:27. For the kingdom of Ethiopia which continued to maintain its independence against the Roman emperors, see ETHIOPIA. Its queen was often called Candace; this seems, indeed, to have been regarded as an official title, somewhat like 'Pharaoh' (or rather 'Ptolemy') in Egypt. The name occurs in hieroglyphics on a ruined pyramid near ancient Meroë: see Lepsius, Denkmäler, v. pl. 47 (pyram. 20 of Begeraueh). There, a queen is called Amen-aryt and K(e)nt(e)ky.¹ It is difficult to say which of the two or three queens called Candace was buried in that tomb.

1. Strabo (820; see also Dio Cass. 53:29; 54:5) speaks of the one-eyed virago Candace (τῆς βασιλίσσης . . . Κανδάκης, ἥ καθ' ἡμᾶς ἦρεε τῶν Αἰθίοπων, ἀνδρική τις γυνὴ πεπηρωμένη τὸν ἑτερον τὸν ὀφθαλμὸν) who in 22 B.C. attacked Egypt, overpowered the three cohorts of Roman soldiers stationed at the first cataract and devastated the Thebaid, but was easily defeated by the legate Petronius, and pursued to her northern capital, Napata, which was destroyed. 2. Pliny (6:35) seems to refer the reign of Candace ('regnare fœminam Candacem') to the time when Nero's explorers passed through Nubia; his assertion that the name had become somewhat common among the queens of Meroë ('quod nomen multis jam annis ad reginas transiit') is usually pushed much too far against the monumental evidence.

The Ethiopian officer of Acts 8 cannot well have had any connection with the Candace of Strabo; but his mistress may not improbably have been the contemporary of Nero.

Nero's explorers reported the southern capital as in ruins, in consequence of internal wars between the Ethiopians; most likely, the royal residence had already been shifted S. to Wady-es-Sofra and Soba, where ruined palaces and temples of the latest style have been found, but the kingdom appears still to have taken its name from the capital Meroë where the kings were, at least, buried.

For the condition of the Meroitic kingdom at that time and the part played by the queens (or rather kings' mothers), see ETHIOPIA.

CANDLE (נֵר; ΛΥΧΝΟΣ), Job 18:6 Mt. 5:15 etc.; cp below, and see LAMP.

CANDLESTICK, the EV rendering of (1) מְנוּרָה Ex. 25:31 etc. (ΛΥΧΝΙΑ), the well-known candelabrum of the temple, and (2) Aram. nebrašā נְבְרָשָׁא (deriv. uncert.), Dan. 5:5 (ΛΑΜΠΑC [Theod.]), פֶּנֶס [G.], to the former of which the present article will confine itself, leaving to the articles LAMP and TEMPLE further remarks upon the use of lights in temples or shrines, and of lights (and 'candlesticks' or rather 'lampstands') for secular purposes.

There is no critical evidence to support the supposition that the temple candelabrum described by P in Ex. 25:31 ff.

1. Not pre-37:17 ff. existed before the Exile. On the contrary, an old passage 1 S. 3:3 (written, perhaps, at the beginning of the seventh century B.C. [Bu., SHOT; cp SAMUEL, i. § 3 (a)]) speaks only of a 'lamp' (נֵר) which seems to have burnt from night-fall until the approach of dawn. Solomon, it is true, is said to have had ten golden menōrōth in his temple, five on either side (1 K. 7:49 ff.);² but they are not mentioned in 2 K. 25:13-17 (in the Jer. 52:19 their introduction is due to a glossator), nor do we find any trace of them in the temple described by Ezekiel (Ezek. 40 ff.), or in the restoration of temple-treasures by Cyrus (Ezra 1:6 ff.).³ These facts, as well as internal evidence, support Stade's conclusion that the passage in 1 K. is an interpolation (ZATW 3:168 ff. [83], G17 1:230; cp Now. HA 2:40 n. 2, and Benz. ad loc.). The

1    ; read  for the disfigured fifth sign.

2 Apart from the instruments used in tending this candlestick and the lamps themselves, mention is made only of the 'flowers' (נֶחֱמָה, in Ki. λαμπάδ[ε]κα [in Zech. 4:2 = ῥῆ, 'bowl'], in 2 Ch. 4:22 λαβίδες [i.e., ῥῆ, 'tongs']).

3 Unmentioned also in 2 Macc. 2:5 and the Apoc. of Baruch 6:7.

ten candlesticks of the temple of Solomon have probably been evolved from the imagination of a later scribe, who seems to have adopted the number ten to agree with the ten 'bases' (קַנֹּתִים); cp 1 K. 7:39. Obviously it is no real objection to our view of the critical value of 1 K. 7:49 that the Chronicler mentions candlesticks of gold and silver among David's gifts to Solomon in 1 Ch. 28:15. That this verse in its present form has suffered amplification appears from a comparison with 6.

Tradition held that these ten candlesticks (Jos. augments the number to 10,000! [Ant. viii. 37]) either were already present along with the Mosaic candelabrum, or were exact copies of it (cp 2 Ch. 4:7, מִצְבֵּי־זָהָב). Naturally Solomon's great wealth was considered a sufficient explanation of the otherwise curious fact that, whereas he employed ten candlesticks, the Mosaic tabernacle and the second temple were content with one. Bammidbar Rabba, 15, adds that the candlestick was one of the five things taken away and preserved at the destruction of Solomon's temple.

The candlestick of gold, called also the 'pure candlestick' (Lev. 24:4), is described at length by P in Ex.

2. Description. 25:31 ff. (= 37:17 ff.). It was placed outside the veil, in front of the table of shewbread (see the Vg. addition to Ex. 8:2). The menorāh comprised the קָנֶה (AV shaft),¹ קַנֹּתִים (branch, καλαμίσκος), $\text{כַּסְיָה$ (AV bowl, RV cup, κρατήρ, scyphus), תְּפֵלִים (knop, σφαιρωτήρ; Targ. Pesh. 'apple'),² and חֲזָזִים (flowers, κρίνον [similarly Targ. Pesh. Vg. 'lily']), perhaps collectively 'ornamentation.' The workmanship was מְעֻשָׂה , 'beaten-work' or repoussé (so τορευτός; but στερεός in Nu. 8:4 Ex. 37:14 [17]; Jos., on the other hand, has κεχωνευμένος, 'cast'). From an upright shaft three arms projected on either side. Each branch comprised three cups described as מְשֻׁבָּבִים , 'shaped like [or ornamented with] almonds' (ἐκτετυπώμενοι καρύσκους—see ALMOND), together with kafṭōr and perah. Under each pair of branches was a kafṭōr (Ex. 25:35), and four sets of kafṭōr and perah were to be found 'in the candlestick' (הַמִּצְבֵּה , i.e., on the shaft, v. 34). These four may have included the three of v. 35, in which case the fourth was between the base and the lowest pair, or near the summit. Possibly, however, the four sets came between the topmost pair of branches and the summit (cp the illustration in Reland De Spoliis Templi, facing p. 35). The centre shaft in Zechariah's vision was surmounted by a bowl (4:2 לֵן לַאֲמִידִּי). From Jos. (Ant. iii. 67) we learn that the candelabrum was hollow, and comprised σφαιρία, κρίνα with ροσκοί and κρατήρια, seventy ornaments in all.³ It ended in seven heads 'κατάλληλαι', and was situated obliquely (λογῶς) before the table of shewbread, and thus looked E. and S. 6's version of Ex. 37:17 ff. (differing widely from the present MT) supplies the interesting statement that from the branches (καλαμίσκοι) there proceeded three sprouts (βλαστοί) on either side 'ἐξιστούμενοι ἀλλήλους.' Rabbinical tradition (cp Talm. Menach. 28b, Abarbabel, Rashi, etc., on Ex. 1:2.) maintained that the candelabrum stood three ells in height and measured two ells between the out lights; and that it stood upon a tripod (Maimonides; cp Crenu Opusc. fasc. vi. 22 f.). The seven lamps were provided with pure olive oil (Ex. 27:20 f.), and for the general service were supplied 'tongs' (מַטְבֵּי־זָהָב), 'snuff dishes' (מִטְבֵּי־זָהָב), and various 'oil vessel' (כִּלְיֵי־זָהָב).¹ The lamps were to be tended daily (Ex. 30:7 f.); but tradition varied as to how many were kept lit at one time.² The light was never allowed to be extinguished, and tradition related that the approaching fall of the temple was prognosticated by the sudden occurrence of this mishap (Talm. Yoma, 39b); cp the lament in 4 Esd. 10:22 (written after the fall of Jerusalem lumen candelabri nostri extinctum est).

It was forbidden to reproduce the candlesticks exactly (cp Onias and the temple of Leontopolis, BJ vii. 10:3); but this law could be evaded by making them with five, six, or even eight arms (Ab. Zara, 43a).³

The holy candelabrum is referred to comparatively seldom in subsequent writings.⁴ It forms the motive in Zechariah's vision (Zech. 4, cp Rev. 11:4).⁵ In B.C. 170 Antiochus Epiphanes carried it off along with the golden altar etc. (1 Macc. 1:21, λυχνία τοῦ φωτός [AN], om. V); but a fresh one (tradition relates that it was of inferior material) was reconstructed by Judas after the purification of the temple (164 B.C., 1 Macc. 4:49). Jesus the son of Sirach employs the λύχνος ἐκλάμπων ἐπὶ λυχνίας ἀγίας as a simile for beauty in ripe old age (Ecclus. 26:17). The same is doubtless the λυχνία ἱερὰ seen by Pompey (Ant. xiv. 44), which, with its seven λύχνοι, was one of the three famous objects in the temple of Herod (BJ v. 55). Its fate at the fall of Jerusalem is well known. The holy candelabrum, or, more probably, a copy of it, was carried in the triumph of Titus (BJ vii. 55), and was depicted upon the famous arch which bears his name. Vespasian deposited it in the temple of Peace, and after various vicissitudes (see Smith, *DB*⁶, s.v.) it was placed in the Christian church at Jerusalem (533 A.D.). All trace of it has since been lost. Possibly it was destroyed or carried off by Chosroes II. of Persia, when, in 614, he took and pillaged Jerusalem (see Levesque in Vigouroux, DB, s.v.).

Curiously enough, Josephus, in his account of the triumph of Titus, states that the workmanship (ἔργον) of the candlestick was not the same as that which had been in the temple.⁷ As was the case with other objects in the triumph, it was probably constructed from the descriptions of the captives; besides, such conventional candlesticks were not unknown at that time.⁸ The griffin-like figures depicted upon the base of the candelabrum may be possibly ascribed to the artist; so far as can be judged, they do not resemble the mythical symbols from Palestine or Assyria. Consequently, in endeavouring to gain an idea of the original seven-branched candlestick, one must not adhere too strictly to the representation upon the Arch of Titus.

The language employed to describe the sacred menorāh shows that it must have closely resembled a tree.⁹ Seven-branched trees are frequently met with in sculptures, etc., from the E,¹⁰ and, as Robertson Smith observes, 'in most of the Assyrian examples it is not easy to draw the line between the candelabrum and the sacred tree crowned with a star or crescent moon' (*RS*¹¹ 488). Since it is only natural to look for traces of Assyrian or

² Cp Ex. 27:20 f. 2 Ch. 13:11 and Jos. Ant. iii. 8:3. Rabbinical tradition held that only one was lit by day. This, it has been suggested, was the lamp upon the central shaft (called מִצְבֵּה־זָהָב).

³ Thus, e.g., in the Feast of Tabernacles (see Succah, 52).

⁴ The evidence for the existence of more than one in post-exilic times rests only upon Jos. BJ vi. 8:3. With Ant. xii. 5:4 (1 Macc. 1:21) contrast ib. 7:6.

⁶ Cp their use as symbols in Rev. 1:12 f. 2:1 ff. 4:5.

⁷ Cp similarly the candelabrum in the temple of the Palatine Apollo (Pliny, 34:8).

Babylonian influence in the second temple, it is not improbable that the menōrah was originally a representation of the sacred seven-branched tree itself, possibly indeed the tree of life.¹ The six arms, instead of coming up and forming a straight line with the top of the central shaft, probably tapered off, the extremities of each pair being lower than those of the pair above it, thus presenting more accurately the outline of a tree. Examples of candelabra with the arms thus arranged are not unknown.²

It is not impossible that the Ethrog and Lulab ('citron' and 'palm-branch'; cp APPLE, § 2 [3]) of the Feast of Tabernacles (wherein candlesticks played so important a part) are to be connected also with this sacred seven-branched tree, from which, it has been suggested, the menōrah has been evolved. The specific tree represented was one which, for various reasons, was considered the most unique and valuable. The choice may have depended more strictly upon the belief that it was supposed to represent the tree of temptation in the Paradise myth (so at all events in Christian times; cp Didron, Manuel d'Iconographie chrétienne, 80).

See Reland, De Spoliis Templi; H. Opitz, Disquisitio . . . de candelabris . . . structura (1708); Reinach, L'Arc de Titus (Paris, 1890); and Vigouroux, DB, s.v. 'Chandelier,' with the literature there quoted. S. A. C.

CANE, SWEET (קֶנֶדֶן), Is. 43:24 Jer. 6:20. See REED 1 (δ).

CANKERWORM (קֶרֶבֶד; Βρογχος or ΔΚΡΙC), Ps. 105:34 Jer. 51:14 27 Joel 1:4 [twice], 2:25 Nah. 3:15 16†; in Ps. and Jer. AV has CATERPILLER. The Hebrew qereb is usually regarded as denoting a young stage in the history of the locust; but this seems doubtful. See LOCUST, § 2, n. 6.

CANNEH (קֶנֶה), Ezek. 27:23, MT, usually taken for the name of a place in Mesopotamia with which Tyre had commercial dealings, and identified with Calneh (see Schr. in Riehm's HWB (2), 1:256). Cornill even reads 'Calneh' (כלנה), appealing to a single Heb. MS which reads thus, and to variants of C—viz., χαλλαν [AΘ], χαλλαν [V]. But the name is really non-existent; the words rendered 'and Canneh and Eden' should rather be 'and the sons of Eden.'

Everywhere else we read either of Beth-Eden or of B'ne Eden; it is not probable that there is an exception here. The χavaa [B], or χavaav [AQ] of C, is not כננה, but כנע or כנען, where y or ny is a relic of קנ, and כנ a corruption of כנע. Most MSS of C give only two names, and the second name is not Canneh (as Smith's DB (2)), but a corruption of B'ne Eden. The discovery (for such it seems to be) is due to Mez (Gesch. der Stadt Harrān, 1892, p. 34). T. K. C.

The word canon is Greek; its application to the Bible belongs to Christian times; the idea originates in Judaism.

1. Greek terms.

The Greek (δ) kanōn (allied to kánva, kánvη, 'a reed'; borrowed from the Semitic; Heb. קֶנֶדֶן) means a straight rod or pole, a rod used for measuring, a carpenter's rule; and, by metonymy, a rule, norm, or law; a still later meaning is that of catalogue or list.

As applied to the books of Scripture kanōn is first met with in the second half of the fourth century: thus, βιβλία κανονικά (as opposed to ἀκανόνιστα) in can. 59 of the Council of Laodicea (circa 360 A.D.), and β. κανονιζόμενα in Athanasius (ep. fest. 39; 365 A.D.); kanōn for the whole collection is still later. The original signification is still a question. Did the term mean (a) the books constituted into a standard; or (b) the books corresponding to the standard (i.e. of the faith; cp kanōn ἐκκλησιαστικός, κ.

τῆς ἀληθείας, κ. τῆς πίστεως) and measured by it (cp kanonizō in Ptolemy's Letter to Flora, circa 200 A.D., in Holtzmann, p. 115 f.), or perhaps underlying it; or (c) the books taken up into the authoritative catalogue or into the normal number? The subject is discussed with full references to the literature in Holtzmann, pp. 142 ff. It is not improbable that the word passed through various phases of meaning in course of time.

The idea involved is clearly fixed; θεοπνευμάτια γραφὰ (Amphilochius, ob. 395), πιστευθῆντα θεῶν εἶναι βιβλία (Athanasius, ut sup.) are expressions concurrently used to convey the same meaning. It was, as we saw above, a loan from Judaism, and within the Christian domain originally applied only to the sacred books of the synagogue—the OT. So already in the NT itself (2 Tim. 3:16). The doctrine of the synagogue was that all the writings included in its canon had their origin in divine inspiration, and that it was God who spoke in them (Weber, § 20 1). This canon, with the doctrine attached to it, passed over to the Christian church and became its sole sacred book,¹ until new writings of Christian origin came to be added, and the Jewish canon, as the Old Testament, was distinguished from the New.

The composite expression 'canonical books' has an analogue in the usage of the synagogue. From the first century A.D. such books are designated

3. Hebrew terms. יְדִידֵי אֱלֹהִים (‘that defile the hands’: ² Yadayim 3:2 4:5³ 4:56; cp Eduyoth 53, and Weber, § 21 r). Of this surprising expression still more surprising explanations have been offered.

Thus (a) Buhl still prefers that drawn from Yadayim, 45 6, according to which the designation was intended to prevent profane uses of worn-out synagogue rolls. (b) Weber, Strack, C. H. H. Wright, and Wildeboer adopt that suggested by Shabbath, 13b, 14a. According to this the object was to secure that, as unclean, the sacred writings should always be kept apart, and thus kept from harm such as might arise, e.g., if they were kept near consecrated corn, and so exposed to attack from mice. (c) A. Geiger (Hinterlassene Schriften, 4 14) actually maintains that only such rolls as had been written on the skins of unclean beasts were intended to be declared unclean.

All such explanations are disposed of by Yadayim 34, where there is a special discussion of the question whether the unwritten margins and outer coverings of sacred rolls defile the hands. Under none of the above explanations could any such question as this possibly arise. The fact that defilement only of the hands is attributed to the sacred writings demands more attention than it has hitherto received. Interpreted in positive terms this can mean only that contact with them involves a ceremonial washing of the hands, especially as the ruling in the matter occurs in that Mishna treatise which relates to, and is named from, such hand-washings. The expression would be an unnatural one if it implied a command that the hands should be washed before touching (so Fürst, p. 83). As enjoining washing after contact it is quite intelligible. The Pharisees (under protest from the Sadducees; cp Yad. 46) attributed to the sacred writings a sanctity of such a sort that whosoever touched them was not allowed to touch aught else, until he had undergone the same ritual ablution as if he had touched something unclean.¹ The same precept, according to the stricter view, applied to the prayer ribbands on the tephillim (Yad. 33; see FRONTLETS, end). To this defilement of the hands the correlative idea is that of holiness;² both qualities are attributed together, but only to a very limited number of writings, namely the canonical (cp Yad. 35). See also CLEAN, § 3.

A. OLD TESTAMENT.

I. EXTENT AND ARRANGEMENT OF THE OT CANON.

—The extent of the OT canon, so far as the synagogue is concerned, is exactly what we find in our Hebrew printed texts and in the Protestant translations. The original reckoning of the synagogue, however, does not regard the books as thirty-nine. The twelve minor prophets count as one book called 'the twelve,' שנים עשר (so already in Baba Bathra, 14b, 15a text), Dodekapropheton; so also Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles; whilst Ezra and Nehemiah form one book of Ezra. Thus $11 + 3 + 1 = 15$ have to be deducted from our 39, leaving only 24.³ See § 11 ff.

The twenty-four canonical books fall into three main divisions: תורה (the law) with five books, נביאים (the prophets) with eight, and כתובים (the writings, Hagiographa) with eleven.⁴ The prophets consist of four historical books (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and four prophetic (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve Minor). Since the Massoretic period (cp Strack, PRE⁽²⁾ 7439) the first group has borne the name of ראשונים ('former prophets') to distinguish it from the second, נביאים אחרונים ('latter prophets'). Among the Hagiographa a distinct group is formed by the five (festal) 'rolls'—חמש.

² With this corresponds the Mishnaic name of the canon כתבי הקודש, while the names חפזים tacitly supplement the idea of holiness. To these exactly answer the NT expressions ἁγία γραφή, ἁγία, ἁγία, ἁγία, ἁγία, ἁγία. For other names see below, and for fuller details cp Strack, 438 f.

מגילת—printed in modern impressions in the order of the feasts at which they are read in the synagogue: Canticles (Passover), Ruth (Pentecost), Lamentations (9th Ab, Destruction of Jerusalem), Ecclesiastes (Tabernacles), Esther (Purim). Only once (in the *Baraytha*¹ Berachoth, 57b) do we find the three larger poetical books—Psalms, Proverbs, and Job—grouped together as כתובים גדולים and the three smaller—Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations—as כתובים קטנים. Finally, Daniel, Ezra, Chronicles close the list.

Compass and threefold division of the canon are already taken as fully settled in a very old and authoritative passage in the tradition of the synagogue, viz. the Baraytha Baba Bathra, 14b 15a; but as to the order of the books within their several divisions the same passage gives a decision for the first time. The explanation of this is that in the oldest times the sacred writings were not copied into continuous codices. Each book had a separate roll to itself.² Accordingly, in the preceding Baraytha (Baba Bathra, 13b), we find the question started whether it be permissible to write the entire Holy Scriptures, or even the eight prophets, on a single roll. On the strength of some precedent or other the question is answered in the affirmative; and this leads up to the further question as to the order in which the single books in the second and the third divisions ought to be written. This plainly shows that there was as yet on the subject no fixed tradition, and therefore too great importance ought not to be attached either to the Mishnic determination of the question or to the departure from Mishnic usage which we meet with.³ Both, however, are worthy of attention.

The order of the prophets proper, according to our passage, ought to be: Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the twelve. The position of Isaiah seems to have struck even the teachers of the Gemara as remarkable, and is explained by them in a fanciful way. The Massora gives Isaiah the first place, and in this it is followed by the MSS of Spanish origin (as by the printed texts), while the German and French MSS adhere to the Talmudic order. Just because of its departure from strict chronology, we are justified in assuming that the Talmudic order rests on old and good tradition. We may safely venture, therefore, to make use of it in the attempt to answer the question of the origin not only of the individual books but also of the canon.

For the first books of the Hagiographa, the order given in our printed texts—Psalms, Proverbs, Job—which is that of the German and French MSS, gives place in our passage to this order: Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs. Supposing this to be the original place of the Book of Ruth, we might account for its later change of position by a desire to group together the five festal rolls. This explanation, however, is impossible for the reason that the Massora and the Spanish MSS put Chronicles instead of Ruth in the first place and before the Psalter. Of course, the same purpose is served by either arrangement: each of them prefixes to the (Davidic) Psalter a book which helps to explain it. The Book of Ruth performs this service inasmuch as it concludes with David's genealogical tree and closes with his name; and the Book of Chronicles does so in a still higher degree, inasmuch as, in addition to the genealogy (1 Ch. 29 ff.), it gives an account of David's life, particularly of his elaborate directions for the temple service and temple music. Thus the claim of the Psalter to the first place

² The Law was an exception; its five books as a rule constituted but one roll, although the five fifts (חומשין) were to be met with also separately (cp Megilla, 27a).

is only confirmed by both variations (that of the Talmud and that of the Massora) from the usual order.¹ On the other hand, the Massora and the Spanish MSS support the order, Psalms, Job, Proverbs (Job before Proverbs), which therefore must be held to be the older arrangement, the other being explained by the desire to make Solomon come immediately after David.

The arrangement of the five "rolls" in the order of their feasts is supported only by the German and the French MSS. The Massora and the Spanish MSS have—Ruth, Cant. Eccl. Lam. Esth., whilst Baba Bathra, after transposing Ruth in the manner we have seen, gives the order—Eccl. Cant. Lam., then introduces Daniel, and closes the list with Esther. We may venture to infer from this (1) that the arrangement of the Megillōth in the order of their feasts in the ecclesiastical year is late and artificial; (2) that about the year 200 A.D. they had not even been constituted a definite group; (3) that the inversion of the order of Daniel and Esther, and the removal of Ruth from the head of the list, were probably designed to effect this, the position of Daniel before Esther having thus a claim to be regarded as the older;² and (4) that the original position of the Book of Ruth is quite uncertain, because the first place among the rolls may have been assigned to it by the Massora simply because it had been deposed from the first place among the Hagiographa. We may, further, regard it as probable that Proverbs was originally connected, as in Baba B., with the other Solomonic writings. Finally, it may be taken as perfectly certain that Ezra and Chronicles closed the list.³

The definition, division, and arrangement of books as given above, which rests on real tradition, and must constitute the basis for our subsequent investigations, is violently at variance with that of the LXX. It will be sufficient merely to indicate the differences here, for, as compared with the canon of the synagogue, that of the LXX represents only a secondary stage in the development.

(1) The arrangement of the LXX is apparently intended to be based on the contents of the books. The poetical books are, on the whole, regarded as didactic in character, the Prophets proper as mainly predictive, whilst the Law leads up to the historical books and is closely connected with the Former Prophets. As the Prophets are placed at the end, the progress of the collection is normal—from the past (historical books) to the present (didactic books) and the future (books of prophecy).

Certain, however, of the miscellaneous collection which forms the Hagiographa—those, namely, that are historical—are transferred to the first division, where a place is assigned them on chronological principles. Ruth (cp 11) is inserted immediately after Judges, whilst Chronicles, Ezra, and Esther are appended at the end. Lamentations, on the other hand, regarded as the work of Jeremiah (cp 2 Ch. 35 25 and the opening words of the book in 6), is transferred to the third division (prophetic books) and appended to Jeremiah; whilst Daniel closes the entire collection. Lastly, Job, regarded as a purely historical book,⁴ serves to effect the transition from the historical to the didactic writings.

Of the prophetic books, the Dodecapheton heads the list (in a somewhat varying order of the individual books), presumably on account of the higher antiquity of the writings which open it.

(2) Samuel and Kings together are divided into four books of Kings. Chronicles is divided into two books, as is also (subsequently) Ezra. (3) In varying degrees new writings unknown to the Hebrew canon are interpolated.

² This is supported by Jerome in Prolog. Gal. (cp the text in Ryle, 287 ff.). Other variations, it is true, occur in the same author.

³ It should be added that the MSS show the utmost irregularity in their arrangement of the Hagiographa; cp Ryle, Excursus C, 287 f., and, for some important details, A. Rahlf, 'Alter u. Heimat der vaticanischen Bibelhandschrift,' CGN, 1899, Heft 1 (Philol.-hist. Klasse).

The very various arrangements of the Hebrew canon which have been adopted in the Christian Church can all be traced back to the LXX, with 11. Ruth and Lam. and more or less far-reaching corrections based on the canon of the synagogue.

Among all the divergences of the LXX from the synagogue arrangement, there is only one concerning which it is worth while considering whether it may not possibly represent the original state of things as against the synagogue tradition: Ruth is made to follow Judges, and Lamentations Jeremiah. If the actual state of the case be that these two books ranked originally among the prophets, but were afterwards transferred to the Hagiographa, the historical value of the threefold division of the canon is very largely impaired. Now, this order of the books is supported by the oft-recurring reckoning of twenty-two books instead of twenty-four (cp above, § 2), a reckoning which can be explained only on the assumption that Ruth and Lamentations were not counted separately, being regarded as integral parts of Judges and Jeremiah. Our sole Jewish witness to this is Josephus (c. Ap. i. 8; circa 100 A.D.). He gives the total as twenty-two, made out as follows: Moses, 5; Prophets after Moses, 13; hymns to God and precepts for men, 4. The last-named category doubtless means the Psalms and the three Solomonic writings. Thus Daniel, Esther, Ezra, Chronicles, and even Job, are, as historical books, reckoned with the prophets, and Ruth and Lamentations are not counted at all—that is to say, they are included in Judges and Jeremiah.¹ Here clearly a compromise has been struck between the threefold division of the synagogue, which places the prophets in the intermediate position, and the division of the Alexandrians, which arranges the books according to subjects. The Alexandrian canon is obviously in view also in the pointed addition [βιβλία] τὰ δικάως μεμνημένα,² by which the books not contained in the canon of the synagogue are excluded. We may conclude, therefore, that also the reason why Ruth and Lamentations are not reckoned as separate books is that the LXX is followed; and thus we have no fresh testimony here. There is a further remark to be made. That the seven books just mentioned should be removed from the prophetic canon, if they once were there, to a place among the Hagiographa³ could be explained only by a desire to have the festal rolls beside one another. In the oldest tradition, however, there was no such group of rolls (see above, § 9).

13. Origin of No. 22.

The supposed motive, therefore, could not have been operative. On the other hand, the number twenty-two has an artificial and external motive, not indicated by Josephus, but mentioned by all the Church fathers from Origen downwards:⁴ there is thus one book for each letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This childish fancy is carried to an extreme point when the books are reckoned as twenty-seven (an alternative which is offered by Epiphanius and Jerome) to do justice to the five final letters also: the books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and Ezra are divided, the fifth being supplied in Epiphanius by Judges and Ruth, in Jerome by Jeremiah and Lamentations. That this is mere arbitrary trifling is obvious.

On the other hand Jerome gives also the number twenty-four (Prolog. Gal.), cautiously describing it as a reckoning accepted by 'nonnulli,'

14. Jerome, etc. Ruth and Lamentations thus being counted among the Hagiographa. A symbolical sense, based on Rev. 4.4, is found for this number also. In the Prologue to Daniel, however, Jerome adopts 24 as the only reckoning: he counts 5, 8, and 11 books to each of the divisions respectively, though he does not mention the total. Support is given to the Baraytha Baba B. 14b, 15a in like manner by the contemporary testimony of Bera-choth 57b, which quotes Cant. Eccl. and Lam. as 'writings,' and by the Targum of Jonathan on the prophets, where Ruth and Lam. are wanting. Finally, our oldest witness—4th Esdras, probably written under Domitian (85-96 A.D.), and therefore contemporary with Josephus—represents Ezra as writing at the divine command 94 books (chap. 14)—i.e., after deduction of the 70 esoteric books, the 24 books of the canon.¹

The number twenty-two, therefore, certainly comes from a Jewish source; but it is a mere play of fancy. The original place of Ruth and Lamentations, accordingly, was in the third part of the canon.

II. TRADITION RELATING TO THE CLOSE OF THE CANON.—Even had there been a binding decision of 15. No canonization. of books (twenty-four) was declared to be canonical and all other books were excluded from the canon, there could hardly have been any tradition of it. According to the idea of the meaning and origin of canonicity entertained by the synagogue (the sole custodian of tradition), and inherited from it by the Christian Church, canonicity depends on inspiration, and this attribute each of the twenty-four books brought with it into the world quite independently of any ruling, and in a manner that unmistakably distinguished it from every other writing. The growth of the canon was represented as being like that of a plant; it began with the appearance of the first inspired book, and closed with the completion of the last. The question accordingly was simply this: When was the latest canonical book composed? or, if this admits of being answered, Who was its human author?

To this question the tradition of the synagogue actually offers an answer,—in the same Baraytha Baba Bathra 14b 15a in which the order of the Prophets and the Writings is determined. The passage proceeds thus:—'And who wrote them?'—and names the writers of the several books in exact chronological sequence. The last of them is Ezra. With him, therefore (i.e., according to traditional chronology, about 444 B.C.), the canon closed.²

One can easily understand that, once Ezra had been named as the latest author of any biblical book, men did not remain content with the assertion (quite correct, if we admit its premises) which attributed to him the closing of the canon merely de facto, without deliberate act or purpose. Rather did each succeeding age, according to its lights, attribute to him (or to his time) whatever kind of intervention it conceived to be necessary in order to secure for the canon a regular and

17. 4 Esdras. orderly closing. The oldest form of this kind of tradition, so far as known to us, goes back earlier by a whole century than the tradition of the synagogue. It is to be found in the passage of 4 Esdras (chap. 14) that has been referred to already.³ Ezra (v. 18 ff.) prays God to grant him by his Holy Spirit that he may again write out the books

³ For what follows cp Ryle, Excursus A, 239 ff., where a very copious literature with fully translated quotations is given.

(here called 'the law,' torah, in which perhaps lingers a trace of an older form of tradition) which had been burnt (with the temple, one understands). God bids him take to himself five companions, and in forty days and nights he dictates to them ninety-four books (see above, § 14), of which seventy are esoteric writings, and the remaining twenty-four are the canon of the OT. Of this legend no further trace has hitherto been found in the remains of Jewish literature;¹ but within the Christian Church it shows itself as early as the time of Irenæus, frequently recurs in certain of the fathers (so Tertullian, Clem. Al., Orig., Euseb., Jerome, etc.), and is prevalent throughout the scholastic period, although there it is weakened by references to the powers of ordinary human memory.

The period of the humanists and of the reformation extinguished this as well as many other legends;² but

18. 'The Great Synagogue.' if the old legend disappeared, it was only to make way for a modern one, not mystic but rationalistic in character. This latter obtained credence through Elias Levita (ob. 1549), who says³ that Ezra and the men of the great synagogue (אנשי נפת הנורלה), among other things, had united in one volume the twenty-four books (which until then had circulated separately) and had classified them into the three divisions above mentioned, determining also the order of the Prophets and the Writings (differently, it is true, from the Talmudic doctors in Baba Bathra). This assertion satisfied the craving of the times for a duly constituted body, proceeding in a deliberate manner. Accordingly the statement of Elias Levita, especially after it had been homologated by J. Buxtorf the elder in his Tiberias (1620), became the authoritative doctrine of the orthodoxy of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. To it were added, as self-evident, though Levita said nothing of them; the authoritative decree (Hottinger), and the separation of the non-canonical writings (so already Buxtorf, and after him Leusden and Carpzov).⁴

It is vain to seek for the tradition on which Elias Levita based his representation. The Talmud, which says a great deal about 'the men of the great synagogue,' has not a word to say about this action of theirs with reference to the whole body of Scripture. The mediæval Rabbins also touch on the matter but lightly. We conclude therefore that, to suit the needs of his time, Levita merely inferred such an action from the existence of the body in question.⁵

The evidence for the very existence of a body of the kind required, however, is extremely slender. From the

19. Its true nature. middle of the seventeenth century it was continually disputed anew. If even we moderns must admit that there was a body of some kind, the kind of existence that we can accord to it supplies the strongest refutation of the statement of Elias Levita. The question as to what we are to understand by 'the men of the great synagogue' (or rather 'assembly') in the sense in which the expression was originally used, may be regarded as now fully cleared up. By a brilliant application and criticism of all that tradition had to say and all the work of his modern predecessors, Kuenen¹ demonstrated that this 'synagogue' is no other than the great assembly at Jerusalem described in Neh. 8-10: the assembly in which the whole body of the people, under the presidency of Nehemiah and through the signatures of its representatives, pledged itself to acceptance of the law-book of Ezra. This assembly, as the latest authority mentioned in the OT, was afterwards, by the tradition of the synagogue, made responsible for all those proceedings of a religious nature not referred to in the OT, which, nevertheless, so far as known, dated from a period earlier than the tradition laid down in the Talmud. Since this last, however, with its most ancient (and almost mythical) authorities, the five 'pairs' and Antigonus of Socho, does not go back farther than the second century B.C., there gradually grew out of the assembly, whose meetings began and closed within the seventh month of a single year, a standing institution to which people in that later time, each according to his needs and his chronological theories, attributed a duration extending over centuries. This was made all the easier by the chronology of the Talmud bringing the date of the Persian ascendancy too low by some 150 years, and thus bringing the beginning and the end closer together.²

Strack gives the originals of the most important passages; cp also Fabricius, Codex Pseudepigraphus VT 1 (1713), 1153 ff., 2 (1722), 289 ff.

⁵ When Levita points out that the order of the Prophets and the Writings, as fixed there, was different from that in Baba B., this only goes to show that the sages of the Mishna still found something for them to give decisions about. Elias Levita forgets that these sages found the books written on separate rolls, and that, therefore, there was not yet any order to fix. Cp above, § 7.

The activity as regards the canon, then, which Elias Levita and his followers ascribe to 'the men of the great synagogue', implies for the most part a comparatively late and false conception of the character of that supposed body. What ancient tradition has to say about it remains well within the limits of time assigned to it by criticism. In Baba B. 14b 15a, 'the men of the great synagogue' have assigned to them a place immediately before Ezra; they write Ezekiel, the Dodecapropheton, Daniel, and Esther. When, therefore, Ezra had contributed his share (Ezra and Chronicles), forming the closing portion of the series of the twenty-four books, the canon was forthwith complete. It is evident (1) that here the activity of 'the men of the great synagogue' does not extend below Ezra's time; and (2) that it extends only to four books, not to the whole canon. Therewith the absolute untenableness of Levita's assertion becomes apparent. Expedients have been

20. 'Writing', resorted to in vain; as, for example, of books. Baraytha to 'collect,' or to 'transcribe and circulate,' or both together (cp Marx, 41). 'The writer' of the Mishna most certainly means the author of the books—so far as there can be a question of authorship where, in the last resort, the author is the Holy Spirit. Of authorship nothing but writing is left. This, accordingly, is the sense assumed by Gemara and by rabbinical exegesis. What we are told concerning 'the men of the great synagogue' is not more startling than it is to learn that Hezekiah and his companions wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes,—books of which tradition is unanimous in saying that the last two were wholly, and the second in great measure, written by Solomon two centuries before Hezekiah. Here, in fact, it is the miraculous that is deliberately related. The meaning is that Solomon had only spoken (cp 1 K. 5 12 f.) what is contained in these books, and that 200 years later, divine inspiration enabled the men of Hezekiah to write it out, and so make it into canonical books. By exactly the same operation 'the men of the great synagogue' were enabled to write out what an Amos and a Hosea, a Micah and a Nahum, and so forth had spoken in the name of God. There is nothing to surprise us about such a view as this, if we remember what we have already found in connection with 4 Esdras (above, § 14). In the present instance, indeed, it is only a portion of the OT that comes into question, not the whole mass as in 4 Esdras; but, on the other hand, in 4 Esdras it is only the reproduction of books that had been lost that is spoken of, whilst here it is their very composition.¹

² Kuenen's proof has, in Great Britain, been accepted (among others) by Robertson Smith (OTJC (2) 160 f.), Driver (Intro. (1) xxxiii), and (at least in all essentials) by Ryle, to whose very careful Excursus A (239-272) the reader is especially referred. It has indeed found an uncompromising opponent in C. H. H. Wright (Koheloth, 5 ff. 475 ff.), whose arguments, however, amount to little more than this—the necessity (which in fact produced the legend) for some corporate body by whom the religious duties of that time could have been discharged. This, however, cannot convert what is demonstrably legend into history. Whatever has to be conceded is granted already by Kuenen (Ges. Abh. 1. 156, 158); and writers like Strack (PRE (2) 18 330, footnote*) are skillful enough to reconcile the demand for such 'organised powers' between Ezra and Christ with Kuenen's results. The most recent apology for the tradition is that of S. Krauss ('The Great Synod,' JQR, Jan. '98, p. 347 ff.). Of course he does not defend the theory of Elias Levita.

That stories such as these should ever have passed current as real historical tradition resting upon facts is surprising enough. Almost more astonishing is it that such baseless fancies should of fancy. not yet have been abandoned, definitely and for good, by the theology of the Reformed Churches.

Whether the tradition is genuine need no longer be asked. The only question is, How was it possible that the Mishnaic doctors, and perhaps those who immediately preceded them, arrived at such a representation? This question in some cases already greatly exercised the exegetes of the Gemara, and even led them to attempted corrections; and Rashi (ib. 1105) gives a solution of some of the knottiest points which, if we are to believe Strack,² represents the view of the Baraytha. According to this explanation, Ezekiel, Daniel, and Esther did not write their own books, because they lived in exile, and outside the borders of the Holy Land it was impossible for any sacred book to be written. Even, however, if this view had some element of truth in it, it hardly meets the main point. The writing of each book the scribes, as was natural to their order, sought to assign to a writer like themselves, a veritable sôphêr (see SCRIBE), and attributed the authorship of any book only to one to whom writing could be assigned on the authority of a proof text. In the case of books whose reputed authors could not be shown to have been sôphêrim, the authorship was attributed to the writers of such other books as stood nearest to them in point of time.

That Moses was a scribe was held to be shown by Dt. 31 9-24 (the Book of Job also was attributed to him on account of its supposed antiquity), and the same is true of Joshua (Josh. 24 26). Similar proof was found for Samuel in 1 S. 10 25, and to him accordingly was assigned, not only the book that bears his name, but also Judges and Ruth. In the case of David, if the words לְדָוִד in 2 S. 1 18 were not enough, there was at all events sufficient proof in 1 Ch. 23 ff. and especially in 28 11; means were found also for reconciling the tradition that he wrote the whole Psalter with the tradition (oral or written) which assigned certain psalms to other authors. It was declared that he wrote the psalms, but לְדָוִד of those other writers. Of Solomon all that was said in 1 K. 5 12 was that he spoke, not that he wrote; but no one felt at any loss, for in Prov. 25 1 the production of a portion of his Book of Proverbs is attributed to the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah. These genuine scribes were utilised to the utmost. They had ascribed to them not only all the Solomonic books, but also the book of their contemporary Isaiah, although 1s. 81 might well have been taken as saying something for the prophet himself. Whether in this instance some special cause contributed to the result, or whether it was merely that prophet and scribe had at any cost to be kept separate, it is impossible to say. For Jeremiah, the one prophet in the narrower sense of the word among those who are named, Jer. 36 spoke too distinctly to be ignored; that Kings also should have been attributed to him is at once sufficiently explained by 2 K. 24 18, and chap. 25 compared with Jer. 52. Next in order as biblical authors come 'the men of the great synagogue,' who, as contemporaries of Ezra the scribe far excellence (himself also one of their number) but at the same time also as signatories of the act in Neh. 10 r, were expressly called to this. Why Ezekiel (the scribe, if any scribe there was among the prophets), to whom the act of writing is repeatedly attributed (37 r6 ff. 43 rr), should not have been credited with his own book, may perhaps be rightly explained by Rashi. The twelve prophets could not have written severally their own books, because all the books together form (see § 6) but one book (a somewhat different turn is given to this in Rashi), and as the latest of them belonged to the period of the great synagogue, and, indeed, according to tradition, were actually members of that body, the assignment of the authorship to it presented no difficulty. Finally Daniel and Esther, regarded as books of the Persian period, easily fell to their domain. Ezra, with his account of his own time, closes the series. Some explanation is needed of the fact that whilst 'the genealogies in Chronicles down to himself' (this is no doubt the easiest explanation) also are assigned to Ezra, no account is taken of the remainder of that work. The most likely reason is that the main portion of Chronicles was regarded as mere repetition from Samuel and Kings, the origin of which had been already explained.

It is not of the slightest importance to consider how far this attempted explanation of the origin of the various books is in agreement with the real thought of the Baraytha; in any case it remains pure theory, the product of rabbinical inventiveness, not of historical tradition. Apart from a fixed general opinion about certain individual books and about the Pentateuch, the tangible outcome of the beliefs of the whole period with which we are dealing is that the canon was held to have been closed in the time of Ezra. The theory upon which this belief proceeded will occupy us later (§ 44 f.).

As against this congeries of vague guesses and abstract theories, science demands that we should examine each book separately, and endeavour, with the evidence supplied by itself, and with continual reference to the body of literature as a whole, to ascertain its date and to fix its place in the national and religious development of the Jews. This is the task of 'special introduction'; but its results must always have a direct bearing on the history of the canon. This history must give close attention also to all the external testimonies relative to the formation and to the close of the canon, and, after weighing them, must assign to them their due place. Above all, it must trace out all general opinions and theories, such as we have been considering, ascertain their scope and meaning, and satisfy itself as to the period at which they arose, and as to their influence on the formation of the canon. In so far as we succeed in these endeavours, we shall arrive at a relatively trustworthy history of the canon.

III. HISTORY OF THE OT CANON.—(1) *The first canon: the Law.*¹—Whatever difficulties we may have

¹ W. J. Beecher (see below, § 75) offers a solemn protest against the fundamental proposition of this article (as of all modern discussions of the subject)—a triple canon, collected and closed in three successive periods. He denies that there is any evidence of a time when the Law alone was regarded as canonical, or of a time when the Law and the Prophets stood in authority above the Writings. He denies that the other OT writings were originally regarded as less authoritative than the Pentateuch. He sees in the canon of the OT an aggregate of sacred books growing gradually and continually to a definite time when the part written latest was finished and the collection was deemed complete. Law [or rather, Message], Prophets, and Writings are nothing but three different names for the same books—e.g., the prophetic writings. We are not told how these terms came to be the names of three different parts of this collection. The fundamental fact that the Law alone was promulgated and made authoritative by Ezra and Nehemiah, is obscured by Beecher by the statement that the term 'book of Moses' is applied to an aggregate of sacred writings including more than the Pentateuch. His only proof is Ezra 6 r8, where 'we are told that the returned exiles set up the courses of the priests and Levites, "as it is written in the book of Moses." The Pentateuch contains nothing in regard to priestly or Levitical courses. Possibly the reference is to written precepts now found in 1 Chronicles.' Beecher does not translate accurately. The text runs: 'They set up the priests in (by) their courses and the Levites in (by) their divisions.' This means that the priests and the Levites are set up 'as it is written in the book of Moses'; but it does not necessarily mean that their courses and divisions were based on the same authority. Beecher never mentions the fact that the Samaritans accepted only the Law (see below, § 25), nor does he investigate what grain of truth is contained in the same statement as to the Sadducees in dealing with the later stages of the history of the canon and with its close, there is no obscurity about its commencement. It was indeed by those

23. The Torah. 'men of the great synagogue,' to whom orthodoxy assigns the close of the canon, that its foundations were laid, in the clear daylight of well-authenticated history. From the twenty-fourth day of the seventh month of the year 444 B.C. onwards, Israel possessed a canon of Sacred Scripture. It was on this day that the great popular assembly described in Neh. 9 f. solemnly pledged itself to 'the Book of the Law of Yahweh their God' (93), 'which had been given by the hand of Moses the servant of God' (1030), and had been brought from Babylon to Jerusalem shortly before by Ezra the scribe (Ezra 76 rr r4 Neh. 8 r f.). In virtue of this resolution the said law-book at that time became canonical; but only the law-book.

Already, indeed, in the eighteenth year of King Josiah, between 623 and 621 B.C., there had been a solemn act of a similar character, when the king and people pledged themselves to the law-book that had been found in the temple, the 'book of the covenant' (2 K. 23). The entire editorial revision of the Books of Kings, and especially the express references to the law-book (1 K. 23 2 K. 2325, and above all, 2 K. 146 compared with Dt. 24 r6), clearly prove that it had canonical validity during the exilic period, whilst the book of Malachi (cp esp. 24 f. 35 8 f. 22) shows that also in the post-exilic period down to the time of Ezra it continued to hold this place in Jerusalem.¹ The critical labours of the present century, however, have conclusively established that this first canonical book contained simply what we now have as the kernel of our Book of Deuteronomy.

The law canonised in 444 was a very different document. The only possible question is whether it was the 24. Its extent. entire Pentateuch as we now have it, or only the Priestly Writing, the latest and most extensive of the sources which go to make up the Pentateuch. The latter is, so far as we can at present see, the more likely hypothesis. In that case what happened in 444 B.C. was that the Deuteronomic Law, which had until then ruled, was superseded by the new Law of Ezra. A determination of this kind, however, was unworkable in view of the firm place which the older book that had been built up out of J E and D² had secured for itself in the estimation of the people. Accordingly, the new law was revised and enlarged by the fusing together of the Priestly Writing and the earlier work, a process of which our Pentateuch, the canon of the Law, was the result.

This last stage was most probably accomplished in the next generation after that of Ezra, and completed before 400 B.C. We have evidence

25. Samaritan Torah. of this in the fact that the schismatic community of the Samaritans accepts the entire Pentateuch as sacred. It is true that the solitary historical account we possess (Jos. Ant. xi. 72-84) places the separation of this community from that of Jerusalem as low down as the time of Alexander the Great (about 330 B.C.); but the cause that led to (see below, § 38), or consider the reason why the Law is wanting in 2 Macc. 2 r3 (see below, § 27). On the other side, it may be hoped that he will find the difficulty caused by the Book of Joshua, a difficulty greatly exaggerated by himself, removed (in fact turned into a help) in § 28 f. of this article, written two years before his paper was published. This is only one of many instances. The theory of the triple canon of the OT, based on incontestable facts, is not as mechanical as Beecher represents it. It is able to satisfy every demand for organic growth in the collection of OT writings. Beecher's paper (a total failure, it seems to the present writer, in the main point) may do much good in cautioning against too mechanical a conception; but it did not furnish to the present writer any occasion to alter the views developed in this article.

the separation—the expulsion of the high priest's son, the son-in-law of Sanballat, who founded the community and sanctuary of the Samaritans—is rather, according to Neh. 13:28, to be referred to the period of Nehemiah (about 430 B.C.). It has already been mentioned (§ 19) that Jewish chronology has dropped a whole century and a half, so bringing the periods of Nehemiah and Alexander into immediate juxtaposition; and this is the explanation of the confusion found in Josephus. We may suppose that before the final separation of the Samaritans there elapsed an interval of some decades which would give ample time for the completion of the Law.¹ This does not exclude the possibility that adjustments may have been made at a later date between the Samaritan Pentateuch and that of Jerusalem, or that later interpolations may have found their way into the Samaritan law. The compass of the work, however, must have remained (to speak broadly)² a fixed quantity, otherwise the Samaritans would not have taken it over.³

At the same time the Samaritan canon, which contained nothing but the (complete) law, is our oldest

26. Torah = entire canon.

witness to a period during which the canon consisted of the Law alone, canon and Law being thus coextensive conceptions. If alongside of the Law there had been other sacred writings, it would be inexplicable why these last also did not pass into currency with the Samaritans. There are other witnesses also to the same effect. The weightiest lies in the simple fact that the name Torah or Law can mean the entire canon, and be used as including the Prophets and the Writings. We find it so used in the NT (Jn. 10:34 12:34 15:25 1 Cor. 14:21), in the passage already cited from 4 Esdras (14:20), and, at a later date, in many passages of the Talmud, the Midrashim, and the Rabbins (cp Strack, 439). This would have been impossible if the words 'canon' and 'law' had not originally had the same connotation, other books afterwards attaining to some share in the sanctity of the Law. The same thing is shown by an often-quoted and much-abused passage in 2 Macc. (2:13). There we read that Nehemiah, in establishing a library, brought together the books concerning the kings and prophets (τὰ περὶ τῶν βασιλέων καὶ προφητῶν) and the (poems) of David (τὰ τοῦ Δαυὶδ) and the letters of kings concerning consecrated gifts (to the temple: ἐπιστολὰς βασιλέων περὶ ἀναθεμάτων). The passage occurs in a letter from the Jews of Palestine to their compatriots in Egypt, and is an admitted interpolation in a book which is itself thoroughly unhistorical; it is thus in the highest degree untrustworthy (cp MACCABEES, SECOND, § 7). As evidence of what could be believed and said at the time of its composition, however, in the first century B.C., it is unimpeachable. When we find the Former and Latter Prophets and the Psalms catalogued as forming part of a library, and, alongside of them and on the same level, letters of kings (heathen kings of course), it is clear that there is no idea of sacrosanct books. The Law is not mentioned in the same connection; as the sacred canon, it receives a place to itself and has nothing to do with the library. Whether all the contemporaries of this author shared his view is another matter; in any case, the possibility of such a view being held is proof of the original isolation of the Law. Moreover, it appears from this passage that at the time when it was written, or within the writer's circle, the legend of the closing of the canon by Ezra can have been prevalent only in the (narrower and historically much more accurate) sense that the canon of the Law received its validity as such by Ezra's action. The fact, moreover, that in the LXX the version of the Law appears to be distinctively an official work, not the result of private enterprise, confirms the inference already drawn from the exclusive attention given to the Law in the period represented by Ezra.

(2) The second canon: the Prophets.—The nucleus for a second canon was laid to the hand of the scribes of the fifth century in the very fact that the 28. J E D. canon of the Law had been set apart to a place by itself. It is one of the certain results of the science of special introduction that the Priestly Document on which Ezra's reform rested, followed the history of Israel, including the division of Canaan, down to the end of the Book of Joshua: the portions derived from it can still be distinguished in our present Book of Joshua. The same holds good for J E D. We can go further. It may still be matter of dispute, indeed, whether the material for the subsequent books (Judges, Samuel, Kings) also was derived from J and E; but so much is indisputably certain, that the Deuteronomic redaction embraced these books also, in fact, the whole of the Former Prophets, and that at the end of Kings the narrative itself is from Deuteronomistic hands. As even now each of these books is seen to link itself very closely to that which precedes it, it follows that J E D, ultimately at least, in the form in which the work was used in the fifth century, included the Law and the Former Prophets. That the Law might attain its final form as a separate unity, therefore, it was 29. Penta- not enough that P and J E D should be teuch. worked up into a single whole. This whole must be separated from the history that followed it. How and when this was effected we can imagine variously. According to the view taken above, what is most probable is that in 444 the entire Priestly Writing, including the closing sections relating to the entrance into Canaan and the partition of the country, was already in existence and canonized in its full extent.¹ Not until its subsequent amalgamation with the corresponding sections of J E D did the hitherto quite insignificant historical appendix to the 'law,' strictly so called, acquire such a preponderance that the division was found to be inevitable. It was made at the end of the account of the death of Moses, and thus a portion of the Priestly Writing also (as well as of J E D) was severed from the body to which it belonged. In any case, however we may reconstruct the details, the great fact abides that, after the Law had been separated, there remained the compact mass of writings which afterwards came to be known as 'the former 30. 'Former Prophets,' a body of literature which from the very first could not fail to take an exceptional position from the simple fact that it had once been connected with the sacred canon, and must necessarily have been prized by the community as a possession never to be lost.

Equally certain is it that by far the larger proportion of the 'latter prophets' was already in the hands of the scribes of the fifth century. In these

31. 'Latter Prophets,' books God spoke almost uninterruptedly by the mouth of his prophets—in itself

reason enough for assigning to them the attribute of holiness. If, nevertheless, the books were not reckoned to the canon, the explanation is to be sought in the practical character of the first canon: Ezra gave to the community in the canon of the Law all that it required. It was not new when he gave it; he only gave over again what God had once already given through Moses to the people as his one and all. If the people had remained true to this Law, not only would they have escaped all the disasters of the past, but also they would never have needed new revelations from God through his prophets. These prophets contributed nothing new; they were sent only to admonish the unfaithful people to observe the Law, and to announce the merited punishment of the impenitent. The Law thus had permanent validity, whilst the work of the prophets was transitory; the Law addressed itself to all generations, the prophets each only to his own, which had now passed away. The generations that had sworn obedience anew to the Law under Ezra, therefore, had no need for the prophets. Should similar circumstances recur, it might be expected that God would send prophets anew; but the prevailing feeling was, no doubt, that the time of unfaithfulness, and consequently of the prophetic ministry, had gone for ever.¹

The view here set forth is that of the OT itself, pre-eminently that of the Deuteronomistic school, where it is constantly recurring.² Indeed, since the Deuteronomistic and the Priestly Laws alike, each in its own way, had assimilated the results of the work of the prophets, this view must be called, from their point of view, the right one. Accordingly it has throughout continued to be the view of the synagogue, as can be proved from many passages in the Talmud and the

33. Historical books

Midrashim.³ It explains at the same time why it is that the historical books (Joshua-Kings) are called 'prophets.' They speak just in the manner of the prophets of the unfaithfulness of past generations to the law, and of the divine means—chiefly the mission of prophets—used to correct this. Both relate in a similar way to the past. For the same reason the prophets, conversely, are called history; for 'tradition' in the sense of 'history' is what is meant by אשלתא (ash-lenta), the Massoretic term for the canon of the prophets, נביאי (nebi'im), as a whole (cp further, Strack, 439).

We can thus very easily understand how it was that the Prophets could not be canonized simultaneously with the Law. To pledge people to the Prophets was not possible, and the obligation to the Law would only have been obscured and weakened by a canonization of the Prophets at the same time. The idea of canonicity had first to be enlarged; it had to be conceived in a more abstract manner, on the basis of a historical interest in the past, before the canonizing of the Prophets—that is to say, their being taken in immediate connection with the Law—could become possible.⁴

Of course a considerable period of time must have been required for this; and the same result follows from the established facts of 'higher criticism.'

34. Not yet canonized.

Of the Prophets properly so called, not only are Joel and Jonah later than the completion of the Law, but also the older books, over wide areas of their extent, bear more or less independent evidence of a secondary literary activity.¹ These phenomena are so manifold, and there are traces of periods so widely separated, that we must believe not a few generations to have borne a part in bringing the prophetic books to their present form. Yet these extensive additions and revisions, at least most of them, must of course have taken place before the canonization.

² Compare also, however (especially), the confession of sin which in Nehemiah precedes the taking of the covenant (particularly xxi. 16 ff. 26-29 ff. 34).

This obvious conclusion is indeed contradicted by the tradition of the synagogue, which tells us that the books of the prophets were written by 'the men of the great synagogue,' on which view the canon of the prophets was already complete in 444 B.C. Nor does this assertion, the baselessness of which we have already seen, stand alone. It is backed by others. Josephus (c. Ap. 18) says expressly that it was down to the time of Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes (i.e., Artaxerxes I., Longimanus, 465-424) that the literary activity of the prophets continued. The passage in the Mishna in which the unbroken chain of tradition is set forth (Pirke Abôth, 1:1) represents the Law as having been handed down by the prophets to the men of the great synagogue; which again brings us to the same date, and dispenses with the need of any further testimony.

It is exactly this chain of tradition, however, that supplies the interval of time that we need. The passage goes on to say: Simon the Just was one of the last survivors of 'the men of the great synagogue'; he handed on the tradition to Antigonus of Socho, by whom² in turn it was transmitted to Jose b. Joëzer and Jose b. Johanan, the first of the so-called 'pairs.' That the chronology of this section leaves much to be desired is clear.³ It seems to be as good as certain, however, that the fourth of the five pairs lived about 50 B.C., the third about 80 B.C. The same ratio would bring us to somewhere about 140 or 150 B.C. for the first 'pair,' whilst the time of Antigonus and Simon would fall about 200 B.C., or a little earlier. In that case, Simon the Just would be the high priest Simon II. b. Onias who is briefly mentioned by Josephus (Ant. xii. 4:10). The cognomen of 'Just,' however, is given by Josephus (Ant. xii. 2:54:1) to Simon I. b. Onias, who lived almost a century earlier, soon after 300. If we must consider that he is the Simon who is meant, it is clear that the alleged chain of tradition is defective in its earlier portion, only a single name having reached us for the whole of the third century. Further, Simon the Just is the connecting link with 'the great synagogue,' and as the assembly that gave rise to this name was held in 444, there is again a gap, this time of a century, even if we concede that Simon reached a very advanced age. The long interval between Simon the Just and 444 B.C., however, is not to be held as arising from a different view about the synagogue; it is to be accounted for by the hiatus (already referred to, §§ 19, 25) in the traditional chronology between Nehemiah and Alexander the Great, similar to that which brings Zerub-babel into immediate relation with the time of Ezra.⁴ It is within this vacant period that we must place those redactions, the fact of which has been so incontestably proved by critical inquiry. The main reason why the synagogue has no recollection of this period, is that during this time the activity of the scribes (with the history of which alone the chronology busies itself from Ezra onwards) had no independent life, but devoted itself almost exclusively to the sacred writings of the past, and left its traces only there, so that whatever it and canonicity (even in the case of non-prophetic books) is guaranteed only by contemporaneity with the continuous series of the prophets. This view is confirmed by the Talmudic tradition. Tos. Yadayim, 2:3 (p. 683) rules that 'books such as Ben Sira [Ecclesiasticus] and all books written בכאן ואילך do not defile the hands.' This בכאן ואילך—i.e., 'from that time forward'—is the standing expression for the cessation of the prophetic period. Corresponding with it is the other phrase עד כאן ('until then'), denoting this period. Further confirmation is found in San. 28a: 'Books like Ben Sira and similar books written from that time onwards may be read as one reads a letter' (cp on this, Buhl, § 2). The point of time is fixed by a passage in Seder olam rabba, 30, as the time of Alexander the Macedonian: 'The rough he-goat (Dan. 8:21) is Alexander the Macedonian, who reigned twelve years; until then the prophets prophesied by the Holy Spirit; from that time forward incline thine ear and hearken to the words of the wise.'¹ If Alexander the Great here takes the place of Artaxerxes in Josephus, the explanation is simply that, according to the Jewish chronology and conception of history, Haggai and Zechariah, Ezra and Malachi all lived at the same time, which is contiguous with that of Alexander.²

² 'By whom' is plural according to the text, the reference including perhaps Simon the Just. Zunz (37 n.) would interpret 'from the successors of Antigonus, mediate or immediate'; but this is hardly permissible.

We now know, therefore, that it is not out of mere caprice, but in accordance with a settled doctrine, that 4 Esd. 14 and Baba Bathra 15a declare all the canonical books to have been already in existence in Ezra's time. The time limit was a fixed one; difference of view was possible only with regard to the person of the author. From this doctrine we deduce the proposition: Into the third canon, that of the Hagiographa, were received all books of a religious character of which the date was believed to go back as far as to the Prophetic period, that is, to the time of Ezra and the Great Assembly.

The reason for the setting up of such a standard is easily intelligible. Down to the time of the Great 45. Reason of limit.

Assembly, the Spirit of God had been operative not only in the Law but also outside of it, namely in the Prophets; but 'from that time onwards' the Law took the command alone. 'Until then' it was possible to point to the presence of the factor which was essential to the production of sacred writings, but 'from that time onwards' it was not. Hence the conviction that the divine productive force had manifested itself even in those cases where the writing did not claim to be an immediate divine utterance; but only down to the close of the prophetic period. The proposition we have just formulated is sufficient to explain the reception or non-reception of all the books that we now have to deal with. Job was received as, according to general belief, a book of venerable antiquity; Ruth as a narrative relating to the period of the judges, and therefore (as was invariably assumed as matter of course in the case of historical narratives) as dating from the same time; the Psalms as broadly covered by the general idea that they were 'David's Psalms'; Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes as resting on Solomon's name; Lamentations as resting on that of Jeremiah; Daniel as a prophet of the Persian period (which in its whole extent was supposed to fall within the prophetic age) overlooked in the earlier collection. The same consideration held good for Esther, regarded as a history book. At the close comes the Book of Ezra—separated from the general work of the Chronicler³—which, in its account of the Great Assembly, contained the original document on the close of the Prophetic period and so, as it were, puts the colophon to the completed canon. Had what we now call Chronicles—i.e., the first part of the Chronicler's work—been incorporated with the canon simultaneously with the incorporation of its second part, the Book of Ezra, the two would never have been separated, and even arranged in an order contrary to the chronological (cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 15). We may therefore say with all confidence that Chronicles did not come in till afterwards, as an appendix to the canon. The reason for its original exclusion was no doubt the consciousness that, strictly, it was but a Midrash to other canonical books. The second part of the Chronicler's work, once canonized, tended to take the other along with it; possibly too the Book of Chronicles may have been helped by the minuteness with which it goes into the temple service—a feature to which at a later date, in the Massoretic arrangement (see above, § 8), it was indebted for a first place among the Hagiographa. From this one certain case, the last, may be inferred the possibility that other books also, especially the immediately preceding ones (Ezra, Esther, Daniel; perhaps also Ruth: see above, § 9), were only gradually added, one by one, to the third canon by way of appendices. At least, they all of them have the appearance of being, as to their contents, appendices to the two halves of the Prophetic canon, whilst the remaining six books form a class by themselves. We are not, however, in a position to speak with certainty here.

Conversely, all other writings, so far as not excluded by reason of their language or some exception taken to their contents, may safely be supposed to have been excluded either because, manifestly and on their own confession, they did not go back to the Prophetic time, or because their claim to do so was not admitted.¹ The first-mentioned reason must have been what operated in the case of works of so high a standing as 1 Macc. and Ecclesiasticus; as instances of the application of the second principle, we may take (in contrast to Daniel) the books of Baruch and Enoch.²

The attempt to determine the date at which the canon of the Hagiographa, and with it that of the entire OT, was finally closed, is again surrounded with the very greatest difficulty. Let us, to begin with, fix the terminus ad quem. It is given us in the passages, frequently referred to already, in Josephus (c. Ap. 1.8) and 4 Esdras (chap. 14), where the entire corpus of the OT Scriptures, in twenty-two or twenty-four books, is set apart from all other writings. As to the extent of the canon, unanimity had been reached by at least somewhere about the year 100 A.D.

For a superior limit we shall have to begin where our investigation as to the prophetic canon ended—with the son of Sirach. In his hymn he commemorates, as the last of the heroes of Israel, Zerubbabel and Joshua as well as Nehemiah, thereby conclusively showing that he was acquainted with the work of the Chronicler (49:11 ff.). Moreover, he makes use of passages from the Psalms. Neither fact proves anything for a third canon; the fact that he found his ideal and pattern in the prophets is rather against this (24:33: ἐτι διδασκαλίαν ὡς προφήτεيان ἐκχεῶ). The prologue of his descendant (later than 132 B.C.) shows still more unmistakably that no definite third canon was then in existence, even although already a certain number of books had begun to attach themselves to the Law and the Prophets. Three times he designates the whole aggregate of the literature which had been handed down, to which also his ancestor had sought to add his quota, as ὁ νόμος καὶ οἱ προφῆται καὶ τὰ ἄλλα τὰ κατ' αὐτοὺς ἠκολούθηκῶτα; ὁ ν. κ. οἱ πρ. κ. τὰ ἄλλα πάτρια βιβλία; ὁ ν. κ. αἱ προφητεῖαι (οἱ προφῆται [C]) κ. τὰ λοιπὰ τῶν βιβλίων. What is thus designated by three different indeterminate expressions cannot have been a definite collection. That of these books, in whole or in part, there were already Greek translations we can gather from the Prologue; but we get no help either from this or from the LXX generally.

³ Cp CHRONICLES, § 2 and EZRA, § 8.

In 1 Macc. 7:16 f. we find Ps. 79:2 f. cited with the formula κατὰ τὸν λόγον ὃν (τοὺς λόγους οὓς [A]) ἔγραψε, in other words, as Holy Scripture. In 2:59 f. Daniel and his three friends are named as patterns in immediate connection with Elijah, David, Caleb, and others; 1:54 seems to quote Daniel's prediction (Dan. 9:27). We here see, somewhere about the close of the second or the beginning of the last century B.C., the Book of Daniel for the first time coming into evidence as a fully accredited authority—we could not possibly have expected so to find it at any earlier date.

Unfortunately these testimonies, such as they are, are followed by a very wide hiatus. Philo (ob. circ. 50

50. Philo. A.D.) is our next resort; but, great as is the extent of his writings (all proceeding uncompromisingly on the allegorical method of biblical interpretation), they do not yield us much that is satisfactory in our present inquiry.¹ Nowhere do we find a witness to a tripartite canon.² Of the canonical books he nowhere quotes Ezekiel, any of the five Megilloth, Daniel, or Chronicles.³ The blank is a great one. Still we may find some compensation in the fact that at least the Book of Ezra is cited with the solemn formula applicable to a divinely inspired writing.⁴ A certain conclusion as to the incompleteness of the canon cannot be drawn from this silence regarding many books. On the other hand, real importance attaches to the following piece of negative evidence: Philo, although (as an Alexandrian) he must have been acquainted with many non-canonical books, and indeed actually betrays such acquaintance, in no instance uses them in the same way as the canonical. This allows as probable the inference that a definitely closed canon was known to him; only we are not able to say from any data supplied by him what was the extent of that canon in its third part.

Our next witness is the NT. In Lk. 24:44 we have evidence of the tripartite division, for 'the psalms' probably stands a priori for the whole of the

51. NT. third canon. Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Esther, and Ezra are not referred to at all. Of course here again nothing certain is to be inferred from the silence; but, if other considerations came into play, this fact also ought to be taken into account. On the other side, the certain reference to Chronicles in Mt. 23:35, Lk. 11:51⁵ is entitled to have weight. The quotation of Dan. 7:22 in 1 Cor. 6:2 also must be referred to.⁶

There thus remains a space of something like two centuries—say from the end of the second century B.C.

² Apart from De Vit. Contempl., § 3, probably a work of a much later time. Cp Lucius, Die Therapeuten, 1879, and Schürer's review of Conybeare's Philo about the Contemplative Life, TLZ, 20th July 1895.

to about 100 A.D.—within which we are unable to point out any sure indications of the close of the third canon.

52. No decision. Ryle (p. 173 ff.) thinks it can be made out with a very high degree of probability that the close took place as early as the second century B.C., between 106 and 105, the year of the death of John Hyrcanus II. His one positive reason¹ is that the civil wars and scholastic controversies of the last century B.C. must have withdrawn interest from such things and made impossible any union of schools or any public step that could alter the status quo. That there ever was a union of schools, however, we have every reason to deny; the extension of the canon was in all probability only one of the internal affairs of the Pharisaic school (cp above, § 37). From this it necessarily follows that there is no question about any public step being taken—say a deliberate decision, reached once for all, or a decree of any authoritative assembly.

We actually have express information, however, of such a decision at a much later time. It is obvious that no such thing would have been

53. Mishna. necessary if a binding decision had already been long in existence. We refer at present to the controversy of which we read in the Mishna (Yad. 3:5; cp Eduyoth, 5:3).

The general proposition there laid down runs as follows: 'All holy scriptures (קְדוּשׁ קְדָשִׁים) defile the hands' (cp above, § 3); next follows the particular: 'Canticles and Ecclesiastes defile the hands.' Then we have the controversy. 'R. Juda said: Canticles indeed defiles the hands; as regards Ecclesiastes opinion is divided. R. Jose said: Ecclesiastes does not defile the hands, but as regards Canticles opinion is divided. R. Simon said: About Ecclesiastes the school of Shammai gives the laxer, the school of Hillel the severer decision (here compare the elucidation in Eduyoth, 5:3, that according to the former [Shammai] Ecclesiastes does not defile the hands, according to the latter it does).² R. Simon b. 'Azai said: To me it has been handed down from the mouth of the seventy-two elders that, on the day on which R. Eliezer b. 'Azarya was made supreme head, it was decided that (both) Canticles and Ecclesiastes defile the hands. R. 'Akiba said: God forbid that there should ever have been difference of opinion in Israel about Canticles, as if it did not defile the hands; for the entire world, from the beginning until now, does not outweigh the day in which Canticles was given to Israel. For indeed (כִּי) all Scriptures (כְּתוּבִים) are holy (קְדוּשׁ), but Canticles is holy of holies (קְדוּשׁ קְדָשִׁים). If people were divided in opinion, it was as to Ecclesiastes alone. R. Johanan b. Jehoshua, the son of R. 'Akiba's father-in-law, said: As the son of 'Azai says, people were thus divided in opinion, and it is thus that the matter has been decided.'³

It has been contended that the dispute here was not about the question of canonicity, both books being clearly

54. Meaning of dispute. included in the opening sentences under the category of holy, and that the word נָנָה, 'to preserve, lay aside, hide,' the technical expression for the treatment with which the books in question were threatened, does not mean 'to pronounce apocryphal' but only something like 'to exclude from public reading.'⁴ Both contentions are incorrect. The word in question is not used with reference to Ecclesiasticus or other apocryphal works, simply because no one had ever spoken of canonizing them, and thus there could not possibly be any question about doing away with them or removing them. And that our passage certainly is discussing the question whether the two books are Holy Scripture or not, is

made unmistakably evident by the words of R. 'Akiba. In this final stage of the development the question cannot possibly be whether perhaps, though integral parts of Holy Scripture, they nevertheless do not defile the hands: it is established that 'all Holy Scriptures defile the hands.' Then follows the Mishnic decision that the books of Canticles and Ecclesiastes also belong to this class; after this, the discussion which preceded the decision, and the grounds on which it was reached, are given.

In this connection the precise fixing of the day on which this decision was arrived at is important—the day

55. 100 A.D. on which at Jamnia (Yabna) R. Gamaliel II. was incidentally deposed from his place as president of the court of justice, an incident for which we have also other early testimonies.¹ This event certainly falls within the decades that immediately followed the destruction of Jerusalem—whether so early as 90 A.D. (the usual assumption) is questionable, but 100 A.D. will not in any case be very wide of the mark. This period, then, saw the settlement of a twofold controversy, which, as regards one half of it at least, had already occupied the schools of Hillel and Shammai about a century before. This last point is conceded even by a zealot like R. 'Akiba; his unrestrained exaggeration as regards Canticles is only a veil to cover the weakness of his position.² We hear nothing of any decision of the question preceding that of Jamnia. That, after the proceedings of that stormy day, the question should have been discussed again some decades later (R. 'Akiba ob. 135), need not surprise us. No new decision is arrived at: the question is answered by a confirmation of that of Jamnia.³

Thus, then, about the year 100 A.D. there was still, as an unsettled controversy, the same question as to the canonicity of two books, which as regards one of them (Ecclesiastes; see ECCLESIASTES, § 3) had been a notorious point of difference between the two great schools of the Pharisees.⁴ By that time, however,

⁴ This is not inconsistent with the fact (which we learn from various sources) that Simon b. Shetah (who belonged to the third of the five 'pairs,' in the first half of the first century B.C.) quotes Eccles. 7.12 as Holy Scripture (for details see Buhl, p. 15 f.). He represents the one side of the case. The subject is one that belongs to 'special introduction'; but, in passing, the present writer may be allowed to express the view that, in the present text of Ecclesiastes, traces are to be clearly found of the assistance which it was found necessary to give, in order to secure for this book a place in the canon. In 12.10 it is testified of the preacher (חנניה) that he was a well-meaning and respectable man (of course otherwise unknown). The contradiction to 1.1, where he is represented as being 'the son of David,' 'king in Jerusalem,' is glaring. These words, as also 1.12.16, a good deal in 2.4-9 and perhaps also 7.15a and certainly 12.11-14 are interpolations, by means of which alone the reception of the book into the canon was rendered possible. It is self-evident that Canticles also became a part of the canon, only by virtue of its superscription which ascribes it to Solomon. A valuable light is thrown on R. 'Akiba's assertion that Canticles had never been disputed, and at the same time a trustworthy evidence, the question had long been (substantially) a settled one, as is shown by the passages quoted from Josephus and 4 Esdras; settled, however, not by any single decision, but only by the gradual clearing up of public opinion. Of other books in addition to the twenty-four there is no question whatever, and as regards those two about which alone any difficulty is possible, common opinion came to be so decidedly in favour of what claimed to be the stricter but in reality was the looser opinion, that the zealot R. 'Akiba comes forward fanatically on the side of Hillel.

We may now venture to figure to ourselves what was the probable course of the development, and what the

56. Result. attitude assumed by various sections of the community towards the decisive questions. It is probable that among the Sōphërim (professional students of Scripture) of the last century B.C., but without the co-operation of the Sadducean priestly nobility, there was gradually formulated a scholastic doctrine as to which of the many religious writings then current¹ could establish a just claim to a sacred character. We have already seen by what standard the writings were judged. As this doctrine gradually took shape, unanimity was reached on every point except on a dispute with reference to two minor books, in which, as was natural, the victory was ultimately gained by the more liberal view. This doctrine of the Sōphërim, as being the view of those who were the only qualified judges on the special subject, readily gained admission amongst such as were in doubt and sought to inform themselves.² Thus the learned Philo, though living in Alexandria, takes very good care not to contravene the stricter practice; what we know about the opposition offered to the books of Ecclesiastes, Canticles, and Esther, even suggests the possibility (incapable of course of proof) that his silence about certain books (cp above, § 50) really arises from a still greater strictness. As a convert to Pharisaism, Josephus professes the school doctrine of his teachers with an emphasis all the greater because his own personal leanings were (perhaps) against such exclusiveness. On the other hand, though the doctrine made way, yet the majority of the people betook themselves quite naturally to the mass of apocalyptic and legendary literature, which, in the century immediately before and after the birth of Jesus, exercised a very great influence, and did much to prepare the way for Christianity. The formulated theory possessed obvious advantages, however, and the Jewish war and the destruction of Jerusalem left the Pharisees in sole possession of the leadership of Israel. This is shown most clearly by 4 Esdras. Against his will, the author of that book is constrained to acknowledge the divine authority of the canon with its twenty-four constituent parts. Being, however, a thoroughgoing partisan of the apocalyptic literature, he outdoes the Pharisees. To the seventy books³ which they exclude he attributes a still higher authority, placing them in an esoteric as distinguished from an exoteric canon.

By the end of the first century the scribes had settled the last of the questions controverted in the schools, and not long after the beginning of the second century (R. 'Akiba ob. 135), to refer to the decision at Jamnia is decisive. Later, following in 'Akiba's footsteps, the scribes succeeded, not only in obliterating every trace showing how long its true character still continued to be known, is conveyed by the information that R. 'Akiba himself hurled an anathema against those who sang the Song of Songs with wanton voice in houses of public entertainment (Tosephta, Sanh. chap. 12; cp WRS, OT/C 2.186).

of variations in the text, but also in driving from circulation the whole body of extra-canonical literature.¹

Christianity, however, in the vigour of its youth, emancipated from the authority of the scribes, continued to pursue the old ways. In the rejected literature it discovered prophecies of the 57. Christianity. appearing of Jesus; and what the Pharisees destroyed in the original language it eagerly handed down in translations and revisions to succeeding generations. The NT writers show no scruple in quoting extra-canonical books as sacred, and we find ascribed to Jesus some expressions quoted as Holy Writ (Lk. 11.49; Jn. 7.38) which are not contained in the OT.² What is more, examples of this form of Jewish literature fused with Christian elements, or worked over from the Christian point of view, have found their way into the canon of the NT itself—a fact which only lately has begun to receive the attention it deserves.³

This independent drift of tendency within the Christian Church greatly increases the difficulty of estimating the so-called 'canon of the Alexandrians.'⁴ As is well known, even the oldest extant MSS of the LXX contain, in addition to the canonical books, a greatly varying number of writings which are not recognised in the canon of the synagogue, and indeed in some cases were not even originally written in Hebrew. On the other hand, the oldest of these MSS are several centuries later than the Christian era, and are the work of Christian copyists. It becomes a question, therefore, which is the earlier: the freer praxis of the Alexandrian Jews or that of primitive Christianity; whether the greater compass of the LXX canon of the Alexandrians influenced the view of the Christian communities or whether the influence flowed the other way.⁵ The probability is that, in fact, the influence worked both ways. What principally concerns us here, however, is this. About the middle of the first century A.D., when the Greek-speaking Christian community began to break entirely with Judaism, the narrow Pharisaic doctrine of the canon had certainly not as yet penetrated into the domain of Hellenistic Judaism so deeply as to delete completely, or to exclude from the MSS of the LXX, all the books that Pharisaism refused to recognise. The vacillation in individual MSS must at that time have been even greater than it is in those which have reached us; although on this point definite knowledge is unattainable. It is certain, however, that to some extent precisely those books belonging to this category which lay nearest to the heart of the Christian community in its most primitive days (especially Enoch and 4 Esdras) have come down to us in no Greek MS. The conclusion is that the additions to the LXX are for the most part older than Christianity.

The doctrine of the Pharisees, however, ultimately won the day also in its proper home. Not only did

² As to this cp Wildeboer, 48 f., who must be held in all essentials to have the better of the argument as against the vigorous polemic of Ryle, 153 f.

³ See, for example, APOCALYPSE.

it succeed in extending its influence over the Hellenists by means of the new Greek translation of Aquila; but also the Church itself ultimately surrendered. A strange and significant fact! From about 150 A.D. onwards there constantly occur patristic statements on the extent of the OT canon, which avowedly rest upon Jewish authority. This certainly had its advantages; for in this way many books of merely temporary value were excluded which, if rendered authoritative, could hardly have furthered the interests of Christianity. On the same ground too, the return of the Reformers to the canon of the synagogue is justifiable, especially when, as in the case of Luther, the relative importance of the Apocrypha is duly recognised. On the other hand, it must be confessed that even the unanimously accepted canon¹ of the Church is not without books of a similar character (notably Esther and Canticles; also Ecclesiastes and Daniel), and that thus the distinction between canonical and uncanonical books (if they are judged by their intrinsic value) is a fluctuating one.² Besides this, it is certain that in the excluded books, of which we know so many already, and are continually coming through new discoveries to know more, there has come down to us a treasure of unspeakable value for a knowledge of religious life as it was shortly before and after the time of Jesus, and so for an understanding of the origin of Christianity (see APOCRYPHA, APOCALYPTIC).

K. B.

B. NEW TESTAMENT.

The problem of the NT canon is to discover by what means and at what period a new collection of sacred books came to be invested with all the dignity which belonged to that of the Synagogue. Jesus had claimed to speak with an authority in no way inferior to that of the OT, and had placed his own utterances side by side with some of its precepts as fulfilling or even correcting them. The remembered words of Jesus thus became at once, if the expression may be allowed, the nucleus of a new Christian canon. At first they circulated orally from hearer to hearer. Then narratives were compiled recording the Sacred Words, and the no less Sacred Deeds which had accompanied or illustrated them. Some narratives of this kind underlie our Gospels, and are referred to in the preface to the Third Gospel. In course of time these were superseded by the fuller treatises which bear the

61. Gospels. names of apostles or the chosen companions of apostles; and their superior merit, as well as the sanction thus given to them, soon left them without rivals as the authorised records of the Gospel history. They were read side by side with books of the OT in the public worship of the Church, and were appealed to as historical documents by those who wished to show in detail the correspondence between the facts of the life of Jesus and the Jewish prophecies about the Messiah. This stage has been definitely reached by the time of Justin Martyr; but as yet there is no clear proof that a special sanctity or inspiration was predicated of the books themselves. The final step, however, could not long be delayed. The sacredness of the Words and Deeds of Jesus which they contained, the apostolic authority by which they were recommended, and, above all, their familiar use in the services of the Church, gradually raised them to the level of the ancient Scriptures; and the process was no doubt accelerated by the action of heretical and schismatical bodies, claiming one after another to base their tenets upon certain of these documents or upon others peculiar to themselves.

Meanwhile a similar process had been going on in regard to other writings of the apostolic age. These

62. Epistles. were for the most part letters, written in many instances to particular churches, and designed to meet special needs. The writers betray no consciousness that their words would come to be regarded as a permanent standard of doctrine or of action in the Christian Church: they write for an immediate purpose, and just as they would wish to speak, were they able to be present with those whom they address. In their absence, and still more after their death, their letters were cherished and read again and again by the churches which had first received them, and by others who naturally welcomed such precious relics of the apostolic age. For the apostles were the authorised instructors of the Christian Church. In the age which succeeded them, 'the Lord and the apostles' became the natural standard of appeal to which reference was to be made in all matters of faith and practice. For some time 'the tradition of the apostles,' as handed down in the churches of their foundation, was regarded as the test of orthodoxy. Oral tradition, however, is necessarily variable and uncertain. It was natural that, when actual disciples of the apostles were no longer living, appeal should more and more be made to their written words, and that these should be set side by side with the Gospels as the primary documents of the Christian faith. Here again the same elements as before come into play, though probably at a slightly later period—viz., the liturgical use of the epistles, and the necessity of maintaining them intact against the mutilations or rejections of heretical sects.

In the collection which was thus gradually being formed by the pressure of various circumstances and with no distinct consciousness of the creation of a canon, a place was found beside the Gospels and the epistles for two other books. The Apocalypse of John opened with the salutation of an epistle; and, even apart from this, its apocalyptic character claimed for it a special and abiding sacredness; moreover it contained an express blessing for those who should read and listen to it, and a warning against any who should presume to alter or add to it. The Acts of the Apostles would find an easy entrance, partly as an authorised account of the deeds of apostles written by one who had contemporaneous knowledge of them, and still more as being in form the second part of the Third Gospel and properly inseparable from the earlier book.

Thus, side by side with the old Jewish canon, and without in any way displacing it, there had sprung up a new Christian canon. Although its exact

64. A new canon. limits were not yet precisely defined, and local variations of opinion were to be observed with regard to the acceptance of particular books, we find the idea of such a new canon in full play in the writings of great representative men of the period from 180 to 200 A.D.—of Irenæus speaking for Asia Minor and Gaul, of Tertullian in N. Africa, and of Clement in Alexandria. The Church is by this time fully conscious that she is in possession of written documents of the apostolic age; documents to which reference must be universally made, as to a final court of appeal, in questions of right faith and right action. The authority of Jesus and his apostles is, in the main, embodied for her in writings which she reads together with the OT in her public services, quotes as Scripture, and regards as the inspired revelation of divine truth. Of the stages by which this result has been reached the writers referred to have nothing to tell us. It was, as we have seen, the issue of an unconscious growth, natural and for the most part unchallenged, and so leaving no recorded history behind it. If the Church was awakened to a consciousness of her great possession, and to the importance of insisting upon its integrity, by the attempts made by heretics to defraud her of portions of it, there is no evidence of deliberate efforts on her part to build up the conception of a new canon in opposition to them; much less of any formal declarations, such as those of later times, defining what books should or should not be included in it. In the stress of controversy she fell back on the treasures which she possessed, and realised that in the books which she was accustomed to read for the instruction of her children she had, on the one hand, the full and harmonious expression of all those positive truths whose isolation or exaggeration formed the groundwork of the several heretical systems, and, on the other hand, the decisive contradiction of the negations in which their capricious selections had involved those who rejected any part of the common heritage.

2. That the sketch given above of the gradual growth of a new canon with its twofold contents, in the period anterior to Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement, is justified not only by intrinsic probability but also by the references of early Christian writers to books of the NT, may be seen by consulting the collections of such references accessible in modern treatises upon the canon. Here a brief outline of the evidence must suffice.

65. Evidence of orthodox writers: Clement, etc.

In the Epistle of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians (circa 95) we have two precepts introduced by a command to 'remember the words of our Lord Jesus' (cp Acts 20:35): in neither case do they exactly agree with the language of our Gospels; they may be the result of a fusion due to citation from memory, or they may possibly be derived from oral tradition. The epistle is saturated with the phraseology of the Pauline Epistles (Rom., 1 Cor., Eph.; less certainly Tim. and others) and of the Epistle to the Hebrews; but these are not directly cited, and the expressions 'Scripture' and 'it is written' are applied to the OT alone.

In the genuine Epistles of Ignatius of Antioch (shorter Greek recension, circa 110 A.D., Lightfoot) the only direct citation of words of Jesus ('Lay hold and handle me and see that I am not a spirit [δαμόνιον] without body,' Ad Smyrn. 3) is possibly derived from an apocryphal book or from an oral tradition. The language of these Epistles shows traces of acquaintance with Mt. and Jn. and with several of the Pauline Epistles. The Epistle of Polycarp (circa 110 A.D., Lightfoot) is largely composed of quotations from NT books (especially Mt., Lk., 1 and 2 Jn., 1 Pe., and the Pauline Epistles). There is but one (somewhat uncertain) instance of the citation of NT words as Scripture.

The Epistle of Barnabas (circa 98 A.D., Lightfoot: though most scholars place it later) prefixes to the saying 'Many called but few chosen,' the formula 'it is written.' If this be cited from Mt. 22:14—and a later reference makes it not improbable—then we have here the earliest use of this formula in reference to a book of the NT.

The Teaching of the Apostles (date uncertain: perhaps 110-130) introduces a form of the Lord's Prayer, which has variants both from Mt. and Lk., by the words, 'as the Lord commanded in his Gospel, so pray ye' (chap. 8; cp chaps. 11, 15). It clearly presupposes a written Gospel, and shows acquaintance with Mt. and Lk. It has embodied an ancient (perhaps Jewish) manual, 'The Two Ways' (used also in Ep. Barn. and elsewhere), and also certain early eucharistic prayers which incorporate the language of Jn.

The Apology of Aristides, the Athenian philosopher (circa 125-130 A.D.), addressed to the emperor Hadrian (acc. to Eus. and the title of Arm. vers.; the title of the Syr. vers. would place it a few years later, under Antoninus Pius), twice refers expressly to writings of the Christians; in the first instance, after enumerating the main events of the life of Jesus—including his birth 'from a Hebrew virgin' and his ascension—it distinctly appeals to the written Gospel for corroboration. It also embodies language from the Epistle to the Romans.

The Shepherd of Hermas (date uncertain: 110-140) betrays a close acquaintance with many NT books, though it makes no direct citations either from OT or from NT. The language of our four Gospels (even of the Appendix to Mk.), of the Pauline Epistles including the Pastoral Epp., of 1 Pe., Acts, Apoc., and above all of Jas., is adopted by the writer; and even 2 Pe. seems to have been used.

Before we come to the fuller testimonies of Justin Martyr and subsequent writers it is necessary to examine the evidence to be derived from 66. Papias. Papias. His date and the interpretation to be placed on his fragmentary remains have been the subject of much criticism (see esp. Lightfoot, Essays on Supernatural Religion, 142-216). He was the hearer of at least two personal disciples of Jesus, and his great work may be placed circa 130-140. It was entitled Λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεις, 'Expositions of the Oracles of (or 'concerning') the Lord.' As λόγια is a term used in the NT of the OT writings, the title of the book naturally suggests some kind of commentary on the writings relating to Jesus—i.e., on written Gospels which held a recognised position of sacredness in the Christian Church. It is probable that similar commentaries on one or more of the Gospels had already been composed by Gnostic writers: thus Basilides is said to have written twenty-four books on 'the Gospel' (circa 117-138). Such books are disparaged by Papias as wordy and misleading; he prefers to fall back on the testimonies of the living disciples of those who had seen the Lord. He gives accounts, not free from difficulties, of the composition of Gospels by Matthew and Mark. On the whole, the facts seem to be most readily accounted for if we suppose that Papias in his five books expounded and illustrated by traditional stories the four Gospels as we at present know them. Eusebius further expressly informs us that Papias used 1 Jn. and 1 Pe. There can be little doubt that his chiliastic views were based on the Apocalypse.

Justin Martyr (circa 152), when mentioning the words of the institution of the Eucharist, says: 'So the

67. Justin. apostles handed down in the Memoirs made by them, which are called Gospels' (Ap. 166). In describing the Sunday worship, too, he refers to 'The Memoirs of the Apostles' (Ap. 167; see LORD'S DAY), and these Memoirs (ἀπομνημονεύματα) are placed on a level with the 'Writings of the Prophets' as an alternative means of edification in the gatherings of the Christian Church. Justin's use of them, here and in his Dialogue with the Jew Trypho, is conditioned by the necessities of his argument. In themselves they would have no weight with heathen or Jewish opponents. The OT prophecies, however, could be freely appealed to in either case, as the argument rested on their fulfilment rather than on their sacredness. Justin accordingly uses 'The Memoirs of the Apostles' as historical documents in proof of the fulfilment of Messianic predictions in the recorded events of the life of Jesus. Twelve times he refers to them directly in the Dialogue—all the instances being in connection with his exposition of Ps. 22. In every case, both here and in the Apology, the reference is fully accounted for by the supposition that these 'Memoirs' were our four Gospels, the phraseology of each of which can be traced in his writings. Where he most carefully describes them, after referring to an event recorded only by Lk., he says that 'they were compiled by Christ's apostles and those who companied with them.' This exactly agrees with the traditional authorship of our Gospels, as written two by apostles (Mt., Jn.), and two by followers of apostles (Mk., Lk.). Justin likewise refers for corroboration of his statements to official Acta Pilati: he may perhaps have been acquainted with a more primitive form of the apocryphal materials still surviving under that designation. There is, however, no satisfactory evidence that he used any apocryphal Gospel (unless perhaps a 'Proteuangel' or Gospel of the Infancy). He refers directly to the Apocalypse as written by the apostle John (Tryph. 81), and shows acquaintance with most of the Pauline Epistles.

From Justin we pass to his pupil Tatian (circa 150-160 A.D.), who helps to confirm our conclusions as to

68. Tatian. Justin himself by his use of our four Gospels and no other in his Diatessaron. This remarkable book, which for a long period must have been the only Gospel of many Syrian churches, is known to us mainly through a Commentary upon it written by Ephraim, and preserved to us in an Armenian translation; and also through an Arabic version of the Diatessaron itself—made, however, after the later text of the Peshitta Syriac had been substituted for Tatian's own text, which had many interesting variants of an early type. The two sources of evidence supplement each other, and make it certain that Tatian's Gospels were none other than our own. There is some reason for thinking that Tatian also introduced into Syria a collection of the Pauline Epistles.

3. Although Tatian adopted heretical opinions after the death of his master, his great work on the Gospels appears to be quite independent of these 69. Un-orthodox: and was accepted without question by the Syrian Church. It will be well, however, to Basilides, notice at this point the evidence to be derived etc. from other heretical leaders in regard to the estimation in which various books of the NT were held by those who were dissatisfied with the teaching of the main body of the Church. It will suffice to take three writers of whom we have a considerable amount of information preserved to us. Basilides of Alexandria flourished in the reign of Hadrian. His Expositions on the Gospel, in twenty-four books, have already been mentioned. Accepting, with Hort, the account preserved in the Refutation of Heresies (generally ascribed to Hippolytus) as representing portions of this work, we meet with the striking fact that quotations from the NT, introduced with the words 'The Scripture saith,' and 'as it is written,' are found in a heretical writer at a period at which they cannot with certainty be said to be so introduced by any writer within the Church. Several passages from the Pauline Epistles are so cited by Basilides. He also used Mt., Lk., Jn., and apparently 1 Pe.

Marcion (circa 140) undertook to restore the simplicity of Christianity on the basis of Paul, whom he regarded as the only true apostle. He rejected the OT and retained of the NT only Lk. in a mutilated form, and ten Epistles of Paul; the Pastoral Epistles and the Epistle to the Hebrews not being included in his canon. There is no indication that he applied any other standard than that of correspondence with his own dogmatic position, in making what must be considered the earliest attempt at the conscious definition of a NT canon.

Heracleon (circa 170, or earlier), a disciple of Valentinus, wrote a Commentary on Jn., of which considerable fragments are preserved by Origen. His system of interpretation shows that he held the exact words of the Evangelist in the highest veneration, as instinct with spiritual meaning. He also commented on Lk., and shows acquaintance with Mt., Heb., and the Pauline Epistles including 2 Tim.

Thus the first certain citations of NT writings with the formula familiarly used of the OT, the first attempt at defining a NT canon, and the first commentary on a NT book, come to us not from within but from without the Church. These are striking evidences of the authority generally accorded to the NT writings; in the words of Irenæus (iii. 27): 'So strong is the position of our Gospels, that the heretics themselves bear witness to them, and each must start from these to prove his own doctrine.'

4. The early history of the Old Latin and the Old Syriac versions is wrapt in obscurity; but there is reason for believing that the translation of

70. Early versions. parts at least of both these versions must be placed not much later than the middle of the second century (see TEXT, §§ 20, 32). The Old Latin version seems to have been made in N. Africa, and to have included, probably before the time of Tertullian, all the books of the later canon, excepting Jas., 2 Pe., and possibly Heb. When the Scillitan Martyrs (N. Africa, 180 A.D.) were examined as to what was contained in their book-chest, their brief recorded reply was 'Books and Epistles of Paul, a just man.' Such was their description of the writings which, doubtless, were used by them in their services. It is conditioned by the circumstance of its utterance before heathen judges; it would be wrong to conclude from it that the Pauline Epistles were placed by them on a different level from the other sacred writings. The Old Syriac of the Gospels has till lately been known only from Cureton's imperfect MS; but the palimpsest recently found at Mt. Sinai enables us to reconstruct this version for the most part with approximate certainty. A selection of comments by Ephraim on the Acts of the Apostles, and his Commentary on the Pauline Epistles, preserved in Armenian translations, point to an Old Syriac version of these books also. The older MSS of the revised Syriac version (the Peshitta) do not contain 2 and 3 Jn., 2 Pe., Jude, and Apoc.

We have been concerned hitherto with tracing the growth of the conception of a NT canon, without considering, except incidentally, the range of writings included in it. The influence of the main body of the NT literature upon the writers of the period with which we have been dealing cannot be at all fully appreciated from our scanty analysis. Their writings must themselves be studied line by line, if we are to understand the debt which they owed, as regards both ideas and phraseology, to the documents of the apostolic age. In that age new conceptions had been given to the world, and a new terminology had been formed for their expression. The next age reproduced these; but it was not itself creative. This is seen, for instance, in the technical terms of even the boldest of the Gnostic speculations. Whatever may have been men's conscious attitude towards the NT writings, it is clear that they are dominated by them from the very first. Gradually they come to recognise them more and more as their masters; and then, both within the Church and outside it, we find them definitely declaring the limits of the canon to which they owe this allegiance.

Marcion's list of sacred books has already been noticed. The next list of which we have any knowledge is unfortunately a fragment, and tells us neither its date nor its author's name or locality. It was published in 1740 by Lodovico Antonio Muratori, the librarian at Milan. Hence it is known as the Muratorian canon. It is in barbarous Latin, in a seventh or eighth century MS; but its original must have been Greek, and it is generally agreed that it was written in the West (perhaps at Rome) towards the close of the second century. Lightfoot conjectured that it was a portion of the 'Verses on all the Scriptures' assigned to Hippolytus. The fragment commences with the end of a description of Mark; it goes on to speak of Luke and John, and refers to the different beginnings of the four books of the Gospel. After Acts come the Epistles of Paul; the seven churches to which he wrote being paralleled with the seven of the Apocalypse, and enumerated in the following order—Cor., Eph., Phil., Col., Gal., Thess.,

CANON

Rom. Then come four private letters—Philemon and the Pastoral epistles. Two other epistles are declared forgeries—viz., those to the Laodiceans and to the Alexandrians. Then we have Jude, two epistles of John (1 Jn. has been quoted from at an earlier point, so that these may perhaps be 2 and 3 Jn.), and the Wisdom of Solomon, 'written in his honour.' Then the 'apocalypses of John and Peter alone we receive, which (sing.) some among us will not have read in the church.' The Shepherd of Hermas 'ought to be read,' but not reckoned either with the prophets or with the apostles. After a few more lines as to rejected books, the text being very corrupt, the fragment suddenly closes. The omissions are deserving of notice—nothing is said of 1 and 2 Peter, James, and Hebrews—but the omitted epistles were undoubtedly (if we except 2 Peter) known at this time in the Roman church. It is difficult, therefore, to draw conclusions from their omission in a fragment of whose history so little can be ascertained and whose text is so obviously corrupt. The Muratorian canon is fully discussed by Zahn, Hist. of the Canon ('90) 21-43: quite recently Dom Amelli of Monte Cassino has published fragments of it from other MSS (Misc. Cassin., 1897).

5. The inclusion (though with an expression of variance of opinion) of the Apocalypse of Peter in the 'Muratorian Fragment' leads us to say something of books which for a time claimed a place in the canon, but were ultimately excluded.

The Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians, and the Homily, miscalled his 'Second Epistle,' are contained, after the Apocalypse, in Cod. A (the great Greek Bible of the 5th cent. in the Brit. Mus.). The Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas hold a similar place in the Sinaitic Bible (8, 4th cent.). The two latter books are occasionally cited as Scripture in patristic writings, and this is the case also with the Teaching of the Apostles.

Of apocryphal Gospels two deserve special notice. The Gospel according to the Hebrews is known only by a few fragments, which show that it bore a close relation to our First Gospel. Clement of Alexandria and Origen quote from it, although they insist on the sole authority of our four Gospels. The Gospel according to Peter, a considerable fragment of which was published in 1892 from a MS found in Egypt, is known to have been used in the church of Rhossus near Antioch. Serapion, Bishop of Antioch (190-203), at first permitted its use, but subsequently disallowed it on the ground of Docetic errors. The extant portion embodies the language of all our four Gospels, though it often perverts their statements. There is no trace of the use of any other Gospel in its composition, though certain phrases may possibly be borrowed from some earlier apocryphal book. Its composition may with probability be assigned to circa 165. Its testimony to the canon is thus somewhat parallel in date and extent to that of Tatian's Diatessaron.

The Apocalypse of Peter, of which a fragment was recovered at the same time, was an early book which powerfully influenced subsequent literature of a similar kind—e.g., the Apocalypse of Paul. It seems to be responsible for much of the mediæval conception of heaven and hell. It presents curious coincidences with 2 Peter. It is quoted as Scripture by Clement of Alexandria; and as late as the fifth century it was read on Good Friday in certain churches of Palestine.

6. Our inquiry has revealed to us that towards the close of the second century, by the time of Irenæus,

74. Result. Tertullian, and Clement—writers whose testimonies are so abundant that we need not dwell upon them here—the Church had attained to a conscious recognition of a canon of the New Testament. Three classes of books have come into view: (1) the main bulk of the NT books, as to which no doubt at all is expressed by writers within the Church; (2) books whose position in the canon was challenged in certain quarters, although they ultimately were included; (3) books which were read in certain churches, but were ultimately classed as non-canonical. With regard to books of the second of these classes the later history of their reception will be found under the special articles devoted to them, and in the works to which reference is made below. With regard to the third it may suffice to say that the verdict of the Church has been fully justified by the fact that no serious effort has ever been made to reinstate them.

CANTICLES. We have before us a book which has suggested as many problems as Shakespeare's Sonnets. The name which we give to

1. Problems. it, therefore, should not be a question-begging name. We will call it in this article neither 'Canticles' nor 'Song of Solomon,' but, following the best interpretation of 1:1, 'Song of Songs'—the choicest of all songs (like 'servant of servants,' Gen. 9:25—i.e., 'lowest of servants').

The first difficulty arises when we seek to determine precisely the subject of the Song (§§ 2-4); the next, when we investigate its poetical form (§§ 5-11), and seek to fix its date (§§ 13-15). We will consider these difficulties in order; but the first cannot be treated completely (§§ 10 f. 17) until we have overcome the second.

1. Subject (preliminary). Jewish tradition laid down very positively that, both as a whole and in its several

2. Hist. of In- parts, the Song describes the phases of a spiritual (not merely an earthly) love. The bride was the symbol of terpretation. Israel, the bridegroom that of its divine king; and by the labours of countless homilists the Song became a lyric record of the intercourse between the Lord and his people from the Exodus (cp Jer. 22) to the Messianic time. Of those exegetical labours, or rather poetical broodings, we have a summary in the Midrash ha-Shirim (transl. Wünsche, Biblioth. Rabbin. 1 f. 6), with which the not less fervidly-written Targum (of post-Talmudic origin) may be compared.¹ This theory was introduced in a modified form into the Christian Church mainly through the influence of Origen, of whom Jerome says that, 'while on the other books he surpassed all others, on the Song of Songs he surpassed himself' (Origen, Op. 311). This theologian treated the bride as being either the Church or (an important variation) the soul of the believer. The boldly avowed heterodoxy of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who interpreted the Song solely as relating to the Egyptian marriage of Solomon, was fruitless. Its condemnation at the second council of Constantinople (553 A.D.) postponed the acceptance of the literal interpretation in the Church for a thousand years. The great St. Bernard wrote eighty-six sermons on Song 1 and 2 alone, and his example fostered similar mystical studies in the Latin Church. Only among Jewish commentators was a natural exegesis not wholly unrepresented.² Ibn Ezra, in particular, is so thorough in his literal exegesis that it is doubtful whether he is serious when he proceeds to allegorise. Though Luther was moving in this direction, no Christian scholar before Sebastian Castellio (1544) ventured to maintain the purely secular character of the poem, and all that mediæval mysticism could do was to exercise its right of selection from the two allegoric views. The idea that the bride was the Christian soul became the favourite: partly because it seemed to promote edification, and partly because it commended itself to the romantic spirit of the young western nations. Thus, Dante surprises us when (Convivio, 2 15, end) he identifies the bride with Heavenly Wisdom.³ Even in the time of the Reformation we find the evangelical 'Horace of the cloister,' Fray Luis de Leon, translating the Song mystically in 'ottava rima'; and in our own day Bishop Alexander, though a Hebraist, has made an earnest poetic protest in favour of a mystic and against a dramatic theory (Poems, 1886, pp. 26-51).

Grammatical exegesis, however, destroys the basis of the old verse-by-verse allegorical interpretation. The

such a symbolic resemblance is inconsistent with the spirit of Hebraism. It is true that the relation between Yahwè and his people is described in the prophets by the symbolism of wedlock (Hos. 1-3; Jer. 22 3; Ezek. 16; Is. 50 1 54 56). It is true, also, that the phrase 'to love (אהב) Yahwè' occurs frequently in Deuteronomy and (less often) in the Psalter, and that the word אהב (used in the Song) is applied once by Isaiah (51) to Yahwè. Still, the notion implied by the prophetic allegory of wedlock, as well as by the phrase 'to love God,' is not that of free inclination on Israel's part towards the All-beautiful One, but rather of an obedience which is in the first instance the condition of divine protection, though, as favours multiply and the essential goodness of the divine commands appears, it becomes a habit and a passion. In Deuteronomy, therefore, the love of Yahwè is prescribed as a duty not invited or presupposed; and even in the Psalter, where devotional feeling finds the freest expression, there are only three passages in which the phrase 'to love Yahwè' occurs (Ps. 31 23 97 10 (?) 145 20), and in the first of these it occurs in the imperative mood. It is in harmony with this that three other passages (Ps. 5 11 69 36 119 132) contain the fuller phrase 'to love Yahwè's name,' which appears to mean (see Is. 566) the performance of religious duties with a certain fervour. Such a conception of the love of God we find in the Koran (Sur. 329; cp 1996). It was one of the Jewish elements in Mohammed's teaching, and failed to satisfy later generations of Moslems. In Syria and in Egypt, and still more in Persia, arose a mystic type of devotion, which sought by contemplation to lift the veil between man and God. The mystic love-songs of the Cairo dervishes, and the fine love-poems of the Süfi-poet Hâfiz, have been compared by Orientalists with the Song of Songs; but it has been forgotten that, fervid as the love of God became among the later Jews, it never divested itself of the chastening restraints of legalism, and that, in Persia at least, mystic poetry is one of the fruits of a national reaction against the aridity of Islam. It is still stranger that Sir William Jones and Sir Edwin Arnold have compared the Gitagovinda of the admired Indian poet Jayadeva (14th cent. A.D.), in which it would appear (but may we not suspect an afterthought of the poet?), 'from the few stanzas scattered through the poem where the author speaks in his own person, that he means his verses to be taken' in a mystic sense—Krishna symbolising the human soul, the shepherdesses the allurements of sense, and Râdhâ the knowledge of, or meditation on, divine things. Surely the pantheistic atmosphere in which Jayadeva lived, and the excessive imaginative fervour of the Indian genius, are altogether unlike the conditions under which the Song of Songs must have been penned.

How came it, then, it may be asked, that the Jews of a later time, in their exegesis of the Song, adopted a

4. Origin of allegorical interpretation. theory which is, strictly, contrary to the spirit of Hebraism? Probably thus. We know from the Mishna (Taanith, 48) that, before the destruction of the temple, passages from the Song were sung at certain popular yearly festivals. We know, too, that after the great catastrophe all expression of exuberant joy was forbidden. Now, what in those gloomy days was to be ancient authority,' but also to the analogy of Ps. 45 and (more safely) to passages in the prophets. Such a position, however, was tenable only provisionally. The Bishop expressly rejects the most poetic form of the allegorical theory, for which alone most Christians have cared—it was defended by Bossuet—that which explains the Song of the loving intercourse between Christ and the soul. Surely the election of a Gentile Church ('dark but comely') might have been foreshadowed at a less expenditure of poetry. Rightly, therefore, did J. D. Michaelis and the acute Ep. Warburton criticise Lowth for not going further. Lowth answered that without allegory the place of the Song in the canon could not be justified. All his literary taste could not dissolve his narrow notion of the authority of the canon.

done with the Song, which tradition already ascribed to Solomon? The answer was ready:—Consecrate it by allegorical interpretation. This course corresponded to the change which had passed upon the national character. The enthusiastic element in Jewish piety was becoming, in adversity, more intense. This element needed the expression which it found in the Song of Songs (see Berachoth 57b, where שמירת is ascribed to the Megilla of the Song of Songs as well as to the Book of Psalms). It should be added, however, that even after 70 A.D. the natural interpretation found some supporters. At the synod of Jamnia (90 A.D.) R. 'Akiba had still to defend the sacredness of the Song of Songs (Mishna, Yadayim, 35), and in Sanhedrin, 101 a, we find a solemn anathema on those who treat the Shir ha-Shirim as a secular song (כסין זמר). The grounds on which this secular character was asserted may be guessed from the Aboth de R. Nathan, chap. 1, which states that 'formerly' some counted the Song 'apocryphal' (נוה), quoting in support of this, not 7 1-9, but 7 11 f.

It is about, or soon after, 90 A.D. that we find the first traces of the allegorical view (see 4 Esdras 5 24 26 7 26, and R. Simeon ben Gamliel's allegorical interpretation of Song 3 11 in Taanith 48). Before that time Jewish teachers seem to have shrunk from quoting the Song; even Philo neglects it. Nor is any use made of it (or of Kôhéleth) in the NT. Eph. 5 27 alludes perhaps to Ps. 45 13, but certainly not to Song 4 7; and the parallelism between Rev. 3 20 and Song 5 2-6 (Trench, Seven Churches, 225 f.) is incomplete. This silence on the part of early Jewish and Christian writers shows the weakness of the argument from tradition adduced by the allegorists.

II. Poetical form. Is the Song of Songs a drama or a bundle of loosely connected songs? The earliest

5. Poetical form: history of views. advocate of a definite dramatic theory was the learned Jesuit, Cornelius a Lapide († 1637), who, like Ewald, divided the poem into five acts. Our own Bishop Lowth takes up a middle position. He finds no trace of a regular plot, and only one thing in which the Song closely resembles the Greek dramatic models—the chorus. He allows, however, that the Song may be classed with imperfect dramatic poems, such as the Eclogues of Virgil and some of the Idylls of Theocritus. The first scholar to adopt the second solution of the problem was Richard Simon; but the first to make it plausible was Herder.¹ Influenced partly by the disintegrating tendency of the newer criticism, but still more by an irresistible impulse to search for traces of old popular poetry, he boldly denied the continuity of the poem, dividing it into about twenty-one independent songs (with a fragmentary conversation for an appendix), threaded like so many pearls on a necklace. These songs are sometimes very short; but brevity, Herder thinks, is the soul of a love-song; nor is it important to determine the exact number of songs. Herder does not deny a certain pleasing appearance of unity, but ascribes this to the collector, who wished to show the gradual growth of true love in its various nuances and stages, till it finds its consummation in wedlock. In its present form the Song may be taken to consist of six 'scenes'; but the critic apologises for the term, and insists that the poem was intended to be read, and, as it stands, is neither a theatrical piece nor a cantata. Herder's 'exquisite little treatise'² could not fail to make an impression. It gained the approval of Eichhorn and Goethe; but, without a more thorough justification than Eichhorn gave, it could not permanently subvert the rival theory. Apart from its eloquent defence of the literal interpretation, its chief contribution to biblical study is perhaps this—that it has unintentionally proved the impossibility of recovering the original songs (if songs there were) and of retracing the plan (if plan he had) of the hypothetical collector. Goethe appears to have felt this. Tempted himself, as he tells us in the Westöstlicher Divan, to select and arrange some of 'these few leaves,' he took warning from the failure of previous efforts, and left the poem in its hopeless but lovely confusion.

A first step in the criticism of the Song was taken by Ewald in his early commentary (1826). He did not as yet venture to suppose that the 'cantata' was really acted on the stage; but from the first he asserted its genuinely dramatic character, and in 1839 he repaired his original omission (Die poet. Bücher des AT, Bd. i.). Was this a step backward? Only in appearance. Until the necessity of disintegration had been convincingly proved, Ewald was always on principle opposed to it. The cleverness and moderation of his critical theory, aided by his growing reputation for broad and deep scholarship, led to a very general adoption of the dramatic hypothesis, though the names of De Wette, Gesenius, Bleek, and Magnus may be quoted on the other side. The last-named scholar, however, did not effect much for his cause. His theory 'involved the assumption that the editor often displaced part of a song, sacrificing the unity of the original lyrics to an artificial composition of the whole.' It is only fair to add that in 1850 Böttcher did his best to make the opposite view absurd by introducing into the supposed Hebrew drama 'the complexities and stage effects of a modern operetta.' In 1860 Renan observed, with truth, that the dramatic theory had become 'almost classic,' and in 1891 and 1893 it was put forward as correct in the Introductions of Driver and König. Other eminent defenders of this theory are Hitzig (1855), Ginsburg (1857), Kuenen (1865), Delitzsch (1875), Robertson Smith¹ (1876), Kaempff (1877), Kohler (1878), Stickel (1888), Oettli (1889), Bruston (1891), Martineau (1892), and Rothstein (1893).

By degrees, however, the theory of the separatists recovered from the effects of Magnus's imprudence. It began to pass into a new phase, and to exercise a stronger attraction. Diestel (art. 'Hohes Lied,' Schenkel's Bib. Lex. iii. [71]; Reuss ('79, in La Bible, etc., also Gesch. der Schriften des AT (2) [90], 231-239); Stade (GVI, 2197 [188]); Cornill (Einh. [91], pp. 236-240); Budde (New World, March '94, pp. 56-77); Kautzsch (HS, '94; Lit. of the OT, 148-151), and Siegfried (Hohes Lied, '98) have done much to show that the view of Herder had not yet been adequately considered. Among these Budde deserves prominence for being the first to utilise adequately the information respecting Syrian marriage customs given by Consul Wetzstein in 1873.

Before reviewing this theory ourselves, we shall do well to examine the dramatic hypothesis more attentively.

6. Dramatic hypothesis considered. (a) The forms which it has taken are numerous and varied; in dividing the poem into acts and scenes critics are by no means unanimous.² According to Reuss, this wide divergence is fatal to the hypothesis. It seems fairer to admit that if it could be made out (1) that there is a plot, and (2) that there is any reason to expect a drama among a Semitic people, we might excuse this divergence as an unfortunate consequence of the absence of stage directions.

i. First, then, is there any plot? The dramatists (as we may call the defenders of this theory) answer that there is. Stickel even discovers two plots, developed by distinct pairs of lovers—the Shulammitte (who is a vine-dresser) and her 'friend' (דָּוִד), and a shepherd and shepherdess of Lebanon (besides the royal suitor, Solomon). The two latter are introduced in three scenes, 1 7-8 1 15-2 4 4 7-5 1. They know nothing about the Shulammitte and her 'friend.' The poet has interwoven the two movements to amuse the audience and produce a pleasing contrast between the different fortunes of the two pairs of lovers. All very conceivable! Double musical themes can be treated in fugues: why not also in Hebrew drama, granting that a regular Hebrew drama ever existed, and that Stickel's view of the text is justified? However, all that this critic has shown is that 1 7 f. and 1 15-17 are out of connection with the previous verses; and in the case of the latter passage an easy emendation¹ enables us to recognise a continuous speech of the bride in 1 12-21.

Most critics, on the other hand, are content with one plot, and approach more or less closely to the dramatic scheme of Ewald, according to which the heroine is a maiden of Shulem or Shunem in Issachar (see SHUNEM), who has two lovers, the one at a distance, the other (till he finally disappears) near at hand; the one poor but favoured, the other royal but treated with disdain. In chap. 1 4 f. we find the maiden, who makes no secret of her country origin, in the 'chambers' of the king among the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (the ladies of the palace); but in 85 she suddenly appears, approaching her mountain home on the arm of her betrothed. From the context it is thought to be clear that the suitor whose riches are condemned (87, cp 11 f.) is King Solomon, to whom the flattering compliments offered to the maiden in previous chapters must be assigned. How, then, came 'the Shulammitte' to exchange her free country life for the irksome splendour of the court? It is inferred, from 6 11 f., that she had been surprised by Solomon's courtiers (who had often been employed, no doubt, in similar abductions) on a royal progress in N. Israel. She 'had gone down into the nut-garden to look at the green things of the valley,' when 'suddenly,' she says, 'my desire brought me to the chariots of my noble people' (Ewald). It is some excuse for Solomon that, if Ewald may be followed, 'the Shulammitte' had not even been betrothed to the shepherd when she was carried off. (R. Martineau, however, thinks that between the third and the fourth scene—i.e., between the 36-11 and 47-16—'the Shulammitte' and the shepherd lover have been formally betrothed.) Then, how came the girl to be delivered from her royal captor? Renan has offered a very modern solution of the problem; but it is one which has no basis in the text, and may be safely neglected. Most have supposed (cp 89 f.) that the escape of 'the Shulammitte' was due, not to any favourable combination of circumstances, but to the effect produced upon Solomon by her own frank and loyal character; 'all the actors,' says Ewald, 'recognise the restraints of the true religion.' Will this view hold? Is it conceivable that the luxurious Solomon should have been represented by any popular poet as releasing one of the 'maidens innumerable' in his 'chambers'?² Is it probable that such a maiden would have had, in the poet's fancy, the liberty implied in the early scenes of the 'drama,' or that she would have met Solomon's advances in that extraordinarily absent manner which Ewald's view of 19-26 supposes? Why should the recurring phrase 'daughters of Jerusalem' (cp 'daughters of Zion,' 311) have such a limited reference as the dramatic theory requires? Then, as to the Shulammitte and her abduction. Theory apart, what right have we to assume that the intercourse implied in the poem between the girl and her lover was prior to marriage? To this point we shall have to return. Can we safely infer from the title that Shulem or Shunem was the girl's home? The title occurs in a single passage (613 [71]); but there is no allusion elsewhere to confirm this supposition. Next, how can Ewald base such a romantic story simply on the very obscure passage, 611f.? Lastly, how do we know that the Solomon of history or legend plays any part in the poem? As Castelli, himself one of the dramatisers, has well pointed out, Solomon is mentioned by name only in some simile or figurative contrast.¹ Thus in 15 the heroine likens herself for comeliness to the curtains of the pavilions of Solomon (but we should rather read with Brüll, We., and Wi., שֹׁלֹמֹה, the name of a nomad Arabian tribe; see SALMAH, 2). In 37-11 Solomon's litter is spoken of jestingly; and so, in 81, 'to the costly vineyard of Solomon the heroine prefers her own symbolic one, which does not require the anxious supervision of others.' There is a fourth passage in which, according to an extremely probable correction of the text, Solomon is named,—68f.:

² Stickel quotes an example of such magnanimity from the life of the Caliph Mahdi (Kremer, Culturegesch. des Orient, 2 127); but can we compare the characters of the two sovereigns?

'Sixty queens had Solomon, and eighty concubines, and maidens innumerable. One is my dove, my spotless one.'

Here again there is a contrast between Solomon's large harem and the speaker's single incomparable bride.

Can we, then, be sure that where the phrase 'the king' occurs alone, it is not a honorific designation of the bridegroom? And this suggests the question, which Castelli, however, does not raise, whether the term 'the Shulammitte' is not as purely figurative as 'the king'? Several writers (e.g., Klostermann) have conjectured that the story of Abishag the Shunammite (1 K. 13f.) supplied the plot of the supposed drama; but considering the difficulty of making out any plot at all, and the fact that 'the Shulammitte' is referred to only in one passage, we may ask whether it is not more probable that the term is applied metaphorically, and is equivalent to 'the fairest of women' (18 59 61)? If we omit 611f. as misplaced (doubtless a correct view), and read 610 and 13 [71] together, we shall see how natural it was for the poet to seek out some striking variation on the rather hackneyed phrase just mentioned. The passage will run thus:

'Who is she that looketh down as the dawn, fair as the moon, clear as the sun? Turn, turn, thou Shulammitte, that we may look upon thee.'

It is usual to assume that the spectators, being ignorant of the heroine's name, address her with blunt directness as a girl of Shunem, and that she answers by the modest question, 'What do you see in the simple Shulammitte girl?' It is much more natural to suppose that 'the Shulammitte' (Shunammite) is a term not less complimentary than 'fair as the moon' in v. 10, and points back to the Abishag of tradition.² And should it be asked why Abishag's name is not mentioned, we may venture to express the opinion that when the song was written there was probably in the Hebrew text of 1 K. 13 15, 1 Sam. etc., not אֲבִישָׁג, but a very different word (see SHULAMMITE).

There are many other difficulties of interpretation which might be mentioned. For example, how are we to understand the movements of 'the beloved'? Are all the meetings of the lovers, except the final reunion, in reminiscence or in sleeping or waking imagination only? Can we conceive of a drama in which each of the actors seems almost if not quite uninfluenced by the speeches of the other? Not so did the Yahwist and the Elohist and the author of the Prologue of Job manage their dialogues. Less important is the difficulty which arises from the changes of scene, a weakness which need not surprise us in primitive plays. We must be careful, however, not to attach too much importance to European parallels. Renan, for example, goes too far when he refers to the comparatively elaborate pastoral play called Li Gieus de Robin et de Marion, or Li Jous du Bergier et de la Bergiere, composed in 1282 by Adam de la Halle for the diversion of the court.¹ It would be more natural, with R. Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam), to compare the simple pastoretas of the Troubadours; but even that might be misleading.

ii. We have now to ask, further, Have we a right to expect a Semitic drama, however primitive in form?

7. No Semitic drama. That Semitic nations are not at all devoid of general dramatic capacity may be granted. In Mohammedan countries the rāwī ('reciter') still displays all the faculties of an actor, and stirs his hearers to the depths as he tells the story of 'Antar or the tales of the Arabian Nights; and there is an unmistakably strong dramatic element in Arabic works such as the 'Sessions' of Ḥariri. It cannot have been otherwise with the Israelites. They too must have laughed and wept as they listened to their story-tellers. At all events, the relics of their literature contain genuinely dramatic passages: see, for example, the stories of Jacob and Samson (evidently of traditional origin), of Ruth and Job. Even in the psalms and prophecies we have pieces like Ps. 2 24 7-10 Is. 631-6 288-11 Mic. 6-8, and the colloquies in the Book of Job have at least a distant affinity to the drama of character. Still, there is no evidence that the transition to a drama was ever made by a Semitic people. We have an Assyrian epic, but no Assyrian drama. Least of all can we reasonably expect to find one in the OT. Theatrical performances were not known at Jerusalem before the time of Herod, and to all good Jews such heathenish practices were detestable (Jos. Ant. xv. 81; cp BJ i. 21 8). Hence the dramatic theory of the Song is plausible only if the composition of the poem be placed at Alexandria (during the Greek period). Why, upon this supposition, did not the dramatist write in Greek, as did Ezekiel, the author of the drama on the Exodus called Ἐξάγωγη? In a word, the difficulties of the dramatic theory are insuperable.

(δ) The Israelites, however, had a still more characteristic gift—that of lyric poetry. Singing and dancing

8. Popular lyric poetry. formed essential parts of their festivities, as they still do among the Bedouins; and when these festivities were occasioned by some great local or national event, a dramatic element would naturally infuse itself into the popular songs, and this all the more easily because the custom of alternate song, which is in its nature dramatic, was very ancient (cp Ex. 1521 1 S. 2111). Ewald thinks that the Song (which is, according to him, a cantata) was originally intended for a festival of the independence of the N. kingdom, and that it was performed in five days, an act in a day. This view suits his theory of the 'plot' of the Song; but it is no longer tenable—we have seen that the references to 'Solomon' are figurative, and that 'the Shulammitte' is also a mere eulogistic term.

Why should not we take up again the suggestive idea of Bossuet and Lowth that the Song was intended for use on the seven days of the marriage festival (cp

² This view was proposed by Stade in 1887 (GVI 1292), and adopted by Bu. in his excellent essay, New World, Mar. 1894, pp. 62-64. Budde desiderates an OT analogy. Perhaps 'Zimri' in 2 K. 9 31 (see RV) is such.

Gen. 29.27 Judg. 14.12 Tob. 11.19)? On such occasions there would, of course, be alternate songs by the bridegroom and the bride, and to this Jeremiah refers when, describing the calamities of invasion, he says that God will 'cause to cease from the cities of Judah and from the streets of Jerusalem the voice of mirth and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride' (Jer. 7.34 25.10). There is also an illustrative passage in the Mishna (Taanith, 48, already referred to), and the strangeness of the notice affords the best guarantee of its truth. It was customary at the 'Wood Festival' (ξύλοφορία) on the 15th of Ab (August) and at the close of the Day of Atonement¹ for the 'daughters of Jerusalem' (cp Song 1.5, etc.) to go out and dance in the vineyards, and whoever had no wife went thither also. (Was it a relic of 'marriage by capture'? Cp Judg. 21.21.) There was also alternate singing, and the youths were wont to use the words of Song 3.11. See DANCE, § 6.

It is from Syria, where so many old customs have survived, that we get the fullest confirmation of Bossuet's idea. Let us turn to Song 36-11 (translated by the present writer in JQR, July 1899), where the words referred to so strangely in the Mishna occur. Solomon is here introduced riding in his palanquin 'with the crown with which his mother crowned him on his wedding-day,' escorted by sixty warriors 'with the hand on the sword.' What this means we can tell from von Kremer's account of the marriage processions in Moslem villages in the Lebanon.² The procession goes from the house of the bridegroom to that of the bride, and in it there is a band of youths armed with long poles, which they keep striking together, and hold in such a way as to form a kind of roof over them. The poles were probably in olden times lances: the open country was not secure from bandits (Hos. 6.9; cp Ps. 108).³ The 'crown' is, of course, that of the bridegroom (cp Is. 61.10); 'in the war with Vespasian,' says the Mishna (Sota, 9.14), 'the crowns of bridegrooms were forbidden.' The Solomon of 3.11, then, is not the Solomon who made himself a state-litter, but a happier though a humbler mortal. It is, in sooth, a pretty jest to liken the bridegroom with his nuptial crown and the sixty 'companions' (Judg. 14.11) who roof him over with their poles to the luxurious Solomon in his gorgeous palanquin with his martial bodyguard around him; and the jest has a wholesome moral.

9. Syrian wedding festivities.

A much fuller account of the customs of the Syrian peasants in the month of weddings (March) is given by Wetzstein.⁴ During the seven days after a wedding, high festivity, with scarcely interrupted singing and dancing, prevails. The bridegroom and the bride play the parts of king and queen (hence the week is called the 'king's week'), and receive the homage of their neighbours; the crown, however, is at present in Syria (as in Greece) confined to the bride (contrast Song 3.11). The bridegroom has his train of 'companions' (to borrow the ancient term, Judg. 14.11), and the grander the wedding the more of these there are. The bride too has her friends (cp 'daughters of Jerusalem,' Song 1.5, etc.), the maidens of the place, who take an important part in the reception of the bridegroom (cp Ps. 45.14 Mt. 25.1-13). In the evening of the great day a sword-dance is performed. In the Arabian desert it is the young men of the tribe who thus display their agility (Doughty, Ar. Des. 2.118); but in the Syrian wedding festivals the sword-dancer is the bride. When taken in connection with another Syrian custom and with the passage of the Mishna mentioned above, this may be thought a relic of primitive 'marriage by capture.' (The connected custom referred to is this—that when, on the morning after the wedding, the royal seat has been erected, a crier comes forward declaring that the 'king'—the bridegroom—has made a campaign against a hitherto impregnable fortress, and calls upon him to say whether he has succeeded or not. The 'king' answers in the affirmative, and upon this the seven days of rejoicing begin.) However this may be, the sword-dance at the Syrian weddings has a significance of its own. It not only displays the physical gifts and capacities of the bride, but also symbolises her womanly self-respect, which keeps all intruders afar off (cp Song 8.9 10). 'The figure of the dancer, her dark waving hair, her serious noble bearing, her downcast eyes, her graceful movements, the quick and secure step of her small naked feet, the lightning-like flashing of the blade, the skilful movements of her left hand, in which she holds a handkerchief, the exact keeping of time,' form a scene which contributes not a little to make the 'king's week' the happiest in a Syrian peasant's life. The description throws a bright light on Song 6.10 13 7.1-6 (which forms a connected passage).¹ The opening verse is probably spoken by the chorus of neighbours on the approach of the bride with the sword; it abounds with respectful compliments suitable to the occasion. V. 13a also belongs to the neighbours, who call to the bride to turn that they may see her better. Then, to draw out their admiration further, the bridegroom asks them why they are gazing as fixedly at this paragon of beauty—this second Shulammitte—at the dance of warlike hosts, i.e. at the war-dance, or sword-dance (מִן הַמִּלְחָמָה; ws χοροὶ τῶν παρεμβολῶν; so Budde). It often happens in the Syrian desert, says Wetzstein, that when a woman performs this dance on occasion of a victory of one tribe over another, and some young man shows special admiration of the dancer, he is called upon to fight unarmed, according to certain rules, with the dancer, and may chance to pay for his boldness with his life. To this the question in Song 6.13b may allude. Song 7.1-6 (which is in a different metre from 6.10 13) exactly answers to the Syrian wasf (i.e., 'laudatory description') sung during the sword-dance by the leader of the chorus. We must not criticise it too severely. The tone is that which popular taste required and (to judge from the wasf quoted by Wetzstein) still requires in Syria.

On the day after the wedding, when the 'king' has announced his 'victory' over the 'fortress,' another wasf is sung. This time the attractions of the lady are described with less unreserve, in deference to wifely dignity. Such a wasf we seem to have in Song 4.1-7. Is the bridegroom, then, exempt from laudation? Not in modern Syria, nor in the Song. True, in Song 36-11, sung (it would seem) during the procession from the bridegroom's house to that of the bride, flattery goes no further than to liken the crowned bridegroom to Solomon. The young wife naturally goes further. The wasf itself is found in Song 5.10-16. Prefixed to it is a speech of the bride describing a weird dream that she has had, in which she believes so firmly that she begs for the help of the 'daughters of Jerusalem' in restoring her to her beloved. These are the chief songs of this class; but in Song 6.4-7 we have at least a fragment of a laudatory description of the bride, part of which is an ill-connected quotation from 4.1-3. Wetzstein assures us that the wasf-passages are the weakest part of the wedding-songs, and accordingly, he adds, the wasf-portion of the Song of Songs is much inferior poetically to the rest. Certainly the most striking part

Even among the fellaḥin of Palestine there seems to be a vestige of the sword-dance. of the Song of Songs is the passage which contains 711-87 (excepting the interpolated verses 83-51). It is a song such as might have been sung on the evening of the wedding-day. The opening description is true in idea, though imaginary in its incidents. It is true in idea; for every marriage, according to the poet, should arise from the free affection of one man and one woman. It is imaginary in its details, for the incidents are inconsistent with what was allowable in courtship. For real songs of courtship such as an Israelite might have used, see Rückert's Hamasa, bk. iv.). The closing eulogy of love as 'strong as death, inflexible as Sheol, whose flashes are flashes of fire, [whose flame is] a flame from heaven' ² (86), is noble.

The poetical form, and therefore also the origin, of the Song of Songs seems to be no longer doubtful.

Fully twenty years ago (1878) the present writer rejected Ewald's interpretation of Song 611f., but still thought it possible, by omitting interpolations and transposing certain misplaced passages, to restore something like the original sequence, and to recognise a loose imperfect plot such as quick-witted hearers and spectators might have divined. He saw also that the poem was based on popular songs, ³ and admitted the critical significance of the information furnished by Wetstein. 'When we consider,' he then wrote, 'that processions and the choral performance of lyric poems were familiar to the Israelites from Samuel downwards, it becomes a highly probable conjecture that this custom of the Syrian peasants was already in vogue in the times of the OT writers. This is confirmed by the remarkable coincidence between the time when the incidents of the Song are supposed to take place (see Song 211-13) and the time of the peasants' weddings in Syria (March is the most beautiful time of the Syrian year).' He further noticed two or three of the wasf-passages in the Song, and (after Kohler) the implied reference to the sword-dance in Song 61013 (v. 11f. being misplaced). He was far, however, from realising the extent to which the Hebrew songs were analogous to the traditional Syrian, and thought that a part of the Song related to the happy courtship of the rustic lovers; nor did he understand the reference to Solomon or the meaning of 'the Shulammitte.' To Budde he owes it that he has adopted a more consistent theory.⁴

10. Present writer's relation to Wetstein.

The book is an anthology of songs used at marriage festivals in or near Jerusalem, revised and loosely connected by an editor without regard to temporal sequence; in saying which, we do not deny that the kernel of the work may have been brought from some other part of the country, perhaps in the north. What of the supposed indications of unity? These are found partly in the phraseology ('Solomon,' 'the king,' 'daughters of Jerusalem,' 'my beloved,' 'my friend,' the seeming refrains in 273584; as well as in 271a46a; and in 217b814b), partly in the poetical colour, partly in the feeling or spirit, and of course in the circumstances. This agreement between the several parts of the poem is not as great as has been supposed. As Bickell observes, 'Generatim omnia verbotenus repetita serius inserta sunt'; in Q such repetitions are even more plentiful than in MT. The genuine points of phraseological agreement are quite accounted for by the traditional conventions of these love songs. That the feeling, the poetical colour, and the circumstances are the same, harmonises with the assumed origin of the songs. The prominence of the mother (1634825) is to be explained not (with Ewald, 334) by 'the Shulammitte's' supposed loss of her father, but as a vestige of the matriarchate (Mutterrecht). With regard to Song 14 and Song 810, which, taken together, may seem to show that the heroine had been placed in a royal palace but had 'compelled her assailant to leave her in peace'

12. Apparent unity.

¹ These verses are not in the metre of the rest of the passage; the two former come from 261f. (cp 85), while the last has been suggested by 86.

² Or, 'a most vehement flame.' The final יה may be simply an affirmative (Jäger, Jastrow).

³ See Founders of OT Crit. (1893), 350.

(Robertson Smith's paraphrase of 810b), we should hold that the 'chambers' of 14 are those of the crowned bridegroom, and that the 'peace' of 810 belongs to the characteristic figure of the 'fortress' (see above).

Historically, the Song would gain, could it be shown to be pre-exilic. What would not one give for the light liltings of ancient Hebrew maidens, 13. Date. and for a noble popular protest against the doubtful innovations of the unpatriotic Solomon? Robertson Smith in 1876 held that the Song of Songs was just such a protest. 'The conservative revolution of Jeroboam was,' he remarks, 'in great measure the work of the prophets, and must therefore have carried with it the religious and moral convictions of the people. An important element in these convictions, which still claims our fullest sympathy, is powerfully set forth in the Canticles, and the deletion of the book from the Canon . . . would leave us without a most necessary complement to the Judean view of the conduct of the ten tribes which we get in the historical books.' The reference to the harem life of Solomon, however, is confined to two verses (Song 68f.); it is rather sportive than polemical, and, attractive as the protest-theory is, it is opposed to a sound exegesis (see above).

For a pre-exilic date there is no solid argument. (a) The title, which is not by the author (note אֲשֶׁר), 14. Not pre-exilic. is of course not more trustworthy than the headings of the 'Solomonic' psalms.

(b) The points of contact with Hosea (cp Song 213 411 611 with Hos. 146-9) and Prov. 1-9 (cp Song 411 14f. with Prov. 53 717 515-17) prove only that different poets used similar (conventional) images. Moreover, recent criticism tends to show that Hos. 142-10 and Prov. 1-9 are post-exilic. (c) The phrase הַיָּרֵחַ 'going down) straight,' used of wine, in Song 79 Prov. 2331, is indecisive, whether Prov. 2c. is early or late. (d) The mention of Tirzah beside Jerusalem (Song 64) need not point to 'the brief period when that city was the capital of the dynasty of Baasha' (but see TIRZAH), for (if MT is correct) it is the beauty of the site of Tirzah that is referred to—a beauty which could not pass away with a dynasty. Most probably, however, we should emend the text thus, 'Thou art beautiful as the narcissus, comely as the lily of the valleys' ¹ (cp 21). If so, Tirzah is not mentioned. (e) That the references to Solomon prove nothing, we have seen already. It will, therefore, be absurd to base an argument on the comparison of the lady in Song 19 with one of Pharaoh's mares. If the bridegroom could be likened to Solomon, the bride could be likened to one of Solomon's finest Egyptian horses, especially if the songs were written while Palestine formed part of the Græco-Egyptian empire (cp Theoc. Id. 1552f.). Whether Solomon really obtained horses from Egypt, is a question which need not be discussed here (see MIZRAIM, § 2a).

For a post-exilic date the main arguments are these: (a) The position of the book among the Hagiographa. (b) The beauty of Jerusalem is mentioned late (Ps. 482 15. Post-exilic. 502 Lam. 215). (c) The absence of striking archaisms of thought and expression. (d) The importance attached to rare exotic plants and to garden-cultivation points to Babylonian influence (see GARDEN). See Song 412-15, where the following plant-names, which are of foreign origin, and very possibly late, deserve attention.

אֶלֶּוֹת (also Ps. 459, late, where, as here, it is coupled with כֶּרֶם; cp Prov. 717, and see ALOES). קַיָּוֶן (also Prov. 717 Ex. 3023, both passages late), כֶּרֶם (אֶלֶּוֹת.

לעץ, נֶדֶךְ (also 1:2), and, following Grätz, נָדִים (for the tautological נֶדֶךְ), new Heb. for 'roses'.¹

The fondness of the poet of Canticles for spices led the ancient scribes into some very strange textual errors—viz., (1) 4:6, 'to the mountains of myrrh (תְּמֻלָּה) and the hill of frankincense' (הַלְבָנוֹן), where חֶרְמוֹן should be 'Hermion,' and לְבָנוֹן should be חֶרְמוֹן (cp 8:14); very probably, also, the correct reading in 2:8 is 'from the hills of the cedars, from the mountains of the cypresses' (מִן הַבְּרָשִׁים מִהַרְרֵי בְרוֹשִׁים); (2) 8:14, in the 'mountains of spices' (בְּרָשִׁים), בְּרָשִׁים should certainly be בְּרָשִׁים, to which, if We.'s view of חֶרְמוֹן בְּתוֹךְ, 'mountains of malobathron' (We. Proz. 409),² was that of the early scribes, we may add 2:17 where we should read בְּרָשִׁים, 'mountains of cypresses' (see BETHUR).

Add אָנוֹן=new Heb. אָנוֹן, 8:11, and perhaps פֶּרֶךְ = κύπρος, 1:14 4:13 (plur.). Last, not least, we have the Persian loan-word for plantation or park, פָּרְדֵּס, 4:13; elsewhere only Neh. 2:8 Eccl. 2:5, though the exact history of the form is doubtful.

One Greek loan-word³ has been found in אַפְרִיָּן, 'palanquin,' 3:9=φασείον (so 5:5; but see LITTEr). In the Midrash 'א' is explained by פֶּרִיכָמָה—i.e., φέρωμα. In Sota 49a it is said that the use of the bridal litter (אֶפְרִיָּן) was forbidden by the Jewish authorities during the Bar-Cochba war. On the gorgeous φασεία of the Syrian ladies under Antiochus Epiphanes, see Polybius (ap. Athen. 522). The only doubt can be whether 'א' is not a gloss. Metrical reasons suggest its excision (Bickell).

(e) Among the distinctly late words are אֶרְבָּן 3:10 7:64 (for Judg. 8:22-27 is not, as it stands, ancient; see Budde); שֶׁשׁ, 5:15 Esth. 1:6; אָב (plur.), 6:11 Job 8:12; גִּלְשֵׁשׁ, 4:1 6:5; חֶבְדָּעָלָה, 2:1 Is. 35:1; הַצֵּץ, הַשְּׂנִיָּה, פֶּתֶל, 1:10 (חרו, Aram. and new Heb.); 'to glance,' חֲרָבִים 'smoke-holes,' 2:9; קָפֶס, 1:12; מִדְּבָרָה, 2:14 Ezek. 38:20 (Aram. דְּרַבָּא 'a step'; סִפְרֵי, 2:135 7:12 and perhaps Is. 168 (for שְׂרָפֹת, see SBOT, ad loc.; cp Duval, REL 14277); קָחוּ, 'winter,' 2:11; קָחוּצָה, 5:2 11:5; הַשִּׁיטִים, 5:2; שֶׁשׁ (plur.), 3:2 Prov. 7:8 Eccl. 12:45 (cp Grätz, 49); מִנֶּה (Piel), 5:3; קָפֶס (Piel), 'to spring,' 2:8; 'to keep,' 1:6 8:11 12:12; מִבְּרָה, 'enclosed,' 7:3. (f) Grammatical forms. Note רַעְיָה, 1:15, etc.; בְּרוֹחַ, 1:17; אֵיכָה, 'where,' 1:7 (cp 7:28, Dan. 7:28); אֵיכָה, 'how?' 7:53, Esth. 8:6. Also שֶׁשׁ, 22 times. שְׁלֹמֹה, 1:7, like שְׁלֹמֹה, Jon. 1:7, and אֶשֶׁר, Eccl. 8:17; אֶשֶׁר לָקַח, Dan. 1:10. שְׁלֵי, 1:6 8:12; שֶׁל, 3:7 (exactly the Mishna usage). (g) הָיִיד, 4:4, for הָיִיד, may perhaps point to the post-exilic period (see Bonk, ZATW 11127).

The preceding list of arguments, though not exhaustive, should be sufficient. Linguists, such as Gesenius among Christians and M. Sachs among Jews, long ago recognised the modern character of the Hebrew. The question, however, was a complicated one, and ingenuity did its best to save an early date, and with it (it appeared) the historical value of the Song. It is time for critical students to look at the facts more frankly. We can now show that this anthology of songs is post-exilic, and may conjecture that it is nearly contemporary with that 'song of love' (and of spices), Ps. 45. It is not easy to find a period more suitable to all the data than one of the early and fortunate reigns of the Ptolemies (cp Founders, 353). A still later date is suggested by Winckler (Alt. Forschungen, 295).

Like the other poetical books, the Song of Songs suffers from many, often most unfortunate, corruptions of the text; some dislocations of passages have added to the difficulties of the inter-

16. Text.

¹ The first mention of roses elsewhere is in Ecclus. (see Rose). This would allow us to date the song in 300-250 B.C. There were roses in Babylon in Herodotus's time (Herod. 1:95).

² He was anticipated by Field (Orig. Hex. 2415), who gives the rendering of Sexta as μαλαβάθρον. 'Dat et malobathron Syria,' says Pl. (HN 12:1).

preter. Grätz was the first to recognise the bad state of the text. Among recent scholars Bickell and Budde have done most; Bickell's chief results have been incorporated in Budde's excellent commentary. Perles, in his Analekten ('95), has considered about ten passages, and the present writer has endeavoured to correct some of the chief errors (JQR and Exp. Times for 1898-99 and Expositor, Feb. 1899, 145 ff.). Among these corrections it may be mentioned that, according to Bickell, 'the Shulammitte' in 7:1 is due to corruption; against this view, however, see Budde, who points out that, since the phrase 'the Shulammitte' is not tantamount to a declaration that the bride is a Shulammitte damsel, and only means 'one who is as fair as Abishag the Shulammitte,' it is no gain to the adherents of the dramatic or idyllic theory to have the correctness of השלמיטת assured to them. Contrary to Perles (who on this point is an adherent of Grätz), Bickell further thinks that עַמִּי נָרִיב in 6:12 (see AMMINADIB) also is not the true reading. He regards נָרִיב בְּתוֹךְ עַמִּי (cp 7:2) as a doublet of [הַ] נָרִיב [עַמִּי] in 7:2, and renders 'my noble kinswoman'; Budde prefers to wait for more light. Perles has pointed the way to a better solution by grouping 6:12 and 7:2 with 7:7. Here, the present writer thinks, we should read אֶהְיֶה בְּתוֹךְ שְׁנִימִית, 'loved one, Shunammite damsel,' and, consequently, he makes the same restoration in 6:12 and 7:2—i.e., בְּתוֹךְ שְׁנִימִית. Certainly Bickell is right in refusing to have anything to do with the 'chariots' of which MT and therefore also EV speak in 6:12. The whole story of the Shulammitte's having been surprised in the nut-orchard by the king's retinue (cp Driver, Introd., 442, 446) breaks down, when strict criticism is applied to the text. On Cant. 3:6-11, which is disfigured by curious corruptions (one of which is the famous אַפְרִיָּן, RV 'palanquin'), see LITTEr.

We must now endeavour to estimate the value of the Song. We shall not be ungrateful for the material

17. Value. which it supplies to students of manners and customs and the distribution of plants; but it is much more important that it opens a window into the heart of ordinary Israelites. (a) The Song reveals a very pure conception of true love, as springing out of a free inclination of one man and one woman,¹ and rising into a passionate and indestructible union of hearts. If the songs were written (or even if they were only edited, revised, and supplemented) in the early Greek period, what a contrast they offer to much that was current at the luxurious court of the Ptolemies! (b) The Song shows also a genuine love of nature. 'The writer inspires us with his own delicate joys. The breath of spring still breathes through his words. Its scents, its fresh moist greenness, the old hopeful spring notes heard in the woods, again are all here.'² There is nothing more lovely than the spring of Palestine, and this old poet felt it. Where the images are bizarre, we need not put it down to him. The wayf-songs were, and still are, governed by strict convention (cp Wetz. in Del. 174-177). Ovid and Theocritus are not without some of these strange love images.³ (c) 'Race-psychology' also may gather something. Twice the heroine falls into a perplexing confusion between dreamland and reality (Song 3:1-4 5:2-7). This can be paralleled from Arabic love poetry, in which the dream-form of the beloved receives an objective existence, and lovers even give their respective apparitions a rendezvous (see Hamāsa, Freytag, 22; Lyall, Translations, 12).⁴ (d) If the poem is post-exilic, it shows us that there were times and seasons (cp Eccl. 3:4) of which legalism could not overshadow the joyousness.

³ Cp especially Song 1:9 with Theocrit. Id. 18:30.

In this and in other respects our notion of the post-exilic period may perhaps need revision.

Is this, then, the whole worth of the Song for us? Being canonical, must it not have some subtle religious value which has been overlooked?¹

The answer is (1) that we have no right to assume that R. Akiba's well-known saying about the Song at the Synod of Jamnia (see CANON, § 53) represents the point of view of those who first admitted this popular and supposed Solomonic work among the Kethūbhīm; and (2) that the mistake of a Jewish Synod cannot be perpetually endorsed by Christian common-sense and scholarship. We have therefore to revise our conception of the word 'canonical' in its application to the OT writings.

CAP (πετασος [AV]; according to one view it has been borrowed in Aramaic under the form ܥܦܬܐ Dan. 3:21; but see BREECHES, 2; TURBAN, 2; and cp Journ. Phil. 26309 f.), the Greek broad-brimmed (fr. πετασμι) felt hat which Jason made the Jewish youth wear (2 Macc. 4:12 RV; AV 'hat'). It was worn (originally) chiefly by shepherds and hunters, was an attribute of Hermes,² and so became the badge of the palestra.

This assumes that the text is genuine (note that ὑποτάσσων in 6A precedes). The Syr. reads ܥܦܬܐ ܕܡܠܟܐ: cp 2 S. 12:31 (Pesh.), where MT has ܥܦܬܐ. Did the translator think of ἐπὶ τὰς αὐχῆς? Equally obscure is the origin of the Vg. in heparibus, though the infamy and vice of the later gymnasia, the fact that the ἑπικατα were celebrations of a more or less free and unrestrained character, and the allusion to vicious practices in 2 Macc. 6:4, make it possible that a genuine tradition has been followed.

CAPER-BERRY (אֶפְרַיִם, καππαρις [BNAC]), Eccles. 12:5 RV. That the HYSSOP (g.v.) is the caper-plant (Capparis spinosa, L.) is a favourite theory. Still more prevalent is the view that the word rendered 'desire' in AV RVm² of Eccles. 1:2 ('the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail') denotes the berry of the caper-plant.³ The difficulties of translation are as great in the third of these clauses as in the others (ALMOND, GRASSHOPPER). The Revisers of OT changed 'desire' into 'the caper-berry,' but could not determine on a satisfactory verb; 'fail' therefore remains, with 'Or, burst' in the margin. Thus much at any rate is plain: the noun in this clause must denote some object in the physical world.

The rendering 'the caper-berry' (6, Aq. Vg.)⁴ has been adopted by nearly all moderns, among whom G. F. Moore⁵ deserves special mention because of the fresh light which he has brought from Mishnic and Talmudic sources. The rendering 'desire' (Abulwalid; Parchon) is a worthless modern guess.

In spite of the agreement of scholars, the clause remains obscure, mainly from the difficulty of interpreting the predicate אֶפְרַיִם. (1) Plutarch (Symp. 62) speaks of the caper being used as a relish to induce appetite for food; mediæval Arabic writers mention its effects in stimulating sexual impulse (Wetz. in Del. Koh. 452);¹ and it was in traditional use (especially the fruit) in the middle ages as a stimulant in senile disorders.² It has been sought, accordingly, to explain אֶפְרַיִם as meaning 'fail of effect' (so RV text), and this will do as a makeshift: when even the caper fails, nothing is left to try. Unfortunately, it is difficult to believe that the Heb. verb can have this meaning; Delitzsch's explanation of it as a case of internal Hiphil ('produces failure'—i.e., 'fails') is most unlikely.

(2) Others have thought of the bursting of the ripe berry and the scattering of its seeds as a synonym for death (so RVm²); but this is quite untenable, (a) because of the fact that the root פִּרַּח is nowhere used in a physical sense in Hebrew,³ (b) because the context requires a phrase descriptive of old age rather than of death, and (c) because of the botanical impossibility of the interpretation, there being no evidence that the fruit of Capparis spinosa is dehiscent.

Unless, therefore, we give the Heb. verb the very unusual sense of 'fail' we can only say that probably, as in the other clauses, the metaphor indicates some feature in the old man's appearance or physical state, and Moore's suggestion, to emend אֶפְרַיִם into some derivative of פִּרַּח appears a good one.

CAPERNAUM is the transliteration of the Text. Rec. καπερναοὺμ; but NBDZ, followed by Tisch.,

1. Name. Treg., WH, etc., read καφαρναοὺμ (so Pesh. and Jos.). The original was, therefore, כפר נחום, כפר נחום, village of Nahum. It is not mentioned before the NT, and this, coupled with the fact that כפר prevails in the composition only of comparatively late names, is proof of an origin shortly before the time of Jesus. Whether by Nahum is meant the prophet, we do not know. In Jerome's time it was another Galilean town that was associated with him (GASm. Twelve Proph. 279).

Capernaum became the home of Jesus (ἐν οἴκῳ ἐστίν, Mk. 2:1) and 'his own city' (Mt. 9:1) after his rejection by the townsmen of Nazareth.

2. References. Here he preached (Mt. 8:5 Mk. 1:21 9:3336 Jn. 6 etc.); did many wonderful works, healing Peter's mother-in-law and many others (Mk. 1:31 34), a paralytic (Mt. 9: Mk. 2:1 Lk. 5:18), a centurion's servant (Mt. 8:5 Lk. 7:1), a man with an unclean spirit (Mk. 1:23 Lk. 4:33), and (by a word from Cana) a nobleman's servant (Jn. 4:46); and called the fishermen Peter and Andrew (Mk. 1:16), and Matthew or Levi, who sat to receive toll (Mt. 9:8 Mk. 2:14 Lk. 5:27). In spite of all this, the body of citizens remained unmoved, and Jesus pronounced woe upon the place (Mt. 11:23 Lk. 10:15, RV). These passages imply that Capernaum was a πόλις, with a Roman garrison, a synagogue (built by the centurion), and a customs-station; and that it lay down in the basin of the lake (Jn. 2:12 Lk. 4:31), and on the lake shore (Mt. 4:13), and (presumably from the customs station) on the great high road from Damascus past the N. end of the lake to the Levant (cp way of the sea quoted in Mt. 4:15 f. from Is. 9:1 [8:23]). A comparison of Jn. 6:17 with Mt. 14:34 would seem also to imply that it lay on or near the plain of Gennesaret at the NW. corner of the lake.

The name has entirely disappeared, and amid the scattered evidence of writers since the NT and the various groups of ruin which strew the lake shore between Gennesaret and the mouth of the Jordan, diversity of tradition and of modern opinion has naturally arisen. Two sites divide the authorities—Khirbet el-Minyeh (several mounds with indistinguishable ruins and an old Khān also called Minyeh on the N. corner of Gennesaret); and Tell-Hūm, a heap of black basalt ruins

1 It should, however, be noted that neither Dioscorides (2204) nor Pliny (13:27 20:165 ff.) mentions either of these effects.

2 So Tragus (De Stirp. Hist. Contm. 1552, 360a) writes to the effect that, cooked, and taken with oil and vinegar, it is used with benefit in cases of palsy, gout, 'phlegm,' 'spleen,' sciatica, in urinary troubles, and as an emmenagogue.

3 Even if it were, the Hiphil would not mean 'to burst.'

with the remains of a white marble edifice and a curious tomb two miles and a half farther west, and two miles and a half from the mouth of the Jordan. Between these two the evidence is not quite conclusive.

For Tell-Hūm there is usually quoted the evidence of Josephus, who says that, having been thrown from his

4. Josephus. horse in a skirmish with the Roman forces in Jordan, he was carried to a village called Κεφαρνωμων (bib. 72), and thence to Taricheæ. Even if this reading were correct, Josephus, with injuries so slight as he reports, might as easily have been carried the 5 m. to Gennesaret as the two and a half to Tell-Hūm, especially as his desire seems to have been to get to Taricheæ. It is suspicious, however, that he calls the place a village (κώμη), and Niese fixes the proper reading as κεφαρνωκὸν. The only other evidence Josephus gives favours Khān Minyeh. He describes (B/iii.108) the plain of Gennesaret as watered by 'a most copious fountain' called by the people of the country Capharnaum. This Robinson believes to be the 'Ain et-Tin, close by Khān Minyeh; more probably it was the 'Ain et-Tābigah, whose waters were conveyed in an aqueduct past the site of Khān Minyeh into the plain. Tell-Hūm, on the other hand, has neither fountain nor spring.

The Christian and the Jewish traditions are divided. Jerome places Capernaum 2 R. m. from Chorazin, a

5. Christian and Jewish traditions. datum which, if Chorazin be Kērazeh, agrees with Tell-Hūm. So do the data of Theodosius (circa 530), who, working from Magdala round the N. end of the Lake, places Capernaum 2 R. m. on the other side of Heptapagon, presumably 'Ain et-Tābigah. Isaac Chilo in 1334 (Carmoly Itinéraires, etc., la Terre Sainte des xiii.-xvii. Siècles, 260) came to Kefar Nachum from Irbid, and found it in ruins with the tomb of Nahum. In 1561 the Jichus ha-Tsedikim (ib. 385) mentions Tanchum with the tombs of Nahum and Rabbi Tanchum (cp Jichus ha-Abot id. 448). Taking Kefar Nachum and Tanchum as identical, some find in 'Tell-Hūm' a corruption of 'Tanchum.' This is the case for Tell-Hūm. It really rests on the evidence of Jerome and Theodosius (for it is not certain either that Kefar Nachum and Tanchum were identical or that 'Tell-Hūm' is derived from 'Tanchum'); and it is opposed to the evidence of Josephus. Yet in recent times it has received a large increase of support (Dr. Wilson, Lands of the Bible, 139-149; Thomson, Land and Bk. ed. 1877, 352-356; Sir C. Wilson, Recovery of Jerusalem, 375-387; Guérin, Galil. 1227 f.; Schaff, ZDPV 124 ff.; Furrer, id. 263 ff., and in Schenkel's Bib. Lex. 3495; Frei, ZDPV 2115; van Kasteren, ib. 11219 f.; Schürer's Hist. 471; Buhl, Pal. 224 f.).

On the other hand, Arculf's description of Capernaum (670 A.D.), as being on 'a narrow piece of ground between the mountain and the lake,' suits Khān Minyeh, but not Tell-Hūm. Arculf adds that it lay on the shore non longo circuitu from the traditional spot on Gennesaret where the loaves were blessed. He did not visit it, but saw from a distance that it had no walls. Willibald's data (722 A.D.) suit any point between Mejdol and Bethsaida, and equally indefinite are all other references till Isaac Chilo in 1334 states that the town is now in ruins, but was formerly inhabited by Minīm—i.e., Jews who had become Christians—all sorcerers (cp Neubauer, Géog. du Talm. 221). Many find Minīm in Minyeh. In answer to objections to this (Furrer, ZDPV 258 ff.), another derivation has been suggested through the older Arabic spelling el-munya, common in Egypt and Spain for 'villa,' 'steading,' 'hamlet,' etc. = Lat. mansio, Gr. μονή—from which it is said to be derived (Gildemeister, ZDPV 4194 ff.). In any case, a place lay here in the eleventh century called Munyat Hishām (Kazwini's Lexicon), and in 1430 El-Munja, a village so large that the whole lake was called after it. (Tristram gives the form 'Minyeh,' which Delitzsch derives from Mineh, harbour). And Quaresmius in 1616-26 (Elucid. Terr. Sanc. 2568) says that by the site of Capernaum there was in his time a Khān called by the Arabs Menieh—i.e., Minyeh. Ruins have been found both on the plain, by Robinson (LBR 348-358) and Merrill (E. of Jordan, 301 f.), who traced a city wall, and on the hill by Schumacher (ZDPV 1370).

On the whole, then, the balance of opinion is in favour of 'Khān Minyeh.' So Robinson, Conder, Henderson

6. Probably (Pal. 158 f.), Keim (Jesus, Engl. ed., 2367 ff.), Stanley (SP 384), G. A. S. M. Khan (Hist. Geog. 456 f.), Ewing (in Hastings, DB). The site suits the biblical data, is required by the data of Josephus, and has tradition in its favour from the seventh century onward.

CAPHARSALAMA (χαφαρσαλαμα [N V; so Syr.], καφ. [Jos.], φαρσ. [*N], χαφαρσαλαμα [A]), the scene of Nicanor's unsuccessful attack upon Judas, 1 Macc. 7:31 (cp Jos. Ant. xii. 104). The name is obviously כפר שלם, which is met with in the Talmud also. Most commentators (Michaelis, Grimm, Keil) seek the site somewhere to the S. of Jerusalem, on the ground that Nicanor's subsequent movements were first to Jerusalem and then farther northwards to Beth-horon. Ewald and Schürer, however, prefer to identify it with the Carva Salim mentioned in a pilgrimage of the year 1065 as near Ramleh and not far from Lydda (Ew. Hist. 5321, Schür. GJV 1:69 n.; cp Le Strange, Pal. under Moslems, 471 f.). In the time of the crusaders 'Capharsalem' is again mentioned as a casale of the Knights Hospitaliers. Mukaddasi's location of it 'in the district of Cæsarea on the high road from Ramleh northwards' agrees with the data in 1 Maccabees. In that region we find at the present day a village Selmeḥ 3 m. E. of Joppa and Khirbet es-Suālīmīyeh 6 m. farther N. across the 'Aujeh. Kh. Deir Sellām, 12½ m. W. of Jerusalem and 1 m. S. of the present high road to Joppa, suits the Maccabean, but not the mediæval data. The same remark applies to the other Kh. Deir Sellām 4 m. N. of Jerusalem. Cp also the important W. Selmanū which runs one of the main roads from the Maritime Plain to Jerusalem.

CAPHENATHA, RV CHAPHENATHA (χαφεναθα [ANV], ⲕⲁⲫⲉⲛⲁⲛⲁⲧⲁ [Lag.], but ⲕⲁⲫⲉⲛⲁⲛⲁⲧⲁ [Walton]), a locality on the E. of Jerusalem, which Jonathan the Maccabee repaired (ἐπεσκεύασε), 1 Macc. 12:37†. The reading is uncertain, and the etymologising attempts of the older Lightfoot and others (ⲕⲁⲫⲉⲛⲁⲛⲁⲧⲁ, 'unripe dates,' כספחה, from silversmiths or some treasure house) are best avoided. Sepp and Furrer (TLZ, 1896, col. 470) identify the place with the Tyropoeon valley (see JERUSALEM), in which case ἐπεσκεύασε (ἐπεσκήλασεν [V]) will have to be emended.

CAPHTOR (ⲕⲁⲫⲧⲟⲣ; Dt. 2:23 Am. 9:7, ⲕⲁⲫⲧⲟⲣⲁⲕⲱⲓⲁⲥ [BAQL], ⲕⲁⲫⲧⲁ. [F]; Jer. 47 [G 29] 4†, om. 1. Not Crete. BNAQ, ἀθ'καὶ ⲕⲁⲫⲧⲟⲣ. [A⁹⁷]); Dt. 2:23† (AV Caphtorims, ⲕⲁⲫⲧⲟⲣⲓⲙ [BAFL]); the land and properly the people whence came the Philistines. In Gen. 10:14 (see below)¹ and Dt. 2:23 Caphtorim is a synonym for Philistines. Caphtor is now generally identified with Crete, an important island of which the mention is perhaps to be expected; see GEOGRAPHY,

CAPHTOR

§ 15(7). In Jer. 47 it is expressly called an 'island' (?), and the Philistines (?) are sometimes called 'Cherethites.' The Zeus Cretagenes in Gaza may also suggest a connection of the Philistines with Crete. These are Dillmann's arguments. But (1) Crete does not appear to be mentioned in the Assyrian or the Egyptian monuments; (2) the sense of 'island' is not to be limited to 'island' (BDB, 'coast, border, region'); and (3) in Jer. 47. 5 gives τοὺς καταλοιποὺς τῶν νήσων—i.e., the text which it followed was without 'Caphtor'; the 'islands' or 'coast-lands' might be the Phœnician colonies (WMM). As for 'Cherethites,' the current explanation, 'Cretans'

(so too Ἔ, Pesh.), is very uncertain; cp 2. 'Cherethites' not Cretans. כרת probably = Pulasati (Purasati), which is the name of one of the tribes of seapirates from the coasts of Asia Minor which harassed Egypt under Rameses III. The probability is that כרת is a slightly modified form of the name of another such tribe. Now, the tribe which is constantly coupled with the Pu-ra-sa-ti in the Egyptian inscriptions is that of the Ta-k-ka-ra or Ta-ka-ra-y. It is reasonable to infer that כרת is a form of Takaray, which was Hebraised in two ways: (1) by placing the first consonant third instead of first (כרת, as if = cut off?), and (2) by omitting the first syllable (כר); but see CARITES). We look to Egyptology, therefore, for light on this problem.

According to Ebers,¹ Caphtor is the Egyptian Kaft-ur, 'Great Kaft.' This scholar held that Kaft was the name current in Egypt, first of all for the populous Phœnician colonies in the Delta, and then, more widely, for the Phœnicians of Phœnicia and their colonies. Kaft-ur would therefore mean 'Great Phœnicia' (cp Magna Græcia). This view, however, though not without plausible justification, is no longer tenable, as W. M. Müller has fully shown (As. u. Eur. 337 ff.).

Keftô is the name of a country which, together with Asi (the Alasia of Am. Tab.)—i.e., Cyprus—represents the western quarter of the world in the age of Thotmes III. No doubt it is Cilicia that is meant; hence in Lepsius's Denkmäler, 63, it is mentioned with Mannus (= Mallus, a region of silver mines) as inhabited by the same people. E. Meyer (who himself, however, still inclines to identify Caphtor with Crete) writes thus² of the land of Kaft (i.e., Müller's Keftô):—'The inhabitants of this land, the Kafti (formerly wrongly read Kefa) carried on a sea trade, and possessed a richly-developed decorative art which is closely related to the Mycenaean. Upon the Egyptian monuments they present throughout, in contrast with the inhabitants of the Phœnician seaports, a wholly non-Semitic type of features, and appear in the inscriptions as a western people outside the pale of the Semitic world. Rightly, therefore, have Pietschmann, Steindorff, and W. M. Müller rejected the equation Kaft=φουίκη of the bilingual decree of Canopus and sought for Kaft in Asia Minor, perhaps in Cilicia.'

Now, when we consider that the sea-pirates called Purasati and Takaray are stated to have come from the 'islands' (i.e., coast-lands), it is obvious that, if Purasati (at any rate) has been rightly identified in Hebrew literature, Caphtor, whence the Pēlīstīm (Philistines) came, must be a name for some part of the sea-board of Asia Minor, and we may expect to find its original in the Egyptian inscriptions. That original must surely be Keftô (or Kaft), which appears to have been Hebraised as Caphtor. That Caphtorim should be called a son of Mizraim (Gen. 10 14) is not surprising, for Caphtorim here, as well as in Dt. 23, means, not the people of Caphtor (the coasts of Asia Minor) but the Philistines, who, as Müller has shown, were subject to Egypt in Shishak's time and earlier (cp DAVID, § 7). It is indeed doubtful whether either Amos or the Yahwist (J) can be presumed to have known the true meaning of Caphtor, for as early as the fourteenth century the name Keftô had passed out of general use. As a name for Cilicia it was superseded by Hīlakku (see CILICIA, § 2). Hence the false tradition, identifying Caphtor with Cappadocia, could easily arise, just as another incorrect tradition identifying the Cherethites with the Cretans (on the other side see CHERETHITES) arose. See WMM, As. u. Eur. 337, 390, to whom this (probably) right explanation of Caphtor is due. That the final r in Caphtor still needs to be accounted for is admitted.

CAPPADOCIA (ΚΑΠΠΑΔΟΚΙΑ [Ti. WH]) Acts 29 1 Pet. 1 17. Cappadocia, from a similarity of sound, was wrongly identified by the translators of Ἑ with CAPHTOR (see readings in previous article). It is allowable, however, to find it in the Gomer (see GEOGRAPHY, § 20, 1) of Gen. 10 2; certainly the region called Gimir by the Assyrians was in or near Cappadocia. A still older name for Cappadocia seems to have been Tabal (see TUBAL); the Tabalæans were scattered abroad on the invasion of their lands by the Gimirrai. The connection of Cappadocia with the early Hittites can only be mentioned here (see HITTITES).

Cappadocia is mentioned twice in the NT: Cappadocian Jews listened to Peter's sermon (Acts 29), and his first epistle is addressed to Christian residents in the province (1 Pet. 1 17). Jews must early have found their way into this part of Asia Minor, which is intersected by the commercial highways leading to Aniisus on the Euxine and to Ephesus on the Ægean.

Strabo (534) sketches the area included under the name of Cappadocia. In the earliest times it embraced the entire neck of the Anatolian peninsula. Subsequently it was split up into the two independent monarchies of Cappadocia Proper (ἡ πρὸς τῷ Ταύρω, ἡ μεγάλη) and Pontus (ἡ πρὸς τῷ Πόντῳ K.), separated from each other by the broad irregular elevation of the Tchamlı Bel and Ak Daglı (Strabo, 540; Rams. Hist. Geogr. 315). In the south the Pylæ Ciliciæ and the ridge of Taurus marked the frontier against Cilicia. Lake Tatta was part of the western boundary. In the SW. Cappadocia merged into the vast level plains of Lycaonia and South Galatia; eastwards it extended to the Euphrates. The frontier varied greatly, however, at different epochs, especially towards the N. and the E. Cappadocia is a cold elevated table-land, intersected by mountains, deficient in timber, but excellent for grain and grazing (Str. 73, 539). Its chief export seems to have been slaves (Hor. Ep. i. 6 39: Mancipis locupletis eget eris Cappadocum rex); but they were not of much account (Cic. Post Red. 6 14). Red ochre (Σινωπική μίλτος: Str. 540) of good quality was exported: the emporium was Ephesus—not Tarsus, as we might have expected. Several monarchs of Cappadocia Proper bore the name Ariarathes (cp 1 Macc. 15 22). Its last king, Archelaus, was deposed by Tiberius, who reduced the country to the form of a province, in 17 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 24 2; Jos. Ant. xvi. 46).

In Imperial times the Cappadocian roads fall into three groups:—(1) those on the north, and (2) those on the south, of the river Halys, in both cases leading eastwards to the fords of the upper Euphrates; (3) transverse roads leading northwards from the Cilician Gates: one of the chief among these last was that which afterwards became the pilgrims' route to the Holy Land (Rams. op. cit. 255). The capital, Mazaca (Μάκκα, from Mosoch, the ancestor of the Cappadocians; Jos. Ant. i. 6 1; Gen. 10 2), occupied a central position actually upon the Euphrates trade-route, at the northern foot of Mt. Argæus. It was re-founded by Claudius, who gave it the name Caesarea, about 41 A.D. Because of the strength of the new religion in it, Julian expunged it from the list of cities. By his time the whole town had been christianized (πᾶνθημα Χριστιανισμός) and its great temples of Zeus Pollichus and Apollo Patrois had long been destroyed (Sozom. HE 5 4; Rams. op. cit. 303). This is the more remarkable as southern Cappadocia was the stronghold of the worship of Ma (Enyo), whose priest rivalled the king himself in power (Str. 535). At the time of Strabo's visit the Hieroduli of the temple numbered over six thousand, and goddess ATARGATIS (q.v.). G. Smith's words are (see Del. Par. 266 f.), 'Grand site [;] vast walls and palace-mounds 8000 feet round [;] many sculptures and monoliths with inscriptions [;] site of Karchemesh.' Some of the sculptures and inscriptions are now in the British Museum. The ruins extend half a mile from N. to S. by a quarter of a mile from W. to E. (Pococke, l.c.).

Carchemish was the northern capital of the Hittite empire, the Assyrian māt Ḫatti, clearly a great trade centre, and seems to have been a fortress-city commanding the principal ford of the Euphrates on the trade route from the Mesopotamian plains into Syria. As the mounds lie between Berejik and the junction of the Sājūr with the Euphrates, it is certain that a strong force at Carchemish could block the route of an Egyptian army into Assyria. About 1600 B.C. the army of Thotmes III. had to meet the people of Ka-ri-ka-mai(?) -ša (WMM, Asien, 263); and the Egyptian captain Amenemḥbe took some of the inhabitants prisoners. Tiglath-pileser I. (circa 1100 B.C.) says that he defeated and plundered people belonging to the city of Carchemish, and when the rest fled and crossed the Euphrates he sent his troops across on floats of inflated skins and burnt six cities at the foot of Mount Bišri (KB 132, l. 49 ff.). It is clear that his victory did not give command of the ford and that he did not take the city itself. Ašur-nāšir-pāl (circa 880 B.C.) received from Sangara, king of (māt Ḫatti) the Hittites, in the neighbourhood of Carchemish, tribute, the magnitude and variety of which attest the wealth and prosperity of the land (KB 106, l. 65 ff.). Shalmaneser II. about 858 B.C. defeated an alliance of Sangara with his neighbours and received an enormous tribute from him (KB 162, l. 27 ff.). On the bronze gates of Balawāt a picture of the fortress is twice given in relief. Sargon II. in 717 B.C. actually captured the city, took its king Pisiris prisoner, deported its people, and settled Assyrians in it (KB 238, ll. 10, 22; Wi. Sarg., passim). From this time it was the capital of a regular province of Assyria, and had its own šaknu or governor, who took his place among the Eponyms (592 B.C.). A strong proof of its commercial importance is afforded by the fact that by far the most common unit of monetary value in Assyria down to the last was the maneh of Carchemish. On the battle of Carchemish in 605 B.C., see EGYPT, § 68; ISRAEL, § 40.

CARIA (τὴν καρίαν[NV], τ. -ία [A]), the southern part of the Roman province of Asia, mentioned as one of the countries to which a Roman note in favour of the Jews was sent in 139 B.C. (1 Macc. 15²³); see MACCABEES, FIRST, § 9. At that date Caria was autonomous. Previously the greater portion had been assigned to Rhodes (in 189 B.C.), but after the war with Perseus (168 B.C., cp 1 Macc. 8⁵ Pol. 30⁵) it was declared free. After 129 B.C. Caria was part of the province of Asia (Cic. Pro. Flac. 65). Jews were settled in many Carian towns—Cnidus, Halicarnassus, Myndus, Miletus—and in the islands off the coast—Cos, Rhodes, etc.

CARMANIANS, RV Carmonians (Carmonii [ed. Bensly], -mini [A*], -ne [A]), for which some MSS read Armenii, on the principle of substituting the unknown for the known, a people, mentioned in the 'vision horrible' (4 Esd. 15³⁰), who were to go forth 'as the wild boars of the wood' and 'waste a portion of the land of the Assyrians with their teeth' (so RV); see SWINE. They are probably the inhabitants of Kermān, a province on the N. shore of the Persian gulf, lying to the W. of Gedrosia. Kerman is now the name of a province in the SE. of Persia.

In language and customs they were akin to the Persians. They were not unknown to ancient classical authors (e.g., Nearchus, Arrian Ind. 38; Strabo, 15⁷²⁷, the latter of whom gives a very gruesome account of some of their cruelties).

The events hinted at in the vision probably refer to the conquests of the Sassanides, more especially of Shāpūr or Sapor I. (242-273 A.D.), and to their expeditions against Valerian (258 A.D.) and other generals. We may thus see in the wasting of a 'portion of the land of the Assyrians' (v. 30) Sapor's expedition towards the NW. where he overran Syria and destroyed Antioch. The dragons of Arabia (v. 29; cp the 'fiery flying serpents' of Is. 30⁶) would then be the Arabian forces of Odenathus and Zenobia, who drove him back beyond the Euphrates; and the retaliation described in v. 33 would refer to the repulse of the Palmyrene troops, their dislodgment from the banks of the Orontes, and the fall of Zenobia at the hands of Aurelian (272 A.D.).

CARMEL (כַּרְמֶל or כַּרְמֶלֶת—i.e., 'the garden-land'; καρμηλιος [BAL]). 1. (Sometimes also כַּרְמֶלֶת הַיָּר, καρμηλιος [BAL]). 1. (Sometimes also כַּרְמֶלֶת הַיָּר, καρμηλιος [BAL]).

1. Name and position. The name Carmel, which is properly a common noun meaning a plantation of choice trees (cp Span. carmen), is employed both with and (Josh. 19²⁶ Jer. 46¹⁸ Nah. 1⁴) without the article as the proper name of a mountain. The reference is to the richly wooded character which Mt. Carmel had anciently and possesses still in a large degree (cp 'The Black Forest').

It is convenient to distinguish three separate applications of the name: (1) as denoting the range of hills extending for some 12 or 13 miles from the sea coast in the NW. to the W. el-Milh in the SE.; (2) as including also the farther prolongation (called er-Ruhah) of this range for other 12 or 13 miles in a south-easterly direction, as far as to the neighbourhood of Jenin; (3) as designating the promontory or headland in which the range ends at its northern extremity, leaving only a narrow passage between the mountain and the sea. The range and the promontory combine to form a striking feature in the configuration of Palestine. The symmetrical arrangement by which the country as a whole falls into longitudinal sections, running north and south, distinguished as the littoral zone, the hill-country, and the zone of the Ghōr (see PALESTINE, § 6 f.), is broken by Carmel alone, intruding into the Mediterranean plain, and interrupting the continuity of the mountain zone so as to form the plain of Jezreel. Topographically it is thus important; and, though Carmel is not often expressly named, the presence of this natural barrier and the adjoining plain had a considerable influence on the course of immigrations or invasions from the time of the Philistines and Pharaoh Necho down to that of Bonaparte.

The eastern slope of Carmel falls sharply towards the plain of Esdraelon; but westward its declivity towards the Mediterranean is gentle. On this side its configuration presents a series of divergent buttresses separated by valleys and opening up like a fan towards the coast. This western region, properly, belongs to the massif of Carmel, and Conder says, quite rightly, 'Carmel is best described as a triangular block of mountains.' From the summit of the main range and, indeed, from almost every point along the ridge extensive views to south and north are obtained, and Carmel in turn is visible and conspicuous from a great variety of distant points. The range reaches a maximum elevation of 1810 feet a little to the south of the village of 'Esfieyh.

Geologically it is cretaceous and nummulitic limestone, containing fossil echinoderms and 'geodes'—i.e., silicious concretions known as septarium or vulgarly as cats' heads, called by the ancient pilgrims lapides judaici or Elijah's melons (Lortet, La Syrie d'aujourd'hui, 172). There are many caves, and some volcanic rocks. The fauna includes the roebuck, the leopard, and the wild cat. The flora, which is luxuriant, is wholly wild. The most common trees are the pine, oak, lentisk, carob, olive; traces of modern agriculture are to be found only in the neighbourhood of the villages and of the sea-coast. It was otherwise in ancient times, as is shown by the very name (above, § 1). At various points in the range ancient wine and oil presses have been discovered, and traces of Roman roads have been pointed out to the present writer by Dr. Schumacher.

There is every ground for believing that formerly Carmel was covered much more luxuriantly than it is now. Hence the comparison in Cant. 7.5[6] ('thine head is like Carmel'), and the allusion to the 'splendour of Carmel' in Is. 35.2. Its prominence is referred to in Jer. 46.18, where it is said that the king of Babylon will come 'like Tabor among the mountains and like Carmel by the sea.' In conjunction with Sharon, Lebanon, and Bashan, Carmel serves as a type for a land that has been singularly blessed by God (Jer. 50.19 Mic. 7.14). The devastation of Carmel implies the severest chastisement for Israel (Is. 33.9 Jer. 42.6 Am. 1.2 Nah. 1.4). Its thick woods offered shelter to the fugitive, as Amos (9.3) indicates in an allusion that admits of explanation without supposing that the mountain was held to give protection against Yahwè (for the idea cp Ps. 139.12). The passages which assign to Elisha an abode on Carmel do not necessarily mean that he was compelled to seek an asylum there (2 K. 2.25 4.25). In the time of Strabo Carmel was still a place of refuge for the persecuted (16.759).

We cannot say with certainty to which tribe Carmel belonged.

The one reference in this connection (Josh. 19.26) in the delimitation of Asher is somewhat enigmatical (see ASHER, § 3), and in any case can relate only to the extreme headland. The tribes of Manasseh, Issachar, and Zebulun must all have touched on Carmel. Doubtless the tribal limits varied from age to age, and there must have been periods of Phœnician ascendancy.

In later times Carmel belonged now to Samaria, now to Galilee, sometimes even to the province of Tyre.

In Ahab's time it certainly formed part of the dominions of that monarch, and it became the scene of the memorable contest between Elijah and the prophets of Baal.

Tradition places the scene, and the altar of Yahwè which Elijah repaired, at a point called El-Mohraka ('place of burning'), where there is a Roman Catholic sanctuary 1700 feet above the sea-level, two hours south from Esfieyh. Beneath this spot, at the base of the mountain, near the Kishon, there is a hillock, the so-called Tell-el-Kassîs ('hill of the priest', not 'of the priests'), which is pointed to—but, of course, with no historical certainty—as the place where the prophets of Baal were put to death.

There are no data for fixing the scene of 1 K. 18 in one locality more than another, and vv. 41-46 leave us as much in the dark as the rest of the narrative. Some interpreters take the 'mountain' in 2 K. 19.15 to be Carmel; but it is natural to look for it somewhere on the road between Samaria and Ekron. It has also been supposed to be intended in Dt. 33.19 ('Issachar and Zebulun . . . shall call the peoples unto the mountain'); but 'what mountain is meant is quite indeterminate. There may have been more than one mountain sanctuary in Zebulun and Issachar; and the inference may be to these generally' (Dr. ad loc.).

Carmel had a widespread reputation for sanctity. Thotmes III. has been quoted as a witness. Maspero, in fact, thinks that he can recognise the 'holy headland' (קדש ראש) of Carmel in the name Ru-šā-kdš, no. 48 in the Palestinian place-list of Thotmes III. (RPP 547); but this is uncertain.¹

Jamblichus (Vit. Pyth. 3.15) asserts that Pythagoras sojourned on Carmel. Tacitus (Hist. 2.78) speaks of it as a place consecrated by the presence of an oracle, beside an altar that was unadorned by any image of the deity. Suetonius (Vesp. 5) relates that Vespasian sacrificed at this spot, and heard from the priests the prophecy of his greatness. Among

5. Later times. Mahommedans the memory of Elijah is indissolubly associated with Carmel, which the Arabs to this day call Jebel Mâr Elyās, Mount St. Elias, where they have set up wells and mosques in his honour.

Still greater has its importance been in the Christian world. Many anchorites established themselves there from the earliest times. In 1156 St. Berthold of Calabria founded the order of Carmelites and built their first monastery at the north-western extremity of the range near 'Elijah's grotto.'

In 1252 the monastery was visited by St. Louis (Louis IX.) of France, who is sometimes, but wrongly, represented as its founder. Dedicated to 'Our Lady of Mount Carmel,' it has had a very chequered history. The Carmelites were often persecuted; and their house was destroyed or turned into a mosque. In 1799 it was used as a hospital for the sick and wounded of Napoleon's army. In 1821 it was destroyed by 'Abdallah-pasha; but a Carmelite friar, Giovanni Battista di Frascati, successfully undertook to collect funds for its restoration. The present building, 560 feet above the sea-level, is due to his efforts; by its side stands a lighthouse. 'Elijah's grotto' forms the crypt of the church; another grotto near, which formerly belonged to the Christians but has now been taken by the Moslems, is represented as having harboured a school of the prophets in Elijah's time, and as having given shelter to the Holy Family on their return from Egypt.

A little way above the monastery, on the crest of the hill, a large sanatorium (Lufthaus) has been built by the German colony in Haifa.

These colonists pursue agriculture on the slopes of Mount Carmel, and, by their success in vine-culture especially, have demonstrated the possibility of bringing back to the scene of their labours some portion of its ancient prosperity.

6. Literature. 2. A town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. 15.55) (χερμελ [BAL]), the scene of incidents in the life of Saul (1 S. 15.12) and David (1 S. 25.2 ff.).² The gentile חֶרְמֵל, Carmelite (καρμηλῖος), is applied to David's wife ABIGAIL [q.v., 1] (2 S. 22. καρμηλιτου [A], etc.) and to HEZRO (1 Ch. 11.37). The town is mentioned (Χερμαλα, Carmela) by Eus. and Jer. (OS 110.3272.6 f.) as situated 10 m. from Hebron, and as having a Roman garrison. It is the modern Karmal, 2887 ft. above the sea-level, about 8 m. SE. from Hebron (according to Robinson, who thinks Eusebius and Jerome have exaggerated the distance; see also Palestine Survey map, sheet xxiv.). Robinson speaks of the ruins as 'extensive'; the principal ruin is that of the castle, which he assigns to Herod or the Romans, but Conder to 12th century A.D. The site is upon the edge of the wilderness of Judæa; but to the west the land is broad and fertile, not unlike scenes of upland agriculture in Scotland. The name Carmel is therefore suitable. There are many remains of vineyard terraces, and a reservoir.

CARMĪ (כַּרְמִי, § 70; χάρμη[ε] [BAFL]), apparently shortened from Beth-hac-cerem³ or Beth-haccarmi [see TAHCHEMONITE], and note in Josh. 15.59 the name Carēm (καρεμ [BAL]).

³ In that case it cannot be compared with the Nab. n. pr. כַּרְמִי.

CARPUS (καρπος [Ti. WH]) appears to have been Paul's host at Troas; it was with him that the apostle left the cloak and books mentioned in 2 Tim. 4:13. He is named in the lists of 'the seventy disciples of our Lord' compiled by the Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus (see DISCIPLE, § 3) as bishop of Beroëa in Thrace.

This English word, which has elsewhere in EV, with various special applications as indicated by the context, the obsolete sense of 'something carried,' is found in the sense of 'vehicle' in Lev. 15:9, RV^{mg}. The other renderings are based on the connection of כַּסְפִּיאַ with כֶּסֶף 'silver, money,' Ezra 8:17 (ἀργυρίω τοῦ τόπου [BA]) = 1 Esd. 8:45 [47]. It is doubtless the same as the Caspis, RV Caspin (see GERPHYRUN), of 2 Macc. 12:13 (καct[e]ιν [VA], Kaspa [Syr.]), a fortress described as strong and fenced about with walls and near a lake 2 stadia broad. These data suit the present el-Muzeirib, the great station on the Hajj road, which is not identified with any other OT name (but see ASHTAROTH, § 2), and in antiquity must have been a place of importance: its ancient name has not been recovered.

The identification of Casphon with Khisfin (see Furrer, in Riehm's HWB 1834 f.) is philologically improbable, and has no

CASSIA represents two Hebrew words. 1. קָזָה (Ex. 30:24 Ezek. 27:19†) appears, along with myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and olive oil, as an ingredient of the holy anointing oil. It is mentioned, along with bright iron and calamus, among the wares brought into the Tyrian market. The origin of the word is unknown, nor is it found in any of the cognate languages: some have thought that it reappears in the κισσά spoken of by Dioscorides (1:12) as one species of cassia.

QBAFL renders קָזָה in Ex. 30:24, where κασσία, ξυλαλόη, and κίσσος are mentioned in other MSS as alternative renderings: in Ezek. 27:19, where QBAQ omits, Aq. has σπαρίον, Syn. σπαρίη, and Theod. καίδα. Pesh. and Targ. identify it with the קָזָה or 'cassia' of Ps. 45:8 (see below).

Scholars are agreed that probably what is intended is some kind of cassia.

Celsius (2:186) notices the mention in Mish. AZ i. § 8 of קָזָה, 'white cassia,' as cultivated in Palestine; but this, according to Löw (349), must have been quite a different plant.

2. קָזָה Ps. 45:8 (9), the word which passed into Greek as κασία¹ and thence into other languages, is almost certainly a derivative of the root קָצַץ (= Ar. qada'a), to 'scrape'—properly 'to reduce to fine dust' (WRS in J. Phil. 167:1 f.). A 'powdered fragrant bark' is thus indicated. The word is too general to allow of certain identification with any particular species; but probably what is intended is something akin to the modern 'cassia bark' (i.e., the bark of other kinds of Cinnamomum than that which yields the true cinnamon). The use of the Heb. plural to denote a substance of this kind is natural.² The word in the singular is found as a female name; see KEZIAH.

Fl. and Hanb., Pharm. (2) 519, say: 'That cinnamon and cassia were extremely analogous is proved by the remark of Galen, that the finest cassia differs so little from the lowest quality of cinnamon that the first may be used for the second, provided a double weight of it be used.'

A very probable source of cassia is Cinnamomum iners, Bl. The Pharmacopoeia indica says: 'May be used as a substitute for Cinnamon, to which it can hardly be reckoned inferior. C. iners occurs in S. India and throughout the Malayan region. It yielded the 'cassia bark' once so largely exported from N. Canara. See CINNAMON.

CASTLE. Two buildings are distinguished in AV by this title: (1) the 'city' [rather, citadel] of David in 1 Ch. 11:5 (כַּסְנֵטִים) 7 (כַּסְנֵטִים), where RV harmonizes with 2 S. 5:7 by rendering 'strong hold,' and (2) the barracks (lit. camp) attached to the fort Antonia (Acts 21:34 37; παρεμβολή). See JERUSALEM, TEMPLE.

3. RV also gives the title to the birith (בֵּיתֶךָ) of Susa (AV 'palace'). See PALACE, SHUSHAN; also FORTRESS, TOWER.

4. The word is also used in AV, quite wrongly, for בֵּיתֶךָ frith, which is rather a nomad 'encampment' (so RV), Gen. 25:16 etc. (distinguished from חָצִירִים 'villages'). See CAMP, § 1, CATTLE, § 1 n.

CASTOR AND POLLUX, RV The Twin Brothers (Διοσκουρῶν [Ti. WH]; so RV^{mg}. 'Dioscouri'), the sign (παράσημον) of the Alexandrian ship in which Paul sailed from Melita to Puteoli (Acts 28:11). Castor and Pollux, the sons of Zeus and Leda and brothers of Helen, appear in heaven as the constellation Gemini.³ See STARS, § 3 f. They were the tutelary deities of sailors, and (it may be interesting to note) were held in especial veneration in the district of Cyrene, near Alexandria (Schol. Pind. Pyth. 56). Catullus (4:27)

³ A longer form is biraniyyah (only in plur.), 2 Ch. 17:12 27:4 (coupled with migdālīm, 'towers').

⁴ On their mythological forms see more fully EB (9) s.v., and Roscher s.v. 'Dioskuren.'

speaks of a boat dedicated to the same deities, and for other examples of names of ships see Smith's Class. Dict., s.v. 'Insigne.' It is probable that images of Castor and Pollux were fixed at the bow of Paul's ship, since it was customary for a ship to carry at the bow a representation of the sign which furnished the name (the insigne), and at the stern a representation of the tutelary deity (the tutela). Herod. (337) makes reference to the Pataikoi (origin doubtful), figures of hideous muscular dwarfs which the Phoenicians stuck up on the bows of their galleys (cp PHOENICIA, and see Perr. Chip. Phoen. 217 f., and note the illustration of such a galley, ib. 19).

CAT. Cats (EV) or rather WILD CATS (αἰλουροι)—for the context requires us to take αἰλ. in this sense—are mentioned in the 'Epistle of Jeremy' (Bar. 6.22) with bats, swallows, and birds, which alight upon the bodies and heads of idols. Wild cats (יִלְיָן) are recognised by the Tg. of Is. 13.22 (for יִלְיָן, see JACKAL 34.14 {for יִלְיָן, see JACKAL [4]}), but not of Hos. 9.6 (where 'ח is a faulty reading for יִלְיָן, 'thistles'). We must not infer from the lateness of these words that it was only at a late date that the Israelites became acquainted with wild cats. They no doubt knew the felis maniculata (the original of our own domestic cat), which to-day is very common on the E. of Jordan (though it is scarce on the W. side), and is found, indeed, throughout Africa, Arabia, Syria, and Palestine (Tristram).

We need not wonder that no reference is made in the OT to the domestic cat. The Egyptians themselves had probably tamed the wild cat only to a certain extent; it accompanies the fowler on his expeditions (see woodcuts in Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1236 f.). The stories of Herodotus (266) are absurd. Bastit, the goddess of Bubastus, was 'a cat or a tigress' (Maspero).

The rendering 'wild cats' in Tg. of Is. (see above) is not adopted by modern translators. All that we can be sure of is that the writers of the descriptions referred to had in view some definite wild animals. Wolves, hyenas, jackals, and wild cats (including 'martens') were in their minds; but it is not easy to distribute them among the various Hebrew terms. Many commentators, after Bochart (Hieros. 862), give 'wild cat' for Heb. יִלְיָן (Is. 13.21 34.14 Jer. 50.39 Ps. 74.14 [text doubted]). Certainly EV's 'wild beasts of the desert' (as if from חַיָּה) is inappropriate; the etymology assumed also is very doubtful. The ancient versions are inconsistent, and the Heb. writers would not have condemned them. See JACKAL, WOLF.

CATECHISE (קָטַח) Prov. 22.6 אָנֹכִי; EV 'train up,' with which cp Lk. 14 mg., 'the things which thou wast taught (κατηχήθης) by word of mouth'; Acts 18.25 mg. 'taught by word of mouth (κατηχημένος) in the way of the Lord.' That oral instruction is meant by κατηχεῖν is undeniable; cp Jos. Vit. 65, 'when thou meetest me,' καὶ αὐτός σε πολλὰ κατηχήσω, 'I will inform thee of many things.'

The Revisers of the OT seem to have thought that such a peculiar word as קָטַח may have had a technical meaning such as κατηχεῖν at length acquired. In MH a derivative of קָטַח (קָטַח) means the 'gradual introduction of children into religious practice'; e.g., 'Wherein consists the child's training (קָטַח), Yoma 82a, with reference to the fasting on the Day of Atonement. Certainly the word קָטַח elsewhere always has a technical meaning. It seems to mean religious initiation or dedication, whether of a person (so perhaps קָטַח Gen. 14.14) or of a building (see DEDICATE; cp קָטַח, Enoch). The first part of Prov. 1.6 is very obscure, and probably corrupt (see Che. Exp. T. Sept. 1399). Oral instruction there doubtless was in the post-exilic period to which Proverbs seems to belong (see EDUCATION, § 1); but קָטַח is not one of the technical words of the wise men for communicating instruction.

CATERPILLER (קָטָן), Ps. 105.34, etc., AV, RV CANKERWORM, see LOCUST, § 2 (6), and (קָטָן) 1 K. 8.37 etc. EV, see LOCUST, § 2 (9).

CATHUA (ΚΟΥΑ [B], ΚΑΘΟΥΑ [A], ΓΕΔΔΗΛ? [L]), a family of NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9) 1 Esd. 5.30, unmentioned in || Ezra 2.47 Neh. 7.49, unless the name may be identified with GAHAR (גַּחַר for גַּחַר?), or perhaps with GIDDEL [q.v.].

CATTLE.¹ The nomad origin of the Semites is plain from the fact that numerous words relating to the life and associations of nomads (e.g., ox, 1. Nomadic life, sheep, etc.) are common to all the dialects. In the case of the b'ne Israel, not only idioms and figures of speech, but also old traditional names and even direct statements, confirm the view, which is in itself highly probable. Note, for example, the name RACHEL, 'the ewe' (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 311), and the description of Abram as a 'nomad Aramæan' (אֲרָמִי Dt. 26.5). A still earlier ancestor, JABAL (the name is again significant), is called the 'father'—i.e., founder—of nomadic life (Gen. 4.20; cp CAINITES, § 11).

It is important at the outset to bear in mind the difference between nomads ('tent-dwellers,' Gen. 1.2) and those who have settled down as agriculturists. Of the constantly recurring struggle between these two classes a vivid picture is presented in the narrative of Zeeb and Zalmunna (Judg. 8), chiefs of the Midianites, a people which, as depicted in the OT, may serve as a good illustration of the nomad class. The difference between the two classes may not be complete; for traces of nomadic origin will continue to be visible, even after the shepherd's tower, or the cattle kraal, with its nucleus of tents,² has developed by successive stages into the fortified city (צָרָה; see 2 K. 17.9 18.8 and cp Benz. HA 125 f.). It is equally important to remember that the state of civilisation of a settled people is not readily assimilated by those on a lower grade. The importance of this in its bearing on the early history of Israel can hardly be exaggerated³: with the b'ne Israel the transition from the nomadic to the settled state was a long process. The compilers and expanders of the patriarchal legends shrink from representing their heroes as pure nomads: they feel that, if so represented, these heroes would be grossly inadequate types of their far-off descendants. We have, however, evidence that the later Israelites had, in the more northern parts of their own land, representatives of the old nomadic life in all its simplicity (see RECHABITES).

The words commonly employed in Hebrew to denote cattle in general are:

1. מִקְנֵה, mikneh (cp מִקְנֵה, 'property'), EV usually 'cattle' (so מִקְנֵה שֵׂנִי, 'nomads,' Gen. 46.32), a term denoting 'possession,' comprising, therefore, the things which are the usual and almost peculiar property of nomads.

2. Names for cattle. It is used, accordingly, in a much wider sense than צֶמֶד (EV 'flock'; but AV 'cattle,' Gen. 30.40 etc.), which denotes the small cattle, sheep, and goats, or sheep alone (cp 1 S. 25.2). Mikneh does not include, however, servants; nor, as a rule, horses or asses (but see Ex. 9.3 Job 1.3).

2. מִקְנֵה, dhēmalah, kthnos, includes all the larger domestic animals: in Neh. 2.12 14 it means a saddle-animal. It is usually contrasted with man, wild beasts (חַיָּה, kthnos), birds, and crawling things (cp Ps. 148.10). The word is not, however, free from vagueness, for it may be applied to wild animals, and even (in plur. form) to an imaginary animal (see BEHEMOTH, §§ 1, 3).

3. חֵרֶף, de'ir, kthnos ('cattle' Nu. 20.4 Ps. 78.48), 'beast,' used of beasts of burden (Gen. 45 17 cp 44 3 13) and of cattle generally. The Ar. ba'trūn is used of both the camel and the ass.

² מִקְנֵה, properly the circular encampment of nomadic tribes: cp Gen. 25.16 Ezek. 25.4.

4. מִלְלָה mīllā'hhah 'property' (cp Ex. 22 7 [6], 10 [9]), used of cattle in Gen. 33 14 and, as including them, in 1 S. 15 9.

5. מִרְרִי mīr-rī 'fat cattle,' 1 K. 19 (RV fattling, cp μῆσχος meushos); generally used with מִרְרִי or מִרְרִי.

6. שֶׁה seh, rendered 'small cattle' or 'cattle' in Is. 43 23 Ezek. 34 17, is the nom. unitatis to מִרְרִי, see SHEEP.

7. אֱלֶפֶת ālāphēm (pl.), 'oxen'; cp Prov. 14 4 Is. 30 24, etc.

To denote the animals of the bovine kind the Hebrews used:

(a) בָּקָר bāqār, a generic word, which frequently occurs in parallelism with מִרְרִי. It is often used individually (cp בָּקָרָא, a single ox or calf; see Gen. 18 7), and frequently employed to define a word more closely—e.g., with מִרְרִי Lev. 9 2, 7 Ex. 29 1. Its usual nom. unit. is מִרְרִי, used without reference to age or to gender, to denote an ox or cow. It is used of a young calf in Ex. 22 30 [29], Lev. 22 23, and is once collective, Gen. 32 5 [6]. (b) פָּרָה pārāh, fem. פָּרָה pārāh, bull, cow, defined by בָּקָר Ex. 29 1 and used of a seven-year-old, Judg. 6 25. (c) עֵגְלָה egālāh, fem. עֵגְלָה egālāh, a calf, used of a three-year-old (Gen. 15 9 cp Is. 15 5), and also of a young cow that already gives milk (Is. 7 2); see HEIFER. (d) אֲדִיר ādīr 'mighty,' used poetically of oxen (Is. 34 7), but also of horses (Jer. 8 16, etc.).

With regard to the practices of ancient nomadic pastoral peoples we are but ill-informed. It is probable

3. Breeding. that formerly (as now in Arabia) the same clan would not breed more than one kind of domestic animal. There is still a broad distinction between the camel-breeding tribes of the upland plains and the shepherd tribes of the mountains (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 311). The steppes of E. Palestine have always been more suitable for sheep and goats, and the northern mountains for oxen. E. of the Jordan, however, cattle were turned loose,¹ and, becoming wild, acquired a name for their ferocity and from their habit of gathering in circles round any object that attracted their attention (Ps. 22 12 [13] f.). At the present day shepherds frequent the cool mountain-heights in the summer, and find late in the autumn an abundant supply of green leaves and twigs for their sheep and goats in the cedars round Lebanon and Baalbek.

The parts of Palestine which were most suitable for the pasturing of herds—the parts which deserve the name of מִדְבָּרָא (Nu. 32 1 4)—were those situated to the E. of Jordan (the modern region of Belkā) and in the S. plains of Judah. The enormous tribute paid annually by Meša, 'the shepherd' (מִשְׁעָה), attests the richness of the country (cp Nu. 1 2 c.). Places specially mentioned in connection with herds and flocks are Carmel (1 S. 25 2), Shechem (Gen. 37 12), Dothan (Gen. 37 17), Sharon (1 Ch. 27 29 Is. 65 10), Tekoa (Am. 1 1), Gedor (1 Ch. 4 39), Bethlehem (1 S. 16 11), Midian (Nu. 31 32 cp vv. 8 f.), Edom (Is. 34 6), and Kedar (Ezek. 27 21).

In prehistoric times there were several kinds of oxen, all wild: a European bison, Bison bonasus, Linn., still preserved in the forests of SE. Europe; the

4. Species. Urus, Bos primigenius, and Bos longifrons, now extinct, probably belonging to the same race as our Bos taurus or domesticated oxen. Our modern cattle are derived from the last-named. In Palestine at the present day horned cattle are found only where fresh pastures are easily accessible. In the wilderness S. of Judah horned cattle of a rather undersized kind may be seen in great numbers. Farther to the N. there is a larger and better bred race, used for tilling. These, as a rule, belong to the same species as our cattle, the Bos taurus. N. of Esdraelon there is a light-coloured and stalwart variety usually known as the Armenian. In the valley of the Jordan, especially towards the N., there is a species of Indian buffalo, Bos bubalis (Ar. gūmūs), a clumsy animal with remarkably long horns (generally flattened and angulated). From its size and general appearance the species has been confounded with the ancient rē'im (see UNICORN); but it belongs to comparatively recent times. It has been introduced into several of the Mediterranean countries—e.g., Egypt, Asia Minor, and Italy. E. of the Jordan horned cattle are rare (Tristram, Moab, 251), although the best country for them is said to be there (cp Buhl, Pal. 60).

Cattle-breeding holds a large place upon the Egyptian monuments; their evidence goes to show that the so-called Zebu was most common, and that several species of it were bred. The long-horned kind generally had their horns bent like a lyre or, less commonly, in the shape of a crescent. Short-horns appear rarely in the Old Empire, but are more frequent in later times. Another kind was hornless; it is never represented as ploughing and threshing, and hence may have been regarded as belonging to a 'fancy' class.

A new kind appears in the New Empire. It has horns somewhat wide apart, and bears a big hump.

We have no means of ascertaining any of the ancient methods of breeding (a certain kind of which is prohibited by the law in Lev. 19 19) or of rendering horned cattle tractable. They were

5. Cattle-rearing. the earliest of domesticated animals. They preceded by a long time the domestication of the sheep. The bones of one species, the Bos primigenius or Urus, have been found in the remains of the neolithic Swiss lake-dwellings.

The pastures were probably free to all comers, since in primitive times there was hardly any property in land. A pasture is useless without a watering-place (cp Judg. 1 5, where the importance of the possession of water is clearly shown; see Moore, ad loc.), and property in water is doubtless older and of more importance (cp WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 104 f.). The right to a pasture was obtained by digging a well; and, among the Hebrews as among the Arabians, the wayfarer was always allowed to water his beasts so long as he did not hinder the owners of the water.¹ See SPRINGS. The district upon which cattle pastured is called מִדְבָּרָא, lit. 'place for feeding.' Cp דְּבִיר 1 K. 4 23 [24]; מִדְבָּרָא 'a broad pasture' (Is. 30 23) is doubtful (SHOT). מִדְבָּרָא (EV 'desert,' 'wilderness') denotes properly a pasturing ground where herds are driven, from דָּבַר 'to drive (herds)'; cp BDB Lex. s.v. דָּבַר.²

Other words to denote the pasturing ground are מִדְבָּרָא the pastoral abode (gen. rendered 'pasture,' or 'sheep-cote,' once 'stable,' Ezek. 25 5 EV). Similarly מִדְבָּרָא couching-place, Jer. 50 6 (Prov. 24 15 of an abode of men). To denote more narrowly confined areas, we find מִדְבָּרָא sheep-folds (1 S. 24 3 Zeph. 2 6, etc.), מִדְבָּרָא an enclosure (Mi. 2 12), מִדְבָּרָא (Gen. 33 17) 'booths,' temporary night-shelters (see below).

When required to be specially fattened, cattle were withdrawn from the open pastures and kept in a stable מִדְבָּרָא. See Am. 6 4 1 S. 28 24 Jer. 46 21 Mal. 4 2 (3 20); 'stall,' lit. a place for tying up; cp also מִדְבָּרָא (Hab. 3 17) and מִדְבָּרָא (Hab. 3 17 Ps. 50 9 78 70) 'fold.'

The pens⁴ are called מִדְבָּרָא (Ps. 68 13 [14] RV 'sheepfolds,' AV 'pots'), or מִדְבָּרָא (Judg. 5 16 Gen. 40 14), properly perhaps 'double-pens.' Moore (on Judg. 5 16) and Che. (on Ps. 68 13) prefer the sense 'dung-heaps.'

The manger or crib is אֹמֶס (Is. 13 cp 1 K. 27 13 15 φάτρην), whence the denominative אֹמֶס 'fattened,'

² Similarly, מִדְבָּרָא, the common-lands of a city (especially a Levitical one), in Nu. 35 2 'suburbs' (EV), is perhaps originally 'place of driving' (BDB); cp RV margin, 'pasture-lands.' Che. doubts the sense of 'driving' and proposes a fresh explanation, making the word practically syn. with מִדְבָּרָא 'field.' Hence the applied sense 'reserved land'—i.e., belonging to the community or to the sanctuary. See JQR, July 1898, p. 566.

applied to oxen (Prov. 15:17; and also birds 1 K. 4:23 [53]). To eat the 'stalled ox' (which was looked upon as a luxury; cp Prov. 15:17) is termed a reproach by Amos (Am. 6:4)—himself once a herdsman.

Apart from the ordinary herbage (רֶקֶת, Nu. 22:4 עֵשֶׂב), cattle had special food (קֶסֶף), which was either chopped straw (תָּבַן) or 'mixed fodder' (בָּלִיל;¹ cp Job 6:5) made more palatable by the addition of salt, or a salt herb (בָּלִיל הַחֵיץ, Is. 30:24).

From the references in the OT we are able to gain a fairly clear idea as to the duties and customs of those who had charge over cattle.

6. Shepherds, etc.

The usual word to denote such an occupation is רֹעֶה (or צֹמֵר; less frequently שֹׁמֵר, and נֹקֵר (for the last see SHERR). By far the greater number of references deal, as we should naturally expect, with the tending of sheep and goats, and the specific word for a 'cattle-man' (בֹּקֵר) occurs only once (Amos 7:14).

The shepherd, clad in a simple garment (Jer. 43:12) like the mod. Ar. burnus, goes forth at the head of his flock (עֶרֶךְ; cp Jn. 10:4), all of which know his voice and respond to the name he gives them (ib. v. 3). He takes with him his shepherd's bag (בֶּלִי הָרָעִים, 1 S. 17:40) or wallet (לִקְוֹת, ib., EV SCRIP), staff (מִקְלָה, see esp. Gen. 32:10 [11]; and cp שֹׁמֵר עֶרְשֶׁת, Ps. 23:4), and, as a means of defence, a sling (זֶלְזֶל, 1 S. 17:40). He 'gently leads' his flocks (נִיחַל, Is. 40:11 Ps. 23:2) to the best pastures, where he makes them lie down by streams (Ps. 23:2);² though it must be admitted that the reading in Ps. 23:2 is uncertain (see Che. Ps. (2)). The dangers from wild beasts³ (e.g., lions, Is. 31:4 1 S. 17:34) and nomadic marauders (Job 1:14 17) were very real. No doubt there was the solace of the pastoral record⁴ (see Judg. 5:16, and cp Job 21:12 1 S. 16:18), and later writers speak of the sheep-dog (Job 30:1 Is. 56:10 f., see DOG, § 1), well known to the Assyrians. By night the shepherd had to keep watch in the open air (Lk. 28, cp Nah. 3:18); but sometimes a temporary shelter was made (Ass. tarbasu = תַּרְבָּסָא and mašallā are so explained), whence 'shepherd's tent' (אֶתֶל רֹעֶה, Is. 38:12; cp מִשְׁכַּנְתוֹ הָרֹעֶה, Cant. 1:8) becomes the type of an uncertain dwelling-place.⁵ In other cases towers were built for the shepherds (cp Gen. 35:21, and see 2 Ch. 26:10); traces of them are to be found at the present day. The 'duars' in the Sinaitic peninsula consist of stone towers put together without mortar, and bear a striking resemblance to the 'Talayôt' of the Balearic Isles, and to the beehive-shaped houses of Scotland. They are enclosed by low walls of massive rough stones, and are occupied by cattle (cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 352 f.; see also Doughty, Ar. Des. 1:13). The sheepfolds also, as their name implies, were surrounded by walls (cp Jn. 10:1).

When the shepherd returned to his master the sheep were carefully counted by being made to pass under the staff (cp Lev. 27:32 Jer. 33:13 Ezek. 20:37)—a representation of the shepherd 'telling his tale' is not infrequent on Egyptian monuments. As for wages, it may be doubted whether the practice described in Gen. 30:28 f. was usual: possibly the usual reward was the milk of the flocks (see 1 Cor. 9:7—cp, on the other hand, Zech. 11:13, which speaks of a money payment).

³ Similarly in Assyria: cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 767 f.

⁴ Cp the illustration from Assyria, Maspero, l.c. The shepherd seated plays upon a reed to the delight of his dog.

⁵ At the present day a sheep-pen is made of boughs. It is called hazīra (see HAZOR), and the trail of boughs in the sandy desert is always a sign of the nomad mansil (encampment); cp Doughty, Ar. Des. 2:200 f.

The status of the shepherd varies according to the society in which he lives. Among primitive pastoral peoples the sheikh himself, or even his daughters, tend the flocks (cp Gen. 29:9 Ex. 2:16—17. 6:423), as is the case at the present day in various parts of the Sinaitic peninsula (see Kn.-Di. Ex., ad loc.). The early kings of Israel owned large flocks, and the post of chief shepherd (cp שֹׁמֵר הָרֶקֶת, Gen. 47:6, also 1 Ch. 27:29 1 Pet. 5:4, ἀρχιπολυμν, and magister regii pecoris, Liv. 1:4) was important and full of dignity. Hence the designation 'shepherd' (רֹעֶה) was a noble one and was used of the kings of Israel (Jer. 23:4, cp רֹעֶה 'to rule' 2 S. 5:2) as well as of those of Assyria, and becomes the origin of the beautiful NT phrase 'the good shepherd.' Perhaps it is inevitable that the adoption of a more settled mode of life should be unfavourable to the repute of the shepherd. To the Egyptians, for more than one reason, shepherds were an 'abomination' (Gen. 46:34: cp ABOMINATION, 4); 'Asiatic' (i.e., barbarian) and 'shepherd' were to them synonymous terms (see EGYPT, § 31). Similarly in Palestine, as the Jews advanced in prosperity, the prestige of the shepherd's calling diminished. In Rabbinical times a shepherd was precluded from bearing witness, because one who must have fed his flocks upon the pastures of others would naturally be dishonest (cp Sanh. 25a, Jos. Ant. xvii. 107).

Besides the use to which cattle were put in ploughing and threshing (see AGRICULTURE, § 8), they were also used as draught animals (cp 1 S. 6:7 f.). Their MILK (גָּזָא) formed one of the main articles of diet, and their skins were used for clothing (see LEATHER, WOOL). Pastoral life probably meant usually a diet of milk and game; and the use of cattle for food was somewhat restricted (see Rel. Sem. (2) 296 f.). The young animal was, however, preferred and considered a special dainty. At the present day, it is said, the sheep is eaten only at festivals, and goat-flesh is not used as food save by the very poor. In sacrifices cattle were frequently used, and huge hecatombs are mentioned in connection with the temple services¹ (cp 1 K. 8:63 2 Ch. 5:6 7:5 29:33 etc.).

Cattle, being almost the only property of nomads, become, among primitive people, a medium of exchange. When the first coins were made in Greece, this was commemorated by stamping the head of an ox upon the ingot. Cattle and wealth are, therefore, almost synonymous terms.

Cp בְּרִיטָה 'possession' and Ass. sugullatu 'herd'; קֶקֶה 'cattle,' and נֶקֶהִים and Syr. نَحْمَس and نَحْمَس orig. an animal for riding (Nestle, ZDMG 33, 707 [79]; pecus and pecunia; κτήνος and κτήμα).

The earliest legislation (Ex. 20-23) was intended for a people who, having advanced beyond the pastoral stage, were occupied chiefly in agriculture.

9. Treatment of cattle.

The prominence given to the ox, the sheep, and the ass is as noticeable as the absence of all reference to the horse and the camel. Remarkable also is the humanity which characterises these regulations. Cattle are not to be muzzled (בֶּקֶר, cp מִקְלָה) while threshing (Dt. 25:4)—a law which holds good to the present day (cp Dr. ad loc.), and was in vogue in Egypt, where one sees representations of an ox and an ass threshing unmuzzled (cp Erm. Eg. 432, and see AGRICULTURE, § 8). According to another enactment, oxen were not to work upon the sabbath (Ex. 23:12). Notwithstanding the strictness of the sabbath, it was customary to water the cattle on that day (Lk. 13:15). Other laws respecting cattle-stealing and damages caused by oxen are given in Ex. 21:28 f.; cp ib. 22:10 [9] f. The law dealing with the case in which a beast entrusted to one's care has been maimed or torn (Ex. 22:10 [9] f.) provides that the production of the maimed part is to suffice as a guarantee of good faith and that no restitution is to be required (see DEPOSIT). It was, therefore, to the advantage of the shepherd to be able to produce a leg or a piece of an ear as a proof (cp Am. 3:12). Jacob, however, declares to Laban that instead of producing 'that which was torn of beasts' (עֲרֵבָה) he has made good the loss himself (Gen. 31:39).

The early Semites, like other pastoral peoples, paid great reverence to cattle, their kinship with whom they long continued to recognise. This gives additional point to Nathan's parable: the ewe lamb was, to a poor man who nourished it, more nearly a daughter¹ than it could be in later times. No doubt the special veneration for cattle was connected with the idea that man owes his food in large measure to them (cp WRS L.C.).

A full treatment of this subject would lead us too far. Nor can we consider here the Israelitish form of the legend of the 'Golden Age' (cp Hesiod, Works and Days, 109 ff.), and the contrast between J's description of the peace between man and the lower animals (cp Is. 11:6 f.) and P's representations of man as their lord and master. The worship of the domestic animals is another subject which invites attention. The most ancient evidence for it is supplied by the Babylonian zodiacal mythology.² In Egypt, too, the worship of sacred animals takes us back to an incalculable antiquity. Witness, for example, the bull-worship of Memphis and other cities (see EGYPT, § 14), which has been connected with Israelitish idolatry. Notice, too, the worship of the cow Ha'thor, the 'lady of heaven,' which reminds us of the cow-headed Ashtoreth of Sidon. See further CALF, GOLDEN; ASHTORETH; AZAZEL; CLEAN, § 17.³

CAUDA (καυδά [Ti. WH]), Acts 27:16. See CLAUDA.

CAUL (properly a close-fitting cap or net-work), as applied to an article of dress, occurs as the EV rendering of שֵׁבִיטִים Is. 3:18 (mg. 'networks,' as though = שֵׁבִיט; ΕΜΠΛΟΚΙΑ). To complete the parallelism of the verse, we should read, with Schroeder and others, שֵׁבִיטִים, 'little suns'; see NECKLACE, n.

In its anatomical sense, 'caul' in Hos. 13:8 ([עֲרֵבָה] שֶׁנָּה; συγκλεισμός καρδίας) apparently refers to the pericardium. It is used similarly in Ex. 29:13 Lev. 3:4, 10:15 etc. to render עֲרֵבָה (lit. 'excess'; Ε λοβός), an uncertain expression which has occasioned difficulty from the earliest times. It denotes probably 'the fatty mass at the opening of the liver which reaches to the kidneys, and becomes visible upon the removal of the "lesser omentum," or membrane extending from the fissures of the liver to the curve of the stomach' (Dr. Lev. SBOT, ET). On the Vss., and various interpretations, cp Di-Rys. on Lev. 3:4 and, on the probable reason of the choice of this particular part of the body for offerings, see LIVER.

CAVES (מְעָרָה, mē'ārāh; CΠΗΛΑΙΟΝ; spelunca). The limestone strata of Syria and Palestine readily lend themselves to the formation of caves and ravines. The springs issuing from limestone rock generally contain carbonate of lime, and most of them yield a large quantity of free carbonic acid upon exposure to the air. To the erosive effect of water charged with this acid, combined with the mechanical action of the sand and stones carried along by the currents, the formation of caves and ravines in such rocks is chiefly to be ascribed.

² On the 'Bull' of the Zodiac, which is the Bab. Gud-an-na (equivalent to our Taurus, or else to Aldebaran), see Jensen, Kosmol. 62 ff.

⁴ The old view that yāthereth was the greater lobe of the lung has nothing in its favour.

What are now ravines have in many cases originally been subterranean watercourses, which have been unroofed by the degradation of the rock. Some of the Syrian caverns are of great size; Strabo, for example (756), speaks of the σπήλαια βαθύστομα of Ituraea, and mentions one capable of holding 4000 men. Books of travel, from William of Tyre and Quaresmius onwards, abound with references to such caves and the local traditions respecting them (Tavernier, Maundrell, Shaw, Robinson). Those of Palestine are frequently mentioned in the Bible as places of refuge and shelter for the terror-stricken (Is. 219 Rev. 6:15 cp Zech. 14:5), the outlawed (David), the oppressed and the persecuted (Judg. 6:1 S. 13:6 1 K. 18:13 19:13 Ezek. 33:27 2 Macc. 6:11 Heb. 11:38), and the criminal (Jer. 7:11 Mk. 11:17 and ||), and as places of sepulture (Gen. 23:11 Jn. 11:38). Whether the word Horite¹ means 'cave-dwellers' has been questioned; yet that in many parts of Palestine the earlier inhabitants continued to use caves not only as storehouses but also as dwelling-places cannot be doubted. Of their connection with worship in pre-Christian times there is little or no direct evidence. Still, it appears safe to hold 'that the oldest Phœnician temples were natural or artificial grottoes, and that the sacred as well as the profane monuments of Phœnicia, with their marked preference for monolithic forms, point to the rock-hewn cavern as the original type that dominated the architecture of the region' (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 197), and it is probable that the Greek μέγαρον was borrowed from the Phœnician מְעָרָה (ib. 200). The association of so many of the Christian sacred sites in Palestine (e.g., Birth of Mary, Annunciation, Meeting of Mary and Elizabeth, Birth of the Baptist, Transfiguration and Agony of Christ, Repentance of Peter) with grottoes is the arbitrary invention of legend-mongers. See, further, MAARATH, MEARAH, HEIRON (Machpelah), MAKKEDAH, ETAM, ELEUTHEROPOLIS; also ADULLAM (where it is shown that 'cave' ought to be read 'hold'), and (on the grotto of the Nativity) BETHLEHEM, § 4.

CEDAR (עֵדָב; κέδρος [BAL]), Cedrus Libani Loud., bears in Heb. a name which is found also in Aramaic, Arabic, and Ethiopic, and is probably derived from a root signifying 'to be firm' or 'well-rooted', of which another derivative might be the עֵדָבָה² of Ezek. 27:24. It appears that Aram. 'arsā and Ar. 'ars, like κέδρος,³ may denote not only the cedar, but also the juniper (Juniperus Oxycedrus), and, possibly, pines of various sorts.⁴ It may be, then, that עֵדָב is not to be strictly confined to Cedrus Libani;⁵ but it is highly probable that this tree, which has been associated with Lebanon from early times, is the one usually intended,⁶ and in such a passage as Is. 41:19 the cedar is expressly distinguished from other conifers. OT writers employ the cedar as a type of beauty (Nu. 24:6), majesty (2 K. 14:9), strength (Ps. 29:5), and loftiness (2 K. 19:23). The wood, which was much more precious than that of common trees like the sycamore (1 K. 10:27), was largely used in the construction of great buildings like the temple (see also ALTAR, § 8) and Solomon's palace; cedar

³ On this see the Index to Schneider's Theophrastus, s.v. κέδρος.

⁴ So in modern times we are told of el-Ars — 'in the mouth of uneducated Syrians it designates one of the pines, Pinus halepensis, which grows in great numbers on the mountains' (Journ. Linn. Soc. 15:247).

beams were most highly esteemed for covering interiors (Cant. 1.7 Jer. 22.14). The use made of this wood in the ceremony of cleansing the leper (Lev. 14.4 ff.) or the person rendered unclean by contact with a dead body (Nu. 19.6), seems to be due to the esteem in which it was held for durability and incorruptibility (see Di. on Lev. 14, Nowack, HA 2.289). See CLEAN, § 16 f.

Of the existing cedars of Lebanon the first accurate account was that given by Sir J. D. Hooker in Nat. Hist. Rev., 1862, pp. 11-18. The group which he visited was that in the Kadisha valley, N. of Beirut, near the summit of Lebanon (Dahr el Kodib). He found there about 400 trees, disposed in nine groups—the trees varying from about 18 inches to upwards of 50 feet in girth.

Another interesting account is that of Dr. Leo Anderlind, who visited them in 1884.¹ He speaks of three groups—one at Baruk, a second 4 m. ESE. of Bsherre, and the third 18½ m. N. of that place. It is the second of these, the same that Hooker visited, which he particularly describes. The greatest height of any of the trees, he says, is about 82 ft.; but the majority are between 46 and 72 ft. The oldest of them were the strongest trees he had ever seen.

According to Tristram (NHB 344), 'at least nine distinct localities are now ascertained.'

[According to Dr. Post (Hastings' DB 2364), it is uncertain what tree is meant by 'arāzin in Nu. 24.6. He remarks that 'the cedar of Lebanon does not grow in moist places,' but 'seeks the dry sloping mountain side, where nothing but the moisture in the clefts of the rocks nourishes it.' He concludes, therefore, that 'unless we suppose that the location of the 'arāzin is poetic licence, we must suppose some water-loving tree to be intended in this passage.' It was well to bring forward this difficulty, which is overlooked by Di. The remedy lies close at hand. Usage requires that the 'cedars' should be described as the trees which Yahweh planted. We have to read in אֲרִיזִים 'like cedars' and in בָּרוּשִׁים 'like poplars' (Che. Exp. T. 10.401 b [June '99]).]

CEILING, in modern house-architecture, means the covering of a room which hides the joists of the floor above, or the rafters of the roof. Down to the seventeenth century, however, the word was applied also to the inner lining of the walls of a room, and in modern shipbuilding it still denotes the inside planking of a ship's bottom (see New Eng. Dict. s.v.). The Hebrew words (see below) rendered 'ceiling,' 'ceiling,' in EV are to be taken in this more extended sense. See further, CHAMBER, HOUSE, TEMPLE.

AVmg RV (cp συγκαλεισμός [Qmg.]) is a guess. In late Heb., Syr., etc. חֲבִיתָא denotes 'shop' (cp ἐργαστήρια [Aq.], ergastulium) or 'tavern.' Moreover the form is difficult (Evan, Dan. 30, n. 1). חֲבִיתָא (BAQ, חֲבִיתָא, [N], al. חֲבִיתָא) points to the CELOSRYIA (κοιλῆς κυρία [BAL]), 1 Esd. 2.17, RV CCELESRYIA.

CENCHREA, or rather, RV, CENCHREÆ (κενχρεῖαι [Ti. WH]). A town and harbour on the Saronic gulf, now marked by the village of Kichries. It served as the eastern port of Corinth, which lay about seven miles (Str. 380, says 70 stadia) to the west, just as Lechæum was the port for the Italian trade. Strabo calls Cenchreæ a village (κώμη), which indicates its subordination to Corinth: it was, in fact, merely a landing-place for goods and passengers.

About 4 m. to the north, at Schœnus (modern Kalamaki), was the δόλος or tramway upon which vessels of small tonnage made the passage from the one sea to the other (ῥὸ στενωπὸν τοῦ Ἰσθμοῦ: Str. 335, 369: cp Thuc. 8.7, Pol. 4.19, Dio Cass. 51.5). The idea of substituting for it a canal cut through the Isthmus was very ancient. The scheme was entertained in turn by Periander, Demetrius Poliorcetes, Julius Caesar, Caligula, Nero, and Herodes Atticus. Nero actually began the work in 67 A.D., about the time of Paul's final visit to Corinth. Vespasian sent him six thousand Jewish prisoners from Galilee (Jos. B. iii. 10.10). Traces of this cutting were to be seen on the line which has been adopted by the modern engineers who have brought this χρόνου μέγα ἀγώνισμα to completion (1881-1893).

Half a mile to the SW. of the Saronic entrance to the canal are the remains of the Isthmian sanctuaries and Stadium which furnished Paul with the imagery of 1 Cor. 9.24-27.

The pines from which were cut the victors' garlands are mentioned by Strabo (380) and Pausanias (ii. 1.7). The road to Corinth led through groves of pine and cypress and was bordered with tombs—among them those of the Cynic Diogenes and the courtesan Lais (Paus. ii. 2.4). Coins (of Antoninus Pius) give a representation of the harbour of Cenchreæ flanked on either side by a temple, and containing a standing brazen colossus of Poseidon (Paus. ii. 2.3) and three ships. Coins of Hadrian show the two harbours, Lechæum and Cenchreæ, as nymphs turned opposite ways, each holding a rudder, inscribed ΛΕΧΗ., CENCH.

It was from Cenchreæ that Paul sailed at the close of his first visit to Achaia (Acts 18.18 cp 20.3). The voyage between Greece and Asia took a fortnight in Cicero's case (Ep. ad Att. 5.13 6.9); but he sailed slowly (cp Thuc. 3.3). Phœbe, a deaconess of the church at Cenchreæ, 'carried under the folds of her robe the whole future of Christian theology' (Renan, Saint Paul, 219), for to her, on the eve of her departure to Italy on her private affairs, Paul entrusted his letter to the church at Rome (Rom. 16.1 2).¹ See Frazer, Pausanias, 37 f. He and his army were put to flight, near Modin, by Judas and John, the two sons of Simon the Maccabee (1 Macc. 15.38-16.10). According to Zöckler, he is the Cendā of the Arabian legends, a N. Ar. prince hostile to the Jews (cp Blau, ZDMG 25.577). Schürer (GV 1, § 7, n. 31), however, derives Cendebeus (as also κανδυβέυς) from the Lycian town κάνδυβα.

CHAFF (חִיף etc.). See AGRICULTURE, §§ 9, 15.

CHAINS is the word used in EV in translating Hebrew terms which signify (1) ornaments and insignia, and (2) means of confinement and punishment. Though chains were no doubt well known to the early Semites, it is chiefly the latter variety that we find depicted upon the monuments; actual remains, moreover, have been found in excavating (Place, Ninive, iii. pl. 70). Chains for confinement consisted of rings around each foot joined together by a single link; the arms were similarly treated (see Botta, Monuments de Ninive, i. pl. 82).

1. Chains were worn as articles of adornment upon the foot (חֲנִיכִי, see ANKLETS, BRACELET, 5), arm (שֶׁרֶת, see BRACELET, 4), and neck (חֲנִיכִי, שֶׁרֶת, see NECKLACE). For chains such as were worn by Joseph and Daniel, as expressive of rank (בִּדְרִי), and Bibl.-Aram. חֲנִיכִי, see NECKLACE. To denote some kind of architectural ornamentation we find חֲנִיכִי, 1 K. 6 21 (Kr. חֲנִיכִי; Ezek. 7 23, doubtful), and שֶׁרֶת, 1 K. 7 17 2 Ch. 3 16 (cp 2 Ch. 35), see PILLAR, TEMPLE. Of these Heb. words the former is used in Is. 40 19 (חֲנִיכִי, text doubtful) of the chains fastening an idol, the latter denotes the chain worn upon the high-priest's ephod (שֶׁרֶת, Ex. 28 22, שֶׁרֶת, 39 15; κροσσός [BAF], κροσσ. [L]; also Ex. 28 14 κροσσ[σ]ωτός [BAFL]); see BREASTPLATE, ii., EPHOD, OUCHES. For chain-armour see BREASTPLATE, i.

2. As a means of confinement, ropes or cords were perhaps more commonly employed. For chains the general term is חֲנִיכִי Nah. 3 10, etc., or, with closer reference to the material, בָּרֶזֶק, 'fetters of iron' (Ps. 149 8)—both, in parallelism, in Ps. 105 18. Other terms are צִנֵּן (COLLAR, 3) and בְּרִיחַ, 'brass' (Lam. 3 7).² The use of the latter in the dual בְּרִיחִים, Judg. 16 21 2 S. 8 34, etc.) does not necessarily imply the binding of both hands and feet by these bronze fetters. The Greek words are δεσμός (Jude 6), σείρα (2 Pet. 2), πείδη and αλυσος (in parallelism, Mk. 5 4 Lk. 8 29); the last-mentioned term is used in Acts 12 6, where the Roman custom of chaining a prisoner to two warders is exemplified. See PRISON.

CHALCEDONY. What the ancients understood by

1 The Aramaic form of this word (חֲלָקֶדֶן) is represented also in the new Hebrew חֲלָקֶדֶן, which became a regular word for chain, and meant also a chain for measuring.

2 The RV 'chains' for חֲנִיכִי 2 Ch. 33 11 is too bold. See MANASSEH.

CHALDEA, CHALDEAN

the word is uncertain. 1. It is met with only once in the Bible (Rev. 21 19; χαλκεδών [Ti.], χαλκηδών [WH]; others, καρχηδών; calcedonius). In modern mineralogy chalcedony is a variety of amorphous quartz 'semi-transparent or translucent; white, gray, blue, green, yellow, or brown; stalactitic, reniform, or botryoidal, and in pseudomorphs or petrifications' (Ency. Brit. (9) 16 389). The word chalcedony is usually applied to the white or gray variety, the brown chalcedony being known as the sard (SARDIUS), the red as the carnelian (see SARDIUS). The chalcedony also occurs in stratified forms; when white layers alternate with black it is called onyx (see ONYX). When the white alternate with others of red or brown colour it is called sardonix (see SARDONYX). Pliny, who lived not far from the time when the Apocalypse took shape, does not speak of the chalcedony as a distinct stone, but only of 'Calchedonii [or 'carched.] smaragdi' as an inferior kind of emerald, mentioning that the mountain in Chalcedon where these stones were gathered was in his day known by the name of 'Smaragdites' (HN 37 72-73). Symmachus, on the other hand (circa 200 A.D.), gives καρχηδόνιον for כָּרְכָר in Is. 54 12 (AV 'agates,' RV 'rubies'). This rendering suggests an original כָּרְכָר (cp the reading כָּרְכָר [BQ], כָּרְכָרֹס [A]) for כָּרְכָר in Ezek. 27 16 (AV 'agate,' mg. 'chrysoprase,' RV 'rubies'). See PRECIOUS STONES, RUBIES.

2. Chalcedony (χαλκεδνῖς) is the usual Pesh. rendering of שֶׁבַח (ḥēbō (ḥēbō, achates, 'agate' of Ex. 28 19 39 12). Notwithstanding the reference in Ezek. 27 22 to the precious stones imported from Sheba² we can hardly connect the stone שֶׁבַח with the country called Sheba. As Fried. Del. points out (Heb. Lang. 36) it is the Ass. šubu—i.e., the shining or precious stone (abnu našku or akru), κατέξοχτη. This stone occurs among others in a list of stones encased in gold for the royal breastplate. On Delitzsch's suggested identification with the diamond (Prol. 84 ff.)³ or the topaz (Heb. Lang. 36) cp what is said under PRECIOUS STONES, DIAMOND, TOPAZ. Tradition is in favour of the rendering 'agate.'

Agate, so named, according to Theophrastus, from the river Achates, in Sicily, is one of the numerous modifications of form under which silica presents itself, almost in a state of purity, forming 98 per cent of the entire mineral. The silicious particles are not so arranged as to produce the transparency of rock-crystal, but a semi-pellucid, sometimes almost opaque substance, with a resinous or waxy fracture; and the various shades of colour arise from minute quantities of iron. The same stone sometimes contains parts of different degrees of translucency, and of various shades of colour; and the endless combination of these produces the beautiful and singular internal forms, from which, together with the high polish they are capable of receiving, agates acquire their value as precious stones. Agates are usually found in detached rounded nodules in that variety of trap rock called amygdaloid or mandelstein, and occasionally in other rocks. The varieties of the agate are numerous, and are now, as in the time of Pliny, arranged according to the colour of their ground.

3. It is not apparent why RVmg. should suggest 'chalcedony' for שֶׁבַח in Ex. 28 20 (EV 'beryl'). See TARSHISH, STONE OF. W. R.

2 Theophrastus (Lap. 34) tells us that the best precious stones came from Psepho (ἐκ τῆς περὶ καλουμένης χώρας). This is probably the same as the Psebo of Strabo (822) a lake and island S. of Meroe (mod. Tsana or Tana) near the head of the Blue Nile (see Reclus, Géogr. Univ. 10 258 262).
3 The difficulty of believing that the Israelites knew and perhaps even engraved the diamond is only minimised by Del., not removed (see ADAMANT, DIAMOND), though it is not so serious in the case of ḥēbō (mentioned only in P) as in that of Yahālm (Ezekiel and P).

Yakin; its usual name in the Assyrian inscriptions was māt Tamtim, the Sea-land. If Delitzsch (Par. 128, etc.) be correct in his derivation of the name from the Kassite people, the wider application to Babylonia may have been a legacy from the Kassite dynasty there. On the other hand, the Kassites (Del. calls them Kossäer) had a language quite distinct from that of the Kaldū, who spoke Semitic. The Kaldū are carefully distinguished by Sennacherib both from the Arabs and from the Arameans. Merodach-baladan, the usurper in Babylon during Sargon's reign, and the inveterate foe of Assyria till Sennacherib hunted him from Babylon to Bit-Yakin and thence to exile, was a Kaldū. There is no reason to think he had any right in Babylon; on the other hand, nothing shows him to have been more foreign than were the Assyrians. In fact, the Chaldeans not only furnished an early dynasty of Babylon, but also were incessantly pressing into Babylonia; and, despite their repeated defeats by Assyria, they gradually gained the upper hand there. The founder of the New-Babylonian kingdom, Nabopolassar (circa 626 B.C.), was a Chaldean, and from that time Chaldaea meant Babylonia.

The use of the term Chaldee, introduced by Jerome to distinguish the language of certain chapters in 2. 'Chaldee,' Daniel and Ezra (דְּכַלְדַּיִשׁ; Dan. 14), etc. is incorrect. The only correct expression is Aramaic (see CHALDEA, § 2; DANIEL, § 12; ARAM, § 2; ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, § 1 f.). Another peculiar usage must be mentioned. We find 'Chaldeans' used in Dan. as a name for a caste of wise men. As Chaldean meant Babylonian in the wider sense of a member of the dominant race in the times of the New Babylonian Empire, so after the Persian conquest it seems to have connoted the Babylonian literati and become a synonym of soothsayer or astrologer (see DANIEL, § 11). In this sense it passed into classical writers. Whether any association of sound with kalā, the specific name for magician in Assyrian, helped the change of meaning is difficult to decide. The modern so-called Chaldees have no racial claim to the name, and it is very questionable whether the traces of alleged Chaldean culture 'discovered' at Tellah are correctly assigned to this people.

CHALPHI (χαλφει [VA]), 1 Macc. 11:70 RV, AV CALPHIL.

CHAMBER. Of the structure of the chamber of the ancient Hebrew house we know but little; it would naturally depend upon the style of the rest of the building. In modern Syria, floor, wall, and ceiling are commonly made of beaten clay (cp חֶרֶץ Ezek. 13:12), which is often coloured with ochre. Wood, nevertheless, is not rare. The CEILING, if of wood and flat, is of curious and complicated joinery; or, if vaulted, is wrought into many coves and enriched with fretwork in stucco; the walls (רֶקֶד) are adorned with arabesques, mosaics, and the like, which, set off by the whiteness of the stucco, present a brilliant effect. Enamelled inscriptions, specimens of the most intricate Arabic calligraphy, originally intended to keep off harmful *jinn*s, surround the walls. On the number and arrangement of chambers, see HOUSE, 1.

Of the various Heb. words for 'chamber' חֶמֶד and חֶמֶד (cp ὑπερῷον) are used of rooms in private houses; see BED, § 1. חֶמֶד is used particularly of the nuptial chamber; see TENT, § 4. Other terms are used especially of rooms in a temple or palace. לְשֶׁבֶת (1 Ch. 9:26 Jer. 35:24, etc.) or לְשֶׁבֶת (Neh. 3:30 12:44 13:7), a room in the temple occupied by priests and temple-servants, also a room in the royal palace, Jer. 36:12 20; and (once) of a meal-chamber in a Bamah (1 S. 9:22 AV 'parlour'); see HIGH-

PLACE, § 3. חֶמֶד (1 K. 6:573 Ezek. 41:5 ff.) and חֶמֶד (1 K. 14:28 2 Ch. 12:11 Ezek. 40:7 ff.) are similarly used of temple-chambers. In the case of two words the suggested rendering, 'chamber,' is certainly incorrect; חֶמֶד (1 K. 6:5 AV) means properly a 'story,' as in RV (see TEMPLE), and חֶמֶד (Ezek. 16:24 31:39 RVmg. 'vaulted-chamber'), in parallelism with חֶמֶד, refers evidently to some mound for illicit worship (EV better 'eminent place').

CHAMBERLAIN. In Esth. 1:10 12 etc., EV uses 'chamberlain' (for חֶמֶד), perhaps as a more English-sounding title than EUNUCH [q.v.]. On Jer. 51:59 (AVmg. 'chamberlain') see SERAIAH [4].

Blastus, in Acts 12:20, is a court officer in charge of the king's bedchamber (ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ κοιτῶνος τοῦ βασιλέως); but in Rom. 16:23 οἰκονόμος (AV 'chamberlain') is used in a wide sense (RV 'treasurer'); cp Lat. arcarius, and a gloss of Philox., ὁ ἐπὶ τῆς δημοσίας τραπεζῆς. The same title occurs in inscriptions (cp Marm. Oxon. 85, ed. 1772, Νεῖλος οἰκονόμος Ἀσίας; see W. A. Wright in Smith's DB (2) s.v.).

CHAMBERS OF THE SOUTH (חֶמֶד הַיָּמִינִי), Job 9:9, and probably 37:9 (emended text). See STARS, § 3 e, EARTH, FOUR QUARTERS OF, § 2 (1a).

CHAMELEON. 1. RV LAND-CROCODILE (חֶמֶד, etym. uncertain), one of the reptiles mentioned as unclean in Lev. 11:30. חֶמֶד (χαμαιλεων [FL], χαμη. [BA]) and Vg. (chamaleon) have the same rendering as AV; the Arabic version has harḡām, which means probably a species of land-crocodile. Bochart (Hieroz. 43) argues from the Hebrew name, which is the same as the word for 'strength,' that what is meant is the Arabic waral, the largest and most powerful sort of lizard. The Talmudic references, on the other hand, seem to point to a smaller animal; but they are too general to convey any definite information (Lewysohn, Zoologie des Talmuds, 223 f.). N. M.

2. AV MOLE (חֶמֶד) in the same verse. See LIZARD, 6.

CHAMOIS (חֶמֶד), derivation uncertain, cp Lexx.; χαμηλοπαρδαλις [BAFL], Dt. 14:5†), a 'clean' animal, mentioned along with the fallow-deer (יָחִי), the roebuck (צִי), the wild goat (אֵז), the addax (אֵזִי), and the antelope (אֵזִי); see CLEAN, § 8. Many ancient interpreters (S, Vg., Arab., Abulw., Kimhi, etc.) thought that what was meant was the giraffe; but the home of the giraffe lies far away from Palestine. A more probable rendering is the zemer or 'wild goat' of the Targums, which suits the context better. The chamois (Rupicapra tragus) extends from the Pyrenees to the Caucasus, but is not known to have ever inhabited Palestine, whereas of mountain sheep and goats there have been found three kinds. Tristram and Post think that zemer may be the wild sheep (Ovis tragelaphus); but, though that sheep lives in Northern Africa, and an allied or identical species occurs in Arabia, it is doubtful whether it has lived in Palestine. See GOAT. N. M.

CHAPLET

(1) שָׁרֵף, שָׁרֵף, of the heads of the pillars in P's account of the tabernacle (Ex. 38:38 38:17; 38:17; 38:17). See TABERNACLE.

(2) כִּתְּרֵי, kithrēth (כִּתְּרֵי 'to surround,' whence כִּתְּרֵי 'crown') is used (a) of the crowning portion of Solomon's pillars JACHIN and BOAZ (1 K. 7:16-20, ἐπιθεμα [BAL]; 2 K. 25:17, χυθαρ [BA], ἐπιθεμα [L]; 2 Ch. 4:12 f., πρὸ [BA], -ρωθ [L]; Jer. 52:22, γείσος [BNAQ], κεφαλίδες [Qmg.]); see PILLAR: and (b) in the description of Solomon's 'bases' for the lavers (1 K. 7:31); but see LAVER.

(3) כִּתְּרֵי, kithrēth (כִּתְּרֵי 'to overlay'), also of the crowning portion of Solomon's pillar (2 Ch. 3:15, 38:15 doubtful). See PILLAR.

(4) כִּתְּרֵי, kaphthor (deriv. uncertain) occurs with the same meaning, if we are to follow RV and AVmg. (Amos 9:1, το ἱλαστήριον [BQmg.]=כִּתְּרֵי, θυσιαστήριον [AQ*]=כִּתְּרֵי; Zeph. 2:14; τὰ φανώματα [BNAQT]). But kaphthor elsewhere has a different sense (see CANDLESTICK, § 2). Read perhaps כִּתְּרֵי (Che.).

CHAPLET, RV for כִּתְּרֵי Prov. 1:9 f. (AV 'ornament'; στεφανος). Wisdom is a chaplet, or wreath, or garland of grace, upon a man's brow. Chaplets or garlands of flowers were common in the second century B.C., at banquets (Wisd. Sol. 28 cp 3 Macc. 48): see MEALS, § 11. For the chaplets of bridegrooms, see CROWN. Of similar import are the στέμματα of Acts 14:13 (EV 'garlands'), the usual headgear of sacrificers to Zeus.

Some critics hold that there is a hendiadys in the passage and that the meaning is καύρους ἐστεμμένους (garlanded oxen). Ornaments resembling crowns were placed on royal animals by the Assyrians (cp also Esth. 8 and see CROWN), and on victims for the altar. 'The very doors, the very victims and altars, the very servants and priests, are crowned' (Tertul. De Cor. x.).

CHARASHIM, THE VALLEY OF, (a) 1 Ch. 4:14 (RV GE-HARASHIM), called in (b) Neh. 11:35 'the valley of craftsmen' (RVmg. GE-HAHARASHIM). In (a) MT has שֵׁם הַנִּיחַ; in (b) הַנִּיחַ. The fundamental rendering of שֵׁם is γῆ ἀρασειμ, which assumes various distorted forms.² In 1 Ch. 4:14 this valley is described as occupied by craftsmen (workers in wood, stone, or metal; cp EVmg.), who traced their origin to Kenaz. The 'father' or founder of the family was Joab b. Seraiah. According to Kittel's analysis, however, the words 'father of the valley of craftsmen, for they were craftsmen,' are a later addition to an old record (Chron. in SBOT). If so, it becomes easier to admit that the name שֵׁם הַנִּיחַ must be corrupt. The statement of the Talmud (Jer., Meg. 11) that Lod and Ono were situated in the Ge-harashim is surely impossible. The 'plain of Ono' (Neh. 6:2) is the natural phrase. Most probably הַנִּיחַ (ge) is a corrupt fragment of בני (δ'νε), and the name originally meant, not 'valley of craftsmen,' but 'sons of sorcerers,'³ i.e., members of a guild of sorcerers. It was a spot connected by ancient tradition with Philistine sorcery (cp Is. 16 Mic. 7:13). Conder's identification, therefore (PEFQ, '78, p. 18) falls to the ground.

CHAREA (χάρεια [A]), 1 Esd. 5:32 = Ezra 2:52, HARSHA.

CHARGER, a somewhat archaic expression denoting a 'platter' (which, indeed, takes its place in the Amer. Vs. of OT), is employed by the EV to render:—

(1) כֶּרֶךְ, kerēk (Nu. 7:13 19 and throughout the chapter [P]); 38:19 as in Mt. 26:23 Mk. 14:20, the tabernacle offering given by the heads of the tribes, elsewhere rendered 'dish'. See MEALS, § 9.

(2) כֶּרֶךְ, agartāl; 'chargers of gold . . . of silver,' enumerated among the temple vessels restored by Cyrus (Ezra 1:9, om. B, 1 ψυκτήρες, —i.e., wine-coolers [AL], φιάλε [Vg.]; || 1 Esd. 2:13, σπονδ[ε]μα [BAL]). Agartāl (which is found with slight variations in Aram., MH, and Arab.) is taken to be a loan-word from the Hellen. Gr. κάρα(α)λος 'basket'; cp BASKET.²

(3) πῖναξ (Mt. 14:8 11 Mk. 6:25 28), the dish upon which was brought the head of John the Baptist; Lk. 11:39, EV 'platter,' along with 'cup.' See MEALS, § 9. In Mt. 23:25 παροψίς.

CHARIOT (כִּרְכָּב, מִרְכָּבָה, מִרְכָּב). Of the three Heb. words denoting 'chariot' merkābh is post-exilic.

1. Names. (1 K. 5:6 [4:26]). It is employed in Lev. 15:9 and Cant. 3:10 for the seat of the chariot or palanquin (38:10 ἑλίσσωμα [another transl. has κάθισμα], ἐλίσβαιος [Vg. Rashi]). In nearly every case rekhebh is used collectively for a body of chariots. The instances where it is employed to denote a single chariot (like merkābhāh) are comparatively few (Judg. 5:28 2 K. 9:21 24). Occasionally it designates the chariot-horses and riders (2 S. 10:18), or the horses only (2 S. 8:4; cp Is. 21:7 9). On the other hand, merkābhāh expresses the individual chariot, Ass. markabtu, Ar. markabatu, Syr. markabthā—all alike derived from the common Semitic root (rakhabh), to mount or ride, and corresponding in meaning to Latin currus and Greek ἀρμα. The word in Heb. is frequently employed, not in a purely military sense, but to denote a state carriage or travelling conveyance. Examples of this use may be found in Gen. 41:43 46:29 Lev. 15:9 1 K. 12:18 and Is. 27:27 (?). This word must be kept quite distinct from another term, agālāh (מִגְדָּל), 'cart' or 'waggon,' employed in the conveyance of agricultural produce (Am. 2:13).³ The cart was employed in very early times by the Israelites (1 S. 6:7 2 S. 6:3) before chariots were introduced among them. Its form probably approximated to that of the accompanying figure (fig. 1), taken from one of the reliefs of Tiglath-pileser III. Each cart holds three occupants and is drawn by two oxen; the wheels have eight spokes. A still more primitive kind of cart, employed by the Asiatic nations, possessed wheels which consisted simply of circular discs, whilst the earliest and most primitive form of all consisted in a mere framework with 'a board or seat, placed between two asses to which it was strapped, on which the person sat as the War-chariot.

3. War-chariots: introduced late.

The striking fact that the ancient Hebrews for centuries refused to employ so valuable a military aid as the chariot, in their encounters with the Canaanites was due to several co-operating causes.

First among these was the nomadic origin and character of early Israel. The Canaanites, like the Egyptians, may have borrowed the form of their chariots from their northern neighbours, the Syrians or Hittites. This, however, is by no means certain, for among the Amarna Tablets, we have a despatch to the Egyptian monarch from one of his vassals in Canaan, in which the latter, in anticipation of an invasion by the Hittites, requests the aid of chariots and troops from the king of Egypt.¹ Not improbably, therefore, Egypt may have been the proximate source whence Canaanite civilisation borrowed the chariot. From Josh. 17:16 Judg. 4:3, however, we learn that the Canaanite war-chariot was plated or studded externally with iron, a feature which seems to be more probably Hittite than Egyptian.²

4. Hill country unsuitable.

A second reason why Israel remained destitute of this important adjunct is to be found in the physical configuration of Canaan. During the earlier period of the Hebrew occupation, the district seized by the sons of Jacob was the central or mountainous region, where chariots and cavalry could not easily operate. Interesting illustrations of this difficulty in employing chariots may be derived from the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser I. (circa 1100 B.C.). In Prism Inscr. col. ii. 70-74 we read: 'mighty mountains and difficult country I passed through—so far as it could be traversed, in my chariot; and that which could not be traversed, on foot. By the mountain Aruma, unsuited for the advance of my chariots, I left my chariots behind . . . ' (Winckler in KTB 1; cp also col. iii. 47-49). How difficult the Canaanites found it to make effective use of them against the Israelites, may be inferred from the later experience of the Syrians, who attributed their constant defeats to the fact that the deities of the Hebrews were potent in the mountainous country (1 K. 20:23) whilst their own operations, which were largely carried on with cavalry and chariots (cp 2. 21 and Shalmaneser II.'s Obelisk Inscr. 65, Monolith Inscr. col. ii. 90), would be successful only in the plains. It can readily be understood, therefore, how the Hebrew race, by clinging to the central mountainous region and not venturing too far into the Shephelah or low country, as well as by dint of sheer bravery and the skilful use of bow, sling, and spear, were able, down to the time of David, to defy successfully the armies of Canaan and Syria.

5. Religious conservatism.

A third reason was that religion—in its tendency, ever conservative of a nation's past—sanctioned the ancient custom of warfare, and regarded horses and chariots as a foreign innovation corrupting Israel's allegiance to Yahweh. This view, constantly reflected in prophecy (Hos. 17:14 [3] Mic. 5:9 [10] Zech. 9:10), became embodied in the Deuteronomic legislation (Dt. 17:16), and expressed in song (Ps. 20:7). When, however, under David, Israel became an aggressive state and entered into conflict with Syrian and Hittite cavalry and chariots in the plains, the stress must have been severely felt by the Hebrews, and it is not surprising that chariots and horsemen were gradually introduced into Israel's military service. This is clear from 2 S. 8:4, where, following 6, we should restore יָחַד ('for himself'; omitted in MT from religious scruples); the passage means that David reserved 100 chariots and horsemen for his own use. His successor, Solomon, is said to have provided Israel with 1400 war chariots, which were quartered in special cities (1 K. 9:19 10:26; see BETH-MARCABOTH). In his reign the purchase of horses and chariots became an organised trade; they were imported (though Winckler denies this; see MIZRAIM, § 2 [a]) from Egypt, at the cost of 600 shekels, or about £80 for each chariot¹ (v. 28 f.). From this time onwards we constantly read of chariots and horsemen both in the northern and in the southern kingdom (1 K. 16:9 22:34 2 K. 8:21 13:7 Is. 27 Mic. 5:9 [Heb.]). In col. ii. 91 of Shalmaneser II.'s great monolith inscription we are startled to find that Ahab's contingent of chariots, 2000 in number, largely exceeded that of any other state in the confederacy that encountered the Assyrian army at Karkar in 854 B.C. (cp AHAB, § 7). From Is. 30:16 31:1 36:9 we may infer (with Kamphausen) that the supply of chariots and horses from Egypt was one of the grounds of alliance between that power and Judah.

Since Egypt was the land from which the Hebrews obtained their supply of this arm, we turn to its monuments for illustrative material; and this we obtain in abundance from the eighteenth dynasty onwards (vol. vi. in Lepsius' Denkmäler). Before the eighteenth dynasty (1500 B.C.) chariots and horses were unknown in Egypt, and there is good evidence to show that they were borrowed from the North Palestinian race called Rutennu.² The Egyptian chariot usually contained two persons. Nowack (HA 1:367), however, is wrong in his assertion that this was invariably the case. In Lepsius' Denkmäler (Abth. iii. Bl. 157 f.) we have numerous illustrations of chariots with three figures. According to Sir Gardner Wilkinson, however, this was not common, except in triumphal processions, 'when two of the princes or noble youths accompanied the king in their chariot, bearing the royal sceptre, or the flabella, and required a third person to manage the reins.' On the other hand Hittite chariots frequently contained three occupants (see below, § 9). Lepsius (Denkmäler, Abth. iii. Bl. 160) exhibits figures of Egyptian chariots in which the right-hand warrior bears the bow while the left carries the shield. Here, as in many other cases, we find the reins tied round the body of one of the combatants while he is engaged in action. On another page (Bl. 165) we have a chariot with the solitary royal occupant, Rameses II., drawing the bow, while the reins of his two horses are tied around his middle. Indeed, one of the most striking features in these vivid scenes of combat, is the multiplicity of functions discharged by the chariot rider. The accompanying figure (fig. 3) exhibits an archer in the act of drawing his bow with the right hand. A whip consisting of a stick handle with leather thong attached, is suspended from his wrist, while round his waist are fastened the horses' reins.

¹ In 1 K. 10:28 (2 Ch. 1:16) the text is very uncertain in the latter part of the verse. In MT of 1 K. 10:28 we read יִבְרָה בְּמֶלֶךְ יִבְרָה יִבְרָה יִבְרָה. It seems simplest with Kamph. (in Kau. HS) to cancel the first יִבְרָה and to render the whole verse 'And the export of the horses of Solomon was from Egypt; and the royal merchants used to fetch a troop for payment.' This is certainly preferable to the other suggestion, to which Ki. in his note on 2 Ch. 1:16 (SBOT) refers—viz., to make a transposition and read . . . נִבְרָה הַמֶּלֶךְ סָבִיב סָבִיב 'the king's traders getting every time a troop . . .'. This use of the distributive construction is very forced. Ki. himself finds a reference in מִלְּבָל to Kuß—i.e., E. Cilicia. See the note referred to and cp MIZRAIM, § 2 (a).

It is obvious from the representations which portray the manufacture of different portions of the Egyptian chariot, that it was almost entirely constructed of wood. It was light and open from behind, so that it could be easily mounted, and consisted of 'a wooden framework, sometimes strengthened and ornamented with metal and leather binding. The flat bottom was formed of a kind of network, consisting of interlaced thongs or rope, which gave it elasticity and mitigated the jolting' (Wilkinson).

The occupants of a chariot nearly always stood. In rare instances the car was provided with a seat in which the royal personage sat. The furniture consisted of a bow-case, which was placed in a slanting position pointing forwards, and was often ornamented with the figure of a lion. There were also receptacles for arrows and spears, which, as a general rule, slanted backwards (see fig. 4).

The diameter of the wheel was a little over three feet. The felloe was in six pieces and the tire was fastened to it by bands of hide passing through long narrow holes. 'The yoke, resting upon a small, well-padded saddle, was firmly fitted into a groove of metal; and the saddle, placed upon the horse's withers, and furnished with girths and a breastband, was surmounted by an ornamental knob; and in front of it a small hook secured the bearing rein.

The other reins passed through a thong or ring at the side of the saddle, and thence over the projecting extremity of the yoke, and the same thong secured the girths.' Further details may be found in Sir Gardner Wilkinson's exhaustive work, from which the above description has been borrowed.

The chariots of the Assyrians were of stouter and more solid construction than those of the Egyptians, since the former were intended to sustain the wear and tear of rough and rugged paths in distant campaigns. Thus we often find that the tires and felloes of the wheels amounted together to as much as eight or ten inches in thickness. In the early part of the ninth century B.C. we find chariots of this description employed by Ašur-nāšir-pal. Upon the obelisk of this monarch we find the archer standing on the right hand and the driver on the left, and these are their respective positions in nearly all the examples depicted on the Assyrian monuments. We observe, moreover, in all the portrayals belonging to the ninth century and the early part of the eighth, that the two receptacles for arrows are placed on the right side, and are disposed crosswise over one another, and in a slanting position as in the Egyptian examples. We notice, in one case depicted in Ašur-nāšir-pal's obelisk, an attendant on foot bearing a shield, and holding the reins. This meets us again on one of the monuments of Tiglath-pileser III.

Vivid representations of the chariots of this period may be found in the reliefs of the Nimrud gallery in the British Museum. One excellent example, reproduced in the accompanying figure (fig. 5), is borrowed from a hunting-scene in which the monarch Ašur-nāšir-pal is engaged. Note that we have here, as in many other instances of this period, three horses—a contrast with Egyptian usage, in which the number never exceeded two. The pole of the chariot is fixed to the base of the 'body,' to the upper part of which is fastened, on the left, a large heavy shaft¹ attached to rings upon the shoulder-pieces of the central as well as the outer horse on the left side. The rein on the right-hand steed passes through a ring on his shoulder, and is attached to the bit. The use of bits with ancient Egyptian, as well as Assyrian, war-horses can admit of no doubt. As in other examples, the two receptacles for arrows cross each other slantwise on the right side of the chariot—for that was obviously the side on which the archer most conveniently stood, thus preserving his right hand and side unencumbered by his companion in the use of the bow. A battle-axe stands among the arrows in one receptacle, whilst an extra bow is inserted among those in the other. We notice in this example, as in all others portrayed on the monuments of this period, that the axle of the wheel, as in the Egyptian chariot, is placed under the hindmost extremity of the body of the vehicle, in order to ensure more steadiness; consequently part of the weight of the chariot and its occupants rested on the horses. In another specimen on the reliefs of this period we again observe three steeds harnessed to the chariot, while in this case the driver holds a whip. Near the front of the chariot, between the two occupants, rises a pole surmounted by a symbolic device, from which hang ornamented tassels. In other examples a spear may be seen in the receptacle that slopes backwards. Often the horses are richly ornamented with crests, sometimes with a necklace² or collar. Leather straps pass beneath and in front of the animal. We find tassels hanging down apparently from a metal boss on its side. Otherwise the animal is unprotected.

Among the reliefs of Tiglath-pileser III. we observe a state-chariot with two horses and three occupants. There is no archer. The king stands on the right and the driver on the left. The driver has three reins in each hand, a whip in his right. In front stands an attendant holding the reins. The monarch is shaded by an umbrella. We notice two new points.

² Not improbably this contained amulets or charms, like the crescents on the camels' necks in Judg. 8:21. See Whitehouse, Primer of Hebrew Antiquities, 50 f. and footnote.

8. In 8th cent. The receptacle for arrows stands upright. Also the wheels are now much enlarged, being about $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet in diameter, with tire and felloes of considerable thickness. Mr. T. G. Pinches is disposed to think that the inner rim of the wheel was of metal, and appearances would seem to justify this conclusion. It is possible, however, that we have here plating, not solid metal.

The state chariot of Sennacherib, which we here reproduce (fig. 6), exhibits wheels at least $4\frac{1}{2}$ feet in diameter, with eight spokes. We notice the thickness of the tire and felloes, and the metal studs or nails on the outer circumference. A large umbrella is fixed in the chariot. Here the driver is on the right hand, the king on the left. We also observe no receptacle for arrows, bow, or battle-axe; from the close of the eighth century onwards the archers become dissociated from the chariots; in the time of Ašur-bāni-pal they usually constitute a separate corps.¹

Of the Hittite chariot we obtain the clearest conception from Egyptian portrayals, and a special interest belongs to it because it is probably to be regarded as the prototype from which the

9. Hittite chariots. Egyptian was derived, and the Israelite vehicle was ultimately, if not proximately, borrowed.

¹ In one case, however (45), we have a single-horse chariot carrying two archers with quivers on their backs. Moreover, the large upper shaft to which reference has been made disappears altogether from the time of Sennacherib onwards. Not more than two horses are harnessed to the chariot. Also it becomes simpler in form, while the wheels become larger. In the representation of Ašur-bāni-pal's war against Elam (Nimrud gallery 48, 49) we observe that the wheels have as many as twelve spokes. In some cases there is only a single occupant. In others there are several occupants, and an umbrella is fixed in the chariot when it conveys a royal personage or some nobleman of distinction.

CHARIOT

In one respect it differed from the Egyptian, viz. in carrying three, not, as a rule, two occupants. This is important, as it seems to throw light upon Hebrew usage, to which we shall presently refer. The ordinary weapons of the chariot-fighter were bow and arrows. In the annexed figure (fig. 7) it will be observed that the two-horsed chariot has among its three riders a shield-bearer, who apparently occupies the central position. The driver on the left holds only a single rein in each hand, though he is driving two steeds, which are held together by a strong collar and undergirths. Simplicity and strength combined with lightness are the chief characteristics of the Hittite chariot.

Among the ancient Hebrews, as among the Assyrians, Egyptians, Hittites, and Greeks, the horses were always

10. Israelitish chariots: 'Shalish.' arrayed side by side, never one behind another. Moreover, with the Assyrians and the Egyptians the chariot usually held two persons. This was the case

perhaps occasionally in Israel; but various considerations lead to the inference that the chariots as a rule held three, as among the Hittites, the occupants being the driver, the bowman, and the shield-bearer. (In the case of Jehu, he himself handles the bow, 2 K. 9.24.) It is therefore as something peculiar and exceptional that we find Jehu recalling to Bidkar that they were riding in pairs¹ behind Ahab, as his body-guard, when the latter was confronted by Elijah near Naboth's vineyard (2 K. 9.25). This Hebrew-Hittite usage may explain the word שָׁלִישׁ (šālîš; see ARMY, § 4) which, in its origin, signified one of the three occupants of the royal chariots that accompanied the king to battle. The word is used during the regal period in the sense of a distinguished attendant of the king who accompanied him in his chariot. This is evident from 2 K. 9.25 where Bidkar holds this position in relation to Jehu. It is significant that in 1 K. 9.22 the שָׁלִישִׁים (šālîšîm) are placed in close connection with captains of chariots (שָׂרֵי רֶכֶב), and formed a body-guard commanded by a special officer, 'chief of the שָׁלִישִׁים' (רֹאשׁ הַשָּׁלִישִׁים); 1 Ch. 11.11 [2 S. 28.8]. Compare the use of šālîš in Ex. 14.15.4. That the šālîš held a high position is clearly shown in 2 K. 7.21.7, where he is described as one 'on whose hand the king leans.' (Probably the term is used here as equivalent to שָׂרֵי הַשָּׂדֶה.)

In addition to the šālîš the king was frequently accompanied by 'runners' (רָצִים), who were prepared to render assistance when the king dismounted from the chariot, or to hold the reins (as in the reliefs of the Assyrian kings to which we have already referred), or to discharge any other duty in the king's service, 2 S. 15.1 1 K. 15.2 K. 10.25 11.4 (see ARMY, § 4). In the time of David there was a special body of fifty men detailed for this special function.

We know that the Persian kings took with them on their expeditions ἄρματᾶς—four-wheeled carriages

11. Persian chariots. covered with curtains, specially employed for the conveyance of women and children, as may be inferred from Herod. 7.41 Xenoph. Cyrop. vi. 4.11. Probably these closely resembled, or were identical with, the ὄχηματα ἐνθρόνια ἐνείματα—adapted for sitting or lying down. According to 2 Ch. 35.23.7. Josiah, when mortally wounded, was removed from his war-chariot into a reserve chariot (רכב משנה) which was probably regarded by the Chronicler as partaking of this character.

In later times chariots were provided with scythes (ἄρματα δρεπανηφόρα, Xenoph. Anab. i. 7.10 Diod. Sic. 17.53). This device does not meet us among the ancient Egyptians and Assyrians;² but we know that scythe-bearing chariots were employed by the Persians and later still by the Syrians (2 Macc. 13:2). It was probably the Persians who introduced this formidable addition to the war-chariot. (Cp Xenophon, Cyrop. vi. 130.)

The different portions of the chariot receive special names in the Heb. of the OT. 'Wheels,' מְסָנִים, are mentioned in Nah.

12. Parts of chariot. 32 (cp Is. 28:27 Prov. 20:26). Another name, more descriptive, was 'rollers,' מְסָנִים (Is. 5:28 Ezek. 10:26 23:24 26:10). The 'spokes' of the wheel were called מְסָנִים, while the 'felloes' had the name מְסָנִים or מְסָנִים. The wheel revolves by a nave (מְסָנִים), round an axle (מְסָנִים). See WHEEL. All these terms are to be found in the locus classicus, 1 K. 7:32 f.

The pole of the chariot, מְסָנִים, was (according to Mish. Kelim 14:4 24:2) fastened below the middle of the axle, passed under the base of the 'body' of the chariot, and then, curving upwards, ascended to the neck of the horses. To this, draught-animals were fastened by means of the yoke, assisted by cords or wide leather straps. Beyond these broad features it is doubtful how far we are justified in following the details contained in a treatise of the Mishna composed centuries after the latest OT literature.

That the chariot, which was so closely associated with the public functions of Oriental monarchs, both in war and in peace, entered into the religious conceptions as an indispensable portion of the paraphernalia of divine monarchy, cannot awaken surprise. The chariot, therefore, has its place in ancient Semitic religion. Just as the Hellenic religious imagination endowed Helios with horses and chariot (as the Homeric Hymn clearly testifies), so Canaanite religion endowed the Sun-god Šemeš with the same royal accessories (cp HORSE, § 4). This feature in the cultus of the Sun the Hebrews blended with the worship of Yahwè in the precincts of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, in the days that preceded the Reformation of Josiah (2 K. 23:11). The combination of Yahwè, the God of Israel's armies and of the sky, with the Sun was not unnatural to the Hebrew mind, as their literature testifies both early and late. Cp 1 K. 8:12 f. (an old fragment of the Book of Jashar restored by We. from 6^A in 1 K. 8:53); Ps. 19:7 84:11 [12].¹ Yahwè, as Lord of hosts, has chariots among his retinue. These were the 'chariots and horses of deliverance' whereon Yahwè rode forth to conquer and terrify Israel's foes in the days of the Exodus (Hab. 3:8 f.). With this graphic touch in the Prayer of Habakkuk we may compare the fiery chariots of 2 K. 2:11 6:17 13:14² as well as a phrase occurring in the magnificent triumphal ode, Ps. 68:18. O. C. W.

In spite of the apparent resemblance of the names (but note the different initial letters), the Chebar cannot be the same as the HAVOR (חָבַר)—Babylonia never included the region watered by this river—but must be one of the Babylonian canals (Bab. nārāti; cp נַרְתִּי בְבֶל, Ps. 137:1). This was first pointed out by Nöldeke (Schenkel, BL, 1508 [1869]). The final proof has been given by Hilprecht, who has found mention twice of the (nāru) kabarru, a large navigable canal a little to the E. of Nippur 'in the land of the Chaldeans.'¹ but כְּבַר לְאוֹמֶר western reading [Ginsb. Intr. to Mass.

1. Story. crit. ed. 203 f.; conversely Strack, Kohut AEL—אַלל. [D], -אַלל. [D]), according to Gen. 14:1 was a king of Elam, whose dominion extended as far as the SE. of Canaan, where five kings, of whom those of Sodom and Gomorrah were the chief, served him twelve years. In the thirteenth year, however, they rebelled, and in the fourteenth year they were defeated by the Elamite and his allies. In the sequel of the story (vv. 12-24) we are told how Abram with his own servants and some allies pursued the victorious army and rescued not only the captured kings but also his nephew Lot (see ABRAHAM, § 2). The question whether this narrative is trustworthy, and whether the Chedor-laomer of the story and his allies are historical personages, is ruled by the other, as to the date of the chapter containing it.

2. Its date. That the chapter is quite an isolated piece, and formed no part of the writings from which the Hexateuch was composed, may be considered as certain. Some scholars, however, (e.g., Kittel) assign it to the eighth century B.C., and are of opinion that the author had an older writing before him; according to others, it is not older than the fourth century B.C.² The former hold that the antiquity and the authenticity of the story are attested by the following facts:—(1) that at least the name of the chief king is purely Elamitic; (2) that the Rephāim, the Zamzummin (= Zuzim), and the Emim really occupied in ancient times what afterwards became the dwelling places of the Ammonites, Moabites, and Edomites, whilst the Horites (Gen. 36:20), according to Dt. 2:10 f. and 20 f., were the oldest inhabitants of Seir; (3) that AMORITES (q.v.), the name of the people established, according to v. 7, in Hazazon-tamar (= Engedi, 2 Ch. 20:2), is the ancient name of the people of Canaan (Gen. 15:16 48:22 Am. 2:9), and that several names (En-mishpat, Hobah, Shaveh), words, and expressions not occurring anywhere else, as well as the exact description of the campaign (vv. 5-7), bear the impress of antiquity and trustworthiness.

The arguments of those who ascribe the narrative to a post-exilic Jew, whose aim was to encourage his contemporaries by the description of Abram's victory over the great powers of the East, his unselfishness, piety, and proud magnanimity towards heathen men, mostly take their starting-point in the second part of the chapter.

It is pointed out that the names of Abram's allies, Mamre and Eshcol, occur elsewhere (Gen. 13:18 23:17 19:25 35:27 50:11 Nu. 13:23) as place names; that Melchizedek (Melchizedek) and Abram are represented as monotheists; and that the patriarch pays tithes to the priest-king, a duty not prescribed at all in Dt. (see 14:22-29 26:12 f.), but characteristic of the post-exilic sacerdotal law (Nu. 18:21-28).

The criticism extends also, however, to the first part, with which we are here chiefly concerned. It is remarked that there is no evidence of the historicity of the campaign in question, which is, in fact, as closely as possible connected with a view of Abraham which we know to have been post-exilic (cp ELIEZER, 1). Moreover, it is difficult to resist the impression that the names of the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah—viz., Bera' and Birsha' (compounds conveying the idea of 'evil,' 'badness')—and the name given in the narrative to the town of Zoar—viz., Bela'='perdition' (see BELA)—perhaps also that of the king of Zebō'im, which the Samaritan text gives as Shem-ebed='slave-name'—are, some of them at least, purely symbolical and therefore fictitious. (See, however, in each case, the special article.)

² See, e.g., E. Meyer, GA 1:165 f. (84); Kue. Hex. 324 (35); St. ZAW 6:323 (36); We. CH 110 f. (39); Che. OP 3:161, 270 (91), cp Founders, 2:7 f.; Holzinger, Einl. in d. Hex. 4:5 (93).

What is certain is this: Chedor-laomer, = Kudur-lagamar, is a purely Elamitic name, which is not, indeed, found as a royal name on the monuments, but is of the same type as Kudur-nanḫundi (Kutir-nanḫunte in Old Susian), the name of a king who in the beginning of the twenty-third century B.C. conquered the whole; and Kudur-mabuk, the name of another king, who, probably later, was master of a part of Babylonia. Lagamar(u) (Laḫamar) occurs as the name of an Elamitic deity, not only in 5 R (p. vi., coll. 6, 33), but also in the Inscriptions of Anzan-šūšinak,¹ and seems to be the same as Lagamal, the queen of the town of Kišurre (2 R pl. ix. 15a = 14b). Hence the name cannot be the invention of a Hebrew writer. It can hardly be doubted, either, that Arioch, king of Ellasar, is really no other than Eri-aku (i.e., servant of the Moon-god), the well-known king of Larsa, son of Kudur-mabuk.²

3. Name Chedor-laomer.

These discoveries have opened a wide field for ingenious combinations. It has been observed that Kudur-mabuk is called in one of the inscriptions of his son by the name Adda-martu, 'Father of the West.' Now, the word Martu being commonly used, at least in later times, to designate Western Asia, especially Canaan (mat Aharri, or perhaps better mat Amurri, the land of the Amorites), Adda=Father has been interpreted to mean conqueror, and this has been taken as evidence that, in a very remote period, Canaan fell under Elamite dominion. It is a pity that we must call attention to a weak point in this theorising. Kudur-mabuk is not the same as Kudur-lagamar, and Adda-martu seems to be only a synonym of Adda-yamubala, a title which the same king, as ruler of a western province of Elam, bears in other inscriptions (see Tiele, BAG 123 f.).

The attempts to make out the two other Eastern kings to be historical personages must be considered failures.

4. Amraphel Tidal.

Amraphel is the famous Babylonian king Ḥammu-rābi himself, whose name is explained in Semitic as Kimta-rapaštu ('am = kimta, rapel = rapaltu = rapaštu); whilst, according to Hommel (GBA 364 f.), he is Ḥammu-rābi's father Sin-muballit, because Sin is sometimes named Amar and muballit may conceivably have been condensed into pal (phel). (See also AMRAPHEL.) With more confidence Shin'ar is stated to be a Hebraised form of Šumer (see Schr. KAT). Unfortunately, this is by no means certain. Though Ḥammurābi was king of Babylon, and therefore of Akkad, he was not king of Šumer so long as Eri-aku was king of Larsa. Not till he had put an end to the Elamite dominion in Babylonia could he be called king of Šumer, and then neither Eri-aku nor an Elamite king could join with him in the conquest of Canaan. As to Tidal, king of Goyim, we may read his name Thargal, following ⁵EL; we may identify the Goyim with the people of Gutium; we may even go so far as prudence permits in theorising on the latest discoveries: but all this does not make TIDAL (q.v.) historical. All that we can say is that the writer of than those of Chedor-laomer and Arioch; the former are very possibly corruptions of the names of historical personages whom we are as yet unable to identify. Nor do we assert that the whole story is the product of the inventive faculty of the author. That in very remote times, Babylonian kings extended their sway as far as the Mediterranean, is not only told in ancient traditions (e.g., of Sargon I.), but has also been proved by the Amarna tablets. From these we learn that as late as the fifteenth century B.C., when the kings of Babylon and Assyria had no authority beyond their own borders and Egypt gave the law to Western Asia, Babylonian was the official and diplomatic language of the Western Asiatic nations. Hence it is not impossible, it is even probable, that a similar suzerainty was exercised over these nations by the Elamites, who were more than once masters of Babylonia. Our author, whether he wrote in the eighth century B.C., or, which is more probable, in the fourth, may have found this fact in some ancient record, and utilised it both for the glorification of the Father of the Faithful and for encouraging his contemporaries.

So much appears to be all that can be safely stated in the present state of research. Scheil, however, is of opinion ('96) that the Ku-dur-la-a-g-ga-mar (?) whom he finds in a cuneiform epistle was the Elamite king of Larsa who was conquered by Ḥammu-rābi and Sin-idinnam, and, therefore, cannot have been any other than the son of Kudur-mabuk, who, as king of Larsa (Ur), had adopted the name of Rim-sin (Eri-aku?). Pinches has discovered a cuneiform tablet in the Brit. Mus. collection which has naturally excited great hopes among conservative critics. It is sadly mutilated; but it is at least clear that names which may be the prototypes of Arioch, Tid'al, and possibly Chedorlaomer, were known in Babylonia when the tablet was inscribed. The tablet dates, probably, from the time of the Arsacidae; but it is tempting to assume that the inscription was copied from one which was made in the primitive Babylonian period. It should be noticed, however, that the form of the first name is not Eri-aku but Eri-(DP)[E]-a-ku, and that the third name is not read with full certainty, the second part being -mal, which is only conjecturally made into lah-mal. There is also a second tablet on which two of the names are mentioned again. Pinches reads the one Eri-ē-ku (possibly Eri-ē-ku-a), and the other Ku-dur-lah(?) -gu-mal. In a third inscription the name Ku-dur-lah(?) -gu-[mal] appears. The second of the three names is mentioned only in the first tablet as Tu-ud-hul-a, where, since the Babylonian ḫ answers to the Hebrew ח in חמל, Pinches and Schrader agree in recognising the Tidal of Gen. 14. But not by a single word do these inscriptions confirm the historicity of the invasion 'in the days of Amraphel.'

[The doubts here expressed are fully justified by L. W. King's more recent investigations. Both Scheil's and Pinches' readings of the respective inscriptions are incorrect, and 'though Ku-dur-ku-ku-mal (Kudur-KU-KU-mal) is styled (in Pinches' inscriptions) a king of Elam, there is no reason to suppose that he was a contemporary of Ḥammu-rābi. He might have occupied the throne at any period before the fourth century B.C.]

CHELLUH, RV CHELUHI, mg. CHELUHU (חֶלְיָהּ, Kt.; חֶלְיָהּ, K^{re}; χελιαουγ [L; probably through the influence of ελιας. v. 36]), mentioned in the list of persons with foreign wives (see EZRA, i. § 5, end), Ezra 10³⁵ (χελκεια [BN], χελια [A]) = 1 Esd. 9³⁴ EV ENASIBUS (ενασιβος [BA]).

CHELLUS (χελουγ [BA]; χελα. [N], ܡܚܠܐ [Syr.]), one of the places to which Nebuchadrezzar sent his summons, according to Judith 1⁹. The Halhul of Josh. 15⁸ may be meant; but the reading χελουγ suggests rather CHESULLOTH or CHISLOTH-TABOR, which is given by Jerome and Eusebius as Chasalus or χασαλου (OS², 914, etc., 30264). See CHELLIANS. Another identification should be mentioned. Chellus is perhaps the same as the place which in Jos. Ant. xiv. 14 is called αλουσα, by Jerome and Eusebius allus, αλλουδ (OS², 856 21189), viz. חלוצה (Targ. Jer. Gen. 16 14; cp Gen. 20 1 in Ar., and see BERED), or Elusa. Cp We. Heid.² 48, n. 1; WRS, Kin. 293f.

CHELOD (χελουγ [B], χελαιουγδα [N^a], χελαιουγ [N^a], χελουγ [A]). 'Very many nations of the sons of Chelod' (Judith 16) assembled themselves to battle in the plain of Arioch in the days of Nebuchadrezzar and Arphaxad (!). What we ought to understand by Chelod is quite uncertain.

Vet. Lat. has Chelluth, and Syr. has 'against the Chaldæans.' One very improbable conjecture is that χαλων (CALNEH) is intended; another, hardly less unlikely, is that the word is the Hebrew חֶזֶן ('weasel'), and that by the opprobrious designation of 'children of the weasel' are meant the Syrians (Ew. GV 543).

CHELUB (חֶלֶב, § 67, probably a variation of Caleb, cp below).

(1) A Judahite, doubtless to be identified with CALEB (§ 4); similarly We. (Genz. 20), who reads 'Caleb b. Hezron' (1 Ch. 4 11 χαλεβ [BAL], Caleb [Vg.] ܡܠܚ [Pesh.]). His designation 'brother of Shuhah' (שׁוּחָה) is not clear; G²BA read 'father of Achsah,' possibly a correction (Ki. SEOT). Cp the still further corrupt Pesh. 'brother of Ahiah' (ܡܠܚ ܐܚܝܐ). (2) Father of EZRI, 1 Ch. 27 26 (χοθουδ [B], χελουβ [A], χα- [L]).

CHELUBAI (חֶלְבַּי, § 67, a gentilic [= חֶלְבַּי: see 1 S. 25 3 K^{re}] used instead of the proper name CALEB), b. Hezron, 1 Ch. 29 (ο χαλεβ [A], ο χαβεα [B], ο χαλωβι [L], ܡܠܚ [Pesh., a corruption]); see CALEB, § 3, CARMi, 1.

CHEMARIM (חֶמְרִים, Zeph. 14 RV 2 K. 23 5 mg. Hos. 10 5 mg.; AV Chemarims, Zeph. 14. Rather Kēmārim.

CHEMOSH

The original Heb. word appears also in 2 K. 23 5, where EV gives 'idolatrous priests,' and in Hos. 10 5, where EV has 'priests.' It is also highly probable that in Hos. 4 4 we should read, with Beck 'for my people is like its Chemarim' (1 (G, however, ως ἀντιλεγόμενος ἱερέων, perhaps an error for οὐ ἱερέων [Schleusner]). G transliterates Χωμαρεμ (BA) 2 K. 12; but ἱερεῖς is also supported, see Field, Hes ad loc.; it apparently omits in Zeph.; (in Hos. it had a different Heb.). Vg. varies between aruspices (2 K.) and aditui (Zeph. Hos.); Targ. between כְּחֹמְרִים (2 K. Zeph.) and פְּלֹחָיו 'the ministers thereof'; Pesh. adheres to חֶמְרִים.

As to the meaning, if we appeal to the versions, we find only the dim light which an unassisted study of the context can supply. Evidently the term was applied to the priests of Baal, who served at the high places under royal authority, but were put down by Josiah. But what special idea did the word convey? In itself it meant simply 'priests'; in Zeph. 14 Kēmārim and Kōhānim are put side by side to express the idea of a priesthood of many members; and in Hos. 3 4 (if the view proposed above be adopted) we have kēmārim used of the priests of N. Israel, when these are spoken of objectively, and then kōhēn, when the priests are addressed as an organic unity. But the word Kēmārim probably also conveyed the idea of a worship which had Syrian affinities. Certainly it cannot be explained from Hebrew; כָּחַר does not mean 'to be black' (cp ECLIPSE), and even if it did, the 'black-robed ones' is a most improbable designation for ancient priests.² The word is no doubt of Syrian origin (see the Aram. inscriptions in C/S 2 nos. 113 130). The primitive form is kumr, whence Aram. kumrā (never used in an unfavourable sense) and Heb. kēmārim are normally formed. Lagarde (Armen. Stud. 2386) compared Arm. chourm; but it is more obviously reasonable to compare the Assyrian kummaru, which is given as a synonym of lubaru zakū—i.e., 'a clean vesture' (Del. Ass. HWB 337 b., cp 254 b.). The term kēmārim probably described the Syrian and Israelitish priests in their clean vestments (cp 2 K. 10 22, the Baal festival) when ministering to their God. To derive it from an Aram. root meaning 'to be sad' is much less natural.

Delitzsch compares Ass. kamāru, 'to throw down'; the term, he thinks, describes the priests as those who prostrate themselves in worship (Ass. and Heb., 41, 42; so Che. Hos. 103, 111). Finally, Robertson Smith,³ noting that the word belongs to a race in which the mass of the people were probably not circumcised (Herod. 2 104, cp Jos. Ant. viii. 103, c. A. 1. 22) while the priests were (Dio Cassius, 79 11; Ep. Barnab. 96; cp Chwolson, Ssabier, 2114), conjectures that kumrā means 'the circumcised' (Ar. kamara, 'glans penis'). T. K. C.

CHEMOSH (חֶמֶשׁ, in MI כְּחֹמֶשׁ; on name see § 4, end; χαμωσ [B^aNAFQL], αμωσ [B^a Judg. 11 24], Chamos), the national god of the Moabites

1. Moab's national deity. (1 K. 11 7, Jer. 48 7 13). Moab is the people of Chemosh; the Moabites are his sons and daughters (Nu. 21 29; cp the relation of Yahwē to Israel, Judg. 5 11 Nu. 11 29 Judg. 11 24 Is. 45 1, etc.). A king of Moab in the time of Sennacherib was named Chemoshnabab (Amusnabadab;⁴ cp Jehonadab); the father of Mesha was Chemoshmelech;⁵ a gem found near Beirūt is inscribed לַחֲמֹשׁ (cp Heb. חֶמֶשׁ, יִחְיָא, פְּחֹז, פְּחִי, יְחֹזֶל, יְחֹזֶל). The stele of Mesha king of Moab, contemporary with Ahab, Ahaziah, and Jehoram of Israel (2 K. 1 3), in the middle of the ninth century B.C. (see MESHA), was erected to commemorate the deliverance which Chemosh had wrought for his people.

1 Continue, יְחֹזֶל יְחֹזֶל יְחֹזֶל, 'and thou shalt stumble, O priest, in the daytime'; at the close of the verse read, with Ruben, תְּחִי, 'thy Thummim' (addressed to the priest).

2 Cp Mishna, Middoth 54. A priest who had become unfit for service put on black garments and departed. One who was approved by the Sanhedrin clothed himself in white, and went in, and ministered.

3 EB (2) s.v. 'Priest.'

4 KB 2 90 f.; COT 1 281.

5 Others read Chemoshgad.

6 Renan, Miss. de Phén. 352.

The inscription tells us that Omri had oppressed Moab for a long time because Chemosh was wroth with his land (L. 4f.); the Israelites had occupied the district of Medeba forty years, but Chemosh had now restored it to Moab (L. 7-9); Chemosh drove out the king of Israel before Moab from Jahaz (L. 18-21); at the bidding of Chemosh, Mesha fought against Nebo and took it (L. 14-17); at his command, he made war on Horonaim, and Chemosh restored it to Moab (L. 31-33); the inhabitants of captured cities were slaughtered, 'a spectacle (?) מַשְׁחָה for Chemosh and Moab' (L. 11f.); men, women, and children were devoted to Ashtar-Chemosh (L. 15-17)—the מִלְכָּם (see BAN); the spoils of Israelite sanctuaries were carried off and presented to Chemosh (L. 12f, 17f.).

The religion of Moab in the ninth century was thus very similar to that of Israel: the historical books of the OT furnish parallels to almost every line of the inscription.

We learn from the OT that human sacrifices were offered to Chemosh, at least in great national emergencies; the king of Moab, shut up in Kir-hareseth and unable to cut his way out, offered his eldest son upon the wall; the effect of this extraordinary sacrifice was a great outburst of Chemosh's fury upon Israel, which compelled the invaders to return discomfited to their own land (2 K. 3.27). Priests of Chemosh are mentioned in Jer. 48.7; the language of Mesha, 'Chemosh said to me' (L. 14, 32), supposes an oracle, or perhaps prophets.

The worship of Chemosh as the national god did not exclude the worship of other gods; Mesha's inscription speaks of Ashtar-Chemosh (L. 17).

2. Other Moabite gods.—that is, most probably, an 'Ashtar (Astarte) who was associated in worship with Chemosh,¹ perhaps at a particular sanctuary. The worship of Baal-peor (Nu. 25, cp Hos. 9.10) was probably a local Moabite cult—there is no ground for identifying the god with Chemosh. (See BAAL-PEOR.) [Beth] Baal-meon (Mesha, L. 9, 30; OT) was, as the name shows, the seat of another local Baal cult. Mount Nebo may have received its name in the period of Babylonian supremacy; but we do not know that the worship of the Babylonian god was perpetuated by the Moabites. Cp NEBO.

The statement of Eusebius (OS 228.66ff., s.v. 'Αρειά) that the inhabitants of Areopolis in his day called their idol 'Αρειά, 'because they worshipped Ares,' seems to be the product of a complex misunderstanding.

In Judg. 11.24, in the argument of Jephthah with the king of the Ammonites, 'Chemosh thy god' is set over against 'Yahweh our god' in such a way as to imply that Chemosh was the national god of Ammon. From many passages in the OT we know, however, that the national god of the Ammonites was Milcom (see MILCOM) while Chemosh was the god of Moab.

3. Chemosh outside of Moab. The hypothesis that Chemosh and Milcom are but two names of the same god (Milcom originally a title) is excluded by the contexts in which they appear side by side (e.g., 1 K. 11.33). Nor is it sufficient to suppose that Chemosh in Judg. 11.24 is merely a slip on the part of the author or a scribe for Milcom: closer examination shows that the whole historical argument applies to Moab only, not to Ammon. Whatever explanation may be given of this incongruity (see Moore, Judges, 283; Bu. Richter, 80f.), the passage cannot be taken as evidence that Chemosh was the god of Ammon as well as of the sister people Moab. The statement of Suidas (s.v. Χαμὸς) that Chemosh was a god of the Tyrians and Ammonites is, as the context shows, a confused reminiscence of 1 K. 11.57.

From the name χλωδισβίλος, the second mythical Babylonian ruler after the flood (Frag. Hist. Gr. 2.503), it has been surmised that the worship of Chemosh was of Babylonian origin; the name of the city Carchemish on the Euphrates has been explained as 'Citadel of Chemosh'; neither of these theories has any other basis than a fortuitous similarity of sound.

Solomon built a high place for Chemosh on the MOUNT OF OLIVES (1 K. 11.7a), where, according to 2 K. 23.13, it stood until Josiah's reform—more than three hundred years.

During the long reign of the theory—not yet universally abandoned—that all the gods of the nations were heavenly bodies or meteoric phenomena, Chemosh was by some thought to be the sun, by others identified with Milcom-Moloch-Saturn; the one opinion has as little foundation as the other. In Roman times Rabbath-moab, as well as the more northern Ar-moab, was called Areopolis, and this name—perhaps originally only a Graecising of Ar (Jerome)—was understood as 'City of Ares.' Coins of Rabbath-moab in the reigns of Geta and Severus (Eckhel, iii. 504; cp Mionnet, v. 591, Suppl. viii. 388) exhibit a standing warrior in whom the type of Mars is to be recognised; but even if we were sure that the old Moabite god of the city is represented, and not the Nabataean Dusares, we could learn nothing about the nature of Chemosh in OT times from so late and contaminated a source. Confusion of Chemosh with Dusares is probably to be assumed in the statements of Jewish writers that the idol of Chemosh was a black stone—the same which is now adored by Moslems in the Caaba at Mecca.¹

The etymology of the name Chemosh is quite unknown: a fact which gives good reason to believe that he is one of the older Semitic gods.

CHERETHITES (כֶּרֶתִּים, חֶרֶתִּים, ⚙ in Sam. and K. ο χερεθθαι, or [by assimilation to Pelethites] ο χερεθθαι; Vg. Cerethi; ⚙ in Prophets κρητες), a people in the south of Palestine. In the days of Saul and David a region in the Negeb adjoining Judah and Caleb bore their name (1 S. 30¹⁴ χαλθει [B] χερθη [A] χορρι [L]). From v. 16 it appears that the inhabitants of this region were reckoned to the Philistines; in Zeph. 2⁵ and Ez. 25¹⁶ (AV Cherethims), also, Philistines and Cherethites are coupled in such a way as to show that they were regarded as one people. Finally, in the names mentioned in the prophecy against Egypt in Ez. 30⁵, where AV gives, 'the men of the land that is in league,' we should restore 'the Cherethites' (חֶרֶתִּים; so Cornill, Toy). It is to be inferred that the Cherethites were a branch of the Philistines; or, perhaps, that they were one of the tribes which took part with the Philistines in the invasion of Palestine, and that, like the latter, they remained behind when the wave receded (see PHILISTINES, § 2, CAPHTOR, § 2). The ⚙ translators of Zeph. and Ez. interpreted the name by Cretans; and in this, although they may have been guided only by the sound, they perhaps hit upon the truth.² An early connection between Gaza and Crete seems to be indicated by other evidence (see GAZA).

Except in the three passages already cited, the name occurs only in the phrase, 'the Cherethites and Pelethites' (חֶרֶתִּים וּפְלִיִּשְׁתִּים) ⚙ gen. φελεθθαι as the designation of a corps of troops in the service of David—his body-guard (2 S. 8¹⁸ 15¹⁸ 20⁷ 23 Kt., 1 K. 13⁴⁴ 1 Ch. 18¹⁷; σωματοφύλακες Jos. Ant. vii. 54, etc.).³ They were commanded by BENAIAH, 1, and remained faithful to their master in all the crises of his reign (2 S. 15²⁰ 1 K. 1).

Only the strongest reasons could warrant our separating the Cherethites of David's guard from the people of the same name spoken of in the same source (1 S. 30¹⁴). There are no such reasons: the כֶּרֶתִּים has the regular form of a gentile noun; and, although much ingenuity has been expended on the problem, all attempts to explain the word as an appellative have failed. The name Pelethite, which is found only coupled with Cherethite in the phrase above cited, also is a gentile noun; the etymological explanations are even more far-fetched than in the case of the Cherethites. The presumption is that the Pelethites also were Philistines;⁴ and this is confirmed by the passages cited from Zeph. and Ez.; פְּלִיִּשְׁתִּים is perhaps only a lisping pronunciation of פְּלִשְׁתִּים, to make it rhyme with כֶּרֶתִּים.

It need not surprise us that David's guard was composed of foreign mercenaries. The Egyptian kings of the nineteenth dynasty recruited their corps d'élite from the bold sea-rovers who periodically descended on their coasts; Rameses II. displays great pride in his Sardinian guards, and Sardinians and Libyans are the flower of the army of Rameses III.¹ The Philistines were more skilled in arms than the Israelites, and doubtless liked fighting better: cp ITTAI the Gittite, and see ARMY, § 4. It is the opinion of some recent scholars that where David's gibbōrim (EV 'mighty men') seem to be spoken of as a body, the Cherethites and Pelethites are meant; see especially 1 K. 18¹⁰ compared with v. 38. This is, however, not a necessary inference from the verses cited; and conflicts with 2 S. 20⁷ (cp 15¹⁸ ⚙). More probably the gibbōrim were the comrades of David in the days of his outlawry and the struggle with the Philistines for independence. See DAVID, § 11. In 2 S. 20²³ for 'Cherethites' the Heb. text (Kt.) has Carites (קָרִיתִים).² In 2 K. 11⁴ 19, where this name again occurs, it probably means 'Carians.' The Carians were a famous mercenary folk, and it would not surprise us to find them at Jerusalem in the days of Athaliah (see CARITES). That the soldiers of the guard in even later times were usually foreigners has been inferred from Zeph. 18^f. and from Ez. 44⁶ f.: see WRS OT/C⁽²⁾ 260 f., but also THRESHOLD. For mercenary troops in post-exilic times see ARMY, § 7.

CHERITH (כֶּרֶית, χορραθ [BAL]; χορρα [Onom.]). ELIJAH (q.v.) has just informed Ahab of the impending drought, when we are abruptly told that 'Yahwē's word came unto him, saying, Get thee hence' (i.e., presumably from Samaria), 'and turn to the east (מִזְרָחָא) and hide thyself in the torrent-valley of Cherith which is before (עַל-פְּנֵי) Jordan' (1 K. 17³⁵). This occurs in the first scene of the highly dramatic story of Elijah. In the second he appears in the far north of Palestine—at Zārēphath, which hardly suits Robinson's identification (BR 1558) of Chērith with the Wady el-Kelt (which is rather the Valley of ZEBOIM [q.v., 1.], at least if these two scenes stood in juxtaposition from the first. Besides this, the two names Kelt and Cherith begin with different palatals and since the expression 'before Jordan' is most naturally explained 'to the E. of the Jordan,'³ it is plausible to hold with Prof. G. A. Smith that the scene of Elijah's retreat must be sought in Gilead (HG 580). Let us, then, look across the Jordan eastward from Samaria (where Elijah may have had his interview with Ahab). The Wady 'Ajlūn and the Wady Rājib have been proposed by Thénus; the Wady el-Yābis by Mühlau. But, as C. Niebuhr (Gesch. 1291) points out, Elijah would certainly go to some famous holy place. Of the burial-place of Moses (Niebuhr) we know nothing; but 1 K. 19³⁹ suggests that the sanctuary was in the far south. It is true, Eus. and Jer. (OS 30269 11328) already place Cherith (Xoppa, Chorath) beyond Jordan. Josephus, however, makes Elijah depart 'into the southern parts' (Ant. viii. 132). What we have to do is to find a name which could, in accordance with analogies, be worn down and CHERUB, plural form Cherubim (כְּרִיבִים, כְּרִיבִים; χερουβ, χερουβ[ε]μοι, -[ε]μοι [BAL]; etymology disputed; Ps. 104:3 may allude to a popular [post-exilic] identification angelology. of כְּרִיבִים and כְּרִיבִים, but kerūb being, like kerūb, a loan-word, a Hebrew etymology is inadmissible). In the composite system of Jewish angelology the cherubim form one of the ten highest classes of angels, while another class is distinguished by the synonymous term 'living creatures' (hayyōth). These two classes, together with the 'ophannim' or 'wheels,' are specially attached to the throne of the divine glory, and it is the function of the cherubim to be bearers of the throne on its progresses through the worlds. The Jewish liturgy, like the 'Te Deum,' delights to associate the 'praises of Israel' (Ps. 223[4]) with those offered to God by the different classes of angels, and singles out for special mention in a portion of the daily morning service the 'ophannim, the hayyōth, and the seraphim. We find an approach to this conception in the Apocalypse, where the four ζῶα (Rev. 4:6-8), though—like the twenty-four πνεύματα—they are always mentioned apart from the angels, and discharge some altogether peculiar functions, are yet associated with the angels in the utterance of doxologies¹ (Rev. 4:8, 5:12-14, 7:10-12).

A similar view is suggested in the 'Similitudes' in Enoch, in one passage of which (61:10f.) 'the cherubim, seraphim, and 'ophannim, and all the angels of power' are combined under the phrase 'the host of God,' and unite in the ascription of blessedness to the 'Lord of Spirits,' while in another (chap. xl.) the 'four faces on the four sides of the Lord of Spirits' (a reminiscence of Ezek. 1:6) are identified or confounded with the archangels. Elsewhere, however, a somewhat different view is presented of the cherubim. They are the sleepless guardians of the 'throne of His glory' (71:7); they are the 'fiery cherubim' (14:1), and together with the seraphim (exceptionally called 'serpents,' ὄφιδες) are closely connected with Paradise, and placed under the archangel Gabriel (20:7). From these facts we gather that in the last two centuries B.C. there were different ways of conceiving the cherubim. Some writers had a

2. Ezek. 28:13-15 stronger sense of the peculiarity of the nature of the cherubim than others, and laid stress on such points as their connection with the divine fire, and with Paradise and its serpent-guardians. Whence did they derive a notion so suggestive of mythological comparisons?

The most reasonable answer is, From the earlier religious writings, supplemented and interpreted by a not yet extinct oral tradition. A tale of the serpents by the sacred tree (once probably serpent-demons) may have been orally handed down, but the conception of the fiery cherubim in God's heavenly palace is to be traced to the vision in Ezek. 1, and to the account of the 'mountain of God' in Eden, with its 'stones of fire' and its cherub-guardian, in Ezek. 28:13-15. These two passages of Ezekiel form the next stage in our journey. The latter must be treated first, as being evidently a faithful report of a popular tradition. Unfortunately the received Hebrew text is faulty, and an intelligible exegesis of the passage is rarely given. Keil, for instance, admits some reference to Paradise, but feels obliged to infer from the epithet 'that covereth' (הַסֹּכֵךְ) that 'the place of the cherub in the sanctuary (Ex. 25:20) was also present to the prophet's mind.' Nor is the difficulty confined to this epithet and to the equally strange word (מְכַסֶּה) which Vg. renders 'extensus,' and EV 'anointed' (so Theodot.); the opening phrase אֲתִכְרֹב, whether rendered 'thou wast the cherub' or (pointing differently) 'with the cherub,'¹ baffles comprehension. It is necessary, therefore, to correct the text of vv. 13-15; we shall then arrive at the following sense:—

'Thou wast in Eden, the divine garden; of all precious stones was thy covering—cornelian, etc.; and of gold were thy . . . worked; in the day when thou wast made were they prepared. To be . . . had I appointed thee; thou wast upon the holy, divine mountain; amidst the stones of fire didst thou walk to and fro.² Then wast thou dishonoured (being cast) out of the divine mountain, and the cherub destroyed thee (hurling thee) out of the midst of the stones of fire.'

The sense now becomes fairly clear. We have here a tradition of Paradise distinct from that in Gen. 2 and 3. Favoured men, it appears, could be admitted to the divine garden, which glittered with precious stones (or, as they are also called, 'stones of fire') like the mythic tree which the hero Gilgames saw in the Babylonian epic,³ or like the interior of the temples of Babylon or Tyre,⁴ or like the walls and gates and streets of the new Jerusalem in the Apocalypse. But these privileged persons were still liable to the sin of pride, and such a sin would be their ruin. This Ezekiel applies to the case of the king of Tyre, who reckoned himself the favourite of his god, and secure of admission to Paradise.

The idea of the passage is closely akin to that expressed in Is. 14:13-15. The king of Babylon believes that by his unique position and passionate devotion to the gods he is assured of entering that glorious cosmic temple of which his splendid terrace-temples are to him the symbols. Towards Marduk he is humility itself, but to the unnamed prophet of Yahweh he seems proud even to madness. From that heaven of which in his thoughts he is already the inhabitant, the prophet sees him hurled as a lifeless corpse to an ignoble grave. This is just what Ezekiel holds out in prospect to the king of Tyre, and the destroying agent is the cherub. How different this idea of the cherub from that of the apocalyptic ζῶα!

We have again a different conception of the cherubim in Ezekiel's vision (Ez. 1).⁵ The prophet has not the old unquestioning belief in tradition, and modifies the traditional data so as to produce effective

3. Ezek. 1:10 symbols of religious ideas. Out of the elaborate description it is enough to select a few salient points. Observe then that the one cherub of the tradition in ch. 28 has now become four cherubim (cp Rev. 4:6-8), each of which has four faces, one looking each way, viz. that of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle, and human hands on his four sides. They are not, however, called cherubim, but hayyōth

² According to the ordinary view which makes the Tyrian prince a cherub, the plumage of the cherub of Ezekiel's tradition was resplendent as if with gold and precious stones. But surely it was not merely as a griffin, nor as a griffin's fellow, that the Tyrian prince was placed (as the prophet dramatically states) in Paradise, but as one of the 'sons of Elohim'; and the covering spoken of is a state-dress besprinkled with precious stones. 'Stones of fire' means 'flashing stones,' like the Assyrian aban šāti, 'stone of fire,' one of the names of a certain precious stone (Friedr. Del. Par. 118).

('living creatures'), until we come to 93, and Ezekiel tells us (10²⁰) that he did not 'know that they were cherubim' till he heard them called so by God (10²). By this he implies that his own description of them differed so widely from that received by tradition that without the divine assurance he could not have ventured to call them cherubim. Sometimes, however, he speaks of them in the singular ('the living creature,' 1²⁰⁻²²; 'the cherub,' 93, 10²⁴, if MT is correct), apparently to indicate that, being animated by one 'spirit,' the four beings formed but one complex phenomenon. The fourfold character of the cherub is caused by the new function (relatively to the account in ch. 28) which is assigned to it; in fact, it has now become the bearer of the throne of God (more strictly of the 'firmament' under the throne 1²²⁻²⁶). But the whole appearance was at the moment bathed in luminous splendour, so that the seer needed reflection to realise it. We will therefore not dwell too much on what must be to a large extent peculiar to Ezekiel and artificially symbolic, and in so far belongs rather to the student of biblical theology. All that it is important to add is that the divine manifestation takes place within a storm-cloud, and that a fire which gives out flashes of lightning burns brightly between the cherubim; also that there are revolving wheels beside the cherubim, animated by the same 'spirit' as the living creatures, and as brilliant as the chrysolith or topaz; and that in his vision of the temple Ezekiel again modifies his picture of the cherubim, each cherub having there but two faces, that of a man and that of a lion (41^{18 f.}).

Another group of passages on the cherubim is found in the Psalter, viz. Ps. 18^{10 f.} [11^{f.}] 80^{1[2]} 99¹, and to the latter we may join not only Ps.

4. Some post-exilic passages. 223⁴], but phrases in 1 S. 4⁴ 2 S. 6² 1 Ch. 13⁶ 2 K. 19¹⁵ (= Is. 37¹⁶). All these passages are post-exilic.¹ In the first we read, 'He bowed the heavens and came down, and thick clouds were under his feet; he mounted the cherub and flew, he came swooping upon the wings of the wind.' That there is a mythical conception here is obvious, but it has grown very pale, and does not express much more than Ps. 104³⁶. The conception agrees with that of Ezekiel; the cherub (only one is mentioned, but this does not exclude the existence of more) is in some sense the divine chariot, and has some relation to the storm-wind and the storm-clouds. The other psalm-passages appear at first sight to give a new conception of the cherubim, who are neither the guards of the 'mountain of God,' nor the chariot of the moving Deity, but the throne on which he is seated. It may be questioned, however, whether the phrase 'enthroned upon the cherubim' is not simply a condensed expression for 'seated on the throne which is guarded by the cherubim.' Both in the Psalter and in the narrative-books it is the heavenly throne of Yahwè which is meant, the throne from which (as is implied in Ps. 80^{1[2]} 99¹ and 2 K. 19¹⁵) he rules the universe and guides the destiny of the nations. That is the only change which has taken place in the conception of the cherubim; they have been definitely transferred to heaven, and, strictly speaking, their occupation as bearers of the Deity should have gone, for the 'angels' are sufficient links between God and the world of men. Or rather there is yet another point in which the cherub idea has been modified; it is indicated in Ps. 223⁴ (4) where, if the text is correct,² Yahwè is addressed as 'enthroned,' not upon the cherubim, but 'upon the praises of Israel.' The idea is that the cherubim in heaven have now the great new function of praising God, and that in the praiseful services of the temple, where God is certainly in some degree present, the congregation takes the place of the cherubim. This at any rate agrees with later beliefs, and may be illustrated by the direction in Ex. 25²⁰ (P) that the faces of the cherubim on the ark shall be 'towards the mercy-seat' (kappôreth). The meaning of the priestly theorist (for the description is imaginary, the ark having long ago disappeared) is, that the cherubim are a kind of higher angels who surround the earthly throne of Yahwè and contemplate and praise his glory. It is also stated that their faces are to be 'one to another,' and, if we add to this that they have to guard, not Yahwè, but the sacramental sign of his favour, we get three points in which the cherubim of the priestly writer are closely analogous to the seraphim of the vision of Isaiah (Is. 6).

We now come to the cherubim in the temple of Solomon. Carved figures of cherubim were prominent in the decoration of the walls and the doors, and two colossal cherubim stood in the debîr or 'adytum,' where they 'formed a kind of daïs, one wing being horizontally stretched towards the lateral wall, whilst the other overshadowed the ark, a felicitous arrangement resulting in charming effects'¹ (see 1 K. 6²³⁻³⁵). Obviously they are the guards of the sacred ark and its still more sacred contents. Cp TEMPLE.

There is no record of any myth which directly accounts for the temple-cherubim. But an old tradition

6. Paradise story. said that after the first human pair had been driven out of the divine garden, Yahwè 'stationed at the east of the Garden of Eden the cherubim and the blade of the whirling sword,'² and the function of these two allied but independent powers was 'to guard the way to the tree of life' (Gen. 3²⁴). Neither in this case, nor in the preceding one, is any account given of the physiognomy of the cherubim. In the height of the mythological period no such account was needed.

We see therefore that the most primitive Hebrew myth described the cherubim as beings of superhuman

7. Development. power and devoid of human sympathies, whose office was to drive away intruders from the abode of God, or of the gods. Originally this abode was conceived of as a mountain, or as a garden on the lower slopes of a mountain, and as glittering with a many-coloured brightness. But when the range of the supreme god's power became wider, when from an earth-god he became also a heaven-god, the cherub too passed into a new phase; he became the divine chariot. We have no early authority for this view, but the age which produced the story of Elijah's ascent to heaven in a fiery chariot (2 K. 2¹¹) may be supposed to have known of fiery cherubs on which Yahwè rode. At a still later time, the cherubim, though still spoken of by certain writers, were no longer indispensable.³ The forces of nature were alike Yahwè's guards and his ministers. Mythology became a subject of special learning, and its details acquired new meanings, and the cherub-myth passed into an entirely new phase.

There is much that is obscure about the form of the primitive Israelitish cherub. It was in the main a land-animal, but it had wings. That is all that we know, though a probable conjecture (see below) may lead us further. As to the meaning of the cherubim, they have been thought to represent the storm-clouds which sometimes hang around the mountain peaks, sometimes rush 'on the wings of the wind,' sending forth arrow-like flashes of lightning. This theory is consistent with the language of Ps. 18⁹ f. Ez. 14^f. 24, and the passages in Enoch, but hardly explains the symbolism of the cherub in its earliest historically known

8. Origin. forms. At any rate, we can affirm positively that the myth is of foreign origin. Lenormant thought that he had traced it to Babylonia,¹ on the ground that kirūbu occurs on a talisman as a synonym for šidu, a common term for the divine bull-guardian of temples and palaces. This theory however is not confirmed as regards the derivation of כְּרֻב (see ZA 168 f. [86]). We may indeed admit that Ezekiel probably mingled the old Palestinian view of the cherub with the analogous Babylonian conception of the divine winged bulls. But, so far as can be seen at present, the early Hebrew cherub came nearer to the griffin, which was not divine, but the servant of the Deity, and the origin of which is now assigned to the Hittites of Syria.² The idea of this mythic form is the combination of parts of the two strongest animals of air and land—the lion and the eagle, and a reminiscence of this may perhaps be traced in the reference to these animals in Ez. 10. It was adopted by various nations, but to understand its true significance we must go, not to Egypt nor to Greece, but to the Hittites, whose originality in the use of animal-forms is well known. The Hittite griffin appears almost always, in contrast to many Babylonian representations, not as a fierce beast of prey, but seated in calm dignity like an irresistible guardian of holy things. It is only on later Syrian monuments that the Sun-god is represented in a chariot³ drawn by griffins, which agrees with a statement respecting the Indian sun-god in Philostratus's Life of Apollonius (348). The Egyptians imported this form, probably from Syria or Canaan at the beginning of the New Empire, but the griffin never acquired among them the religious significance of the Sphinx.⁴ The Phoenicians, and probably the Canaanites, and through them the Israelites, evidently attached greater importance to the griffin or cherub, and it is said that among the discoveries at Zenjirli in N. Syria (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, § 2) is a genuine representation of this mythic form as described in Ez. 41:18 f.⁵ Whether the sculptured quadruped with a bearded human head, Assyrian in type, discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneau in the subterranean quarries in the north of Jerusalem,⁶ is rightly called a cherub seems very doubtful.

CHINNERETH (כִּנְרֶת), in Josh. 13.27 $\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ [B], $\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\omega\theta$ [AL]; 19.35, $\kappa\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ [B], $\chi\epsilon\mu$. [L], $\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\omega\theta$ [A]; in Dt., כִּנְרֶת, 'from Chinnereth'; $\mu\alpha\chi\alpha\mu\alpha\rho\epsilon\theta$ [B], $\alpha\mu\alpha\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho$. [AF], $\alpha\mu\alpha\chi$. [L], the name of one of the 'fenced cities' of Naphtali (Josh. 19.35). Possibly it is also referred to in 1 K. 15.20, where we should perhaps read 'and Abel-beth-maacah, and Chinneroth, and all the land of Naphtali.'¹² It is of great antiquity, for it occurs under the form kn-na-ra-lu in the list of places conquered by Thotmes III., n. 34 (RP⁽²⁾ 5.45; WMM As. u. Eur. 84). It is also given (1), with the prefix 'sea of,' to the Galilean lake (Nu. 34.11 [$\chi\epsilon\mu\alpha\rho\alpha$ BF, $\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ AL] Josh. 13.27); (2) to the same inland 'sea' without that prefix (Dt. 3.17, cp. Josh. 11.2 and see below). The site of the town can no longer be identified.

Jerome identified it with Tiberias (OS 112.29); some rabbins with a town at the S. of the lake called Beth-jerach (probably the Tarichæa of Josephus). Others included Sanbari (the Sennabris of Jos. E/iii. 9.7) under the designation; a third extended the application of the name to Beth-shean (Ber. rabba, par. 98, Wünsche). This vagueness sufficiently shows that nothing was known as to the site of the ancient town. Cp. Neubauer, Géog. Talm., 214 f.

On the derivation of Chinnereth, see GENNESARET.

² ואת כנרת ואת כל-ארץ נפתלי. ואת. \mathfrak{C} , in 2 Ch. 16.14, however, presupposes כְּנָרֶת נפתלי (τάς περιχώρους; see Ki., SBOT).

CHINNEROTH ([Gins. כִּנְרֹת or [Bä.] כִּנְרֹת, the 'pluralis extensus' of CHINNERETH) is the name applied (1), with the prefix 'sea of,' to the Galilean lake in Josh. 12.3 ($\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ [BFL], $\chi\epsilon\mu$. [A]), (2), without this prefix (cp. Dt. 3.17), to the same lake in Josh. 11.2 ($\kappa\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\omega\theta$ [B], $\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ [A], $\epsilon\theta$ [FL]), (3), in the spelling CHINNEROTH (AV only), to a district (?) in Naphtali laid waste by Benhadad king of Damascus (1 K. 15.20, $\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\epsilon\theta$ [AL], $\chi\epsilon\mu\epsilon\rho\omega\theta$ [B]). See CITY, § 2 (f.), n. The second and third passages need a brief comment. In 1 K. 15.20, Ewald (Hist. 2.290, n. 6) explains 'all Chinneroth' to mean the W. shore of Lake Merom and the Sea of Galilee and of that part of the Jordan which flows between those lakes; Thenius, the basin which extends from Lake Merom to the upper point of the Sea of Galilee. Such a large extent of meaning, however, is improbable. Unless we adopt the correction suggested above (CHINNERETH) it is best to suppose Chinneroth to mean here the shores (or the W. or E. shore alone) of that famous lake. In support of this explanation, the second passage mentioned above (Josh. 11.2) may be appealed to.

The text, however, is not quite correct. The rendering 'in the Arabah south of Chinneroth' (RV) can hardly be defended. The difficulty lies in כִּנְרֶת, for which it is better with Di. to read נְקָרָה (\mathfrak{C} BAFL $\alpha\pi\epsilon\nu\alpha\nu\tau\iota$); we shall then get the phrase 'in the Arabah over against Chinneroth.' This may be a designation of the fertile plain called el-Ghuruweir, the GENNESARET of the Synoptic Gospels, in which the town of Chinnereth was presumably situated. Cp. GENNESARET, and JUDAH UPON JORDAN.

CHIOS (χίος [Ti. WH]: Chius), the beautiful and fruitful Scio, the central member of the triad of large islands lying off the coast of Asia Minor. It has little connection with biblical history, but the solitary mention of it (Acts 20.15) very clearly indicates its geographical position. Paul returning from Macedonia, to keep Pentecost at Jerusalem, touched at Mitylene in Lesbos; next day he was 'over against' Chios ($\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\gamma\eta\tau\eta\sigma\alpha\mu\epsilon\nu \acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\iota\kappa\rho\upsilon\varsigma \chi\iota\omicron\upsilon$); probably somewhere about Cape Argennum, mod. Asprokavo, which was a place of anchorage (Polyb. 168). On the third day at Samos. The ship evidently anchored each night and sailed with the early morning breeze, which prevails generally in the Ægean during the summer, blowing from the N. and dying away in the afternoon. The run from Mitylene to Chios is something over 50 m. Herod's voyage as related in Jos. Ant. xvi. 22, in the reverse direction, illustrates the apostle's journey.

Strabo describes the town as having a good harbour with anchorage for eighty ships (645). Paul possibly lay becalmed in the channel (about 7 m. wide), and may not have landed. The island was noted for its wines (Strabo, 645, 657). W. J. W.

The position of the place on the main road N., in the pass between Tabor and the hills of Nazareth, explains its strategical value, as witnessed in its various appearances in history.

king, and Chiun your images, the star of your god.' AV, RV^{mg.} differ by rendering סִכּוּת, 'the tabernacle (of)'. These words have long been a puzzle to scholars. The primary question is, whether they should be considered appellatives or proper nouns. The problem is ancient, as appears from the phenomena of the versions (see below, § 2). Into the syntactical and exegetical difficulties of v. 26, taken with its context, we cannot here enter; our object is to consider the explanation of the above-mentioned words offered by Schrader (St. Kr. 324 ff. [74], and COT 2:141 f.), which, though widely accepted, fails to satisfy some good critics. According to Schrader's theory סִכּוּת is to be pointed סִכּוּת, the former representing the divine name Sakutt, the latter Kaiwān. Oppert had already recognised in Chiun the Babylonian Kaiwān, and this identification may be regarded as almost certain. The word is of frequent occurrence in Babylonian mythological and religious texts as the name of the planet Saturn. It is of uncertain meaning and etymology.

Other Semitic peoples have preserved the same name, probably as loan words, for Saturn is called by the Mandæans כִּיּוֹן, by the Syrians كايون, and by the Persians Kaiwān (for references to the occurrence of the word in Babylonian texts, see Jensen, Kosmol. 111 ff.).

The name Siccuth presents much greater difficulties. Schrader has shown that the name Sak-kut, which is probably the same as the Siccuth of the text, is used in a Babylonian list as a name, or an ideographic writing, for the god Ninib (2 R. 57:40). Ninib, however, appears to be the god of the planet Kaiwanu or Saturn (see Jensen, Kosmol. 136 ff.; Lotz, Quaest. de hist. Sabbati, 27 ff.). We seem, therefore, to be brought to the conclusion that Sakkuth and Kaiwan are the same (which would be still more clear if it could be shown with certainty that SAG-UŠ, 2 R. 32 no. 3 l. 25, might be read Sak-kut, as Oppert and Schrader believe). Not all the steps in the argument made to connect Sak-kut and Kaiwan are perfectly clear. Still, indirect confirmation of the correctness of the result has lately come to hand, the two words having been found together in a mythological text. In the Šurpu texts Sak-kut and Kaiwānu are invoked together (4 R. 52 col. 4 l. 9; cp Zimmern, Beit. zur Kenntniss der Bab. Rel., 1896, p. 10 l. 179). In this text at least the two words Sak-kut and Kaiwan appear together as they do in Amos.

[Not improbably, according to Che., there is a reference to Saccuth-Kaiwān in 2 K. 17:30 (see SUCCOTH-BENOTH) and another to Kaiwan in a passage of Ezekiel. 'The image of jealousy' in Ezek. 8:3 is not a possible title; קִנְיָה seems to be a corruption of כִּיּוֹן. The word for 'image' is סִכּוּת; it was probably a statue of Kaiwan which Ezekiel saw (in ecstasy) 'northward of the altar gate' in the outer court of the temple, unless indeed סִכּוּת (Idol, § 1 c.) should rather be סִכּוּת—i.e., lamassu, one of the names for the colossal winged bulls which guarded the entrances of Assyrian and Babylonian palaces and temples (cp Ezek. 8:3 where, however, read סִכּוּת, 'at the entrance,' with Grä. for סִכּוּת). At any rate, we now seem to know the period to which the interpolation of Am. 5:26 refers (see further Che., Exp. Times, 10:142, Dec. '98).

The connection of Siccuth and Chiun with the Babylonian name and the ideographic value for the planet Saturn agree well with their juxtaposition in Am. 5:26, and if כִּיּוֹן and סִכּוּת are transposed, the verse becomes at least intelligible (see Schr. ib., and cp Orelli, ad loc.). The phenomena of Che.'s text, however, and

2. Text. also those of the MT, suggest the inference that there may be a more deeply-seated corruption (see AMOS, § 13).

[For the כִּיּוֹן of Heb. text שִׁבְעָא Symm. give תִּן סִכּוּתִי—i.e., סִכּוּת (cp Acts 7:43), Pesh. ܫܝܬܐ, Aq. ܫܝܬܐ, Theod. τὴν ὄρασιν, Vg. tabernaculum, Tg. (Lag.) סִכּוּת, which confirms MT. For כִּיּוֹן (Heb. text and Tg.), Aq. and Symm. have χίον, Theod. ἀμάρωσιν, Vg. imaginem (for Θ see REMPHAN). The pointing of MT seems to be suggested by that of קִנְיָה, 'abomination' = 'idol'; cp קִנְיָה. For references to recent critics see AMOS, § 13, and cp Che., Exp. Jan. 1897, pp. 42-44.]

CHLOE (χλόη [Ti. WH]), a woman of whom nothing is known, save that 'they of Chloe' (οἱ χλόης) were the first to let Paul know at Ephesus of the division which had arisen in the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 1:11).

Whether she belonged to Ephesus or to Corinth, who the members of her household were, whether even she was a Christian or not, are questions on all of which only conjectures can be offered. It is possible, but hardly probable, that Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus (1 Cor. 16:17 f.) may have been servants of Chloe.

CHOBA (חֹבָא [BA], חֶבְאָא [N], حبة [Lag.], حبة [Walton]), called in Judith 15:4 f. Chobai (חֹבַי [BN^{ca}A], חֶבְאָא [N*], in 15:5 חֹבָא [BNA], حبة [Lag.]), is mentioned in connection with the defensive measures of the Jews against Holofernes (Judith 4:4). Reland (p. 721) proposed the Coabis of the Tab. Peut. near Jericho, a site that would agree with both the Greek and the Syriac of Judith 4:4; and in connection with it Conder (PEF Mem. 2:231) points to the ruin el-Mekhubby and the cave Arāḥ el K'hubby on the Roman road 3 m. from Tūbās (see THEBEZ) and 11 from Beisān.

CHOIR. The subject of the hereditary choirs, or better, guilds of singers is considered elsewhere (see

1. Members. PSALMS). We content ourselves here with the Talmudic statements relative to the Temple choir in the narrower sense of the word, postponing, however, the question of choral psalms. The Talmud affirms that the choir in the Second Temple consisted of not less than twelve adult Levites, nine of whom played on the instrument called the Kinnor (lyre?), two on the Nebel (lute?), while the remaining one beat the šēšēlim (cymbals). This number might, however, be exceeded on the occasion of festivals (Mish. Erach. 2:3-5). No statement is made as to the number of the singers whom these musicians accompanied, from which Grätz infers that the instrumental and the vocal music were performed by the same persons. This seems to illustrate Ps. 92:2 [3] 3 [4] (Che.)—

Good is it to give thanks to Yahwē,
To make melody to the name of the Most High,
To the sound of the horn and the lute,
To the sweetly sounding notes of the lyre.

Certainly the most important duty of the choir of Levites was the service of song. The Talmud also states that boys' voices were called in to modify the deep bass of the men's voices. The choir-boys did not stand on the platform with the Levites, but lower down, so that their heads were on a level with the feet of the Levites. They were sons of persons of rank in Jerusalem (בְּנֵי יְקִירֵי יְרוּשָׁה, Talm. Erach. 136). See Grätz, Psalmen, 65 f.; Del., Ps. 26 f., 372; and cp MUSIC, § 13 f.

The duty of the choir is briefly summed up in Neh. 12:24 2 Ch. 5:13. It is לְהוֹדִיעַ וּלְהַלֵּל, i.e., to raise the strain of praise (Hallelū=praise ye) and thanksgiving (Hōdū=give ye thanks). See HALLEL, CONFESSION, § 3. The formula of 'thanksgiving which served as a refrain in the later eucharistic songs was, 'For he is good, for his loving-kindness is for ever' (2 Ch. 5:13 73 6 Ezra 3:11 Jer. 33:11—the last passage has been expanded by a late writer—and cp the psalms beginning 'Give thanks unto Yahweh'). Were there any female singers in the temple choirs? From Neh. 7:67 Peritz infers that there were ('Women in the Ancient Hebrew Cult,' JBL 17:148 [198]).

Strange to say, the word 'choirs' occurs but once, and only in RVmg Mattaniah (if this mg. is right) was 'over the choirs' (MT תִּירְיָהּ, Neh. 12:8. Del. (Psalmen 26), Ry., and Kau. (HS), however, give 'choir' as the rendering of תִּירְיָהּ in Neh. 12:31, where RV has 'companies that gave thanks.' This may be accepted, but the mg. 'choirs' in 12:8 is but a confession of the great improbability of MT. Neither תִּירְיָהּ nor תִּירְיָהּ (which Ry. and Kön. prefer) can be naturally defended. Read תִּירְיָהּ, 'over the thanksgiving' (Böttch., Ol., Guthe). EV in Neh. 12:8, therefore, virtually corrects the text. GL ἐπὶ τῶν ἐξομολογήσεων: GBNA pointed תִּירְיָהּ (ἐπὶ τῶν χειρῶν). CHORAZIN (χοραζην [Ti. WH] Mt. 11:21 Lk. 10:13 Eus. OS 303:77 χωρ.). In these two passages Jesus calls woe upon Chorazin and Bethsaida (and immediately after on Capernaum) as towns in which his wonderful works have produced no effect. From his direct address to all three, they appear to have lain together within his sight. Jerome (OS 114:7 Chorozain) places Chorazin 2 R.m. from Capernaum (Euseb. 12 R.m., but this seems a copyist's error). In his commentary on Is. 9:1 Jerome describes the town as on the shore of the lake—like Capernaum, Tiberias, and Bethsaida. From this Robinson (BR 3359 ff.) argues for the site at Tell Hüm. But about 1 m. N. of Tell Hüm, in a shallow wādy running from the Lake into the hills, there are black basalt ruins, including those of a large synagogue, with Corinthian columns, which bear the name Kerazeh (PEF Mem. 1:400-2). Now, Willibald (722) says that he went from Capernaum to Bethsaida, thence to Chorazin, and thence to the sources of the Jordan—a course which, in spite of what Robinson asserts, suits Kerazeh as it does not suit either Tell Hüm, or any other site on the Lake. Accordingly, most moderns, since Thomson discovered the site in 1857, agree that Kerazeh is Chorazin, and take Jerome's statement as either vague or inaccurate. (Robinson thinks the name may have drifted from Tell Hüm to Kerazeh.) Jesus calls Chorazin a city and treats it as comparable with Tyre and Sidon. The ruins are extensive, and there are traces of a paved road connecting the site with the great trunk road from Capernaum to Damascus.

The Bab. Talmud (Menahoth 85a) praises the wheat of Chorazin (כּוֹרֶזִין cp Neubauer, Geog. Talm. 220). In the days of Eusebius and Jerome (330 and 400 A.D.) the place was in ruins. Willibald found a Christian Church there. G. A. S.

The name follows Simon (=Shimeon in || Ezra 10:31), and hence may represent one of the three names in Ezra 10:32 otherwise omitted in 1 Esd. Possibly in a poor MS only the final γ of Malluch and the third name Shemariah were legible, and out of these the scribe made Choshamiah (Ball, Var. Apoc.). Otherwise the name has arisen from Hashum (חֲשׁוּם), v. 33; but the Syr. ܟܫܡܝܐ still remains a difficulty.

CHRISTIAN, NAME OF. We can readily understand that the followers of Jesus confessed to the name of their Master whenever occasion arose. On the other hand, the time, the place, and the circumstances of the origin of the name Χριστιανός as a specific designation are obscure. According to Acts 11:26 the matter seems a simple one; but, with this passage before us, it is remarkable how seldom the name

1. Infrequency. occurs elsewhere in the records of early Christianity. In the NT the only other places where it is found are Acts 26:28 and 1 Pet. 4:16. It is certainly not alluded to in Acts 5:41; for 'the name' on account of which the apostles suffer dishonour was, as we are expressly told in v. 40, the name of Jesus. This passage, accordingly, belongs to the same category as Mk. 9:37 41—where, besides, the words 'because ye are Christ's' after ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι μου (so Ti.) may be merely the explanatory marginal gloss of some early reader—and Mk. 13:13. In Ja. 2:7 also, the 'honourable name' by which the readers are called is not the name 'Christian,' but the name of Christ himself as their Lord; for the expression is to be explained in the same sense as Am. 9:12 ('the heathen, which are called by my name')—viz., by reference to 2 S. 12:28 ('lest . . . it be called after my name'). All passages of this class must here be left out of account, inasmuch as they do not presuppose the specific name 'Christian.' The name is presupposed, as far as the NT is concerned, only in Lk. 6:22 (τὸ ὄνομα ὑμῶν).

Outside of the NT, according to the exhaustive researches of Lipsius,¹ the name does not occur in either of the epistles ascribed to Clement of Rome; it is absent from Barnabas, Hermas, Polycarp, the Pseudo-Clementine Homilies, Tatian, and the Cohortatio ad Græcos. The Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions, as also the Catholic Acts of Peter and Paul, have it only in a few passages of later insertion; so also with the Gnostic writings. As a word in regular use it makes its earliest appearances in the Apologists—Justin, Athenagoras, Theophilus, Minucius Felix—and in the 'Epistle to Diognetus,' in Ignatius, who uses also the word Χριστιανισμός, in the 'Martyrdom of Polycarp,' in the Catholic κήρυγμα Πέτρου, in the letter of the churches of Lugdunum and Vienna (Eus. HE 5:1 f.), in Irenæus, Tertullian, and Clement of Alexandria. To this list must be added the passage in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (124), discovered after the publication of Lipsius's essay.

Lipsius, it is true, points out allusions to the existence of the name 'Christian' in older writings. As far as Hermas, however, is concerned, the only valid passage is Sim. ix. 17 4.

The phrase is ἐπὶ τῷ ὀνόματι τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ καλεῖσθαι. Such expressions as τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ φορεῖν (ix. 12 2 f. 14 5 f. 16 3) or λαμβάνειν (ix. 18 7) or φέρειν (Polycarp, 6 3) do not necessarily presuppose the word Χριστιανός, and the simple phrase τὸ ὄνομα φορεῖν (Sim. ix. 12 2 f.), or πάσχειν διὰ τὸ ὄνομα, or ἐνεκα τοῦ ὀνόματος (ix. 28 3 5; Vis. iii. 1 9 2 1), in several cases is clearly in juxtaposition to the words τὸ ὄνομα τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ or τοῦ κυρίου (Sim. ix. 13 3, 28 2-6; Vis. iii. 5 2).

Even 1 Clem. 14:3 f. cannot with certainty be taken in the sense which is so abundantly plain in Justin (Apol. 14): Χριστιανοὶ εἶναι κατηγοροῦμεθα τὸ δὲ χρηστὸν μισεῖσθαι οὐ δίκαιον. This play upon words seems, besides, to be sufficiently explained by the consideration that χρηστός had at that time the same pronunciation as χριστός. Tertullian (Ap. 3; Ad Nat. 13), however, expressly says that the Gentiles perperam or corrupte pronounced it Chrestiani. Χρηστιανοὶ is the reading in all three NT passages of the uncorrected NT; it preponderates in the inscriptions; and Justin, according to Blass (Hermes, 1895, pp. 465-470), associates this word with χρηστός in his Apology (i. 44 49; ii. 6, where, as he says, κεχρησθαι ought to be read), just as in his Dialogue with Trypho he associates it with χρῆν. Blass con-jectures from this that the Pagans to whom the Apology is addressed had derived the words 'anointed, followers of the anointed,' which were mysterious to them, by a popular etymology from χρησμός; and Justin, for simplicity's sake, accepted the derivation without seeking to correct it.

We have thus seen that the name was left unused by a series of Christian writers at a time when it was already

2. Possible early origin. familiar to the younger Pliny (Epist. 10.96 [97]) in 112 A.D., to Tacitus (Ann. 15.44) in 116-117 A.D., and to Suetonius (Nero, 16) in 120 A.D. The plain fact is that they did not need it. For designating their community there lay at their command an ample variety of expressions,¹ such as 'brethren,' 'saints,' 'elect,' 'called,' 'that believed,' 'faithful,' 'disciples,' 'they that are in Christ,' 'they that are in the Lord,' 'they that are Christ's,' and ['any . . . of the way'?). It follows that, notwithstanding its absence from their writings, the name of Christian may very well have originated at a comparatively early time.

It can hardly, however, have been current at so early a date as that indicated in Acts 11.26.

The famine predicted at that time, according to Acts 11.28, occurred in Palestine between the years 44 and 48. (The belief that it extended over the whole of the habitable world is a mistake.) The prediction itself must, of course, have been earlier. Indeed, the expression, 'which came to pass in the days of Claudius,' may be held to imply that it was made before the accession of that emperor—that is to say, before 41 A.D. With this it agrees that the death of Herod Agrippa I. (44 A.D.) is mentioned in the following chapter (12).

Some fifteen years later, or more, the claim to be 'of Christ' was made by a single party in Corinth (1 Cor. 1.12).

Presumably certain personal disciples of Jesus had first applied this designation to themselves, whilst denying to Paul the right to be so called, as also his right to the apostleship (2 Cor. 10.7). Paul, on the other hand, takes great pains to establish the right of all believers in Christ to the designation (1 Cor. 1.3.23; also 7.22.15.23. Rom. 8.1 Gal. 3.29.5.24).

Thus it can hardly have been already a current name.

As for Jesus himself, it is permissible to doubt whether he used in their present forms such expressions as we now find in Mk. 9.37.41.13.13—that is to say, with the emphasis upon his own name. The theory that he presupposes the currency of the name 'Christians' in Lk. 6.22 is absolutely excluded by the consideration that, according to the same gospel, he does not himself lay claim to the name of Christ till later (9.20), and even then wishes it to be kept secret, and further that, according to the same author (Acts 11.26), the name 'Christians' did not arise till a considerable time after his death.

All this makes it more than doubtful whether the writer had even here any trustworthy authority for assigning the occurrence to so early a date. His reason for doing so may have been simply that the founding of the first Gentile Christian church seemed to be the most likely occasion for its coming into use.

The suddenness with which the name 'Christian' becomes one of frequent occurrence in the writings of

3. Used by and with Pagans. the apologists shows that the word first became necessary for Christians in their dealings with Pagans. In speaking to the latter, such periphrases as 'those of Christ' were found to be inadequate: a definite name was wanted. In fact, it is probable enough that the name came from the heathen themselves in the first instance. With such a view of its origin Acts 11.26 fits in very well. At all events, the name did not come from the Jews. These were still looking for their Messiah. By using a name which signified 'those of the Messiah,' they would by implication have justified the sect that regarded Jesus as such, and so have stultified themselves. Even Herod Agrippa II., notwithstanding his Greek training and the indifference towards his ancestral religion which this carried with it, could not have gone so far; moreover, he still held by Judaism to the extent at least that he insisted upon King Azizus of Emesa and King Polemo of Cilicia being circumcised before being allowed to marry his sisters Drusilla and Berenice (Jos. Ant. xx.7.13 [§§ 139, 145 f.]). If, accordingly, the saying attributed to him in Acts 26.28¹ is authentic, the name 'Christian' must by that time have become so thoroughly established that its etymological meaning was no longer thought of.

The whole scene, however, is in full accord with the tendency of Acts (see ACTS, § 51) to set forth Paul's innocence, and at the same time the truth of Christianity, as accepted by the Roman authorities; and this of course is more effectively done by the mouth of a Jew. An obvious parallel is the statement of Herod Antipas in the gospel by the same author (Lk. 23.6-15); but its historicity is open to grave suspicion, both in view of what we know of Herod's relations to John the Baptist and in view of the fact that the story is absent from the other gospels. Even if Paul's meeting with Herod Agrippa II. is historical, the word Χριστιανός may very easily have come into the narrative out of the author's own vocabulary. We are informed by the same writer (Acts 24.5) with much greater precision that 'sect of the Nazarenes' (αἵρεσις τῶν Ναζωραίων) was the name given by the Jews to the Christians, as we learn also from Tertullian (Adv. Marc. 48) and Jerome (in Jes. ch. 5.18 f. 49.7.52.5). It was not till afterwards that the expression was restricted to a particular sect of Christians—a fact by which Epiphanius allowed himself to be misled. He tells us (Har. 29.9) that the Jews, in their public prayers, which were offered three times daily in their synagogues, pronounced a solemn curse upon this sect—a curse which, as we learn from Justin (Dial. 16 and elsewhere), and indeed as we see from the nature of the case, applied rather to all Christians.² Its Hebrew name, Birkat-ha-Minim, shows that the Jews had still another name for the Christians—and this name could also be Græcised into Mivaioi.

As for the place where the name Christian arose, the apparent Latin termination used to be thought to point to

4. Place of origin. a western, indeed (Tac. Ann. 15.44) to a Roman, origin; but that it was there that the name first came into use is by no means said by Tacitus, whilst in such a word as Herodian, Ἡρωδιανός (Mk. 3.6 and elsewhere), we have evidence that in the Greek-speaking domain this colloquial Latin formation of personal names (e.g., Cæsariani), in incorrect imitation of forms like Pompeiani (where the i is part of the root), was not unknown. The ancient Greek grammarians recognise the termination -avós for derivatives from town and country names, and even designate it specially as the τύπος Ἀριανός, as being met with, not in Greece itself, but in Asia (Buttmann, Ausf. Gr. Sprachlehre, § 119.54; many examples in Lipsius, 13-16). In this matter, therefore, Acts 11.26 is not open to criticism (yet see above, § 2).

The time at which the name arose could not with assurance be placed earlier than 79 A.D., even if a certain

5. Pompeii inscription. inscription (which disappeared soon after its discovery) at Pompeii, on the wall of a building (at first supposed to have been a Christian meeting-house), had actually contained the letters HRISTIANI.

This reading might very well have been a derivative from the tolerably frequent proper name Chrestus (see above, § 1); but, in point of fact, the reading is only a conjecture, and, according to Kiessling's original transcription (which is still extant), the word really was ceristira—whatever that may mean.

The architecture of the house shows it to have been an 'inn' (καρπὸνα), provided even with a cella meretricia, where, accordingly, it is hardly likely that Christian meetings would have been held; in fact, the inscription, which begins with the words, 'Vina Nervii,' was probably an advertisement of wines.¹

An answer to our question can, therefore, be hoped for only from examination of the history of the Christian

6. Early persecutions.

The character of these persecutions has been placed in an entirely new light by the proposition of Mommsen in 1885 (Röm. Gesch. 5520, n.), which has since then been more fully and elaborately developed by him in Sybel's Hist. Ztschr. 64 389-429 [90], and accepted by C. J. Neumann (Der röm. Staat u. d. Allgem. Kirche, 116 [90]) and by Ramsay (chap. 10, § 5)—that 'the persecution of the Christians was always similar to that of robbers.' On this view, every provincial governor had, without special instructions, the duty of seeking out and bringing to justice latrones, sacriligos, plagiarios (kidnappers), and fures (Dig. i. 18 13 xlviii. 134), and for this end was invested, over and above his ordinary judicial attributes, with a very full power of magisterial coercion, which was not limited to definite offences, or to a regular form of process, or to any fixed scale of punishments. Only, as far as Roman citizens were concerned, banishment was forbidden, and the capital penalty was reserved for the judgment of the emperor.

i. Legal Status of Christians.—While actually throwing into still further obscurity the date of the origin of the Christian name, this discovery of Mommsen's (above, § 6) sheds much light upon the question of legal position. The points on which the scholars named, as well as others, are agreed are, briefly, these. Among the duties of a Roman citizen a fundamental place was held by that of worshipping the ancestral gods. By these in the earliest period were meant only those of the city of Rome; but subsequently those of Latium were included, and finally all those of Italy and Greece, as soon as they had been formally recognised by decree of the senate. Non-citizens were forbidden to proselytise to strange gods, but not to worship them, so far as this did not appear to be of danger to the state. The Christian religion, however, was held to be dangerous in this way, as denying the existence of the gods of the state. The Jewish religion was, strictly, under the same ban; and, therefore, circumcision was laid under severe penalties by Hadrian, and, as far as non-Jews were concerned, by Antoninus Pius and Septimius Severus also. For themselves, however, the Jews, apart from the prohibition by Hadrian just mentioned, possessed religious freedom on the ground of special privileges conceded to them, particularly by Julius Cæsar and Augustus, in accordance with the favoured position which they had enjoyed, long before the Roman rule, in Egypt and elsewhere in the East. These privileges included exemption from military service, which would have interfered with their strict observance of the sabbath, and exemption from the obligation to appear before the courts on that day. When Cæsar, on account of suspected political activity, suppressed cuncta collegia præter antiquitus constituta (Suet. Cæs. 42), the Jews were expressly exempted. New corporations in the older (i.e., senatorial) provinces required the sanction of the senate; in the imperial provinces still under military government that of the emperor himself was doubtless sufficient. It is probable that burial societies had a general sanction from the senate. Apart from these, however, there were many societies which had never obtained any special concession. They were left alone if they did not appear to be dangerous; but at any moment they could be suppressed by the police. In the cases of those which had been sanctioned by the senate, suppression was made lawful only by a new senatorial decree. Now, the Christians could never have obtained such a concession, for their religion did not belong to the class of permitted religions. In their case, accordingly, the well-known rule (Dig. xlvii. 221) did not apply: ('permittitur tenuioribus stipem menstruam conferre, dum tamen semel in mense coeant . . . sed) religionis causa coire non prohibentur, dum tamen per hoc non fiat contra senatus consultum, quo illicita collegia arcantur.' They had, therefore, to hold their meetings simply on sufferance, and were never for a moment free from the risk of police interference. Still, they did not expose themselves to persecution or to death merely by holding unauthorised meetings. For such an offence these penalties were much too severe. When a sodalitas of this sort was broken up, unless its object had been in itself criminal, the members were subjected only to a mild punishment. In fact, they were allowed to divide among themselves the funds of the society, which were confiscated in the case of all capital offences.

Persecution and capital punishment fell to the lot of the Christians, therefore, only because their religion was regarded as criminal. In the case of Roman citizens it implied a violation of the duty to worship the gods of the state; in the case of provincials who were not citizens, ἀθεοῦν as against the local gods of the place was in like manner implied. In a (legally) very lax sense they were accused of sacrilegium, which originally meant only theft of sacred objects. Over and above this, all Christian subjects were chargeable with the offence of refusing to worship the Emperor, an offence legally construed as majestas, or crimen læsæ majestatis—more precisely, as majestatis imperatorum—the majestas populi Romani not being touched by this class of offences. Thus, either as sacrilege or as majestas, Christianity could at all times be prosecuted, and—certainly in the case of non-citizens, probably also in that of citizens—by the mere exercise of arbitrary coercive power. The penalties under either charge were, approximately, the same.

ii. Correspondence of Pliny and Trajan.—Thus we gain a new light on the correspondence between Pliny and Trajan (see above, § 2). Let it be premised that by the flagitia (2), as may be gathered from the allusion in the words cibum promiscuum et innoxium (7), were certainly intended the epule Thyestæ and the concubitus Oedipodei, which, as we learn from Justin (Apol. 126 212) and other writers of the second century, were laid to the charge of the Christians. Acts 208 already appears to be intended to meet the familiar accusation. The story ran that before the beginning of these orgies all lights were put out. Pliny's question, then, whether the mere fact of being Christian (nomen ipsum), or whether only the crimes associated therewith ought to be punished, is, from what we have seen, already answered in the first sense, and is so decided by Trajan also. On the other hand, Trajan's injunction, conquirendi non sunt, with which also is to be associated his order to disregard anonymous letters of accusation, is an important mitigation of the law, as is his other direction that a Christian who formally renounces his Christianity by sacrificing to the images of the gods shall be exempt from punishment. Such a degree of favour could, from the nature of the case, never be shown to the robber or to the thief, with whom, nevertheless, the Christian is classed. Let it be noted, also, that Pliny had no difficulty in deciding on his own responsibility the earlier cases that came before him (2-4). His reference of the matter to the emperor was first occasioned by the largeness of the number of those who ultimately came to be denounced, and by certain leanings, on grounds of policy, towards clemency (49 f.), to which Trajan gives his sanction by both of his decisions.

We must, therefore, no longer hold to the view that in this rescript (which, although originally intended only for Pliny, was shortly afterwards published, along with the whole correspondence, and taken as a norm by other provincial governors) the persecution of the Christians was now for the first time authorised. Accordingly, we must proceed to investigate such notices as we have of earlier persecutions, and especially to discuss the question whether in these cases the nomen Christianum was known to the authorities and constituted the ground of accusation.

iii. Claudius.—Of Claudius we are informed by Suetonius (Claud. 25) that Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit. It is quite impossible, however, to determine whether by Chrestos (on the form of the name, see above, § 1) we are here to understand Jesus, the preaching of whom by Christians divided the Jews in Rome into two parties, or whether Suetonius conceived him to have been personally present in Rome, or whether we should take him to be a Jewish agitator of whom nothing further is known. Acts 18² is by no means decisive for the first or the second alternative, even if we are to suppose that Aquila and Prisca were already Christians when they came to Corinth.

iv. Pomponia Græcina.—Of Pomponia Græcina we learn from Tacitus (Ann. 18³²) only that in 57 A.D. she was accused superstitionis externæ, and that she was acquitted of the charge by her husband, the consular A. Plautius, before whom she had been brought for trial. At that time, however, the Jewish and Egyptian religions were regarded as foreign, just as much as the Christian, which has been supposed to be meant in her case (Tac. Ann. 28⁵; Suet. Tib. 36). For full details see Hasenclever, JPT, 1882, pp. 47-64.

v. Neronian Persecution.—The notices we have of the Neronian persecution are very obscure.

Tacitus (Ann. 15⁴⁴) says: 'abolendo rumori (of having planned the burning of Rome) Nero subdidit reos et questissimis penis affect, quos per flagitia invisos vulgus Christianos appellabat . . . primum correpti, qui fatebantur, deinde indicio eorum multitudo ingens haud proinde in crimine incendii quam odio generis humani coniuncti sunt.' Coniuncti here could mean only that the ingens multitudo was added to the primum correpti (Ramsay, chap. 11, § 3); the reading convincti for coniuncti is a conjectural emendation almost universally adopted.

At the outset the only thing quite clear is that the Christians were from the first accused not as Christians, but as incendiaries. Otherwise Nero could not have been freed from the suspicion of being the guilty party. The Christians, however, were innocent (subdidit); and the ground on which they were condemned, accordingly, was not so much (haud proinde) the evidence that they had been incendiaries as the odium generis humani. By this expression there cannot be understood a hatred of which they were the objects: Roman society, which alone could be regarded as cherishing it, cannot possibly have been spoken of as genus humanum by Tacitus. Still, understood as cherished by the Christians, 'hatred of the human race' is no less an idea foreign to all legal conceptions, nor could it be supposed to represent another ground of accusation against them, over and above that of incendiarism.

Weizsäcker (Ab. Zeitalt. 478, 2nd ed. 462; ET 2143) and Ramsay (chap. 11, § 24) try indeed to make out that this actually was brought as a charge against them by referring to Suetonius (Nero 16): afflicti supplicii Christiani, genus hominum superstitionis nova ac malefica, holding that by maleficium witchcraft and poisoning are meant, and that it was precisely for these offences against society that the two punishments bestiis obicit and crucibus affigit were threatened, and (according to Tacitus) inflicted. These same punishments, however, were attached to many other crimes also. Suetonius says nothing about the conflagration as having occasioned the accusation against the Christians. In other words, he follows an entirely different account, and we are not justified in seeking to explain Tacitus by referring to Suetonius. The two authors agree only in believing that the occurrence in question was confined to Rome.

The main question, then, in the case of Tacitus, is as to what it was that the persons first accused made confession of (fatebantur). The answer seems to lie to our hand: se incendium fecisse. Such a confession may very well have been made by them, though innocent, under torture. As regards the ingens multitudo nothing more was required than merely some vague suspicions, or a few false witnesses, to whom the judges, on account of the commonly assumed general perversity of the Christians (their odium generis humani), were only too ready to give credence. There remains, therefore, a possibility that the religion of the accused did not come into question at all, and that Tacitus and Suetonius have, unhistorically, carried back the name Christiani from their own time into that of Nero. Were this not so, the reader, moreover, would expect to find in Tacitus a name indicating the characteristic attribute of those denoted by it; after quos per flagitia invisos vulgus one would expect not Christianos but some such expression as flagitarios appellabat.

Another interpretation of fatebantur is not less possible. It is that at first only those who had already habitually confessed themselves in public to be Christians (fatebantur se Christianos esse) were apprehended, and that only afterwards, on the evidence obtained from these in the course of the legal proceedings, a great number (ingens multitudo) of those who had not hitherto made any such public profession shared the same fate. The Christians were laid hold of because it was hoped that popular belief would readily attribute the incendiarism to them. Although, on this supposition also, their religion constituted no ground of accusation, it was recognised as distinct from the Jewish; whereas if the other interpretation of fatebantur is adopted the Christians may have been regarded simply as Jews: Tacitus (Hist. 5⁵) attributes adversus omnes hostile odium to the Jews also.

Clement of Rome further (i. 51-62) tells us only that the Christians suffered, without informing us why; and Paul's trial in Rome could throw light upon the question before us only if we knew what was its result. Gallio was not led by the accusation, as cited in Acts 18¹³, to suppose that Paul taught a religion dangerous to the state. The representation, too (though not necessarily the fact), is open to suspicion on account of the 'tendency' observable in Acts (see Acts, § 51). In a word, the little that we really know of the Neronian period does not enable us to come to a decision on the question as to the date and origin of the name 'Christian.'

Ramsay, however (chap. 11, §§ 26^f), considers that in the second stage the Neronian persecution was permanent, otherwise than in the first stage. As the persecution is mentioned by Suetonius along with other measures of police which must have been of a permanent nature, he holds that it must have had the same character: in the second stage, of course, the persecution was not on account of incendiarism, but on account of alleged witchcraft and other flagitia. Tacitus, Ramsay believes, also gives proof of this permanence of the persecution under Nero when he says, unde . . . misratio oriebatur tanquam non utilitate publica sed in sevitiam unius absumeretur; and Sulpicius Severus (ii. 29³) is understood to speak to the same effect—hoc initio in Christianos sevirii captum: post etiam datis legibus religio vetabatur palamque edictis propositis Christianum esse non licebat. Immediately upon this, however (117 121; 3rd ed., pp. 244, 255), Ramsay explains that the word post refers to other emperors than Nero, and also concedes that the expressions edicta and leges are 'loosely and inaccurately' employed by Sulpicius. Further, the unde in Tacitus traces the miseratio to the horrors of the public celebration of the executions and Nero's personal participation in them—incidents which were, of course, not of constant recurrence. The argument based on the context in Suetonius is too precarious to rest history upon, even apart from the doubtful interpretation of malefica.

vi. Titus and Vespasian.—We read in Sulpicius Severus (ii. 306-8) that, in a council of war, Titus finally decided on the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem quo plenius Judæorum et Christianorum religio tolleretur: quippe has religiones licet contrarias sibi, iisdem tamen (ab) auctoribus profectas; Christianos ex Judæis exstitisse: radice sublata stirpem facile perituram. Now, even were we to reject, as a falsification of history from motives of complaisance, the very different statement of Josephus, an eye-witness (BJ vi. 43-7), that Titus wished the temple to be preserved, and were we to carry back the words of Sulpicius Severus to Tacitus, whom he elsewhere always follows, we should still be a long way from having proved the account of Severus to be historical. It is in the highest degree improbable that Titus had such erroneous ideas as to the dependence of the Christians on the temple, while attributing to them such dangerous qualities and so great a degree of independence as apart from the Jews. Even Mommsen (Röm. Gesch. 539; ET Provinces, 2216 f.), on whose authority Ramsay relies, detects here traces at least of a Christian editor. Ramsay, however (chap. 121 f.), regarding the speech as a programme for treatment of Christians, holds it to be 'a historical document of the utmost importance,' and further assumes that the programme was actually carried out by Vespasian. For this he has not a word of proof to allege apart from the statement of Suetonius (Vesp. 15)—neque cade cujusquam unquam letatus est et (by the three last words he conjecturally fills a hiatus) justis suppliciis illacrimavit etiam et ingenuit—which, he considers, we are entitled to interpret as referring to processes against Christians. Were this the case, it would be natural at least to expect that these should have begun immediately after the destruction of the temple; but, according to Ramsay, they did not begin till towards the end of the reign of Vespasian. As far as the documents are concerned, this last hypothesis finds still less support than that of Vespasian's Christian persecution as a whole. All that can be said for the hypothesis is that it is requisite in order that, by the shortness of the persecution under Vespasian, the silence of Christian writers respecting them may be explained (see below, § 16).

vii. Domitian.—With regard to Domitian, Suetonius (Dom. 15) tells us that eight months before his death Flavium Clementem patrualem suum contemptissimæ inertia . . . repente ex tenuissima suspitione tantum non in ipso ejus consulatu interemit. Cassius Dio (lxvii. 141 f.), according to the excerpt of the monk Xiphilinus, adds that at the same time his wife, Flavia Domitilla, was banished to the island of Pandataria: ἐπὶ τῇ δὲ ἀμφὸν ἐγκλημα ἀθεότητος, ὑφ' ἧς καὶ ἄλλοι ἐς τὰ πῶν Ἰουδαίων ἦθ' ἐξοκέλοντες πολλοὶ κατεδικάσθησαν. Now, Christian legend, and in particular the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, speak of Flavius Clemens as Bishop of Rome, and of his father as, like the consular in Suetonius, related to the imperial family; the daughter of his sister (also called Flavia Domitilla) became involved in a Christian persecution, and was banished to Pontia (the island adjacent to Pandataria). This last statement is all the more important because Eusebius (Chron. ann. 2110, 2112 Abrah.: HE iii. 184) takes it from a heathen chronographer, Bruttius or Brettius, who wrote before 221 A.D. For further details see Lipsius, Chronol. d. röm. Bischöfe, 152-161. It is alike natural and difficult to assume that Clement and Domitilla represent each only one person, and that person a Christian. The charges in Cassius Dio, taken by themselves alone, show either that the question was one not of Christians but of Jews, or that Christians at that time still remained undistinguished from Jews. The view that they were Jews can hardly be maintained.

In the heathen writer Bruttius, Domitilla figures expressly as a Christian, and in all later Christian writings Domitian is represented as a violent persecutor of the faith (see, e.g., Melito ap. Euseb. HE iv. 269). He is called by Tertullian (Apol. 5) portio Neronis de crudelitate; and, though the heathen Juvenal (137 f.), it is true, says something to the same effect, the Christian bases his accusation expressly upon the persecution of his brethren in the faith.

We are, then, left with the second interpretation of the words of Cassius Dio, that they relate to Christians. Ramsay's method of evading this (chap. 12, § 4) is surely forced—that in Dio's time (211-222 A.D.) it was 'a fashion and an affectation among a certain class of Greek men of letters to ignore the existence of the Christians and to pretend to confuse them with the Jews.' Further, in the collection of temple money

(now a state tax) from the Jews, according to Suetonius (Dom. 12), those also were taken account of qui vel improfessi Judaicam viverent vitam (or: Judaicam fidem similem viverent vitam) vel dissimulata origine imposita genti tributa non pependissent. As at that time the Judaicus fiscus acerbissime actus est, it would be very remarkable if here we were not intended to understand both the Jewish Christians regarded as circumcised persons and the Gentile Christians regarded as proselytes. The Roman officers, we know from Suetonius, in cases where it was necessary, satisfied themselves as to the fact of circumcision by inspection. Even though greed may well have been a motive for conniving at the profession of the Christian religion, it is plain that the danger to the state presented by the Christians cannot have been taken very seriously.

We are led to the same conclusion by the story (as far as it can be believed) of Hegesippus (in Eus. HE 319 f.) that Domitian released the grandchildren of Jude, the brother of Jesus, as not being dangerous persons, although they confessed themselves to be not only descendants of David, but also Christians. It was not till the end of his reign that the persecution began.

viii. Nerva.—As far as the accusations under Domitian had reference to Christians they are covered by the regulations of Nerva (Cassius Dio, lxxviii. 12, after Xiphilinus).

Tertullian (Apol. 5) and Hegesippus (Eus. HE iii. 205) erroneously attribute the regulations to Domitian himself. The text of Cassius Dio is: τοὺς τε κρινομένους ἐπ' ἀσεβείᾳ ἀφῆκε καὶ τοὺς φεύγοντας κατήγαγε . . . τοῖς δὲ ἄλλοις οὐτ' ἀσεβείας οὐτ' Ἰουδαίου βίον κατατιτῆσθαι τυτὰς συνεχώρησεν.

The preceding discussion of the Christian persecutions makes it evident that the grounds upon which these were conducted were by no means clearly set forth, and that (partly on this account, but mainly from want of information) we can hardly venture to suppose the persecutions to have been of so great frequency as we should have expected on the principles laid down by Mommsen and Ramsay. In particular, had they been so frequent, the hesitation of Pliny—or, at all events, that of Trajan—would be quite inexplicable. Ramsay's answer (chap. 10, § 6), that Trajan's words—neque enim in universum aliquid quod quasi certam formam habeat constitui potest—refer to Pliny's doubt whether or not the question of age should be allowed to make a difference in the punishment, is quite inadmissible. Neque enim does not refer to the decision upon a matter which was still in question. It refers, in commendation, to a judgment which Pliny had already taken: actum quem debuisti . . . secutus es. Thus Ramsay's conjectures of some archive which Trajan caused to be searched for the decisions of his predecessors upon previous references by other procurators must also be rejected. Whatever the principles of the government, and however strongly they may have led, if rigidly interpreted, to unremitting search for and punishment of Christians once these had been definitely distinguished from Jews, they can have been carried into practice only in an intermittent way. In the conditions of privacy in which, as we know, the Christians carried out the exercises of their religion, no direct danger to the state can have manifested itself. In Pergamum Antipas was the only martyr (Rev. 2:13).

Therefore, Trajan's conquirendi non sunt was a mitigation in principle, indeed, but not necessarily in practice. If only parties could be found to denounce, persecutions could be instituted, after Trajan's time, on a much greater scale than before under the influence of the stricter—but seldom used—principle of conquirere. Such, according to all documents, was in reality the case.

For the period before Trajan we know of persecutions only under Nero and Domitian. Tertullian, for example, was not aware of any others (Apol. 5), and Melito in his Apology to Antoninus Pius (ap. Eus. HE iv. 269) expressly says that only Nero and Domitian (μόνοι πάντων Νέρων καὶ Δομετιανός) had given up the Christians to the slanders of denouncers. To the same purpose we have the statement of Origen (c. Cels. 38) that δύλοι κατὰ καιροὺς καὶ σφόδρα ἐναριθμητοὶ . . . τῶν ἡ-κασιν; over against which the πολύ πλῆθος ἐκλεκτῶν spoken of by Clemens Romanus (i. 61) in the reign of Nero, and the ingens multitudo of Tacitus, must, of course, not be overlooked.

In view of such definite statements as these, it is not possible to explain the silence of our authors—especially that of Christian authors—on the persecutions which Ramsay infers to have been instituted under Vespasian and Titus, as being due only to the shortness of those reigns—or rather the shortness of the portions of them in which persecutions occurred (above, § 6, vi. end)—or to the fact that the Christians had no eyes for anything except the imminent end of the world (Ramsay, chap. 12, § 2).

Ramsay, it is true, finds support by assigning 1 Pet. to about the year 80 A.D.—that is to say, the reign of Titus (chap. 131-3)—or to 75-79 A.D., in the reign of Vespasian (Expositor, Oct. 1893, p. 286). He does so, however, on grounds the validity of which depends on that of his hypothesis.

He shows with truth that the epistle presupposes accusations on account of the mere nomen Christianum (415 f.), and that it was composed at the beginning of a persecution (412 314 17 214). It has also been rightly urged that there is no reason for assigning it to the year 112 on the mere ground that then for the first time a persecution of Christians over the whole οἰκουμένη (59) became possible. On the other hand, before that date there had been no persecution which had touched or threatened the provinces named in 1 and gave cause to anticipate its extension over the whole habitable world.

When the contents of this letter are considered, no one who can be reached by critical considerations will unreservedly maintain its genuineness, containing as it does so little that is characteristic of Peter and so much that is reminiscent of Paul.

The presence in 117 of the words διασπορά and δοκίμιον, which here are superfluous and disturbing, and have their appropriate place only in Ja. 113, shows its dependence on that epistle, which in its turn depends not only on the Epistles of Paul but also on that to the Hebrews (113; cp Ja. 225). Dependence on James is shown also in 1 Pet. 55 f., which is borrowed from Ja. 46 f. In the latter passage the οὖν is logical (θεοῦ 44 . . . θεῶ), and in the former, therefore, in like manner, the ἀλλήλοις of v. 5 should have been followed by some such expression as 'submit yourselves one to another,' if the writer had been following a natural and not a borrowed train of thought.

As for the word ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, the only satisfactory explanation of its use in 1 Pet. 415, to denote a criminal of the same class as φονεύς and κλέπτης, is that of Hilgenfeld, according to whom what is intended is the class of delatores, who made a trade of denunciation, which was first made criminal by Trajan (Plin. Panegy. 34 f.). By ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοποι Ramsay understands people who stir up strife between members of the same family, or between servants and masters. This accusation could be very easily brought against Christians, as soon as they began to attempt conversions. Ramsay's assertion, however, that Nero gave power to the courts of justice thenceforward to regard such persons as magicians and to punish them as criminals (chap. 151), rests upon no documentary evidence: it proceeds solely upon his own interpretation of the maleficæ of Suetonius (above, § 6, v.). Nor has Ramsay made out (chap. 8, §§ 21, pp. 280 f. 290) that 1 Pet. presupposes search for Christians to have been made by the state.

Were this so, the epistle could, of course, have been written only either before Trajan's decision, conquirendi non sunt, or after the re-enactment of conquirere by Marcus Aurelius; but here again it has to be remarked that, if only there were denunciations enough—and Ramsay himself (chap. 10, § 2) is aware how readily these could at any time appear among the class of sellers of sacrificial animals (Pliny to Trajan, 10), or among people in the position of Demetrius (Acts 19 24-34), or of the masters of the damsel with the spirit of divination (16 16-19)—1 Pet. 3 15 58 become intelligible enough, even after the publication of Trajan's conquirendi non sunt.

We may still hold, therefore, that 1 Pet. was written in 112 A.D.

The one new thing we have learned is that, when 1 Pet. touches upon the subject of punishment for the mere name of Christian (416), it is describing not a new attitude of the authorities but one that they have been taking for some time. This very fact makes it impossible to use this passage as Ramsay does as fixing the date of the epistle for the transition period during which punishment of Christians only for flagitia was giving place to a system of persecution for the mere name. Ramsay (chap. 13, § 1) argues that this last mode of persecution must have been new to the author, because at the same time his language constantly presupposes the continuance of the old state of things; but the exhortation in 415 that none should suffer as a flagitious person is not in any case out of place, even if flagitia had not hitherto been the only ground on which the punishment of Christians proceeded; against such flagitia Paul also constantly warns his readers (Gal. 5 19-21 1 Cor. 6 9 f. 2 Cor. 12 20 f. Rom. 13 1-13), and that at a time when there was no thought of Christian persecution. Further, the hope of being able by 'seemly behaviour' and 'good works' to convince the secular power of the injustice of persecution (1 Pet. 2 12 3 13 etc.) is one that Christians can never have wholly abandoned, and it found a reasonable justification in the plea of Pliny (27-10) for mild treatment of those who had been denounced. We can understand its persistence most easily on the assumption, as made above, that persecution was only then beginning.

The very positions argued for by Mommsen (and accepted by Ramsay) make it clear that there never

9. Conclusion. had been a period during which Christians, although recognised as a distinct religious society, were punished for flagitia merely, and not on account of the nomen. The strength of Mommsen's view lies precisely in this: that the name, as soon as it was known, also became punishable. According to Mommsen, we must also conclude, conversely, that where flagitia alone are punished the nomen is not yet known. Even for the time of Nero this argumentation would be conclusive, had he not wanted incendiaries. But if, as Ramsay says, Christians under Nero were already recognised as distinct from Jews, then flagitia other than fire-raising—as, for example, witchcraft—cannot, even in the second stage of the Neronian persecution (on the assumption of there having been such a stage at all), have been the sole ground on which condemnation proceeded. On the question as to the date at which Christianity first began to be recognised as a distinct religion we must confess ourselves completely at a loss. Only this much is certain: that it had come about before the time of Pliny's governorship. From what has been said above, the view of Neumann (and Lipsius) appears the most plausible: the view, namely, that the distinction first received recognition under Domitian, and, more precisely, in the last year of his reign. To this Weizsäcker and others¹ object, with good reason, that it is highly improbable that Christians should have passed for Jews so long. The simple facts that they did not accept circumcision, and frequented, not the synagogues but meeting-places of their own, and moreover often came into conflict with the Jews, made the recognition of a distinction inevitable—especially as the Roman authorities, most notably in matters affecting societies, were wont to take careful cognisance of even the minutest trifles, and of course, in a formal investigation, had means readily at their disposal for eliciting every detail. If we had nothing but Suetonius's account of Nero to go upon, these considerations would certainly be held to be conclusive even for the time of Nero; but we have Tacitus, who makes us hesitate; and what is said about Domitian goes against Weizsäcker's conclusion. Christian sources give no hope of a decision. Ramsay's citation of 1 Pet. does not hold good; that of the Apocalypse is worthless as long as the unity and the date of the book continue to be as questionable as they are; and the Pastoral Epistles are too doubtful. Moreover, it is not at all certain that they speak of flagitia as the ground of persecution, so as to necessitate their being assigned to the period of Nero, even if Ramsay's view is adopted as correct; for 2 Tim. 29 does not necessarily mean that Paul suffers because he is regarded as a κακοῦργος—it can just as well mean that he suffers the same penalties as those to which a κακοῦργος is liable, but that the cause of them is in his case his preaching of the gospel (ἐν ᾧ)—in other words, his Christianity. In like manner, it is quite as conceivable in 2 Tim. 3.12 that the women is the cause of the sufferings of all Christians as that flagitia are. As for the Third Gospel and Acts, according to what has been said above (§ 2), they show only that their author, about 100-130 A.D., was acquainted with the name, and knew nothing as to its origin that rendered it impossible for him to place its date about the year 40. All that the present discussion can be regarded as contributing towards the solution of the question is the conjecture that the Pagans, in as far as they knew the true character of Christianity at a time before that which we have definitely ascertained, hardly took any cognisance of it—on account of the infrequency with which it came under public notice.

CHRONICLER (כְּתוּבֵי הַיָּמִים), 2 S. 8:16 20:24, Is. 36:3, RV^{mg.}; EV RECORDER (גְּזֵרָה).

CHRONICLES (דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים), 1 K. 14:19. See HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 13 f.

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF. In the Hebrew canon Chronicles is a single book, entitled דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים, Events of the Times.

The full title would be סֵפֶר דְּבָרֵי הַיָּמִים, Book of Events of the Times; and this again appears to have been a designation commonly applied to special histories in the more definite shape—Events of the Times of King David, or the like (1 Ch. 27:24 Esth. 10:2 etc.).

1. Name. The Greek translators divided the long book into two, and adopted the title Παραλειπομένα, Things (often) omitted [scil. in the other historical books; cod. A adds βασιλείων respecting the kings or τῶν βασιλείων Iouda: see Bacher, ZATW 15:305 ff. (95)]. Jerome, following the sense of the Hebrew title, suggested the name of Chronicon instead of Paralipomenon primum et secundum. Hence the English Chronicles.

The book of Chronicles begins with Adam and ends abruptly in the middle of Cyrus's decree of restoration.

2. Connexion with Ezra-Nehemiah. The continuation of the narrative is found in the Book of Ezra, which begins by repeating 2 Ch. 36:22 f., and filling up the fragment of the decree of Cyrus. A closer examination of those parts of Ezra and Nehemiah which are not extracted word for word from earlier documents or original memoirs, leads to the conclusion that Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah was originally one work, displaying throughout the peculiarities of language and thought of a single editor (see § 3). Thus the fragmentary close of 2 Chronicles marks the disruption of a previously-existing continuity. In the gradual compilation of the canon the necessity for incorporating in the Holy Writings an account of the establishment of the post-exilic theocracy was felt, before it was thought desirable to supplement Samuel and Kings by adding a second history of the pre-exilic period. Hence Chronicles is the last book of the Hebrew Bible, following the book of Ezra-Nehemiah, which properly is nothing else than its sequel.

Whilst the original unity of this series of histories can hardly be questioned, it will be more convenient in the present article to deal with Chronicles alone, reserving the relation of the several books for the article HISTORICAL LITERATURE (q.v., § 14 f.). The author used a different class of sources for the history of the pre-exilic and the post-exilic periods respectively; and thus the critical questions affecting Chronicles are for the most part quite distinct from those which meet us in the book of Ezra-

CHRONICLES, BOOKS OF

Nehemiah. Besides, the identity of authorship cannot be conclusively demonstrated except by a comparison of results drawn from a separate consideration of each book.

Of the authorship of Chronicles we know only what can be determined by internal evidence. The colour

3. Date. of the language stamps the book as one of the latest in the OT (see § 11); but it leads to no exact determination of date. In 1 Ch. 29:7, which refers to the time of David, a sum of money is reckoned by darics (but see DRAM), which certainly implies that the author wrote after that Persian coin had long been current in Judea. The chief passage appealed to by critics to fix the date, however, is 1 Ch. 3:19 ff., where the descendants of Zerubbabel seen to be reckoned to six generations (so Ewald, Bertheau, etc.).

The passage is confused, and G reads it so as to give as many as eleven generations (so Zunz, Nöld., Kuen. § 296; cp Kön. § 54 3b); whilst on the other hand those who plead for an early date are disposed to assume an interpolation or a corruption of the text, or to separate all that follows the name of Jesaiah in 7. 21 from what precedes (Movers, Keil). It seems impossible, however, by any fair treatment of the text to obtain fewer than six generations, and this result agrees with the probability that Hattush (v. 22), who, on the interpretation which we prefer, belongs to the fourth generation from Zerubbabel, was a contemporary of Ezra (Ezra 8:2).

Thus the Chronicler lived at least two generations after Ezra. With this it accords very well that in Nehemiah five generations of high priests are enumerated from Jeshua (12:10 f.), and that the last name is that of Jaddua, who, as we know from Josephus, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. That the Chronicler wrote after the period of the Persian supremacy was past has been argued by Ewald (Hist. 1:73) and others, from the use of the title King of Persia (2 Ch. 36:23).

The official title of the Achæmenidæ was not 'King of Persia,' but 'the King,' 'the Great King,' the 'King of Kings,' the 'King of the Lands,' etc. (see RPD 1:11 ff. 5:151 ff. 8:65 ff.); and the first of these expressions is that used by Ezra (7:27 f. 8:1 etc.), Neh. (1:11 2:1 ff.), and other Jews writing under the Persian rule (Hag. 1:15 Zech. 7:1 Ezra 4:8 11:56 f. etc.).

What seems to be certain and important for a right estimate of the book is that the author lived a considerable time after Ezra, probably indeed (Nöld. Kuen.) after 300 B.C., and was entirely under the influence of the religious institutions of the new theocracy. This standpoint determined the nature of his interest in the early history of his people.

The true importance of Hebrew history had always centred in the fact that this petty nation was the people of

4. Character: Yahwê, the spiritual God. The tragic interest which distinguishes the annals of Israel from the forgotten history of Moab or Damascus, lies wholly in that long contest which finally vindicated the reality of spiritual things and the supremacy of Yahwê's purpose, in the political ruin of the nation which was the faithless depository or these sacred truths. After the fall of Jerusalem it was impossible to write the history of Israel's fortunes otherwise than in a spirit of religious pragmatism. Within the limits of the religious conception of the plan and purpose of the Hebrew history, however, more than one point of view might be taken up. The book of Kings looks upon the history in the spirit of the prophets—in that spirit which is still echoed by Zechariah (15 f.): 'Your fathers, where are they? and the prophets, could they live for ever? but my words and my statutes, which I commanded my servants the prophets, did they not overtake your fathers? so that they turned and said, Like as Yahwê of Hosts thought to do unto us . . . so hath he dealt with us.' Long before the Chronicler wrote, however, there had been a great change. The new Jerusalem of Ezra was organised as a municipality and a church, not as a nation. The centre of religious life was no longer the living prophetic word, but the ordinances of the Pentateuch and the liturgical service of the sanctuary. The religious vocation of Israel was no longer national, but ecclesiastical or municipal, and the historical continuity of the nation was vividly realised only within the walls of Jerusalem and the courts of the temple, in the solemn assembly and stately ceremonial of a feast day.

These influences naturally operated most strongly on those who were officially attached to the sanctuary. To a Levite, even more than to other Jews, the history of Israel meant above all things the history of Jerusalem, of the temple, and of the temple ordinances. Now the author of Chronicles betrays on every page his essentially levitical habit of mind. It even seems possible, from a close attention to his descriptions of sacred ordinances, to conclude that his special interests are those of a common Levite rather than of a priest, and that of all levitical functions he is most partial to those of the singers, a member of whose guild Ewald conjectures him to have been.

To such a man the older delineation of the history of Israel, especially in Samuel and Kings, could not but appear to be deficient in some directions, whilst in other respects its narrative seemed superfluous or open to misunderstanding, as for example by recording, and that without condemnation, things inconsistent with the pentateuchal law. The history of the ordinances of worship holds a very small place in the older record. Jerusalem and the temple have not that central place in the Book of Kings which they occupied in the minds of the Jewish community in post-exilic times. Large sections of the old history are devoted to the religion and politics of the northern kingdom, which are altogether unintelligible and uninteresting when measured by a strictly levitical standard; and in general the whole problems and struggles of the earlier period turn on points which had ceased to be cardinal in the life of the new Jerusalem, which was no longer called upon to decide between the claims of the Word of Yahweh and the exigencies of political affairs and social customs, and which could not comprehend that men absorbed in deeper spiritual contests had no leisure for such things as the niceties of levitical legislation.

Thus there seemed to be room for a new history, which should confine itself to matters still interesting to the theocracy of Zion, keeping Jerusalem and the temple in the foreground, and developing the divine pragmatism of the history, with reference, not so much to the prophetic word as to the fixed legislation of the Pentateuch (especially the Priest's Code), so that the whole narrative might be made to teach that Israel's glory lies in the observance of the divine law and ritual.

1. Outline of Chronicles. The book falls naturally into three parts. 1. Introductory resumé (1 Ch. 1-9).—5. Contents. For the sake of systematic completeness the author begins with Adam, as is the custom with later Oriental writers. He had nothing, however, to add to the Pentateuch, and the period from Moses to David contained little that served his purpose. He, therefore, contracts the early history (1 Ch. 1-9) into a series of genealogies,¹ which were doubtless by no means the least interesting part of his work at a time when every Israelite was concerned to prove the purity of his Hebrew descent (see Ezr. 2:59-62, and cp GENEALOGIES, I. § 3). The greatest space is allotted naturally to the tribes of JUDAH and LEVI (gg. v.) (23-423 6 [527-666]); but, except where the author derives his materials from the earlier historical books (as in 13:1-16 654-81), his lists are meagre and imperfect, and his data evidently fragmentary. Already, however, the circumstances and interests of the author betray themselves; for even in these chapters his principal object is evidently to explain, in a manner consonant with the conceptions of his age, the origin of the ecclesiastical institutions of the post-exilic community.

Observe that 1 Ch. 9:2-17a is excerpted (with merely clerical differences) from Neh. 11:36-19a (on the passage see EZRA, II. § 5 [2], § 15 [1] a); and that the stage to which the genealogies in 1 Ch. 3:17-24 and 8:33-40 (cp 9:35-44, and see BENJAMIN, § c) are carried, shows that their purpose is to give the pedigree of post-exilic families who traced their descent from David and Saul respectively. In ch. 2 We. (De gent.; cp more briefly Prod. 4) 216 ff. (ET 16.) has shown that ezr. 9:25-33 42-50a, forming the kernel of the chapter, relate to pre-exilic Judah, whilst ezr. 10:17 18-24 34-41 50b-55 (like the greater part of 4:1-23) have reference to the circumstances of the post-exilic community; the chief aim of ch. 2 is to explain how the Calebites, who before the fall of Jerusalem had their home in the S. of Judah, had in post-exilic times to find new homes in the more northerly parts of Judah (see CALEB, § 3 f.).

2. Israel before the schism (1 Ch. 10-2 Ch. 11.—From the death of Saul (1 Ch. 10) the history becomes fuller and runs parallel with Samuel and Kings. The limitations of the author's interest in past times appear in the omission, among other particulars, of David's reign in Hebron, of the disorders in his family and the revolt of Absalom, of the circumstances of Solomon's accession, and of many details as to the wisdom and splendour of that sovereign as well as of his fall into idolatry.

3. The Southern Kingdom (2 Ch. 12-36)—In the later history the northern kingdom is quite neglected, and political affairs in Judah receive attention, not in proportion to their intrinsic importance, but according as they serve to exemplify God's help to the obedient and his chastisement of the rebellious. That the author is always unwilling to speak of the misfortunes of good rulers, is not to be ascribed with some critics to a deliberate suppression of truth, but shows that the book was throughout composed not in purely historical interests, but with a view to inculcate a single practical lesson.

II. Additions to Kings. 1. The more important additions which the Chronicler makes to the old narrative consists of (a) statistical lists (1 Ch. 12, see DAVID, § 11, iii.); (b) full details on points connected with the history of the sanctuary (see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 15) and the great feasts (see FEASTS), or the archaeology of the Levitical ministry (see LEVITES), 1 Ch. 13 15 16 (these three chapters expanded remarkably from 2 S. 6) 22-29 2 Ch. 29-31 35-17 etc.); and (c) narratives of victories and defeats, of sins and punishments, of obedience and its reward, which could be made to point a plain religious lesson in favour of faithful observance of the Law.

See the following passages:—2 Ch. 13:21. (Alhijah), 14 9-15 (Zerah), 15 1-15 (Asa and the prophet Azariah), 16 7-10 (Asa and Hanani), 19 1-3 (Jehoshaphat and the prophet Jehu), 20 (Jehoshaphat and Moab, etc.), 21 11-17 (Jehoram), 25 5-10 12-16 (Amaziah) etc.

These narratives often include prophetic discourses, inculcating the same principle of the theocratic conditions of success and failure, with much uniformity of expression, and in a tone very different from that of the prophets who appear in Samuel or Kings.

2. Attention should be directed also to the short insertions, introduced often into the narratives excerpted from the older historical books, for the purpose of supplementing them at some point where they appeared to the author to need explanation or correction.

Such are the notes on ritual 1 Ch. 15:27a 28b (David); 2 Ch. 5:11b-13a 6:13 7:6 8:13-15 (Solomon); 23:6b 13 (middle) 18 (from 7:2) 19 (deposition of Athaliah); 34:9 ('the Levites') 12 (from 'and the') 13, etc.; the reflections in 1 Ch. 21:6 f. (Joab's census); 2 Ch. 8:11b (Solomon's wife's palace); 12:12 (Rehoboam humbling himself); 18:31b (Yahweh delivers Jehoshaphat); 22:3b 4b (cause of Ahaziah's wickedness); 25:27a (to 'Yahweh', cause of plot against Amaziah); 26:21 (middle) 23 (middle); consequences of Uziah's leprosy); 27:6 (effects of Jotham's piety); 33:23 (character of Amon).

The minor variations of Chronicles from Samuel and Kings are analogous in principle to the larger additions and omissions, so that the whole work has a consistent and well-marked character, presenting the history in quite a different perspective from that of the old narrative.

Here, then, a critical question arises. Is the change of perspective wholly due to a different selection of

6. Sources. items from authentic historical tradition? May we assume that everything which is new in Chronicles has been taken exactly from older sources, or must we judge that the standpoint of the author has not only governed the selection of facts, but also coloured the statement of them? Are all his novelties new data, or are some of them inferences of his own from the same data as lie before us in other books of the OT?

To answer these questions we must first inquire what were the materials at his command. The Chronicler makes frequent reference to earlier histories which he cites by a great variety of names.

1. The Book of the Kings.—That the names 'Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah,' 'Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel,' 'Book of the Kings of Israel,' and 'Affairs of the Kings of Israel' (2 Ch. 33:18, Heb.) refer to a single work is not disputed. Under one or other title this book is cited some ten times (1 Ch. 9:1 2 Ch. 16:11 25:26 27:7 28:26 33:18 35:27 36:8, also 20:34 32:32, noted below).

That it is not the canonical Kings is manifest from what is said of its contents.

It must have been quite an extensive work, for among other things it contained genealogical statistics (1 Ch. 9:1), as well as other particulars, not mentioned in the existing Book of Kings (see 2 Ch. 27:7 33:18 36:8); and it incorporated certain older writings of (or about) prophets—in particular the Dēbārīm (Words, or rather Matters, i.e., History) of Jehu ben Hanani (2 Ch. 20:34, where read with RV, 'which is inserted in') and the Vision of Isaiah (2 Ch. 32:32).

Now it is noticeable that, where the Chronicler does not cite this comprehensive work at the close of a king's reign, he generally refers to some special authority which bears the name of a prophet (1 Ch. 29:29, Samuel, Nathan, and Gad; 2 Ch. 9:29, Nathan, Ahijah, and Iddo; 12:15, Shemaiah and Iddo; 13:22, Iddo; 26:22, Isaiah). Never, however, are both the Book of the Kings and a special prophetic writing cited for the same reign. It is therefore highly probable that, in other cases as well as in those of Jehu and Isaiah (see above), the writings cited under the names of various prophets were known to the author only as parts of the great Book of the Kings.

Even 2 Ch. 33:19 (cp v. 18), where AV departs from the received Hebrew text, but probably expresses the correct reading,¹ seems rather to confirm than to oppose this conclusion (which is now disputed by very few scholars) except in the case of Isaiah's history of Uzziah (2 Ch. 26:22), where the form of the reference is different.

The references to these Dēbārīm will thus not imply the existence of historical monographs written by the prophets with whose names they are connected; they will merely point to sections of the Book of the Kings, which embraced the history of particular prophets, and were hence familiarly cited under their names.

2. The Midrash of the Book of the Kings.—Whether the Book of the Kings is identical with the Midrash (RV, badly, Commentary) of the Book of the Kings (2 Ch. 24:27) is not certain. On the one hand, the peculiar title would suggest a distinct work; on the other hand, it is not apparent why, if (as its title shows) it was a comprehensive work, dealing with the kings generally, it should be cited for only one reign. The term 'Midrash,'² moreover, from מִדְרָשׁ to search out, investigate,—as applied to Scripture, to discover or develop a thought not apparent on the surface,—denotes a didactic or homiletic exposition, or an edifying religious story (such, for instance, as that of Tobit or Susannah); the Midrash here referred to will thus have been a work intended to develop the religious lessons deducible from the history of the kings. This, however, is just the guiding motive in many of the narratives, peculiar to Chronicles, for which the author cites as his authority the Book of the Kings; the last-named work, therefore, even if not identical with the Midrash of the Book of the Kings (as Ew. We. Kue. with much probability suppose), will nevertheless have been similar in character and tendency (cp below, § 9, end).

The Midrash of the prophet Iddo (2 Ch. 13:22) will have been either a particular section of the Midrash of the Book of the Kings, or, more probably, perhaps, a separate work of the same character, which was attributed to Iddo as its author, or in which the prophet Iddo played a prominent part. For allusions to other authorities, see 1 Ch. 5:17 23:27 27:24 2 Ch. 35:25.

3. Conclusion.—All these writings must have been post-exilic works; nor is it probable that, except for some of his statistical information, the Chronicler had access to any sources of early date other than the canonical histories of the OT. The style (see below, § 11) is conclusive evidence that no part of the additional matter¹ peculiar to Chronicles is an excerpt from any pre-exilic writing.

The general conclusion is that it is very doubtful whether the Chronicler used any historical work not accessible to us, with the exception of this lost Book of the Kings. Even his genealogical lists may have been derived from that work (1 Ch. 9:1), though for these he may also have had other materials at command.

4. Sources of the Canonical Kings.—Now we know that the two chief sources of the canonical book of Kings were entitled Annals ['events of the times'] of the Kings of Israel and Judah respectively. That the lost source of the Chronicles was not independent of these works appears probable both from the nature of the case and from the close and often verbal parallelism between many sections of the two biblical narratives. Whilst the canonical Book of Kings, however, had separate sources for the N. and the S. kingdoms, the source of Chronicles was a history of the two kingdoms combined, and so, no doubt, was a more recent work, in great measure extracted from the older annals. Still it contained also matter not derived from these works, for it is pretty clear from 2 K. 21:17 that the Annals of the Kings of Judah gave no account of Manasseh's repentance, which, according to 2 Ch. 33:18 f., was narrated in the great Book of the Kings of Israel.

5. Dependence of Chronicles on Kings.—It was formerly the opinion of Bertheau, and other scholars (e.g., Keil), that the parallelisms of Chronicles with Samuel and Kings are sufficiently explained by the ultimate common source from which both narratives drew. Most critics hold, however, that the Chronicler also drew directly from the canonical Samuel and Kings, as he unquestionably did from the Pentateuch. This opinion is probable in itself, as the earlier books of the OT cannot have been unknown to the author; and the critical analysis of the canonical Book of Kings shows that in some of the parallel passages the Chronicler uses words which were not taken from the annals but written by the author of Kings himself. In particular, Chronicles agrees with Kings in those short notes of the moral character of individual monarchs which can hardly be ascribed to a hand earlier than that of the final author of the latter book (cp e.g., 2 Ch. 20:32 f. [Asa] with 1 K. 22:43; 24:2 [Joash], with 2 K. 12:3 [2] [Jehoash]; 25:1-4 [Amaziah], with 2 K. 14:2 f. 5 f., etc.). It is of course possible, as Bertheau (xliv. f.) and Kuenen (§ 32:15) suppose, that the author of the chief source of Chronicles had already incorporated extracts from our canonical book of Kings; and in general the connections of the successive historical books which preceded the present canonical histories are sufficiently complex to make it unwise to indulge in positive assertions on a matter in which so many possibilities may be suggested.

² Though common in Rabbinical literature, it occurs otherwise in the OT only in 2 Ch. 13:22.

In¹ studying Chronicles a sharp distinction ought always to be drawn between the parts excerpted (without substantial alteration) from the earlier canonical historical books and the parts peculiar to the Chronicler. The recently published edition of Chronicles by Kittel (SBOT), in which such excerpts are coloured light red, will materially assist the reader in doing this.

The question arises, What is the historical value of the passages peculiar to Chronicles? After what has been said, it can hardly be doubtful that, except for some of his statistical information, his one genuine ancient source was the series of the 'Former Prophets,' Samuel and (more largely) Kings. The MSS of these books which he employed preserved occasionally a better reading than is found in the existing MT; but where he adds to the earlier narrative or departs from it, his variations are seldom such as to inspire confidence. In large measure these variations are due to his assumption, the validity of which he never questions, that the religious institutions of his own time must have existed in the same form in old Israel.

1. High Places.—Living in a time when high places were universally regarded as idolatrous, the Chronicler could not imagine that a good king had tolerated them.

Thus, whereas 1 K. 15:14, 22:43 state that Asa and Jehoshaphat did not abolish the high places, the Chronicler (2 Ch. 14:5, 17:6) says that they did abolish them.

2. Levitical Choirs.—Again, he assumes that the Levitical organisation of his own time, and especially the three choirs of singers, were established by David.

Had this really been the case, the silence of the older history would be inexplicable; indeed the Book of Ezra-Nehemiah shows that, even at the time of the return from Babylon, the system with which the Chronicler was familiar had not been elaborated, for the 'singers' there still form a separate class not yet incorporated with the Levites.

(a) The narrative in 2 S. 6 of the removal of the ark to Zion does not say a word respecting the presence of Levites upon the occasion. In 1 Ch. 13:15, this omission is made good: the Levites, including the singers, take a prominent part in the ceremony; the mishap of Uzzah is represented (15:13) as due to the fact that the ark had not at first been properly carried by the Levites, and a psalm composed of parts of three post-exilic psalms (105:1-15, 96:1-13, 106:1, 47:1) is placed in David's mouth (108-36).

(b) In 1 K. 8:3 the ark is borne by priests (in accordance with Dt. 31:9, and all pre-exilic allusions); but in 2 Ch. 5:4 'Levites' is substituted for 'priests,' to bring the passage into conformity with the later Levitical law.

(c) In 2 K. 11 Jehoiada's assistants in the revolution which cost Athaliah her life, are the foreign body-guard, which we know to have been employed in the temple down to the time of Ezekiel (44:7); but in 2 Ch. 23 the Carians (see CHERETHITES) and the foot-guards give place to the Levites, in accordance with the rule of the second temple, which did not allow aliens to approach so near to the holy things. 'Deliberate alterations' (Be.) are in consequence introduced throughout the narrative: and a new colouring is imparted to the whole occurrence.

(d) There are other incidental allusions, also, which show that the author is really describing institutions of a date later than the age to which he refers them. Thus (i.) not only do the gates mentioned in 1 Ch. 26 (under David) presuppose the existence of a temple, but also the Persian name PARBAR (q.v.), given to one of them (v. 18), shows that the writer is thinking of the post-exilic temple. (ii.) The allusions in 2 Ch. 13:11 (in the speech put into Abijah's mouth) to the golden candlestick and the evening burnt-offering, point also to the usage of the same age: in the pre-exilic temple the number of golden candlesticks was not one but ten (1 K. 7:49; see, however, CANDLESTICK, § 1), and the evening sacrifice of the pre-exilic temple was not a holocaust but a cereal oblation (מנחה: 1 K. 18:36, 2 K. 16:15, Ezra 9:4).²

In his descriptions of pre-exilic solemnities, as in the speeches which he places in the mouth of pre-exilic characters, the Chronicler is unconsciously an unimpeachable witness to the religious usages and beliefs of his own time; it is inconsistent with sound historical principles to treat his testimony with regard to antiquity as of equal value with that of the older and more nearly contemporary historical writings, where the two, whether directly or by legitimate inference, are at variance.

Another principle traceable in the Chronicler's additions is the tendency not merely to lay stress upon the doctrine of divine retribution, but also to represent it as acting immediately (see especially below [e]). To the earlier prophets the retributive justice of God is manifest in the general course of the history—the fall of the Hebrew nation is the fruit of sin and rebellion against Yahwe's moral commands—but God's justice is mingled with long-suffering, and the prophets do not suppose that every sin is punished promptly, and that temporary good fortune is always the reward of righteousness. The aim of very many of the additions made in Chronicles to the old history, is to show that in Israel retribution followed immediately on good or bad conduct, especially on obedience or disobedience to prophetic warnings.

(a) In 1 K. 22:48 we read that Jehoshaphat built Tarshish-ships (i.e., great merchant vessels) at Ezion-geber for the S. Arabian gold-trade; but the ships were wrecked before starting. For this the Chronicler seeks a religious reason. As 1 K. proceeds to relate that, after the disaster, Ahaziah of Israel offered to join Jehoshaphat in a fresh enterprise, and the latter declined, the narrative of 1 K. 22:48 is so altered in 2 Ch. 20:35, 37b as to represent the king of Israel as having been partner in the ships that were wrecked; whilst in v. 37a there is an addition stating that Jehoshaphat was warned by a prophet of the certain failure of an undertaking in which he was associated with the wicked Ahaziah.

(b) In 2 K. 3 we read of a war with Moab in which Jehoshaphat was associated with the wicked house of Ahab, and came off scathless. In Chronicles this war is entirely omitted, and in its place we have (2 Ch. 20) an expedition of Jehoshaphat alone against Moab, Ammon, and Edom, in which the Jewish king, having opened the campaign—with the assistance of the Levites—with suitable prayer and praise, has no further task than to spoil the dead of the enemy who have fallen by one another's hands.

(c) Kings states simply as a fact that Shishak invaded Judah and carried off the treasures of the temple and palace: the Chronicler inserts between 1 K. 14:25 and 26 a notice explaining that this was because Rehoboam had forsaken Yahwe, but that, as he and his princes had humbled themselves, they should not be entirely destroyed (2 Ch. 12:28-8; cp v. 12).

(d) In Kings, Asa, who according to 1 K. 15:14 was a good king all his days, had in his old age (v. 23) a disease in his feet. With the object, apparently, of accounting for this, the Chronicler explains (2 Ch. 16:7-10; cp the addition in v. 12b) that three years previously he had shown a distrustful spirit by contracting an alliance with Benhadad (which is mentioned in 1 K. 15:17-22, without any mark of disapproval on the part of the narrator). The singular dates in 2 Ch. 15:19, 16:1 (which place Baasha's invasion at a period which, according to 1 K. 16:33, 16:8, was ten years after his own death) are most naturally explained as an attempt to bring the fault sufficiently near the punishment.

(e) Similarly the misfortunes of Jehoash, Amaziah, and Azariah are explained by sins of which the older history knows nothing (2 Ch. 24:23, 25:14-16, 26:20, 26:16-20);³ and Pharaoh Necho himself is made a prophet, that the defeat and death of Josiah may be due to his rejection of a divine warning (2 Ch. 35:21, 36:12b). In 2 Ch. 24:14, 28:22, 24:24, the older narratives of Kings have been not less curiously transformed than in 2 Ch. 23 (see above, § 7 c); Be., ad loc.; Kue.(2), § 20, 21, § 81, 2; We. Prolog. (4), 193, 198 f. [ET 194, 198 f.]. The correspondence between Hiram and Solomon (2 Ch. 2:3-16; cp 1 K. 5:2-9) has been rewritten by the Chronicler (with reminiscences from other parts of Kings) in his own style.

All this is entirely in the style of the Jewish 'Midrash'; it is not history, but 'Haggadā', moralising romance attaching to historical names and events. The Chronicler himself, it will be remembered (see above, § 6 [2]), gives the name of 'Midrash' to two of the sources from which his materials were derived. There need be no uncertainty, therefore, as to the nature of his work when it departs from the older narratives of S. and K.

Another peculiarity of the Chronicler is to be found in the incredibly high figures with which he deals.

David (1 Ch. 22 14) amasses 100,000 talents of gold and 1,000,000 talents of silver for the temple (contrast the much more modest estimate of even Solomon's revenue in 1 K. 10 14 f.); the army of Abijah numbers 400,000 men, that of Jeroboam 800,000, of whom 500,000 perish in one day (2 Ch. 13 3 17); Asa musters 580,000 soldiers, Zerah 1,000,000 (1489), Jehoshaphat 1,160,000 (17 14-19)—although in 20 12 he complains that he has 'no might,'—Uzziah 307,500 (26 13); of the army of Ahaz 120,000 are slain in one day, while 200,000 women and children are taken captive (28 68).

Manifestly such figures cannot be historical. The past was magnified, as it was also idealised. The empire of David and his successors was imagined on a scale of unsurpassed power and magnificence; pre-exilic Judah was pictured as already in possession of the institutions, and governed—at least in its greater and better men—by the ideas and principles which were in force at a later day. The past was read in the light of the present, and the history, where necessary, re-written accordingly. No doubt in many instances a traditional element lies at the basis of the Chronicler's representation; but this element has been developed by him, and embellished with fresh details, for the purpose of giving expression to the ideas which he had at heart, and of inculcating the lessons which he conceived the history to teach. It is probable that the new conception of Israel's past history, and the characteristic didactic treatment of it, did not originate with the Chronicler himself, but had already appeared in the Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah or the Midrash of the Book of Kings, which he so frequently cites as his authorities (cp Be. xxxvii.).

A usage, not peculiar to the Chronicler among OT writers, which must be carefully taken into account by the historical critic, is that of giving information that is really statistical in the form of a narrative. This is the principle which underlies many of the OT statements of genealogical relationships, and which alone explains the variations between different accounts of the genealogy proceeding from a single ancestor: information as to the subdivisions of clans, the intermingling of populations, and the like, is thrown into a genealogical form (see GENEALOGIES, § 1). The most striking example of the application of this principle is the ethnographical table of Gen. 10 (cp also 22 20-24 25 1-4 13-16, and parts of 36); but these instances by no means stand alone; there are many in 1 Ch. 1-9.

Thus it is avowedly the intention of 2 24 42-45 49-55 4 2-5 11-14 17-23 to indicate the origin of local populations: in 2 43 Hebron, the town, has 'sons.' Several of the names in 2 4 are also those of Edomite clans (Wellh. De Gentibus etc. 38 f.); these came gradually to be treated as belonging to Judah, and the connection was afterwards exhibited artificially in a genealogical scheme. Caleb and Jerahmeel were not originally Israelite; Caleb belonged to the Edomite clan (Gen. 36 12) of the Kenizites (Jos. 14 6-14); and clans bearing the name of Caleb and Jerahmeel are in David's time (1 S. 27 10, cp 30 29; note also the terms of Jos. 14 15a) still distinguished from Judah: in course of time, however, they were regarded as an integral part of the tribe, and a genealogy was formed (1 Ch. 2 18 25) to give expression to the fact.¹

A different application of the same principle seems to lie in the account of the institutions of Levitical service which is introduced in connection with the transference of the ark to Jerusalem by David. The author is not concerned to distinguish the gradual steps by which the Levitical organisation attained its full development. He wishes to describe the system in its complete form, especially as regards the service of the singers, and he does this under the reign of David, who was the father of Hebrew psalmody [cp OTJC (2) 223 f.] and the restorer of the sanctuary of the ark.

The style of the Chronicler has remarkable peculiarities. It is not merely that it presents characteristically late linguistic novelties (which are not confined to the vocabulary, but, as König's Syntax der hebr. Sprache fully shows, extend to the Syntax), but it has also a number of special mannerisms. Even the reader of a translation can see that this must be the case. Modern words, often with Aramaic affinities, inelegant syntax, cumbrous and uncouth sentences, in strongest possible contrast to the ease and grace of the earlier Hebrew historical books,—these are the predominant marks of the Chronicler's style; and so constant are they that there is hardly a sentence, not excerpted from Samuel or Kings, in which they are not observable.¹ For details we must refer to the Introductions and Commentaries (see e.g., Be. xiv. xviii.; Dr. Introd. 535-540; F. Brown, Hastings' DB 1389-391). It might be thought, by those unacquainted with the Chronicler's manner, that the speeches in Chronicles might form as a whole an exception to what is here stated, and that they might conceivably be based on some special sources of older date. But this would be a great mistake. The tone and literary style of the speeches which have parallels in Samuel and Kings are both very different from those which have been added by the Chronicler. The latter not only reflect, almost uniformly, the ideas and point of view of the Chronicler himself, but also exhibit frequently the same literary peculiarities. There can be no reasonable doubt that they are, one and all, his own composition.²

Be.'s work in the Kuragef. Hdb. (ed. 2, 1872) is still a most helpful commentary; see also Keil (70); Zöckler in Lange's Bibelwerk (74); Oettli, Kef. Konn.

¹ The peculiarities in question may often be observed even in the short sentences which the Chronicler sometimes introduces into a narrative otherwise excerpted without material alteration from Samuel or Kings: e.g., 1 Ch. 21 1 (עָרָה), 3 end (אֲשָׁמָה), 11 end (קָרַל), 2 Ch. 23 (2) 5 117-132 12 12 18 3 end, 316, etc.

A. OLD TESTAMENT.

The advantages afforded by a fixed and uniform chronological system of defining historical events seem so evident that one might expect to find some such method of determining dates in use from the very earliest times.

History, however, shows that a long development was needed to lead to this simple result. Only in connection with a universal history did the desire for a uniform and comprehensive method of determining dates spring up. The impulse towards a real universal history and a general chronology came, not when the attempt was made to collect and record all human events, but when men learned to look at them from a single point of view and to comprehend them in a single plan. The roots of such a universal history lie in the prophets of Israel, who regarded the plan of Yahwè as realising itself in the experience of the nations of the earth as well as in the history of Israel; and its actual beginnings, strange as it may seem, are to be found in the Apocalyptic writers, who regarded history as a comprehensive whole (see APOCALYPTIC, § 2). This mode of regarding history was continued by Christianity. It is not strange, therefore, that Christianity felt the need for a universal chronology and found a way of meeting that need, thus proving its own world-embracing significance. This is not the place to enter upon the long and involved history of the adoption of the Christian era, which, after its author, the Roman abbot Dionysius Exiguus of the first half of the sixth century, is also called the Dionysian era. In order, however, to obtain a fixed starting-point from which to reckon, we must simply state here that the year 1—i.e., the year of the birth of Christ—is equivalent to the year 754 of the era of Varro—i.e., the era of the city of Rome,—and to the first year of the 195th Olympiad; and, also, that King Herod died in the year 750 of the city of Rome, and so in the year 4 B.C. (cp Schür. GVV 1343-345).

The same phenomenon of gradual arrival at a satisfactory chronological method is repeated in the narrower sphere of the national history of the several nations. We never find a settled era, a definite date from which years were counted, at the very beginning or even at an early period of a nation's history. If anything of this kind has seemed to appear in early times, it has always turned out to be in the highest degree uncertain, or really to rest on later calculations. Nor is the

OT any exception to this rule. Only once had the Jews before Christ a national era, and that was for a very short time. When Simon the Maccabee had obtained from the Syrians complete freedom from taxation along with the acknowledgment of the political independence of Judea, documents and contracts were dated by years of Simon, the High Priest and Prince of the Jews, the first year of Simon the High Priest (1 Macc. 13:41 f. 14:27) representing the 170th year of the era of the Seleucides (= 143-142 B.C.).¹

On the other hand, since the time when the Jews fell under the dominion of Syria, they had used the so-called era of the Seleucides (Βασιλεία Ἑλληνῶν, 1 Macc. 1:11; Βασιλεία Ἀσσυρίων [Assyrian=Syrian], Jos. Ant. xiii. 67; מנין שנים = era contractuum amongst the Jews, and year ד'גאטנאָיג amongst the Syrians). This era has for its starting-point the defeat of Nicanor, the general of Antigonus, by Seleucus Nicator, and the final establishment of the dominion of the Seleucides in Syria and Babylonia in the year Ol. 117, 1—i.e., 312 B.C. It is used in the Books of the Maccabees, but there, it would seem, with this difference, that in the first book it begins, not, as was usual elsewhere, in the autumn, but in the spring of 312, thus about half a year earlier.² This era reached in general as far as the Syrian power, and although, usually, where states were able to obtain freedom they introduced new eras of their own, none was able to maintain itself so long as that of the Seleucides. It remained in use, indeed, among the Syrians for centuries alongside of the Arabic era, which counts from the Hegira (hijra, flight of Mohammed), 16th July, 622 A.D.

Real eras are not met with in the OT in earlier times. We cannot cite as an exception the practice of the Jews during the Exile, of counting the years since they were carried away from their land (לנינון, Ezek. 33:21 and 40:1; לגלות יהויכין, 2 K. 25:27; also Jer. 52:31, and Ezek. 1:2, and, without mention of the point from which the reckoning is made, Ezek. 8:20:29:17). In truth, they desired nothing more eagerly than to be delivered from the need of counting in this way. Besides, there was along with it a reckoning from the final fall of Jerusalem (Ezek. 40:1), while Ezek. 1:1 (if the text has reached us intact) must rest on still a third mode of reckoning.¹ It is, moreover, a very unsafe hypothesis which ventures to retain in the case of the statement of 2 Ch. 16:1 (as a whole clearly untenable) at least the number 36 as based on trustworthy tradition, and proposes to find therein a trace of a Judæan era, thought to date from the division of the kingdom (Sharpe, Chronology of the Bible, 29; cp Brandes, Abhandl. 62). Nor, lastly, are we any more justified in finding any trace of a real era counting from the Exodus in the late passage 1 K. 6:1, where the building of Solomon's temple is assigned to the 480th year after that event. This number does not rest on tradition: it has been reached by calculation based on some hypothesis. No corroboration can be obtained from the numbers in the late Priestly Code—if the passages containing them are original even there—numbers which date the events of the journey through the wilderness by years from the deliverance out of Egypt (לָצֵאת בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל מֵאֶרֶץ מִצְרָיִם; cp Ex. 16:19; Nu. 1:19; 33:38). Nor can any support, in fact, be found for the notion that the Jubilee period was turned to chronological purposes. There is not the slightest trace of a real carrying out of the regulations concerning it mentioned in Lev. 25:9 ff.: even the Books of the Maccabees speak only of Sabbatic years, never of Jubilee years (1 Macc. 6:49-53; cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 162).

² So Schürer, op. cit. 133; We., however (IV 129 f. 208), regards this assumption as unnecessary (cp YEAR, § 9).

In spite of this lack of a proper era, the OT is not without notes and data intended to serve as a

2. Miscellaneous data.

In addition to isolated observations (none the less important that they are incidental) setting an occurrence in relation to another prominent event (e.g., to the death of the king, as in Is. 6:14-28, or to an important expedition, as in Is. 20:1, to the building of a city, as in Nu. 13:22, or to an extraordinary natural phenomenon, as in Am. 1:1), we generally find, in the case of any important OT personage, the year of his life or his reign specified; and in the books edited during the Exile the date of the events narrated begins to be given by years of the reigning king. Besides, there are the various synchronistic data often supplied by headings of books (e.g., in the case of certain of the prophets), and by the Books of Kings, which have a complete synchronistic record for the time of the coexistence of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah. Finally, the evidence of the contemporaneity of certain events furnished at times by the historical narrative itself is of the highest importance.

The weightiest question, however, is, to what degree of credibility this chronological material can lay claim.

3. Late origin.

Before undertaking the examination of this question for the several points of the history, we must premise some general considerations that thrust themselves on our notice. First of all, there is the remarkable fact that these chronological notes are to be found in greatest abundance in those parts of the historical books that are confessedly to be regarded as the youngest. In the Pentateuch they belong to the post-exilic Priestly Code or to additions of even later date; in the other historical books into which the older

¹ In that case nothing would meet the requirements of the passage but a reckoning that counted from the reform of Josiah (622). Of any such mode of reckoning we know nothing, any more than we do of a reckoning by Jubilee periods, or of a Babylonian era meeting the requirements of the text (cp Kue. Eintl. 260 n. 4). Wl. (AT Unters. 94-96) therefore alters the text, and reads Ezek. 1:1 thus, וְיָהִי בִשְׁנָה הַשְּׁלִישִׁתָּה לְהַשְׁלִישִׁתָּה בְּרִבְעִי, or וְיָהִי בִשְׁנָה הַרְבִּיעִיתָה לְהַרְבִּיעִיתָה, which must be understood like 8:1, and give an earlier date than 8:1. It would be better, however, to assume the original reading to have been 'in the fifth year' (cp the following verse)—i.e., בִּשְׁנָה הַחֲמִישִׁית, and that from the fact of Jeremiah's having predicted seventy years for the Exile (25:11, cp 29:10) while Ezekiel gave only forty (46), a later writer drew the inference that Ezekiel prophesied thirty years after Jeremiah, and accordingly inserted as a date in Ezek. 1:1 the thirtieth year of the Exile (Duhm).

sources have been worked, they are due, in the main, to the latest exilic editors. Then, it must be regarded as proved that the superscriptions of the prophetic books containing detailed information concerning the time of the respective prophets do not come from the prophets themselves, but are much younger additions, such as the erudition of later ages delighted in. This appears from the inexplicable double date (by kings of Judah and of Israel) found in Hosea and Amos, as well as from the inaccuracy, or the crowding, of the data in Is. Jer. and Ezek. Nor is the remarkable addition in Amos 1:1, 'two years before the earthquake,' any exception to this rule: the fact that a later event is employed to define the date shows that the statement is a subsequent addition, and it is therefore very probable that it rests on the exegesis and calculation of the scribes (cp Hoffmann, ZATW 3:123 [83]). Lastly, it is remarkable that the text presents no uniformity of reading in the matter of recording dates: nay, that there are even to be found unfilled blanks. Thus in 1 S. 13: the numbers have been omitted from the formula giving the age of Saul and the length of his reign, and in 5 the whole verse is omitted.¹ There are also other places in the LXX where such chronological data are lacking—e.g., Jer. 47:1 [BAN]—and elsewhere in the old versions we come on considerable variations from the traditional Hebrew text. All these are marks that indicate a late origin for the chronological numbers and warn us in the most emphatic way to submit them to a thorough examination.

As regards the oldest period, with which Genesis deals, the time down to the Exodus, it is known that the numbers supplied by the Samaritan and the LXX texts, and even by the Book of Jubilees (dating from the first century A.D.), differ in many points from those of the Massoretic text.

The divergence will be made most plain by a comparison showing the sum of the years according to each tradition. In Gen. 5 the period from the creation of the world to the beginning of the flood is, according to the Hebrew text, 1656 years; according to the Samaritan, 1307; and, according to 5B, 2242. In Gen. 11:10 ff. the interval from the birth of Shem to the birth of Abraham is, according to the Hebrew text, 390 years; according to the Samaritan, 1040; and, according to the text of 5B, 1270. In this no account is taken of the variations exhibited by the other MSS of 5 itself, nor is it inquired whether the tradition represented by any one given text is free from internal inconsistency (cp, e.g., Gen. 11:10, 'two years after the flood,' with Gen. 5:32 76, and Gen. 11:10a; further Gen. 12:4 with Gen. 11:26, 32).

This state of matters shows, what was indeed probable to begin with, that there was no fixed tradition concerning the early history of Israel: that, indeed, even at so late a time as that of the LXX and the Book of Jubilees, there was no clear idea of how the period in question should be measured. Thus the numbers of the Hebrew text, since they are not earlier than the Priestly Code, go back at the best only to the fifth century B.C., and do not rest on tradition, but have been reached by the application of some artificial theory. Since they are useless, therefore, at least for chronology (if indeed one could ever have hoped to obtain such a thing for those earliest times) it is unnecessary to attempt to discover what the actual theory underlying them is.

It will be enough to mention that v. Gutschmid observed that 2666—the number of years resulting from the summation of the Massoretic numbers for the period (Gen. 5 to Ex. 12:40) from the creation of Adam to the Exodus² is exactly two-thirds of 4000 years. These 4000 years he took to represent a period (of 100 generations of 40 years each) assigned for the duration of the world. In this way he sought to explain the artificial origin of the system (cp Nöld. Untersuch. zur Krit. des AT

² The number 2666 results from the addition of 1656, the number of years from the creation of the world to the beginning of the flood (cp Gen. 5), +290, the sum of the years from the flood to the birth of Abraham (cp Gen. 11:10 ff.) +75 to the departure of Abraham from Haran (Gen. 12:4) +215 to the departure of Jacob for Egypt (=25 to the birth of Isaac [Gen. 21:5], +60 to the birth of Jacob [Gen. 25:26], +130 years of Jacob's life [Gen. 47:9-28]), +430 years of stay in Egypt (Ex. 12:40).

CHRONOLOGY

111). It is worth while, however, noticing the relation in which, according to Oppert (GGN, 1877, pp. 201-223), the Chaldean numbers for the first ages in Bérössus and the statements in Genesis stand to each other. The Chaldeans reckon from the beginning of the world to Alexander 215 myriads of years, of which 47 myriads represent the time from the first man to Alexander. Thus they allow for the creation 168 myriads of years. Now, the 7 days of the biblical account of the creation give 168 hours. Thus in the creation age a myriad of years is represented in the biblical account by an hour. Again, for the time of the first ten men down to the flood, the Chaldeans reckon 432,000 years,¹ Genesis 1656. If both numbers be divided by 72, we get 6000 and 23 respectively, and 23 years—i.e., 8400 days—represent 1200 weeks, while 6000 years is 5 times 1200 years. Hence the Chaldeans seem to have reckoned 5 years (i.e. 60 months) as a lustrum (sosse), where Genesis has reckoned 1 week. 1656 years (Genesis)=72×23 years=72×1200—i.e., 86,400—weeks; 432,000 years (Chaldean)=86,400 lustra. This remarkable relation, which can hardly rest on pure accident, presupposes a complicated calculation, and a very late origin for these numbers. Whatever be the theory underlying the numbers of Genesis, one thing, therefore, is certain: for a sure chronology of the times before the Exodus, the OT numbers, appearing as they do for the first time in the youngest sources of the Pentateuch, afford no security.

The case is no better with the chronology of the interval that extends from the Exodus to the building of the temple of Solomon. We have here, indeed, a check in 1 K. 6:1 which makes the building of the temple begin in the 480th year after the Exodus; but this number did not make its appearance till a time when the temple of Solomon was no more (cp above, § 1). It bears, moreover, the clear impress of being artificial; for it plainly counts from Moses to David twelve generations of forty years each, which we can easily identify as follows: Moses, Joshua, Othniel, Ehud, Deborah, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, Samuel, Saul, and David. This explanation of the origin of the number 480 is corroborated by the fact that the five "little" Judges in Ju. 10 and 12 appear to have been inserted into the Deuteronomistic Book of Judges later (on the object of their insertion, see JUDGES, § 9). Nor can anything certain be obtained from the individual numbers, since they are neither quite clear nor free from gaps.

It remains obscure, e.g., how the numbers relating to the supremacy of the Philistines and the judgeship of Samson (13:15-20 and 16:31) are related to each other; how the twenty years from the arrival of the ark at Kirjath-jearim to the victory of Samuel over the Philistines are to be fitted into Samuel's history (1 S. 7:2); and how the ninety-four years of foreign oppression are to be combined with the data concerning the length of rule of the individual Judges.²

The tradition also presents gaps, however, since it does not mention the time during which Joshua was the leader of the Israelites, and in 1 S. 13:1 the numbers for Saul are entirely wanting. Finally, GBAL allows Eli in 1 S. 4:18 only twenty years instead of the forty of MT: and the frequently recurring round numbers—such as 40 for Moses, Othniel, Deborah-Barak, Gideon, Eli (20) and David; 80 (=2×40) for Ehud; and 20 (=½) for Samson, for Eli (according to GB), for Samuel, and (approximately) for Tola (23), and Jair (22)—go to set in still clearer light the unhistorical character of the data.

The matter may rest, then, as Nöldeke left it at the end of his chronology of the period of the Judges (op. cit. 197), with the verdict that 'neither for the several divisions of the period of the Judges nor for its whole duration

² If we reckon together the numbers for this period, we get as follows:—40 (stay in the wilderness) +40 (Othniel, Ju. 3:11)+80 (Ehud, 8:30)+40 (Deborah-Barak, 5:31)+40 (Gideon, 8:28)+23 (Tola, 10:2)+22 (Jair, 10:3)+6 (Jephthah, 12:7)+7 (Ibzan, 12:9)+10 (Eli, 12:11)+8 (Abdon, 12:14)+20 (Samson, 16:31)+40 (Eli, 1 S. 4:18)+20 (Samuel, 1 S. 7:2)+40 (David, 1 K. 2:12)+4 (Solomon, 1 K. 6:1)=440 years. If we deduct the 'little' Judges (Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Eli, and Abdon=70), we shall have a total of only 370 years. For Joshua and Saul, for whom the numbers are lacking, there still remain, to complete the 480 years, according to the first calculation 40 years, according to the second 120. If, however, we are to insert between the periods of the several Judges the 94 years of foreign oppression (=8 [Cushan Rishathaim, Ju. 3:8]+18 [Eglon, 3:14]+20 [Jabin, 4:3]+7 [Midianites, 6:1]+3 [Abimelech, 9:22]+18 [Ammonites, 10:8]+20 [Philistines, cp 13:15-20 and 16:31]), we get 534 or 464 years—according to the first reckoning already 54 years too many, with nothing left for Joshua and Saul; according to the second, only sixteen years for these two together, a period far from sufficient for the deeds of both.

is a chronology any longer attainable.' It is, therefore, also useless to seek, by calculation from these numbers, to ascertain the time of the leadership of Joshua and the reign of Saul. The furthest we can go is to conclude, from passages like Am. 2:20-25, that an old tradition estimated the journey through the wilderness at forty years. (On the chronology of the Book of Judges, see JUDGES, § 15.)

It is much harder to deal with the chronological dates for the period from the building of the temple by Solomon to the conquest of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar. In various important instances we now meet with statements concerning the year of the reigning king to which the event narrated belongs.

Thus in regard to events of war we read: 'In the fifth year of King Rehoboam Shishak King of Egypt came up against Jerusalem' (1 K. 14:25), and 'In the ninth year of Hosea the king of Assyria took Samaria' (2 K. 17:6). So also in regard to home affairs: 'In the three and twentieth year of King Jehoash the priests had not repaired the breaches of the house' (2 K. 12:7). Clear as such passages seem to be, we need to know which year of a given king was called the first—the year in the course of which he ascended the throne, or the first complete year at the beginning of which he was already seated on the throne. Sound information on this point is still more indispensable, however, for the understanding of the further data for our period supplied by the Books of Kings. These give the sum of the years of reign of each several king. If, however, for any interval that can be defined by means of events related, we add together these amounts, the totals for the parallel kingdoms of Judah and Israel do not agree. The question becomes very complicated when at each accession the date is regularly defined synchronistically, by years of the contemporary ruler of the neighbouring kingdom of Israel or Judah. This synchronism again leads to a reckoning of its own. What we have first to do is to estimate the value of the various chronological data which form a sort of framework for the whole history of the period. Then we can determine the importance and range of the individual dates assigned by years of accession.

The statements concerning the duration of a reign as well as the synchronism of its beginning form parts of the brief reviews which pass judgment on each king from the standpoint of the Deuteronomic law (see KINGS, BOOKS OF, § 1 ff.). The two chronological elements, however, have a diverse origin; for the synchronistic notes betray their character as 'subjective additions of the Epitomator.' It is clear, to begin with, that this noting of synchronism was not in actual use during the existence of the two kingdoms: apart from dates of accessions, we find it only once—at the fall of Samaria (2 K. 18:9-10), the point where the system comes to an end.

It would be natural to maintain that the very construction of the chronological notes reveals their diverse origin: the verb מלך has in the same sentence one meaning for the words that precede, and another for those that follow. It is to be construed as inchoative ('he became king') as well as progressive ('he reigned'). For instance, in 2 K. 14:23 'In the fifth year of Amaziah the son of Joash, king of Judah, Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel מלך (=became king, and also=reigned) forty-one years in Samaria.' If here and there (1 K. 15:25 16:29 22:52: 2 K. 3:15 13:3) מלך is added to מלך, this only proves, it would seem, a sense of the irreconcilability of expressing both the date of accession and the duration of the reign by the simple verb מלך. The double sense of this verb, however, is peculiar to such annals, and is to be explained by the brevity of the style. Exactly so in the list of kings of Tyre given by Josephus (c. Ap. 1:18) from Menander of Ephesus, εβασίλευσεν is used in both senses at the same time: 'he became king' as well as 'and he reigned.'

The decisive proof, however, of the secondary character of the synchronistic numbers is reached only when we compare them with the years of reign. It then appears that the former has been attained by calculation from the latter, although the method that has been followed cannot in all points be discerned.¹ A tabular exhibition of the data will be the best way to make this clear. In the first column we give the date reckoned from an imaginary era of the division of the kingdom, and in the last the references from the Books of Kings.

258 years 241 7/8 yrs.				=	258 years 260 years

This table shows that at the end of the 258th year after the division of the kingdom, there had elapsed 258 synchronistic years, $241\frac{7}{8}$ years of reign in Israel, and 260 such years in Judah; and we have thus the singular equation $258 = 241\frac{7}{8} = 260$. The result is even more singular, however, when we examine separately the parts before and after the first point of coincidence obtained through a contemporaneous accession in both lines. Before the year of accession of Jehu and Athaliah there were only 88 years according to the synchronisms for 98 years of reign in Israel and 95 in Judah; but for the second part there are 170 years according to the synchronisms for only $143\frac{1}{8}$ years of reign in Israel and 165 in Judah. Whilst thus, in the first period, the number, according to the synchronistic calculation, is smaller than the sum of the traditional years, in the second period, which is longer by about a half, it exceeds the traditional years not inconsiderably. Similar variations for smaller periods can easily be proved by a glance at the table. Nor can we equalize the synchronistic and the traditional numbers by assuming that the latter represent a popular way of counting according to which from the middle of the first to the beginning of the third year was considered three years, as in the case of the siege of Samaria (2 K. 18 10). The excess of the traditional values in the period before Jehu could perhaps be thus explained, but not their defect in the following period. Nor is it possible by altering the individual numbers to bring the synchronisms into harmony with the years of reign; even were one to alter all the synchronistic statements, this would do nothing towards removing the differences between the numbers for Israel and those for Judah. Thus, almost along the whole line, the discrepancy between synchronisms and years of reign is incurable.

We must not fail, however, to appreciate a remarkable agreement. The sum of the synchronistic years is very nearly equal to the sum of the years of reign for Judah ($258 = 260$). The slight difference of two years can have no weight, and can perhaps be entirely removed. In the surprising statement of 2 K. 18 10 that the accession of Jehoash of Israel happened in the 37th year of Jehoash of Judah, we may follow v. 1 and change 37 to 39; for, according to that verse, Jehoahaz, who had acceded in the 23rd year of Jehoash of Judah, reigned 17 years. In this way the sum of the years of reign in the lines of Israel and Judah, according to the synchronisms, would be increased in each case by two years—for Jehoahaz would have reigned, according to the synchronism, 16 years instead of 14, and Jehoash 39 instead of 37—while the traditional numbers would undergo no alteration. Even without this slight emendation—adopted in the Aldine edition of the LXX, and demanded by Thienus, Klostermann, and Kamphausen—it is apparent that it is the sum of the Judean years of reign that forms the basis on which the synchronistic numbers are calculated. In this process, however, though the individual sums have not been disregarded, it has been impossible, especially in the case of the kings of N. Israel, to avoid important variations.

¹ It has recently been shown by Benzinger (Comm. zu den Königen, 1899, pp. xvii.-xxi.) that the synchronisms start from two different points and proceed upon two distinct methods of reckoning, one of which is followed by preference in the Hebrew text and the other in OL.

Care, however, has been taken not to alter the synchronism of events.¹ It is worthy of note that the following requirements are satisfied:—Jeroboam's reign runs parallel with those of Rehoboam and Abijah (1 K. 14:30–15:7); Baasha is king during the reign of Asa (1 K. 15:16); Jehoshaphat survives Ahab and Ahaziah, and reigns contemporaneously with Jehoram of Israel (1 K. 22:2 ff. 50; 2 K. 8:7 ff.); the deaths of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah fall in the same year (2 K. 9); Amaziah and Jehoash of Israel reign contemporaneously (2 K. 14:8 ff.); and Pekah is a contemporary of Jotham and Ahaz (2 K. 15:37–16:5 ff.).

Although the synchronistic dates have thus not been attained without regard to tradition, they are obviously, as belonging to the youngest parts of the text, not a standard for chronology. They apply to the past a method of dating with which it was quite unacquainted. This is true not only of the practice, which could never be carried out in actual life, of connecting the years of one kingdom with reigns of kings in a neighbouring kingdom, but also of the methodical practice, presupposed in such a custom, of indicating in an exact and regular way the years within one and the same kingdom, by the years of reign of its king for the time being. In such texts as we can, with any confidence, assign to pre-exilic times, we find nothing but popular

8. First chronologies associating an event contemporary with it (cp Is. 6:1 14:28² 20:1).

The few dates according to years of kings given in the older history (as, e.g., 1 K. 14:25; 2 K. 12:7) may be ignored. They are too isolated, and must rest (e.g., in the writings and portions which treat of the latest pre-exilic times) on subsequent calculation, or be due to interpolation (cp also the dates introduced by the Chronicler in deference to the desire felt at a later date for exacter definition of time, of which the Books of Kings still knew nothing: 2 Ch. 13:23 15:10–19, and especially 16:1)—though it is perhaps possible that, even without there being a settled system, some prominent events might, occasionally and without set purpose, be defined by years of reign. In any case, dating by native kings must be regarded as at least older than the artificial synchronism between Judah and Israel.

Dating by the years of kings was thus never systematically used by the Hebrews so long as they had national kings. They learned this useful method from the Babylonians, and then introduced it into their historical works compiled during the exile (cp Wi. AT Untersuch., especially pp. 87–94). Thus the question how the Hebrews dealt with the year of a king's death—i.e., whether they reckoned the fraction of a year that remained before the beginning of the next year to the deceased king, or made the first year of the new king begin at once—disappears. There can be no doubt that the synchronisms, as well as the dates and years of reign in general, presuppose the Babylonian method (the only satisfactory one), according to which the rest of the year in which any king died was reckoned to the last of his reign, and the first year of the new king was the year at the beginning of which he already wore the crown.

¹ We need take no account of the independent narratives of CHRONICLES (g.v., § 5); they do not agree even with the traditional years of reign.

By giving up the synchronisms we are thrown back for the chronology of the monarchy on the sums of the

10. Years of reign of the individual kings.

The hope of finding in these numbers trustworthy material for chronology, and thus solving the singular equation whereby about 242 Israelitish years represent 260 Judean years, could be realised only on one condition. One might simply subtract the 242 Israelitish years from the total for Judah, and regard the excess of 18 years as falling after the conquest of Samaria. Nor is there anything in the synchronism to prevent this operation, for that may have started from an incorrect calculation in putting the fall of Hoshea as late as the reign of Hezekiah. A clear veto, however, is laid on this procedure on other grounds. If we subtract the superfluous 18 years (6 years of Hezekiah and the last 12 of Ahaz) from the total for Judah, all that is left of Ahaz's reign parallel with the Israelitish years of reign is the first 4 years. Therefore Pekah, who was murdered nine years before the fall of Samaria (2 K. 17:6), must, at the accession of Ahaz, have been already five years dead, which is impossible, since, according to 2 K. 16:5 ff., this king was attacked by him. The expedient of simple subtraction, therefore, fails; the embarrassing equation remains, about 242 Israelitish years = 260 Judean: nay, since no objection can be raised against the contemporaneity of the deaths of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah, 144 Israelitish years = 165 Judean.

If the totals are thus unequal, very great inequalities appear, naturally, in the details. Efforts have been made to remove them; but this has not been achieved in any convincing way.

2 K. 15:5, e.g., states that during the attack of leprosy from which his father Azariah suffered in the last years of his life, 'Jotham was over the palace and judged the people of the land.' Even were we to found on this statement the theory that the years of reign of father and son that ran parallel to each other were counted twice over in the numbers 52 and 16 assigned to their respective reigns, and also to suppose that during all these 16 years the father was still alive, there would still remain 144 Israelitish years = 149 Judean.

Mistaken attempts of this kind are, moreover, the less to be taken into consideration that, as will appear (§ 35^b), even the lowest total of 144 years for the interval from Jehu to the fall of Samaria is more than 20 years too high. From all this it results that the individual numbers of years of reign, as well as the totals, are untrustworthy and useless for the purposes of a certain chronology, even if it be admitted that, within certain limits or in some points, they may agree with actual fact.

11. Basis of calculation. The untrustworthiness of the numbers becomes plainer when the principle according to which they are formed is clearly exhibited.

In 1887 E. Krey (see below, § 85) argued that, at least in the case of the Israelitish kings, the several sums assigned to the respective reigns rest in general on an artificial fiction. He then thought that the series of kings of Judah, and indeed those also of the house of Jehu, 'show no such artificiality'; but (acc. to Bleek-We. Einl. (4) 265) he soon observed a playing with figures also in the items for Judah. To begin with the kings of Israel down to Jehoram, we find an average reign of 12 years. In the case of Omri and Jehoram this is the exact number, whilst for Jeroboam, Baasha, and Ahab we have 22¹ (i.e., in round numbers 2 × 12), and for the rest—Nadab, Elah, and Ahaziah (the immediate successors of the kings provided with the double period)—2 years each. This is as if we had 8 kings with 12 years each, making a total of 96—more exactly 98 years. Moreover, the totals for the first and the last four of these are each almost exactly 48. In the next part of the series, as We. emphasises, we have for the 9 kings from Jehu to Hoshea a total of 144 years, which makes an average of 16 for each. One might also urge the remarkable fact that, even as Jehu with his 28 years reigned about as long as his two successors, so the 41 years of Jeroboam II. also exactly equal the sum of the reigns of his successors. In the Judean line, on the other hand, a similar role is played by the figures 40 and 80. Thus, down to the destruction of Samaria in the 6th year of Hezekiah, we have Rehoboam + Abijah 20, Asa 41, Jehoshaphat

¹ Strictly, Baasha has exactly 24 assigned him.

+ Jehoram + Ahaziah + Athaliah 40, Jehoash 40, Amaziah + Azariah 81, Jotham + Ahaz + Hezekiah 38 years; and from this point onwards till the last date, the 37th year of Jehoiachin, we have Hezekiah + Manasseh + Amon 80, and also Josiah + Joahaz + Jehoiakim + Jehoiachin 79½ years. If we might still, with Kamphausen, be inclined to find in all this only a freak of chance, our suspicion would be raised on comparing the total for the kings of Israel (circa 240) with the number in 1 K. 6:1 (480), and still more on observing that 480 is also the total of years from the building of the temple of Solomon to the beginning of a new epoch—the epoch that opens with the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus and the consequent possibility of founding the second Theocracy and setting about the building of the second temple. (The 36-7 years of Solomon from the building of the temple + 260 years, to the fall of Samaria + 133½ years, to the fall of Jerusalem + 50 years of the Exile, give exactly 480 years.)

There can hardly, then, be any mistake about the artificiality of the total as well as of the various items. If so, the origin of the present numbers for the years of reign of the individual kings, on which the synchronistic notices are founded, must fall in a period later than the victory of Cyrus over Babylon, and chronology cannot trust to the correctness of the numbers.

For all that, it may be conjectured the numbers in individual instances are correct; but which are such cases, can be known only in some way independent of the numbers. Sometimes, indeed, the narrative of Kings or a prophetic writing can decide the point; but without help from outside we could not go far. In itself it cannot be more than probable that the last kings of Judah appear with the correct numbers. These numbers give Hezekiah 29 (2 K. 18:2), Manasseh 55 (21:1), Amon 2 (21:19), Josiah 31 (22:1), Jehoahaz 1 (23:1), Jehoiakim 11 (23:36), Jehoiachin 1 (24:8), and Zedekiah 11 years (24:18); thus, 139½ years in all, embodying an estimate of 133 years from the fall of Samaria to the conquest of Jerusalem. Thus, the earliest that the dates according to years of kings can lay claim to consideration is in Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Here grave mistakes in retrospective calculation (for even they rest on that) seem to be excluded by the nearness of the time. Naturally no account can be taken of the statements of the Book of Daniel, which did not originate till the second century B.C.; it knows the history of the fall of the kingdom of Judah and of the exilic period only from tradition, and cannot be acquitted of grave mistakes (see DANIEL, ii. § 9 f.).

For the last period, reaching from the fall of Jerusalem to the beginning of the Christian era, we have in the Hebrew OT itself but few historical records. Beyond the introduction of the law in the restored community the historical narrative does not conduct us. For the short interval preceding it we are referred to the statements in the prophets Haggai and Zechariah and in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. These, however, show that the Jews had learned in the interval how to date exactly by years of reign. The writings mentioned give dates by years of the Persian kings. All difficulties in the way of a chronology of this period, however, are not thus removed. The names Darius and Artaxerxes leave us to choose between the several bearers of these names among the Persian kings. Hence both the first and the second of the three Dariuses have been regarded as the Dariāwesh mentioned in the OT, and even all three Artaxerxes have been brought into connection with the Artahšasta of Ezr.-Neh. Then, again, the transpositions and actual additions that the Chronicler allows himself to make increase the difficulty of knowing the real order of events. In the case of Darius, indeed, only the first can, after all (in spite of Havet and Imbert), be seriously considered.

The chief interest, accordingly, lies in deciding as to the date in Ezra 7:7 f. which sets the return of Ezra in the seventh year of Artahšasta. It is to be noted that this passage (7:1-10) has been revised by the Chronicler (see EZRA AND NEHEMIAH, Books of), and in both verses the date is open, from its position or lack of connection, to the suspicion of not being original. Koster accordingly, leaving this datum wholly out of account, maintained (Herstel, '94) that Ezra made his first appearance in Jerusalem with the Gola (see ISRAEL, § 57) immediately after Nehemiah's second arrival there, while Artaxerxes I. was still on the throne, and introduced the law then. Van Hoonacker, on the other hand, accepted the datum of Ezra 7:7 f., but believed that it had reference to Artaxerxes II., and accordingly set down the date of Ezra's arrival as in the seventh year of that king (397 B.C.). [Marquart ('Die Organisation der jüd. Gemeinde nach dem sogenannten Exil,' Fundamente isr. u. jüd. Gesch., '96)¹ thinks that the careers of Nehemiah and Ezra can fall only a few decades earlier than the reported deportation of Jews to Hyrcania under Artaxerxes III., Ochus. Nehemiah's Artaxerxes was, he thinks, Artaxerxes II., Mnemon. He finds no trace of Ezra's presence in Jerusalem during the twelve-years' governorship of Nehemiah; the reference to Ezra in Neh. 12:36 is an addition of the Chronicler. Nehemiah, too, is nowhere mentioned in Ezra (Neh. 8:9 10:2 are interpolated). Internal evidence alone can determine the date of Ezra. Neh. 13 is connected naturally with Ezra 9:1-10:44. Ezra's arrival then follows in the time after Nehemiah's return to Susa; the text of Ezra 7:7 (which belongs to the redactor) has suffered in transmission; 368 or 365 was the original date reported. Nehemiah's second arrival, at any rate, fell after the promulgation of the Law (Neh. 13:1); Marquart proposes to read in Neh. 13:6 'at the end of his days' (יָמָיו), implying a date between 367 (364) and 359. Cheyne, in a work almost devoid of notes, but called 'the provisional summing up of special researches,' differs in some respects in his chronological view of the events alike from the scholars just referred to, and from Ed. Meyer, who is about to be mentioned. (See his Jewish Religious Life after the Exile, '98, translated, after revision by the author, by H. Stocks under the title Das religiöse Leben der Juden nach dem Exil, '99). Like Marquart he doubts the correctness of the text of Neh. 5:14; but he is confident that the Artaxerxes of Ezra-Nehemiah is Artaxerxes I., and that Nehemiah's return to Susa precedes the arrival of Ezra with the Gola. The incapacity of Nehemiah's successor (the Tirshatha?) probably stimulated Ezra to seek a firman from the king, though the terms of the supposed firman in Ezra 7 cannot be relied upon. Ezra seems to have failed at the outset of his career, and it was the news of this failure, according to Cheyne, that drew Nehemiah a second time from Susa. Klostermann's treatment of the chronology in Herzog cannot be here summarised.—Ed.]

Ed. Meyer's thorough discussion (Entst. '96), however, has convinced the present writer that we are not entitled to call in question the arrival of Ezra before Nehemiah, and consequently that the datum of Ezra 7:7 f. may be right after all. If so, Ezra returned to Jerusalem with the Gola in 458 B.C., having it for his object to introduce the law there. In this, however, he did not succeed. It was not until after Nehemiah had arrived in Jerusalem in 445 B.C. clothed with ample powers, and had in the same year restored the city walls with his characteristic prudence and energy, that Ezra was at last able to come forward and introduce the law under Nehemiah's protection (445 B.C.). From this date onwards till 433 B.C. (cp Neh. 13:6) Nehemiah continued in Jerusalem. Shortly after 433 B.C.—perhaps in 432 B.C.—he obtained a second furlough. How long this lasted we do not know; but its importance is clear from Neh. 13:4-31.

15. Later times.

The OT offers no further chronological material for determining the dates of the last centuries before Christ.

¹ But the essay was 'completed 29th August 1895' (p. 28).

CHRONOLOGY

The apocalypse of Daniel cannot be held to bridge over the gap between Ezra and the time of the Maccabees with any certainty, for it is the peculiarity of these apocalypses to point to past events only in a veiled way, and it is, in fact, only what we know otherwise of the complications between Syria and Egypt, and of the doings of Antiochus Epiphanes, that makes an understanding and an estimate of the descriptions in the Book of Daniel possible. Besides, its intimation (9.24 ff.) that from the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar (586) to the death of Antiochus Epiphanes (164), we are to reckon a period of 70 year-weeks—490 years—shows how inaccurate the chronological knowledge of the writer was, and how much need we have to look around for other help.

Astronomy would furnish the surest means for determining the exact year and day of events, if the OT contained indubitable accounts of solar or lunar eclipses. Unhappily, however, such accounts are lacking. One might be tempted to go so far as to suppose

16. Supposed astronomical data. A solar eclipse to explain the sign on the sundial of Ahaz given to Hezekiah by Isaiah (Is. 38.8); perhaps also the 'standing still of the sun at Gibeon'

17. Mahler's system. (Josh. 10.12-14). Rationalistic as this may seem, Ed. Mahler (see § 38 for title of work) has not been content to stop here, but has discovered many solar eclipses intimated in the OT: he even finds them in every prophetic passage that speaks of a darkening of the sun. In this way he has been able to determine astronomically a whole series of events. Before we can accept these results, however, we must examine more carefully the foundation on which they are reared.

For example, Mahler assigns the Exodus to the 27th March 1335 B.C. which was a Thursday, because fourteen days before that day there occurred a central solar eclipse. This calculation rests on Talmudic data¹ that assign the darkness mentioned in Ex. 10.21 to the 1st of Nisan, and explain that that day, and therefore also the 15th of Nisan, was a Thursday. In Ex. 10.22, indeed, we read of a darkness of three days; but Mahler argues that this note of duration really belongs not to v. 22 but to v. 23, and is meant simply to explain how 'intense and terrifying was the impression which the darkness produced on the inhabitants of Egypt'—'so that no one dared for three days to leave his house.' It is just as arbitrary to assume in Gen. 15.5 ff. an eclipse, enabling Abraham to count the stars before sunset, and then to use the eclipse for fixing the date of the covenant then concluded (Bérith ben hab-béthärim). The time at which search is to be made for this eclipse Mahler reckons as 430 years before the Exodus, since Rabbinic tradition thus explains the number 430 assigned in Ex. 12.40 to the stay in Egypt, whilst on the other hand it makes the 400 years assigned in Gen. 15.13 to the bondage begin with the birth of Isaac. The desired eclipse Mahler finds on 8th Oct. 1764 B.C. about 430 years before the Exodus (1335 B.C.; see above). Even more artificial, if possible, is the Rabbinic exegesis of Gen. 28.11 and 32.32 on which Mahler relies for the determination of the beginning and the end of the twenty-years' stay of Jacob in Haran. The solar eclipse indicated according to him in Gen. 28.11 ('because the sun was set') must have been, he argues, in the evening, and would thus be the eclipse that occurred on the 17th Feb. 1601 B.C., whilst Gen. 32.32 ('and the sun rose upon him') must indicate a morning eclipse, which occurred on 30th May 1581 B.C. If we add that for the victory of Joshua at Gibeon (Josh. 10.12-14) he has found a solar eclipse calculated to have occurred on 31st Jan. 1296 B.C., we have for the earliest period the following items:—

MAHLER'S SUPPOSED EARLY DATES.

Abraham's Bérith ben hab-béthärim (Gen. 15.5 ff.)	1764 B.C.
Jacob's journey to Haran (Gen. 28.11)	1601 "
Jacob's return home (Gen. 32.31 [32])	1581 "
Exodus (Ex. 10.21)	27th March 1335 "
Joshua's victory at Gibeon (Josh. 10.12-14)	1296 "

The attempt to do justice to Is. 38.8 by the assumption of a solar eclipse is at least more interesting. According to this theory, all the requirements of the narrative would be met if a solar eclipse had occurred ten hours before sunset, since in that case the index could have traversed over again the ten degrees which, owing to the eclipse, it had 'gone down,' and the dial would have again made its usual indication. Such an eclipse has, moreover, been found for 17th June 679 B.C., whence, since the sign in question belongs to Hezekiah's fourteenth year, his reign must have covered the years 693-664 B.C.

The further calculations which fix a whole series of dates on the ground of misunderstood passages are likewise quite unsatisfactory. Thus, Amos is made (89.7) to announce to Jeroboam II. the solar eclipse of 5th May 770 B.C.; Is. 10.3 and Micah 3.6 are made to refer to that of the 11th Jan. 689 B.C. in the time of Hezekiah; and Joel, who is represented as living in the time of Manasseh, is made to indicate no fewer than three solar eclipses (21st Jan. 662, 27th June 661, and 15th April 657 B.C.; cp Joel 2.10 3.4 4.15). It is further urged that we should refer Ezek. 30.18 and 32.8 to the solar eclipses of 19th May 557 and 1st Nov. 556; Nah. 1.8 to that of 16th March 581; Jer. 4.23 28 to that on 21st Sept. 582 (in the time of Josiah); and Is. 8.22 to that on 5th March 702 B.C. (in the time of Ahaz); and, finally, that even the fight against Sisera can, according to Ju. 5.20, be with certainty fixed for 9th Aug. 1091 B.C.

By combining these 'results' with the numbers of the OT Mahler believes himself justified in producing the following chronological table for the time of the Monarchy:—

It is only a pity that the imposing edifice thus erected in the name of astronomical science rests on a foundation so unstable—an artificial phantom, dependent on a Rabbinical exegesis, itself a mere creation of fancy.

The OT itself having thus failed to give sufficient

¹ Mahler finds here a reference to the fall of Nineveh. He argues that the battle against the Lydians in which the day became night (cp Herod. 1.103)—a battle which preceded the fall of Nineveh—fell, not on 30th Sept. 610 B.C. but on 28th May 585 B.C. Again, the solar eclipse with the announcement of which Zephaniah (1.5) connects an allusion to the expedition undertaken by Phraortes against Nineveh at least twenty-five years before its final fall is (acc. to Mahler) one that happened on 30th July 607.

CHRONOLOGY

chronological data, we have to inquire whether the foreign nations, which so often come through the events of history into contact with Israel, can help us. In so doing we must consider in the first place the Egyptians. It is to Egypt that the narrative of the origin of the people of Israel points; thither escaped the remnant of the community of Gedaliah; and in the interval between these times, as also later, the fortunes of Palestine were often intertwined with those of Egypt.

The Egyptians themselves possessed no continuous era: for the quite unique mention, on a stèle from Tanis,

19. No fixed era. of the 400th year of the king Nubti (according to Steindorff probably none other than the god Set of Tanis), is too obscure and uncertain, and would not help us at all even were it more intelligible. Nor yet does the Sothis-period help us much. This was a period of 1461 years, at each recurrence of which the first days of the solar year and of the ordinary year of 365 days once again coincided for four years, or, what amounts to the same thing, the Dog-star, from whose rising the solar year was reckoned, again appeared on the 1st of Thoth. The period was never used for chronological purposes.¹ Nor have the monuments fulfilled the expectation, not unreasonable in itself, that by the help of inscriptions giving dates according to two methods it would be possible, by calculation, to reach a more exact chronology for Egyptian history. The most learned Egyptologists, indeed, can themselves determine Egyptian chronology only through combination with data from outside sources. The conquest of Egypt by Cambyses in the year 525 B.C. furnishes their cardinal point. From this event, the years of

20. Period of certainty. reign of the kings of the 26th dynasty may be fixed with certainty by the help of the data supplied by the monuments, Herodotus, and Manêtho. What lies before Psamtik I., the first pharaoh of this dynasty, however, is in the judgment of Egyptologists more or less uncertain, and therefore for other chronological determinations the records of that earlier time are either not to be used at all or to be used with the greatest caution.

Still, even this short period, from 664/3 (the accession of Psamtik I.) to 525 B.C., is a help to us by supplying points of reference. Through synchronisms of Egyptian and Judean history several events of the time are to a certain extent fixed. Thus Necho II. (middle of 610 B.C. to beginning of 594 B.C.) is admitted to be the king who fought the battle at Megiddo that cost Josiah his life. So mention is made in the OT of Hophra (Apries), who reigned 588-569 B.C., and was even down to 564 nominally joint ruler with Amasis (see EGYPT, § 69). Thus we get fixed points for the contemporaries of Necho II.—Josiah, Jehoahaz, and Jehoiaikim;—and for the contemporaries of Hophra.—Jeremiah, and the Jews in Egypt (Jer. 44:30)—although neither for the battle of Megiddo nor for that of Carchemish can the year be determined from Egyptian data. On the other hand, these Egyptian data are sufficient to prove that the astronomical edifice of Mahler is quite impossible.

For the time before Psamtik I. the rulers of the 25th dynasty may be fixed approximately. 21. 25th Dynasty. Tanutamon ruled alone only a short time, and therefore may fall out of account. The data for his three predecessors do not agree (cp EGYPT, § 66 f.).

Taharka reigned, according to the monuments, 26 years; according to Manêtho, 18 (var. 20).

Šabatako's reign, according to the monuments, was uncertain; according to Manêtho it was 14 (var. 12).

¹ The confirmation that Mahler (op. cit., p. 56 ff.) seeks for 1335 B.C. as the date of the Exodus in the statement that under Menephtah, whom he holds to be the pharaoh of the Exodus, was celebrated the beginning of a Sothic period, which may have happened in the year 1318 B.C., is certainly weak, since the pharaoh who according to Ex. 14 was drowned could not have reigned after that for 17 years. See Exodus.

CHRONOLOGY

Šabako reigned, according to the monuments, 12 years; according to Manêtho, 8 (var. 12).

If we assign to Šabatako Manêtho's number of years (fourteen) and take, as our basis for the rest, the numbers of the monuments, we get the following:—Taharka, 690-664 B.C., Šabatako, 704-690 B.C., and Šabako, 716-704 B.C. Still, according to the view of Steindorff, to whom we are indebted for these data, Taharka may have reigned even longer than twenty-six years, perhaps along with Šabatako. Since, however, Ed. Meyer gives Šabako 728-716, Šabatako circ. 704, and makes Taharka as early as 704 real master, although not till 689 official ruler, of Egypt (cp Gesch. Aeg. 343 ff.), all sure support is already gone. Besides, although according to Meyer (op. cit. 344) the identity of Šabako with the Assyrian Sab'i and the Hebrew שַׁבְיָה (So', or, more correctly, Save' or Seweh) in 2 K. 17:4 is indubitable, Steindorff has grave doubts as to the phonetic equivalence of these names, and finds no Egyptian datum for the battle of Altau. It is, therefore, very difficult to get from Egyptian chronology any certain light on two OT statements relating to Egypt—viz., that Sennacherib sent messengers to Hezekiah when he heard of the expedition of Taharka (2 K. 19:9; Is. 37:9), and that Hoshea of Israel had dealings with מֶן of Egypt, and was therefore bound and put into prison by Shalmaneser (2 K. 17:4).

For the chronology of the OT in still earlier times, there is, unfortunately, nothing at all to be gained from Egyptology. According to 1 K. 11:40

22. Earlier times. 14:25 (cp 2 Ch. 12:2), Shishak (Sheshonk) was a contemporary of Solomon, and in the fifth year of Rehoboam went up against Jerusalem. In spite, however, of the Egyptian monument at Karnak bearing the list of cities conquered by him, his date cannot be determined on Egyptological grounds (on biblical grounds it is usually given as about 930 B.C.). As to 'Zerah the Cushite' (2 Ch. 14:9 ff.), we need not expect to find any mention of him in Egyptian sources (ZERAH).

The clay tablets found at Tell el Amarna (see ISRAEL, § 6), indeed, make some important contributions to our knowledge of the relations of Palestine to Egypt; but for the chronology they afford nothing certain. We must get help from the chronology of Babylonia before we can, even approximately, determine the date of the correspondence. Then it seems probable that Amen-hotep III. and Amen-hotep IV. reigned in Egypt either about 1450 B.C. or about 1380 B.C., at which time, therefore, Palestine must have stood under the sceptre of Egypt: the contemporaries of Amen-hotep III.—Burnaburiaš I. and Kurigalzu I. of Babylon—are assigned by Winckler to 1493-1476 and 1475-1457 B.C. respectively, and the contemporary of Amen-hotep IV.—Burnaburiaš II.—to 1456-1422, whilst R. W. Rogers, on the other hand (Outlines of the History of Early Babylonia, 1895, p. 56), gives 1397-1373 as the probable date of Burnaburiaš II., and C. Niebuhr (Chronol. der Gesch. Isr., Aeg., Bab. u. Ass. von 2000-700 B.C. untersucht, 1896) accepts only one Burnaburiaš and places him and his contemporary Amen-hotep IV. in the beginning of the fourteenth century B.C. As in these tablet inscriptions the name of the Hebrews has not so far been certainly discovered, so, in the Egyptian monuments generally, we cannot find any reminiscence of a stay of Israel in Egypt or of their departure.¹ Theories about the pharaoh of the oppression and the pharaoh of the Exodus remain, therefore, in the highest degree uncertain. Neither Joseph nor Moses is to be found in Egyptian sources: supposed points of contact (a seven-years famine, and the narrative of Manêtho about Osarsiph-Moses in Josephus, c. Ap. 1:27:28; on this cp Ed. Meyer, Gesch. Aeg. 276 f.) have proved, on nearer examination, untenable.¹ Apart, therefore, from the dates of the rulers of the twenty-fifth and the twenty-sixth dynasties, there is very little to be gained for OT chronology from Egyptology. On Egyptian Chronology see also EGYPT, § 41.

Assyriology offers much more extensive help. It is much better supplied with chronological material, since it possesses, for a series of 228 years, inscriptions containing careful lists of Eponyms, lists, that is, giving the name of the officer after whom the year was called, and mentioning single important events falling within the year. These brief notes alone are quite enough to give the lists an extraordinary importance. Their value is further increased, however, by the fact that the office of Eponym had to be held in one of his first years, commonly the second full year of his reign, by each king. Hence the order of succession of the Assyrian kings and the length of their reign can be determined with ease, especially as names of kings are distinguished from those of other Eponyms by the addition of the royal title and of a line separating them from those that precede them (cp ASSYRIA, § 19 ff.). The monumental character, too, of these documents, exempting them, as it does, from the risk of alteration attaching to notes in books, gives assurance of their trustworthiness. Nor is the incompleteness of the list supposed by Oppert a fact. In regard to the order of succession no doubt is possible.

The establishment of this uninterrupted series of 228 years can be accomplished with absolute certainty (as we shall see below) by the help of an eclipse of the sun assigned by the list to the Eponym year of Pur-Sagali of Gozan.² In order to be able to determine the eclipse intended, however, and thus to fix the year astronomically, we have first to bring into consideration the so-called Canon of Ptolemy³—next to these Assyrian Eponym lists, perhaps the most important chronological monument of antiquity. This Canon is a list giving the names of the rulers of Babylon—Babylonian, Assyrian, and Persian—from Nabonassar to Alexander the Great (the Egyptian Ptolemies and the Romans are appended at the end), with the number of years each of them reigned, and the eclipses observed by the Babylonians and the Alexandrians—the years being reckoned according to the era of Nabonassar—i.e., from that prince's accession. The trustworthiness of this document is proved, once for all, by the astronomical observations it records,⁴ from which we learn that the beginning of the era of Nabonassar falls in the year 747 B.C.⁵

The Canon can be combined with the Assyrian Eponym lists, and the establishment of the latter with certainty effected in the following way. On the one hand, the Ptolemaic Canon assigns to the year 39 of the era of Nabonassar, 709 B.C., the accession of Arkeanos (= Sargina on the fragment of the Babylonian list of kings); and, on the other hand, Assyrian clay tablets identify this year, the first of the rule of Šarrukin (i.e., Sargon or Arkeanos) over Babylon with the

² KB, I 210 f.

⁵ More exactly (since the dates are reduced to the common Egyptian year) on the first of Thoth (= 26th Feb.), not (as according to Babylonian official usage might have been expected) on the 1st of Nisan (= 21st March) (cp Hommel, GBA, 488, and see below § 26).

CHRONOLOGY

Eponym year of Mannu-ki-Ašur-li' (Schr. *KAT*², 491) the thirteenth of Sargon's rule in Assyria.¹ Hence we may identify this Eponym year of Mannu-ki-Ašur-li' (the thirteenth year of Sargon's reign in Assyria) likewise with the year 709 B.C.; and, as the series is uninterrupted, all its dates become known. We can, then, obtain astronomical confirmation of the correctness of this combination (and so also of the trustworthiness of the Ptolemaic Canon and the Assyrian Eponym lists) in the way hinted at already. For, if the Eponym year of Mannu-ki-Ašur-li' is the year 709 B.C., the Eponym year of Pur-Sagali, to which, as we saw above, there is assigned a solar eclipse, must be the year 763 B.C.; and astronomers have computed that on the 15th June of that year a solar eclipse occurred that would be almost total for Nineveh and its neighbourhood. Thus the Assyrian Eponym list may safely be used for chronological purposes.

On the ground of the statements of this list, then, we have, for the years 893-666 B.C., fixed points not to be called in question by which to date the events of this period in Israel; for the Assyrian inscriptions not only supply direct information concerning certain events in Israel's own history, but also in other cases fix the date of contemporaneous events which the narrative of the OT presupposes. Then the Ptolemaic Canon, which from 747 B.C. onwards accompanies the Assyrian Eponym list, continues when the Eponym list stops (in 666 B.C.), and conducts us with certainty down to Roman times.

We are thus enabled to determine beyond all doubt the background of the history of Israel and Judah from 893 downwards, and obtain down to Alexander the Great the following valuable dates:—

With regard to this summary it is to be noted that (as is a matter of course in any rational dating by years of reign—it is certainly the case in the Ptolemaic Canon) the year considered as the first of any king is the earliest year at the beginning of which he was already really reigning; in the preceding year he had begun to reign on his predecessor's death. Short reigns, accordingly, which did not reach the beginning of the new year, had to remain unnoticed, as that of Laborosoarchad (Lābasi-Marduk) in the year 556, which, according to Berosus, lasted only nine months. It is further to be noted that the beginning of the year did not fall in the two lists on the same day. The Eponym lists make the year begin on the first of Nisan, the 21st of March, while the Ptolemaic Canon follows the reckoning of the ordinary Egyptian year of 365 days, the beginning of which, as compared with our mode of reckoning, falls one day earlier every four years. Thus, if in the year 747, as was indeed already the case in 748, the beginning of the year fell on the 26th of February, the year 744 would begin on the 25th. For a period of a hundred years this difference would amount to twenty-five days. Thus the beginning of the year 647 B.C. would fall on the 1st of February; and so on. Therefore for the period 747-323 B.C. the beginning of the year would always fall somewhat near the beginning of ours.

If, then, the chronological data of the OT were trustworthy, as soon as one cardinal point where the two series

27. Care necessary.

—that of the OT and that just obtained —came into contact could be established with certainty, the whole chronology of the OT would be at once determined, and the insertion of the history of Israel into the firm network of this general background would become possible. In the uncertainty, however, in which the chronological data of the OT are involved, this simple method can lead to no satisfactory result. All points of coincidence must be separately attended to; and, although we may start out from a fixed point in drawing our line, we must immediately see to it that we keep the next point of contact in view. Unfortunately, in going backwards from the earliest ascertainable date to a remoter antiquity such a check is not available.

The earliest date available, as being certain beyond doubt, for an attempt to set the chronology of the OT on a firm basis is the year 854 B.C., in which Ahab king of Israel was one of the confederates defeated by Shalmaneser II. (859-825) at Karkar (Schr. KGF, 356-371 and KAT⁽²⁾, 193-200). Since, however, the OT contains no reference to the event, it is of no use for the purpose of bringing the history of Israel into connection with general history till we take into consideration also the next certain date, 842 B.C., in which year presents were offered to the same Assyrian king, Shalmaneser II., by Jehu (KAT⁽²⁾, 208-211). Within these thirteen years (854-842) must fall the death of Ahab, the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, and the accession of Jehu. Of this period the most that need be assigned to Jehu is the last year, which may have been at the same time also the year of Jehoram's death; for it may be regarded as quite probable that it would be immediately after his accession that Jehu would send presents to the Assyrian king to gain his recognition and favour. On the other hand, the traditional values of the reigns require for Ahaziah two years (1 K. 22:52), and for Jehoram alone twelve years (2 K. 3:1): so there appears to be no time left for Ahab after 854. The death of Ahab, however, cannot be assigned to so early a date as 854.¹ The reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram, therefore, must be curtailed by more than one year. The course of events from 854 to the death of Ahab in the struggle with the Syrians has, accordingly, been ranged in different ways.

Wellhausen (JG⁽²⁾, 71) supposes that, in consequence of the universal defeat in 854, Ahab abandoned the relation of vassalage to Aram that had lasted till then, and thus provoked a Syrian attack on Israel. Then, by the victory at Aphek in the second year and the capture of Benhadad, he compelled the Syrians to conclude peace and to promise to deliver up the Gileadite cities they had won from Israel (1 K. 20). As the ¹ Victor Floigl (GA, 1882, pp. 94-96), indeed, supposes that Ahab fell before Karkar (z.z., in 854), and not before Ramoth-Gilead; but to accomplish this he has to treat the narratives of the Syrian wars (1 K. 20:1-34:38-43 22:1-37) as quite untrustworthy.

CHRONOLOGY

Syrians did not keep their promise, he undertook in the third year of the peace the unfortunate expedition for the conquest of Ramoth-gilead, in which he met his death (1 K. 22). Thus the death of Ahab would fall about the year 851. Schrader, on the other hand, sees in Ahab's taking part in the battle of Karkar a consequence of the conclusion of peace with Aram that followed the battle of Aphek, and finds it thus possible to assign Ahab's death to so early a date as 853. Even if we inclined to follow the representation of Schrader (Wellhausen's is much more attractive), the Assyrian notice of the battle of Karkar in 854 establishes at least one point, that the beginning of Jehu's reign cannot be earlier than 842, and the traditional numbers must be curtailed. On the question just discussed see also AHAB.

The year 842 B.C. may, therefore, be assigned as that of the accession of Jehu. In the same year also perished 29. Approximate earlier dates.

Jehoram, king of Israel, and Ahaziah, king of Judah, whilst Athaliah seized the reins of government in Jerusalem.

If from this date, equally important for both kingdoms, we try to go back, we can determine with approximate certainty the year of the division of the monarchy. The years of reign of the Israelitish kings down to the death of Jehoram make up the sum of ninety-eight, and those of the kings of Judah down to the death of Ahaziah the sum of ninety-five; whilst the synchronisms of the Books of Kings allow only eighty-eight years. Since the reigns of Ahaziah and Jehoram of Israel must be curtailed (§ 28), if we assume ninety years as the interval that had elapsed since the partition of the kingdoms this will be too high rather than too low an estimate. The death of Solomon may, accordingly, be assigned to ± 930 B.C. Wellhausen (JG⁽²⁾, 9 f.), indeed, raises an objection against this, on the ground of a statement in the inscription of Mesha; but the expression in the doubtful passage is too awkward and obscure to lead us, on its account, to push back the death of Solomon to 950 B.C., or even farther.¹

In this connection it is not unimportant that the statements of Menander of Ephesus in regard to the assignment of 930 B.C. as the approximate date of the death of Solomon. According to the careful discussion that Franz Rühl has devoted to this statement (see below, § 85 end), preserved to us in three forms (first, in Josephus, c. Ap. 18; second, in the Chron. of Euseb., and third, in Theophilus ad Autol. iii. 100 22), we may, assuming v. Gutschmid's date of 814 B.C. for the foundation of Carthage, fix on 966-936 as the period of reign of Eīromos or Hiram, and on 878-866 B.C. as that of Eīthbālos or Ethbā'al. Now, Ahab was son-in-law of Ethbā'al (1 K. 16:13), and since Ethbā'al at his accession in the year 878 B.C. was thirty-six years old, he could quite well have had a marriageable daughter a few years later, when Ahab, who according to 1 K. 16:29 reigned twenty-two years (about 872-851 B.C.), ascended the throne. Moreover, Menander mentions a one-year famine under Eīthbālos, which even Josephus (Ant. viii. 18 2) identifies with the three-year famine that, according to 1 K. 17, fell in the beginning of the reign of Ahab. Further, Eīromos (966-936) may be identified with Hiram, the friend of Solomon (cp 1 K. 5:18 24 f. 32 9 10 ff.), and, whether we adopt the opinion that Hiram, the contemporary of David (2 S. 5:11), was the same person as this friend of Solomon's, or suppose that the name of the better-known contemporary of Solomon has simply been transferred to the Tyrian king who had relations with David, the year ± 930 B.C. for the death of Solomon, agrees excellently with this Phœnician synchronism.

¹ We. translates lines 7-9 thus:—'Omri conquered the whole land of Medaba, and Israel dwelt there during his days and half the days of his son, forty years, and Kamos recovered it in my days.' He thus arrives at an estimate of at least sixty years for Omri's and Ahab's combined reigns, since only by adding the half of Ahab's reign to the part of Omri's reign during which Moab was tributary, is the total of forty years attained. It is to be noted, however, that 'Israel,' which We. (so also Smend and Socin, Die Inschr. des K. Mesa von Moab, 1886, p. 13) supplies as the subject to 'dwelt' (נָשָׁב), is lacking in the inscription, and that even with this insertion the construction is not beyond criticism. Is it, in the undoubted awkwardness of the passage, not possible to translate thus—'Omri conquered the whole land of Medaba, and held it in possession as long as he reigned, and during the half of the years of my reign his son, in all forty years. But yet in my reign Chemosh recovered it.' In that case there is no ground for ascribing so many as sixty years to the reigns of Omri and Ahab. Nay, the possibility is not excluded, that 2 K. 3:5 is right in making the revolt of Moab follow the death of Ahab, and then the futile expedition of Jehoram of Israel and Jehoshaphat of Judah against Moab could be taken as marking the end of the forty years.

If it has been difficult to attain sure ground in the early period of the divided monarchy, it is even less possible to determine anything with certainty about the period preceding Solomon's death. If the data of the OT concerning the reigns of Solomon and David (40 years each, 1 K. 2:11 11⁴²) have any value, David must have attained to power about the year 1000 B.C. Concerning Saul, even 1 S. 13:1 gives us no real information, and regarding the premonarchic period the most that can be said is that, according to the discoveries at Tell-el-Amarna the Hebrews were, about the middle of the fifteenth century B.C., not yet settled in Canaan.¹

For the time, therefore, from the partition of the kingdom down to the year 842 B.C., we must be content with the following estimate:—

32. Schism to Jehu.

TABLE IV.—ESTIMATE OF REIGNS: DEATH OF SOLOMON TO ACCESSION OF JEHU.

KINGS OF ISRAEL.		KINGS OF JUDAH.
930 (?)–854	Jeroboam of Israel and his contemporaries	Rehoboam and Abijah in Judah.

842	Death of Jehoram of Israel	Death of Ahaziah of Judah.

From 842 B.C. onwards, there is no fixed point till we come to the eighth century. Then we have one in the eighth year of the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III. (745–727)—i.e., 738 B.C. In that year, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, this king of Assyria received the tribute of Menahem of Israel. When the OT tells of this (2 K. 15:19 ff.) it calls the Assyrian king Pul: although elsewhere (2 K. 15:29 16:10) it uses the other name, Tiglath-pileser. Of the identity of the two names, however, there can be no doubt (KAT⁽²⁾ 223 ff., COT, 1:219), and we are not to think of the reference being to a Babylonian king, or an Assyrian rival king, or to assume that Tiglath-pileser himself, at an earlier period, twenty years or more before he became king over Assyria, while still bearing the name of Pul, made an expedition against the land of Israel (so Klo. Sam. 11. Kö. [87] p. 496). If we add that Ahaz of Judah procured for himself through a payment of tribute the help of Tiglath-pileser against the invading kings, Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus; that, accordingly, the Assyrian king took the field against Philistia and Damascus in 734 and 733; and that in 732, after the conquest of Damascus, Ahaz also appeared in Damascus to do homage to Tiglath-pileser, there remains to be mentioned only the equally certain date of the beginning of the year 721 B.C. (Hommel, GBA 676) for the conquest of Samaria, to complete the list of assured dates between 842 and 721.

The attempt to arrange the kings of North Israel during this period is hampered by fewer difficulties in the interval 842–738 than are to be found in that between 738 and 721. If we assume that Menahem died soon after paying tribute, we shall still have in the 113 years reckoned by the traditionary account from the accession of Jehu to the death of Menahem a slight excess, since for the period 842–738 we need only 104 years. Still, we can here give an approximate date for the individual reigns. The latest results of Kautzsch (in substantial agreement with Brandes, Kamphausen, and Riehm) are the following: 1—Jehu 841–815, Jehoahaz 814–798, Jehoash 797–783, Jeroboam II. 782–743 (or before 745), Zechariah and Shallum perhaps also in 743, Menahem 742–737 (or \pm 745 to after 738). For the last period, on the other hand, from the death of Menahem to the conquest of Samaria, the traditional reckoning gives thirty-one years, whilst from 737 to 721 we have hardly sixteen. The necessary shortening of the reigns is accomplished by Kautzsch in this way: Pekahiah 736, Pekah 735–730, Hoshea 729–721. Wellhausen has abandoned his former theory that Pekahiah and Pekah are identical, and makes the latter begin to reign in \pm 735. To Hoshea, the last king of Israel, he assigns an actual reign of at least ten years, although he assumes that according to 2 K. 17:4 f. he came under the power of Assyria before the fall of Samaria.

For the Judean line of kings the starting-point is likewise the year 842 B.C., in which Ahaziah of Judah met his death at the hand of Jehu, and 35. Judah 842–734.

Athaliah assumed the direction of the government. On the other hand, we do not find, for the next hundred years, a single event independently determined with perfect exactness by years of the reigning king of Judah. We must come down as far as 734 B.C. before we attain certainty. We know that at that time Ahaz had already come to power, and we can only suppose (according to 2 K. 15:37 f.) that he had not long before this succeeded his father, during whose lifetime Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus were already preparing for war. The presents of King Ahaz to Tiglath-pileser in the year 734 B.C. delivered Judah from the danger that threatened it, and in 732 B.C. in the conquered Damascus the same king did homage to the victorious Assyrian, and offered him his thanks (cp 2 K. 16:7 ff. and Schrader, KAT⁽²⁾ 257 ff.). It is still difficult, however, to allot the intervening time to the several kings of Judah; for the traditional values for the reigns require no less than 143 years from the first year of Athaliah to the death of Jotham, whilst between 842 B.C. and 734 B.C. there are only 108 years at our disposal. It is, therefore, necessary to reduce several of the items by a considerable amount, and it is not to be wondered at that different methods of adjustment have been employed. The synchronism of events between the history of Israel and that of Judah is too inadequate to secure unanimity, and the mention (not quite certain) of Azariah of Judah in Assyrian inscriptions for the years 742–740 (cp Schr. KAT⁽²⁾, 217 ff.) does not make up the lack. On one point, however, there is agreement: that it is in the cases of Amaziah, Azariah (Uzziah), and Jotham that the deductions are to be made.

The years 841–836 B.C. for Athaliah are rendered tolerably certain by the data concerning Jehoash, the infant son of Ahaziah (2 K. 11:1 ff. 4 ff.). Then we need have no misgivings about giving Jehoash, who was raised to the throne at so young an age, about forty years. If we take these years fully, we obtain for the reign of Jehoash 835-796 B.C. The date of his death may, indeed, be pushed still farther back; but in any case his time as determined by these data cannot be far wrong, for he must have been a contemporary of Jehoahaz the king of Israel (814-798), and, according to 2 K. 12:18 ff., also of Hazael of Aram (acc. to Winckler 844-about 804 [?]). From 795 to 734 there are left only 61 years, and in this interval room must be found for Amaziah with twenty-nine years, Azariah with fifty-two, and Jotham with sixteen—no less than ninety-seven years. Even if we allow the whole sixteen years of Jotham, who, according to 2 K. 15:5, conducted the government during the last illness of his father, to be merged in the fifty-two years of Azariah, we do not escape the necessity of seeking other ways of shortening the interval. Amaziah's reign is estimated too high at twenty-nine years. The only thing that is certain about him is that he was a contemporary of Jehoash of Israel (797-783; cp 2 K. 14:8 ff.). It is pure hypothesis to assign him nine years (We.), or nineteen years (Kamph. and Kau.), instead of twenty-nine. The smaller number has the greater probability, since the defeat that he brought on himself by his wanton challenge of Jehoash of Israel best explains the conspiracy against him (2 K. 14:19 ff.), and he would therefore hardly survive his conqueror, but much more probably meet his death by assassination at Lachish not long after 790 B.C. (cp also St. GVI, 1559). From the death of Amaziah to 734 reigned Azariah and Jotham. To discover the boundary between the two, we must bear in mind the Assyrian inscriptions already mentioned, which apparently represent Azariah as still reigning in the years 742-740, and must keep in view that Isaiah, who cannot be thought of as an old man when Sennacherib marched against Jerusalem in the year 701, received his prophetic call in the year of the death of Uzziah (Isa. 6:1). Accordingly, we cannot be far wrong in assigning the death of Azariah and the accession of Jotham as sole ruler to 740 B.C. More than this cannot be made out with the help of the materials at our disposal up to the present time.

If now the year of the conquest of Samaria (721 B.C.) were fixed with certainty according to the year of the king then reigning in Judah, this would appear the next resting-point after 734 B.C.

The data of the OT do not agree, however, and none of them is to be relied upon. This is true even of the datum in 2 K. 18:13, lately much favoured by critics, that Sennacherib's expedition against Palestine in the year 701 B.C. was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah (so We. JDT [75] p. 635 ff.; Kamph. Die Chronol. der Hebr. Könige [83] p. 28; Guthe, Das Zukunftsbild des Jes. [85] p. 37, and St. GVI, 1606 f.). In order to maintain the datum, it is not enough to say, 'The people of Judah are more likely to have preserved the year of Hezekiah in which their whole land was laid waste and their capital, Jerusalem, escaped destruction only through enduring the direst distress, than to have preserved the year of Hezekiah in which Samaria fell.' The unusual (cp 2 K. 18:19) prefixing of the numeral before מֵשֶׁנָּה (cp Duhm, Jesaja, 235) of itself indicates a later origin, and this is confirmed by what we have already found as to these chronological data not belonging to the original narrative. The number fourteen is based, not upon historical facts, but upon an exegetical inference from Is. 38:5, and a consideration of the twenty-nine years traditionally assigned to Hezekiah, and must therefore rank simply with the scribe's note Am. 1:1: 'two years before the earthquake.'¹

Even when we come to the seventh century, the expectation that at least the death of Josiah in the battle of Megiddo would admit of being dated with complete accuracy by material from inscriptions is not fulfilled. From Egyptian chronology, which does not mention the date of the battle, we gather only that it must have been after 610 B.C., since the conqueror, Necho II., did not begin to reign till that year. There is, therefore, nothing left but to take as our fixed point the conquest of Jerusalem in the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar—i.e., 586 B.C. (2 K. 25:8). For the intervening time we have to take into consideration, besides the death of Josiah, the data supplied by Assyriology, which place Sennacherib's expedition against Hezekiah in 701 B.C. and imply Manasseh's being king of Judah in the years 681-667 (cp Schr. *KAT*², p. 466).

¹ This is forcibly urged by Kau. (cp. Kamph. op. cit. 94) and has received the assent of Duhm (L.c.) and Cheyne (Intr. Is. 218).

For the whole time from the death of Jotham to the conquest of Jerusalem, tradition requires 155 years of reign, whilst from 734 B.C., when Ahaz was already seated on the throne of Jerusalem—which year, if not that of his accession, must have been at least the first of his reign—to 586 B.C., we have only 148, or, since we may reckon also the year 734 B.C., 149 years. The smallness of the difference of seven years, however, shows that we have now to do with a better tradition. Where the mistake lies we cannot tell beforehand. All we can say is that it is not to be sought between the death of Josiah and the fall of Jerusalem, since for this interval twenty-two years are required by tradition, and this agrees with our datum that Josiah must have died shortly after 610 B.C.

Let us see whether another cardinal point can be found. In 701 Hezekiah was reigning in Jerusalem. When it was that he came to the throne, whether before or after the fall of Samaria (721 B.C.), is the question. In Is. 14:28 we have an oracle against Philistia, dated from the year of the death of king Ahaz,—a chronological note which, like Is. 6:1, may have importance, if the oracle really belongs to Isaiah. Winckler and Cheyne [but cp Isaiah, SBOT, Addenda] regard it as possible that the oracle may refer to agitation in Syria and Palestine, in which the Philistines shared, on the accession of Sargon (721 B.C.), when Hanun, king of Gaza, induced them to rebel, in reliance on the help of Sib'e, one of the Egyptian petty kings (cp above on Šabaka, Sab'i, So', Seweh, § 21). On this theory the death of Ahaz would have to be set down about the year 720 B.C. As, however, the authenticity of the oracle is not certain,—in fact hardly probable (cp Duhm, who even conjectures that originally there may have stood, instead of Ahaz, the name of the second last Persian king, Arses [= Arogos])—it is not safe to take it as fixing the death-year of Ahaz. Of greater value is the section relating to the embassy of Merodach-Baladan of Babylon to Hezekiah (2 K. 20=Is. 39). Merodach-Baladan was king of Babylon from 721 to 710. When, later, he attempted to recover his position, he held Babylon for so short a time that an embassy to the west would be impossible. Thus, Merodach-Baladan must have sought relations with Hezekiah between 721 and 709. The beginning of the reign of Merodach-Baladan, when in the year 721 or 720 he obtained possession of Babylon and held it against Sargon, commends itself as the point of time most suitable. After the battle of Dūr-ilu, which both parties regarded as a victory for themselves, it must have seemed natural to hope that the overthrow of the Assyrian kingdom would be possible, if the west joined in the attack. Moreover, Sargon once describes himself (Nimrūd inscr., 18) as 'the subduer of Judah,'¹ which seems to mean that, on the suppression of the revolt in Philistia, Hezekiah resumed the payment of the tribute that had been imposed. In view of this, Winckler seems to be justified in placing the appearance of the embassy of Merodach-Baladan before Hezekiah in the year 720 or 719. Approximately, then, the year 721 may be regarded as assured for the year of the death of Ahaz.

The first year of Hezekiah's reign is thus 720 B.C. rather than 728 (Kau.), or 714 (We. and others). The discrepancy of four years, which is all that now remains between the sum of the years of reign from the death of Ahaz to the conquest of Jerusalem, and the interval 720-586 B.C.—i.e., between 139 years of reign and 135 actual years—cannot be removed otherwise than by shortening the reign of one or more of the kings. The account of the closing portion of the line of kings has already been found to merit our confidence. The shortening must therefore be undertaken somewhere near the beginning of the line of kings from Hezekiah to Josiah. The most obvious course is to reduce the long reign of Manasseh from fifty-five years to fifty-one (We., indeed, assigns him only forty-five). This, however, may seem arbitrary, and it will be simpler as well as less violent to divide the shortening among all the four reigns. If, that is to say, in the case of the years of reign of the kings from Hezekiah to Josiah, tradition included (according to popular practice) the year of accession and the year of death, we may reduce the numbers for Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah by one each, and assign them twenty-eight, fifty-four, one, and thirty respectively. Thus we get the following series:—Hezekiah 720-693 (28 years), Manasseh 692-639 (54 years), Amon 638 (1 year), Josiah 637-608 (30 years), Jehoahaz 608 ($\frac{1}{2}$ year), Jehoiakim 607-597 (11 years), Jehoiachin 597 ($\frac{1}{2}$ year), and Zedekiah 596-586 (11 years). The control over the date of the death of Josiah from Egyptian history which is to a certain extent possible turns out to be not unfavourable to our results, since Pharaoh Necho II. began to reign in 610 B.C., and, as early as the end of 606, or the beginning of 605, encountered the crown prince Nebuchadrezzar at Carchemish (cp. on the date of this battle which, in Jer. 46², is inaccurately assigned to the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Winckler, AT Untersuch. 81). Hence the year 608 B.C. for the battle of Megiddo possesses the greatest probability. That, among the numerous dates for the last decades of the kingdom of Judah which the OT furnishes, little inaccuracies, such as that in the passage (Jer. 46²) just cited, appear, is intelligible on the ground (apart from others, as, e.g., in the case of Ezek. 33²¹) of their being the result of later calculation. At all events, these variations are not to be accounted for, with Hommel (GBA 755), by the supposition that the Jews reckoned the years of Nebuchadrezzar, as well as those of their own kings, from the day on which they ascended the throne to the corresponding day in the following year. The Jews, in adopting the exact Babylonian chronological system, and applying it to their own past history, did not mutilate it and render it futile.

Beyond the points already referred to (§ 13*f.*), the chronology of the times after the conquest of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. presents no difficulties worth mentioning. The Canon of Ptolemy supplies an assured framework into which the data that have been preserved can be fitted without trouble.

The tabular survey on the preceding page gathers together the dates we have established. At the end is appended a continuation indicating the most important dates down to the last century B.C. K. M.

38. Summary of Results.

B. NEW TESTAMENT.

The chronology of the New Testament is of great (subsidiary) importance for the study of the origins of Christianity. From the order of the events in the primitive period it will be possible to draw conclusions with regard to the influence of one event upon another; the rapidity of the historical development will enable us to measure the power of the original impulse; and only when the events have received their place in contemporary history can they be fully understood.

39. NT chronology: importance.

CHRONOLOGY

Unfortunately, the task is attended with serious difficulty, the causes of which need to be briefly described.

40. Difficulty. (1) The first Christians themselves had no interest in chronology, whether with reference to events concerning them as Christians, or with reference to events of secular history. This was due not only to their separation from the world and their limited horizon, but also, and still more, to their sense of superiority to the world (Phil. 3²⁰), which seemed to them already in process of dissolution (1 Cor. 7³¹), and to their feeling that they had already begun to live in eternity. (2) The historical traditions of the Christians were formed wholly with the purpose of promoting Christian piety, and were therefore restricted to a small number of events, the choice of which was often, as it were, accidental, and the arrangement according to subject rather than to time. Our chronological interest has, accordingly, to be satisfied with inferences and combinations which often remain, after all, very problematical; and the gaps in the traditions prevent us from constructing anywhere a long chronological sequence. (3) Of at least a part of the traditions the historical trustworthiness is subject to such grave doubt that we can venture to use them only with great reserve, if at all. (4) In the NT, apart from some vague notices in the Fourth Gospel, the only writer who professedly gives chronological data is the author of the Third Gospel and Acts. He gives no account, however, of the means by which he obtained these data. We are, therefore, unable to check his statements, and can treat them only as hypotheses. As far as we know, the old Catholic fathers—Irenæus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, Julius Africanus, and Hippolytus—were the first to make chronological calculations. Whether they based them on any independent tradition or limited themselves to inferences from our Gospels is uncertain; the latter is the more probable view. Their data can receive only occasional mention here.¹ (5) It has not yet been found possible to give exact dates to certain of those events of profane history which come into question. (6) Further difficulty is caused by the complicated nature of the ancient calendar, and by the different usages in reckoning time and in beginning the year. Side by side with the various eras we have various methods of reckoning by the years of reigning monarchs.²

In the following article the years are designated by the numbers of our current Dionysian era, on the origin of which see Ideler (Handb. 2365 ff.). By this reckoning the year 1 B.C. coincides with the year 753 A.U.C., and the year 1 A.D. with the year 754 A.U.C. The years are treated as beginning on 1st Jan., as was the case according to the Varronian reckoning in the period under consideration.

² An excellent guide through this labyrinth is Ideler's Handb. abridged and in part improved in his Lehrb. (see below, § 85). The most important tables (of the sun and moon, and of eras) are brought together from astronomical works by Günzsch, Hilfsmittel d. rechnend. Chronol. 1853. See further Boucher, Hémérologie, 1868; E. Müller in Pauly's Realencyc. d. class. Alt. s.v. Ära; Matzat, Röm. Chronol. two vols. 1883-84. Special service to NT Chronology has also been rendered by Clinton, Fasti Hellenici, 1830, 2 ed. 1851; Fasti Romani, 1845-50; and by J. Klein, Fasti Consulares, Leipzig, 1881. Further bibliographical notices, and many original contributions to the subject, are to be found in Schürer, GVV, i. (1890), where, in an appendix, is given a table (taken from Clinton) of parallel years by Olympiads, and by the Seleucid, Varronian, and Dionysian eras. The third appendix discusses the months of the Jewish Calendar, and on p. 630 f. a bibliography of the very large literature of that subject is to be found.—Important for the chronology of the NT are also Wieseler, Chronol. Syn. der vier Evangelien, 1843; Chronol. d. ap. Zeitalters, 1848; and art. Our investigation will treat the problems of NT chronology in the following order: the chronology of the life of Jesus (§§ 43–63), that of the life of Paul (§§ 64–80), that of the churches in Palestine (§ 81 f.), other dates (§ 83 f.). The first and second of these divisions are wholly separate from each other.

I. CHRONOLOGY OF THE LIFE OF JESUS.—The questions here relate to the year of Jesus' birth³ (§ 57 f.), the year of his public appearance (§ 47 f.), his age at his entrance upon his ministry (§ 43), the duration of his ministry (§ 44 f.), and the year of his death (§ 50 f.).

1. The Age of Jesus at his Baptism.—It is not surprising that tradition is meagre. In itself, as a mere tale of years, the matter had no interest for the early Christians. That had lived quietly at Nazareth? We have to consider only two passages. (1) Jn. 8 57. If the foolish question, 'Thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?' were authentic, it would only give a superior limit, plainly put as high as possible on the ground of the general impression from Jesus's appearance. From this no inference as to any definite number could be drawn, for among the Jews a man began to be elderly at fifty years, and the remark would merely have meant, 'You are still one of the younger men.' If the question is not authentic, it either testifies to the impression made by the account of Jesus in the tradition, that he was in the best years of life (cp Nu. 4 39 8 24 f.), or else the half-century, as an age which he had not yet attained, is intended to form an ironical contrast to the many centuries from Abraham to the then present time. In the ancient church, Irenæus (ii. 22 5) is the only writer to make use of this passage for chronology; he remarks that the presbyters in Asia Minor had on the ground of it ascribed to Jesus an age of forty to fifty years.

(2) Lk. 3 23. The text is here not quite certain, and the sense of the most probable reading is obscure. (What does ἀρρόμενος mean? In the Sin. Syr. it is omitted from the translation.) In any case, the presence of ὅτι ('about') forbids us to use the number as if it were exact. It merely tells us that Jesus stood in the beginning of adult manhood, and leaves undecided the question whether he had just entered on his thirtieth year or was already over thirty.

Moreover, whether the number comes from actual historical recollection at all is made uncertain by the fact that, according to Nu. 4 39, from thirty to fifty was the canonical age for certain ritual acts. It is significant that these two gospels, from Asia Minor, in so many points similar, give for the age of Jesus in these two passages the two limits of this canonical term of years.

2. The Length of the Public Ministry of Jesus.—The evidence here points on the whole to one year. The 'three years' in the parable of the fig-tree

44. Public Ministry. (Lk. 13 7) are either arbitrarily chosen to designate a short period or are to be connected with the fact that the fig-tree commonly bears fruit in three years (for the opposite view, see Wieseler, Synopse, 202 f.). The 'three days' of Lk. 13 32 express by a proverbial number both brief time and fixed limit (for the opposite view, Weizsäcker, Untersuchungen, 311). From Mark and Matthew we get no light, because of the arrangement of the material by subjects. The plucking of the ears in Mk. 2 23 may indicate the time when the grain was ripe; but that must have been between the middle of April and the middle of June, before which time the harvest in Galilee is not ended. Thus, if the incident was in the early months of Jesus' ministry, it does not imply a duration of more than one year. One year seems to have been the idea of the third evangelist, who, like all the writers of the second century except Irenæus, and like many Fathers of the third century, may very well have understood literally the quotation from Is. 61 1 f. which he puts (Lk. 4 19) into the mouth of Jesus.

In any case, a place can be found without difficulty within the limits of one year for the entire contents of the Synoptical gospels, while to fill out several years the material is rather meagre. The feeling, shared (for instance) by Beyschlag (Leben Jesu, 1 133), that it is a 'violent and unnatural process' to crowd the whole development into the space of one year, is balanced by the feeling of the men of the second and third centuries. Even repeated visits to Jerusalem, if the Synoptical gospels really imply them, are, in view of the nearness of Galilee to Jerusalem and of the many feasts (cp the Gospel of John), easily conceivable within one year. The early Christian Fathers were not disturbed in their assumption of a single year by the Fourth Gospel with its journeys to the feasts.

In the Fourth Gospel, apart from 6 4, if we accept the most common interpretation of ἐορτή (Jn. 5:1) as meaning Pentecost, the feasts group themselves into the course of a single year: 2:13 Passover; 5:1 Pentecost; 7:2 Tabernacles;

45. Fourth Gospel.

10:22 Dedication; 11:55 Passover. Irenaeus alone (ii. 22:3) finds three passovers mentioned in the public life of Jesus; and, since he takes the second not from 6:4 but from 5:1, he, as well as Origen (on Jn. 4:35 tom. 13:39), must have had at 6:4 a different text from any known to us. The Alogi, also, according to Epiphanius (Hær. 51:22), found mentioned in Jn. only a passover at the beginning and one at the end of the ministry. Positive ground for assuming the later interpolation of 6:4 (which could well have been suggested by the substance of the following conversation) may be found in the designation of the feast there, which is different from that in 2:13 and 11:55, a designation combining (so to speak) 5:1 and 7:2. So also the introductory formula ἦν δὲ ἑγγύς ('was at hand') is suitable only in 2:13 7:2 11:55, where a journey to the feast, which does not here come in question, is to be mentioned.

Moreover, the meagreness of the narrative in Jn. is much more comprehensible if the writer thought of the whole ministry as included between two passovers. He can hardly have regarded the narrative in chaps. 3-5, and again that in chaps. 7-11, as sufficient to fill out in each case a whole year. Otherwise, if the saying with reference to the harvest (Jn. 4:35) is to be regarded as anything more than a proverbial phrase (used for the purpose of the figure which Jesus is employing) there would be a period of nine months for which nothing would be told but the conversation with Nicodemus and the baptizing work of the disciples, and a stay of six months in Galilee for which we should have nothing but chap. 6. If, on the other hand, only one year elapsed from the purification of the temple to the destruction of the 'temple of his body,' we should have: 2:13-5:1, only fifty days; 5:1-7:2, perhaps 127 days; 7:2-10:22, perhaps fifty-eight days; 10:22-12:1, perhaps 119 days. In reality, however, even this year will have to be shortened somewhat at the beginning; for the purification of the temple, which the Synoptists likewise connect with a passover (but with the last one), cannot have happened twice, and, while it is incomprehensible at the beginning, it cannot be spared at the end of the ministry. Whether, then, the baptism of Jesus was before a passover, or whether the journey to John in the wilderness may have followed a journey to the passover in Jerusalem, it is wholly impossible to decide. In the latter case the complete absence from the narrative of the baptism of all recollection of such a connection would be singular; in the former it would be strange that Jesus stayed away from the passover in Jerusalem. On the other hand, since the forty days of the temptation are surely a round number drawn from OT analogies, they may safely be somewhat reduced; and the walk with the disciples through the ripe corn-fields in Galilee on the sabbath is then chronologically quite possible, even if the baptism was not until immediately after the passover.

46. One year. nothing but chap. 6. If, on the other hand, only one year elapsed from the purification of the temple to the destruction of the 'temple of his body,' we should have: 2:13-5:1, only fifty days; 5:1-7:2, perhaps 127 days; 7:2-10:22, perhaps fifty-eight days; 10:22-12:1, perhaps 119 days. 3. The Year of the Public Appearance of Jesus.—(1) In Lk. 3:1 f. we have, as the last of Lk.'s several chronological notes (1:5 26 2:1 f.), a notice of the date of the public appearance of the Baptist. This notice is clearly the product of careful investigation, and it is extremely unlikely that the evangelist would have taken so much pains about fixing this date if he had not supposed himself to be at the same time fixing the year (for the Christian, the only year of real importance in the history of the world) of at least the beginning of the Messiah's ministry, which last, together with the baptism of Jesus, Lk. regarded, as appears from the whole tenor of his narrative, as the immediate consequence of the appearance of the Baptist. Whether he was right in this short allowance of time for the preaching of the Baptist we need not decide; if the ministry of the Baptist really did last longer, it is easily comprehensible that the previous time should have escaped his knowledge. What year, then, does Lk. mean? Following previous writers on the life of Jesus, B. Weiss and Beyschlag have taken as the starting-point for Lk.'s reckoning the year 12 A.D., in which Tiberius was made co-regent with Augustus. There is no proof, however, that such a method of reckoning was ever used. Neither the coins, to which Wieseler¹ appealed, nor the great dignity of Tiberius, adduced by Schegg,² which is in any case to be ascribed to flatterers, can establish this hypothesis; and we shall have to take the death of Augustus as the starting-point. Now, Mommsen³ has proved that until the time of Nerva the reckoning usually employed was by consuls, but that when for any reason a reckoning by the years of the emperor's reign was desirable, the years were counted from the exact date of the beginning of the reign.⁴ Accordingly, Lk. must have reckoned the years of Tiberius as beginning with 19th August, 14 A.D.⁵ The fifteenth year ran from 19th August 28 A.D., to 18th August, 29 A.D. Although we cannot control the sources from which Lk. derived his information,⁶ it is plain from the table of dates given above that the notices in Lk. 3:1 do not contradict one another, and we have no reason to doubt Lk.'s information. We say this in spite of the fact that in one point he shows himself not perfectly well-versed in Jewish affairs: the Roman custom of having two consuls has perhaps led him to misinterpret the fact that in the time of the high-priest Caiaphas (from about 18 A.D. to Easter 36 A.D.), the latter's father-in-law, Annas, who had been high priest in 6-15 A.D., was the real leader of the Sanhedrim. Lk. has taken this to mean that the two were high priests at the same time (cp the same error in Acts 4:6).

(2) In Jn. 2:20, forty-six years are said to have elapsed from the beginning of the building of the temple to the beginning of Jesus' ministry and the cleansing of the temple. If the forty-six years are treated as already past, this brings us to A.D. 28. Everything, however, is here uncertain—the position of the cleansing of the temple at the beginning of the ministry, and the authenticity of the conversation, as well as the evangelist's method of reckoning (on the supposition that the number comes from him).⁷

⁶ Keim assumed, without any foundation, that Lk. had Josephus (Ant. xviii. 3:3) before him, and that he supposed the two revolutions there mentioned as occurring in the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate, which began in the twelfth year of Tiberius, to have been in the thirteenth and fourteenth years of Tiberius, and so hit on the fifteenth year for the Baptist. This is, however, in contradiction with the fact of the large number of single notices in Lk. 3:1, which implies careful investigation; and is in itself impossible, since Josephus first mentions the Baptist in xviii. 5:2, and has already related the death of Philip, which happened so late as the twentieth year of Tiberius.

⁷ Has the evangelist perhaps used Nerva's method of reckoning? That yields the year 28 A.D. On the different interpretations of the number, see Sevin, Chronol. Jesu (2), 1874, pp. 11-13.

CHRONOLOGY

temporaneous with the imprisonment of the Baptist
49. The Baptist. (Mk. 1:14 = Mt. 4:12; Mk. 6:17f. = Mt. 14:3f.; cp Lk. 3:18-20). Jesus was baptized shortly before that (Mk. 1:12f. and parallels), and the execution of the Baptist happened in the course of Jesus' public ministry (Lk. 7:18f. = Mt. 11:2f.; Mk. 6:19-29 = Mt. 14:5-12; with Mk. 6:14-16 = Lk. 9:7-9 = Mt. 14:1f.).

The execution is related also by Josephus (Ant. xviii. 5:1f.), who does not give the exact date, but is led to mention the matter in connection with the defeat of Antipas by Aretas (in the summer or autumn of 36 A.D.), which the nation believed to be a judgment of God for the murder of John. Aretas's reasons for making the war are said to have been two: (1) the divorce of his daughter by Antipas in order that the latter might marry Herodias; (2) boundary disputes. From this Keim, Holtzmann, Hausrath, Schenkel, and Sevin have inferred that this divorce, the rebuke of which by John led, according to the Synoptists, to John's death, must have been not long before 36 A.D. A judgment of God, however, may well be delayed for six years, provided the crime which the people believe to be punished by it is not forgotten; whilst a favourable moment for executing human vengeance does not always arrive immediately. Moreover, it appears that boundary disputes were finally needed to bring about the actual conflict.¹

From this war, therefore, we can draw no inferences about the date of the Baptist's martyrdom. As to the marriage itself, there is, in the first place, no reason to doubt the synoptical tradition that the Baptist's courage occasioned his imprisonment. The account of Josephus neither excludes the assumption that the tetrarch waited for a good pretext before arresting John nor makes it impossible that his arrest and execution should have been separated by a short imprisonment (cp Mk. 6:20; Mt. 11:2). That Herodias's daughter was too old to dance at the feast is shown by A. von Gutschmid (Literarisches Centralblatt, 1874, p. 522) to be wholly undemonstrable, and a banquet at Machærus is not inconceivable. That, according to Josephus, Machærus should have been at one time in the possession of Aretas and shortly afterwards in that of Antipas, we cannot indeed explain (cp Schürer, 1:365); but since Josephus finds no difficulty in it, it has no force as an argument. Since, however, we cannot fix the date of the marriage, the whole matter does not help us much,² and we can only say that there is no sufficient evidence that the journey to Rome, on which Antipas made the acquaintance of his brother's wife, and his return to the tetrarchy, soon after which the marriage occurred, were not between 27 and 30 A.D.

The history of the Baptist presents, therefore, no insuperable obstacle to the view that the fifteenth year of Tiberius = 29 A.D.

4. The Year of Jesus' Death.—Since the crucifixion certainly happened under Pontius Pilate, its earliest possible date is 26 A.D., the latest 35 A.D.

The complete publicity of Jesus' death and its character as a civil event, its well-understood importance as the starting-point of Christianity, its unique impressiveness, and its connection with the Jewish passover, must have made it a chief object of the awakening chronological interest of the early Christians, and at the same time have given ground for believing that the date could be fixed with reasonable certainty.

51. Lk.'s method. (a) This suggests that probably the chronological interest of the third Evangelist (Lk. 3:1f.) was engaged as little for the first public appearance of Jesus as for that of the Baptist: that it was directed towards the date of the Lord's death. He preferred, however, not to interrupt his narrative of the Passion by a chronological notice, and therefore worked back from the date of the crucifixion to the date of the beginning of Jesus' ministry, and so to that of the beginning of the ministry of the Baptist. This is confirmed by the fact that the date in Lk. 3:1f. is, with the exception of the 'acceptable year of the Lord' in 4:19, the last date that Lk. gives. If, as we have concluded above, Lk. really had a whole year in mind, he must have put the death of Jesus into the next (the sixteenth) year of Tiberius—that is, at the passover of 30 A.D.³

² Clemen, Chron. der paul. Briefe, thinks otherwise, and reckons out 33 A.D.; but his argument is wholly inconclusive.

³ A different view is held by Bratke, Stud. u. Krit., 1892, who holds that Lk. regarded the fifteenth year of Tiberius as

CHRONOLOGY

That Lk. had worked back one year from the sixteenth year of Tiberius was the view of Julius Africanus.¹ On the other hand, Clement of Alexandria took Lk.'s fifteenth year of Tiberius as the year of Jesus' death; as did probably Tertullian, whose statement that Christ was crucified in the consulate of the two Gemini (29 A.D.) doubtless rests on Lk. 3:1f., and was perhaps made on purpose to avoid confusion from the later method of reckoning (cp above, § 47) which would have led him to the year 28 A.D. The statement in the received text of Tertullian that Jesus revealed himself 'anno xii. Tiberii Caesaris' cannot be harmonised with Tertullian's other notices, and looks like an ancient correction intended to combine the statement in the text that Jesus was crucified in the fifteenth year of Tiberius with the later traditional view of a three-year ministry.

(b) The theory explaining the conduct of Pilate at the trial of Jesus by the censure received from Rome

52. Pilate. between 31 and 33 A.D. lacks all foundation; and so does the theory (Sevin, p. 135) that the hostility between Pilate and Herod (Lk. 23:12) was possible only after the complaint against Pilate (as to the date of the complaint, cp Schürer 1:411), in which Antipas had a share. Hostility between the Roman procurator and Herod's heir must have been the rule, not the exception.

(c) If, in spite of what has been said above, the fourth Evangelist counted three passovers in the public life of Jesus (cp above, § 45), and the

53. Temple. period of forty-six years from the beginning of the building of the temple is to be taken seriously (cp § 48), his chronology also would yield the year 30 for the death of Jesus.

(d) A final decision cannot be reached from the Jewish Calendar. On the one hand, the Synoptists put

54. Day of the Crucifixion. the crucifixion on Friday, the 15th Nisan, John on Friday, the 14th (Mk. 15:42, Lk. 23:54, Mt. 27:62, Jn. 19:31).² On the other hand, although the astronomical new moons have been computed for the possible years with a difference of but a few minutes between the computation of Wurms and that of Oudemans, and the days of the week can be found,³ difficulty is caused by various

55. Jewish Calendar. irregularities in the Jewish calendar-system. First, the beginning of the month was determined, not by the astronomical new moon, but by the time when the new moon was first visible, which depends partly on the weather and on the season of the year, and is always at least from twenty-four to thirty hours later than the astronomical new moon. In order to prevent too great divergence of the calendar, it was prescribed, however, that no month should in any case last more than thirty days, and that no years should contain less than four or more than eight such 'full' months. Secondly, the intercalary years create complication.

A thirteenth month was added to the year whenever on the 16th Nisan the barley was not yet ripe; but this was forbidden in the sabbatical years, and two intercalary years in succession were not allowed. The only sabbatical year in our period (computed by the aid of 1 Macc. 6:49-53, and Jos. Ant. xiv. 16:2; cp 15:12) was, according to Schürer, 33-34 A.D.; according to Sevin and others,⁴ 34-35 A.D. Any one of the six preceding years identical with the 'acceptable year,' and put the death of Jesus into that year, 29 A.D. Arguments similar to Bratke's are to be found in Sancelme, De vulgaris æra emendatione, 1793, and in Caspari, Chronologisch-geographische Einleitung in das Leben Jesu, 1869.

might have been an intercalary year. At the end of 28-29 A.D., however, there was no need of an intercalated month, because the 15th Nisan fell on 16th April 29 A.D., and on 5th April 30 A.D. (so according to Wurm; according to Gauss and Schwarz one day later). At the end of 30-31 there may have been an intercalary month, for the 15th Nisan would otherwise have fallen on 26th or 27th March, 31 A.D., but with an intercalary month on 24th April. In 32 A.D., the 15th Nisan fell on 12th April; in 33 A.D., on 2nd April. If, however, 33-34 was a sabbatical year, an extra month would have had to be intercalated at the end of 32-33, and then the 15th Nisan would have fallen on 1st May, 33 A.D., and 21st April, 34 A.D.; whereas if 34-35 was the sabbatical year, the extra month would not have been inserted until the end of 33-34. Thus, in 33 A.D. the 15th Nisan would have remained 2nd April. The Jewish empirically determined dates all fell, however, one or two days later than these astronomical dates.

If we take the days of the week into account, in the years 29, 32, and 35 A.D., neither the 14th nor the 15th Nisan could possibly have fallen on Friday. On the other hand, if 33-34 was not a sabbatical year (and so 32-33 not an intercalary year), the 14th Nisan may have been celebrated on Friday, 4th April 33, which would correspond to the view of the Fourth Gospel. This year, however, is excluded if Jesus died on the 15th Nisan, and it is impossible in either case if, as is more likely, 33-34 was the sabbatical year, and so 32-33 had thirteen months.¹ There is, therefore, no great probability on the side of 33 A.D. On the other hand, the 15th Nisan may have fallen on Friday, 23rd April 34 A.D. This is hardly possible for the 14th Nisan, as the astronomical new moon occurred at 6.42 p.m., 7th April, so that the 1st Nisan can have been put at the latest on 9th April (so Sevin, 144). No other line of evidence, however, points to the year 34, and this reckoning by the calendar suits just as well the year 30 of Lk. 31 f., for in that year the astronomical new moon occurred at 8.08 p.m., 22nd March, so that the 1st Nisan may have been put on Friday, 24th March, and the 15th have fallen on Friday, 7th April.²

5. The Year of Jesus' Birth.—Dionysius Exiguus, according to the proofs given by Sanclemente (l.c. 48) and confirmed by Ideler (Handbuch, 2383 f.), started in his reckoning from the incarnation, and followed the common method for the years of reigning monarchs. His view was that Jesus was born on the 25th December, 754 A.U.C., and so he counted the whole year 754 as 1 A.D. The view defended by Noris and Pagl, that he assigned the nativity to 25th December 753, and ignored the five following days, is wrong.

In this reckoning, which gradually came to be universally accepted, Dionysius departed from the dating for which Irenæus (Adv. har. iii. 25) and Tertullian (Adv. Jud. 8) are the oldest witnesses; which dating, based only on the information given in the Gospels, put the nativity in 751 A.U.C. = 3 B.C. Dionysius, perhaps because he had no means of fixing the date of the census under Quirinius in Lk. 2, or the death of Herod in Mt. 2, seems to have reached his result by putting the public appearance of Jesus one year later than that of John (15th year of Tiberius, Lk. 31 f.), and reckoning back thirty years. Since we have seen that the thirty years of Lk. 31 f. is a round number, perhaps drawn from the OT, we are thrown back on the narratives of the nativity.

(a) Lk. gives two points. (i.) He says (136) that Jesus was six months younger than the Baptist, whose conception happened under Herod 58. The Baptist. (15). It does not, however, follow that the birth of Jesus fifteen months later was also under Herod, and, even if the evangelist thought so, Krit.* 1877, pp. 181-190; Riess, Geburtsjahr Christi, 1880, p. 45 f. 229-236; and other works mentioned in Schürer, 129 f. ¹ See for the year 33 A.D. the exact reckoning in Schegg, p. 49 f. ² So also Gumpach, Hilfsm. d. rechnend. Chronol. 1853, p. 94.

his view cannot have rested on documentary evidence. Perhaps Lk. may have drawn his inference from the fact that the Baptist died six months before Jesus.

(ii.) Lk. says (21-5) that Jesus was born at the time when a census, ordered by Augustus for the whole empire, was being taken in Judæa and 59. The Census. Galilee, and that this was while Cyrenius (undoubtedly Publ. Sulpicius Quirinius) was governor in Syria.¹ Such a census, however, was legally impossible in the reign of Herod, and a governorship of Quirinius in Syria before Herod's death is chronologically impossible, since at the time of Herod's death (4 B.C.) Quintilius Varus (who put down the insurrection following that event) was still governor in Syria, whilst his predecessors were Sentius Saturninus (9-6 B.C.) and Titius (attested for 10 B.C.). Josephus, who relates the last years of Herod in much detail, has no knowledge of such a census, but says that the census of 7 A.D. was the first, and something altogether novel for the Jews. It may be that Quirinius was governor of Syria for a short time (3-2 B.C.) as successor to Varus, as he certainly was afterwards from 6 A.D. until (at the latest) 11 A.D.; but in his first (problematical) governorship a census for Judæa, which had fallen to the share of Archelaus, is likewise impossible. On the other hand, the census in Judæa under Quirinius in 6-7 A.D., after the deposition of Archelaus, is well attested (cp Jos. Ant. xvii. 125 xviii. 11 and 21 xx. 52, B/, xi. 11, Acts [= Lk.] 537), and may have been in fulfilment of a general imperial command intended to be executed as occasion should arise in the several provinces. This could, however, have applied only to imperial provinces (including, therefore, Judæa), not to senatorial provinces: that is, it would not be universal. Further, (1) even this census could not have included the Galileans, who were subjects of Antipas; and (2) it must have been taken as the basis for a poll and property tax, at the actual, not at the ancestral, home of the subject, for the latter would have been in most cases hard to determine, and such a procedure was in general impracticable. (3) Moreover, Mary could not possibly be affected by it, because she was not of the lineage of David (cp GENEALOGIES, ii.), and in such cases the authorities dealt with the male representatives of the women.

The account in Lk. rests, therefore, on a series of mistakes, and the most plausible view is that the evangelist, or the tradition which he followed, for some reason combined the birth of Jesus with the census under Quirinius, and assigned to the latter a wrong date.²

Perhaps Lk. simply confused Archelaus with his father, for the former was very probably, like Antipas, occasionally called Herod. This confusion of the two Herods would have been all the easier if after Herod the Great's death Quirinius really was for a while governor of Syria. The same confusion may have caused Irenæus and Tertullian to adopt the year 3 B.C. for the birth of Jesus. The imperial census of Lk. is perhaps a confusion of the census under Quirinius, put incorrectly into the year 3 B.C., with the remembrance of the census of Roman citizens throughout the empire which was actually ordered by Augustus in 6 B.C., for the two events lay only two years apart. Lk., who (cp § 47 above, on the two high priests in Lk. 32) was none too well informed on Jewish matters, may have inferred from 'the family of David' that Joseph's home was really in Bethlehem, and have supposed this fact to be the true means of combining the already current tradition of the birth in Bethlehem with the incontestable tradition that Jesus was a Nazarene. If these suppositions are admissible, the kernel of truth in the narrative would be that Jesus was born not far from the end of the Herodian period, and that the Roman rule was set up in his earliest childhood. In both these political occurrences an inner connection with the events which brought in the Kingdom of God was doubtless observed in very early times, and the interest in making the closeness of this connection as clear as possible may have led to the enrichment of the narrative.

² A chronological error is not without analogies in Lk. The case of Theudas (Acts 536 f.) is well known, and the collection for the poor in Acts 1128 f. is perhaps confused with that of Acts 21, whilst the combination of the various famines in the time of Claudius into one world-wide famine (Acts 1128) is very closely analogous to the case of the census.

(b) From Mt. we have as chronological evidence the star and the slaughter of the innocents. Rationalising attempts, however, to subject this

61. The Star. star to astronomical laws do violence to the idea of the narrator. The star moves in its own free paths, appears and disappears, travels and stands still. Even if the evangelist is wrong, and a conjunction or a comet lies at the basis of the story, it is impossible to determine from what phenomena astrologers of 'the East' supposed themselves able to draw such inferences. The star shines only in the legend, and derives its origin from Nu. 24:17 and the apocalyptic imagery (cp Rev. 12:1). It has been matched by similar legendary stars at the birth and at the death of many of the great men of the heathen world.

As to the murder of the innocents, if it were a historical fact, Jesus must be supposed, since the male children were killed 'from two years old and under,' to have been not less than a year

62. The Innocents. old, even if the murder was just before Herod's death; and in that case, since Herod died shortly before the Passover of 4 B.C., Jesus must have been born at the latest in 5 B.C. Josephus, however, although he narrates with the most scrupulous exactness all the horrors of Herod's last years, has no knowledge of the murder of the children. On the other hand, he gives almost exactly the same story as relating to Moses (Ant. xi. 92).

All the other suspicious circumstances in the narrative in Mt. 2 cannot be set forth here. In view of the natural tendency of legends to connect important events with one another and to mirror their mutual relations, we cannot infer from Mt. more than that Jesus was probably born shortly before or after the death of Herod—the same result that we reached from Lk.

The only results which have a very high degree of probability are the date 30 A.D. for the death of Jesus, and the period of about one year for the

63. Conclusions. length of his public ministry. Besides this, it is also probable that Jesus was born in the agitated times when death was snatching the sceptre from the hand of Herod the Great, and when with his successors the Roman rule in Judæa was coming again in sight.

II. CHRONOLOGY OF THE LIFE OF PAUL.—The starting-point for Pauline chronology must be the

64. Paul's journey to Rome. journey to Rome, for here we can make connection with the dates supplied by Roman history. The events immediately preceding—namely, the arrival of Festus in Palestine, the beginning of the proceedings against Paul (Acts 25:1-6), the hearing and the appeal (25:6-12), and (27:1) the shipment of the prisoner—probably followed one another rapidly; but the actual date of the arrival of Festus is matter of dispute

65. Festus. (see the literature in Schürer, GVV, 1 484 f. n. 38, to which must now be added O. Holtzmann, NT Zeitgesch., 1895, p. 125 ff. 248; Blass, Acta Ap. 1895, p. 21 f.; Harnack, Die Chron. der altchristl. Lit. 1 [97]). For the most part the preference is given to the year 60 or 59 A.D., since it was at the latest in the summer of 62 (more probably in that of 61) that

Albinus succeeded Festus, and for the events related of Festus's term of office one year will suffice. The objection to an earlier date is that it might not leave room for the events of the life of Paul, and that, according to Acts 24:10, at the imprisonment of Paul, Felix had already been in office 'many years' (ἐκ πολλῶν ἐτῶν). (That the courtly Josephus casually mentions Poppæa as Nero's wife, which she did not become till several years later, cannot be adduced as a serious argument in the same direction.)

By the side of this commonly received date, however, a much earlier one has been advocated recently.¹

Thus Kellner proposes Nov. 54 A.D.; Weber and O. Holtzmann, the summer of 55; Blass and Harnack, 56 (Harnack, 55?). Whilst O. Holtzmann takes his start from Tacitus, Harnack starts from the chronology of Eusebius, the claims of which to our confidence his labours have materially enhanced. He shows that there is no ground for the common suspicion of the dates given by Eusebius for the procuratorships preceding and following that of Festus.

Eusebius's date for the year preceding the accession of Felix differs from that of Tacitus by only one year. Nor is the difference any greater in the date of his removal. According to Tacitus, Pallas fell into disfavour a few days before the fourteenth birthday of Britannicus, which fell in the middle of Feb. 55 A.D. According to Josephus, Pallas obtained of Nero an acquittal for his brother Felix from an accusation made by the Jews after his recall. Now, as Nero ascended the throne on the 13th Oct. 54 A.D., the time left under him by these two dates is clearly too short for the events narrated by Josephus. Two solutions are possible. Tacitus may be wrong by a year in the age of Britannicus; it may have been his fifteenth birthday, so that it was not till 56 that Pallas fell into disfavour; or else even after his fall Pallas may still have had access to the Emperor. Now, Eusebius in his Chronicle supports the year 56 as that of the accession of Festus, since he assigns it to the second year of Nero (Oct. 55 to Oct. 56; on the textual certainty of this date see Harnack, 236, n. 2). If Felix entered on his office, as according to Eusebius he did, between Jan. 51 and Jan. 52 (according to Tacitus between Jan. 52 and Jan. 53), he could in the summer of 56 be described in case of need, if we compare the average length of procuratorships, as having been in office ἐκ πολλῶν ἐτῶν.

Any objection, in fact, to this number 56 for the accession of Festus, supported by Tacitus and Eusebius, could come only from the requirements of the life of Paul. We shall, therefore, leave the question open for the present.

From the date thus obtained for the relegation of the prisoner to the tribunal at Rome, let us in the first place make our way backwards.

If, as we shall see to be probable, Paul carried out the plan mentioned in Acts 20:16, his arrest must have been at Pentecost under the procurator

66. Felix. Felix, who (24:27) prolonged the proceedings for two years until his retirement from office. This mention of Felix and the two-years imprisonment in Cæsarea are, indeed, regarded as unhistorical by Straatman (Paulus, 1874), van Manen (Paulus, 1, De handelinge der Apostelen, 1890), and especially by Weizsäcker (Ap. Zeitalter, 1886, pp. 433-461); but the improbability of certain details, on which they rely, is not conclusive, and, on the other hand, the rise of this circumstantial narrative cannot be explained on the ground that it is a doublet to Acts 25:f. That Felix should hold over the prisoner for the chance of a change of sentiment in Jerusalem, and, this change not having come about, should finally leave him in prison in the hope of leaving one popular deed to be remembered by, agrees with his character and the habit of procurators. That Acts tells nothing about these two years is much less surprising than its silence about the year and a half in Corinth and the three years in Ephesus. That a provisional imprisonment of two years could be imposed even on a Roman citizen is shown by the two-years imprisonment in Rome. It is likewise obvious that Paul would not have had his case transferred to Rome except in dire necessity. The dry notice in Acts 24²⁷ is, therefore, without doubt trustworthy, and the arrest of Paul is to be put two years earlier than the arrival of Festus—that is, at Pentecost 54 or 58.

¹ By Kellner (the article 'Felix' in Hergenröther's Kirchenlex. (2) [Roman Catholic], 1887; Z. f. kath. Theol. 1888), Weber (Kritische Gesch. der Exegese des 9. Kap. des Römerbriefs, 1889, p. 177 ff.), O. Holtzmann (l.c.), Blass (l.c.), Harnack (l.c.) following such older scholars as Bengel, Süskind, and Rettig.

For the events before the arrest in Jerusalem we give the dates in two numbers: one on the assumption that this happened at Pentecost 54; the other, that it was in 58. The journey to Jerusalem from Philippi (Acts 20⁴⁻²¹ 16), which is related, with the exception of the episode at Miletus (20¹⁶⁻³⁸), from the 'we-source,' was begun after 'the days of unleavened bread,' and there is no reason for supposing that Paul did not carry out his plan (20¹⁶) of arriving at Jerusalem by Pentecost. The itinerary from the beginning of the Passover is given us as follows:—At Philippi (Passover) seven days; to Troas five days; at Troas seven days; to Patara eight days,—in all twenty-seven days. This leaves twenty-two days before Pentecost, which was ample for the journey to Jerusalem except in case of a very exceptionally unfavourable passage from Patara to the coast of Syria. Of these twenty-two days twelve were occupied as follows:—At Tyre seven days, to Ptolemais one, to Caesarea one, to Jerusalem two to three; so that ten days remain for the voyage from Patara to Tyre (which in ordinary weather required four to five days) and for the stay at Caesarea, the duration of neither of which is stated. From the stops, which in view of the brisk coasting-trade were surely not necessary, we may infer that satisfactory progress was made by the travellers. The departure from Philippi, which was the conclusion of Paul's missionary career, is, therefore, to be put just after the Passover of the year of the arrest.

For the dates earlier than this point, the chronologist would be wholly at sea without Acts; and no good reason appears for not trusting the information which it gives. On the great journey which ended at Jerusalem, Paul had started from Ephesus (1 Cor. 16^{8 f.}; Acts 19), and journeyed by way of Troas, where he carried on his work for a short time (Acts 20¹ does not mention Troas at all), to Macedonia (2 Cor. 2^{12 f.} 75). That he stayed there long is not likely; for, if he had done so, the length of his stay would probably have been given as in the case (Acts 20³) of Greece (Corinth). Moreover, the plans made in Ephesus (1 Cor. 16⁸; 2 Cor. 1^{15 f.}) had in view only a short stay in Macedonia, for (1 Cor. 16⁸ cp v. 6) Paul expected to leave Ephesus after Pentecost (which fell somewhere between 15th May and 15th June) and to be in Corinth so early that, even if he should not decide to pass the winter there, his visit should, nevertheless, not be too short. This would allow at most three months on the way. Now, he may have waited rather longer in Macedonia, in order to learn the impression made by Titus (the bearer of 2 Cor.); but, even so, we cannot reckon more than from four to five months for the whole journey. In Corinth itself he stayed (Acts 20³) three months, and then returned to Macedonia, where he surely did not stay long, since he had been there just three months earlier. Moreover, he had, no doubt, formed in Corinth his plan of being in Jerusalem by Pentecost, and the additional time which the unexpectedly long journey (occasioned by Jewish plots, Acts 20³, which made the direct route impossible) must have cost him would of itself have forbidden an unnecessarily long stay. He probably, therefore, reached Philippi but little before the Passover; and we have for the whole journey from Ephesus through Troas, Macedonia, Greece, and back to Macedonia perhaps eight to ten months—namely, about the space of time from Pentecost 53/57 to Passover 54/58. In the summer¹ of 53/57 in Macedonia

CHRONOLOGY

Paul wrote 2 Cor.; at the end of this year or the beginning of the next in Corinth, Romans, and the letter of introduction for Phoebe to the Christians at Ephesus (Rom. 16¹⁻²⁰). About this time may belong, too, the undoubtedly authentic note Tit. 3¹²⁻¹⁴; in which case the Macedonian Nicomedia is meant, and the plan for the winter was not carried out.

The stay in Ephesus had lasted, according to Acts 19

8¹⁰⁻²², over two years and a quarter (Acts 20³¹ speaks of three years), so that Paul must have come to Ephesus at Pentecost or in the summer of 50/54. From there, after he had already sent one letter to Corinth (1 Cor. 5⁹), he wrote in the beginning of 53/57 our 1 Cor., and later had occasion to write to Corinth for yet a third time (2 Cor. 7³: the letter is perhaps preserved in 2 Cor. 10-13).¹

From this long stay in Ephesus, which doubtless formed the second great epoch in Paul's missionary activity in the Greek world, we go back to 70. Corinth. the first—namely, the first visit to Corinth (Acts 18¹⁻¹⁸; cp 1 and 2 Cor.). This appears to have lasted about two years, since to the one year and a half of 18¹¹ must be added, in case 18¹¹ refers only to the time spent in the house of Titius Justus, the previous time, in which Paul was trying to work from the synagogue as a base, as well as the later καινα ημέραι of 18¹⁸. How much time lay, however, between the departure from Corinth and the arrival at Ephesus in 50/54 we cannot tell, although the very sketchiness of our only authority (Acts 18¹⁸⁻¹⁹) makes it easier to believe that the author is drawing here (except for the words, v. 19, εἰσελθών-ν. 21, θέλοντος) from a written source than that he relies on oral tradition or his own imagination. Oral tradition would either have omitted the journey altogether, or have narrated what happened at Jerusalem in some detail. All suspicion of 'tendency' is excluded by the brevity and obscurity of the passage. For the journey thus barely mentioned in Acts one year would be ample time. In that case Paul would have left Corinth in the summer of 49/53, having arrived there in the summer of 47/51. In the beginning of this period of two years 1 Thess. was written. (The genuineness of 2 Thess. must be left undetermined.)

Before the long stay in Corinth falls the Macedonian mission, with the necessary journeys, which, however, occupied but one day each (Acts 16¹¹⁻¹⁸). For the whole journey from Troas to Corinth a few months would suffice. It is, therefore, possible that Paul set out after the opening of navigation in March of the same year in the summer of which he arrived for his long stay in Corinth.

Up to this point the probability of the chronology is very considerable. The results may be summarized as follows:—

71. Results.

TABLE VIII.—LIFE OF PAUL: ENTRANCE INTO EUROPE TO IMPRISONMENT AT ROME.

Spring 47/51.—Departure from Troas, followed by mission in Macedonia.
Summer 47/51–Summer 49/53.—Corinth and Achaia. 1 Thess.
Summer 49/53–Summer 50/54.—Visit to Jerusalem and Antioch; journey through Asia Minor to Ephesus.
Summer 50/54–Pentecost 53/57.—Ephesus.
Pentecost 53/57–Passover 54/58.—Journey by way of Troas and Macedonia to Achaia and return to Philippi.
Passover–Pentecost 54/58.—Journey, with the contribution, from Philippi to Jerusalem.
54/58–56/60.—Imprisonment in Caesarea.
Autumn 56/60–Spring 57/61.—Journey to Rome.
57/61–59/63.—Imprisonment in Rome.

Passing now to the period before 47/51 A.D., we find that Acts supplies us with far less trustworthy accounts and is wholly without dates; nor have we any Pauline epistles written in these years. Highly probable, nevertheless (just because of the peculiar way in which it is given), although not without editorial additions, is the representation preserved in Acts 15:40-16:8, that Troas was the goal of a zigzag journey from Antioch in Syria through the interior of Asia Minor. The seeming restlessness (Acts 16:8)—at any rate in the latter part of the inland journey—may imply that the time occupied was comparatively short. In that case, the start from Antioch might fall in the year 46/50; but even that is very problematical. We are, therefore, thrown back for the chronology wholly

73. Gal. 1 f. on Gal. 1 f. Here, however, it is not perfectly plain whether the fourteen years in 2:1 include or follow the three years in 1:18. For the former view may be adduced the change of prepositions μετά ('after') and διά ('in the course of,' RVmg.); but this can be explained better thus. An ἐπειτα ('then') having been introduced in 1:21 between the two ἐπειτα of 1:18 and 2:1, διά was used, instead of μετά, in order not to exclude the space of time between the two ἐπειτα of vv. 18 and 21—namely, the fifteen days in Jerusalem. (Perhaps, also, in 2:1 the three years had completely elapsed before the first visit, whereas the second visit may have been made in the course of the fourteenth year.) On this view seventeen years would have elapsed from the conversion of Paul to the conference in Jerusalem, out of which time he had spent three years in Arabia and fourteen in Syria and Cilicia (1:17-21). The latter period was certainly, the former (at least for Damascus) probably, occupied in the work of an apostle (Gal. 1:23-27 f.). After the conference in Jerusalem followed a stay in Antioch (2:11-21). Since 3:1 f. is introduced without any sign of transition, the simplest supposition is that this προγράφειν (3:1; RV 'open setting forth') and its results (that is, the mission in Galatia) come chronologically after, but not too long after, the events narrated previously. This would agree, also, with the most natural interpretation of Gal. 2:5.

If we look now at the parallel narrative in Acts, there is, in the first place, no doubt that in 15:1-35 we have

74. Acts. the same events described as in Gal. 2. In Acts, as in Galatians, Paul and Barnabas come with others in their company to Jerusalem, and return to Antioch after arriving at an understanding with the church in Jerusalem. To Antioch come also, in both cases (although in Acts no mention is made of a visit of Peter), members of the Jerusalem church, who might in Acts also, just as in Galatians, have been said to come from James. In Acts 11:27-30 12:24 f., however, we find, besides, mention of another earlier journey of Paul and Barnabas from Antioch to Jerusalem and back again, after the journey from Damascus to Jerusalem (Acts 9:26-30 = Gal. 1:18). Since Gal. 1:20-21 makes this impossible as a separate visit to Jerusalem, the two visits from Antioch (Acts 11 f. and Acts 15) must have been really one; and this would explain the further points of resemblance that on both occasions (in one case after, in the other before, the journey of the apostles) prophets come from Jerusalem to Antioch 11:27 15:32), and that both times, although in different ways, a contribution of money plays a part (Acts 11:28 f. Gal. 2:10). Cp also 'to the elders' (Acts 11:30 15:2). Now, although this visit is in general more accurately described by Acts 15, there are many reasons for thinking that it is chronologically placed more correctly by Acts 11:27 f.

The insertion by mistake at the end of chap. 14 is easy to understand; for whilst large parts of chap. 13 f. and the whole of chap. 15 are certainly the work of the final author of Acts (notice that the style is the same as in Acts 1-12), at the same time the 'we source' can be detected (as is now more and more widely held) as far back as 13:1, and we can ascribe to it the return to Antioch (14:26a) as well as the later departure for the journey of 16:6 f. (without the intervening narrative), although we can no longer restore the original connection. Accordingly, since the author had not been able before Acts 13 f. to give a concrete account of any Gentile mission, an undated account (perhaps not perfectly accurate) of a conference in Jerusalem (to which the missionaries came from Antioch) which treated the subject of Gentile missions could be inserted after 13 f. better than earlier. The author may have had some reason to suppose that the contribution of money (the fact but not the date of which he had learned: it was not mentioned in his source as the occasion of the last visit of Paul to Jerusalem; Acts 21) must have been brought on the occasion of the earlier stay in Antioch. If so, we can see how, in consequence of the two periods of residence in Antioch, he was led to suppose that there had been two visits to Jerusalem, and so to create a contradiction to Gal. 1 f. All this becomes still more probable if the districts visited in Acts 13 f. could be called Galatia by Paul: a possibility which can now be regarded as proved, as is the impossibility that Paul should have called them Cilicia (Gal. 1:21) (see GALATIA). On the other hand, it can be seen in Acts 15:1 f. 30 f. that at the conference the great question was about the Syrian Christians, not about those whose conversion is related in Acts 13 f.

If these hypotheses are correct, between the conference in Jerusalem (Gal. 2:1 f.) and the journey from Troas to Macedonia (Acts 16:8-11) lie the missionary journey (Acts 13 f.) begun and ended at Antioch, and the zig-zag tour through Asia Minor (Acts 15:36-16:8), the beginning of the original account of which has been, doubtless, somewhat confused by the insertion of Acts 15. One year, however, is not enough for these journeys. The hindrance hinted at in Acts 16:6 f. may perhaps have been connected with the winter season, if the date (March 47/51) which we have ventured to give above for the passage from Troas to Macedonia is correct. In that case the missionaries would perhaps have passed the preceding winter in Antioch (Acts 14:26); the missionary journey of Acts 13 f. would then fall in the open season before this winter; and thus the departure from Antioch related in Acts 13:1 f. would have been two years before the passage from Troas to Europe (that is, in the spring of 45/49), and the conference in Jerusalem immediately before—perhaps (if we may infer from analogies) at the time of the Passover. The conversion of Paul would fall (Gal. 1:18 2:1) fourteen or seventeen years earlier—that is, in the year 31/35 or 28/32. When Gal. was written is for the general chronology a matter of indifference.¹

75. Results. To the table given above should therefore be prefixed:—

TABLE IX.—LIFE OF PAUL: CONVERSION TO ENTRANCE INTO EUROPE.

- 31/35 or 28/32.—Conversion of Paul.
Three-years stay in Arabia and Damascus.
- 34/38 or 31/35.—First visit to Jerusalem.
Eleven- or fourteen-years work in Syria and Cilicia.
- 45/49.—Conference in Jerusalem, mission in Galatia.
One-year journey through Asia Minor to Troas.

Three further passages can perhaps serve as proof of the results reached above.² The first (Acts 11:28), containing the mention of the famine under

76. Famine. Claudius, loses, indeed, its significance, if the visit there mentioned had as its object the agreement about the mission-fields, not the bringing of a contribution; but it perhaps explains the mistaken combination (Acts 11:30 12:1) of this journey (of 45/49 A.D.) with the death of James the son of Zebedee, which happened (Acts 12:19-23) between 42 and 44. Josephus tells (Ant. xx. 52 and 26 iii. 153) of a famine in Judæa, which can well be put in one of these years, and so could have been foreseen in the preceding year (cp Schürer, 1 474, n. 8). By a singular coincidence there was in 49 also, one of the alternative years for the journey of Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem, a much more widely extended famine (see, for authorities, Schürer, ib.). It is possible, then, that the author knew that the conference was in a famine year, but connected it by mistake with the famine of 44 instead of that of 49, and that this assisted the confusion which resulted in the creation of an extra visit to

² We can make nothing of the statement in Acts 21:38. Even were its authenticity beyond dispute, we have no means whatever of determining the year of the sedition referred to, and Wieseler's choice of 56 or 57 A.D. (Chron. 79) is devoid of any solid foundation. Nor is it possible to infer any date from the account in Acts 25 f. of Agrippa and Berenice's presence in Cæsarea at the time when Paul's case was decided.

CHRONOLOGY

Jerusalem. The confusion of the two famine years is the more pardonable because both fell under Claudius; the transformation of the two local famines into one which affected the whole empire is easily explicable. All this, however, is simply a possibility. If the year of the conference was 45 A.D., the two journeys distinguished by Lk. would fall so close together that we can easily understand their being regarded as distinct, on the supposition that Lk. knew nothing of the raising of a collection and its delivery on the occasion of Paul's last journey to Jerusalem, but did know of a famine about the time of the conference and of succour given to the primitive church through Paul.

The second notice is that of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius, which was (Acts 18:1 f.), before Paul's arrival at Corinth. The year, however, of this edict, which 77. Expulsion of Jews.

Suetonius (Claud. 25) also mentions, is not certain. Wieseler (Chronol. 120-128) conjectures, without conclusive arguments, that it was issued in the year of the expulsion of the mathematici (Tac. Ann. xii. 52; Dio Cassius 606)—that is, in 52 A.D.—whilst Orosius (76, 15 ed. Zangemeister, 1882) gives as the date, on the authority of Josephus (in the existing text of whose writings we find no mention of the matter), the ninth year of Claudius=49 A.D.—a date not favourable to the earlier alternative reached above for the year of Paul's arrival in Corinth, the summer of 47/51. Orosius's statement, however, cannot be verified.

Finally, from Acts 9:24 ff. and 2 Cor. 11:32 f., it appears that Paul's first visit to Jerusalem was occasioned by a persecution at a time when a viceroy of Aretas, king of the Nabateans, resided at Damascus. The latest Damascene coins with the head of Tiberius (which form one of the proofs brought together by Schürer, 1:65 f. n. 14, to prove, against Marquardt and Mommsen, that Damascus was not all the time under Arabian rule) belong to the year 33-34, and it is in itself not probable, though it is possible, that Damascus was given to Aretas by Tiberius, who died in March 37 A.D., while under Caligula such favours are well known. If Caligula's reign had already begun, the flight of Paul would have fallen at least two years later than all but one of the dates assigned for it above. However, the argument is uncertain. Nothing known to us makes the possession of Damascus by Aretas in the last years of Tiberius actually impossible. If that should be excluded by discoveries of coins or other new evidence, we should then (the often assailed genuineness of 2 Cor. 11:32 f. being pre-supposed) have to combine the numbers in Gal. 1:18 2:1 (so that there would be only fourteen years between Paul's conversion and the conference in Jerusalem), or to shorten the time estimated for the mission in Asia Minor and Europe, or else to omit from the life of Paul the two-year imprisonment in Caesarea under the procurator Felix.

At the same time, the coins of Tiberius for the year 33-34 exclude the year 28 as that of Paul's conversion. If we assign the imprisonment to 54, the date of Gal. 1 f. must be explained as referring to the total of fourteen years, so that Paul's conversion would fall in 31. In favour of this is its nearness to the death of Jesus. For 1 Cor. 15:3 ff. does not well permit an interval of any length between Jesus' death and Paul's arrival at Damascus. Conversely, the same consideration demands that, if we regard 58 as the date of the imprisonment, we should calculate from the statements in Gal. 1 f. a period of seventeen years, so that 32 would be the year of Paul's conversion. Neither series, accordingly, conflicts with what we know of those times; but it may readily be asked: Are we warranted in casting discredit on the statements of Eusebius?

How now stands the case with reference to the close of Paul's life? The travellers set out for

CHRONOLOGY

Rome in the autumn of 56 or 60, and arrived in the spring of the subsequent year (Acts 27 f.). For the next two years Paul was kept in easy imprisonment, and to this period belong Colossians and Philemon, though some assign them to the Caesarean imprisonment. After the lapse of the two years began the trial, about which we have some information from a note to Timothy now incorporated in 2 Tim., and from Philippians. Of its duration and issue we know nothing. The prediction that Paul would die without meeting his friends again (Acts 20:25-38), the sudden breaking off of Acts, and the utter absence of all trace of any later activity on the part of the apostle, will always incline one to believe that Paul's presentiment was fulfilled, and that his trial ended in a sentence of death. If so, the great apostle died in the course of the year 59 or 63. In either case his martyrdom was before the persecution of Nero, and had no connection with it.

Nor does any of the older narratives conflict with this. When Eusebius in his Chronicle assigns the death of Peter and Paul to the fourteenth or thirteenth year of Nero (the number varies in different texts)—i.e., 68 or 67 A.D.—he is in conflict with himself, for he elsewhere sets this event in the beginning of the persecution of Nero, which beyond all question was in the summer of 64; and moreover, as Harnack insists (l.c. 241 f.), his date lies under the suspicion of being occasioned by the legendary twenty-five years stay of Peter at Rome, in combination with the story that the apostles left Jerusalem twelve years after the death of Jesus: 30+12+25 make 67.

But neither is the tradition of the contemporaneous death of the two apostolic leaders by any means so well grounded as Harnack assumes (l.c.). In Eusebius, the contemporaneousness lies under the same suspicion as the date. Clem. Rom. chap. 5 gives no hint of it, and the summary introduction of other sufferers in chap. 6 gives us no right, in face of the enumeration of the sufferings endured by Peter and Paul during the whole of their apostolic activity, to apply all that is said in chap. 6, and therefore the death of these apostles, to the persecution of Nero. The testimony of Dionysius (Eus. HE ii. 25 8), ἁμφω εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμῶς διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν ('After both teaching together as far as to Italy, they suffered martyrdom at the same time') is to be taken cum grano salis. If the two great apostles died a violent death for their faith in Rome under Nero, it is easy to see how tradition might lose sight of the interval of one year or five years, and bring the two martyrdoms together. The rapidity with which in the popular memory Paul receded behind Peter, a phenomenon already noticeable in Clem. Rom. and Ignat. (ad Rom. 4), admits of a peculiarly simple explanation if Paul was withdrawn from the scene so much sooner.

Whatever testimony can be found in the literature down to Eusebius for the liberation of Paul from his collected anew by Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Lit. des Urchrist. 1). In truth, all that can be taken account of before Eusebius is the apostle's intention intimated in Rom. 15:24 and mentioned in the Muratorian fragment (except that the apostle's plans were so often upset by events), the Pauline fragments of the Pastoral Epistles (if they ought not also to be brought within the period of missionary activity known to us, since otherwise they would present the post-captivity labours as a strange repetition of what preceded the captivity), and the expression τέρμα τῆς δύσεως 'boundary of the west' in Clem. Rom. It is only the last that we can take seriously. Since, however, Ignatius speaks of Rome as δύσις ('west,' ad Rom. 22), and Clement himself has immediately before opposed δύσις to ἀνατολή ('east'), meaning therefore at least Rome among other places, it is not at all difficult, especially keeping in view the Pauline metaphor of the ἀγών (conflict), to suppose that it is this δύσις, (i.e., Rome) that is indicated as τέρμα. If, in spite of this, the hypothesis of the liberation of Paul should be accepted, we should have to add to our chronological table: 59/63.—Liberation of Paul; July–Aug. 64.—Martyrdom. The apostle's eventful life would thus end with a period completely obscured in the popular memory, a period the events of which have not left a trace behind.

III. CHRONOLOGY OF THE CHURCHES IN PALESTINE.—I. If the dates so far accepted are correct, the whole Palestinian development described

81. Earliest events. by the author of Acts (almost our only authority for this period) between the death of Jesus and the conversion of Paul, finally culminating in the death of Stephen and the dispersion of the church in Jerusalem, must be crowded into the limits of two years, or possibly even of a single year.

The traditions are, however, very scanty. According to 1 Cor. 15:1–7 there happened in this space of time the appearance of Jesus to Peter and the twelve (as to the time and place of which it is not possible to reach a certain conclusion, but with which the return to Jerusalem is most clearly connected), his appearance to the 500 brethren (perhaps to be identified with the occurrence narrated in Acts 2, which in that case was in Jerusalem, and, if Acts 2 is correct, fifty days after the death of Jesus), the conversion of him who afterwards became head of the church of Jerusalem, James the Lord's brother (since this beyond doubt happened at the time of the appearance to him mentioned in 1 Cor. 15:7), and the conversion (by the same means) of many who afterwards became missionaries. The necessity of a representation of the Hellenists (Acts 6:1–6) suggests that from the return of the twelve until that time a considerable period had elapsed, which is, however, very insufficiently filled out by the narratives in chaps. 3–5.

2. As to the later events, in the narratives in Acts 8:4–40 9:1–30 9:31–11 18:11 19:24 illustrating the geographical

82. Later events. extension of Christianity, the author plainly does not mean to assert that the events described followed one another in mutually exclusive periods of time. If the accounts are historical, the missionary operations of Philip and Peter were undertaken while Paul was working in Damascus and Antioch (including Syria) in 31/35 or 32/36 f. A.D. The anonymous beginnings of Christianity in Damascus and Antioch belong, of course, to the time before Paul took hold in those places. If the recollections lying at the basis of Acts 11:22–26 are approximately correct, Barnabas must have left Jerusalem finally for Antioch not very long after Paul's first visit to Jerusalem in 34/38 or 35/39 A.D., and Philip may by that time have already removed to Caesarea (Acts 8:40).

3. After these events we hear nothing until the death of James the son of Zebedee between 41, the year in which Herod Agrippa I. began to rule over Judaea, and 44, the year of his death (Acts 12:1 f.). If the account in Acts is correct, about this same time Peter left Jerusalem permanently (Acts 12:17), and James the Lord's brother must have already become the leader of the church (Acts 12:17). With this agrees excellently the abundantly attested old Christian tradition that the twelve left Jerusalem twelve years after Jesus' death (see reff. in Harnack, Chronologie, 243). It may be in error simply in transferring to the twelve what applied only to their head, Peter. At all events, Acts tells us nothing of the ten left after the death of James. The twelfth year would be 42 A.D. In that case Herod must have sought, immediately after his accession, by his proceedings against the Christians to secure the confidence of the Jews.

4. If the results reached above with reference to what we read in Acts 15:11 27 f. and 13 f. are right, our next information relates to the year 45 or 49, when Peter, Paul, and Barnabas gather again at the conference round James, at whose side (Gal. 2:9) appears John, the son of Zebedee. Paul and Barnabas return to Antioch; Peter leaves Jerusalem again very soon, and lives for a while among the Christians at Antioch (Gal. 2:11 f.).

5. In 54/58, when Paul comes to Jerusalem with the contribution, James is master of the situation (Acts 21:18). This is the last information from the NT about the church in Palestine.

6. According to the received text of Josephus (Ant. xx. 9:1), James suffered martyrdom in 62—that is, under the high priest Ananias (son of the high priest of the same name known to us from the Gospels)—but before the arrival in Judaea of Albinus, the successor of the procurator Festus. (After Festus's early death Annas had been appointed high priest by Agrippa II.) The passage is not free, however, from the suspicion of Christian interpolation. Hegesippus (Eus. HE ii. 23:11–18) seems to have put the death of James somewhat nearer to the destruction of Jerusalem.¹

Shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem (A.D. 70) the Christians removed to Pella in Peræa. The year is not certain, but was probably 67, when, after the downfall of Cestius, Jewish fanaticism overreached itself.

IV. OTHER DATES IN THE HISTORY OF PRIMITIVE CHRISTIANITY.—Here can be mentioned only those few points on which a

83. Other dates. stray ray of light happens to fall. In the nature of the case, detailed discussions can be given only in the special articles.

1. Peter.—That Peter, the last trace of whom we found in A.D. 45/49, or somewhat later, at Antioch, was later a travelling missionary after the manner of Paul, is to be inferred from the allusions to him in 1 Cor. 1:12 3:22 9:5. 1 Pet. 5:12 f., even if the epistle was not written by Peter, implies his intimate association with Paul's former companions Silvanus and Mark, and 1 Pet. 1:1 f. his missionary activity in the provinces of Asia Minor. For this latter there was room at any rate after the imprisonment of Paul in 54/58, and for most of the provinces even before that time: namely, from the moment when Paul transferred his chief activity to Macedonia, Achaia, and Asia. In regard to Peter's stay in Rome, for which 1 Pet. 5:13 is an argument (it is certainly to be put later than the end of Paul's trial), and in regard to the question whether it was in the persecution after the fire in Rome (July 64) that he suffered martyrdom (cp Clem. Rom. 5), see PETER. The assumption of a contemporaneous martyrdom of Paul and Peter finds no support in the earliest documents: see above, § 79.

2. John.—As to John's residence in Ephesus and his end, see JOHN.

3. Whilst the persecution under Nero was doubtless in the main limited to Rome, the last years of Domitian, especially in Asia Minor, in consequence of the insistence on the worship of the Emperor, may have been a period of many conflicts with Christianity.²

To this time (say 93–96) many scholars assign Hebrews and 1 Peter (while others carry them down to the reign 84. NT writings. of Trajan), as well as the Apocalypse of John (see the special articles). Not much later, perhaps about the end of the first century, were written Ephesians, the Third Gospel, and Acts. Our Gospel of Mark must, apart possibly from some later additions, have been written before this; there is no need to suppose a much later date than 70. The Fourth Gospel, after which, probably, came the Johannine epistles, can well, by reason of its near relation to Lk. and for other reasons, have been written at the same time as, or not long after, the Third Gospel. The first third of the second century best suits the latest books of the NT—Matthew, the Pastoral Epistles, and James, all of them doubtless products of the Roman church. Jude may have been written somewhat earlier, 2 Peter somewhat later. See the Introductions to the NT and Harnack, Chronologie, 246-50, 245 f., 451-64, 475-91, 651-81.

CHRYSOLEITE (χρυσολιθός), one of the foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse (Rev. 21.10). It is not improbable that in ancient times the term was applied to a particular shade of BERYL (g.v.). See PRECIOUS STONES. In modern usage Chrysolite is the name generally given to the yellow or yellowish-green varieties of olivine, the transparent varieties being known as peridote (cp TOPAZ).

χρυσόλιθος in 6 is used to translate τὰριζ in Ex. 28.20 89.31 Ezek. 28.13 (cp Ezek. 1.16 Aq. [BAQ transliterate], Dan. 10.6 Theod. [see S.w.]). In Ezek. 28.13 AVmg. has 'chrysolite,' but elsewhere EV 'beryl,' which more probably represents ὁὴμα; see BERYL, § 3, TARSHISH, STONE OF.

CHRYSOPRASE, CHRYSOPRASUS (χρυσοπρασός), one of the foundations of the wall of the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse (Rev. 21.10†). In ancient times the term was perhaps applied to a shade of BERYL; cp PRECIOUS STONES.

The word does not occur in 6; 1 but AVmg. has 'chrysoprase' for בִּרְקִי, kadhkaddh, in Ezek. 27.16 where AV has 'agate' and RV 'ruby' (see CHALCEDONY); and has 'chrysoprase' also for נֶפֶךְ, nephekh, in Ezek. 28.13, where EV has 'emerald' and RVmg. 'carbuncle' (see CARBUNCLE, EMERALD). In mod. mineralogy the chrysoprase is an agate coloured apple-green by the presence of oxide of nickel.

CHUB, RV CUB (כֹּבֶץ; Aq., Sym., Theod. χοῦβαλ), if correct, is the name of a people (Ezek. 30.5†); but 6BAQ has λιβυεῖς, and Cornill is doubtless right in regarding כֹּבֶץ, Cub, as a corruption of לוֹב, Lub, which occurs repeatedly in the plural form LUBIM (g.v.). See also MINGLED PEOPLE.

CHUN, RV CUN (כֻּנַּי, 1 Ch. 188), an Aramæan city identified by Ges.-Buhl (following ZDPV 834) with the modern Kunā (Rom. Cunna) between Laodicea and Hierapolis. The reading Chun is, however, certainly corrupt (cp Ki. in SBOT). See BEROETHAI, and, for a suggested emendation, MEROM.

CHURCH (ἐκκλησία). I. Name and Idea.—The word Ecclesia has an important history behind it when it first appears in Christian literature. It

1. History of word. was the regular designation of the assembly of the whole body of citizens in a free Greek state, 'called out' or summoned to the transaction of public business. It had then been employed by the Greek translators of the OT as a natural rendering of the Hebrew קהל (see ASSEMBLY), the whole 'congregation' of Israel, regarded in its entirety as the people of God. A less technical Greek usage, current in the apostolic age, is illustrated by the disorderly assemblage in the theatre at Ephesus (Acts 19.32-41), where we find also by way of contrast a reference to 'the lawful assembly' (v. 39, ἐν τῇ ἐννόμῳ ἐκκλησίᾳ). The Jewish usage is found in Stephen's speech when he speaks of Moses as having been 'in the church in the wilderness' (7.38). Thus the traditions of the word enabled it to appeal alike to Jews and Gentiles as a fitting designation of the new people of God, the Christian society regarded as a corporate whole.

In this full sense we find it in Jesus' declaration to Peter, 'I will build my church' (οἰκοδομήσω μου τὴν ἐκκλησίαν; Mt. 16.18). Here it is regarded as the divine house that is to

2. NT usage in Gospels. be builded, 'the keys' of which are to be placed in the apostle's hands: see BINDING AND LOOSING. It is thus equated with 'the kingdom of heaven' which Christ has come to establish, each of the designations being derived from the past history of the sacred commonwealth. The force of the phrase, as well as the emphasis given by the position of the pronoun in the original, comes out if for a moment we venture to substitute the word 'Israel' for the word 'church' (Hort); and the thought thus finds a parallel in the quotation of Amos 9.11 f. in Acts 15.16 f., 'I will build again the tabernacle of David which is fallen down.'

The only other passage where the word occurs in the Gospels is Mt. 18.17, where 'the church' is contrasted with the 'one or two more' whom the erring brother has refused to hear. We are here again reminded of the whole congregation of Israel from which offenders were cut off: the delinquent becomes henceforth as one who belongs to the 'nations' outside, and as a traitor to the chosen people (ὡς περ ὁ ἐθνικός καὶ ὁ τελώνης). It is possible indeed that the primary reference in this place may be to the Jewish ecclesia; but if so, the principle remains unchanged for the Christian ecclesia; and in either case, while some local embodiment of the Church is thought of as the means by which action is taken, the meaning is that the whole weight of the divine society is to be brought to bear upon the offender.

While the Christian society is still confined within the walls of Jerusalem, 'the church' is the designation of

3. In Acts. the whole body of the believers, as contrasted with the other residents in the city (Acts 5:11 cp 8:13); but it is possible that the appellation is here due to the historian himself, recounting the events many years later. When, as the result of Stephen's testimony and death, believers are to be found in all parts of Palestine, they are still summed up in the same single word: 'the church' (RV; not 'the churches,' AV) throughout the whole of Judæa and Galilee and Samaria had peace, being builded' (Acts 9:31; cp Mt. 16:18 as above). The same full sense of the

4. In Paul. word is found in Paul's epistles at a time when Christian communities were established in various cities of Asia Minor and of Greece: apostles, prophets, and teachers are set 'in the church' by God (1 Cor. 12:28); 'the church of God' is contrasted with Jews and Greeks (10:32).

The Church is thus the new chosen people: it is 'the Israel of God' (cp Gal. 6:16). Jews and Gentiles who enter it are merged into unity; the two are made one (Eph. 2:14-16). It is 'the body of Christ,' and as such inseparable from him. Christ and the Church are not two, but one—as it was written of earthly marriage, 'they twain shall be one flesh' (Eph. 5:31 f.). The main practical anxiety of Paul's life appears to have been the preservation of the scattered communities of Christians, which had sprung up under his preaching, in a living unity with the earlier communities of Palestine, so as to form with them a single whole, the undivided and indivisible representative of Christ in the world.

It is noteworthy that Peter never uses the word ecclesia. Yet, in spite of the absence both of this

5. In Peter. word and of the Pauline metaphor of 'the body,' no writer displays such a wealth of imagery in describing the holy society. Once he speaks of it as 'a holy nation' (1 Pet. 2:9), twice as a 'people' (2:9, 10), twice as a 'house' (2:5, 4:17), twice as a 'flock' (5:2, 3), twice as a 'priesthood' (2:5, 9), and twice again, in a word wholly his own, as a 'brotherhood' ('Love the brotherhood,' 2:17: 'your brotherhood which is in the world,' 5:9).

Side by side with the full sense of the word ecclesia we find another and a wholly natural use of it, which

6. Of local churches. seems at first sight to conflict with the conception of unity which is dominant in the passages we have hitherto examined. The new 'Israel of God,' like its predecessor, was scattered over a wide area. Wherever Christians were gathered as such, there was the Church of God. Hence we find such an expression as 'at Antioch, in the church, there were prophets and teachers' (κατὰ τὴν οὖσαν ἐκκλησίαν), the participle throwing emphasis upon the noun, 'in what was the church,' Acts 13:1; and again, 'the church of God which is in Corinth'; and even, 'the church that is in their house' (Rom. 16:5). In all these cases the sense of unity may be felt: it is the one Church, thought of as existing in various localities. From this, however, it is an easy passage to speak of 'the church of the Thessalonians' (1 Thess. 1:1, 2 Thess. 1:1); and even to use the word in the plural, 'the churches of Galatia' or 'of Asia' (1 Cor. 16:1, 19), 'the churches of God' (2 Thess. 1:4). The transition is naturally found on Greek ground, where the use of ecclesia in the plural would be helped by its common employment for the ecclesia of Greek cities; whereas in Palestine, where the Jewish connotation of the word was more sensibly felt, it was more natural to speak of the local representative of the ecclesia under the designation of synagoga (cp Jas. 2:2).

The churches, then, are the local embodiments of the Church: the distribution of the one into many is purely geographical. The unity remains

7. Outside Canon. unaffected: there is no other Church than

'the church of God.' When we pass outside the canon we find the same conception of the Church both as a living unity and as the divinely pre-ordained successor to the ancient Israel. Thus in the Shepherd the Church appears to Hermas as an aged woman, even as Sion had appeared to Esdras as a barren woman (4 Esd. 9:38, 10:44). She is aged, 'because she was created first of all things, and for her sake the world was made' (Herm. Vis. 24). Again, in the ancient homily formerly ascribed to Clement of Rome (chap. 14), we read of the pre-existent, spiritual Church, 'created before sun and moon,' and manifested at length in the flesh. In the Valentinian system, moreover, Ecclesia appears as one of the æons. Cp, too, Clem. Alex. Protrept. 8, Strom. iv. 8. The earliest use of the term 'the Catholic Church' (Ignat. Smyrn. 8: circa 117, Lightf.) emphasises the unity and universality of the whole in contrast with the individual congregations; not, as in the later technical sense, its orthodoxy in contrast with heretical systems: 'Wherever Jesus Christ is, there is the catholic church' (ἐκεῖ ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία).

II. Organisation.—The primitive conception of the Church thus regards it (a) as essentially one, admitting

8. Primitive conception. of no plurality except such as is due to local distribution, and (b) as succeeding to the peculiar position of privilege hitherto occupied by the sacred Jewish Commonwealth, so that even Paul in writing to Gentiles thinks of it as 'the Israel of God.' In correspondence with the two parts of this conception it is natural to expect in the development of its organisation (a) a general unity in spite of local and temporary variety, and (b) a tendency, both at the outset and from time to time afterwards, to look back to the more prominent features of Jewish religious institutions. Weekly gatherings for liturgical worship, the recognition of holy seasons and holy books, are examples of elements of religious life which passed over naturally and at once from the Jewish to the Christian Church; and these were elements which the experience of the scattered Judaism of the Dispersion had proved and warranted as amongst the strongest bonds of practical unity.

Had the apostles separated immediately after Pentecost for the evangelisation of the world, it might easily

9. Earliest period. have happened that, while the general needs of the societies founded by their labours were, to a large extent, the same in various districts, the institutions developed to meet those needs might have presented a most astonishing variety. As a matter of fact such a mode of procedure on their part was impossible. The direct command of Christ had indicated Jerusalem as the first scene of their work; but, even apart from this, the very clearness with which from the first they recognised the new society to be the divinely appointed issue and climax of the old, must have hindered them from perceiving at once all that was involved in the complementary truth of its universality. As a matter of fact they clung to the sacred centre of the old national life until the development of events gradually forced them into a wider sphere. Hence a period of years was passed within Jerusalem itself, and in the most intimate relation with the religious institutions of the Jewish people, of whom, at that time, all the believers formed an integral part. Accordingly the new society had time to grow into a consciousness of its own corporate life within a limited area; the pressure of practical difficulties led to the experiment of institutions specially designed to meet them; and, when the earlier limitations began gradually to disappear in consequence of Stephen's wider conceptions and the crisis which they brought upon his fellow-believers, and the society was now scattered like seed over the countries, this corporate life had already given signs of an organised growth, and the home church at Jerusalem had become in some sense a pattern which could not fail to influence all subsequent foundations. These first years in Jerusalem, then, demand careful study, if the development of Christian institutions is to be securely traced.

The brotherhood which was formed by the baptism of the earliest converts, at the outset, practically a

10. A Jewish guild. guild of Judaism, faithful to the ancient creed and worship, and with no thought of a severance from the religious life of the nation. Its distinctive mark was not the neglect of Jewish ordinances, but the adherence to new duties and privileges of its own. 'They were continuing steadfastly in the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, the breaking of bread and the prayers' (Acts 2.42). The temple worship was not forsaken (3.1); but it was supplemented (2.46) by the 'breaking of bread at home.' The first note of this brotherhood was its unity: 'they had one heart and soul' (4.32); they claimed nothing that they possessed as their private right, but held all as a trust for the good of the whole; they would even on occasion sell their property and bring the proceeds to the apostles for distribution to the needy (4.32-35). As the numbers increased, these simple and extemporaneous methods were found to be inadequate. Thus the common tables, at which the poorer dependents received their daily provision, proved an occasion of friction between the two elements of Hebrew and Greek-speaking Jews, of which the brotherhood, from the

11. The 'seven.' outset, was composed. Organisation was necessitated, if the unity of the body was to remain unimpaired; and seven men were accordingly appointed to 'serve tables' (6.1-6). [On the criticism of these narratives cp COMMUNITY OF GOODS.]

Thus was made the first essay in providing for the discharge of the functions of the whole body through representative members. No distinctive title is given by the historian to these seven men. Their office was to serve (διακονεῖν); in respect of it, therefore, they could be¹ termed servants (διδάκονοι); but it is probable that the word 'deacon' remained for some time a mere description of function, rather than a title such as it afterwards became. The naturalness of this institution—the response to a new need which was certain in some form or other to recur, wherever the society was planted—is a most important feature of it. There is no reason to suppose that it was suggested by any Jewish institution. The number of the persons chosen was a natural number in a community consisting of Jews; but the institution itself was a purely spontaneous development, designed to meet a necessity which was wholly new.

Thus far we find but two kinds of distinction which in any way mark off individual members of the society

12. The apostles. from the general mass. The apostles are the natural leaders: to them all look, both for religious teaching and for practical guidance; through them discipline on one memorable occasion is enforced; it is they who suggest a remedy for the first difficulty which was occasioned by increasing numbers; and their hands are laid on the seven men whom, at their bidding, the whole brotherhood has selected to serve on its behalf. The seven, on the other hand, are ordained to humble duties; their function is not to rule, but to serve; through them the society fulfils its common responsibility of providing for the needs of its poorer members.

The dispersion after Stephen's death distracts our attention from the Church in Jerusalem for a while.

13. The 'elders.' Some years later, when the apostles had begun to evangelise other parts of Palestine, we get another glimpse of it at a time of threatened famine. Contributions are sent from the disciples at Antioch to aid the poorer brethren in Judaea; it is not to the apostles, however, that the gifts are brought, but to 'the elders' (Acts 11.30), a class of which we now hear for the first time in the Christian Church. Thus it would seem that the necessity of leaving the apostles free for wider work had issued in a further development of organisation in Jerusalem; but it is only incidentally that we learn that a new step has been taken. We have no indication in Acts of the relation of 'the seven' to these 'elders.'

Peter's imprisonment, which immediately follows, is the occasion of a further notice bearing on the practical

14. James. government of the church in Jerusalem. 'Tell these things to James and to the brethren,' says the apostle after his release (12.17). The position of prominence thus indicated for 'the brother of the Lord' prepares us for the leading part which he subsequently takes in the conference of the apostles and elders, when a question of vital importance has been referred from Antioch to Jerusalem (15.13). Many years later, when Paul arrives on an important errand, his first act is thus described by an eye-witness: 'On the morrow Paul entered in with us unto James, and all the elders came together' (21.18). It is clear, then, that James had come to occupy a unique position in the church at Jerusalem—a position gained, it may be, by no formal accession to power, resulting rather from his relationship to Jesus and his well-known sanctity of life; yet a position clearly recognised by the apostles, and foreshadowing the climax of a series of developments in the universally established rule of the monarchical episcopate.

We have thus, in the early history of the church in Jerusalem, notices, for the most part merely incidental, 15. Summary. of the gradual development of organisation in response to the growing necessities of a corporate life. The humblest offices of the daily service (ἡ καθημερινὴ διακονία) by which the bodily needs of the poorer members were supplied, are discharged by the church through seven representatives. The guidance of the whole body is found to have devolved upon men whose title of 'elders' reminds us of the elders of the Jewish people; and in this case there is no reason for doubting that the new institution was directly suggested by the old. These elders are the medium by which the church in Jerusalem holds formal intercourse with the church elsewhere. Lastly, at the head of all, but acting in close concert with the elders, we see James holding an undefined but unmistakable position of authority.

We must be careful to avoid a confusion between this development of administrative organs of the body

16. Teachers, etc. and that other form of service, rendered to it by those who discharged the various functions of evangelisation, exhortation, and instruction (ἡ διακονία τοῦ λόγου, Acts 6.4). The two kinds of service might often meet in the same persons: thus, at the outset, the apostles themselves were, necessarily, at once the instructors and the administrators of the society—at their feet, for example, gifts for the community were laid, as at a later time they were brought to the elders—and, on the other hand, we read of 'Philip the evangelist, who was one of the seven' (21.8). Quite apart from these, however, we have a mention of 'prophets,' of whom Agabus is one, as coming from Jerusalem (11.27).

The incidental nature of the references to those who discharged these functions of administration and instruction prevents us from knowing to what extent the church in Antioch resembled in its organisation the church in Jerusalem. We only learn that it contained

'prophets and teachers' (131): we hear nothing of its elders or other officers. When, however, Paul and

17. Paul's Barnabas, going forth from the church in Antioch, founded communities in various cities of Asia Minor, they appointed, we are expressly told, elders to administer them (1423). In this they probably reproduced an institution already known at Antioch, with which both of them had together been brought into contact in Jerusalem (1130).

As Paul travelled farther west, and Christian societies sprang up in a more purely Greek soil, the Church's independence of Judaism became continually clearer; and we might reasonably expect to find elements of Greek social life exerting an influence upon the development of Christian organisation. At the same time we must bear in mind that Paul himself was a Jew, that to the Jews in every place he made his first appeal, that his epistles indicate that there was a considerable Jewish element among those to whom he wrote, and that we have clear evidence that, at first, at any rate, his organisation of administration was based upon a Jewish precedent. In his earliest letters to a European church Paul urges the recognition and esteem of 'those who labour among you and preside over you in the Lord, and admonish you,' thus implying a local administration, though not further defining it (1 Thess. 512); but at the same time he demands absolute obedience to the injunctions which he sends them in the joint names of himself and Silvanus and Timotheus (2 Thess. 314).

If we try to draw from the study of Paul's epistles a picture of a Christian society in a Greek city, we may start by observing that the members of it are distinguished one from another mainly by their spiritual 'gifts' (χαρίσματα). Of these the highest is prophecy, which is freely and sometimes distractingly exercised, by any who possess it, in the ordinary meetings of the society. Other gifts too, such as those of healing, give a certain natural pre-eminence to their possessors. Over all we recognise the undefined but overshadowing authority of the apostolic founder. Such is the most elementary stage, and we cannot sharply distinguish it from that which immediately follows. Leading men fall into classes, with obvious divisions (not in any sense stereotyped orders) separating them from the general mass: apostles, prophets, teachers—clear grades of spiritual prestige, though by no means marked off as a hierarchy. The teachers are mainly local in the exercise of their functions; the prophets are local to some extent, but moving from church to church, and recognised everywhere in virtue of their gift; the apostles are not local, but essentially itinerant, belonging to the whole Church.

This ministry expresses the more distinctly spiritual side of the Church's activities. But the community needs, besides, to be governed; and discipline must be exercised in the case of unworthy members. It must have representatives who can formally act on its behalf, either in dealing with individuals or in carrying on communications with sister communities.

Again, there are other functions of the Church's life which call for executive officers. The care of the sick and the poor was a primary duty; so, too, was the exercise of the Church's hospitality to travelling brethren. These duties involved an administration of the common funds collected for such purposes, and generally of corporate property. Servants of the Church were thus called for to perform these humble but necessary functions, and responsible superintendents to see that they were duly performed. This class of executive ministers we find in the 'bishops and deacons' (ἐπίσκοποι καὶ διάκονοι) whom Paul greets in the opening words of his epistle to the Philippians; and the qualifications demanded of them in the Pastoral Epistles afford valuable indications of the nature of their service.

All these elements of moral or formal authority would be more or less distinctly present in every community, expressing the activity and life of the community itself in various forms. In different localities development would proceed at different rates of progress; but in all, the same general needs would have to be met, and inter-communication would help towards a comparatively uniform result. The earlier and the more rapidly developing societies would serve as a natural model to the rest.

In speaking thus we do not lose sight of the controlling inspiration of the divine Spirit promised by Jesus to be the Church's guide. We rather recognise the presence of a continuous inspiration, developing from within the growth of a living organism, not promulgating a code of rules to be imposed from without upon each community at its foundation.

The scanty and scattered notices of church organisation in the NT need, for their interpretation, all the light that can be thrown upon them by the 18. The practice of Christian communities, so far as it can be ascertained from the remains of their earliest literature. Here again, however, the evidence is still sparse and incidental, though of late years it has been increased, especially by the recovery (1883) of the Teaching of the Apostles. The date of this book is quite uncertain. It is of a composite nature and preserves very early documents in a modified form. There is no agreement among scholars as to the locality to which it belongs. It may represent a community lying outside the general stream of development and preserving, even to the middle of the second century, a primitive condition which had elsewhere, for the most part, passed away. This view does not materially lessen its value as an illustration of an early stage of Christian life; but we must be careful not to generalise hastily from its statements when they lack confirmation from other quarters.

In the Teaching (chaps. 7 ff.), then, we have instructions relating to BAPTISM (g.v., § 3), fasting, and the EUCHARIST (g.v.). The following chapters introduce us to apostles and prophets; they provide tests for their genuineness, and instructions as to the honour to be paid to them. The apostles travel from place to place, making but the briefest stay; the prophets appear to be the most prominent persons in the community in which they reside (see PROPHET). In comparison with them, bishops and deacons seem to hold but a secondary place. The community is charged to appoint fit persons to these offices, and not to despise them; 'for they too minister the ministry of the prophets and teachers.' There is no mention whatever of presbyters. In all this we seem to be on the verge of a transition. The ministry of extraordinary gifts is still dominant; but the abuses to which it is liable are keenly felt: the humbler local ministry, though despised by comparison, has the future before it.¹

Other illustrations from the early literature will be found under BISHOP (§ 14 f.). It must suffice here to

19. End of say in conclusion that, before the close of the second century, the long process of 2nd cent. development had issued in a threefold ministry—a bishop, presbyters, and deacons—being at length generally recognised in all Christian churches. In point of time, as well as of method, we have an exact parallel to this development both in the settlement of the canon and in the formulation of the Apostolic Creed. The more abundant literature of the end of the second century shows us a generally accepted standard of ministry, of canon, and of creed. In each case the need of definiteness and of general uniformity had gradually made itself felt, and the Christian consciousness, guided and expressed by eminent leaders, had slowly solved the problems presented to it. In each case we have evidence of that growth which is the

CILICIA (ΚΙΛΙΚΙΑ [Ti. WH]). From southern Cappadocia the range of Taurus descends in a SW.

1. Physical. direction to the sea, reaching it in a complex of mountains constituting that projection of coast which divides the bay of Issus (Skanderūn) from that of Pamphylia. The Cilicians extended partly over the Taurus itself, and partly between it and the sea (Strabo, 668), thus bordering upon Pamphylia in the W., and Lycania and Cappadocia in the N.; in the E. the lofty range of Amanus separated them from Syria. The country within these boundaries falls into two strongly marked sections.

'Of Cilicia beyond Taurus a part [W.] is called Tracheia (rugged), and the rest [E.] Pedias (plain). The former has a narrow seaboard, and little or no level country: that part of it which lies under Taurus is equally mountainous, and is thinly inhabited as far as the northern flanks of the range—as far, that is, as Isaura and Pisidia. This district bears the name Trachei-otis. Cilicia Pedias extends from Soli and Tarsus as far as Issus, and as far N. as the Cappadocians on the N. flank of Taurus. This section consists for the most part of plains and fertile land' (L.c.).

Four considerable streams—Pyramus, Sarus, Cydnus, and Calycadnus—descend from Taurus to the bay of Issus. For a long time the rude W. district remained practically outside the pale of civilisation: we are here concerned only with the eastern part, Cilicia Pedias or Campestris. Difficult passes, of which there are only a few, lead through the mountains into the neighbouring districts. The famous Pylæ Cilicæ, some 30 miles N. of Tarsus, gave access to Cappadocia and W. Asia Minor; in the other direction the Syrian Gates and the pass of Beilam communicated with Syria; through these two passes ran the E. trade route from Ephesus. The military importance of the Cilician plain thus included within the angle of the Taurus and Amanus ranges is finely expressed by Herodian (34).

Owing to the barriers of Mount Taurus, the geographical affinity of Cilicia is with Syria rather than with Asia

Minor. It would be only natural, therefore, 2. In OT. that there should be references to it in OT (cp also AŠUR-BANI-PAL, § 4, end). Nor are these wanting. Archæological criticism indicates three OT names¹ as more or less certainly meaning Cilicia.² The first is CAPHTOR (q.v., § 4), which, however, probably had a more extended application, and referred to coast-regions of Asia Minor besides Cilicia. Caphtor was the first home of the Philistines; it probably represents the Egyptian Keftû. The second is Kuš or Kuah (קֹּחַ)—i.e., E. Cilicia³—from which Solomon imported horses, as we learn from the emended text of 1 K. 10:28 (see HORSE, § 3, n.). The third is Helak, the Hīlakku of the Assyrians, which has been restored by Halévy (Mélanges, 74, p. 69), Geiger (Jüd. Zt. 11:242), and Lagarde (Mittheil. 1211) in Ezek. 27:11 (MT has the impossible חֲזִיז 'thine army'; read 'the sons of Arvad and of Helak'). The same name probably occurs in Egyptian inscriptions under the form Ka-ra-ki-ša, originally Kīlakk(u).¹ It follows from Halévy's restoration that there was, according to Ezekiel, a Cilician as well as a Phœnician and a Syrian element in the garrison of Tyre in 586 B.C.

² The land of Mušri also, which adjoined Kuš (Wi. Gesch. Bab. u. Ass. 175), must have included a part of Cilicia (cp MIZRAIM, § 2 a).

The close physical relation of Cilicia and Syria explains their political connection during the early

3. Later. Roman Empire. Cilicia was usually under the legatus of Syria (Dio Cass. 53:12 where Cœle-Syria, Phœnicia, Cilicia, Cyprus are ἐν τῇ τοῦ Καίσαρος μερίδι; cp Tac. Ann. 2:78). Cilicia is found under a separate governor, however, in 57 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 13:33), perhaps as a temporary measure after the disturbances of 52 A.D. (Ann. 12:55). Vespasian is credited with its reconstruction as a distinct province, in 74 A.D.; but his action was apparently confined to the reduction of part of Cilicia Tracheia to the form of a province, which was united with that of eastern Cilicia (Suet. Vesp. 8). In 117-138 A.D. Cilicia, including Tracheia, was certainly an imperial province, under a prætorian legatus Augusti; but in what year this state of things began is not known. No inference can be drawn from the use of the word 'province' (ἐπαρχία) in the question of Felix (Acts 23:34). The connection between Cilicia and Syria is illustrated in the NT by such passages as Acts 15:23-41 Gal. 1:21, where 'Syria and Cilicia' are almost a single term; and conversely the omission of Cilicia from the superscription of 1 Pet. 1:1, where the enumeration of provinces sums up all Asia Minor N. of the Taurus, is based upon the close connection between the churches in Cilicia and the church of Antioch in Syria.

The presence of Jews in Cilicia must date principally from the time when it became part of the Syrian kingdom (cp Jos. Ant. xii. 3:4). It must have been the hill-men of Cilicia Tracheia that served in the guard of Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 13:5, B/i. 4:3). In apostolic times the Jewish settlers were many and influential (Acts 6:9).

Paul visited his native province soon after his conversion (Acts 9:30 Gal. 1:21), and possibly founded then the churches of which we hear in Acts 15:23-41. It is probable that in his 'second missionary journey' he followed the usual commercial route across the Taurus to Derbe (Acts 15:41; cp Str. 537).

One article of Cilician export is interesting to the student of the NT. The goats'-hair cloth called Cilicium was exported to be used in tent-making (cp Varro, R.R. 2:11). Paul was taught this trade, and supported himself by means of it in the house of Aquila at Corinth (Acts 18:3 and elsewhere; cp Acts 20:34). (See Sterrett, 'Routes in Cilicia,' in Arch. Inst. Amer. 36.) W. J. W.

CINNAMON (קִּינָמון; KINNĀMŌMON [-OC] [BNAFL: Ti. WH]; Ex. 30:23 Pr. 7:17 Cant. 4:14 Rev. 18:13†) bears the same name in Hebrew as in Greek and English, and this is almost certainly a word borrowed from the farther East.² Lagarde (Uebers. 199) maintains that Hebrew borrowed the name from Greek; but against this there is the statement of Herodotus (3:111) that the Greeks learned the word from the Phœnicians.

Kinnāmōn is the fragrant inner bark of Cinnamomum zeylanicum. Nees that is now called cinnamon. As is correctly stated by Plüsch. and Hanb. (520), however, 'none of the cinnamon of the ancients was obtained from Ceylon,'³ and 'the early notices of cinnamon as a product of Ceylon are not prior to the thirteenth century' (ib. 468). Accordingly, it is probable that, as these writers suggest, the cinnamon of the ancients was Cassia lignea, which was obtained, as it is still, from S. China.¹ The source of this is Cinnamomum Cassia, Bl., as has been shown by Sir W. Thiselton-Dyer in Journ. Linn. Soc. 20.19 ff. The name cinnamomifera regio, given to the district W. of Cape Guardafui, must be taken in a loose sense as referring to the commerce of the Erythraean Sea. Like lign-aloes, cinnamon was thus brought along the regular trade-route from E. Asia. See ALOES, § 3.

From whatever source cinnamon was obtained, it appears thrice in the OT among aromatic spices, and in Rev. 18.13 among the merchandise of the apocalyptic Babylon. Thus the Jews must have been tolerably familiar with it. See CASSIA, INCENSE, § 6.

Yöre dē'ah, § 264) and to the literature cited at the end of this article. It was performed not only on the (male) children of the Israelites, but also upon all slaves (as being members of the household and sharers in its worship), whether born within the house or brought in from abroad (Gen. 17.22 ff.)—a usage which plainly points to a great antiquity. In P it is enjoined that all aliens (גֵּרִים) who desire to join in the Passover shall be circumcised (Ex. 12.48); in the Græco-Roman period it was also the condition for the admission of proselytes.

The age for receiving the rite is fixed by the Law for the eighth day after birth (Lev. 12.3, cp Gen. 21.4 [P], etc.); even on the sabbath the sacred ordinance had to be observed (Jn. 7.22 Shabb. 19.2 ff.), although in case of sickness of the child a short delay was permitted (cp ZDMG 20.529 [66]). For the performance of the office all adult male Israelites were fully qualified; but customarily the duty fell to the head of the house (Gen.
17.23 ff.). That in the earlier times it could be performed (of course only in exceptional cases) by women appears from Ex. 4.25; but this was not allowed by later custom.
According to Josephus (Ant. xx. 2.4) it was not unusual to employ the physician; at the present day it is the business of a specially-appointed official, the mohel.

At the close of the first century B.C. the naming of the child accompanied his circumcision (cp Lk. 1.59 2.21);
but there is no indication of any such usage in the OT; indeed, in the older times, the two things were wholly dissociated, the child receiving its name as soon as it was born (cp, for example, Gen. 21.3 29.31 ff. 30.6 ff. 35.
18 38 28 ff., etc.).

The origin of the rite among the Hebrews is obscure.
One of the views represented in the OT is that it was

2. Hebrew introduced by Joshua (Josh. 5.2 ff.), who, at legends. the 'Hill of the Foreskins,'² by divine command circumcised the people with knives of flint, and thereby rolled away 'the reproach of Egypt,'
'wherefore the name of that place was called Gilgal (i.e.
'rolling') unto this day.' Verses 4-7 are an interpolation designed to bring the narrative into conformity with the view of P that circumcision had merely been in abeyance during the years of wandering; cp Hollenberg in Sz.
Az., '74, 493 ff. St. in ZATW 6.132 ff. ('86), and are to do violence to the narrative, can only be interpreted as meaning that in that country the children of Israel had been uncircumcised, and therefore objects of contempt and scorn. It is impossible, however, to regard the narrative in Joshua as strictly historical; it belongs rather to the category of etymologizing legend, being designed to explain the name and origin of the sanctuary of Gilgal. Possibly Stade is right in his conjecture (see above) that the legend arose from the circumstance that in ancient times the young men of Benjamin or of certain Benjamite families were circumcised on the Hill of the Foreskins at Gilgal. See GILGAL.

Another view of the origin of the rite is given in the account of the circumcision of the son of Moses (Ex. 4.
25 ff. [J]), for here also the intention manifestly is to describe its first introduction among the Israelites; there is no suggestion of any idea that it had been a long-standing Hebrew custom. The general meaning of the story is that Moses had incurred the anger of Yahwè, and made himself liable to the penalty of death, because he was not 'a bridegroom of blood'—i.e., because he had not, before his marriage, submitted himself to this rite. Zipporah accordingly takes a flint, circumcises the son instead of her husband, and thereby symbolically makes the latter a 'bridegroom of blood,' whereby the wrath of Yahwè is appeased (see We. Prol. (4) 345).

Both narratives notwithstanding, it is necessary to carry back the origin of this rite among the Hebrews to a much earlier date. True, it is no sufficient 3. Early proof of this that P (Gen. 17) carries it back origin. to Abraham, and that everywhere in the Law the custom is assumed to be of extreme antiquity. More to the point are the facts that Gen. 34 also represents it as pre-Mosaic, while the use of knives of flint (which was long kept up; see Ex. 4.25 Josh. 5.2 ff.) also indicates a high antiquity. What most of all compels us to this conclusion, however, is the well-ascertained fact that circumcision was in no way a practice peculiar to the Israelites. It was common to a number of Semitic peoples in antiquity: Edom, Ammon, Moab all were circumcised (Jer. 9.25 [26]); of the nations of Palestine the Philistines alone were not (cp, for example, Herod. 2.36 f. 104);

the Arabs also practised this rite, which, in the Koran, is taken for granted as a firmly-established custom. Nor is it less widely diffused among non-Semitic races.¹ Of special interest for us here is its existence among the Egyptians; for from a very early period we meet with the view that, within the lands of the ancient civilisations, circumcision had its native home in Egypt, from which it had spread not only to the other peoples of Africa, but also to the Semites of Asia (so Herod. 2.36.204 Diod.
Sic. 3.31 Strabo 17.824). It certainly was known in Egypt from the earliest times (Ebers, Egypt u. d. Bb.
Mos. 1.283), and we have the express testimony of Herodotus (2.36) and Philo (2.210, ed. Mangey) that all Egyptians were circumcised (cp Josh. 5.2 ff., where the same thing is presupposed; Erman, Egypt, 32 f. 539; Ebers, op. cit. 278 ff.), although, it is true, their testimony has not been allowed to pass wholly unquestioned.
One piece of evidence for the Egyptian origin of the rite would be the fact that to the Semites of the Euphrates, who had no direct contact with Egypt, circumcision was unknown. In any case, however, it would be illegitimate to suppose that it was borrowed from Egypt directly by the Hebrews—say, for example, at the time of the sojourn in Egypt; for the nomads of the Sinaitic peninsula appear to have practised it from a very remote period.

As to the original meaning of the rite equally divergent views have been held. The explanations offered fall in

4. Views of the main into two groups—(1) The sanitary: Herodotus asserts that the meaning. Egyptians had adopted it simply for the sake of cleanliness, whilst other ancient writers regard it as a prophylactic against certain forms of disease (Phil. de Circumcis. 2210, ed. Mangey; Jos. c. Ap. 213). A similar theory is still put forward here and there by various nations (cp Ploss, op. cit.), and it was in great favour with the rationalists of last century (see, e.g., Michaelis, Mos. Recht, 4186; also Saalschütz, Mos. Recht, 1246). Recent anthropologists, such as Ploss, give greater prominence to the fact that with many peoples (if not with most) circumcision stands, or originally stood, closely connected with marriage, and regard it as an operation preparatory to the exercise of the marital functions, suggested by the belief that fruitfulness is thereby promoted (so already Philo, loc. cit.; cp CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, § 4). (2) The religious: It is impossible to decide the question by mere reference to the present conditions, or to the explanation which ancient or modern peoples themselves give. On the one hand, it is not to be expected that the original meaning of the act should be permanently remembered; on the other hand, evidence can be adduced in support of either theory. There are broad general considerations, however, which lead inevitably to the conclusion that, in the last resort, the explanation is to be sought in the sphere of religion. All the world over, in every uncivilised people, whether of ancient or of modern times, practices such as this are called into existence, not by medical knowledge, but by religious ideas. It is to the belief about the gods and to the worship of the gods that all primitive ethics must be traced. In this there is nothing to prevent practices, grown unintelligible through the religious motives having gradually faded into the background, being supplied with other reasons, in this case, sanitary. On the other hand, inasmuch as, to judge by its wide diffusion, circumcision must have arisen spontaneously and independently in more places than one, there is nothing to exclude the possibility of diverse origins.

The primarily religious nature of circumcision being granted, we must nevertheless be careful not to carry back to the earlier times the interpretation put upon it by later Judaism. According to P the rite is a symbolical act of purification (in the ritual sense); the foreskin represents the unclean. This conception of circumcision is presupposed in the symbolical applications of the expression to be met with in the discourses of the prophets (see below, § 7). For the earlier period, however, we have no evidence of the presence of any such idea, nor is there any analogous conception to make its existence probable. The notion so frequently brought forward in explanation of the idea,—that the sexual life, as such, was regarded as sinful,—is in truth nowhere to be met with in the OT. The ancient conceptions of clean and unclean are all of them of a wholly different nature; see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN.

In general, circumcision is to be regarded as a ritual tribal mark. This view is favoured by several considerations. Not only among the Jews, but also among the Egyptians and most other peoples by whom circumcision is practised, the uncircumcised are regarded as unclean—i.e., as aliens from the tribe and its worship—and as such are looked upon by the circumcised with contempt. Among peoples who do not practise circumcision we find analogous tribal marks; filing or removal of teeth, special tattooings, in some cases still more drastic mutilations of the sexual organs (semi-castration and the like). Finally, with most peoples, circumcision used to be performed at the age of puberty. By its means the grown-up youth was formally admitted among the men, received all the rights due to this position, and, in particular, the permission to marry (hence the frequent connection already alluded to between circumcision and marriage). The full-grown man becomes for the first time the fully-invested member of the tribe, and, in particular, capable of taking part in its religious functions. It is fitting then that he should wear the badge of his tribe.

Such a badge has always a religious significance, since membership of a clan carries with it the right to participate in the tribal worship (see GOVERNMENT, § 8), and, for early times, to be outside the tribe and outside its worship meant the same thing. Thus the act of circumcision had, in the earliest times, a sacral meaning. Like all other initiation ceremonies of the kind in the Semitic religions, circumcision had attributed to it also the effect of accomplishing a sacramental communion, bringing about a union with the godhead. To this extent the explanation of circumcision as of the nature of a sacrifice (Ewald) is just; originally circumcision and sacrifice served the same end.

For the old Israelite, in particular, the view just stated is confirmed by the identification of the two conceptions

6. In early 'uncircumcised' and 'unclean'; see Israel. especially, in this connection, Ezek. 31:18 32:19-32, where in the under-world the uncircumcised have assigned to them a place by themselves, away from the members of the circumcised people. The receiving of the tribal mark is a condition of connubium (Gen. 34). Among the Israelites also it was the marriageable young men who were circumcised (Josh. 5:2 ff., see above, § 2). In like manner, as already noticed, in Ex. 4:25 circumcision, as a token of marriageability, is brought into connection with marriage itself; cp the expression 'bridegroom of blood.' The same narrative also explains the circumcision of young boys as a surrogate for that of men (cp We. Proh. (4) 345 f.). This custom—of circumcising boys when quite young—may have arisen very early, as soon as the political aspects of the rite fell into the background. 'When the rite loses political significance, and becomes purely religious, it is not necessary that it should be deferred to the age of full manhood; indeed the natural tendency of pious parents will be to dedicate their child as early as possible to the god who is to be his protector through life' (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 328). This last general statement is particularly apposite in the case of circumcision.

No mention of circumcision is made either in the decalogue or in any other of the old laws. This silence

7. Later. cannot be explained on the ground merely that as a firmly established custom the rite did not require to be specially enjoined; rather does it prove that, for the religion of Yahwè in the pre-exilic period, circumcision had ceased to possess the great importance which we are compelled to assume for it in the old Semitic religion; nor was the same weight assigned to it which it subsequently acquired in Judaism. In particular the prophets took up towards it the same attitude as they held towards sacrifice, that is to say, they looked upon it as of no consequence so far as the worship of Yahwè was concerned. Such a prophet as Jeremiah, for example, sets himself in the most marked manner against the high appreciation of circumcision still prevalent among the masses in his day, when he places the circumcision of the Israelites exactly on the same level with that of the Egyptians, Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites, and threatens all alike with the divine judgment as being 'circumcised in uncircumcision' or as 'uncircumcised'—that is, as not having the circumcision of the heart (Jer. 9:25 [24] f., cp 4:4 to Lev. 26:41). By this very fact—that they contrast with the circumcision of the flesh that of the heart, the ears, the lips—the prophets gave the first impulse to the later symbolical interpretation of the rite as an act of purification.

This last, as already stated, is dominant in Judaism. In the post-exilic period the rite acquired a quite different

8. In Judaism. position from that which it had previously held. As substitutes for the sacrificial worship, no longer possible, the Sabbath and circumcision became the cardinal commands of Judaism, and the chief symbols of the religion of Yahwè and of membership of the religious commonwealth. For this reason neither Greek nor Roman culture was able to suppress this relic of barbarism. Antiochus Epiphanes indeed prohibited circumcision, but with no great effect (1 Macc. 1.48-60 2.46). On the other hand, however, the spread of Grecian culture so wrought among those Jews who had yielded to its influence, that they became ashamed of their circumcision, as in the exercises and games of the arena it exposed them to pagan ridicule; they accordingly took steps by means of a special operation to obliterate the signs of it (πολεῖν ταυτοὺς ἀκροβυστίας, 1 Macc. 1.15, ἐπισπασθαι, 1 Cor. 7.18). In order to remove the possibility of this in future the Talmudists and Bar Cochba ordered that after the ordinary cut had been made the flesh should also be torn with the thumb nail.

CITY (עִיר; קִרְיָה, almost confined to poetry and place-names; קִרְיָה, frequent in Phoenician, but only five times in OT; cp also KARTAH, 1. Names. KARTAN; ΠΟΛΙΣ).

A synonym of עִיר 'ir=Ass. uru ālu 'settlement, city'; cp CAIN, § 1; for Heb. kiryah and kereth, cp Aram. keritha, Ar. karyatun.

The influence of the old Babylonian culture is manifest. We note, too, that 'ir, in virtue of its origin, is an elastic term including the settlements of those who were once nomads (see HAZOR, VILLAGE), and thus we can account for the 'cities (read קִרְיָה with ⁶BL, Klo.) of Amalek' in 1 S. 15.5, and the description in 2 K. 17.9, 'in all their cities, from the tower of the watchmen (see TOWER) to the fortified city.' Dillmann, too, thus explains the phrase 'the wilderness and its cities' in Is. 42.11,¹ and some have supposed that the 'city' built by Cain was but a settlement such as we have just referred to—a most uncritical supposition!² We may safely assume that the Israelites acquired the word 'ir in Canaan. There they encountered highly civilised peoples and strongly fortified cities. The Deuteronomist remarks (Josh. 11.13; cp Jer. 30.18) that places which stood upon *tillim*³—i.e., on artificially heightened mounds or hills—the Israelitish immigrants did not burn down, with the single exception of Hazor. Of course, mountain cities were still more difficult to take (see FORTRESS).

¹ The text, however, is corrupt. For קִרְיָה 'and its cities' we should read קִרְיָה 'and the desert' (see SBOT ad loc.).

(a) Citadels.—In Gen. 11.4 the builders of Babylon say, 'Let us make a city and a tower'; the migdāl or tower here represents the citadel.

2. Various details. Elsewhere it is the 'עִיר' that is the citadel—e.g., the 'city of David,' 'city of Milcom' (see RABBATH AMMON); but observe that in Jer. 48.4 קִרְיָה appears to be used of the lower cities as opposed to the מְצֻרוֹת or citadels.

(b) Gates.—At the gates² of the town (see FORTRESS) there were 'broad places,'³ expressly distinguished from the 'street' in Prov. 7.12, devoted in turn to judicial business, traffic, popular assemblies, and gossip. See 2 K. 7.1 2 Ch. 32.6 Neh. 8.16 Job 29.7; also Ps. 55.11, where we might render, 'Extortion and deceit depart not from its market-place.'

(c) Streets.—Except in Græco-Roman cities like Cæsarea and Sebastè—cities the importance of which is shown by the continuance of their names in an almost unmodified form—the streets⁴ were presumably as narrow as those in a modern Oriental city. That the houses before the Greek period were for the most part poor and perishable is remarked elsewhere (see HOUSE, § 1). Still, the increase of wealth must have had some effect on the architecture (cp Jer. 22.14)—at any rate, in the merchants' quarters, the existence of which may be inferred from Zeph. 1.11 Neh. 3.31 f. Jer. 37.21 (the 'bakers' street'). Whether the Aramæan merchants in Samaria had whole streets (MT of 1 K. 20.34) or simply caravanserais (קָרָוֶרֶת, Klo., or קָרָוֶרֶת) may be left undecided. On the question whether the streets were paved it may be said that the soil was so often rocky that paving would frequently be uncalled for. We have no evidence of paving in Jerusalem before the Roman period (Jos. Ant. xx.97). Herod the Great is said to have laid an open road in Antioch with polished stone (Jos. Ant. xvi.53). On the 'street called Straight,' see DAMASCUS.

(d) Watchmen.—Watchmen, apart from the keepers of the gates, are mentioned only in two almost identical passages of Canticles (3.3 5.7), a work possibly of the Greek period; it is, of course, the capital that is referred to.

(e) Water-supply.—The excellent water-supply of ancient Jerusalem is treated elsewhere (see CONDUITS); smaller places had to be content with the fountains which were the original cause of the settlements.

The student will now be able to judge how far the Hebrew and the Greek conception of a city differed. Pausanias (2nd cent. A.D.) thus presents the Greek conception (Paus. x.4.1, Frazer, 1.503): 'It is twenty furlongs from Chæronea to Panopeus, a city of Phocis, if city it can be called that has no government-offices, no gymnasium, no theatre, no market-place, no water conducted to a fountain, and where the people live in hovels, just like highland shanties, perched on the edge of a ravine. Yet its territory is marked off by boundaries from that of its neighbours, and it even sends members to the Phocian parliament.' Jerusalem, at any rate, had its conduits and a substitute for a market-place, nor were large and high houses (אַרְמֻנוֹת) altogether unknown (see HOUSE, § 1). The gymnasium spoken of

⁴ γὰρ. ἄλυστα has πλατεία five times, δὲ five or six times, δίωδος once or twice, ἑξῶδος more than twelve times, but most frequently renders, with reference to the etymology, simply ἑξῶδος, or ἑξῶ. שַׁעַר, Prov. 7.8 Eccl. 12.45 Cant. 3.21; ἄγορά. In NT the words are πλατεία and ρύμη (in Lk. 14.21, 'lane'); cp Tobit 13.18 Eccl. 9.7.

CITY OF MOAB

in 1 Macc. 1:4 2 Macc. 49:12 was only a temporary innovation.

(f) Store-cities.—This phrase¹ means cities in which grain (2 Ch. 32:28) or other royal provisions, valuable for war or for peace, were stored (1 K. 9:19 etc.). It is implied that such cities were fortified. In Ex. 1:11 6 gives πόλεις θηκὰς; cp PITHOM, RAAMESSES.

CLAUDA, RV CAUDA (κλαυδά [Ti. with N* 13, etc.], κλαυδά [WH with N* B], Cauda, Acts 27:16), is described as a small island (νησίον) under the lee of which Paul's ship ran for shelter (ὑποδραμόντες) when blown off the Cretan shore. She was driving before an ENE. wind (v. 14), which caught her between Cape Lithinos (called also Cape Matala) and Lutro harbour (see PHENIX, 2). Hence Claudia must be the small island now called Gavdhanissi (Γαυδανήσι) or Gozzo, lying about 20 m. due S. of Lutro. Ptolemy (iii. 17:11) has Κλαῦδος νήσος ἐν τῇ πόλει, and remains of a small town are found on the island. There is some variety in the ancient appellation (Κλαυδία, Stad. m. m., § 328; Gaudos, Pomp. Mela, 2:114; Pliny, HN iv. 12:61). It became the seat of a bishop (cp Hier. Syn. p. 14, Νήσος Κλαῦδος, and Notit. Episc. 8:240, etc.).

CLAUDIA (κλαυδία [Ti. WH]) unites with Paul at Rome in sending greeting to Timothy at Ephesus (2 Tim. 4:21). Nothing further is known concerning her.

For the ingenious but unconvincing argument by which it has been sought to identify her with the Claudia who marries Pudens in Martial's epigram (4:13), and to prove her the daughter of the British king Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, see Alford, NT, vol. iii., Prol. to 2 Tim.

CLAUDIUS, the fourth emperor of Rome (41-54), was the son of Nero Claudius Drusus and the successor of Caius Caligula. His advancement to this position came chiefly through the energies of Herod Agrippa I., whom he rewarded with consular honours and the enlargement of his territories by the addition of Judæa, Samaria, and certain districts in Lebanon. For the history of the Jews during his reign, see ISRAEL. Claudius is twice mentioned in the NT. In Acts 11:28 the famine foretold by AGABUS is said to have been in the time of Claudius Cæsar (ἐπὶ Κλαυδίου [Ti. WH]); AV after TR, ἐ. Κλ. Καίσαρος; but see CÆSAR), and in 18:1 f. reference is made to the expulsion of the Jews from Rome which he was induced to order (as Suet. Claud. 25 tells us) on account of their tumults: 'Judæos impulsore Chresto² assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit.' The precise dates of both famine and expulsion have been disputed; see CHRONOLOGY, § 76 f.

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS (κλαυδιος λυσιος [Ti. WH], Acts 23:26), 'chief captain' (military tribune, or chiliarch) in command of the Roman garrison of Jerusalem in the governorship of Felix (Acts 21:31 ff.).

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN

the crystalline; but the materials are so varying that there is clay of several kinds suitable for several uses. The term 'clay' is often applied loosely to 'loam'; of such, for example, is the clay of Egypt and of Palestine, although a bituminous shale, easily convertible into clay, is said to occur at the source of the Jordan and near the Dead Sea; see BITUMEN.

In Palestine, and indeed throughout the E., clay is used chiefly (1) in building, either retained in its natural state (for ceilings and floors) or manufactured into bricks (see BABYLONIA, § 15, BRICK, CHAMBER, HOUSE); (2) in the manufacture of utensils (see POTTERY); (3) in providing a material for documents public and private and a means of safely preserving them. Very many deeds and other records have been found in the form of inscribed clay tablets in Assyria and Babylonia. 'The deed or record was first written on a small tablet, or brick, of clay, with the names of the principals, witnesses, etc., appended. This tablet was then enclosed in an envelope of clay, on which was written, apparently from memory, the contents of the document, the names of the witnesses,' etc. (Peters). In Palestine, where, so far as we know, clay tablets were not customary in the historic Israelitish period, clay, instead of wax, was used for sealing. See, besides, Job 38:14 14:78, where AV's 'sewest up' should rather be 'smearest (clay) over'—parallel to 'sealed up' in v. 17a. In Egypt jars, mummy-pits, etc., were frequently sealed with clay.

The Heb. and Gr. words which are rendered 'clay' are (1) קֶרֶם qerem, Gen. 11:3, etc.; (2) מִשְׁכָּה mischa, used of the mire of streets, also of brick (Nah. 3:14) and potter's clay (Is. 41:25); (3) the biblical Aram. representative קֶרֶם qasaph (Dan. 2:33); and (4) πηλός, Rom. 9:21: see further POTTERY. מִשְׁכָּה melet, Jer. 48:9 AV (RV 'mortar') is uncertain (ἐν προθύροις [BAQ]),¹ ἐν τῷ κρυφίῳ [Qmg.]). A possible meaning is 'earth' (Giesebr.); but it may be a corruption for סֵקֶר 'secretly'; see Ges. Lex. 181.

CLEAN and UNCLEAN, HOLY and PROFANE.

Of the Heb. terms which convey the idea of cleanliness or holiness the most prominent is (1)

1. Meaning of the Terms. קָדַשׁ (קָדַשׁ, קָדַשׁ, etc.), the original meaning of which is not clear. Smend in AT Rel.-gesch. (1) 334 (cp, however, 2nd ed. 150, 223, 325), expresses the common uncertainty of the moment. The older view of Ges. (Thes.), defended now only in a much modified form, is that the root means 'clear,' 'brilliant.' Baudissin,² writing in 1878, finds the fundamental idea in 'separation,' a view which is still widely held.

[Baudissin says, 'A comparison with קָדַשׁ makes it natural to conjecture that קָדַשׁ meant from the first "to be separated"—"to be pure"—i.e., that קָדַשׁ was from the beginning synonymous with קָדַשׁ; cp קָדַשׁ, "pure," from קָדַשׁ, "to cut" or "cut out."'] It is certain, too, that Yahwè's holiness and his glory are correlative ideas (as, in the Avesta, Ahura Mazda's). In Is. 6:3 this is very clearly indicated, and in v. 5 the thought of Yahwè's holiness suggests to Isaiah that of his own (moral) uncleanness (cp Ps. 15:1 f. 24:3 f.). May there not have been a time when קָדַשׁ suggested the idea of purity without any moral reference? Zimmern, followed by Whitehouse (Thinker, July 1892, p. 52), connects קָדַשׁ with Ass. huddušū (Busspsalmen, 37, n. 2; Beitr. zur Assyrl. 1:105; Vater, Sohn, Fürsprecher, 11, n. 3), which means 'bright,' 'pure,' or, more precisely (= ellusū), 'bright,' 'pure' (very frequently), 'illustrious,' 'holy' (so Sayce, in a private letter). According to Abel (in Baudissin, 38), words which originally denoted 'purity' are used in Coptic to denote the divine or the consecrated. This is quite in accordance with the spirit of the old Egyptian religions and with that of the old Semitic religions. If, however, this tempting comparison be accepted, we must frankly admit that the original meaning had become forgotten, or was but obscurely felt, by the OT writers. Only once is 'the Holy One' distinctly parallel to 'light' (Is. 10:17); but the ideas are, at any rate, implicitly synonymous in Is. 31:6 33:14 f. In usage, as Davidson (Exek. xxxix.), remarks, the term 'holy' expresses, not any particular attribute but rather the general notion, of godhead. In a secondary though still early sense, it is applied to that 'which belongs to the sphere of deity, which lies near God's presence or has come into it (Ex. 35 Nu. 16 37 f. [17 2 f.]), or which belongs to him, whether as part of himself or as his property.' Davidson also remarks that the root 'probably expressed some physical idea, though the idea is not now reasonable.' See also WRS Proph. (2) 424, who points out (after Nöldeke) that the Arabic evidence for the supposed root-idea of purity will not hold. In RS (2), 150, the same scholar finds 'some probability' that the original meaning was 'separation' or 'withdrawal.'

² Studien zur semit. Rel.-gesch. 2:20 (in his important dissertation, 'Der Begriff der Heiligkeit im Alten Testament').

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE

Other less prominent terms are ṣār (סָר), zakh (זָךְ), and ṭāhōr (טָהוֹר), all of which are rendered indifferently by 'clean' and 'pure.' (2) Of these the most definitely religious in its application is ṭāhōr. No doubt gold may be ṭāhōr, i.e., refined (Ex. 25 11 Job 28 19); so also a turban (Zech. 3 5), vessels (Ex. 24 6), etc.; but the levitical sense is specially prominent (Lev. 7 19 Nu. 9 13, etc.). The eyes of God also can be ṭāhōr (Hab. 1 13); therefore he cannot tolerate wickedness. Similarly innocence in man; Job 17 9 Ps. 51 12 [10]. God's promises are ṭāhōr—i.e., perfectly veracious (Ps. 127 6[6]).

(3) ṣāḥ, also means refined (as oil, Ex. 27 20); incense (Ex. 30 34), morally pure, 'upright' (Job 8 6 [11] יָשָׁר, Prov. 20 11 21 8). It is used of a prayer (Job 16 17), of the heart (it has to be made or kept 'pure' or 'clean', Ps. 73 13 Prov. 20 9 [11] לְטָהֵר), or the conduct (Ps. 119 9).

(4) ṣār, 'separated'—i.e., 'pure' (cp [1] above). Some Rabbins interpret ṣār in Ps. 2 12, 'selected' = בְּחִירָה; but it would be easier (though not the best solution) to read בְּחִירָה. In a physical sense ṣār=spotlessly beautiful (Cant. 6 9 f.). Spotless purity belongs to God's commandments (Ps. 19 9). It is used of moral purity (Job 11 4 Ps. 24 4 73 1).

The NT terms which have to be noticed are (5) ἀγνός 'pure' (= ṭāhōr), in a physical sense of modesty or chastity (2 Cor. 11 2 Tit. 2 3; Pet. 3 2); sacred, for ceremonial use (2 Macc. 18 8); pure—ethically—of men (2 Cor. 7 11 Phil. 4 8 1 Tim. 5 22), of God (1 Jn. 3 3), and of his wisdom (Ja. 3 17).

(6) ἀγιός, worthy of veneration, whether of things connected with God (Lk. 1 4 Heb. 9 1 24), or of persons (e.g., John the Baptist, Mk. 6 21; Christian disciples, Acts 9 13, etc.). Thus the church—like Israel (Tit. 2 14, see PECULIAR PEOPLE)—is called ἅγιος (cp Ex. 19 6 קָדֹשׁ, קֹדֶשׁ). ἀγιός stands in the same relation δίκαιος as קָדֹשׁ (see LOVINGKINDNESS and cp ASSIDEANS) to קִיָּץ (see Thayer, Lex. NT, s.v. ἀγιός).

(7) δσιος corresponds chiefly with קִיָּץ: see (6) above: (so also in 6). It is used of men (Tit. 1 8 Heb. 7 26), of the Messiah (Acts 2 27 13 35), of Messianic blessings (Acts 13 34 τὰ δσια Δαυίδ), and of God (Rev. 15 4 16 5 cp Dt. 32 4 Heb. יְיָ).

(8) ἱερός, consecrated to the deity, belonging to God, used of the 'sacred' writings (2 Tim. 3 15 RV, AV 'holy'). In 1 Cor. 9 13 τὰ ἱερά means all the sacred objects pertaining to the worship of God in the temple. For the negatives of these qualities, see COMMON, PROFANE.]

Baudissin's view (above [1]) suits many passages: the holiness of the Kēdēšim and the *Kēdēšōth*¹ (see IDOLATRY, § 6), who were certainly found in Israel very early, can have consisted only in their separation: either they were dedicated to foreign gods, or perhaps they were set apart at puberty from the households in which they grew up, according to a custom which ranges from the Gold Coast to Tahiti (see Frazer's Golden Bough, 2225 ff.), and never returned to them or entered others. The hire of the 'harlot' Tyre (Is. 23 18) is to be 'holiness unto Yahwē,' not because the reviving trade of Tyre is to be conducted in a better spirit than before, but because it is to be taxed at the new Jerusalem (which is presumably to be a staple town of the wool and spice trade) in a way to absorb all its profits. Again (Zech. 14 20 f.), everything in the new Jerusalem after its last great trial is to be so holy, so perfectly the property of God, that the very horse-bells will bear the same motto as the High Priest's mitre; the pots in which the sacrificial flesh is boiled for priests are to be as holy as the bowls which hold the sacrificial blood reserved for God; the common cooking pots of Jerusalem are to be holy enough for pilgrims to boil their sacrifices in. Jerusalem (Joel 3 [4] 17) is to be 'holy'; no stranger is to pass through. There is to be through the wilderness of Judah a 'holy' way (Is. 35 8) in which no unclean shall walk.

So far it seems as if holiness might be explained as a relation rather than a quality. The flesh and blood of the sacrifice are holy because they belong to God; the pots and bowls have to be holy that they may hold the flesh and blood. So, too, the vessels (the bodies? or the wallets?) of David's followers (1 S. 21 5 [6]) have to be holy that they may receive the shewbread, which is holy because it is set before God. David (whom all the writers who speak of him regard, from their several points of view, as a model of wisdom and piety) vouches for the negative holiness of his men, and any accidental defilement which he does not know will have had time to wear off: he appears to think that the shewbread will sanctify their 'vessels,'¹ and implies that if they had been specially sanctified, as for a holy war or a pilgrimage, they might have eaten the shewbread though they were not priests.

The 'sanctification' of persons and things falls under the same notion. 'Holiness,' as Robertson Smith

2. Contagion observed (RS (2) 450 ff.), is contagious: whatever a 'holy' thing or a 'holy' person touches becomes holy.

When Elijah casts his mantle over Elisha, the latter has to follow till Elijah releases him; the worshippers of Baal, whose ordinary dress might 'profane' the house, are provided with special vestments from the stores of the house of Baal; otherwise, when they came outside, their ordinary dress would make whatever it touched 'holy to Baal,' and unavailable to the former owners. The priest on the great Day of Atonement (the rule is older than the day) is to take off the holy linen garments and leave them in the holy place, and to wash his flesh in water lest any of the contagion of holiness should cling to him. In a text which, though belonging to the main stock of P, seems to represent a later state of the law, the consecration of Aaron and his successors seems to consist in their investiture with the (hereditary?) state dress of Ex. 28; cp Nu. 20 25-28. According to another view, which is older than Zech. 4 14, the consecration consists in the anointing (cp ANOINTING, § 3, c). The doctrine of the contagion of holiness is at its height in Ezek. (46 24), who provides special kitchens where the priests are to cook the most holy things, and special chambers in which they are to eat them, without bringing them forth into the outer court to sanctify the people (who are eating their own sacrifices). Otherwise, they might become the property of the sanctuary, or at least would be subject to the same obligations as the priests. For the same reason, it is expressly stated, they are to leave the holy garments in the holy place, though all the top of the mountain is most holy. So, too, a little later, the profane sacrificers² of Is. 65 5 either threaten to sanctify the poor who approach them, or claim to be too holy to be approached. In Hag. 2 12 f. we find a distinct change. The contagion of uncleanness is stronger than the contagion of holiness. A garment in which holy flesh is carried does not sanctify; a garment which has touched the dead pollutes (cp EGYPT, § 19, and see DRESS, § 8). The stricter view is still presupposed, at least for the 'most holy' things; any garment sprinkled with blood has to be washed in the holy place (Lev. 6 27 [20]);³ otherwise it would sanctify. For the same reason the earthen pots used in cooking are to be broken; brass pots (too valuable to break) may be used, but only after having been rinsed and scoured—obviously to remove the last vestige of the

³ Is this the reason why the holy garments are of linen? Woollen garments would naturally be sent to the fuller at long intervals.

Benzinger (HA, § 61) remarks, 'It may safely be affirmed that this form of consecration to the deity, and especially the violation of nature combined with it, was unknown to the Israelitish nomads; but also, that with so many other details of Baal-worship, it penetrated into the service of Yahwē, and there spread to a considerable extent.'] holy, which are often cited as if they were known, and never described: though we are told that the 'sin' and the 'trespass' offering are most holy and must be eaten in the holy place, and hence could not be eaten by the households of the priests. Why these special offerings are specially holy is discussed elsewhere (see SACRIFICE). The scribes, to whom we owe this law, are the fathers of those who decided that a book was or was not canonical according as it did or did not 'defile the hands.' After touching a really holy book, a man had to wash before touching common food lest his hands should sanctify it (cp CANON, § 4). In the oldest practice, it would seem, it is the contact with the holy flesh that is the essence of the consecration of priests: the sacrificer who wishes to institute a priest 'fills his hand.'¹ As sacrifice and slaughter are nearly synonymous (as late as Is. 346; ISAIAH, ii., § 14), we seem to find in one of the stories of the golden calf that the share of the Levites in the slaughter of the worshippers is virtually their consecration. 'They have filled your hand for Yahwè' (i.e., 'Ye have been to-day appointed priests'), 'for every man was against his son and his brother' (Ex. 3229).² In 1 K. 1833 Jeroboam fills the hand for the priests of the high places: in 2 Ch. 139 each candidate brings a bullock and seven rams to fill his hand.³ This seems an echo of old tradition; for in Ex. 29 (P), Moses takes only two rams and a bullock when he fills the hand of Aaron and his sons: the blood of the ram of the 'fill offering' is put on the right ear, the right thumb, the right great toe, of each priest; the pieces, which as a rule are burnt, and one of those which in ordinary sacrifices fell to the priest as his fee, are both laid with cake on the hand of each priest and waved before God (to assert the priest's right to the 'wave-breast' and the 'heave shoulder') and then burnt. There seems to be an afterthought (v. 26) in which Moses as the officiating priest takes the wave breast to himself; the priests eat the rest of the sacrifice (which in ordinary cases the worshipper would eat) in the holy place. The idea seems to be that just as the worshipper in the old profession (Dt. 2613) declares 'I have put away the holy out of my house,' so the sacrificer passes on the dangerous holy food to a priest who will take the risk and the privilege of sharing the table of God, and bear the iniquity of the people in their holy things. Possibly the Levites in Ex. 3226 ff. may point to a time when the priest was not chosen by the sacrificer, but handselled his office by laying hands on the holy flesh.

The question whether 'holiness' to begin with is nothing more than 'separateness' bears very directly on the 'holiness' of God. If holiness is 4. Of God. originally a relation rather than a quality, if things and persons are holy to God as persons and acts are righteous before him, then God himself is holy simply as the centre of the circle of sanctity: if all that belongs to the sanctuary is holy, how much more he who dwelleth between the cherubim, who inhabiteth the praises of Israel (Ps. 223[4])? He is the object of worship whom his worshippers 'sanctify.' He is the 'Holy One': 'I am God and not man, the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee' (Hos. 119 cited Is. 126: 'Rejoice and shout, O inhabitant of Zion, for great is the Holy One of Israel in the midst of thee'). Yahwè is the God, the Holy One of the prophet (Hab. 112). So Jacob (Gen. 3153, cp v. 42 [E]) swears by the fear of his father Isaac—i.e., the God whom his father feared.

There are other texts, however, in which holiness seems to be absolute. The men of Beth-shemesh (1 Sam. 620) ask, 'Who can stand before Yahwè, this holy god?'¹ In Am. 42 Yahwè swears by his holiness. Does that mean his character? or the reverence due to him? The answer will govern the sense in which his name is holy in 27. In Is. 516 (authoritative enough by whomsoever written) God's being exalted through judgment and sanctified through righteousness are closely parallel. The song ascribed to the mother of Samuel (1 S. 2) is an unambiguous echo of the song of the seraphim (Is. 63)—'Holy, holy, holy is Yahwè Sābāoth, the whole earth is full of his glory,'—where holiness and glory are clearly parallel. So, too, in Jer. 1712, 'a high throne is the place of our sanctuary,' and in Ex. 1511, 'Who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?'—the holiness, the praises, the wonders, seem to belong to God's external majesty. Throughout the OT God's worshippers rehearse his acts much oftener than his attributes. We find his 'righteous acts' as early as the song of Deborah (Judg. 511); but not till Jer. 121 do we read, 'righteous art thou, Yahwè, when I plead with thee'; where the sense is still half forensic, as in Ex. 927 (JE) Ps. 514[6]. In Ps. 117 we have 'The righteous Yahwè loveth righteousness.' The parallel between holiness and glory is reinforced by the contrast between holy and profane, for profane certainly seems to mean what is cast down to be trodden under foot (Ezek. 2816, 'Cast thee as profane out of the holy mount'; Ps. 8939[40], 'Thou hast profaned his crown to the ground'; cp 44). Israel, again (Dt. 2619), is made high above all people, that it may be a holy people.

The demand that Israel shall be holy is common to every stage and aspect of the Law. In Ex. 2231[30]

5. Of Israel. (JE) and Dt. 1421, it is the ground on which Israel is to abstain from all meat not killed by men for human food; in Dt. 141f. Israel as a holy people is forbidden to make to the dead blood- or hair-offerings, intended, doubtless, to keep up a physical communion with them (cp ESCHATOLOGY). The spiritual tie between God and his peculiar people who are his children is not to be impaired by a rite the sense of which was still clear when the book which Hilkiah found was written, though in Jer. 166 the rite seems harmless and unmeaning. Again, the tithe of the third year is profane if any of it has been 'eaten in mourning' or 'given for the dead' (Dt. 2614). Are we to think of the mere unluckiness of any thing connected with the dead (Hos. 94)? or of some form of worship, as in Is. 819? Consecration for one mode of worship would be a defilement for another. In Lev. 1927 (cp 215) we have the law against cuttings for the dead preceded by a law against an Arab tonsure, which probably marked consecration to an Arab god. This might go back to Hezekiah, who, according to Sennacherib (KB 294), entertained Arab mercenaries. Gratian adopted the dress of his Alan guard. If we suspect with Robertson Smith² an invasion of Arab totemism in the time of Ezek. (87-12), Lev. 19:28 will forbid the tattooing of totem marks.

² [Here, therefore, we have a clear case of the re-emergence into the light of day of a cult of the most primitive totem type which had been banished for centuries from public religion, but must have been kept alive in obscure circles of private or local superstition, and sprang up again on the rising of the national faith, like some noxious weed in the courts of a deserted temple' (RS 2, 357). CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE

In the Book of the Covenant and in Deuteronomy the holiness of the covenant people is demanded, so to speak, incidentally, and without express reference to the holiness of the covenant God. If one were to try to find a keynote for the older book it would be 'justice'; for Deuteronomy perhaps 'Loving-kindness, 'hesed,' the dutiful love of the worshipper to his God, which includes kindness for God's sake to men (see also LOVINGKINDNESS). 'Holiness' is certainly the keynote of the oldest stratum of the Levitical law (see LEVITICUS).

Deuteronomy is clearly a development, as compared with the Book of the Covenant; a deeper insight into the vocation of the chosen people has been gained. Is the Law of Holiness a development in the same sense, compared with Deuteronomy? The interval between Ezekiel and Jeremiah is shorter than that between Deuteronomy and the Book of the Covenant; yet Ezekiel is almost as full of the ideas of H (i.e., the Law of Holiness) as Jeremiah of those of D. Has he inherited a relatively old tradition? Short as H is, it is full of variations and repetitions. Would not an elder or a younger contemporary of Ezekiel, giving expression to a new religious movement that had grown out of Josiah's covenant, have imparted more unity to his work? Again, in more than one way H seems to be older. No reader of Frazer (see especially Golden Bough, 1279 n. 2) would think the law which forbids the reaping of corners later than the law against gleaning (Lev. 19:9 f.). Nor is the holiness required of priests yet extended to the whole people; thus if a layman eats הֶלֶב he is defiled for the day and must wash his clothes; but for priests the prohibition is absolute. There seems, too, to be a recognition of other gods (Dt. 24:15 f.): if a man curses his own god he shall bear his iniquity (i.e., he must not come to the priest of the God of Israel to make atonement for him). Certainly in D the demand for 'holiness' is based on the more characteristic demand for monolatry, whilst in H, though the demand for monolatry is not superfluous—Israel, we are told, went after the Shēdim (see DEMONS, § 4) in the wilderness (Lev. 17:7)—it is not fundamental. The giving of the seed to Moloch is treated as analogous to the moral abominations of the nations, for which the land spewed them out, rather than to turning away to idols or making molten gods. It was a profanation of God's holy name just because those under his wrath (Ezek. 20:25 f.) regarded it as part of his service. Upon the whole, the demand for holiness in H seems to be an intensification of the demand that worshippers shall sanctify themselves, which we may suppose the better priests to have insisted upon as long as there were feasts in Israel. In many ways the holiness is still external: 'ye shall be holy, for I Yahwē am holy,' appears (Lev. 20:26) as a sanction for the law against abominable food (cp 11:44 f.); in 19:2 21:8 the context takes off nothing from the text. These passages mark the culmination, not the starting point, of a line of teaching. Generally the sanction of the precept is, 'I am Yahwē,' 'I am Yahwē your god,' 'I am Yahwē your god who brought you out of Egypt,' 'I am Yahwē who sanctify you.' Logically and theologically God's holiness is the source of all others: he is holy in himself and therefore what he takes for his must be holy too; but possibly, as Robertson Smith held, holiness may in the beginning have been regarded as a mysterious virtue inherent in things external to the worshipper—in trees, in waters, in stones, in the mysterious animal life of well-wooded and well-watered spots,—each of which may have served to suggest a higher power beyond the phenomena in which it was first recognised. Historically, however, the evidence that holiness is an attribute of the object of worship is neither so early nor so copious as the evidence that holiness is a relation bringing the worshipper and his holy things into a new sphere with something worshipped at its centre.

Obviously 'holy and profane,' 'clean and unclean,' is a cross division; holy things and persons are, or may be, as unavailable for common life as if they were unclean, though, on the other hand, holiness necessarily presupposes and includes cleanness. Again, uncleanness often seems, like holiness, to have something supernatural about it: unclean animals often seem to be 'abominable,' like 'idols'; the uncleanness of the dead, and of women at certain times, is as likely to savour of awe as of disgust.

In historical times clean and unclean beasts are those which are fit or unfit for food rather than for sacrifice¹ (see however below, § 11); but the law of clean and unclean animals is puzzling.² The law which limited the eatable quadrupeds to the old order of ruminants (with the exception of the camel) was valuable incidentally from the hygienic point of view. If this was the origin of the law, it must have rested rather on instinct than on observation; at most, shepherds and herdsmen may have noticed what beasts they found feeding in the pastures of the wilderness, and decided that these were as fit for food as their own flocks and herds. All the patriarchs have camels, and Rachel (Gen. 31:34 [E]) hides the teraphim in the camel's furniture: in later, perhaps more historical, times camels seem to belong to aliens (cp CAMEL, § 2 f.). In the oldest stratum of the story of Gideon (Judg. 8:25) we find the gold rings round the necks of the camels of the Midianites; in the oldest stratum of the story of David (1 S. 30:17) 400 of the Amalekites escape on camels. As far as we know, camel-riders have always killed, eaten, and sacrificed their camels, though the meat is inferior to beef and mutton. Possibly the camel was unclean because it was the domestic animal of alien nomads. If so, the rule 'whatsoever divideth the hoof and cheweth the cud shall be clean' may have been settled before the question of eating camels became practical. This question was decided by the observation that the camel does not strictly divide the hoof, or at least rests part of its weight on an undivided pad.

The express prohibition of eating hares, rock-badgers, and swine, as food, is curious. No reason except a possible connection with totemism has yet been suggested why the rock-badger was forbidden; and for the prohibition of the hare we have only guesses—perhaps it is worth while to mention the idea that hares' flesh is unhealthy. The uncleanness of swine is at its height when they are kept in sties and left dirty; but in OT and NT times they seem to have fed in herds out of doors. Compared with sheep and goats, they are fond of mud—but so are buffaloes in modern Palestine, which are not regarded with the same horror as swine. On the other hand, tribes of herdsmen and shepherds have much more in common with each other than with swineherds, and if we are to look for a natural explanation of the abhorrence of swine we may look for it here: the droves of swine of the alien were abominable to the flocks and herds of the Hebrew. As for the actual feeling, whatever its cause, it is significant that in Ḥarrān, traditionally the last station of Abraham on his way to Canaan and the land to which Jacob returned, the land where he won his wives and his wealth, swine were sacrificed once a year and eaten only then. A sacrifice which is, for whatever reason, rare, is also mysterious, awful, and potent. Dogs too were sacred in Harrān; and both swine and dogs seem to figure in the profane sacrifices of Is. 65 and 66.¹ See DOG, § 4.

¹ With regard to sacrifices it is men that are clean or unclean. When men sacrifice of the flock and the herd, only the clean may eat (when Saul misses David at table the first thought that occurs to him is 'he is unclean'): that was the common law till slaughter without sacrifice was allowed in D in the interest of the one sanctuary. Of game, on the other hand, of the roebuck and the hart the clean and the unclean may eat alike—though possibly there is a trace of a blood-offering by hunters in the rule in H (Lev. 17:13) that the blood is to be not simply poured out but covered with earth—a prescription which might be either a survival or a development.

CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, HOLY AND PROFANE

Whatever the reason for the express prohibition of camels, hares, rock-badgers, and swine, the prohibition is as old as any part of the law which we can trace; but the list of prohibited animals in Lev. 11 29 ff. (P) has integral relation to the rest of the law; the weasel, the mouse, and different kinds of lizards are 'the uncleanest with you of swarming things'; except dry sowing seed, everything that comes into contact with their carcase is unclean.

The rule is meant to work: one of these abominations does not defile a whole cistern or fountain; every earthenware vessel which they touch is to be broken; other vessels are to be washed in water and to be unclean until even; the water which washes the vessels pollutes all meat on which it falls; any drink in the polluted vessels is of course unclean.

Two questions arise: Why should people wish to eat weasels, mice, and different kinds of lizards? and why are these charged with special uncleanness? The traditional answer to the second is that they are in a sense domestic vermin which haunt houses and are always getting into whatever is stored there, and so are worse than vermin out of doors; but, as most commentators think that one of the lizards enumerated is an iguana or a land crocodile 3 or 4 ft. long (see LIZARD [1]), the explanation has to bear a heavy strain. If Robertson Smith's theory of totemism is established, much will become clear.² The elders of Israel who worshipped 'creeping things' in 'chambers of imagery' (Ezek. 8 10 ff.) made it necessary to cultivate a special religious horror of their low-class totems: they were at the same stage as the Harranians, who are said to have worshipped field-mice. Indications of high-class totems, however, are not wanting; see LEOPARD, WOLF.

There is neither a category nor a list of clean birds: of the unclean, as enumerated, most are uneatable—

9. Birds. either birds of prey or feeders on carrion. The law is especially forbidden: the only possible reason yet discovered is that it haunts marshy places and that its flesh has sometimes a bad smell. Nothing is said one way or other of doves or pigeons, which is remarkable, as they do not appear at Solomon's table, and, though they are the only birds which, as far as we know, were sacrificed, they were used for sacrifices of which the worshipper at least did not eat. In Syria, at any rate, they were always associated with the worship of Astarte, and, wherever that worship spread to the West, they went with it, and according to Lucian (Dea Syria, 14, 54) none of the worshippers at Hierapolis ventured to eat or touch them—they were too holy,—and whoever touched them was ἐναγής or 'unclean' for a day, and it was a question whether swine were 'holy' or 'abominable.' Probably the question of clean or unclean birds was only of secondary importance: it was not easy to keep ducks or geese; there were no cocks (see COCK) or hens; the 'fowls of heaven' generally appear as feeding on sacrifices or corpses; the 'fowler' (who appears as early as Hos. 98) probably caught small birds for the rich.³

The prohibition of 'flying swarming things that go on all fours' looks as if at first it included locusts, the only

10. Insects. insects which anybody could wish to eat; if so, subsequent scribes discovered that, as they leap on their hind legs and do not strictly go on

Smith's hypothesis has the special merit of explaining why certain animals are sacred, and why certain kinds of flesh may not be eaten. The theory that these animals were regarded as the property of the Godhead only throws the question back. For how came people to embrace such a remarkable theory?' all fours, they might be eaten in all stages of their growth.

The law of aquatic food is clear: 'whatever hath fins and scales' is clean; this limits the dietary to true fishes,

11. Fish. and, among these, excludes eels and shads,—popular and common articles of food in Egypt, Greece, and Italy. According to Pliny (HN xxxii. 10 1), Numa thought fish without scales unfit for funeral banquets; Piankhi Meri-Amen thought well of a king of Lower Egypt who ate no fish; according to Lucian (Dea Syria, 54), fish in general is forbidden food. The Law knows nothing of sacrificial fish. Perhaps the prohibition of fish was general, and the permission of what had fins and scales an exception; see FISH, § 8 ff. There is certainly a tendency to identify what is clean and what is fit for sacrifice. Thus Hosea (9 3) regards food eaten

12. Plants. out of the land of Israel as unclean, because it cannot be purified by acceptable sacrifice to the God of Israel; in Amos 7 17 a foreign land is polluted for the same reason; and in H the fruit of all trees is to be uncircumcised the first three years (i.e., the fruit is to be picked off as fast as it forms while the trees are establishing themselves?); for the fourth year the whole crop is to be holy to praise Yahwē withal (i.e., to be used for sacrificial feasts). There is no distinction anywhere between clean and unclean herbs; the first fruits of all are to be offered, though only corn and wine and oil figure in sacrifice. In P (Gen. 1 29) every herb

13. Different periods. and tree that yieldeth seed is given for meat from the first; so after the flood is all animal food;¹ as sacrifice was instituted (according to P) for the first time at Sinai, the distinction between clean and unclean animals was still in abeyance. The distinction between clean and sacrificial animals which is presupposed throughout D is perhaps to be explained by the transition from the nomadic state. If Levi the sacred tribe be a metonymic formed from Leah the wild cow, wild animals must have been sacred once (see LEAH).

The law of clean and unclean meats obtained special prominence in the Greek period: the first proof of the religious fidelity of Daniel and his companions is their resolution not to defile themselves with the king's meat; when Antiochus Epiphanes resolved to abolish 'Jewish particularism' eating swine's flesh was the test of conformity. If we go back fifty or seventy years, Joseph, the enterprising revenue farmer, whom his namesake idealised (Jos. Ant. xii. 4 10) as Machiavelli did Cæsar Borgia, had clearly no scruple of the kind;² yet even he, though his kindred in the next generation (ib. 5 1) were prominent on the heathen side and he himself fell in love with a pagan (ib. 8), was heartily thankful when his own niece was substituted for her in order to save him from polluting his seed among the heathen. A psalmist (see Ps. 141), who still instinctively draws his imagery from a time before the institution or revival of the evening burnt sacrifice, may be an older witness for the view (hardly to be traced in Ezra or Nehemiah) that the law of clean and unclean meats is given to separate Israel from the heathen: he appears to be thinking simply of fellowship at the table, not, like the author of Is. 65, of sacrificial communion. If so, a Maccabean editor may have revived a psalm which suited the times. Probably older psalms from 18 onwards lay the stress rather on cleanness of hands and innocence; in Is. 6 5 the unclean lips of prophets and people are generally explained as relating to sins of speech, after the analogy of Zeph. 3 9 13. After the destruction of the temple, and still more after Palestine ceased to be the centre of Jewish life, the law of clean and unclean was less zealously observed, though portions of it prove still to be of considerable sanitary value. See FOOD, § 10 ff.

Human uncleanness¹ is of two kinds. It may arise from external contact, or from something in the man or woman who is unclean. The uncleanness of death falls under both; the dead is unclean and makes others unclean. Diseases like leprosy or issue, natural processes like menstruation and probably copulation, cause uncleanness too. If, as Wellhausen holds (CH 151; but cp I/G 108), Lev. 12^a implies Lev. 15¹⁹, the law of uncleanness after childbearing might be an extension by analogy of the older law of the uncleanness of menstruation.² If so, as the Vendidad has much to say respecting the uncleanness of childbed, we might suspect Persian influence—the rather that there is no hint of it in the older Hebrew literature, while the 'menstruous cloth' appears (Is. 30²²) in a passage still generally assigned to the Assyrian period. Cp FAMILY, § 11.

14. Human uncleanness.

Perhaps a common element in all cases of uncleanness not caused by external contact is that the unclean in some way is disgusting or alarming. The law of leprosy is not to be explained from the risk of contagion: ordinary sickness, even pestilence, does not occasion uncleanness; the leper is 'unclean' because he is smitten of God, just as the madman in Moslem countries is 'holy,' and epilepsy was the lepà róros in Greece. In general, persons who are in a state to make ordinary people shrink from them, because their neighbourhood is uncomfortable or terrifying, are unclean.

Casual uncleanness, according to P in its final state, does not require an offering for its removal. It is enough to observe the prescribed term of seclusion, generally 'until the even,' and the prescribed washing; if either be neglected and the unclean negligently or ignorantly intrude among the clean, a 'sin-offering' is necessary. This is Dillmann's inference from Lev. 5². According to Nu. 5², the unclean is excluded not only from 'the congregation,' but also from 'the camp,'—i.e., not only from the temple, but also from, at any rate, walled towns. No offering is prescribed for the menstruous woman; but after childbed and after issues a 'sin offering' is prescribed, whilst the leper has also to bring a 'trespass' offering before he can come into 'the congregation,' though he is admitted to 'the camp' after the performance of an (older?) rite with two birds, running water, cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. After he comes into the camp he must still wait several days before he comes to his 'tent.' Here it is hard to doubt that the law has a sanitary purpose: it imposes a short quarantine to make sure that the cure is complete, and not improbably to guard against the hereditary transmission of the disease. The 'trespass' offering of the leper looks like a 'development'; it is necessary to assert expressly that it belongs to the priest (Lev. 14³³); the leper is anointed with the blood and oil of the trespass offering, exactly as Aaron and his sons (Lev. 8²²) are anointed with the blood of the ram of consecration, whose flesh is boiled for Aaron and his sons to eat, while the 'wave breast' falls to Moses as the sacrificer's fee. Possibly the re-consecration of the leper as one of the holy people by sacrificial blood is older than the theory that he was not to eat of the sacrifice. The sin and the burnt-offering prescribed after all the graver kinds of uncleanness are to 'make an atonement,' which may imply that the uncleanness was a penal infiction, though this is nowhere stated. The (older?) rite, which readmits the leper to the camp, is the only one prescribed for the cleansing of a house from the plague of leprosy, whilst leprosy in a garment, if it ceases to spread, is sufficiently purged by two washings.¹ Much of the rite is still transparent. One of the birds is to be held over an earthen vessel full of living water into which the blood of the dead bird falls; the living bird, the cedar, the scarlet, and the hyssop are to be dipped in the water and blood; the leper who is to be cleansed is to be sprinkled with both; and then the living bird is to fly away with the plague of leprosy, as the women with the wind in their wings (Zech. 5⁹) fly away with the wickedness of the land of Israel, or as the goat for Azazel (see AZAZEL) carries away the sin of the congregation into the wilderness. Probably the living bird is dipped in the blood and water to establish a kind of blood brotherhood between it and the leper. If the blood and water were on the leper alone, the release of the living bird might symbolise that he who was hitherto shut up in Israel was now free as the fowls of the air. Living water is, of course, a natural element of all purifications; Hyssop (q.v.), certainly a popular means of purification (Ps. 51⁷ [9]), according to Pliny (HN xvi. 76) is good for the complexion, and according to others is a saponaceous herb.

What are the cedar and the scarlet for? Cedar wood is aromatic; the bright colour of scarlet may betoken strength and splendour. In the ancient domestic rites of India (SBE 30 281) children are made to touch gold and ghee, that when they grow up they may have riches and food. Remote as the analogy is, we may ask, Is the leper, in virtue of the rite, to dwell in cedar and be clothed with scarlet? See CEDAR.

The cedar, hyssop, and scarlet appear again in the mysterious rite of the Red Heifer whose ashes are used for the water of separation. It had a whole treatise to itself in the Mishna, where its qualifications were elaborated to such a point that at last R. Nisin said that no one since the days of Moses had been able to find one fit to be slain. There is an analogous rite in D (Dt. 21^{1 f.}) When the land is defiled with blood the ordinary way of putting away bloodguiltiness is to shed the blood of the slayer. If he cannot be found the land is made clean again with the blood of an unyoked heifer killed, either by beheading or by breaking the neck (the meaning of the verb araph is not clear), in a barren valley with a running stream in it, where the elders of the city nearest the place where the dead man is found wash their hands of bloodguiltiness over the heifer. A barren valley is chosen, according to Dillmann, Ewald, and Keil, in order that the purifying blood may not be uncovered and lose its virtue; according to Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem. (2) 371), to avoid all risk of contact with sacrosanct flesh. We might ask, Would running water in a fertile valley used for such a rite pollute the fields of offerings? The goat for Azazel is sent into the wilderness. If the heifer is beheaded, her blood is almost certainly intended to 'cover' the blood of the slain. If not, are we to think of Saul's first muster (1 S. 14³² ff.)? Do the elders by implication invoke on themselves the doom of the heifer if their protestation is false? What is the meaning of the obviously popular rite (see COVENANT, § 5) of dividing victims when a covenant is made (Gen. 15¹⁰ Jer. 34^{18 f.})? The rite of the Red Heifer is more general in its intention. Its principal use is not to do away bloodguiltiness, but to cleanse those who are defiled by contact with the dead. Incidentally we learn that it was required for the purification of the vessels of all spoil which will not abide the fire (Nu. 31²³); and the Levites on their consecration are to be purified by what is probably the same, 'the water of sin' (ib. 87). [Aaron and his sons (Ex. 29⁴ and parallels) are washed at their consecration with common

² According to surviving folklore, many things will not 'keep' if made or handled by a person in a state of Levitical 'uncleanness.'

¹ Neither of these laws belongs to the main stock of P, though, if they were later developments, we should expect that the cleansing of a house, at any rate, would have required an offering. In D the dedication of a house has all the look of a survival, and was probably accomplished at one time by sacrifice.

or in any way alluded to; but also it is almost unthinkable that the fourth evangelist presupposes the presence of the mother of John when in 1926 he proceeds: 'when Jesus therefore saw his mother, and the disciple standing by, whom he loved, he saith, etc.' As far as the fourth evangelist is concerned, this scene furnishes a clear motive for thinking not only of the mother of Jesus as present, but also of the mother of John as absent. Lk. 24:10 (at the sepulchre) puts in the place of the mother of John a certain Joanna. If, as he often does, the fourth evangelist is here taking Lk. rather than Mt. or Mk. for his guide, it would be impossible to identify Mary of Clopas with the sister of the mother of Jesus, whose name on this assumption must be taken to be Joanna. It is certain, however, that in Lk. this Joanna is identical with the Joanna who is mentioned in 83 as the wife of a certain Chuza and not stated to have been related to the mother of Jesus. Thus we may take it that it was not she, any more than any of the others, that was intended by the fourth evangelist, and that most probably his reason for mentioning the sister of the mother of Jesus is that, according to Lk. 23:49, 'all his acquaintance' (γινώσκει) are standing by the cross. There is no evidence of any allegorising intention that he could have had in the enumeration of these four (or three) women. Apart from the mother of Jesus and her sister, therefore, the names of the women seem simply to have been taken over from the Synoptists.

Who was the mother of James and Joses, with whom, according to this view, Mary of Clopas would have to be identified? The James in question is often supposed to be the second James in the list of the apostles. With this it seems to agree that Mk. calls him James the Less. Now, this James was a son of Alphæus. Thus Alphæus would appear to be the husband of the Mary mentioned by the Synoptists as present at the cross. From this it is not unusual to proceed to the further combination that in Jn. Clopas is named as the husband of Mary and that he is identical with Alphæus. Philologically the names are distinct (see above, § 1); but the identification is possible if, according to a not uncommon Jewish custom (Acts 123 1225 1319 Col. 411), Clopas had two names. A further step is to bring in at this point the statement of Hegesippus that Clopas was a brother of Joseph the father of Jesus. Over and above this, many proceed to the assumption—shown above (§ 2) to be untenable—that his wife Mary was identical with the sister of the mother of Jesus.

In this case two brothers would have married two sisters, and the second James in the list of apostles would be a cousin of Jesus, and that both on the father's and on the mother's side. Even, however, if we regard Mary of Clopas as a different person from the sister of the mother of Jesus, her son, the second James, as long as he is regarded as the son of Clopas the uncle of Jesus, remains a cousin of Jesus, whilst, according to the identification of the sister of the mother of Jesus with the wife of Zebedee (spoken of above, § 2), this honour would belong rather to the first James and John the sons of Zebedee as being sons of the aunt of Jesus.

The next question that arises is, Who was Joses, the second son of Mary, according to the Synoptists?

4. The sons of Mary = Brothers of Jesus?

In Mk. 63 a Joses is named, along with James, Judas, and Simon, amongst the brethren of Jesus. This has given occasion for crowning the series of combinations which has been already explained, and completing it with a hypothesis whereby it becomes possible to deny the existence of literal brethren of Jesus, and to affirm the perpetual virginity of his mother. Once it is admitted that James and Joses were sons of Clopas (= Alphæus) and of Mary his wife, the same seems to hold good of all the 'brethren of Jesus'. In that case they would be 'brethren of Jesus' only in the sense in which 'brethren' (ἀδελφοί) is used instead of ἀνεψιοί (children of two brothers or two sisters) in 2 S. 209 (cp 1725).

Finally, to this is added, not as a necessary but as a welcome completion of the hypothesis, the suggestion that of the 'brethren of Jesus' not only James but also Simon and Judas were among the apostles.

Both names, in point of fact, occur, at least in Lk. 615 f. Acts 113 (Simon alone in Mk. 318 Mt. 103 f.). With regard to Joses, the fourth of the 'brethren of Jesus,' some have conjectured (carrying out the same hypothesis) that it was he who, according to Acts 123-26, was nominated (though not chosen) as successor to the vacant place of Judas Iscariot. It is true that all the better authorities here read Joseph, not Joses (see BARSABAS); but, on the other hand, this reading being accepted, it can be pointed out that according to the better MSS (at least in Mt. 1355) Joseph, not as in Mk. 63 Joses, is the name of the fourth 'brother' of Jesus.

This whole identification of the 'brethren of Jesus' with apostles or aspirants to the apostleship, however, is quite untenable. According to Mk. 32131 Mt. 1246 f. Lk. 819 Jn. 75, the brethren of Jesus disbelieved his Messiahship while he was alive, and in Acts 114 1 Cor. 95 they are distinctly separated from the apostles.

Even if we give up the identification with apostles, Mary cannot be the mother of the cousins of Jesus.

Had she been so related to Jesus, Mt. and Mk., in seeking to indicate her with precision, would have named not two sons but four; or rather they would have mentioned no names at all, but simply said 'the mother of the cousins of Jesus.' Moreover, it is only of Symeon, the second 'bishop' of Jerusalem, that Hegesippus says he was son of Clopas and cousin of Jesus. If Hegesippus had regarded the four 'brethren of Jesus' as his cousins, he would surely have designated Symeon's predecessor also (James the 'brother' of Jesus) as son of Clopas, and Symeon himself, by whom in this case the Simon of Mk. 63 Mt. 1355 would be meant, he would have designated as brother of James. This, however, is what he does not do: he calls James simply 'the Just' (ὁ δίκαιος), and says (Eus. HE iii. 326) that men 'of the race of the Lord' (ἀπὸ γένους τοῦ κυρίου) had presided over the church (in Palestine) in peace until Symeon the son of Clopas, the uncle of Jesus, was arraigned and crucified; cp iii. 206.¹

Lastly, it is idle to deny the existence of actual 'brethren of Jesus': that is distinctly vouched for by the πρωτόστογον of Lk. 27—an expression all the weightier because it has been already suppressed in Mt. 125.

If James and Joses, the sons of Mary according to the synoptists, are thus no cousins of Jesus, we could all

5. Conclusion. the more readily believe that they were really apostles or at least constant companions (Acts 121) of Jesus. Such an assumption, however, is not borne out by a single hint, and at the stage of the discussion we have now reached it has no more interest than the other which makes Clopas identical with Alphæus and regards him as the husband of Mary. The Mary in question, we are forced to conclude, was simply a woman not known otherwise than as the mother of a James and a Joses. Why is it, then, that the fourth evangelist designates her, not by reference to these sons of hers, but by calling her 'of Clopas'? That he here intends the Cleopas of Lk. 2418 is quite improbable (see CLEOPAS); but neither is it likely that he can have meant a man named Clopas who was wholly unknown to his readers. His allusion must rather have been to the Clopas whom we know from Hegesippus as the brother of Joseph. There is no trace of any allegorising intention in this: we may take it that the evangelist is following tradition. It is possible, therefore, that Clopas was the husband of Mary, in which case James and Joses are cousins of Jesus, but not to be identified with his brothers of the same name, nor yet with the apostle James and the Joseph (or Joses) Barsabas of Acts 123. It is more probable, however, if the prevailing usus loquendi is to be taken as a guide, that Clopas is designated as the father of Mary. In this case it is Mary herself who is the cousin of Jesus. In either case it is remarkable that in the synoptists she should be characterised not by her relationship to Jesus, but simply by mention of her sons; and this on the assumption that it is the uncle of Jesus who is intended, suggests a doubt as to whether the mention of Clopas in this connection is correct.

¹ In Eus. HE iii. 201 Hegesippus speaks of οἱ ἀπὸ γένους τοῦ κυρίου νιῶντοὶ Ἰουδα, τοῦ κατὰ σάρκα λεγομένου αὐτοῦ ἀδελφοῦ; and in iv. 224 he says that ὁ ἐκ θεοῦ αὐτοῦ [Jesus] Συμεὼν ὁ τοῦ Κλωπά was ἀνεψιὸς τοῦ κυρίου δευτέρως. Inasmuch as he does not regard James as ἀνεψιὸς πρῶτος, as has been shown, the words δευτέρως and λεγομένου can mean only that he regards Symeon as 'cousin' and Jude as 'brother' of Jesus in a modified sense. He appears, then, to favour the assumption of the παρθενία of Mary at Jesus' birth. All the more remarkable is it that he does not yet seem to have drawn the further consequence of denying other sons to her. His statement that Clopas was the uncle of Jesus, therefore, does not proceed upon any such theory as that in favour of which it has (as we have seen) been applied, and therefore in respect of trustworthiness is open to no suspicion.

CLOTH, CLOTHING

The apocryphal Acts of the Apostles, following the combination mentioned above (§ 4), for the most part identify Symeon, son of Clopas, the second bishop of Jerusalem spoken of by Hegesippus, with the apostle CNIDUS (ΚΝΙΔΟΣ [ANV: Ti. WH]), a city on Cape Crio (anc. Triopium) in the extreme SW. of Asia Minor, between Cos and Rhodes. It was originally built upon the rocky island (νήσος ὑψηλὴ θαλασσοειδής, Strabo, 656) forming the cape, united to the mainland by a causeway, —thus making two harbours, one on the N. and the other on the S. of the isthmus (cp Mitylene and Myndus).

The inhabitants soon spread eastwards over the neighbouring part of the peninsula. The moles of the large southern port are still in existence, as well as much of the ancient city. The situation of Cnidus was eminently favourable to its development as a commercial and naval power; but, curiously like Cos in this respect, it played no part as a naval state—probably owing to the repressive influence of Rhodes.

The commercial importance of the city was inevitable. It lies upon the maritime highway (cp Thuc. 835, περὶ Τριόπιον τὰς ἀπ' Αἰγύπτου ὁκάδας προσβαλλούσας ξυλλαμβάνειν). Very early it had trade with Egypt and shared in the Hellenion at Naucrātis (Herod. 2.198). At least as early as the second century B.C. Cnidus had attracted Jewish settlers, for in 1 Macc. 15.23 it appears in the list of places to which the circular letter of the Roman senate in favour of the Jews (circa 139-8 B.C.) is said to have been addressed. Paul must have passed the city on his way to Caesarea (Acts 21.1f.); but its name occurs only in Acts 27.7 (βραδυνολοοῦντες καὶ μόλις γενόμενοι κατὰ τὴν Κνίδου) after Myra had been passed, on the voyage to Rome. The continuous NW. (Etesian) winds had made the voyage over the 130 m. between Myra and Cnidus tedious; and rendered the direct course from Cnidus, by the N. side of Crete, impossible (μὴ προσεῶντος ἡμᾶς τοῦ ἀνέμου).

The wines of Cnidus, especially the kind called Protropos, excelled any produced in Asia (Str. 637). The best claim of the city to renown lies in the intellectual activity of its inhabitants and their encouragement of art. They possessed, at the Lesche at Delphi, two pictures by Polygnōtus (middle of fifth century; Paus. x. 25.1f.). They bought the Aphrodite of Praxiteles (his masterpiece, quam ut viderent multi navigaverunt Cnidum; Plin. HN xxxvi. 54: the Cnidians especially worshipped Aphrodite, Paus. i. 13). In addition, they had works by Bryaxis and Scopas. Budoxus the astronomer, Ctesias the physician and historian, Agatharchides, and Sostratus the architect who built the Pharos of Alexandria, all belonged to Cnidus (cp Str. 119, 656).

COACH (כֶּזֶב), Is. 66.20 AVmg. See LITTER.

COAL. The coal of OT and NT is undoubtedly charcoal. A piece of black charcoal was termed קֶהָם (qehām;

1. Terms. cp perh. Ass. pēntu [or *pēmtu] 'fire'; Prov. 26.21 [ἐσχάρα], Is. 44.12, 54.16† [ἀνθραξ; carbō]; pieces in process of combustion, 'live coals,' קֶהָם, קֶהָלִים (qahhēlēm, qehhālīm; cp Ar. jahima to glow, and perh. Ass. guhlu, a shining precious stone; ἀνθραξ; prunæ), and often, more precisely, קֶהָלִי (coals of fire), Lev. 16.12, etc. In this distinction, which is not uniformly observed (cp Is. 44.12 54.16), lies the point of the vivid comparison Prov. 26.21 (RV 'as coals are to hot embers,' etc.).

Of the other words rendered by 'coal' in the OT it is sufficient to say that קֶהָם, qehām (Is. 66) is rather a 'hot stone' (so RVmg.; ἀνθραξ), the קֶהָלִים, qahhālīm, of 1 K. 19.6 (ἐκκαυθίας ὀλυφείτης) being, in like manner, the hot stones on which Elijah's cake was baked (see BREAD, § 2.11); that קֶהָלִי, qehhālī, identified by the Rabbins with קֶהָלִי, qehhālī, and twice rendered 'coals' (Ct. 8.6 AV, Hab. 3.5 AV, RVmg.; AVmg. 'burning diseases'), is rather 'flame' or fire-bolt (cp RV);² and that קֶהָלִי, qehhālī (Lam. 4.8; ἀσβόλη; carbonēs; EV, 'their visage is blacker than a coal'), is properly 'blackness' (so the margins; others 'soot' [fuligo]).

The Hebrews doubtless used for fuel as great a variety of woods as the modern Syrians now use (see

2. Fuel. Post in PEFQ, '91, pp. 118 ff.). Several are named in Is. 44.14-16. Ps. 120.4 (RVmg.) mentions 'coals of broom' (קֶהָלִי), a desert shrub which, when reduced to charcoal, throws out an intense heat (on the text see JUNIPER). The references to thorns as fuel (קֶהָלִי, קֶהָלִים) are many; particular mention is made of the buckthorn or perhaps bramble (קֶהָלִי, Ps. 58.9 [10]), of chaff—chopped straw (zibn), the refuse of the threshing-floor (Mt. 3.12),—and of withered herbage (Mt. 6.30 Lk. 12.28). At the present time the favourite fuel of the Bedouin is the dung of camels, cows (cp Ezek. 4.15), asses, etc., which is carefully collected, and, after being mixed with zibn or chopped straw, is made into flat cakes, which are dried and stored for the winter's use. We may assume that this sort of fuel was not so much required before the comparative denudation of the country, though Ezek. 4.12-15 certainly suggests that it was not altogether unknown.

The charcoal was burned in a brasier (קֶהָלִי, Jer. 36.22 ff.; AV 'hearth,' RV 'brasier') or chafing-dish (קֶהָלִי,

3. The hearth. Zech. 12.6, RV 'pan of fire'),—at least in the houses of the wealthy. The 'fire of coals' (ἀνθρακιά) at which Peter warmed himself in the high priest's palace was no doubt a fire of charcoal (so RVmg.) in a brasier³ (Jn. 18.18 21.9).

COASTLAND

In the houses of the humbler classes, the hearth (מִקְרָה, only of altar-hearth Lev. 6:2 [9]; mod. Ar. marḥida) was probably a mere depression in the floor, the smoke escaping, as best it could, through the door or the latticed window (מִקְרָה, Hos. 13:3, EV 'chimney'). See LATTICE. Chimneys there were none; the AV rendering, 'ere ever the chimneys in Zion were hot' in 4 Esd. 6:4, is based on a corruption of the Latin text (RV 'or ever the footstool of Zion was established').

Coal and coals supply a variety of metaphors. Thus 'to quench one's coal' (מִקְרָה 2 S. 14:7; cp the classical

4. Metaphors. ζῶντιον, and see Dr. ad loc.) is a pathetic figure for depriving a person of the privilege of posterity, otherwise expressed as a putting out of one's candle (rather, 'lamp')—Prov. 13:9 etc. To heap 'coals of fire,' or glowing charcoal, on an enemy's head must, it would seem, be to adopt a mode of revenge calculated to awaken the pains of remorse in his breast (Prov. 25:22¹ (MT), Rom. 12:20). Again, 'kindle not the coals of a sinner'—that is, do not stir up his evil passions—is the sage advice of the son of Sirach (Ecclus. 8:10); cp Ecclus. 11:32, 'from a spark of fire a heap of many coals (ἀνθρακιά) is kindled,' which finds an echo in Ja. 3:5. COCK (ἀλεκτωρ), Mt. 26:34 Mk. 13:35 14:30 72 Lk. 22:34 60 Jn. 13:38 18:27. On the 'cock-crowing' (ἀλεκτοροφωνία) spoken of in Mk. 13:35 information is given elsewhere (see DAY, § 4). Mt., Lk., and Jn. speak of only this cock-crowing. The tradition preserved in Mark, on the other hand (though the text in the MSS differs), refers to a second. Thus the cock had completed its journey to Palestine. Its home was in India; thence it came to Babylonia² and Persia. Homer indeed gives Ἀλεκτωρ as the name of a man; but Aristophanes (Av. 438) considers the cock the 'Persian bird.' To the Jews, too, as well as (presumably) to the Egyptians, it was a Persian bird, even though the Targumic and Talmudic word for cock (תרנוול) may have a Babylonian origin.³

Not improbably we have in Prov. 30:31 a reference to the impression which it produced not so long after its introduction into Palestine. The evidence of the versions⁴ in favour of the rendering 'cock' cannot be regarded lightly, and there is no proof whatever of the sense of 'well girt up' for וְהָיָה, or for the application of the term to the greyhound. The Talmudic וְהָיָה also certainly means some bird (a kind of raven).⁵ The key to the difference of usage is supplied by Ar. ṣarṣara, 'to make a shrill noise'; hence ṣarṣarum is used in Arabic for both the cricket and the cock. The kindred Hebrew word also might be widely used: (1) for the cock, (2) for the starling. The second element in the phrase וְהָיָה כְּתִיקָה is seemingly a difficulty. The word is no doubt corrupt. Dyserinch and Grätz would read וְהָיָה כְּתִיקָה; cp ἐνπεριπατῶν. To keep nearer to the Hebrew and to find a more striking phrase, it is better to read וְהָיָה כְּתִיקָה and render 'the cock who loves to take up a quarrel.' EV rather uncritically gives GREYHOUND (g.v.): cp FOWL, § 2.

There is a word in Job 38:36 (שֶׁבִי) which Vg., the two Targs., and Delitzsch render 'cock' (AV 'heart', RV 'mind,' mg. 'meteor'). As, however, it is evident that some sky-phenomenon is meant, we should almost certainly read for שֶׁבִי, קֶשֶׁת, 'the bow star,' to correspond to הַלַּעֲזָז (so read for הַלַּעֲזָז), 'the lance star.' The bow star is Sirius, the lance star Antares. See Che. JBL, 1898. T. K. C.

COCKATRICE is an archaic English word, derived or corrupted from the mediæval Lat. calcatrrix [see the New Eng. Dict., s.v.], but often confounded with 'crocodile'; the form of the word suggested the fable that the animal was hatched by a cock from the egg of a viper. For Pr. 23:32 AV (EVmg. ADDER; RVmg. 'basilisk') and Is. 11:8 59:5 Jer. 8:17 AV (RV 'basilisk,' EVmg. 'or adder'; שֶׁפֶה, šephā) see SERPENT, § 1 (7). For Is. 14:29 (שֶׁפֶה, šephā), EV as before, Vg. regulus see SERPENT, § 1 (6). ἔ has βασιλισκος in Is. 59:5 (EV VIPER, Heb. ephēh) and in Ps. 90:11 13 (EV ADDER, Heb. peṭhen). Horapollon (11) identifies the basilisk with the Egyptian uræus, a golden image of which is the usual ornament of the divine or royal head-dress. Probably this was the kind of serpent meant by ἔ; the uræus, being divine, had of course extraordinary powers (see SERPENT, § 1, nos. 6 and 7). According to Furetère, the cocatrice (cockatrice) is a kind of basilisk which haunts caverns and pits. The name calcatrrix, however, properly means the ichneumon. Under the form Chalcadri, we find it in the Slavonic Secrets of Enoch (12:15 1), where, however, the writer may be thinking of the crocodile. See CROCODILE. T. K. C.

COCKLE, EVmg., better 'noisome weeds' (בִּצְאֵה, bīṣāh; ΒΑΤΟC [BNAC]), Job 31:40. The cognate verb means in Hebrew 'to stink'; but the primary sense of the root, according to Nöideke (ZDMG 40:727 [86]), is the more general one of badness or worthlessness. A kindred substantive is בִּצְאֵה, 'wild grapes' (Is. 5:24). As בִּצְאֵה occurs only once in Hebrew and is unknown to the cognate languages, there is no evidence to justify the identification with a particular plant, such as the 'cockle' of EV; still, as etymology seems to point to some 'stinking weed,' there is something to be said for the suggestion of Sir Joseph Hooker, that perhaps the reference is to the stinking arums.

Several of the arums are plentiful in Syria—e.g., Arum Dioscoridis, Sibth., Arum Palestineum, Boiss., and species of Helicophyllum (cp Tristram, NHB 439). The ancient versions, in supposing that a thorny plant is intended, were no doubt guided by the parallelism of the verse. The older English Versions use 'cockle' as the rendering of βίβλα in Mt. 13. See TARRS.

ἐσπέρα τ. ποτ., in Ezra 4:20 [BA]. With this we may compare the πέραν Εὐφράτου, which, with τὰ κάτω τῆς Ἀσίας μέση (Asia Minor, NW, of Taurus) appears in the famous Gadatas inscription of Darius I. (Bull. Corr. Hell. 13:529 (89), 14:618; cp Meyer, Entst. 19 f.). The same Aramaic designation is found upon a coin of the Persian period 'Mazda . . . who is over קבר קבר Hal. Mél. Épig. 64 f.), and seems to be the origin of the name of the Persian province Arbāya (for another well-supported view, see ARABIA, § 2). Φοινίκη and Ἀραβία occur together as one archonship in the epilogue to the Anabasis (see Marq. Fund. 39 ff.).¹ That the Minæan קבר קבר is to be connected with קבר, arbāya, though affirmed by Hartmann (ZA 118), Meyer (ib. 327), and Marq. (op. cit. 74 f., cp EBER, 1), is strenuously denied by Glaser (cp MVG, 1897, 33 ff.; see Hommel, AHT 324 ff.), who is, however, perhaps too strongly prejudiced in favour of an exceedingly remote date for the inscriptions in question.

Cœlesyria is, strictly, the designation applied since the time of the Seleucidæ to the depression between the 2. Extent. διέ' αὐτὸν of Lebanon (cp Josh. 11:17 12:7), the mod. Bekā'; cp LEBANON.² In the Grecian period the term includes all E. Palestine. Thus, according to Josephus (Ant. i. 115), the seats of the Ammonites and Moabites were in it, and among its towns he mentions Scythopolis and Gadara (ib. xiii. 132 f.). In its widest sense it included Raphia (so Polyb. 580), and stretched 'as far as the river Euphrates and Egypt' (Ant. xiv. 45). In 1 Esd. and Maccabees (see below) these are its limits; and, roughly used, rather in a political than in a geographical sense, it and Phœnicia constitute the more southerly part of the kingdom of the Seleucidæ. At this period the districts referred to appear as one fiscal domain, under the suzerainty of one governor (viz., Apollonius [2 Macc. 35] Ptolemy [88] Lysias [10:1]). Under the Romans the term was again restricted, and Cœlesyria (with Damascus as its capital; cp Ant. xiii. 152 B/1.48) was officially separated from Phœnicia and Judæa (Ant. xii. 4:1 and 4; Pliny, 57). When, therefore, in 47 and 43 B.C., Herod was in command of Cœlesyria, he seems to have possessed no authority over the southern province. S. A. C.

The foreign-looking but really corrupt word argās illustrates the need of a more correct Hebrew text (see TEXT, § 44 f.).

We cannot accept the far-fetched etymologies of Lag. (Übers. 85) and Klo. (Sam., ad loc.). The τ probably sprang out of a 'final nūn' (ן), which was attached as a correction to an ordinary nūn—thus ארון (cp -an [B]). In this case the 'coffer' was really not distinguished in name from the ark (ארון). Or εν θεματι (ⲙ, cp Lev. 24:6)—i.e., בְּכֶפֶז—'in a pile,' may represent the true text; but more probably θέμα=θήκη=θήκη 'box.' See Che. Exp. T. 10:521 (Aug. COLHOZEH (קֹלְחֹזֶה, § 23, as if 'he seeth all'), a Jerusalemite of Nehemiah's time (Neh. 3:15; om. BNA, χολοζει [L]; 115, χαλεα [BN], -λαζα [A], χο. [L]). As misleading a name as Pahath-moab or as Hallohesh. A clan of 'seers' at this period would of course be interesting; but the name is miswritten for קֹלְחֹזֶה (EV 'Hallohesh'), probably under the influence of the name Hazaiah, which follows in Neh. 11:5. קֹלְחֹזֶה itself is miswritten. See HALLOHESH. T. K. C.

COLIUS (κωλιος [A]), 1 Esd. 9:23=Ezra 10:23, KELAIAH (g. v.).

COLLAR. 1. 'Collars' in AV Judg. 8:26 become in RV 'pendants' (כַּוְנִיּוֹת). See RING, § 2.

2. 'Collar' is also applied, inappropriately, to the round hole (קֶרֶן) for the head and neck in a garment. So in Job 30:18, 'It bindeth me about as the collar of my coat' (EV), and in Ps. 133:2 (RVmg.), 'that flows down to the collar of his robes' (Kay). 'Collar' here should be 'opening.'

In Ps. l.c., however, it is thought that the border of the opening, rather than the opening itself, must be intended. ⲙ Sym. have ἐπὶ τὴν ὥαν—i.e., the lambskin trimming or edging on the neck-opening (cp Tg. אֵיטֶר, 'fringe'). EV, however, ventures on 'skirts (skirt) of his garments'; the revisers felt that, even if AV gave an improbable rendering, they had nothing better to set in its place. The text can perhaps be corrected (see Che. P.s. (2)); it is certainly not right as it stands. In Job l.c., Budde and Duim prefer to render 'even as my tunic'; but this does not make the passage clear. There is reason to think (Che. Exp. Times, 10:382 [May '99]) that we should read קֶרֶן in ψ. 133 (ⲙ ἐπελάβετο) and כַּוְנִיּוֹת in ψ. 133, and render

By (his) great power he takes hold of my garment,
By the opening of my tunic he grasps me.

The word rendered in these two passages 'collar' becomes 'hole' in EV of Ex. 28:32; the context suggested this. The 'hole for the head' (RV) in the priestly me'il (robe) was to have a 'binding (lit. lip) round about'; the material cut out was to be folded over, and so to make what might fairly be called a collar. In later Heb. we find the terms פֶּתַח (opening) or בֵּית הַצֹּמֵר (receptacle of the neck).

3. RVmg. gives 'collar' for a certain instrument of punishment (קֶרֶן, sinōk, Jer. 29:26, AV 'stocks,' RV 'shackles'). The root (like קָנָן) in Aramaic and Talmudic means to bind, to confine. Qimhi takes it to be a manacle for hands, not a collar. Orelli, on the other hand, compares Arab. sināḥ (necklace). ⲙ BNAQ εἰς τὸν καταράκτην represents קֶרֶן and can scarcely be correct.

COLLEGE, RV SECOND QUARTER (כִּלְיָה; Vg. Secunda), as if the 'new town' of Jerusalem (2 K. 22:14=2 Ch. 34:22; Zeph. 1:10). The rendering 'college' is due to Tg. Jon. 2 K. 22:14 בְּבֵית אִלְפִּינָה, 'in the house of instruction.' See JERUSALEM.

The text is, however, plainly corrupt. In Zeph. 1:10 the natural parallel to the 'fish gate' is the 'gate of the old' (see Neh. 12:39, where these gates are mentioned together). For מִן הַשָּׁעַר הַזֶּה, therefore, read מִן הַשָּׁעַר הַזֶּה 'from the gate of the old city.' Similarly in 2 K. and 2 Ch. l.c. (see HULDAH). See also HASSENUAH. In 2 K. 22:14, μασσενα [BA], -εννα [L], AVmg. 'second part,' RVmg. 'Heb. Mishneh.' In 2 Ch. 34:22, μασσαναι [B], μεισαναι [A], μασσενηνα [L], AVmg. 'in the school,' or 'in the second part,' RVmg. 'Heb. Mishneh.' In Zeph. 1:10, τῆς δευτέρας [BNAQ]; AV 'the second.'

writers, and some mod. edd.: the latter form was possibly the native pronunciation¹), a town on the S. bank of the Lycus (Churuk Su), a tributary of the Maeander, in that part of the Roman province of Asia which the Greeks called Phrygia. In the neighbourhood of Colossæ were Hierapolis and Laodicea (cp Col. 2:14:15f.). As those two cities rose in importance, Colossæ seems to have continuously declined (cp Rev. 1:11:14, where the church in Laodicea ranks among the seven great churches of Asia). Herodotus (7:30; cp Xen. Anab. i. 2:6) speaks of Colossæ as 'a city of great size': but in Strabo's time Laodicea is numbered among the greatest of the Phrygian cities, whilst Colossæ, although it had some trade, is only a πόλις (Strabo, 576, 578). In Paul's time Pliny (HN 5:41) enumerates it among the celeberrima oppida of the district; but that is merely historical retrospect. Its geographical position, on the great route leading from Ephesus to the Euphrates (it was passed, e.g., by Xerxes in his march through Asia Minor, Herod. l.c.), was important. Hence arises the question as to whether the place was ever visited by Paul.

On his third journey Paul 'went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order' (Acts 18:23), and, 'having passed through the upper coasts (τὰ ἀνω περικὰ μέρη) came to Ephesus' (Acts 19:1). The natural route would certainly be that with it, followed by commerce, which would pass through Colossæ, though travellers might, as Ramsay suggests (Ch. in R. Emp. 94), take a road to the northward, avoiding the Lycus valley entirely. It is, however, open to us to admit that the apostle may have passed through the town without making any stay. It seems distinctly to follow from Col. 2:1 ('as many as have not seen my face in the flesh') that at the date of writing Paul was not personally acquainted with the Colossian church; but it would be unsafe to argue that he had not seen the town itself. If he did no missionary work there on his third journey through Asia Minor, it is impossible to assign his assumed activity at Colossæ to the second journey on the strength of the expression 'gone throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia' (Acts 16:6): on that occasion he diverged northwards from the eastern trade route leading by way of Colossæ to Ephesus, and ultimately reached Troas (v. 7 f.). Further, although ethnologically Colossæ ranked as a Phrygian town, politically it belonged to Asia, a province which was altogether barred to missionary effort on the occasion of the second journey (Acts 16:6; see ASIA, PHRYGIA).

It would still be possible to argue that Paul established the Colossian church on an unrecorded visit made from Ephesus during his three years' stay there (cp Acts 19:10, 'so that all they which dwell in Asia heard the word'). Nevertheless, Col. 1:4 ('since we heard of your faith') 18:21 are opposed to the idea of personal effort on his part, especially when contrasted with such passages as Gal. 1:6 1 Cor. 3:1-10, where we have positive claim to the foundation of the churches addressed. Nor is it allowable to insist that Epaphras and Philemon, who were certainly Colossians (Col. 4:12), must necessarily have been converted by Paul at Colossæ itself. The Colossian church was an indirect product of the apostle's activity at Ephesus. To whom, then, must the actual foundation be ascribed? Probably to Epaphras, who is called 'a faithful minister of Christ' for the Colossians (ὕπερ ὑμῶν, so AV: better ὕπερ ἡμῶν, 'on our behalf,' RV), and their teacher (Col. 1:7, cp 4:12:13), although the honour has been claimed for Timotheus, on the ground that his name is joined with that of Paul in the Salutation (Col. 1:1).

COLOSSIANS AND EPHESIANS

It is clear from Philem. 22 that Paul looked forward to visiting Colossæ after his first imprisonment at Rome: whether he effected his purpose is not known.

3. The Colossian Church. (but cp 2 Tim. 4:20). Among the members of the Colossian church, besides Epaphras, Philemon with his wife APPHIA and slave Onesimus (Philem. 2:10¹), we hear of Archippus, perhaps son of Epaphras (Philem. 2 Col. 4:17). With regard to the composition of the church, we may say that it consisted chiefly of Gentiles, in this case the descendants of Greek settlers and native Phrygians, deeply imbued with that tendency to mystical fanaticism which was characteristic of the Phrygian race. Very soon, therefore, they fell away to angel-worship and a misdirected asceticism (Col. 2:16-18 21-23). The former heresy is illustrated by the famous ναὸς ἀρχαγγελικός or ναὸς τοῦ Ἀρχιστρατήγου (church dedicated to Michael), mentioned by Nicetas Choniates as standing at the chasm of the Lycus. The tradition is that the archangel opened the chasm and so saved the Christians of Chonas from destruction by an inundation. In the fourth century a Council at Laodicea condemned this angel-worship. Theodoret also speaks of the existence of the heresy in this region. Cp ANGEL, § 9.

The construction of a strong castle at Chōnai (mod. Chōnas), 3 m. S. of Colossæ, was perhaps the work of Justinian. During the seventh or eighth century A.D., under the pressure of Arab incursions, the town in the plain was gradually deserted and forgotten. Hence Nicetas says that Chonai (his own birthplace) and Colossæ were one and the same place (ed. Bonn, 403). The idea even arose that the Colossians of the epistle were the Rhodians (cp Rams. Cit. and Bish. 1:214). The Colossians of Cedr. 1758 are the Paulicians of the Church of Argasous in Armenia.

COLOSSIANS² and EPHESIANS,³ Epistles to the.

These two epistles are related so closely that they cannot without disadvantage be considered separately.

Colossians consists of two distinct portions: the one didactic and polemical, the other practical and hortatory, the whole being rounded off by the superscription (1:1 f.) at the beginning, and by commendations of the bearer, greetings and other messages, and the writer's autograph greeting at the close (4:7-18).

In the introduction, 1:3 f., Paul, as his custom is, gives thanks for the conversion of those whom he is addressing, and expresses the wish that they may continue to grow in all wisdom.

At v. 13, by a gentle transition, he passes over into a Christological discourse setting forth the transcendent glory of the Son, and how he is head of the universe and of the Church, in whom all heaven and the whole earth are reconciled to God (vv. 14-20); in vv. 21-23 the readers' personal interest in Christ's work of reconciliation is affirmed, and in vv. 24-29 Paul goes on to say that he has had it committed to his special charge to proclaim the great secret of the universality of salvation, whence it is that he labours and cares so specially for the interests of his readers. In 2:1-23 the main business of the epistle is entered upon—an earnest warning against false teachers, who, holding out hopes of an illusory perfection, wish to substitute all sorts of Gentile and Jewish religious observances in the place of 'Christ alone.'

With the exhortation (3:1-4) to live their lives in the heavenly manner, and conformably to the new life, the apostle passes to the practical portion of the epistle. Here in the first instance (3:5-17) the sins of the old man that are to be laid aside and the virtues of the new man that are to be put on are indicated somewhat generally; then (3:18-4:1) the duties of wives and husbands, children and parents, servants and masters are specially described, with (4:2-6) an urgent call to continual prayer (including prayer for the success of his own mission) and to wise and discreet employment of speech in their dealings with the unconverted.

The contents of Ephesians are, on the whole, similar to those of Colossians; but the polemical part and epistolary accessories are given much more briefly.

2. Contents of Eph. (only a superscription 1:1 f., and in 6:21-24, a sentence devoted to the bearer of the epistle, with parting good wishes), whilst all the rest is treated with greater amplitude. The doctrinal portion extends from 13 to 32. Here it cannot be said that any one has as yet quite succeeded in pointing out any very clear and consecutive process of thought, or methodical elaboration of definite themes. To find, for example, in 13-14 'the operations of divine grace,' and, more explicitly, in vv. 3 ff. 'what God the Father,' in vv. 7 ff. 'what God the Son,' and in vv. 13 ff. 'what God the Spirit has done,' is to force the text into moulds of thought that are foreign to it. Strictly, this part of the epistle is simply a parallel, carried out with unwonted fullness, to the thanksgivings with which Paul is accustomed to introduce all his letters:—an act of praise to God who has wrought for all mankind deliverance from sin and misery through Christ and his gospel, and who has made the Church, of which Christ is the head, to be the centre of a new and glorious world.

In 13-14 Paul begins, then, with praise to God who from all eternity has graciously chosen his people to salvation; in 15-23 he expresses his special joy that his readers are among those who have thus been chosen. 21-22 brings into a strong and vivid light the absoluteness of the contrast between their former and their present state, and the fact that the happy change is due to divine grace alone; further, it is taught that the distinction between the uncircumcised and the circumcised people of the promise has been obliterated by the blood of Christ (21-23), and that, in the new spiritual building, where Christ is the chief corner stone, those who were afar off are incorporated as well as those who were nigh (24-25); there are no more strangers and foreigners. To proclaim the full and unimpaired interest of the Gentiles in the gospel has been the noble function divinely assigned to Paul (31-32); his readers must not allow his present tribulations to shake their confidence in any way (33). His prayer (34 ff.), closing with a doxology (20 ff.), is that they may ever go on growing in faith, in love, and in knowledge, until at last nothing more is wanting in them of all the fullness of God.

41-46, at the beginning of the practical section, urges the readers to give practical effect to the union that has thus been brought about, to walk worthily of the Christian vocation, and each to take his part in the common task according to the measure of his power, so that the whole may ever grow up more fully into Christ. What yet remains of the old man and heathen life must be sedulously put away (47-50); truthfulness, uprightness, and kindness of speech and act must be cultivated as the true bases of social life (42-52); of these we have the best examples in the love of God and Christ (51 ff.). In 53-21 personal holiness and the walk of believers as wise and pure children of light are further described. In 52-20 the duties of members of households in their several places and relations are treated in the same order as in Col. 318 ff.; and the very elaborate figure of the Christian panoply in 610-20 with the exhortation to carry on the warfare against the powers of evil with courage and boldness—a warfare in which he too would be so glad to join them as a free man—forms a fine close.

COLOSSE (q.v.) lay not far from the larger cities of Laodicea and Hierapolis, with the churches of which

3. Church of Colossæ. the Colossian Christians, it is clear, had kept up intimate relations from the first (Col. 21 41315 ff.). These churches were not among those which had been directly founded by Paul; according to 21 (123) they had not yet seen him personally; their founder, according to 412 f. 17, had been a certain Epaphras. The fact that at the time when the epistle is being written Epaphras is with Paul of itself goes far to prove that he stood to him in the relation of a disciple; in any case Paul recognises the gospel proclaimed by him as the true one and not requiring correction. When these churches were founded is not said; but they do not seem to have had a long history; we may venture to fix the date somewhere between the years 55 and 60 A.D. As, according to 411 f., their founder was a Gentile Christian, we may take it that the great majority of the members also were Gentile Christians, an inference that is enforced by 121 27 f. 213. Thus Paul had a double right to regard them as belonging to his missionary field.

EPHESUS (q.v.) is the city in which, according to Acts 19810 (cp 2031), Paul for more than two years—

4. Of Ephesus. approximately between 55 and 58 A.D. (see CHRONOLOGY, § 68 f.)—in the teeth of great hindrances (see 1 Cor. 1532), had laboured with unwonted success in the cause of the gospel, which, until his arrival, had been practically unheard of there. At last the riot stirred up by Demetrius the silversmith, described in Acts 1923 ff., exposed his life to such serious danger (2 Cor. 18 ff.) that he was compelled to abandon the city for good, and betake himself elsewhere—to Macedonia, in the first instance (Acts 201). The events of that period did not prove fatal to the church at Ephesus: in Rev. 21-7 it stands at the head of the churches in Asia, and it is highly probable that Rom. 16 is a fragment of a letter addressed to it by Paul (Aquila and Prisca, v. 3 f., as well as Epænetus, 'who is the first-fruits of Asia unto Christ,' v. 5, are among the saluted). In any case the apostle kept up a lively interest in this church, and maintained intimate relations with it. The writer of the 'we-source,' however, in Acts 2017-30, describes a most affecting leave-taking between Paul and the elders of Ephesus, whom the former had asked to meet him at Miletus as he was on his way to Jerusalem, and plainly he regards it as having been final. Of what elements the Ephesian church was composed we have no means of judging, apart from Rom. 16; the probability is that the majority were converted pagans; but it is nevertheless certain that the Jews in Ephesus were numerous, and we can well suppose that others of their number besides Aquila and Prisca had joined themselves to the company of believers in Jesus as the risen Messiah. In fact, when Paul, in Acts 2029 ff., in looking forward to the time after his departure, speaks of the appearance of false teachers and ravening wolves in Ephesus, Judaizers may very well have been meant. Unfortunately the references to Ephesus in the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim. 13 2 Tim. 11518 412) throw no light on the subsequent history of Christianity there. All we can be sure of is that the apostle, after so long a residence, must have become acquainted in a very special manner with the peculiarities of the situation.

Even without any special occasion, perhaps, Paul might very well have written an epistle to the church

5. Occasion of Col. of Colossæ at the time he did. Its founder had informed him of the orderly walk and steadfastness in the faith of its members, and doubtless also of their sympathy with himself. It was natural enough, therefore, that he should at least assure them of his gladness over the good beginnings they had made, all the more as a suitable opportunity had offered itself for communicating with them. Onesimus (49) was being sent back to his master, Philemon, with a short letter; Tychicus, a member of the Pauline circle, was accompanying him, and it was almost a matter of course that he should be entrusted with letters of introduction to the churches whose hospitality he expected to enjoy. The epistle to the Colossians, however, is more than a mere occasional writing. The probability is that Paul's determination to write it was formed immediately on receiving the communication from Epaphras as to the condition of Christianity in the Lycus valley; false teachers had made their appearance in Colossæ, and Epaphras himself felt unable, single-handed, to cope with their sophistries. To deal with these is the writer's main object; even where he is not expressly polemical, as in chaps. 1 and 3, his aim is to establish a correct understanding of the gospel as against their wisdom, falsely so called.

If the picture of the Colossian false teachers does not present such well-marked features as that of the Galatian

6. False teachers. false apostles, there is no occasion for surprise, for Paul knew the latter personally, the others only by hearsay. That the Colossian agitators must have belonged to the same class as others that we read of in other places is too much to assume. Many of the observations of Paul would apply well to Judaizers—as for example the marked emphasis with which it is said (211 f.) that the Colossians are circumcised with a circumcision not made with hands, and (2:14) that the handwriting against us has been nailed to the cross and so cancelled. In particular the exhortation of 2:16, 'Let no man judge you in meat or in drink, or in respect of a feast day or a new moon or a sabbath day,' seems decisive as to the Jewish character of the new teachers; in this connection the question of 2:20 (cp 2:8) cannot fail to suggest Gal. 4:3-9, and one is strongly inclined to presume the condition of matters in Colossæ to have been similar to that in Galatia. Only, it is commands and precepts of men that are being imposed with a 'touch not, taste not, handle not' (2:8, 22), it is an 'arbitrary religion' (ἐθελοθρησκία) that is being thrust upon the Colossians (2:23)—in such terms Paul could hardly have described a return to compliance with the injunctions of the OT law.

As the ascetic interest (2:23, 'severity towards the body'; 2:18, 23, 'humility') has a foremost place with the false teachers, many take them to have been Christian Essenes or ascetics of an Essene character (cp ESSENES, § 3 f.). But it has to be remembered that ascetic tendencies were very widely spread at that time, and that they first came into Judaism from without.

According to 2:8 the agitators gave themselves out to be philosophers. Paul indeed regards their wisdom as 'vain deceit'—according to 2:18 they 'are vainly puffed up by their fleshly mind,' and with deceiving speeches seek to lead their hearers astray—and when he so strikingly emphasises that in Christ Christians already possess the 'truth' ('all wisdom and spiritual understanding,' 'all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,' 1:6, 9, 10, 26 ff. 2:3), and so zealously points out what is the right way to perfection (1:28, 3:14, 4:12), all that we can infer from this is, that the innovators in Colossæ came forward with a claim to be able to lead their followers from faith to knowledge, true wisdom, and a perfect Christianity. In doing so they appealed to visions they had seen (2:18); their knowledge of the celestial world entitled them, they contended, formally to set up a worship of angels, by which, however, Christ was thrust out from his central position as the only redeemer (2:19). Paul supplies no details of their speculations as to the powers and functions of these celestial spirits; but any such theosophy as this cannot be called Jewish in any specific sense. How far a religiously objectionable dualistic view of the universe lay at the bottom of the peculiar doctrines and precepts of these men will probably never be known; but that Paul should raise his voice so earnestly against them while taking up an attitude so different towards the 'Essenising' weak brethren in Rome (Rom. 14 f.)—although they do not appear to have attacked him personally at all—shows that he, for his part, discerned in them a spirit that was foreign to Christianity and hostile to it. As their philosophical tendencies and their worship of angels do not fit in with the theory that they were Jews (here Alexandrianism helps us no better than Essenism), it will doubtless be best to regard these Colossian false teachers as baptised 'mysteriorophists,' who sought to bring their ascetic tendencies with them into the new religion, and had found means to satisfy their polytheistic instincts by the forms of a newly-invented worship of angels. In doing so they prided themselves on their compliance with all the demands of the OT, though in detail they of course interpreted these in an absolutely arbitrary way. It was this method of an affected interpretation of the OT, claimed by them to be a guarantee of wisdom, that gave them something of a Judaising appearance; but in so far as their ideas had any individuality (as, for example, the notion that between man and the extra-mundane God there is a series of intermediate beings, and that the thing of essential importance is to secure the favour of these mediators or to know how to avoid their evil influences) they were of heathen not Jewish origin.

The Pauline authorship of Colossians has been denied in various quarters since Mayerhoff (1838), and, in particular, by the Tübingen School en masse. The external testimony to its genuineness is the best possible —ever since a collection of Pauline letters existed at all, Colossians seems to have been invariably included. In form, nevertheless, the epistle presents many striking peculiarities. It contains a large number of words which Paul nowhere else uses—amongst them, especially, long composites such as πιθανολογία (2:4), ἐμβάτευεν (2:18); and on the other hand many of the apostle's most current expressions, such as ἐτι, διό, ἀρα, are absent, and in the structure of the sentences there are fewer anacoloutha than elsewhere in Paul, as well as a greater number of long periods built up of participial and relative clauses.

These difficulties, however, apply only to the first half of the epistle, and even here the genuine Pauline element is still more in evidence than the peculiarities just indicated; the difficulty and obscurity of the style, so far as old age or passing ill-health may not be regarded as sufficient explanation, can be accounted for on the ground that Paul had not so lively and vivid a realisation of the exact opponents with whom he had to do, as in the case of those of Galatia or Corinth. But in substance also the Epistle has been held to be un-Pauline. It

8. Ideas. has been held to represent the transition stage between the Pauline and the Johannine theology—a further development of the Pauline conception of the dignity of Christ (1:15 ff.), in the direction of the Alexandrian Logos-doctrine, according to which he is regarded as the centre of the cosmos, the first-born of all creation (1:15), no longer as the first-born among many brethren only (Rom. 8:29). Formulæ like that in 2:9, 'in him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily,' it is urged, have a somewhat gnostic ring; the representation of the Church as being the body of Christ (1:24, 2:19), further, is said to be post-Pauline, whilst Paul himself never gave ethical precepts in such detail as we find in 3:18 ff.

In answer to all this, it can hardly be denied that Colossians exhibits a new development of Pauline Christology; but why should not Paul himself have carried it on to this de-

9. Genuineness not disproved. velopment in view of new errors, which demanded new statements of truth? The fact is, that in some cases, probably, he has simply appropriated and applied to Christ formulæ (as, say, in 2:9) which the false teachers had employed with reference to their mediating beings; and his theology as a whole never became fully rounded and complete in such a sense as to exclude fresh points of view or new expressions.

Unmistakable traces of an undoubtedly later age cannot be shown in the epistle, while whole sections, such as chap. 4, can hardly be understood as the work even of the most gifted imitator. None of the gnostic systems of the second century known to us can be shown to be present in Colossians, whilst the false teachers with whom the epistle makes us acquainted could have made their appearance within the Christian Church in the year 60 A.D. just as easily as in 120.

There seems no cogent reason even for the invention of a mediating hypothesis—whether that of Ewald, which makes Timothy, joint-writer of Colossians, responsible for certain un-Pauline expressions, or that of Holtzmann, according to which an epistle of Paul was gone over in the second century by the author of Ephesians. With the one hypothesis it is impossible to figure clearly to oneself how the work of writing the letter was gone about; and the other it is impossible to accept unless we choose to admit irreconcilable traits in the picture of the false teachers—as, perhaps, that Paul himself wrote only against 'Essenising' ascetics, whilst the theosophic angelology was due entirely to the interpolator, who had other opponents in his mind. Even in its most difficult parts, however, the connection in the epistle is not so loose as ever to force upon one the impression that there must have been interpolation; and, as regards certain of the difficulties raised by criticism, it is to be remarked that caution is always necessary in dealing with literary productions of a period so obscure. Colossians may be Pauline quite as well as Philippians or 1 Thessalonians. The number of those who doubt its genuineness does not grow.

Colossians was written in captivity (43-58), at the same time as Philemon, probably from Rome (not from 10. Date. Caesarea), about 63 A.D. The apostle is surrounded by friends—Epaphras, Mark, Aristarchus, Demas, Luke, Jesus Justus. Whether Philippians was written before Colossians and Philemon, or whether Philippians should be regarded as the apostle's last writing is difficult to decide, quite apart from the question of a second captivity. The Christological portion of Philippians (24 ff.) has much in common with Colossians.

If Ephesians also is really the work of Paul (see below, § 15 f.), it must have been written almost contemporaneously with Colossians. It is true, indeed, that in Col. 11, as in Phil. 11, 11. Relation to Eph. Timothy is named as joint-writer, while he is not mentioned in Ephesians. From this, however, it cannot be argued that the situations were materially different, any more than it could be argued that Colossians and Philemon must be of different date because in the list of those who send greetings in Philem. 23 f. we do not find the Jesus Justus named in Col. 411, or because, in Philem. 23 f., Epaphras is called a fellow-prisoner and Aristarchus a fellow-worker, whilst in Col. 410 ff. Aristarchus, as a fellow-prisoner, heads the list of those who send greetings, and Epaphras seems to be regarded as one of the fellow-workers. In Eph. 3:13 620 also Paul is a prisoner, yet as much burdened with work as in Col. 1:24-29 43 f. Tychicus is introduced in Eph. 621 f. as bearer of the letter, and as one who will be able to give further particulars as to the apostle's state, in almost the same words as in Col. 47 f.; and although there is no mention of Onesimus in Ephesians, we must hold that both epistles refer to the same mission.

The frequent verbal coincidences between Colossians and Ephesians even in points in which the phraseology is a matter of indifference (cp. for example, Eph. 115 f. and Col. 13 f. 9; Eph. 21 and Col. 121 213; Eph. 620 and Col. 434), unless we have here a case of deliberate imitation by a later writer, are intelligible only if we assume the one letter to have been written when Paul's mind was still full of the thoughts and expressions of the other. Of Colossians the only portions not finding a parallel in Ephesians are: the polemical section, 21-34 (although indeed 210-14 is again an exception), and the greetings in 410-18a; of Ephesians, on the other hand, the only portions not finding a parallel in Colossians are: the introduction (13-14), the liturgically-phrased section (313-21), the exhortation to peaceful co-operation (41-16), and the figure of the spiritual armour, although in this case also some reminiscences are not wholly wanting in Colossians.

That the one letter is a pedantic reproduction of the other cannot be said. If we possessed only one of them it could not be called a mere compilation or paraphrase. The parallel passages to Col. 1, for example, lie scattered up and down Eph. 1-4 (or 5) in a wholly different order, and there is no trace of any definite method according to which the one writing has been used for the other. There is no sort of agreement among critics on the question as to which of the two is the original form; but the present writer inclines to consider Ephesians the later, partly because in Colossians the various details and peculiarities are better accounted for by the needs of a church not yet far advanced ethically, and exposed to danger from false teaching, and it would have been rather contrary to what might have been expected if Paul had first sought to meet these very special needs by means of a letter of a more general character.

Of all Paul's epistles addressed to churches, Ephesians is certainly the least epistolary in character. One

12. Character of Eph. vainly examines the circumstances of those to whom it is addressed to find occasion for its composition. The epistle, which has a personal tinge in only a few places, could have been written equally well to almost any other church; it is more of a sermon than of a letter—a sermon on the greatness of that Gospel which is able to bridge over all the old contradictions in humanity, and on the grandeur of that one Church of Christ by which salvation is made sure, and on the precepts by which the members of this Church ought to regulate their lives. One commentator indeed goes so far as to say that in Ephesians 'we have the most mature and sustained of all the statements of Christian doctrine which have come down to us from the hand of the great apostle.' Other students may perhaps think Galatians and Corinthians more vivid and powerful, Romans richer, Philippians more sympathetic, but certainly so far as the thing can be done at all within the compass of one short letter, Paul has laid down in Ephesians something like an exhaustive outline of his Gospel. Viewed on its anti-Jewish or supra-Jewish side, however, it is much too slightly wrought out.

With regard to the question, to whom Ephesians was addressed, the only thing quite certain is, that if the

13. To whom addressed. epistle was written by Paul it cannot have been addressed to Ephesus. Even after all has been said by the apologists it remains incredible that he should have written to a church to which he had devoted three years of his life and to which, even after his final parting, his heart still yearned so tenderly, in so cold a tone as here,—without a word of greeting to anybody, without reference to any of their common memories, in short without a single individualising note of any kind. Even apart from 115 and 32-4 no one could suspect that the apostle is here speaking to a church with which his acquaintance was so intimate as it was with the Ephesians. If his acquaintance with the Colossians was formed only by report, every reader of the present epistle must hold the same to be true of this. If the words 'in Ephesus' in 11 are to be held to be original, we have here no composition of Paul the prisoner, writing in 63 A.D., but the work of a later hand who has artificially adapted himself to the part of the apostle but who wholly failed to realise how grossly improbable were the relations between Paul and the Ephesians as indicated by him.

But these decisive words—ἐν Ἐφέσῳ—are critically open to the gravest suspicion. It is true that from the date of the Muratorian Canon (about 180) onwards they are attested by witnesses innumerable; but an older authority—Marcion—about 140, cannot have read them where they now stand, since he took the epistle to be addressed to the Laodiceans; they are absent also from both of the oldest extant MSS. (N and B); and learned Church fathers, such as Origen in the third century and Basil in the fourth, agree in their omission. Not till the fifth century do we find the words regularly established in the recognised texts. But it is highly improbable that an original reading ἐν Ἐφέσῳ should ever have come to be deleted (let us suppose) on critical grounds; for the exercise of criticism in this sense was unknown in the second century, and, if it had been, its exercise here would not have been content with a mere negative, but would have gone on to substitute the reading that was considered to be more appropriate. It is absolutely impossible that the oldest text should not have contained the name of some place; a name is rendered quite indispensable by the context 'to the saints which are . . .'

The only remaining alternative is that we should 14. A 'Catholic' epistle. suppose the original name to have accidentally disappeared and that ἐν Ἐφέσῳ was conjecturally inserted in its place, the determining consideration being that

COLOSSIANS AND EPHESIANS

Paul must surely, once at least in his life, have written a letter to his beloved Ephesians. If Marcion read ἐν Λαοδικείᾳ instead of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, it was only because he thought this a preferable conjecture; what he had in his mind was Col. 4:16, where an epistle to the Laodiceans is spoken of, which the Colossians also are bidden obtain a reading of. The letter alluded to must have been nearly contemporaneous with that to the Colossians; we may venture to conjecture that the then conditions in Laodicea were very similar to those in Colossæ, so that on the present assumption the correspondences between the two letters become easily explicable. Tychicus then also will become the bearer of both letters. Only, on the other side again, it is not easy to understand in this case how it is that Paul treats the Colossians with so much greater intimacy and cordiality than he treats their neighbours the Laodiceans; how, further, he should invite comparisons by bidding the churches exchange letters with each other; and, lastly, how in spite of the labour expended in behalf of the Laodiceans by Epaphras (Col. 4:13), Paul should not think it necessary to enclose a greeting from him.

The attitude of Ephesians, with its absence of explicit and detailed reference to the circumstances and stage of growth of its readers, is, on the assumption of its being a Pauline letter, intelligible only if its destination excluded such individual reference; in other words, if it was really not addressed to any one church, but was a circular intended for a number of Gentile Christian churches (in the present case in Asia Minor, or, more precisely, in Phrygia)¹—which Tychicus on the occasion of his journey to Colossæ was to visit, conveying to them at the same time also a direct message from the great apostle of the Gentiles.

It is not, after all, beyond possibility, however, that Ephesians may be the epistle referred to in Col. 4:16; for there it is called, not the epistle to Laodicea, but the epistle from Laodicea, by which expression may have been intended nothing more than a copy of Ephesians to be obtained at Laodicea. In the original superscription, if this be so, we may suppose Paul to have named the province or provinces to the churches of which he wished to address himself (cp 1 Pet. 1:1); the epistle would then have an almost 'catholic' character, and, in point of fact, next to Colossians, 1 Peter, of all the other NT epistles, is the one that comes nearest Ephesians in substance.

The whole preceding discussion (§ 13 f.) falls to the ground if, as was done by the Tübingen school and still is done by many recent writers, the Pauline authorship is denied. The external testimony is the best possible:

15. Genuine- from Marcion's time onwards the epistle is included in all lists of Paul's writings, and from the second century onwards the citations from it are exceptionally frequent. On the other hand, in form and style it is removed still further than Colossians from the manner of the earlier epistles of Paul; the number of ἄπαξ λεγόμενα is astonishingly great; whilst in Paul the devil is called Satan, here (Eph. 4:27 6:11) he is called διάβολος or (22) 'prince of the kingdom of the air';² the structure of the sentences is strikingly lumbering; substantives closely allied in meaning are constantly linked together by prepositions—especially ἐν—or by the use of the genitive, an expedient that conduces neither to freedom nor to clearness of style. At the same time the epistle has a number of characteristically Pauline expressions, including some that do not occur in Colossians, and at every step genuinely Pauline turns of thought are recalled.

The absence of concrete details in Ephesians has already been noted; but, if it be true that we have here a circular letter, the standards which we might apply to Corinthians or Philippians cease to be applicable.

² In Paul he is called also, however, βελίας (2 Cor. 6:15) and 'the god of this world' (2b. 4:4). See BELIAL.

Peculiarities in statement of individual doctrines or in theological outlook generally, indifference of attitude upon controverted points of the Pauline period, and a preference for the ideas of the old Catholicism that was beginning to take shape cannot be denied; but here again, as with Colossians, the case is met if we postulate a growth in the apostle himself, under the influence of new conditions. We fail to find in the epistle any direct evidence that the writer is a man of the second Christian generation, addressing men who have been born Christians; on the contrary, the readers are addressed as persons who had formerly been heathens.

The main obstacle to the traditional view of the authorship of the epistle is found in 4:11 2:20 3:5. In

16. Uncertain. officers, the peculiar spiritual gifts to which so great prominence is given in 1 Cor. 12 f. are almost entirely passed over; in 2:20 it is the glory of the Church that she is 'built on the foundation of apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone,' and in 3:5, as if there had never been any such thing as a dispute in Jerusalem or in Antioch, the present time is spoken of as that in which the Gentiles' equality in privilege has been 'spiritually revealed to his holy apostles and prophets.' In the mouth of the apostle who has devoted the unremitting efforts of a lifetime to the establishment of this equality of privilege, this last expression has a peculiar sound. In a disciple of the apostle, on the other hand,—one who has in view the accomplished fact, the one and indivisible Church for which all the apostles and prophets are equally sacred authorities—the phrases quoted are natural enough; and on the whole the hypothesis that a Pauline Christian, intimately familiar with the Pauline epistles, especially with Colossians, writing about 90 A.D., has in Ephesians sought to put in a plea for the true catholicism in the meaning of Paul, and in his name, is free from any serious difficulty. It is very hard to decide; perhaps the question ought to be left open as not yet ripe for settlement, and Ephesians in the meantime used only with caution when the Pauline system is being construed.

Like the Pauline epistles in general, Colossians and Ephesians are among the best preserved parts of the NT.

17. Text of They have hardly at all been subjected to 'smoothing' revision; the majority of the variants (which, it must be said, are very numerous) are clearly mere copyists' errors. At the same time the readings vacillate at several important points—e.g., (Eph. 3:9) between κοινωνία and οἰκονομία, (Col. 2:18) between ἂ μὴ ἔδρακεν and ἂ ἔδρακεν, (Col. 3:13) between χριστός and κύριος. Influence of the text of Ephesians upon Colossians can be sometimes traced—e.g., Col. 3:6, has been supplied from Eph. 5:6. The obscurity of many of the sentences may have helped to protect them from gratuitous change; in any case the exegete of either epistle has a much harder task than the text-critic.

H. J. Holtzmann, Kritik der Epheser u. Kolosserbriefe, (72), a most careful comparison of the two letters with each other and with those Pauline epistles of

18. Literature. which the genuineness may be regarded as certain. Holtzmann's hypothesis is that in Colossians we have a genuine epistle of Paul to Colossæ, which has been expanded by later interpolations; the interpolator is the author of the epistle to the Ephesians,—a Gentile Christian, of Pauline training, who belonged to the post-apostolic age. Alb. Klüpper, Der Brief an die Colosser (82), and Der Brief an die Epheser (91), a very thorough if somewhat stiff exposition: Colossians is held to be genuine, Ephesians not. H. v. Soden in JPT, 1885, pp. 320 ff., 497 ff., 672 ff. and 1887, 103 ff., 432 ff. substantially accepted Holtzmann's hypothesis, and in the HC (91) has given a luminous commentary. H. Oltramare, Comm. sur les Épîtres de S. Paul aux Colossiens, aux Eph. et Phil., 3 vols., 1891-92, maintains the genuineness of both epistles. In the case of Colossians this had already been argued most brilliantly by J. B. Lightfoot (St. Paul's Epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon, 1875, 8th ed. 1886). J. Macpherson in Commentary on St. Paul's Ep. to the Ephesians, (92), has sought with a painstaking care, worthy of Lightfoot himself, to vindicate tradition and solve the difficulties of the epistle. Er. Haupt (die Gefangenschaftsbriefe, 1899, an entirely new recast of the Krit.-Exeget. Komm. of H. A. W. Meyer) takes, as regards the genuineness, a position similar to that of the present article, but decides against the Roman origin and in favour of Caesarea. Some new points of view are offered in Zahn's Eint. i. d. N.T., 1897, 310-398, both on the question of introduction and on details of exegesis. The once justly popular commentaries of Ellicott ('55) and Harless (2nd ed. '58) on Ephesians are now somewhat out of date. COLOURS. If in certain branches of art the ancient Hebrews fell far behind their contemporaries, they were not without artistic feeling; if they had no drama, they were not devoid of dramatic instinct (CANTICLES, § 7; POETICAL LITERATURE, § 5); and if, through no inherent fault of their own, they were unable to attain any degree of competency in the highest form of art, yet they had, as their poetry shows, a very real appreciation of the sublime and beautiful. The neglect to cultivate this taste was a necessary consequence of the effort to fulfil the ancient command in Ex. 20.4, —a command which would of course apply as much to painting as to sculpture—and of the monotheism to which they subsequently attained. (See Ruskin, Two Paths, 7 f.; Perrot and Chipiez, History of Art in Sardinia, Judea, etc., 1111 f.; and cp ATHENS, § 1.)¹

A simple style of decoration and the use of some of the dyes and dyed stuffs they may indeed have learned at an early date.² When, however,

2. Decoration. the post-exilic writers wish to describe the decorations of an ideal sanctuary, they are obliged to borrow their ideas of ornament from Egypt, Babylonia, Persia, or Greece. (See Wornum, Analysis of Ornament, 51 f., and cp ISRAEL, § 67.) Characteristic of this style of decoration was a love of costly display combined with brilliancy of colour (Analysis of Ornament, 5, and BABYLONIA, § 18, ASSYRIA, § 10, EGYPT, § 36). From these countries, then, in which art was the ally, if not the offspring, of idolatry, came the practice of decorating sculpture in the round with bold colours and costly raiment,³ a practice condemned by Ezekiel (23.14) as being an insult to Yahwë. That such cases, however, were exceptional among the Hebrews appears probable from the fact that their language contains no words for 'paint,' 'painting,' and 'painter' (see PAINT). Nor does this striking phenomenon stand alone. It is also noteworthy that in the original texts no term is found to express that property of light known to us as colour.

When a Hebrew writer wishes to compare one object with another in respect to its colour he finds it necessary to use the word 'ayin' (עַיִן 'eye') in the

3. Colour vocabulary. sense of appearance. So in Lev. 18.55 the plague is spoken of as changing 'its appearance' (EV, here and in the following examples, 'colour'), and in Nu. 11.7 the appearance of manna is described as being like the appearance (so here RV) of bdellium. The same word is used of the appearance of wine (Prov. 23.31), of amber (Ez. 1.42.7.8.2), of burnished brass (Ez. 1.7 Dan. 10.6), of a beryl (Ez. 1.16.10.6), and of crystal (Ez. 1.22). Certainly the term colour occurs frequently in the EV; but in such cases the translation is seldom warranted by the original text. In the Apocrypha, on the other hand, a word does once occur (χρῶμα, Wisd. 15.4) with reference to a painted

² Already the poet who sang of the glorious victory over Sisera knew of dyed stuffs (שִׁשְׁמֹן שָׁמֶרֶץ), and seems to assume that Israel could be expected to provide its enemies with booty of this kind (Judg. 5.30). Of what colours, however, this stuff was composed is not stated; nor is it said with what colours the needlework (קִרְיָן) cp 1 Ch. 20.2 Ez. 17.3 mentioned in the same passage was embroidered. image; but in this instance the term denotes rather the paint or pigment used.

Just as the want of a word to express the idea of 'painting' tends to prove that the art was very little cultivated, so also the want of a word for colour (found in Syriac garwā, Arabic *lawan*¹, Egyptian¹ ḫw) naturally suggests that colours were not much talked about by the Hebrews. This inference could indeed be shown to be unwarrantable if we found many names

4. Colour sense. for different colours, and could prove archæologically that many colours were in use. When, however, we come to examine the Hebrew colour-terms—and this applies also to those in use among the Greeks and the Romans²—at any rate in biblical times, we find that very few of them are real colour-terms at all, such terms being used as denote rather a contrast between light and darkness, brightness and dimness, than what we commonly understand by colour. Still, if colours are not sharply distinguished in the languages of the ancient world it does not follow that the Hebrews and other primitive races were unable to distinguish shades of colour for which their language possessed no distinct terms, or that they were, at least with respect to certain colours, colour-blind.³

It is not so much a question of deficiency of colour-sense (as was contended some years ago) as of an undeveloped colour-vocabulary. (See Del., Iris, 20, and Benzinger, Arch. under 'Farben'; also Grant Allen, Colour Sense, chaps. 11-13.) If colour-blind people are in common life able to use correctly the names of colours that they do not see, so conversely a people may be able to discriminate colours for which their language has not set apart names.⁴ Besides, it now seems clear that even the lower animals are sensitive to colour (see Grant Allen, 221; Clodd, The Story of Creation, 87 f.; and cp Drummond, Ascent of Man, 165 ff., Montaigne, Essays [Cotton], 1.394 [72]).

From the use of the terms which the Hebrews did possess, we are led to conclude that one and the same

5. Scarcity of real colour names. word was used to denote several shades of one colour; the context or object to which the colour was applied affording the clue as to the particular shade intended. Sometimes, however, in order to distinguish the shade of colour quite unmistakably, the thing described is compared with another object of which the colour in question is peculiarly characteristic (cp Eng. salmon-pink, emerald-green, etc.).

It is indeed remarkable how few real colour-terms occur in the OT. Only three of the natural colours are distinguished by names, while for blue and yellow distinct terms are entirely wanting. The deficiency, however, is made up for by the use of the terms expressing degrees of light or dark; and in addition to these are found artificial colours with the name of the object from which they were derived like our crimson, cochineal, indigo, etc. Substances, too, of which a particular colour was characteristic, may have been used to represent the colour itself (like Eng. orange, etc.).

It will be convenient to group and examine the words employed under the following headings; terms ex-

6. Classification. pressing (1) light and degrees of light, (2) darkness and degrees of dark, (3) natural colours, (4) variegated surfaces, (5) pigments, (6) objects. Finally, it will be necessary to point out instances in which the EV expresses or implies a reference to colour where no such reference

¹ Cp im, which means originally 'skin,' 'complexion.'

whence the derivative שֵׁבֶה, šēbhāh, 'gray hair' (Gen. 42:38 44:29; Deut. 32:25 Hos. 7:9 Prov. 20:29) or 'old age' (Is. 46:4). In 35 it is usually represented correctly by πολύ or τὸ γῆρας.

(β) Perhaps the most clearly distinguished of the natural colours, as being the colour of blood, was red, to express which the Hebrews commonly used the root אָדָם, ādham. That it denoted a brilliant hue is evident from the fact that Isaiah uses the verb אָדָם in the sense of becoming like scarlet (מִלְּבָרָד, see below, § 14), and the Priestly Code speaks of skins dyed red (אָדָם). The adjective אָדָם, ādham, is applied to blood in 2 K. 3:22, to blood-stained apparel in Is. 63:2; and verbal forms, to a blood-besmeared shield (מִלְּבָרָד) in Nah. 2:4[3], and to wine (יִתְאָדָם) in Prov. 23:31. That the root, however, was also employed to describe other colours of a reddish hue is apparent from its use as applied to a heifer (Nu. 19:2) or a horse (Zech. 18), to a reddish-brown (אֶדְמִי, Gen. 25:25 1 S. 16:12; 1 cp Lam. 4:7, Cant. 5:10, and see GOLIATH, § 2, n.) skin, as well as to reddish or brownish-yellow lentils (Gen. 25:30).² The Priestly Code uses also a diminutive form (אֶדְמִי) to express merely 'reddish,' applying it to the colour of the leprous spot (Lev. 13:19 24) or sore (Lev. 13:42 f.).

From the same root are derived the names Edom (אֶדְמִי Gen. 25:30), Admah (אֶדְמִי Gen. 10:19), and Adummim (אֶדְמִי Josh. 15:7 18:17; see NAMES, § 102) as well as the precious stone called אֶדְמִי (see RUBY and PRECIOUS STONES). To אֶדְמִי ādham, corresponds σπέρδος (lit. 'having the colour of fire') in 35 and NT; and in Mt. 16:23 we find the verb σπέρδω used of the sky.

Other roots, however, besides this are occasionally employed to designate this colour. Thus the root אָדָם, ādam, which usually conveys the idea of 'acidity, fermentation,' seems to be used in Is. 63:1 to denote a colour; and the context requires a blood- or wine-like appearance (cp Eng. sorrel, (1) from sour=sour and (2) from saur=reddish-brown). אָדָם in Zech. 6:7 is also, from the context, possibly to be read אָדָם (Che.); cp Ges.-Buhl, s.v. אָדָם. The root אָדָם, ādam, 'to be red,' is traced by some in Ps. 75:9, and, with more justice, in Job 16:16 (P'sal form). To this class we may also probably assign אָדָם, ādām, 'reddish-brown' (cp Ar. adharu, 'a sorrel-horse,' and Heb. אָדָם)—a term used in Zech. 1:8 of a horse.

(γ) The third natural colour term describes those uncertain hues—colours which it has, in all ages, been found difficult to distinguish—that waver between blue, yellow, and green. In Hebrew the adjective employed (from יָרֵק, 'to be pale,' cp Assy. arāku, 'to grow pale' [of the face], arāku, 'yellow,' and Aram. יָרֵק, 'to be pale') can be applied to the colour of vegetation (Job 39:8 2 K. 19:26 Is. 37:27); and a substantive יָרֵק, yereq, derived from the same root denotes vegetable produce in general. As, moreover, the root idea of the word was originally, like that of χλωρός its Greek equivalent, merely *pale*ness or faintness of colour, a derivative (יָרֵק) can be used to describe a panic-stricken countenance (Jer. 30:6) or the fading colour of decaying vegetation (Deut. 28:22 Amos 4:9 Hag. 2:17). Further, to express simply 'pale,' a diminutive form (יָרֵק) can be used of plague spots (Lev. 13:49 14:37) or of the appearance of gold (Ps. 68:13).⁴ On the word יָרֵק, ārūs (cp Ar. 'to be yellow?'; cp NAMES, § 66) which is applied to gold (Ps. 68:14, etc.) and seems to denote a shade of yellow, see GOLD.

(4) Variegated surfaces.—A few words occur which, though their precise meaning is uncertain, undoubtedly

² Unless we point אֶדְמִי (see Esau, § 1).

³ From this root some derive אֶדְמִי, ādām, 'asphalt,' אֶדְמִי, ādām, 'clay,' אֶדְמִי, ādām, 'roebeek.'

denote a parti-coloured appearance of some kind; their employment being for the most part restricted to the description of animals. Of these the term rendered in AV by 'ringstraked' and applied to goats (אֶדְמִי, ādām, Gen. 30:35 39 f. 31:8 10:12), probably has reference to white stripes on an otherwise dark skin; that translated 'speckled' (אֶדְמִי, ādām, Gen. 30:32 f. 35:39 31:8 10:12) to light spots on a dark skin; and that represented by 'grisled' (אֶדְמִי, ādām) and used of both goats (Gen. 31:10 12) and horses (Zech. 6:35) to light patches on a dark skin. The last word would, therefore, probably correspond to our piebald.

In Jer. 12:9 (RV) we meet with the phrase 'a speckled (אֶדְמִי) bird of prey.' The commentators have sought to justify and explain it; but it remains improbable.¹ A combination of different colours is expressed in Gen. 30:32 f. by אֶדְמִי, ādām, probably 'besprinkled,' 'flecked' (cp sparsus). The same term is used in Ezek. 16:16 of the dyed stuffs of many colours with which other peoples were wont to decorate their shrines.

(5) Pigments.—The Hebrews knew and made use of several pigments, three of which were derived from animals. These three dyes were all manufactured by the Phoenicians: the one 'scarlet' or 'crimson' (whence its Gr. name φουκόυν and Lat. phœnicium), from an insect (coccus) which gave its name to a species of oak on which it was found (Ilex coccifera); the other two from a slimy secretion found in a special gland of a species of shell-fish called Murex trunculus and Murex brandaris. By infusing the insect (coccus) in boiling water a beautiful red dye was produced, superior in effect and durability to cochineal; the other dyes when applied to articles became at first of a whitish colour, but under the influence of sunlight changed to yellowish greenish and finally to purple, the purple being red or blue according to the species of shell-fish employed. These three colours were held in high estimation by the ancients on account of both their brilliancy and their costliness. The purple-blue is translated 'blue' in the EV, but must have corresponded rather to our violet, by which it is once rendered in the AV (Esth. 1:6 and in the margin 8:15). The Hebrews knew no blue colour with which to compare it, and hence it is said in Barachoth 1:2 that 'purple-blue is like the sea, and the sea is like the plants, and the plants are like the firmament of heaven' (see also Menach. 4, and cp Del. in PRE (2) iv. 488, Iris, 18 f., and the articles PURPLE, SCARLET, BLUE, CRIMSON).

(a) To designate the first of the dyes mentioned above, the Hebrews sometimes used simply אֶדְמִי, ādām.

14. Scarlet. (fr. Arab. ħirmiz=Sansk. krimi) and cochineal (really a term denoting the insect Coccus cacti found in Mexico). Thus it is used in Is. 1:18 as the most natural example of a glaring and indelible dye, and in Lam. 4:5 (where 35 gives the simple term kókkos, 'berry' [A. kókkaw], the insect being regarded in early times as a species of berry) of princely raiment. It even occurs as a verbal derivative (אֶדְמִי, ādām, Nah. 2:3 [4]; אֶדְמִי, ādām) with the meaning 'to be clothed in scarlet' (see, however, DRESS, § 3, n.). More often, however, the form אֶדְמִי, ādām, is found with the addition, either before or after it, of the word אֶדְמִי, ādām—a word which has been derived from the root אֶדְמִי, ādām (cp Assy. šintu, possibly fr. šanú), supposed to mean 'to glitter,' and is thought to refer to the brilliant colour derived from the אֶדְמִי. In this form it is mentioned as a costly possession (Ex. 35:23), and as being, therefore, suitable for an offering (Ex. 25:4 35:6 Lev. 14:4 [שֵׁנִי ח'] 649 51:52 [שֵׁנִי ח'] Nu. 19:6 [שֵׁנִי ח']), for the hangings (Ex. 36:3 [שֵׁנִי ח'] Nu. 19:6 [שֵׁנִי ח']), for the hangings (Ex. 36:3 [שֵׁנִי ח'] Nu. 19:6 [שֵׁנִי ח']).

27.16 36.37 38.18), for the ephod (Ex. 28.56 39.28), for the priests' girdle (Ex. 28.8 39.29), for the breastplate (Ex. 28.15 39.8), and for the embroidered pomegranates (Ex. 28.33 39.24), etc. In Ecclus. 45.11, also, it is used of some kind of embroidered work (Gr. κεκλωσμένη κόκκις; vet. Lat. torto cocco). A thread of this colour—expressed by šini alone—was commonly used in the times of the Jahvist as a mark (Gen. 38.28.30; Josh. 2.21, JE), and the single term is employed in two poetical passages (2 S. 1.24, where the maidens of Israel are called upon to lament Saul, who used to clothe them in scarlet; and Ca. 4.3) as equivalent to the longer expression. In the acrostic on the 'Capable Woman' the same word is used in the plural (šini, šini) to describe the warm clothing provided against the cold of winter (Prov. 31.21), and in Is. 1.18 to denote probably scarlet-stuff as distinguished from the dye itself (šini). As a substitute for these expressions we find the Chronicler using a word karmil (2 Ch. 27.14 3.14, cp Ex. 36.35), derived from the Persian (kirm, 'a worm,' see CRIMSON, and cp above). In κόκκινος is chosen to represent all these expressions, and there can be no doubt that where the same word occurs in the NT it denotes this dye (Mt. 27.28 Heb. 9.19 Rev. 17.34 18.12.16).

Later OT writers knew of another pigment of a like shade of colour, called šār, šār (EV 'vermillion')—perhaps oxide of lead (cp μύλος and see Riehm, HWB 'Mennig'). It was used for painting ceilings (Jer. 22.14, μύλος) and images (Ezek. 23.14, μύλος).

(β) The Purple-blue (tekkēleth, Assy. ta-kil-tu) and Purple-red (argāmān, Bib. Aram. argāmān).

Assyr. argamannu dyed stuffs also figure largely in the decoration of the Tabernacle and the priestly robes; but they can hardly have been known as early as the scarlet (cp CANTICLES, § 15), their employment being characteristic of P and later writers. They also can be used for an offering (Ex. 25.4 35.6), as being a valuable possession (Ex. 35.23), as well as for the curtains (Ex. 26.1 36.8), for the veil (Ex. 26.31 36.35), for the hangings (Ex. 26.36 27.16 36.37 38.18), for the priest's ephod (Ex. 28.6 39.2), for the girdle (Ex. 28.8 39.29), and for the breastplate (Ex. 28.15 39.8), etc. A late prophet knows both colours as part of the splendour of heathen worship (Jer. 10.9). It seems natural also to another late writer to assume that the Midianitish chiefs would wear robes of purple-red (Judg. 8.26); and Ezekiel tells how the robes of purple-blue worn by the Assyrians had struck the imagination of the women of Israel (23.6), whilst he also knows (27.7) of purple-blue and purple-red from ELISHAH (q.v.). In Ecclus., too, both dyes are mentioned (45.10) as occupying a prominent place in the raiment of Moses, and in 6.30 ribbons of purple-blue are said to form part of the adornment of Wisdom. On the defeat of Gorgias dyed stuffs of both colours were taken by Judas Maccabæus among the spoil (1 Macc. 4.23). Of the two purples red seems to have been preferred. Solomon's 'seat of purple' (Cant. 3.10) is perhaps due to error (see PURPLE); but purple robes of office were common. Judas was struck by the fact that the Romans, notwithstanding their power and riches, were not clothed in purple (1 Macc. 8.14). When, however, Alexander appoints Jonathan high priest, he sends him a purple-red robe (10.20.62.64 [NV]); so likewise Antiochus when he confirms him in the office (11.38). On the other hand, when the treachery of Andronicus is discovered, he is at once deprived of the purple robe (2 Macc. 4.38). Similarly in the NT in Mt. 27.28 (χλαμὴς κόκκινη) Mk. 15.17 (πορφύρα) and Jn. 19.2 (ιμάτιον πορφύρεον), the red-purple robe is used as a mock image of majesty; while in Lk. 16.19 (πορφύρα) it is one of the characteristics of a rich man. In Rev. 17.4

1 δισσός (v. 22) however suggests שׁוֹנִי 'double.' So Vg. Schleusner, Grä., Che.

(πορφυροῦν καὶ κόκκινον) it is part of the attire of the great harlot, and in 18.12 (πορφύρας) is referred to as valuable merchandise (cp also v. 16 πορφυροῦν). It is also worthy of note that one of Paul's converts made her living by selling this dye (πορφυροπώλης, Acts 16.14). In Cant. 7.6 the hair of the bride seems to be compared with purple (אֶרְנוֹן), and Greek parallels for this are quoted. The comparison, however, can hardly be trusted, for וְלֹא רֹאשׁ כְּאֶרְנוֹן מִלֵּךְ is a dittogram of רֹאשׁ עֵלֶיךָ כְּכַרְמֶל which precedes. Each form of the clause seems to be more correct in one half than the other. Read, perhaps, with Cheyne 'The locks of thy head are like Carmel (כְּכַרְמֶל); they are pleasant (נְעֻמָּה) as an orchard of pomegranates' (see GALLERY, 2). נֶמֶן in נֶמֶן is plainly some word which should follow כְּאֶרְנוֹן; probably נְעֻמָּה (written נֶעֱמָ, and corrupted to נֶמֶן; cp HAIR, § 1). In the Gr. מְכִילָה is commonly represented by δάκρυθος and δακτύλιος,¹ and אֶרְנוֹן by πορφύρος in both OT and NT (see Rev. 9.17 21.20).

(6) Objects.—The words included under this heading denote objects of which a particular shade of colour was characteristic. Thus בִּיזָה, bīzā (2 Ch. 5.12, βύσσινος) was the fine cotton or linen manufactured by the Egyptians, and called elsewhere (Ex. 26.1 Gen. 41.42, etc.) שֵׁשׁ, šēš (see Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 448, and the articles EGYPT, § 35. COTTON, and LINEN). חֹרִי, hār, in Esth. 1.6 probably means 'white-stuff' (whence חֹרִי in Is. 19.9), and כָּרְפָּס (Pers. kārpas) 'white cotton.' Three more rare words occur in the same verse which have been thought to denote different species of valuable stone or plaster: שֵׁשׁ, šēš, (also in Ca. 5.15) which has been supposed to be identical with שֵׁשׁ, šayīš (1 Ch. 29.2), and to mean 'white marble' or 'alabaster'; בָּהַט, bahāṭ (ἡ παραργίτης, ἡ παραργίτος) denoting perhaps 'porphyry' (so BDB; EV 'red marble,' RVmg. 'porphyry'); דָּר, dar, meaning possibly 'pearl' or 'pearl-like stone'; שֹׁהַנִּים (σφαιρικός λίθος) and סֹהַרֶת (σφαιρική EV 'black marble,' RVmg. 'stone of blue colour'), which has been derived from שֹׁהַר=שָׁהַר, and taken to mean 'black marble' (see, however, MARBLE).

Lastly it remains to notice a few passages in which the EV unnecessarily implies a reference to colour.

Thus the colour 'green' is sometimes used in the EV to represent words denoting not colour but a healthy and flourishing condition. Of such words רָעִנָּה, rā'innā, which means rather 'luxuriant,' is correctly translated in שׁוֹשַׁן by various words expressive of luxuriance (δασύς Dt. 12.2 Is. 57.5; σύνκιος 3 K. 14.23 Ca. 1.16 Ez. 6.13; ἀλωδής 4 K. 16.4 17.10 2 Ch. 28.4 Jer. 8.13 17.8 Ez. 27.6). Very similar is the use of לֶחֶם, lahē, 'fresh, moist' (χαλῶρος Gen. 30.37 Ez. 17.24 20.47 [21.3]; ὑγρός Judg. 16.7 8) and רֹבֵב, rā'ib 'juicy' (ὑγρός Job 8.16). Again אֶבְיָבִי, ābhībī, denotes 'fresh, juicy ears of corn' (Lev. 2.14), and אֶבְיָבִי, ābhībī, can be used of 'fresh young plants' (Job 8.12 Cant. 6.11); whilst בָּגִים, baggīm, seems to denote tender young fruits (Ca. 2.13, see Del. ad loc.), and קַרְמֶל, karmel, (Lev. 23.14) applies to 'garden fruit' in general.

To this category belong also such compound expressions as שְׂפָתֵי שֵׁשׁ 'grassy pastures' (Ps. 23.2) and צִמְחֵי שֵׁשׁ 'sprouts of the field' (Ecclus. 40.22). In all these cases the term 'green,' used in AV, might indeed serve as a paraphrase; but it is otherwise with the following examples:—In Job 6.6 the word יָרִי translated 'white' (of an egg) is thought by many to mean 'the juice of purslain' (so RVmg. ἡ ῥήμασιν κενοῖς but see FOWL); but whichever interpretation be adopted it will be admitted that the Hebrew word contains no idea of colour. Similarly חֹמֶר, the reading adopted by EV in Is. 27.2 (AV 'red wine,' RV 'wine') instead of חֹמֶר (RVmg. 'a pleasant vineyard'; see SBOT), means really 'foaming wine' (Driver on Dt. 32.14); and 1 δ also gives δακτύλιος for שֹׁהַר (Ex. 25.5 26.14 35.7 23, etc.), taking it as the equivalent of שֹׁהַר.

COMFORTER

חֲמֻדָּה in the expression חֲמֻדָּה יְהוָה (Ex. 10.19, etc., Wisd. 10.18 θάλασσαν ἐρυθράν), meaning 'reed,' contains no reference to colour. Moreover, in the expressions לַיְלָה שְׁחֹרָה (AV 'black night,' RV 'blackness of night') in Pr. 7.9 and שְׁחֹרָה (AV 'blackness') in Joel 2.6 Nah. 2.10 the English renderings are purely paraphrastic. In the same way the long robe (perhaps white with a blue border) worn by Joseph (Gen. 37.3) and by Tamar (2 S. 13.18) is transformed in the EV into 'a coat of many colours.' In Pr. 20.30 (חֲמֻדָּה AV 'blueness') and Ecclus. 23.10 (μώλωψ AV 'blue mark') the words mean literally 'bruise.'

COMMON. The negatives of the qualities 'clean,'

'holy' (see CLEAN, § 1) are—
1. 'Common,' a synonym for 'unclean' (see CLEAN), constantly in RV for hōl (properly, 'that which is open,' Baudissin, Studien, 2.23). AV, however, only twice renders hōl thus (1 S. 21.4 f.); elsewhere it has 'unholy' (Lev. 10.10) or 'profane' (Ezek. 22.26 42.20 44.23 48.15). In NT, the RV is less strict with κοινός, which is almost indifferently rendered 'common,' 'unclean,' 'unholy,' 'defiled,' 'polluted.' So in 1 Macc. 1.47 6.2, RV (with AV) gives 'unclean' for κοινός. No injury is done to the sense; cp Acts 10.15, 'what God hath cleansed (=pronounced clean), that call not thou common'; v. 11 'common and unclean.' That which is 'common' is free, or at any rate is treated as if free, from ceremonial restrictions; it can be used in the common life—the life of the עַמִּית עַם, the unintelligent 'people of the land' (ὁ ὄχλος οὗτος ὁ μὴ γινώσκων τὸν νόμον, Jn. 7.49). And those who use what is only treated as if 'common' or open, when it has no right to be so treated, become 'common'—i.e., unclean—themselves. 'Common,' therefore, becomes a wide term, dangerously wide from a truly religious point of view. What an irony in the evangelist's expression 'with common (EV defiled), that is, unwashed hands'!

2. 'Unclean,' the strict rendering of ἀκάθαρτος in NT, of אָמֵץ, אָמֵץ, in OT (cf. ἀκάθαρτος). Both 'common' and 'unclean' can be used (1) of forbidden foods or of animals which may not be eaten (Acts 10.14 11.8 Rev. 18.2). (2) Of persons who are not Jews, or who do not belong to the Christian community (Acts 10.28 1 Cor. 7.14 2 Cor. 6.17; cp κοινός, Mk. 7.15 and parallels, Heb. 9.13 Rev. 21.27 [RT and RV]).

3. 'Unholy,' given in AV of Lev. 10.10 (hōl) becomes 'common' in RV. In Ezek. 22.26 42.20 44.23 (same formula), AV renders hōl, 'profane.' The influence of עַם and Vg. may be suspected; these versions respectively give βέβηλον, βέβηλον, so also in Ezek. 48.15, AV profane, Vg. profana. 'Profane' is best reserved, however, for other Heb. words (see PROFANE). RV of NT retains 'unholy' in 1 Tim. 1.9 2 Tim. 3.2 (ἀνόσιτος), Heb. 10.29 (κοινός).

4. On the peculiar technical term חֲמֻדָּה, 'to be polluted,' see HYPOCRISY.

COMMUNITY OF GOODS, in the widest sense of that expression, is usually considered (on the authority of Acts 2.42-47 4.32-5.11 6.1-6) to have been one of the established institutions of the earliest Christian society at Jerusalem. This opinion requires strict limitation; but that limitation is not to be based, as it has been, either on the intrinsic improbability of the institution itself, or on a vague conjecture that the writer of Acts has idealised the facts. It arises from an investigation of the sources of his narrative (cp ACTS, § 11)—a method which has to record one of its most assured results in connection with the subject of the present article.

We have in Acts not one account of the institution but three.

(a) One account comprehensively records the sale of all lands and houses (χωρίων ἢ οἰκιῶν: Acts 4.34 f.); according to 2.45 the sale was of all possessions and goods whatsoever (τὰ κτήματα καὶ τὰς ὑπάρξεις), a common fund being thus formed, out of which all were supplied according as any man had need. (b) According to another account, the sale of property (κτῆμα, 5.1; χωρίον, 5.3) cannot have been universally prescribed, or even generally customary; for Peter (5.4) expressly declares that Ananias was free to retain in his private possession either his property or the money for which it was sold. Moreover, although there is no hint of there being anything to mark out the act of Barnabas (4.36 f.) from the universal practice assumed in (a)—such as that the estate was his only one, or was particularly valuable—it is thought worthy of special honourable mention. In 4.36 f., therefore, it is not assumed, as it is in 4.34 f., that the sale of property was expected of all. (c) In 4.32, however, where we find 'said' (εἰλεγεν) and not some word implying 'retained as private property,' there is no idea of any sale of property at all. The idea simply is that the owners placed their property in a general way at the disposal of the community at large. There is no assumption of a common fund.

(d) A fourth account may possibly be distinguished in Acts 2.44.

The statement in 2.44 b—that they had all things common—by itself alone agrees well enough with the last-mentioned and simplest account of the institution (that there was no actual sale), and 2.44 a, which declares

2. Possibly a fourth account. that all that believed were together in one place,¹ might by itself be taken, like 1.15 2.1 1 Cor. 11.20 14.23, to refer merely to the exigencies of social worship;² but the connection of the clause with the statement that follows (that they had all things in common) appears to imply that the entire community lived in common, dwelling in the same house and having common meals.

This inference, however, may safely be set aside, as it may well be doubted whether the collocation in Acts 2.44 has not arisen from the author's having inadvertently combined two heterogeneous ideas without perceiving the possible misleading effect.

A social institution of the nature indicated would scarcely have been practicable in a community of 120 persons (Acts 1.15)—much less in one of 3000 (2.41) or more (2.47). The other statements in Acts do not preclude the supposition that the meals, even love-feasts and the observance of the Lord's Supper associated with them, were held in different houses at the same time. Κατ' οἶκον (AV 'from house to house,' AV^{mg} and RV 'at home') in 2.46 (cp 5.42) need not be intended to convey that the whole community assembled on one occasion in one house and on another occasion in another; it may have a distributive meaning like κατὰ πόλιν ('in every city') in 16.21 (and κατ' οἶκους, that is 'in every house,' in 20.20). In Rom. 16.5 14 f. we find several household churches in the same city; cp also 1 Cor. 16.19 Col. 4.15. The complaint about the neglect of certain widows in the daily ministration (Acts 6.1), which the word καθημερινῇ proves to have referred to their sustenance, could not have arisen if there had been common meals (although indeed the expression 'tables' [τραπέζαις] might seem to point to these). It could have arisen only if the widows' share of provisions was brought to their houses.

A misrepresentation of the original idea, similar to that which, as has just been shown, may be present in 2.44, is unquestionably to be found in 5.2 f.

3. Acts 5.2. The writer of this verse held Ananias to have sinned in keeping back part of the money obtained by selling his estate. The duplicity with which Peter charges him does not consist in his having, when questioned, passed off as the whole a part of the money thus obtained. It is only Sapphira (5.8) who does this. Ananias, according to 5.2 f., has already committed the crime of keeping back some of the money before he could be questioned by Peter. This cannot possibly be reconciled with Peter's declaration in 5.4, that Ananias had a perfect right to retain the whole. Notwithstanding that plain declaration, the author must have had before his mind, in writing 5.2 f., the stricter view that it was an absolute duty to sell all the property and to hand over the whole of the money.

The hypothesis that the narratives are based on various sources receives material support

4. Acts 4.32- from the impossibility of discovering any 5.11 not coherent coherence within the passages themselves.

Acts 4.33 treats of a subject quite different from the matters

² εἰς τὸ αὐτό in the NT always refers to place; AV 'into one place.'

COMMUNITY OF GOODS

dealt with in the preceding and the following verses. Nor can 434 be connected with 432. It could be connected with it only if the absence of poor persons were the reason (γὰρ) why all property was common (v. 32) instead of being the result of the community of goods. Further, according to 434f., the absence of poor is due not to community of goods, but to the sale of all property in land and houses and the establishment of a common fund, whereas, in 435-511 again, the sale of any property appears as a voluntary act of certain individuals. In like manner 242 is so definitely repeated in 246 that the narrative can hardly be an independent composition. It must be a compilation. Even more marked is the repetition of the first clause of 243, ἐγένετο δὲ πᾶσι ψυχῇ φόβος, in the third, φόβος τε ἔην μέγας ἐπὶ πάντας. But even if this last clause be omitted, with WH (though it is difficult to explain how it could have arisen as a variant to the first clause), 244, with the reading καὶ πάντες δέ, cannot be connected with what precedes. The opening, 'but also all that believed (were) together,' implies that others were together as well. The omission of the καὶ sanctioned by WH is clearly an attempt to remove the difficulty.

An attempt to prove that all these passages have been compiled by an editor from various sources, could be based only on an examination of the whole book. Such proof is not needful to our present purpose. It will be sufficient to have shown that the book presents three different views on the subject of community of goods.

If it be asked which of the three is the most likely to be the true view, it will be safe to answer that, if any one is to be preferred, it is that which is simplest (§ 1c). An account of any institution of the kind, clothed with the glamour of the ideal, is sure to have been exaggerated by writers with incomplete information.

It is certain, however, that the general idea of community of goods was not strange to the primitive Christian society.¹

It is indicated in such sayings of Jesus as those recorded in Mt. 6 19f. 10 9 19 21-24, and in such information about his own life as we find in Lk. 8 3. Besides, we know there was a distinctly Ebionite tendency which applied a literal interpretation to the blessings pronounced on the poor and hungry (Lk. 6 20f. 24f.), and saw the path of salvation in giving away all property in alms (Lk. 6 34f. 11 41 12 33 16 9). It is not certain indeed that this Ebionite tendency was dominant in the period immediately following the death of Jesus. (The passages cited were taken up by the Third Evangelist from a document which itself rests upon an older written collection of sayings of Jesus. This is proved by the remodelled words in Lk. 6 20-26, which, not having any reference to the disposition of the persons addressed, certainly did not come in their present form from the lips of Jesus. Besides, what is here recommended is not so much community of goods as almsgiving.) The epistles of Paul, which are our most trustworthy authority, only show that in his time (20-30 years after the death of Jesus), the community at Jerusalem was poor, or, at least, contained a good many poor members, and stood in need of assistance from the Gentile-Christian churches (εἰς τοὺς ἀγίους, 1 Cor. 16 1 2 Cor. 8 4 9 1; but τῶν πτωχῶν alone, Gal. 2 10; εἰς τοὺς πτωχοὺς τῶν ἀγίων, Rom. 15 26).

The Gospels prove that many poor people had already attached themselves to Jesus in his lifetime. An active care for these, and consequently a more or less organised διακονία, must be assumed in the original church at Jerusalem. We may well suppose that, in as far as this ministrations took the form of a community of goods, it led, according to the usual lesson taught by other attempts of the kind, to the increase of poverty. It may, moreover, be conjectured that in the earliest Christian times the institution of community of goods increased the tendency to forego the pursuit of wealth, which, even without that institution, was occasioned, according to 1 Thess. 4 11-18 2 Thess. 2 1 f. 3 6-13, by the belief that the end of the world was near at hand and by the unrest to which this belief gave rise. We may suppose that wealthy members of the community in Jerusalem allowed their property to become available for the use of poor brethren; and this does not preclude the belief that of their own free will certain persons, such as Barnabas and Ananias, went further and sold their belongings for the benefit of the community.

Still, it is certainly not true that communism was prescribed as obligatory.

The uncertainty of the subject is shown also by Acts 6 1-6. It would be very remarkable if there were no necessitous persons whose support could be neglected but widows. The phrase seems to be due to a usage of the author's own (comparatively late) period, in which, according to 1 Tim. 5 3-16, the 'widows' had an official position in the community. It is strange also that, although the mention of the names of the seven men appointed to 'serve tables' (διακονεῖν τραπέζαις) points to a genuine tradition, their function—they are nowhere styled διάκονοι—is never referred to afterwards (they are not to be identified with the πρεσβύτεροι of 11 30), and that only the Hellenists had to complain of the neglect of their widows. Just as in Acts 15 36-39 a less serious dispute is narrated in place of one that had more important issues (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 3), so here, at the bottom of the narrative before us, there really lies, we may conjecture, some dissension occasioned by different conceptions of Christianity entertained by the natives of Palestine and by the Christian Jews who had come in from abroad.

CONDUITS AND RESERVOIRS

In any case, the community of goods did not last long, though the view that it came to an end when the society was dispersed by the persecution (Acts 8 1-4) is no more than a conjecture.

The subsequent influence of the idealised picture in Acts is very noteworthy. In the exhortation to works

6. Subsequent influence of the idea. of charity in the Epistle of Barnabas (198), and similarly in the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (48), the statement of Acts 4 32 is repeated as a command: 'Say not, "It is private property"' (οὐκ ἐρεῖς ἴδια εἶναι). Lucian, De morte Peregrini, 13, states that the Christians supported those in need from a common fund (ἀπὸ τοῦ κοινοῦ), and ridicules the credulity with which they allowed themselves to be cheated by impostors in so doing. The influence of the same ideal on the monastic life is obvious. P. W. S.

CONDUITS AND RESERVOIRS. In a country where the rain-supply is small and irregular, which possesses scarcely more than one perennial stream (נָחַל; cp Am. 5 24), and is not rich in springs, the preservation of water in cisterns and reservoirs, and the employment of trenches or conduits to convey it to the place where it was most needed, must have been of paramount importance. Hence the indispensability of rain and the trust placed in the continuance of its supply form the basis of some of the best-known and most beautiful metaphors in OT.

Leaving to the article SPRINGS [g.v.] what needs to be said upon the natural supply of water, we propose here to notice the artificial means by which it was stored and conveyed.

The ordinary method of preserving water was to dig (כָּרַח, or hew (חָצַב) out of the living rock a reservoir,

1. Cisterns. varying in size from a small pit to an extensive subterranean vault lined with masonry. Such cisterns go back to pre-Israelite times (Dt. 6 11 Neh. 9 25). To dig them was the work of a benefactor and deserving of special mention (e.g., 2 Ch. 26 10), and the opening ceremony, on one occasion at least, becomes the subject of a song (see BEER).

The ordinary Heb. term is בֵּיֶר, bēyēr (for variant forms cp BDB s.v.; λάκος [BAL]),

CONDUITS AND RESERVOIRS

properly an artificial excavation, and thus distinct from בִּקְרָה bikrah, a natural well (see SPRINGS). When dry the בִּקְרָה is a pit (cp Gen. 37 20) which can be used as a prison (Jer. 38 6 Gen. 40 15, etc.; cp בֵּית הַבּוֹקֵר Ex. 12 29). In poetical language בִּקְרָה is applied to the pit of the grave (Is. 28 17) or to Sheol (Ps. 30 3 [4]). In only two cases does בִּקְרָה occur as part of a place-name: see BORASHAN, SIRAH.

Other terms are:—

2. גִּבְעָה gēbe (cp Ar. jābiyatun 'watering trough'), Is. 30 14 (AV 'pit'; in Ezek. 47 11 f. EV 'marish' [morass]), and

3. בִּרְיָם biryam Jer. 1 13 2 K. 3 16 (AV 'ditch,' RV 'trench'), perhaps used for purposes of irrigation (cp 2 K. 25 12 = Jer. 52 16, 39 10 after Kto.); see AGRICULTURE, § 5.

4. בִּרְכָה berkhah (κρήνη, κολυμβήθρα) is used of an artificial pool, Eccl. 2 6 (with קִיץ), but elsewhere appears to refer to natural springs. Several pools were found in and around Jerusalem (cp below, and see JERUSALEM), also in Gibeon (2 S. 2 13), Hiron (Is. 4 12), and Samaria (1 K. 22 38); for Cant. 7 4 [5], see BATH-RABBIM.

5. מִקְוֵה miqveh, Is. 22 11, AV 'ditch,' RV 'reservoir.'

It was of the utmost importance that citadels should be well supplied with tanks for collecting the rain-water (so at Masada and Machærus, Jos. Ant. xiv. 146, BJ vii. 62, ἐκδοχείων). A cistern in the temple is mentioned in Ecclus. 50 3 (ἀποδοχείων): cp below, and see SEA, BRAZEN. In the towns it seems to have been customary for every house to possess a cistern¹ (cp 2 K. 18 31 Prov. 5 15). The best example of this is found in Mesha's stele (IL 24 f.); 'there was no cistern (כֶּרֶם) in the midst of the city in קָרָה, and I said to all the people, "Make ye every man a cistern in the midst of his house." The same king records that he made מִקְוֵה לְמַיִן הַמַּשְׁלֹחַ 'the locks or dams of the reservoirs' for water'; but whether חֲכָרָה (the cutting[s]) l. 25] which Mesha made with the help of his Israelite prisoners was a conduit which fed these reservoirs is uncertain. The view is not improbable, however, since the art of forming channels to convey water was common to all the Semitic races and was not due to foreign influence.

Remains of conduits (מִקְוֵה, ὑδραγωγός [BAQL], *aqueductus*²), connected as a rule with pools, are to be found in many places in Palestine;

2. Conduits. they are usually mere trenches running along the surface of the ground, subterranean channels being somewhat rarer. Certain of the rock-cut channels and cisterns in Jerusalem (as well as the Siloam conduit) may be pre-exilic; in many cases, however, they have been enlarged or repaired to such an extent as to make it extremely difficult to tell to what period they belong.

Jerusalem was well supplied with water. Perhaps the most important of its supplies was that which came from the so-called Pools of Solomon beyond

3. Pools of Solomon. Bethlehem (13½ m. distant). These pools (situated close by the Kal'at el-Burak) are near 'Atān and Artās, and must have been devised for a more important work than that of merely irrigating gardens⁴ (Ecclus. 26 Ecclus. 24 30 f., see BATH-RABBIM). There are three of them, partly hewn and partly enclosed by masonry. The lowest seems to have been used at one time as an amphitheatre for naval displays.

The pools are fed by two large conduits. The one, after cutting through the valley of 'Atān (Etam) by a tunnel, runs through the Wady Dēr el-Benāt, along the Wady el-Biār (Valley of Springs), and ultimately enters

² The meaning is not certain: perhaps it is 'two reservoirs.'

the Bir el-Derej (Spring of Steps). The other is much longer and full of windings. Starting from a large reservoir, the Birket el-'Arrūb (now converted into a garden), it leaves the Wady of the same name, and after crossing the plateau of Tekū flows into the middle pool. Conduits connect also the Scaled Spring (mod. 'Ain Sūlīh), identified by a modern tradition with the מִקְוֵה in Cant. 4 12, and the 'Ain 'Aṭān¹ with this water-system.

From the Pools of Solomon the water is led into the city by two conduits. The higher goes along the N. slope of the valley of Burak, descending near Rachel's tomb and rising again. (A syphon was used and remnants of the pipes may still be seen.) It then proceeds towards the hill of Tanfūr and the W. er-Rabābi (see HINNOM, VALLEY OF). It is partly rock-hewn and partly made of masonry. The lower conduit (still complete) goes with many windings from the lowest pool, E. along the slope of the valley, and then W. above Artās. One arm of the conduit was connected (probably under Herod's government) with the spring of Artās and ran to the Frank mountain. The main arm passes Bethlehem and Rachel's tomb on the S., proceeding sometimes above ground in a channel about 1 ft. square, and sometimes underground in earthen pipes. It then crosses the Hinnom valley by a bridge of nine low arches and meets the other conduit hard by the Birket es-Sultān. It finally runs SE. and E. along the valley over the causeway, under the Bāb es-Silsleh (Chain-gate), and supplies the 'Elkas' and the king's cistern in the Haram.² These conduits were repaired by the Sultan Mohammad ibn Kalaūn of Egypt about 1300 A.D. Their date is unknown. The upper conduit is more artificial, and probably the older. Some refer them to the golden age of Judah, and tradition (oral and Rabbinical) ascribes them to Solomon. It has also been pointed out that they exactly resemble the conduits which were made by the Arabs in Spain.³

The well-known Siloam conduit runs from the Virgin's Spring ('Ain Sitti Maryam) to the Pool of Siloam (see JERUSALEM). It runs underground in a circuitous course and is 586 yds. in length⁴

4. The Siloam Conduit. (the direct distance between the two pools is 368 yds.). At its lower end it has a height of 16 ft.; but this gradually decreases to 3½ ft., and then to 2½ ft. This low part, however, is near the surface, and perhaps was originally an open channel. It is a dangerous conduit to explore, as the water is apt to enter unexpectedly and fill the passage. In various places false-cuttings and set-backs are found, indicating subsequent changes in the direction taken by the workmen. About 19 ft. from the Siloam end, on the right-hand side as one enters, is an artificial niche which contained a tablet bearing on its lower face an inscription.

5. Siloam Inscription. This was first observed in 1880, and was brought under the notice of Schick. The tablet was about 27 inches square, and its top only one yard above the bottom of the channel. The inscription, known as the Siloam inscription, is the oldest

² Many subterranean passages and structures have been found under the Haram. Cp Jos. BJ vi. 73 84 94, and Tacitus: 'Templum in modum arcis . . . fons perennis aquæ, cavati sub terra montes, et piscinæ cisternæque servandis imbribus' (Hist. 5 12). Many of these were for removing the water and blood of the sacrifices, or for flushing the blood-channels (cp Yoma, 56, Pesachim, 22, Me'ila, 83, Middoth, 82).

Hebrew inscription extant (cp Dr. TBS xv. f. [facsimile opposite], WRITING, § 4).

It runs as follows: (1) Behold the piercing through (הַנִּקְרָה). Now this was the manner of the piercing through. Whilst yet [the miners were lifting up] (2) the pick (הַמַּחְזֵק) each towards his fellow, and whilst there were yet three cubits to be struck through, there was heard the voice of each man (3) calling to his fellow, for there was a fissure¹ in the rock on the right hand. . . . And on the day of the (4) piercing through, the hewers (הַחֹצְבִים) smote each so as to meet his fellow, pick against pick; and there flowed (5) the water from the channel (מְנוּצָה)² to the pool (בְּרִיקָה) 1200 cubits; and a hundred (6)³ cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the hewers.

The difference of level in the bed of the channel is so slight that one is led to suppose that the excavators had some kind of test. Shafts were made here and there, probably in order that the men might find out their whereabouts. The first shaft is 470 ft. from the Siloam end. After that the passage is straighter.

The conduit is the work of a people whose knowledge of engineering was in its infancy. Its date is uncertain. It may be the one referred to in 2 K. 20²⁰ (= 2 Ch. 32³⁰);⁴ but the allusion in Is. 86 to the 'waters of Shiloah that flow gently' suggests that it may have been in existence in the days of Ahaz.⁵

More or less parallel with this, but straighter, is a channel, evidently connected with the Birket el-Hamrā (Red-pool), which lay to the E. of the Siloam pool. It is older than the Siloam conduit (see Schick, PEFQ, Jan. 1891).

6. Other Conduits. The conduit of the upper pool in the highway of the fuller's field (2 K. 18¹⁷) is identified by Wilson with the aqueduct which seems to have run over the Cotton Grotto to the convent of the Sisters of Zion.⁶ Among other conduits may be noticed the one which connects the Citadel or Castle of David (el-Kalā'a) with the Birket Māmillā. It is possibly referred to in Jos. BJ v. 73, where mention is made of the 'gate where water was brought in to the tower of Hippicus' (the latter is usually identified with the NW. tower of the citadel).

For others, less important, see the memoirs of the PEF. Many remains of conduits, more or less well preserved, have been found in other parts of Palestine. It will be sufficient to mention the aqueduct at Jericho across the Wādī el-Kelt (see Jos. Ant. xvii. 131, Schür. GV 1276); another on the road from Damascus to Palmyra, not far from Jerūd; the kanāt Fir'aun, which crosses the Wādī Zēda near Der'at (Edrei); and the aqueduct conveying water from 'Ain et-Tābigha (Perrot-Chip. Art in Jud. 1330; Basd. (3) 291).

(See 'Die Wasserversorgung der Stadt Jerusalem,' ZDPV 132-176 (1878); Benzinger, Heb. Arch. 51 ff. 230 f.; Warren and Conder, Jerusalem; Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Judaea; Basd. passim, and the many notes and articles in the PEF publications.) S. A. C.

CONEY (כֹּנִי, see SHAPHAN; χοιρογρύλλιος [BAFL] [Th. and many MSS of LXX have λαγῶος in Ps. 104:18], Lev. 115 [in Q^{BAF}, unless the order of the verses is accidentally reversed, כֹּנִי is translated δασύπους] Dt. 147 Ps. 104:18 Pr. 30:26†) should rather be 'rock badger' (RV^{mg}), the animal having been identified with certainty as Hyrax syriacus—called in Syriac hāgāsā and in Arabic *wabr*¹ (Rob. LBR 3387, Tristram, FFP 1 f.).

² כֹּנִי, like Ass. mānu, seems to mean 'channel,' 'water-course'; cp COT 2311 ff.

⁴ It is otherwise identified with the one whose remains running W. and E. were discovered during the digging of the foundations for the English church.

The origin of the Hebrew word is quite uncertain: it has been derived by Rödiger and others from a root meaning 'to hide,' akin to צָפַן. The rendering 'coney' (the probable meaning of the Targumic כֹּנִי) is due to Jewish tradition; but the habits of the rabbit do not suit the references in Ps. 104:18 Pr. 30:26. Still less is to be said for Θ's rendering χοιρογρύλλιος—i.e., hedgehog.¹

The shāphān of OT is known to naturalists under the name of Procavia (Hyrax) syriaca (Schrb.). It is a member of the Hyracoidea, one of the most remarkable orders of the Mammalia.

The Syrian hyrax is about the size of a small rabbit, and has a superficial resemblance to that rodent. It is of a dull orange-brown or fawn colour, and has prominent incisor teeth, one pair in the upper jaw and two in the lower; the former, as in the rodents, grow throughout life, but instead of being chisel-shaped at their tip are pointed, and the teeth are triangular in section. As in the rodents, there is a wide gap between the incisor and the molar teeth. The zoological position of the order is obscure. Cuvier pointed out certain anatomical features which they share with the rhinoceros; but this relationship has not been universally accepted, and at present it is better to regard them as an isolated order. Palaeontology has so far thrown no light on the subject. About fourteen species of hyrax are known, all of them from Africa, Arabia, and Syria. The P. (Hyrax) syriaca, like most of its congeners, lives in holes in rocky ground; usually many animals are found together, and they are very shy and easily frightened. When alarmed they utter a shrill cry and hastily retreat to their holes. According to Nasonow,² they are easily tamed. They eat green leaves, fruit, hay, etc. They are said to make a nest of grass and fur, and to bring forth from two or three to six—three seems the usual number—young at a time. The Arabs esteem them as food, though Canon Tristram found them 'rather dry and insipid.' N. M.—A. E. S.

CONFECTIO, CONFECTIONARIES (Ex. 30:25 35. AV; 1 S. 8:13, EV), old words meaning a composition (confectio), or mixture of drugs or dainties, and those who prepare such mixtures—i.e., 'apothecaries'—respectively. RV correctly translates: 'a perfume (חֲרִיקָה) after the art of the perfumer (חֲרִיקָה).' In 1 S. 8:13 female perfumers are meant (חֲרִיקָה, μυρεψοί, unguentariae). It is the masc. pl. of the same word (חֲרִיקָה) that is rendered 'apothecaries' in EV (RV^{mg} 'perfumers') in Neh. 38 (ἰακκεῖμ [BN], ρωκεῖμ [A], μυρεψοί [L], pigmentarii).

CONFESS, CONFESSION. The verb יָדָה in Hiph. and Hithp. means either to acknowledge aloud in ritual

1. The term. worship God's great and glorious attributes (=to praise him) or to make a solemn confession of sin.

The former meaning is far the commoner in Hiph., the latter in Hithp. (a) For יָדָה 'to confess,' see Ps. 32:5 Prov. 28:13†; (b) For יָדָה 'to praise,' 2 Ch. 30:22† (RV 'making confession'). For the more usual senses, see (a) Ps. 7:17 [18] 42:6 1 Ch. 16:34 and elsewhere, (b) Lev. 5:5 16:21 28:40 Nu. 5:7 Ezra 10:1 Neh. 1:6 9:22. Note also that the noun יָדָה, generally 'thanksgiving,' has in Josh. 7:19 Ezra 10:11 the sense of 'confession (of sin).' Θ renders the verb usually by ἐξομολογεῖν, ἐξομολόγησις, once by ὁμολογεῖν; it never renders the noun by ὁμολογία.

No doubt there is primitive Semitic symbolism in the choice of יָדָה to express the religious act of confession; but here, as elsewhere, we painfully feel the uncertainty of the subject (cp Lag. Or. 222). The root-meaning of the verb is 'to throw,' or perhaps (cp Ar. wadā and יָדָה, Is. 11:8) 'to extend.' Some peculiar gesture used in confession seems to be indicated (cp BDB, s.v. יָדָה). In 1 K. 8:38 'spreading forth the hands' is specified; but this was simply the ordinary gesture in prayer.

Individual confession of sin must be assumed to have been common, though references to it are scanty. Josh. 7:19 is a passage by itself: Achan's confession is bound to confess, to 'give glory' thereby to the all-seeing God; but he is not forgiven. Prov. 28:13 (but not Ps. 32:5, where pious Israel speaks) extols the benefit of it. 1 K. 8:38 virtually refers to it. When God touches the heart or conscience of the sinner (לְבָבוֹ, נַפְשׁוֹ ἡ καρδία αὐτοῦ, but EV 'the plague of his own heart'), the sinner spreads forth his hands (see § 1) towards 'this house' and obtains forgiveness. It has been suggested that the liturgical formula לְהוֹבִיחַ 'to bring to remembrance' (?) in the headings of Pss. 38 and 70 f. (viewed as a single psalm) means that these psalms were to be used by a man confessing his sin at the offering of a special sacrifice;² but the view is not very probable. After the destruction of the temple, the confession of sin by the high priest for the whole people having ceased, the duty had to be discharged by each Israelite for himself in the synagogue. Various formulæ came into use, for which see the interesting conspectus in the article 'Sündenbekenntniss' in Hamburger's REJ, Abth. 2.

CONFISCATION OF GOODS

(a) Of liturgical confession of sin there are three great examples: Neh. 9 Is. 63 7-64 11 [12] Dan. 9 (psalms like 51 may also be compared). Early Liturgical formulæ used by the high priest on the confessions great fast have been preserved (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF, § 7). See also the short general formula quoted by Weber (Jüd. Theol. 321), from Talm. Jer. Yoma, end. Such compositions belong to the class called וִידּוּי, widdui.

(β) There were liturgical confessions of another kind—Thanksgiving confessions. A sacrifice of תּוֹרָה (confession=thanksgiving) is one which is accompanied by a loud (because earnest) acknowledgment of God's gracious guidance (Ps. 107 2; cp Jer. 33 11, post-exilic). The so-called Hodu-psalms (105-107) also may be mentioned here. On the phrase לְהוֹדוֹ, descriptive of a special service of the Levites, cp CHOIRS, § 2.

The point of contact between confession of sin and eucharistic confession is given in 1 K. 8 33. When Israel is defeated because of its sins, 'if they turn again to thee, and confess thy name, and pray . . . , then hear thou in heaven, and forgive'; and it is in harmony with this that two out of the three liturgical prayers mentioned above begin with a glowing acknowledgment of Yahwe's goodness. (The prayer in Dan. 9 merely recognises the duty of thanksgiving in a few words relative to God's fidelity to his covenant.)

In the New Testament we find both senses of ἐξομολογεῖν (to thank, and to confess); e.g., Mt. 11 25

4. NT. 36. In Rom. 14 11 the verb represents ὁμολογία; see Is. 45 23. 'Ὁμολογεῖν and ὁμολογία usually signify 'profess,' 'profession'; so, e.g., 1 Tim. 6 12, AV Heb. 3 1, AV, etc.

Confession and repentance are necessarily connected—the Baptist's hearers are baptised, confessing (ἐξομολογούμενοι) their sins (Mk. 15 Mt. 36)—and therefore so also are confession and forgiveness. See 1 Jn. 1 9 and especially Ja. 5 16, where the 'healing' spoken of has reference to the sins confessed³ (moral and physical troubles connected; cp Is. 53 5 1 Pet. 2 24). The ἀλλήλοι ('one another') are Christian disciples.

The 'confession' of 1 Tim. 6 12 may be that made at Timothy's ordination; but that of Heb. 3 1 seems to be the confession of the divine sonship of Jesus, such as was made at baptism (see BAPTISM, § 3). T. K. C.

CONSECRATE

CONGREGATION. For קָהָל qāhāl, and (less correctly) קָהָל qāhāl, and מִדְבָּר mēdāb, see ASSEMBLY.

'Thy congregation,' Ps. 68 10 (11), RVmg. 'thy troop' (cp 2 S. 23 11 13, EV; but see LEHI), represents a corrupt Heb. word. קָהָל should probably be קָהָל. Canaan was a land of corn; cp Is. 36 17. Fully corrected, the line becomes, 'with thy bread they were satisfied therein' (Che. Ps. 62).

συναγωγή (Acts 13 43) is in RV SYNAGOGUE (g.v.).

For Acts 7 38 RVmg. as in Tyndale, etc. (ἐκκλησία), see CHURCH (so in EV).

CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF (הַר מוֹעֵד; ἔν θρεῖ ὁψηλῶ [BNAQI]; in monte testamenti; ܡܫܐܪܐ ܕܝܫܪܐܝܝܬ), RV's modification of the unfortunate 'mount of the congregation' of AV, which suggests an impossible identification with Zion (Is. 14 13⁺). The phrase occurs in the boast of the king of Babylon, and describes a mountain whose summit was above the 'stars of God' (the brightest constellations), and its base in 'the recesses of the north.' The best rendering is 'Mountain of (the divine) assembly.'

No one would have thought of Mount Zion, but for the accidental parallelism of מוֹעֵד (AV 'tabernacle of the congregation,' RV 'tent of meeting'), and the supposed reference to a passage in Ps. 48 3 [3], rendered in EV 'Mount Zion [on] the sides of the north, the city of the great king.'

מוֹעֵד is a perfectly vague expression, and Ps. 48 3 [3] is under too great a suspicion of corruptness to serve as a commentary.¹ It is, in fact, no mountain known in terrestrial geography that is meant, but the 'holy mountain of Elohim' (Ezek. 28 13 f.), where there were the 'flashing' stones (see CHERUB, § 2, n.), and the cherub, and (so the prophet thought) the king of Tyre (see CHERUB, § 2). It is not stated that this holy mountain was in the north; but we may presume from Ezek. 14 that it was regarded as being there. This is confirmed by Job 37 22 (emended text).

Out of the north cometh (supernatural) brightness;²

On Eloah there is awe-inspiring splendour.

That the Babylonians believed in a similar northern mountain can hardly be doubtful, in spite of Jensen's learned argument (Kosmol. 203-209) against comparing the מוֹעֵד with the Ê-harsag-kurkura ('Mountain-house of the lands') of the Prism Inscription of Tiglath-pileser I. (Del. Par. 118). It appears that the later OT writers supposed the north to be above, and consequently the south below the earth (see Job 26 7, and cp EARTH, FOUR QUARTERS OF). The expressions 'I will scale the heavens,' and 'in the recesses of the north,' are therefore strictly accurate.³

For קָדַשׁ qādāš, 'to devote' (Mic. 4 13), see BAN, § 1. For קָדַשׁ qādāš, 'to dedicate (oneself)' (Nu. 6 12), whence קָדַשׁ qādāš, AV CONSECRATION, RV 'separation' (Nu. 6 7), see NAZIRITE.

Τελεωμένος in Heb. 7 28 is better rendered 'perfected' by RV (cp AV 2 10 59). For ἐνεκαίνισεν (Heb. 10 20), RV 'dedicated,' see DEDICATE.

² Read קָדַשׁ with Che. (Expos. July 1897) and Duhm.

COOKING AND COOKING UTENSILS. The task of preparing the daily food naturally fell to the women of the household, even women of

1. Kitchens. the highest rank attending, on occasion, to this part of the household duties (2 S. 13:8 f.; cp below). An apartment or apartments specially devoted to the preparation of food—in other words, a kitchen—can have been found only in the houses of the wealthy. We can realise without difficulty the kitchen of the Hebrew kings and nobles from the life-like picture of that of Rameses III. as figured on his tomb at Thebes (reproduced in Wilk. Anc. Egypt. 232-34). In such establishments there were cooks, male (מְבָחִים: 1 S. 9:23 f.) and female (מְבָחִיּוֹת: 1 S. 8:13). In connection with the great sanctuaries, too, such as Shiloh (1 S. 14:9) and Bethel, there must have been something of the nature of a public kitchen, where the worshippers had facilities for preparing the sacrificial meals. In his sketch of the restored temple at Jerusalem, Ezekiel makes provision for such kitchens (both for the priests [46:19 f.] and for the people [21-24]), which are here called 'boiling-places' (מְבִישֹׁתַי, mageireia [BAQ]: v. 23) and 'boiling houses' (RV v. 24 מְבִישֵׁי מַיִם, oikoi tōn mageirōn). See CLEAN, § 2.

In an ordinary Hebrew household, whose food, except on great occasions, was exclusively vegetarian,

2. Culinary arrangements. the culinary arrangements were of the simplest kind. Two large jars (כַּד, kadh, the δδρα of Jn. 4:28 26 f.) of sun-dried clay had a place in the meanest house, one for fetching the daily supply of water from the spring—carried then as now upon the head or on the shoulder¹ by the women of the household (Gen. 24:15 f.; cp 1 K. 18:33 [34]: EV 'barrel')—the other for holding the store of wheat or barley for the daily bread (1 K. 17:12 14 16: EV 'barrel'). In both the passages last cited the American revisers rightly prefer the rendering 'jars.' To these we must add some instrument for crushing or grinding the grains of the various cereals used as food, in particular wheat and barley (see FOOD, § 1, BREAD, § 1). The most primitive method was simply to crush the grains between two stones or rather to rub them upon a flat stone by means of another. Such primitive corn-grinders or 'grain-rubbers' (as they were called in Scotland) were found by Mr. Bliss at all stages of his excavations in Tell el-Hesi—the probable site of Lachish—'long slabs flat on one side and convex on the other, with rounded ends' (Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, 83, illustr. p. 85). They are found also both in ancient and in modern Egypt (see illustr. in Erman's Egypt, 190, for the former; for the latter, Benz. HA 85, Nowack, HA 1110). The pestle and mortar (see MORTAR) represent a later stage in the art of preparing food. The still more effective hand-mill or quern (מִחְמָה) with its upper and nether millstones—hence the dual form—is the last to appear (Erman, op. cit. 189; see also MILL).²

² Cp. Dougherty, Ar. Des. 2179: 'After the water-skins a pair of millstones is the most necessary husbandry in an Arabian household.'

COOKING

MILK (q.v.) was kept in skins (Judg. 4:19), but more usually in bowls, wine in skin bottles (see BOTTLE, 1), oil and honey in earthenware jars (see CRUSE, 2). Olives, grapes, figs, and the other fruits of the soil were no doubt kept partly in similar jars, partly in baskets, of which several varieties are named in OT and NT (see BASKET). Such were the sal (סַל, Gen. 40:17 etc.; κανοὺν [ADEL]), a basket of wicker-work; the stne' (סִנְיָה, Dt. 26:2; κάρταλλος [BAFL]; canistrum, cp Verg. Æn. 8:180) for carrying wheat from the threshing-floor, to judge from the passage Dt. 28:5:17 ('blessed shall be thy basket and thy kneading-trough' RV; ὁ αὐθόη-και σου);¹ and the dūd (דֹּד, a basket in which figs were gathered [Jer. 24:2 Ps. 81:6 [7] RV]). The preparation of bread, always the staple article of diet, required the kneading-trough (מִשְׁחָתָה) of wood, earthenware, or bronze according to circumstances, and the oven (תֹּנֵה)—mentioned together Ex. 8:3 (7:28)—for which see BREAD, § 2 c.

Coming now to cooking, in the ordinary sense—that is, the preparation of food by the agency of fire,—

3. Preparation of food. we find that the various methods of cooking to which reference is made may be grouped under two heads.

The food was cooked either (1) by bringing it into immediate contact with the source of heat, whether as in the case of the ash-cakes (subcinericius panis, 1 K. 19:6, described under BREAD, § 2 a) or in the rough and ready method of roasting on the live embers (see below) or in the more civilised method of roasting by means of spit or gridiron; or (2) by using a suitable liquid as the medium for transmitting the heat required—such as water, milk, oil, or fat (in frying). It would seem that the Hebrews originally included these various processes under the general term בָּשָׂה.

The original signification of this verbal root was evidently 'to be or to become ripe,' 'to ripen' applied to grain (Joel 3:4 [13] and fruit (Gen. 40:10), from which the transition to the idea of 'making (food) eatable'—i.e., cooking—was easy (cp post-biblical בָּשָׂה, something cooked, a 'dish'). Hence we find בָּשָׂה 'cooked with fire' (2 Ch. 35:13) and בָּשָׂה 'cooked with (or in) water' (Ex. 12:9), when it is important that 'roasted' and 'boiled' shall be precisely distinguished. In ordinary language, however, בָּשָׂה was used only in the sense of 'boil,' while for the various forms of 'roasting' indicated under (1) above (1 S. 2:15 Is. 44:16 19) use was made of the word שָׁלָה. That which was roasted, a roast, was שָׁלָה (Is. 44:16; cp 'קָל' roasted or parched corn; see FOOD, § 1). In the Talmud a third verb is frequently found alongside of שָׁלָה and בָּשָׂה—viz., פָּקַח, which is applied not only to the cooking of flesh but also to the boiling down of fruit to make preserves (Ma'as. 41, K'el. 88). These three verbs are generally taken to represent the Latin assare, coquere, and elixare respectively, in which case שָׁלָה would signify 'to boil thoroughly' (cp מִתְבַּשֵּׁה in Ezek. 24:10, RV 'to boil well,' and מִתְבַּשֵּׁה ib. v. 5): it is probably equivalent to our 'stew,' since in the absence of knives and forks (see MEALS) the Oriental has to stew his meat till it can be readily pulled in pieces by the hand.

When the meat was boiled in a larger quantity of water than was necessary for stewing, the rich liquor which resulted was known as מַרְרָב, mārāb (Judg. 6:19 f. Is. 65:4 kr. [Kt. פִּיק] EV 'broth'), also perhaps as מִתְבַּשֵּׁה (Ezek. 24:10, RV 'make thick the broth'). The meat and the broth might be served together or separately (the latter by Gideon, Judg. loc. cit.). When the meat, on the other hand, is set on with a smaller quantity of water, to which onions or other pungent vegetables or spices have been added, the result is the favourite Arab stew yahni (يَحْنِي), perhaps the שָׁלָה (Ned. 7) and שָׁלָה (Ab. Zar. 25) of the Mishna. The 'savoury meat' (מִתְבַּשֵּׁה, Gen. 27:4: cp Prov. 23:3) which Rebekah prepared from 'two kids of the goats' was doubtless a spicy stew of this kind.

A reference to another modern dish, kibbeh, which has been called the national dish of Syria, has been found by various scholars in Prov. 27:22 RV: 'Though thou shouldst bray a fool in a mortar with a pestle among bruised corn, yet will not his foolishness depart from him.' This exactly describes the operation of making kibbet: the mutton is first pounded to shreds in a wooden or stone mortar; it is then mixed with burghud (see FOOD, § 1), and the whole boiled and served.¹ [But on the text see Exp. T. viii. [97], 432; where הרימות 'bruised corn' (?) is emended to הריני, 'his fellows'.]

COOKING AND COOKING UTENSILS

When an animal of the herd (קָדָשׁ) or of the flock (זָבָח, see, further, FOOD, § 11, and SACRIFICE) was to be prepared for food it was first slaughtered according to the prescribed method and the carcase thoroughly drained of its blood. For skinning, flint knives (כַּמְנֵי Judg. 19:29) were used in early times (cp Josh. 5:2 ff., RV 'knives of flint')—such as those recovered from Tell-el-Hesi (Bliss, op. cit. 194, illustr. 106). Sacrificial knives were later known as כַּמְנֵי (Ezra 19; cp post-biblical חַמְנֵי); a knife for ordinary domestic purposes was כַּמְנֵי (Prov. 23:2)—in later Hebrew always כַּמְנֵי. The animal was then cut up, the technical term for which was נָחַץ (Lev. 16:12, and often)—a single piece נָחַץ—the priests received the portions that were their due and the remainder was consigned to the pot. The latter, if of copper, had in later times to be scrupulously scoured (מָסָה) and rinsed (שָׁחָה, Zebah. 11:4 ff.; cp Mk. 7:4) when the cooking was over.

The primitive hearth was formed of a couple of stones by which the pot was supported, room being left beneath for the fuel—wood or dung (see

4. Firing. COALS, § 2). Large pots might be placed on the top of the tannūr or baking oven, as at the present day; such an arrangement was found to have been in use in the ancient Lachish (see Bliss, op. cit. 97). The smaller pots were boiled on a chafing dish or pan containing charcoal (שָׂחָה, Zech. 12:6 AV 'hearth of fire,' RV 'pan of fire'), as in Rameses' kitchen. In Lev. 11:35 there is mention, alongside of the tannūr or oven, of the kirāim (כִּירִים, κυστροπόδες [BF], χυτροπόδες [AL]; EV 'range[s] for pots,' RV^{mg.} 'stew-pan'). According to the Talmud, it was a portable cooking-stove, capable of holding two pots (hence the dual) as distinguished from the kuppāh (כֻּפָּה, better קֻפָּה), a stove which had room for only one pot (Jastrow, Dict., s.v.). Like the tannūr, it was of baked clay, and, therefore, easily broken (cp Di. in loc. and Now. HA 2:80, n.). The kirāh (in the sing.) and the kuppāh are frequently mentioned together in the Mishna (see esp. Kelim). For carrying the necessary charcoal a ladle or firepan (קִרְיָה) was used (Ex. 27:3383; in Num. 16:6 ff. 'censer'; Kel. 2:37); for stirring and adjusting it, a pair of tongs (קִלְקָה Is. 66) and שִׁפְיָה shovels (pala or rutrum), for removing the ashes, are mentioned, but only in connection with the great altar (see ALTAR, § 9). The bellows (קָפָה; φυστήρ [BNAQ]) of Jer. 6:29 was probably used only by the metal smelters—for a description and illustration, see Wilkinson, op. cit. 2312. The ordinary housewife was content to fan the charcoal with a fan (כַּמְנֵי, Kel. 16:7) of feathers, as pictured in the representation of Rameses' kitchen referred to above.

The names of various utensils in which food was actually cooked are differently rendered in EV without any attempt at consistency: pan, kettle, caldron, pot (in this order is the list given in 1 S. 2:14). The data at our command do not permit of these being accurately distinguished one from another. In the houses of the poor they were doubtless of glazed or even unglazed earthenware (כִּיֹּרֶת, Lev. 6:28[21]; see POTTERY); in those of the wealthier classes, of bronze (כִּיֹּרֶת, loc. cit., Ezek. 24:11). The difference of rank (so to say) between the two materials gives point to Ben Sira's illustration, 'What fellowship shall the earthen pot have with the [brazen] kettle?' (χύτρα πρὸς λέβητα: Ecclesi. 13:2 f.). In connection with the temple we read not only of pots and caldrons made of bronze (1 K. 7:45 2 K. 25:14 Jer. 52:18) but also of such vessels of silver and gold (Jer. 52:19).

i. For boiling meat various vessels were employed (cp 1 S. 2:14). (a) The most frequently mentioned is the סִיר, sir, pot or caldron. It was used for cooking the ordinary family meal (2 K. 4:38 f. Mic. 3:3 Ex. 16:3 [flesh pots of Egypt]), and for boiling the sacrificial flesh (Zech. 14:20). It served also for a 'washpot' (Ps. 60:8 [10]). It must have been one of the largest of the cooking vessels, to judge from the incident recorded in 2 K. 4:38 ff. ('the great pot' for the whole company of the prophets). (b) The kiyyōr (כִּיֹּרֶת) must have been a wide, shallow pot of considerable size, since the same name is given to the 'laver of brass' (Ex. 30:18) at which the priests were to wash their hands and feet. It served as a chafing-dish (Zech. 12:6). Wherein the kiyyōr differed from (c) the pārūr (פָּרֹר) in which the manna was boiled (Nu. 11:8 RV), and (d) the dād (דָּד, Job 41:20[12]), and (e) the qallūhath (קַלְלֹהַת, Mic. 3:3), we do not know.

In Job 41:20[12] caldron (AV) is a mistranslation of אֹמֶקוֹן (see Rush, 2). In 2 S. 13:9 MT has כִּיֹּרֶת, not found elsewhere (EV pan); but the true reading is probably '[and she called] servant' (כִּיֹּרֶת: so Klo. followed by Ki. and Bu.).

These various pots, pans, etc., were probably used without a lid (in late Heb. כַּסִּי), although the obscure מַצִּיר of Nu. 19:15 is taken by some to have this signification.

ii. A fork (כַּנְיָה, כַּנְיָה) of two or three (1 S. 2:13) prongs was used to lift the meat from the pot, and also to stir the contents of the latter (see illustration, Wilkinson, op. cit. 32).

iii. The spoons (כַּפְיָה) mentioned among the furniture of the table of shewbread (Ex. 25:29) and elsewhere were more probably shallow bowls. We find, however, in the Mishna, real spoons (כַּפְיָה) made of bone (Shabb. 8:6, Kel. 17:2) and of glass (Kel. 30:2). There is also mention of a wooden cooking ladle (קִיֹּרֶת, Bēzāh, 1:7), which was probably used for removing the scum (קִיֹּרֶת, Ezek. 24:6 11, so AV; but this word is more probably 'rust' as RV from the contents of the pārūr or pot (otherwise explained by Levy, s.v. קִיֹּרֶת).

While boiling, to judge from the comparative frequency of the OT references, was the favourite

6. Roasting. mode of cooking flesh-meat, there need be no hesitation in saying that roasting also was practised from the earliest times. In its most primitive form, roasting, as we have seen, consists in laying the meat directly on the ashes or other source of heat, either kindled on the ground or in a pit specially dug (Burckhardt, Notes, etc. 1:240, Rob. BR [41], 1:118 304). The fish of which the disciples partook by the lake of Galilee was cooked by being laid on the charcoal (ὀψάριον ἐπικείμενον, Jn. 21:9).

The spit, the ὀβελός of the Homeric poems, is not mentioned, as it happens, in the OT; but of its use there need be no doubt. In Egypt, Erman tells us, 'the favourite national dish, the goose, was generally roasted over live embers; the spit is very primitive, a stick stuck through the beak and neck of the bird. They roasted fish in the same way, sticking the spit through the tail' (Egypt, 189, illustr. ib., and Wilk. 235). 'The wooden spit was favoured by the Romans (cp Verg. Georg. 2:396, 'Pinguiaque in veribus torre-bimus exta columnis). Later Hebrew legislation—in this, no doubt, perpetuating an ancient practice—required that the Passover lamb should be roasted on a spit of pomegranate (שֶׁפֶר שֶׁל רִמּוֹן [Levy, שֶׁפֶר] Pes. 71). The ordinary spit, being of iron,—so much we may infer from the demand that a spit purchased from an idolater must be cleansed in the fire (Ab. Zarā. 512)—was not allowed for the above-mentioned purpose; neither was the gridiron (מַסְבֵּלָה, Pes. 72). The spit, we may suppose, rested on andirons¹ (βάρεις, varæ), on which it could be turned by the hand.

The passage of the treatise Pesāhim above referred to speaks further of roasting, or more exactly of broiling, on a gridiron placed apparently over the mouth of a tannūr or baking oven. The gridiron was perhaps used to prepare the piece of broiled fish (ἰχθύος ὀπτοῦ μέρος) of Lk. 2442. Not only flesh and fish but also eggs, onions, etc., were roasted by the Jews (Shabb. 110).

The favourite mode of roasting meat for ordinary household purposes at the present day in Syria is by means of skewers. The meat is cut into small pieces, which are stuck upon the skewers and roasted over a brazier. Meat thus prepared is termed kebāb.

With regard to the food-products of the vegetable kingdom (see FOOD), many vegetables were of course eaten raw (ἀγνός, in Hebrew רָךְ, literally 'living,' a word applied not only to raw animal flesh [1 S. 215 Lev. 1310 f.], but also to fish [Nedar. 64], to vegetables [ib.], and even to unmixed wine). They were also cooked by being boiled, alone or mixed with various ingredients—such as oil and spices. The Hebrew housewives, we may be sure, were not behind their modern kinsfolk of the desert, of whom Doughty testifies that 'the Arab housewives make savoury messes of any grain, seething it and putting thereto only a little salt, and samm' (Ar. Des. 2130). Thus, of the cereals, the obscure 'ārisāh (עִרְסָה, Nu. 1520 f.) was probably a porridge of barley groats (see, further, FOOD, § 1), whilst Jacob sod for himself a dish (בִּינִי, EV 'pottage') of lentils (Gen. 2529 34); the same name is given to the vegetarian dish prepared for the sons of the prophets (2 K. 438 f.; cp Hagg. 212). In NT times, at least, it was known that the pulses or pod-plants were improved by being soaked (מְשֻׁה) before being boiled. Various kinds, such as beans and lentils, might be boiled together (Orlah. 17): they might also, like our French beans, be boiled in the pods (קֶלִיפּוֹת). In the OT we find mention of the maḥābath (מַחְבַּת, רִיגָנוֹן, AV 'pan,' RV 'baking-pan,' mg. 'flat plate,' Lev. 25 621 [14], etc.) and the marḥesheth (מַרְחֶשֶׁת, EV 'frying pan,' Lev. 27 79). The maḥābath certainly (see Ezek. 43), and the marḥesheth probably, was of iron; and, although both are used with reference only to the sacrificial cakes (see BAKEMEATS, BREAD), we may legitimately infer from the fact that the martyrs of 2 Macc. 7 were roasted alive on the רִיגָנוֹן (sv. 35; cp late Heb. word מִרְנָן) that both may have been used also in the preparation of meat.

To judge from the prepositions employed (עַל, 'on,' and בְּ, 'in'), the maḥābath was deeper than the marḥesheth. This inference is confirmed by the tradition, which we find in the Mishna, that the difference between the marḥesheth and the maḥābath consisted in the former having a lid (כֶּסֶת) while the latter had none; to which another authority adds that the former is deep and its contents fluid, the latter flat and its contents firm (Menah. 58). The maḥābath, in short, was a stewpan, the marḥesheth similar to a Scotch 'girdle,' a flat iron plate on which oatcakes are baked. A striking illustration of Ezek. 43 is furnished by Doughty (Ar. Des. 1593), who describes an iron-plated door in the castle of Ḥayil: 'the plates (in the indigence of their arts) are the shield-like iron pans (tannūr) upon which the town housewives bake their girdle-bread.'

Other utensils named or implied are (a) the sieve, nāphāh (נָפַח, Is. 3028; Shabb. 82, Aboth. 515), for sifting the flour, and (b) the strainer, mēšamméret, מְשַׁמְמֶרֶת (Shabb. 201, Ab. 515 [especially for wine]; cp Is. 256, Mt. 2324). An ordinary bowl, however, might be perforated so as to serve as a strainer, as we see from the pottery of Tell-el-Hesi (Bliss, op. cit. 85). To these may be added (c) one of the commonest of the post-biblical terms for a pot, קִרְדָּה; hence קִרְדָּה קֻצְוָה came to signify 'cooked food' (Nedar. 61). For the vessels used for serving food, see MEALS, § 8.

The importance of oil in the Hebrew kitchen will be noticed under OIL (q.v.). In early times the custom,

8. Condiments. so popular among the modern Arabs, of boiling flesh in milk seems to have prevailed among the Hebrews. The oldest legislation—confirmed by the Deuteronomic—limited this practice so far as to forbid (for reasons that are still obscure: cp FOOD, § 13, and see MAGIC, SACRIFICE) the seething of a kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 2319 3426 Dt. 1421). In NT times this prohibition had been extended far beyond its original intention.

Thus we read in the Mishna: 'It is forbidden to seethe (בִּשַׁל) any sort of flesh in milk, except the flesh of fish and locusts; it is also forbidden to set flesh upon the table along with cheese' (with the same exceptions, Khullin. 81). It was still debated whether the prohibition applied to fowls and game or only to cattle, sheep, and goats (ib. 4). In the course of time, however, it became part of the Jewish dietary law, that two distinct sets of cooking utensils—one for meat alone, and another for dishes into the preparation of which milk or butter enters—are required in every orthodox Jewish kitchen (see on this law of בִּשְׁרֵי בָהֵמָה esp. Wiener, Die jüd. Speisegesetze, 41-120 [195]). Extreme purists have gone the length of using three (ib. 115 f.) and even four such sets.

COOS, or rather, as in RV and 1 Macc. 1523 EV, Cos (κωκ; now Stanchio—i.e., es rhy kw), the least and most southerly of the four principal islands off the coast of Asia Minor. It lies at the entrance to a deep bay, on the two projecting promontories of which were Cnidus and Halicarnassus. It owed its fertility to its volcanic origin, and its commercial importance to its position. It lies on the high road of all maritime traffic between the Dardanelles and Cyprus: vessels coasting in either direction must pass within half a mile of the capital (also called Cos), which was on the E. extremity of the island, and had a good anchorage and a port sheltered from all winds except those from the SE. Lucan (Phar. 8243) thus sketches the usual route of ships:—

*Epheusque relinquens
Radit saxa Sani; spirat de litore Coe
Aura fluens: Cnidon inde fugit, clarumque relinquit Sole Rhodon.*

In precise agreement with this is the account of Paul's voyage from Macedonia to Palestine (Acts 211). His ship ran before the wind (εὐθροισμῶσαντες) from Milētus, about 40 m. to the N., down to Cos (i.e., either the island or the capital: probably the latter is meant); next day it reached Rhodes.

In spite of its geographical advantages, Cos remained historically unimportant. Its inhabitants, apparently of deliberate choice, eschewed foreign relationships, and devoted themselves to the development of internal resources. No colonies were sent out; for long the capital was in the west of the island; the strategic and commercial importance of its present site was ignored until 366 B.C. When at last the Coans were compelled to emerge from their seclusion, it was only to echo the voice of Rhodes in all matters of foreign policy. The success of this concentration of energy is indicated by the fact that Cos ranked with Rhodes, Chios, Samos, and Lesbos as one of the μακάριον νῆσοι (Diod. Sic. 581 82), and by the existence of the saying 'He who cannot thrive in Cos will do no better in Egypt.'¹ Allied with this material prosperity was the development of liberal arts. Under the Ptolemies Cos became an important literary centre. With it are connected the names of Theocritus the poet, Bērōssus the historian, Apelles the painter, and, at an earlier date (5th cent. B.C.), Hippocrates the physician. Cos was one of the great centres of the worship of Aesculapius, and of the caste or medical school of Asclepiade. Claudius in 53 A.D. gave the island the privilege of immunity, mainly for its medical fame (Tac. Ann. 1261).

Among the commercial products of the island were unguents, two kinds of wine, pottery (amphora Coe, Pliny, H.N. 35.162), and silk for Roman ladies (Coe purpure, Hor. Od. iv. 13.13 vestes tenues, Tibull. ii. 3.55). Cos is still an active port. Strabo (657) notes the fair aspect of the city to one entering the roads.

Interesting is the connection of Cōs with the Jews. As Mithridates seized 800 talents deposited in the island by the Jews of Asia (Jos. Ant. xiv. 72), there must then have been a Jewish settlement there engaged in banking. In 1 Macc. 15.23 Cōs is mentioned in the list of places to which the circular letter of the Roman senate in favour of the Jews (circa 139-8 B.C.) is said to have been addressed. In 86 B.C. Gaius Fannius wrote to the Coan authorities enclosing a senatus consultum to secure safe convoy for Jewish pilgrims to Jerusalem. The island was connected also with Herod the Great (Jos. B. i. 21.11), and with his son Antipas (Boeckh, 2502).

COPPER (נְחֹשֶׁת; χαλκος; cp BRASS). The compound of copper and zinc that we call brass appears to have been little known to the ancients; 1. In Egypt. but we have abundant evidence that copper was early known, and that it was hardened by means of alloys into bronze. Seneferu, a conquering pharaoh of the fourth dynasty, worked the Sinaitic copper mines, and M. de Morgan has found some articles of copper in the tomb of Menes (traditionally regarded as the first king of Egypt), explored by him in 1897. M. Amélineau appears to have proved that copper was known at an even earlier date, and from his researches and those of Mr. Quibell at Kōm el-Aḥmar we may probably conclude that the Pharaonic Egyptians were from the first not ignorant of the use of gold and copper (ḥmt). Themines in the Sinaitic peninsula continued to be the chief source from which the Egyptians drew their copper (see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 355, and cp SINAI); but in the fifteenth century they obtained it also from Alāšia—i.e., CYPRUS¹ (see Am. Tab., 25 and 27), where Cēsola has found both copper and bronze celts in Phœnician remains.

The oldest Babylonian specimens of copper are those found by M. de Sarzec at Tello (before 2500 B.C.); at Tell es-Sifr, in the same neighbourhood. Mr. Loftus has found even a large copper factory (1500 B.C.). In Babylonian graves, and also in what Dr. J. P. Peters calls a jeweller's shop (at Nippur), objects made of copper (belonging to circa 1300 B.C.) have been found. Hommel thinks, on philological grounds, that the Semitic Babylonians as metallurgists were pupils of the Sumerians, and dates their acquaintance with copper and iron very early.² The inscriptions make frequent mention of copper (šiparu) and bronze³ (crā, also ḫū, and urudū; cp Lat. raudus = æs infectum). The ancient hymn (in Sumerian and Assyrian) to Gibil, the fire-god, extols him for his services in the mixing of copper and tin (cp Tubal-cain, and see CAINITES, § 10). The Assyrians used bronze axes as late as the ninth century. They derived their copper and bronze largely from the so-called Na'iri countries; ultimately, therefore, from Armenia; the copper in the tribute paid to Rammān-nirari III. by Damascus is mentioned elsewhere (IRON).⁴

The Canaanites, naturally enough, were well acquainted with copper. According to Ritter (Erdk. 17.1063 cited by Knobel), there are still traces of 3. In Canaan. ancient copper-mines in the Lebanon;⁵

⁵ Cp the important descriptive phrase quoted in Del. Par. 333, šad Ba'alī-šapūna sadū rabū šiparī 'the mountain Baal-this is confirmed by what seems to be an assertion of the fact in Dt. 8.9 and Zech. 6.1 (see below, § 5). On the E. of the Lebanon range copper must have been abundant in the 'land of Nuḥāšši' (Am. Tab.), which Halévy ingeniously identifies with ZOBAB; and in later times there were copper mines in Edom at Phainon, or Phenon (cp PINON). The Phœnicians early employed bronze for works of art,¹ and the great mound of Tell el-Hesi, believed to be Lachish, proves that the Amorites who dwelt there had used their opportunities. 'In the remains of the Amorite city (perhaps 1500 B.C.) there are large rough weapons of war, made of copper without admixture of tin; above this, dating perhaps from 1250 to 800, appear bronze tools, but the bronze gradually becomes scarcer, its place being taken by iron'² (see IRON). Whatever, therefore,

4. In Israel. be the date of 1 S. 17.5 as a document, we may feel quite certain that the Philistine warriors had armour of bronze; indeed, their ancestors in Asia Minor doubtless had bronze weapons long before David's time.³ Goliath, however, uses weapons of attack made of iron (the kidōn [?] of bronze can hardly be a javelin; see GOLIATH).

The statement in Josh. 6.24 (copper or bronze vessels found in Jericho) will be in the main correct; also that in 2 S. 8.8, in as far as it relates to the abundance of bronze in Syria. Whether the serpent of bronze called NEHUSHTAN [q.v.] was earlier than the temple of Solomon may, perhaps, be doubted. At any rate, the notice in Nu. 21.9 (JE) is as much of an anachronism as that in Ex. 38.2-8 (P). The Israelites in the wilderness had no workers in bronze. Nor could David find a competent bronze-worker in all Israel; the statements respecting Hiram the artificer in 1 K. 7.13 ff. are no doubt historical.⁴ In the later regal period it was, of course, quite otherwise (cp Jer. 6.28 ff. Ezek. 22.18.20). From 2 K. 25.13 ff. Jer. 52.17 ff. we learn that the Babylonians broke the sacred vessels of bronze and carried away the metal to Babylon; no doubt Rehoboam's shields of 'brass' (1 K. 14.27 2 Ch. 12.10) went there too; but the chief losses were probably repaired. The cymbals in the second temple were certainly of copper or bronze, as we may infer from 1 Ch. 15.19 Jos. Ant. vii. 123 (cp 1 Cor. 13.1). Gates of 'brass' are mentioned in Ps. 107.16 Is. 45.2 (cp Herod. 1.179, and see Mr. Pinches' account of the bronze gates of Balawāt);⁵ mining implements of 'brass' in Ecclus. 48.17 (Heb. Text).

That 'brass' (bronze) should be used to symbolise hardness and strength is natural. In time of drought,

5. OT usage. it seemed as if the heavens were bronze, so that no rain could pass through them (Dt. 28.23), or as if the earth were bronze, so that it could never be softened again (Lev. 26.19). A sufferer asks if his 'flesh' (i.e., body) is of brass (Job 6.12), as the bones of Bēhemoth (Job 40.18) and the brow of disobedient Israel (Is. 48.4) are, by other writers, said to be. To be compared with brass is not, however, the highest distinction. It was the third empire in Nebuchadrezzar's vision that was of 'brass' (Dan. 2.39 cp v. 32). On the other hand, 'brass' in the obscure phrase 'mountains of brass' (Zech. 6.1) has no symbolic meaning: 'brass' (i.e., copper) is merely mentioned to enable the reader to identify the mountains (cp Nuḥāšši, the 'copperland'; see § 3).

Difficult as the passage is, we need not despair of explaining it. The 'mountains of brass' are parallel to the 'mountains šapūn, great mountain of copper'; also Sargon, Ann. 23, where Ba'il-šapūna, 'the great mountain,' is spoken of as containing mines (copper?).

They were no doubt the 'hills out of which thou mayest dig copper' (Dr. 8:9)—i.e., Lebanon and Hermon (see above, § 3), which formed the northern boundary of the Holy Land. It is the 'land of the north' (the seat of the empire of the Seleucidae?) that chiefly occupied the thoughts of the speaker¹ (68). See Zechariah, Book of. On רֶחַל הַנָּהָר Ezra 8:27, cp Colours, § 7.

COR (כֶּרֶךְ , perh. Ass. kāru [v. Muss-Arnolt, s.v.], or from כָּרַר ; see Nö. ZDMG 40:734 [186]), a measure of capacity—an homer (10 ephahs or baths); of wheat and barley (1 K. 4:22 [52]; EV 'measure,' mg. 'cor'; 2 Ch. 2:10 [9] 27:5; RV^{mg.} 'cors'). As a liquid measure Ezek. 45:14. 2 K. 6:25 (emended text) speaks of $\frac{1}{2}$ cor of carobs (see HUSKS).

In 1 K. 5:11 [25] 'measures of oil' is wrong; read בַּת שֶׁחָן 'baths of oil,' after בַּת שֶׁחָן 2 Ch. 2:9. κόρος [BAL] a loan-word, which in בַּת שֶׁחָן represents both בַּת שֶׁחָן and בַּת שֶׁחָן , occurs once in NT (Lk. 16:7 RV^{mg.} 'cors'; AV^{mg.} says 'about 14 bushels and a pottle'). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

CORAL is EV's rendering in Job 28:18 Ezek. 27:16 of רַמְּוֹת , a word of unknown origin, which occurs also in Prov. 24:7, where EV treats it as a derivative of רָחַם , meaning 'too high.' 1. Rāmōth unidentified. Most commentators, however (Hitz., Siegf. Sta., etc.), suppose that there is a reference to a precious object called rāmōth—as if the wise man meant, 'Wisdom is as much out of the fool's reach as coral.' Neither explanation is satisfactory.²

The word occurs only twice, and, since the Vss. shed an uncertain light on the meaning, we must be content to make the most of internal evidence.

Ezek. has λαμωθ [BQ], ραμωθ [AL], sericum; Job has μετέωρα [BRAC Theod.], υψηλά [Sym.], excelsa; Prov. has $\text{σοφία καὶ ἐννοια ἀγαθὴ ἐν πύλαις}$ [BNA] for $\text{רַמְּוֹת לְאִייל כְּמֹת בִּשְׁעָרַי}$ [Vg., excelsa].³

The context in Job (rāmōth, gābīš, pēnīnīm) shows that some precious and ornamental substance is intended, and Dillmann infers from the language that rāmōth was regarded as less valuable than pēnīnīm (see below). According to MT of Ezek. 27:16, rāmōth, with nōphēk, argāmān, rikmah, būs, and kadhkōdh, was brought into the Tyrian market by merchants of Syria; but probably (see Cornill, ad loc.) we should read for Aram (ארם) Edom (אדום);⁴ as Cornill remarks, Edom was an important stage in the transport of merchandise westward from S. Arabia and India. This last indication of the provenance of rāmōth makes against the usual rabbinic rendering, 'coral'; for the red coral of commerce—the hard calcareous skeleton of the colonial Actinozoön, Corallium nobile, Pal. (rubrum, Da Costa), which is widely distributed in the Mediterranean and the Atlantic as far as the Cape Verd Islands, and is a considerable source of wealth in the Mediterranean basin—occurs in its natural state much less frequently S. and E. of Suez.

2. In RV^{mg.} 'corals' (Lam. 4:7), 'red coral,' and 'pearls' (Job 28:18 Prov. 3:15 8:11 20:15 31:10) are suggested as renderings alternative to 'rubies'

2. Pēnīnīm (see RUBY, 1) for פְּנִינִים pēnīnīm, perhaps coral. Certainly 'rubies' is not a good rendering.

The words, 'the catching' (קִשְׁף ; EV, improbably, 'price') of wisdom is above that of rubies, in Job 28:18, ¹ This interpretation is due to Grätz (Jüd. Zt. 1885, pp. 549 f.); it has been overlooked by even the most recent commentators. For other views, on the whole very improbable ones, see Wright, Zechariah, 124 f.; Now, and GASm. decline to offer any opinion.

² Bickell: 'If thou hold thy peace (דַּבָּרְךָ) before a fool, thou art wise.'

⁴ With Aq., Pesh., some Heb. MSS, and virtually ἄνθράκων = anthrakōn. Sym. and Theod. support MT.

would seem to imply that a fishery was in the case,¹ and, if two of our best critics may be followed, the nobles of Jerusalem are described in Lam. 4:7 as 'purer than snow, whiter than milk, more ruddy than branches of pēnīnīm' (i.e., obviously, of coral).² Another reference to pēnīnīm, of considerable interest, occurs in Ps. 45:14 [13], where we should no doubt read פְּנִינִים for פְּנִינִים ; the whole line should perhaps run, 'on her neck is a wreath of pēnīnīm' (see Che. Ps. (2) ad loc.).

In the somewhat obscure question as to identification of the substance or substances intended by rāmōth and pēnīnīm, it ought not to be overlooked

3. Coral-like stones. that certain stones valued by the ancients seem to have been named from their resemblance to coral. Pliny, before passing from the onyx and alabaster group, speaks of a valuable 'corallite stone' found in Asia, of a white hue, somewhat approaching that of ivory, and in some degree resembling it (HN 36:13); also of corallis, a native of India and Syene, resembling minium in appearance; and of coralloachates or coral-agate, commonly found in Crete, and there called the 'sacred' agate, similar to coral, and spotted, all over, like the sapphire, with drops of gold (37:54 56). CORBAN (κορβᾶν [Ti.], κορβᾶν [WH], Mk. 7:11, transliteration of Heb. קֶרֶבָן , an offering;³ explained by δωρον , 'gift' (cp Mt. 15:5; similarly Jos. Ant. iv. 44: κορβᾶν), a kind of votive offering; an object devoted to the deity, and therefore tabooed.⁴ Josephus (l.c.) uses the word in speaking of the Nazirites who were dedicated to God as a corban, and of the temple treasure, which was inviolable (B/ii. 9.4; . . . τὸν ἱερὸν θησαυρὸν, καλεῖται δὲ κορβανᾶς; cp Mt. 27:6 κορβανᾶς). Theophrastus, among foreign oaths, especially quotes the corban as one belonging to the Jews, which was forbidden to the Tyrians (cp Jos. c. Ap. 1:22, § 167). It is easy to see that by interdicting himself by a vow a man was able to refrain from using or giving away any particular object, and might thus evade any troublesome obligation. Several abuses crept in (cp Ned. 56), and, in the passage cited (Mk. 7:11 cp Mt. 15:5), Jesus denounces a system which allowed a son, by pronouncing the word 'corban' (and thus vowing a thing to God), to relieve himself of the duty of helping a parent. Cp comm. on Mt. 15:5 Mk. 7:11, and especially L. Cappellus on Mt. 15:5; also PRE (2) 542.

CORBE (χορβε [BA]), 1 Esd. 5:12 AV=Ezra 2:9, ZACCAI.

CORD. There is no scarcity of Hebrew terms to denote cord of one kind or another.

Among the commonest words are הֶבֶל hebel ($\sqrt{\text{to bind}}$), and יֶתֶר yether ($\sqrt{\text{to stretch}}$), both used of cords or ropes for drawing, hauling (cp 2 S. 17:13 EV 'rope'),⁵ of tent-ropes (Is. 38:20 Job 42:1),⁶ and of ship's tackle; see SHIP, TENT, § 3. Yether (עֵתֶר in Judg. νευρά), which seems to denote rather 'gut,' and its derivative יֶתֶר , are used also specially of bowstrings (Ps. 112:21 112 [13]). Less frequent terms are: חֹט hūt ($\sqrt{\text{to sew}}$), ¹ The text may, however, be corrupt; מִשְׁךְ is a singular term. We might emend to מִתְשַׁבֵּחַ , 'wisdom' is esteemed' (Che.).

² The common rendering is '... more ruddy in body than pēnīnīm' (cp EV). But 'in body' (בְּגֵם) appears superfluous here; whereas if we transpose the preposition, and read קִשְׁף instead of בְּגֵם , we get a good sense (see above). ἄνθρακων does not represent either קִשְׁף or בְּגֵם . See Bu. and Bickell, ad loc.

³ In P of the Hexateuch it is the comprehensive term for all offerings 'presented' to God, bloody or bloodless; see also Ezek. 20:28 40:43.

⁵ For 1 K. 20:31 see TURBAN.

'thread' (Gen. 14²³ Judg. 16¹² Cant. 4³; AV 'fillet,' RV 'line' in Jer. 52²¹); נִקְפָּה nikpāh (✓to encircle, go round), Is. 32⁴ RV 'rope' (AV rent); נֶבֶךְ ābhoth (cp Ass. abuttu, 'fetter'), Judg. 15¹³, etc.; פִּתְּלִיל pithil, Nu. 15³⁸, etc., Judg. 16⁹ (AV thread, RV string), (for Gen. 38^{18 25} see RING, § 1); and נֶבֶךְ, see LINE.

The materials available were strips of skin or hide (cp the legend of the Carthaginian Byrsa), or the intestines of animals, especially the goat or camel (cp יֵרָ above), flax (Ezek. 40³), and rushes. It is ropes of rushes that are meant by σχοινίων and σπαρτίον, ὧ's equivalents for חבל and חוט respectively. Σχοινίων occurs twice in NT—Jn. 2¹⁵ (a scourge of cords), Acts 27³² (ropes of a ship).

The weaving together of two or more ropes for greater strength was customary: cp Eccles. 4¹², 'the threefold cord (חֲוֶהֶם הַשָּׁלֹשׁ) is not quickly broken.' יֵרִים 'green withes' (EV), 'which had not been dried,' were employed in binding Samson (Judg. 16⁸). Greater flexibility, for the purpose of tying, was thus ensured, and the knots were less liable to slip and the cord to split.

From the idea of 'line, cord,' etc., is readily obtained the meaning of 'measuring-line' (cp חֶבֶל 2 S. 8² Am. 7¹⁷, חוֹט 1 K. 7¹⁵, 7²³, חֶבֶל Ezek. 40³);¹ hence, further, that of the part 'measured off,' the 'lot' or 'inheritance' (cp חֶבֶל Josh. 19⁹, pl. in Ps. 16⁶ [5]).

CORE (κορε [BNA Ti. WH], Ecclus. 45¹⁸ Jude 11 AV, RV KORAH [g.v.]).

CORIANDE (רִי; kopion [BAFL]);² Ex. 16³¹ Nu. 11⁷) is a plant indigenous to the Mediterranean area, Coriandrum sativum, L., as all agree. The Hebrew name, which Lagarde (GA 57) believes to be of Indo-European origin, seems identical with the γοιδ³ which the scholiast on Dioscorides (864) affirms to be the Punic equivalent of κόριον; and the identity of the plant is thus assured. The manna which is likened to its seed is also said to be 'small, flaky,'⁴ small as hoarfrost upon the ground,⁵ and is elsewhere said to resemble bdellium. These characters suit the so-called seed (really fruit) of the coriander, which is about the size of a peppercorn.

CORINTH (ΚΟΡΙΝΘΟΣ). The secret of Corinthian history lies in the close relation of the city to the commerce of the Mediterranean. Even before the development of trade by sea the wealth of Corinth was inevitable owing to its position on the Isthmus, the 'bridge of the sea' (Pind. Isth. iii. 38, 'door of the Peloponnese,' Xen. Agas. 2). For navigation and far-reaching commercial enterprises no city was more favourably placed. Its territory was unsuited for agriculture (Strabo 382); the more distinct, therefore, was the vocation of its inhabitants for a seafaring life. The Phœnicians were early attracted by the advantages of the site. There are many traces of their presence at Corinth. At the foot of the Acrocorinthus, Melkarth, the god of Tyre (see PHœNICIA), was adored by the Corinthians as the protector of navigation under the name Melicertes (Paus. ii. 13). The armed Aphrodite (Astarte), had a temple on the summit of the hill (Str. 379, ναῖδον: Paus. ii. 46 f., sharing it with the sun-god; ιδ. ii. 51); to her in later times a thousand female votaries paid service with their bodies, adopting a custom well known in Syrian worship (Strabo, 378).

The juxtaposition of the two Corinthian harbours (Lecheum on the Corinthian Gulf, and Cenchræa, with Schœnus, on the Saronic) made it easy to tranship cargoes; and, as the voyage round Cape Malæa was difficult, the mariners of Asia and Italy found it desirable to land their goods at Corinth, so that the possessors of the Isthmus received dues from these as well as from whatever was brought from the Peloponnese by land' (Str. 378; cp Dio Chrys. Or. viii. 5, ἡ πόλις ὡς περ ἐν τριόδῳ ἐκείνῳ). In consequence of her rapid commercial expansion, the arts also awakened in Corinth to a new life, especially those of metal-work and pottery, heirlooms of Phœnician influence (cp Paus. ii. 33; Pl. H.N. 343). Trade became wholesale. The establishment of the Isthmian games in the sanctuary of Poseidon, near the bay of Schœnus, in 'the wooded gorge of the isthmus' (Pind.; Str. 380), elevated Corinth into a distinct centre of Hellenic life (Str. 378). So from the earliest times the epithet 'wealthy' was especially reserved for Corinth (ἀφνεύς, Hom. Il. 2590; δόβλια, Pind. Ol. 134; Thuc. 113), and although the rise of Athens finally destroyed her dreams of naval empire she remained the first mercantile city of Greece.

² The Greek name, according to Fluck. and Hanb. (293), is due to 'the offensive odour it exhales when handled, and which reminds one of bugs—in Greek, κόρις.'

³ The Punic γοιδ appears again in Lat. gil or gith, which is black cummin, Nigella sativa, L. See FRICH, i.

⁴ This, rather than 'round,' seems to be the meaning of חֲוֶהֶם (Di. on Exod. 16¹⁴).

This prosperity found a rude ending in 146 B.C. when the place was pillaged by the Roman consul, Lucius Mummius, and levelled with the ground; but the re-establishment of the city was inevitable. In 44 B.C. Julius Cæsar founded on the old site the Colonia Laus Julia Corinthus. The nucleus of its population consisted of freedmen (Paus. ii. 12, Str. 381). Most of the names of Corinthian Christians indicate either a Roman or a servile origin (e.g., Gaius, Crispus, 1 Cor. 114; Fortunatus, Achaicus, 1 Cor. 1617; Tertius, Rom. 1622; Quartus, Rom. 1623; Justus, Acts 187). The New Corinth, by the mere force of geographical causes, became as of old the most prosperous city of Greece, and the chosen abode of luxury and 'abysmal profligacy' (Str. 378 382; Athen. 13 573; cp the saying, οὐ παντὸς ἀνδρὸς ἐς Κόρινθον ἐστὶ ὁ πλοῦς). It was also the capital of the province, and the seat of the governor of Achaia (Acts 1812).

For description, see Paus. ii. 1 f.; cp Frazer, Paus. 820-38. Pausanias distinguishes the Roman from the Greek remains; few vestiges are now found of either city, though the American archaeologists have recently made important discoveries (see JHS 18 333 [1981]; among other inscriptions, one 'of uncertain date, but as late as the imperial times, reading συναγωγὴ Ἑβραίων').

Corinth, like Athens and Argos, naturally attracted a large Jewish population (Philo, Leg. ad Cai. 36; cp Justin, Dial. 1). The edict of Claudius, banishing the Jews from Rome, must have augmented the number of Hebrew families in Corinth (Acts 182; cp Suet. Claud. 25); see AQUILA. As in other cities (e.g., Iconium, Acts 141, Thessalonica, Acts 174), a considerable number of gentiles had been attracted to the Jewish synagogue, and their conversion would be the first-fruits of Paul's work. His decisive breach with the Jews, and his adoption of the house of the Roman or Latin Titius Justus as his place of instruction (cp Acts 199), enabled Paul to reach the otherwise inaccessible gentile population (mostly of Italian origin: Acts 188, πολλοὶ τῶν Κορινθίων ἀκούοντες ἐπίστευον). Aquila, on the other hand, seems to have enjoyed his greatest success among the Jews (Acts 1828), though the Corinthian church remained predominantly gentile in character.

In conformity with his principle of seeking the centres of commercial activity, Paul visited Corinth on his departure from Athens (Acts 181). For the importance of this step as regards the development of Paul's missionary designs, see PAUL. Converts were made chiefly among the gentiles, of the poorer class (Acts 188 1 Cor. 126 611 122), although some Jews believed (see CRISPUS); and some persons of importance (see ERASTUS, GAIVS, perhaps also CHLOE). The accession of Crispus and of Gaius was so important that Paul forsook his rule and baptized them with his own hand (1 Cor. 114-16). He lays special stress upon his claim to be regarded as sole founder of the Corinthian church (1 Cor. 36 415). This claim is not contradicted by 2 Cor. 119 ('who was preached . . . by me and Silvanus and Timothy'), for 2 Cor. is addressed to the Christians of Achaia generally as well as to the Corinthians, while 1 Cor. is written more especially to the church of Corinth.

The apostle spent eighteen months in Corinth on this occasion (Acts 18¹¹). On his next recorded visit he stayed three months (Acts 20³). On a supposed intermediate visit to Corinth and on the correspondence that took place, see CORINTHIANS, §§ 9*f.*, 13. On the character of Paul's teaching see below, and cp PAUL, APOLLOS.

As to the effect of Paul's letters and presence the NT gives no information; but the letter of Clement, written, perhaps, about 97 A.D., shows that the moral tone of the Corinthian church improved, though the friction between parties continued, as indeed we should expect from the social conditions obtaining in such a city. Hegesippus visited the church about 139 A.D., and was favourably impressed by the obedience and liberality of its members, and the activity of its bishop Dionysius (Eus. HE iv. 22).

The two epistles written to the Corinthians are remarkable for the variety of their local colouring. The illustrations are drawn chiefly from gentile life:—the wild-beast fight (1 Cor. 15³²); the stadium and boxing match (1 Cor. 9²⁴⁻²⁷); the theatre (1 Cor. 4⁹ 7³¹); the garland of Isthmian pine, the prize in the games (1 Cor. 9²⁵); the idol festivals (1 Cor. 8¹⁰ 10^{20 f.}); the syssitia, so common a feature of Greek social life (1 Cor. 10²⁷).

CORINTHIANS, Epistles to the.¹ It will be unnecessary to repeat here the familiar story of the founding of the church at Corinth, which is elsewhere set in its place in the life of the apostle (see PAUL). According to the scheme of chronology adopted in this article it would fall in the years 50-52 A.D. (48-50 Harnack, 52-54 Lightfoot, otherwise von Soden; see CHRONOLOGY, § 71). In the spring of the latter year Paul left Corinth. Aquila and Priscilla accompanied him as far as Ephesus, where they stayed behind while he went on to Jerusalem. This journey and the visit to the Galatian churches (Acts 18²³) would take up the whole of the later spring or summer of A.D. 52, and it would not be until the autumn of that year that the apostle returned to Ephesus.

In the meantime events had moved at Corinth. The Alexandrian Jew Apollos, by this time an instructed Christian, had gone thither and his preaching had a great effect. Other teachers were at work there in a spirit less friendly to Paul. Factions were formed, and, when Paul wrote his first extant letter to the Corinthians some two years later, had begun to make serious mischief. The apostle was now settled at Ephesus, which, on an average voyage, would not be more than a sail of a week or ten days from Corinth.² News would thus pass easily to and fro: and Paul was evidently kept well informed of what passed at Corinth. At least one earlier letter of his has been lost to us (1 Cor. 5⁹), unless, as some have thought, a fragment of it remains embedded in 2 Cor. 6¹⁴⁻⁷¹ (on this view, which should probably on the whole be rejected, see below, § 18). The purport of the letter, which the Corinthian Christians somewhat misunderstood, was to warn them against intercourse with immoral heathen. When we remember the laxity of Corinthian morals we cannot be surprised that other and graver aberrations of this kind had taken place among them. The state of things disclosed by some of the apostle's visitors at Ephesus, notably by members of the familia of a lady called Chloe (1 Cor. 1¹¹), gave him so much anxiety that he took pen in hand to write our First Epistle. At the same time he replied to a series of questions put to him in a letter which he had received (perhaps through Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus: 1 Cor. 16¹⁷) from the church at Corinth. These two things—the tidings which he had heard of disorders in the church, and certain definite inquiries put to him—account satisfactorily for the contents of the First Epistle (see below, §§ 14-16). So far all is clear, except perhaps as to the exact date at which the epistle was sent, though it may be placed provisionally about Easter of A.D. 55. There is also no doubt as to the general nature of the circumstances under which our Second Epistle was sent. The interval which separated it from the First Epistle cannot have been very long. It may be assigned to the late autumn (about November) of the same year.¹ From some cause or other, it is clear, the anxiety of the apostle had increased, and had indeed reached a pitch of great and painful tension. The return of Titus, whom he had sent to Corinth, relieved him of this, and he warmly expresses his satisfaction. Then he turns to the practical question of the collection which he was organising for the poor Christians at Jerusalem. Before the letter is concluded, however, he comes back (in the text as we have it) to his opponents and writes again with no little emotion about them. This letter was written on the way to Corinth, probably from Macedonia, and the apostle is about to pay to the church a visit which he repeatedly calls his third (2 Cor. 12¹⁴ 13¹).

This brief outline, however, evades a number of difficulties.

Considered quite broadly and generally, the course of events is clear enough; but, when we attempt to give them precision in detail, difficulties spring up at every step.

4. Difficulties in detail. questions which arise are also exceedingly intricate, so that to state them satisfactorily is no easy matter. They have nearly all been brought out by the research of the last five-and-twenty years; and we shall perhaps succeed best in threading our way through them by taking the several steps—logical if not exactly chronological—by which they may be supposed to have arisen.

The data which we take over from the First Epistle are: (1) the existence of an active opposition to Paul on the part not only of unbelieving Jews but also of certain sections of Judaising Christians at Corinth; and (2) the occurrence in the church there of a gross case of what we should describe as incest (1 Cor. 5¹). The main question which meets us is, how far does the Second Epistle deal with these same data, and how far have the circumstances altered? Before we can formulate an answer to this question, however, it is necessary first to decide whether or not we are to interpose a lost epistle between the two which have come down to us.

The Second Epistle is full of allusions to a previous letter, and the older commentators with one consent assumed that this was the First Epistle.

5. Intermediate letter. Such an assumption was obvious and natural; but, when the language of the Second Epistle came to be closely examined, doubts began to arise as to whether that language could really be satisfied by the First Epistle as it has come down to us.

In particular it was asked whether the strong emotion under which it seemed that this previous letter had been written could apply to the First Epistle: 'out of much affliction and anguish of heart I wrote unto you with many tears' (2 Cor. 2⁴); and again, the severe heart-searchings described in 2 Cor. 7⁷⁻¹¹ did not seem to agree with the calm practical discussions of the First Epistle.

Since Klöpper (1874) an increasing number of scholars have replied to this decidedly in the negative. Perhaps somewhat too decidedly. Although it is perfectly true that a great part of the First Epistle is taken up with calm practical discussions, the whole epistle is not in this strain.

CORINTHIANS, EPISTLES TO THE

Many passages, especially in the earlier chapters, must have cost the writer no slight emotion. Such would be (e.g.) the scathing irony of 1 Cor. 4:8-13 (the Corinthians already enjoying the rich abundance of the Messianic reign while the poor apostles are maltreated like gladiators in the arena); the whole of the next section, 1 Cor. 4:14-21, which ends with a threat that the apostle will come to them with a rod; and then the section on the incestuous man, in which he projects himself in spirit into the president's chair in their assembly and solemnly hands over the offender to Satan.

It is by no means incredible that passages like these would stand out in Paul's memory after he had despatched his letter, and that he should work himself up into a state of great and even feverish anxiety as to the way in which they would be received. The fact that a considerable fraction of the church should have made themselves, as it seems, in some sort accomplices with the offending person, might well make the apostle feel that the moment was extremely critical and that the result might be nothing less than the break-up of the church.

This leads us to the further question with which that just stated is bound up. Along with the allusions to a 6. Situation in 2 Cor.

Epistle also allusions to what was evidently a great crisis in the history of the church. Was this crisis the same as that which is contemplated in the First Epistle, or was it wholly distinct?

The scholars who first maintained the view that there was a lost letter between the two extant epistles were content to acquiesce in the older view that the descriptions of 2 Cor. 2:5-11 7:5-16 had reference to a state of things growing directly out of the situation presented in 1 Cor. 5. There too there is a single offender, who appears to have a backing in the church, and the apostle is aware that the position is full of danger: the machinations of Satan are not hidden (2 Cor. 2:11).

It must be confessed that the situation of 1 Cor. 5 fits on extremely well to that of 2 Cor. 2:5-11, except in one particular. That is, as the more recent writers on the epistles (Weizsäcker, Pfeiderer, Krenkel [Beiträge], Schmiedel, Jülicher) for the most part urge, that the treatment described in 2 Cor. 26, which is accepted as adequate to the occasion by Paul, seems inadequate to the very gross offence of 1 Cor. 5:1. There is also considerable difficulty in assigning the part of the injured person in 2 Cor. 7:12: 'So although I wrote unto you, [I wrote] not for his cause that did the wrong, nor for his cause that suffered the wrong, but that your earnest care for us might be made manifest,' etc.

If the offending person of 1 Cor. 5 was really let off with a comparatively slight punishment there must have been extenuating circumstances of which we are not told. Such circumstances might be that the 'father's wife' was not in the strict sense a wife but a concubine (the father being probably a heathen); and we might have supposed that the father was dead. In such a case Paul with his strong sympathy for human infirmity, and his readiness to make allowance for a convert brought up in the laxity of heathenism, might conceivably have accepted an expiation short of that which the circumstances would seem at first sight to demand. The supposition that the father was dead would fall through, however, if 'his cause that suffered the wrong' (τοῦ ἀδικήσαντος) referred to him; and it does not seem satisfactory that a sin of this kind should be regarded only in the light of personal injury to another.

Accordingly the tendency among those recent German writers who have gone into the question more fully than any others, has been to offer a wholly different explanation of the state of things implied in the Second Epistle. They, as a rule, take the offence on which the situation turns in this epistle to be some personal affront or insult put upon Paul (so Hilgenfeld, Mangold, Weizsäcker, Pfeiderer, Schmiedel, Jülicher; Beyschlag gives the alternative that the insult may have been offered to Timothy), not in connection with the case of the incestuous man, but rather growing out of the revolt against his authority as an apostle. In keeping with this, most of them would explain τοῦ ἀδικήσαντος as an indirect reference to Paul himself.

8. Other explanations of 2 Cor. 2:5-11.

This, however, again seems strained and unnatural, and indeed inconsistent with the exegesis of the verse where Paul is mentioned (v. 12 'your earnest care for us'; τὴν σπουδὴν ὑμῶν τὴν ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν) in such a way as almost certainly to distinguish him from the injured person. Krenkel, it seems to us rightly, urges this and would take the passage as referring to some private quarrel between two members of the Corinthian church (Beitr. 304-307). We know from 1 Cor. 6 that such quarrels were rife at Corinth, and the interpretation thus suggested suits the choice of words (ἀδικήσας and ἀδικήεις) better than any other. The objection would be that we have to draw largely upon the imagination to explain how a matter like this, which we should have thought might be settled calmly enough, became the cause of such acute tension between the apostle and a large section of the church.

We have then three hypotheses, each with some advantages and some counterbalancing drawbacks: (1) that the reference is to the incestuous man—which would greatly simplify the situation so far as the two epistles are concerned, but could be held only on the assumption of peculiar qualifying circumstances in the case which it is not easy for us to imagine; (2) that the reference is to some direct personal insult to Paul—a hypothesis which, by introducing an intermediate letter, enables us to construct one which will suit the allusions somewhat better than the extant First Epistle, but in our opinion forces δ ἀδικήεις and makes the situation in the Second Epistle a tantalising duplicate of that in the First, besides (it might seem) inconveniently crowding events between the two epistles; (3) that the reference is neither to Paul nor to the incestuous man, but to a quarrel between two unknown persons—which satisfies δ ἀδικήεις, but is open to some of the same objections as the last, and is not so helpful.

We shall see below that, in spite of its apparent attractiveness, the first of these hypotheses must be given up. There is a break between the two epistles: there must have been at least one intervening communication—and if one, probably two communications—between Paul and the church at Corinth; and the aspect of things has changed not simply once, but probably twice. The fact of the new situation, and the fact of the intermediate letter, thus seem to be assured; but in regard to particulars we have hardly data enough to enable us to judge. We cannot easily bring ourselves to think that the person directly injured is Paul: at the same time he appears to be someone closely connected with him. Timothy would meet the conditions better than any one we can think of; but neither the injured person nor the aggressor can be identified more precisely.

Along with the question as to an intermediate letter goes the further question as to an unrecorded visit paid by Paul to Corinth.

Unlike the letter, this visit is not purely hypothetical. In 2 Cor. 12:14 and 13:1 the apostle speaks expressly of his approaching visit as the third. This implies that we must insert another, not mentioned by the historian, somewhere between Acts 18:18 and 20:2—or rather, we may say, somewhere in the three years spent by Paul at Ephesus. We have seen that his communications with the church at Corinth were frequent; we have seen also that the voyage was easy. The silence of Acts (which dismisses two years in a verse: 19:10), therefore, is no real obstacle.

9. Unrecorded visit.

Is the visit to be placed before or after the First Epistle?

It is most tempting to go with the majority of recent critics and place it after. The conspicuous fact about this visit is that it was a painful one (ἐν λύπῃ: 2 Cor. 2:1). If so, what could be more natural than to connect it with the letter which was written 'with many tears'? Both alike, it might seem, should be placed on the line of strained relations which led up to the Second Epistle. The unrecorded visit would, in that case, precede the lost letter. We might imagine, in view of 2 Cor. 10:10, that Paul had been summoned over to Corinth hastily, that there his malady had come on, that he had broken down physically and been obliged to return, leaving matters to all appearance worse than he found them; that he then wrote a letter to undo the effect of this disaster; that this letter was strongly worded, and, after it had been sent, caused him great anxiety; and that it was his relief from this anxiety on the coming of Titus that was the immediate occasion of the Second Epistle.

Such combinations are tempting; but they lead us on to the discussion of the next point which has a direct and perhaps a crucial bearing upon them.

In 1 Cor. 16:5 the apostle announces his intention of coming to Corinth by the longer land route through Macedonia. This, as a matter of fact, is the route that he was actually taking at the time when he wrote the Second Epistle. In the interval, however, he must have changed his mind, not once but twice; or, rather, he must have changed it and afterwards reverted to his original plan. From 2 Cor. 1.15^f we learn expressly that he had at one moment decided to go straight from Ephesus to Corinth, thence to Macedonia, and then to return again to Corinth.

10. Paul's plans.

When he formed this decision he seems to have been well pleased with the Corinthians and they with him; his motive is that, twice over, both on going and returning, they may have the benefit of this presence (2 Cor. 1.15). He did not carry out this plan because, after it had been formed, his relations to the Corinthians underwent a change. He tells us that he would not go to them because, if he had gone, it must have been 'in grief' (2 Cor. 2.1). None the less his change of plan was made one of the accusations against him, and was set down to fickleness of purpose (2 Cor. 1.17).

This being so, however, are we not precluded from interposing any visit between the conceiving of the intention described in 2 Cor. 1.15 (the short voyage and the double visit) and the writing of the Second Epistle?

It is not only, as Schmiedel argues (HC 53), that the feelings of the apostle when he made his plan and when he paid the supposed visit were different—in the one case satisfaction with the Corinthians, in the other case pain—but that a visit of any kind is inconsistent with the language used. If Paul had paid such a visit he would have kept to his intention (not broken it), and the charge of fickleness must at least have assumed another form.

We must therefore, with some reluctance, abandon the idea of bringing the painful visit and the painful letter into juxtaposition. The only other place for the former seems to be in the part of Paul's stay at Ephesus anterior to the First Epistle, and towards the middle or later part of it (i.e., not far from, and probably before, the lost letter; 1 Cor. 5.9; cp Schmiedel, op. cit. 54). The supposition that the second visit was only contemplated, not paid, appears to be excluded by 2 Cor. 13.2.

We observe also, in passing, that the history of these changes of plan goes far to dispose of the arguments in favour of the supposition that there is no lost letter between the two epistles.

The only way to make the First Epistle referred to directly in the Second is to regard certain passages in it as haunting the apostle and causing him trouble as to its reception. At the time when he conceived the plan set down in 2 Cor. 1.15, however, his mind was free from trouble; the Corinthians and he were on the best of terms. This alone would sever the links which have seemed to bind the two letters together. They must be connected closely or not at all.

When Paul wrote 1 Corinthians Timothy was not with him. We should infer from Acts 19.22 that before that date he had been already sent into Macedonia. This agrees perfectly with the turn of phrase in 1 Cor. 16.10: 'If Timothy come, see that he be with you without fear.' Before the despatch of the Second Epistle he had rejoined Paul, as he is associated with him in the opening salutation (2 Cor. 1.1). If the suggestion above holds, it was probably he who brought news of the events which led up to the second crisis. In any case the dealing with that crisis at its height was committed not to Timothy but to the stronger hands of Titus.

Assuming that there was an intermediate letter between 1 and 2 Cor. it is probable that Titus was the bearer of it (2 Cor. 12.18), as he was also the bearer of our Second Epistle

12. Of Titus. also the bearer of our Second Epistle (2 Cor. 8.16-24).

A small group of scholars, including Hausrath and Schmiedel, would assign to Titus yet another earlier visit, on the business of the collection, soon after the writing of the First Epistle; but the hypothesis is invented to suit the theory that 2 Cor. 12 is not an integral part of our Second Epistle, and necessitates the invention of a number of other purely hypothetical occurrences (among them a fifth, or third lost letter), nearly all of them duplicates of others that are better attested. It may be rejected without hesitation.

The sequence of events, as far as we can ascertain it, seems to have been this:—¹

13. Sequence of events. (i.) While Paul is absent at Jerusalem Apollos arrives at Corinth, where he preaches with success (Acts 18.27).

(ii.) Paul takes up his abode at Ephesus in the summer of A.D. 52, remaining there until the summer of A.D. 55.

(iii.) Early in this period Apollos quits Corinth and certain Judaizing teachers arrive there. The beginnings are laid of differences which soon harden into parties.

(iv.) About, or somewhat after, the middle of the period Paul pays the church a brief disciplinary visit, ἐν λυγῇ (2 Cor. 2.1; see above, § 10). He also, after his return, writes the lost letter of 1 Cor. 5.9.

(v.) The household of Chloe bring news of an ominous development of the spirit of faction (1 Cor. 1.11), and a little later Stephanas, Fortunatus, and Achaicus arrive at Ephesus (1 Cor. 16.17), perhaps as bearers of a letter to the apostle from the church at Corinth seeking his advice on various matters.

(vi.) Partly in consequence of what he had heard, and partly in answer to that letter, Paul writes First Corinthians in the spring of A.D. 55, taking occasion to correct a wrong impression drawn from the lost letter (1 Cor. 5.9^f).

(vii.) The epistle thus written has the desired effect, and for the moment all goes well (2 Cor. 1.12-16). The apostle lets the Corinthians know his programme of 2 Cor. 1.15^f. Timothy arrives at Corinth and now, or at the time of chap. 8, returns to Ephesus.

(viii.) Another sharp controversy arises, beginning perhaps in some well-meant but feeble action on the part of Timothy, and soon involving the whole question of the apostle's position and authority.

(ix.) On hearing of this from Timothy Paul writes a second lost letter, the tone of which is severe and uncompromising. It is sent by Titus, who at the same time has instructions in regard to the collection.

(x.) After Titus has gone, Paul becomes more and more anxious as to the effect his last letter is likely to have on the Corinthians. He leaves Ephesus, having about this time been in imminent peril there. He stops at Troas. Still no news.

(xi.) Titus at last returns to him in Macedonia and dispels his fears. The Second Epistle is written and is sent by Titus and two others (2 Cor. 8.18-22). Its main tenor is thankfulness; but the collection is pressed, and the growth of one party (probably the Christ-party) leads to some emphatic strictures.

(xii.) Towards the end of December A.D. 55 Paul reaches Corinth. He stays there three months (Acts 20.3), during which he writes the Epistle to the Romans.

FIRST EPISTLE.—We have seen that the occasion of the First Epistle was two-fold: (1) certain tidings which had reached Paul as to various disorders existing in the church at Corinth; (2) certain questions put to him in an official letter from the church.

The disorders were: (i.) a number of factions which raised the flag of party spirit and used the names of prominent leaders to give colour to their own self-assertiveness. On these more will be said below (§ 16). The subject covers 1.10-4.21. (ii.) A bad case of immoral living which too much reflected a general laxity in the church (5.6.12-20). (iii.) Litigiousness, which did not scruple to have recourse to heathen law-courts (6.1-11). (iv.) An indecorous freedom in worship, exemplified by the disuse of the female headdress (11.2-16). (v.) Still worse disorders at the agapē or love-feast, which was followed by the eucharist (11.17-34). And we may perhaps include under this head (vi.) the denial by some of the resurrection, dealt with in chap. 15.

The last three points may have been raised by the official letter. This certainly contained questions about marriage (answered in ch. 7); probably also about relations to heathen practices, such as the eating of meats offered to idols (ch. 8 continued in 9.1-11.1); and possibly some inquiry as to the relative value of spiritual gifts. Chap. 1.1-9 is introductory, and ch. 16 an epilogue of personal matter containing instructions as to the collection, and details as to Paul himself and his companions.

The only points that need perhaps to be more particularly drawn out are the connection of chaps. 1.10-4.21 and 8.1-11.1.

The first tracks out the spirit of faction to its origin in the conceit of a worldly-minded wisdom, which is contrasted with the simplicity of the Gospel—a simplicity, however, which does not exclude the higher wisdom

15. 1 Cor. 1.10-4.21 and that comes from God (1.17-2.16). Then, in 8.1-11.1, the true position of human teachers is stated. They are but stewards, whose duty is not to put forward anything of their own, but only to administer what is committed to them by God. The Christian has but one foundation and one judge, namely Christ. 4.6-21 applies these general truths to the circumstances of the case with biting irony, which, however, soon changes to affectionate entreaty, and that again to sharp admonition.

The sequence of the argument in 8.1-11.1 should not be lost sight of. In ch. 8 is laid down the principle which should guide conduct in such matters as the eating of meat that might have come from heathen sacrifices. This principle is the subordination of personal impulse to the good of others. In ch. 9 Paul points out the working of the principle in his own case; it is in deference to it that he waives his right to claim support from the Church, in deference to it that he exercises severe self-control, like that of runners in a race. The history of Israel showed what an utter mistake it was for even the most highly-privileged to suppose themselves exempt from the necessity of such self-control (10:1-13). The very nature of the Christian Eucharist prescribed care in relation to heathen feasts (10:23-22). This leads to some practical suggestions and advice (10:23-11:1).

Of the subject matter of the epistle the points which most invite discussion are the nature of the parties, the parties, and the spiritual gifts. The latter are dealt with elsewhere (see GIFTS, SPIRITUAL).

As to the parties, we may remark (1) that the names 'Paul,' 'Apollos,' 'Cephas,' and 'Christ' represent real titles which the parties at Corinth gave themselves.

When Paul says in 4:6 'These things, brethren, have I transferred by a fiction' (to adopt Dr. Field's elegant translation, Ottum Norvic. ad loc.) 'to myself and Apollos for your sakes,' the fiction consisted, not in using names which the Corinthians did not use, but in speaking as if he and Apollos had behaved like party-leaders, when they had not so behaved. The whole movement came not from them but from those who invoked their names against their will and without their consent.

(2) The nature of the Paul and the Apollos parties is clear: they were no doubt liberal in tendency, giving a free welcome to Gentile converts, and apt to deal too tenderly with the vices which these brought over with them. From this side would come such premature emancipation as that described in 11:2-16. The followers of Apollos probably also prided themselves on a kind of Alexandrian Gnosis, which is by inference condemned in chaps. 1:18-2:16. The Petrine and the 'Christ' parties were, on the other hand, Judaistic, claiming the authority of the apostles at Jerusalem. Both disparaged and attacked Paul. The Christ party, however, seems to have gone to the greater lengths.

The Christ party were Jews in the strictest sense, probably Jews of Palestine (2 Cor. 11:22). They came with commendatory letters from Jerusalem (2 Cor. 8:1). They themselves bore the title of 'apostle,' in the wider acceptance (2 Cor. 11:13, 12:11). They claimed to have Christ for their Master in a sense in which others had not (2 Cor. 10:7). And in particular they insisted that Paul had not the full qualifications of an apostle, as these are laid down in Acts 1:21 f.: he was not an eye-witness of the acts of Jesus, and did not belong to the select company which he had gathered around him (1 Cor. 9:1). Their teaching laid stress on Jesus' Jewish Messiahship (conceived as the Jews conceived it) as to amount to preaching 'another Jesus' (2 Cor. 11:4). Paul takes firm ground in his opposition to them. He will not bate one jot of his Gospel (ibid.); he will not allow that he is behind the most apostolic of the apostles (2 Cor. 11:5); he had 'seen the Lord' as truly as they had (i.e., on the road to Damascus, and in ecstatic vision, 1 Cor. 9:1, 15:8, 2 Cor. 12:1 f.); he had better proof of his apostleship—in his miracles (2 Cor. 12:12), in his insight into Christian truth (2 Cor. 11:6), in his labours (2 Cor. 11:23 f.), and especially in the success of his ministry among the Corinthians themselves (1 Cor. 9:1 f., 2 Cor. 3:2 f.).

There can be little doubt that Paul's masterly Apologia carried the day; the curtain drops for us with the close of the Second Epistle; but the subsequent history of the controversy shows that the worst part of the crisis was past, and the power of the Judaisers broken.

SECOND EPISTLE.—The Second Epistle is even more a direct product of the historical situation than the First. We may map out the main body of the epistle thus: (1) an outpouring of thanks for recent deliverance (1:3-11); (2) explanations in reference to the apostle's change of plan and the treatment of the offending person by the Corinthian church (1:12-2:17); (3) a deeper Apologia for his apostolic position and the distinctive character of his Gospel (3:5); (4) more personal explanations (6:7); (5) the collection (8 f.); (6) a warmer defence against Judaistic attacks (10-13:10).

The principal literary question affecting the epistle is as to its integrity.

Putting aside mere wanton and extravagant theories, substantial arguments have been urged for maintaining that the short paragraph of six verses, 6:14-7:1, and the longer section 10-13 or 10:13-13:10, though the work of Paul, were not originally part of this epistle, but belonged to other epistles now lost: 6:14-7:1 to the missing letter alluded to in 1 Cor. 5:9, and the Verkapitel-brief (as the Germans call it) to the intermediate letter which we have seen reason to assume between the two extant epistles.

We may admit at once that there is a real break in the Second Epistle at both the places noted.

The subject changes, and changes abruptly, both at 6:14 and at 10:1. The epistle would read continuously if we were to skip from 6:13 to 7:2, and the few concluding words 13:11-14 would come as well at the end of chap. 9 as of chap. 13.

We may admit further that the subject matter of the first passage resembles, though it is not identical with, that of the missing letter referred to in the First Epistle ('not to keep company with fornicators' was the keynote of the one, 'not to be unequally yoked with unbelievers' of the other); and the vehement polemic of the last four chapters would be not unlike what we should expect to find in the letter which we are led to postulate by the Second.

In spite of these favouring considerations, however, and in spite of the assent which it has met with from certain critics (Pfleiderer, Hausrath, Krenkel, Schmiedel), this latter hypothesis of the letter of four chapters must, we believe, be dismissed.

There was but one painful letter (2 Cor. 7:8, ἐκείνη ἡ ἐπιστολή, cp 2:4); which is referred to in these chapters (10:10 f.), and therefore is not to be identified with them; if it were, then we should have to postulate a previous painful letter further back. When the apostle wrote his painful letter, he wrote in order to avoid the necessity of making a visit in person (12:23); but when he wrote these chapters he was on the point of paying a visit (12:14, 13:1). Again, there are many coincidences of expression which connect the four chapters with the preceding: 7:6=10:1 (ἑαυτοῦ, of Paul himself); 6:8, 7:16=10:1 f. (ἑαυτοῦ, not elsewhere in Epp. Paul.); 1:15, 3:4, 8:22=10:2 (ἑαυτοῦ, only twice besides); κατὰ σάρκα three times=three times, always in reference to himself; 6:7=10:4 (ὁδὸς); νόημα three times=twice, only once besides; 7:15=10:5 f. (ὁπακοή); 9:5=10:6, 16 (ἑτοιμος, only once besides in Epp. Paul.). These are samples from the first six verses alone. We cannot use the comparison of 12:18 with 8:17 f., 22 quite as it is used by Jülicher (Bibl. 65), because the two passages really refer to different occasions; 8:24 is proof that the aorists which precede are epistolary and describe the circumstances connected with the sending of the present epistle, whereas in 12:18 the aorists are strict aorists and point back to a former visit of Titus and his companion. The parallelism of expression, however, is so great as to suggest strongly that both passages belong to the same letter. There is a parallelism equally marked between the use of πλεονεκτεῖν in 12:17 f. and in 7:2 (cp 2:11); the word occurs only once besides in NT (1 Thess. 4:6).

If the one hypothetical intrusion breaks down, the other should in all probability go with it.

Not one of the analogous cases to which Schmiedel appeals really holds good; for the balance of argument is also against detaching Rom. 16 from the epistle to the Romans (see the commentary on that epistle by the present writer and Mr. A. C. Headlam). The attestation of the NT text is so varied and so early that a displacement of this magnitude could hardly fail to leave traces of itself. At least, before it can be assumed, the major premise that such a displacement is possible needs to be more fully established.

In the cases which might be quoted from the OT the conditions are really different. It would, however, be well if the whole question of the editing and transmission of ancient Jewish and Christian books could be more systematically investigated. [For a discussion of 6:14-7:1 see Class. Rev., 1890, pp. 12, 150 f., 317, 359; and the authorities mentioned in the last place.]

If the epistle has come down to us in its integrity, no doubt we must recognise the abruptness of Paul's manner of writing or dictation. In that, however, there is nothing very paradoxical. Besides the rapid fluctuations of feeling, which are so characteristic of this epistle, we must remember that a letter of this length could not all be written at a single sitting. It was probably written in the midst of interruptions ('the care of all the churches,' 11:28). Moreover, its author was one whose mind responded with singular quickness to every gust of passing emotion.

APOCRYPHAL LETTERS.—In the Armenian version after 2 Corinthians there stand two short letters, from the Corinthians to Paul and from Paul to the Corinthians (cp APOCRYPHA, § 294), the substance of which is briefly as follows:—The Corinthians inform Paul that a certain Simon and Cleobius have come to Corinth teaching that the prophets are not to be believed, that the world, including man, is the work not of God but of angels, that there is no resurrection of the body, that Christ has not come in the flesh, and that he was not born of Mary. Paul replies asserting the orthodox doctrine on each of these heads.

Attention was first called to these apocrypha by Archbishop Ussher in 1644. A complete text was published in the Armenian Bible of Zohrab in 1805 (incomplete translations earlier); also, with a monograph by Rinck, in 1823. Just as interest in the subject was being revived by Theod. Zahn (Gesch. d. Kanons, 1386 f. 2502-611) and Dr. P. Vetter, professor in the Roman Catholic Faculty at Tübingen, a Latin version was discovered by M. Samuel Berger in a tenth-century MS. at Milan, and published by him in conjunction with Prof. A. Carrière (La Correspondance Apocryphe de Saint Paul et des Corinthiens, Paris, 1891). A second MS. (13th cent.), containing a different but probably not altogether independent version, was found at Laon, and published by Prof. Bratke in TLZ, 1892, col. 586 f. There is also extant, in Armenian, a commentary on the epistle by Ephrem Syrus. The texts are most conveniently collected by Dr. P. Vetter in a Tübingen programme (Der apocryphe dritte Korintherbrief; Vienna, 1894).

The facts at present ascertained in regard to the apocryphal letters are these:—

(1) They were from the first (i.e. from the 5th cent.) admitted into the Armenian version as part of the canon. (2) They also existed in Syriac and were accepted as canonical in the fourth century by Aphraates, Ephrem Syrus, and the Syriac Didascalia. [The quotation in Aphraates is recognised by both Harnack and Zahn, though questioned (as we think wrongly) by Carrière and Vetter.] (3) The letters were also known and had some small circulation in the West.

The problems which still await solution have reference to the question of origin.

(1) Zahn, and now also Vetter, think that the greater part of the letters was in the first instance incorporated in the apocryphal Acts of Paul. [Since this was written Zahn's hypothesis has been verified through the discovery, by Dr. C. Schmidt, of considerable portions of the Acts of Paul in Coptic; cp Neue Heidelberger Jahrbücher, 1897, pp. 117-124, and Harnack in TLZ, 1897, col. 627.] In any case it seems probable that they gained their place in the Syriac version in connection with the controversy against Bardesanes early in the third century. Their composition can hardly be much later than 200 A.D. (2) It is coming to be generally agreed that the main body of the epistles existed first in Greek. Vetter and Zahn now think that the concluding portion was added in Syriac, and Zahn goes so far as to make the Latin versions translated not from the Greek but from the Syriac. In this he certainly has not proved his case; but the age of these versions needs further investigating.

Besides the general commentaries (which still deserve mention) of Bengel, Weiststein, and Meyer (recent editions by Heinrici), we have, in English, in The Speaker's Commentary, that on 1 Cor. by T. S. Evans (primarily exegetical and marked by fine scholarship), and that on 2 Cor. by Dr. Joseph Waite (general), also the commentaries on 1 Cor. by Dr. T. C. Edwards (exegetical and theological), and by Bishop Ellicott (grammatical and exegetical). Dean Stanley on both epistles is picturesque and interesting to the general reader, but has inevitably fallen behind the present position of inquiry, and was never exact in scholarship. In this element the later English editions are strongest: they are most deficient in historical criticism. The fullest recent commentary in German on the two epistles is by Heinrici (Berlin, 1880, 1887); well meant, and with new illustrations from later Greek, but inclined to press Greek analogies too far. Perhaps the best on the whole is Schmiedel's in the HC (91), which is searching and exact but inclined, as we think, to multiply entities beyond what is necessary. In this respect Jülicher's Einl. (94) seems to us to be the most judicious. Godet published a commentary on 1 Cor. in 1886; and mention should be made of a monograph and commentary on 2 Cor. by Klöpper ('69, '74), and of the discussions of special points in Krenkel's Beiträge ('90), and of the missing epistle and its identification with parts of 2 Cor. in the Expositor (1897) 6 231 ff. 285 ff., 1898 a 113 ff.).

On the apocryphal letters, besides the literature quoted above, a summary will be found in Harnack's Gesch. d. altchr. Litt. 1 37-39, and Zahn's last words on the subject in Theol. Literaturblatt, 1894, col. 123 ff. The important discussion in Zahn's Einleitung, 1 183-249, was too late for notice. W. S.

CORMORANT. 1. The cormorant of EV is the šālākāh, שָׁלָאָה (Lev. 11:17 Dt. 14:17),¹ a word connected with the common Hebrew verb for 'to throw down' (שָׁלַח), and therefore denoting some bird that swoops or dives after its prey. שָׁלָאָה in Lev. 11:17 rightly renders καταρπακτης, as this denotes a fish-eating bird which dives and remains under water for some time (Arist. HA 913). In Dt. 14:17 the order of שָׁלָאָה is different from that of the MT. Vg. has Mergus, the little Auk, and Targ. and Pesh. have šālē nūnē—i.e., 'extrahens pisces.' Many writers, following Bochart, believe שָׁלָאָה to be Sula bassana, the 'gannet' or 'solan goose'; but, although this bird is sometimes alleged to have been seen in the reed-marshes of Lower Egypt (Di. on Lev. 11:19), there is some reason for doubting whether it has so wide an E. range. A more likely bird, in view of its common occurrence on the coast of Palestine (Tristram, NHB 252), is the 'cormorant,' which likewise plunges after its prey.

Two species of cormorant are described from Palestine: the Phalacrocorax carbo, which frequents both the sea-shore and inland waters, and the pygmy cormorant, P. pygmaeus, which is found in lakes and rivers. Canon Tristram states that the P. carbo is always to be seen near the mouth of the Jordan, watching for the fish, which seem on entering the Dead Sea to be stupefied by the saltness of its waters. Cormorants are fish-eaters and extremely voracious. Like the bittern and the pelican they are looked upon as inhabitants of solitary places.

CORNELIUS (ΚΟΡΝΗΛΙΟΣ [Ti. WH]), one of the centurions of the so-called Italian cohort (Acts 10:1).

In the regular army composed of Roman citizens distinctive names of this sort were not given to the separate cohorts; only the legions were so designated.

1. The 'Italian' Cohort. (Ramsay, St. Paul (4), chap. 14, § 1, p. 314). In Acts 10, accordingly, what we have to do with is a cohort of the auxiliary troops which were raised in the provinces and not formed into legions.¹ As for the meaning of such names: 'cohors Gallorum Macedonica,' for example, would denote that the cohort mentioned consisted of Gauls but had distinguished itself in Macedonia. If this interpretation were applicable, an Italian cohort would mean one which had fought in Italy. In Arrian, however (Acies contra Alanos, § 3, p. 99), the cohort which in § 13, p. 102, is called ἡ σπεῖρα ἢ Ἰταλική, the Italian cohort, figures simply as οἱ Ἰταλοί, the Italians, and with this agree all the other mentions (entirely in inscriptions) of a cohors Italica.

These are (1) Coh(ors) I Italica civium Romanorum voluntariorum; (2) coh(ors) mil(itaria)—i.e., having 1000 instead of as usual 500 men Italica(a) volunt(ariorum) quae est in Syria; (3) coh. II. Italica; (4) the epitaph of a subordinate officer found at Carnuntum in Pannonia and first published in the Archaeol.-epigr. Mittheilungen aus Oesterreich-Ungarn (1895, p. 218)—optio coh(ortis) II Italicae (civium) Romanorum centuria F(austini ex vexil(l)ariis) sagitt(ariis) exercitus Syriaci.

Thus the σπεῖρα Ἰταλική of Acts 10:1 really consisted of Italians, probably of Italian volunteers.

Now, Schürer¹ has pointed out that according to Josephus (Ant. xx. 87, § 176) the garrison of Caesarea about 60 A.D. consisted mostly of Caesareans and Sebastēni (Sebaste having, from 27 B.C., been the name of Samaria). As early, however, as 41-44 A.D. (at latest), when Caesarea was not under a Roman procurator but under a grandson of Herod the Great, King Herod Agrippa I. (whose death is recorded in Acts 12:20-23, and during whose reign, or shortly before it, the story of Cornelius will have to be placed), the garrison at Caesarea must, according to Schürer, have been similarly composed. For in 44 A.D., the emperor Claudius desired to transfer the garrison—which, at that time, and according to Josephus (BJ iii. 42, § 66) also twenty-three years later, in 67 A.D., consisted of an ala (= ἑλμη—i.e., cavalry detachment of 500 men) of the Caesareans and Sebasteni and five cohorts—to the province of Pontus, because, after the death of his friend King Agrippa I., they had publicly insulted the statues of his daughters; but there was no change of garrison until the time of Vespasian (Jos. Ant. xix. 91 f., §§ 356-366). This led Schürer to conjecture that a cohort of Italians may have come to Caesarea (there was in Syria, as shown above, one such at least) under Vespasian, and that the author of Acts, or of the source from which he drew, may have transferred the circumstances of his own time to the time of Peter.

Ramsay, on the other side, adduces the fourth of the inscriptions given above. This inscription, however, does not say more than that in 69 A.D. there was a cohors Italica in Syria; and, although there may have been such a cohort there as early as about 40-45 A.D., it is not said that there was one in Caesarea. It is especially improbable that that city was so garrisoned in the reign of Agrippa I. (41-44 A.D.), for he was a relatively independent sovereign, not likely to have had Italians in his service; but even for the period preceding 41 A.D. Schürer argues for a probability that the garrison of Caesarea was the same as it was afterwards, and that it was simply taken over by Agrippa at his accession. For the rest, Ramsay can only appeal to a possibility that Cornelius may have been temporarily at Caesarea on some 'detached service.'

Oscar Holtzmann (NTliche Zeitgesch. § 11, 2, p. 108) thinks that perhaps the enrolment at some time or other of a considerable number of Italian volunteers may have sufficed to secure for such a cohort in perpetuity the honorary epithet of 'Italica.' All this, however, is mere conjecture.

Mommson (Sitzungsber. d. Akad. zu Berlin, 1895, pp. 501-3) seeks to deprive of its force the statement of Josephus on which Schürer relies. Starting from the view that the troops of Agrippa must certainly have been drawn from the whole of his kingdom,—that is, from all Palestine—he maintains that Caesarea and Sebaste are singled out for special mention by Josephus merely as being the two chief towns in Agrippa's dominions. He lays emphasis on the fact that in BJ iii. 42, § 66

(see above) and Ant. xx. 61, § 122, it is said only of the ala—not of the cohors—that it was composed of Caesareans and Sebastenes. At the same time he does not use this fact to establish the probability of a cohors Italica in Caesarea. On the contrary, his conclusion is that 'We are unable to identify with any certainty either the cohors Augusta of Acts 27:1 or the σπεῖρα Ἰταλική of Acts 10:1.'

The special importance of Cornelius in Acts lies in the representation that his conversion by Peter brought the original Christian community of Jerusalem, in spite of violent recalcitrance at first (11:2 f.), to the conviction that the Gentiles also, without circumcision and without coming under any obligation to observe the law of Moses, were to be received into the Christian Church if they had faith in Christ (11:17 f.).

The historical truth of this representation has to be considered in connection with what we are told elsewhere concerning the Council of Jerusalem (see COUNCIL, ii. § 4; ACTS, § 4). That council could never have been necessary, and the Judaizing Christians in it could never have stood out for the circumcision of the Gentiles or their obligation to observe the whole Mosaic law (Acts 15:5), if they had already come to see and acknowledge in the case of Cornelius that such demands were contrary to the divine will. In his controversy with Peter at Antioch also (Gal. 2:11-21), Paul could have used no more effective weapon than a simple reference to this event; but he betrays no knowledge of it. No one, it is to be presumed, will attempt to save the credibility of the narrative by the expedient of transferring it to some date subsequent to the Council of Jerusalem. As at that council (we are told) Peter himself expressly agreed that the Gentiles should have unimpeded entrance into the Christian Church, that circumcision and observance of the law should not be demanded of them, he did not, at a later date, require to be instructed on the matter by a divine revelation. Had the Cornelius incident been later than the Council the novelty would have lain simply in Peter's preaching the gospel and administering baptism to Cornelius and his household in propria persona. This, however, is precisely what would have been contrary to the principle adopted at the Council as laid down in Gal. 2:9, which settled that he should confine his missionary activity to born Jews. (On the importance of this principle, see COUNCIL, § 9.)

As the story of Cornelius must thus be retained, if anywhere, in its present place, before the Council of Jerusalem, its credibility can be allowed only on condition that it is acknowledged not to possess the important bearing on questions of principle which is claimed for it in Acts. 11:1-18.

(a) To meet this requirement, it is usually thought sufficient to say that the occurrence was an 'exceptional case' (so, for example, Ramsay also, St. Paul⁽⁴⁾, chap. 3, p. 44). This may be true in the sense that Peter converted and baptized no more Gentiles; but, unless at the same time it is denied that in the case of Cornelius Peter's action proceeded on a divine revelation and command, the reference to the exceptional character of the case has no force. The conditions of missionary activity which God had revealed to Peter in the case of Cornelius must surely, when Paul also began to apply them, have been acknowledged by the original Church; and thus the controversy resulting in the Council of Jerusalem could never have arisen. On this ground alone, then, to begin with, Peter's vision at Joppa is unhistorical; and aversion from miracles has nothing to do with its rejection. The whole account seems to be influenced by reminiscences of the story of the summoning of Balaam by Balak (Nu. 22:5-39); see Krenkel, Josephus u. Lucas, 193-9 [94].

(b) It is further urged (so again Ramsay, St. Paul⁽⁴⁾, ch. 3 § 1 and 16 § 3, pp. 42 f. and 375, and Exp., 1896, 2200 f.) that Cornelius according to Acts 10:22-35 was a semi-proselyte—i.e., gave a general adhesion to Judaism, without being circumcised or yielding definite obedience to the details of the Mosaic Law;¹—but neither does this contention avail. The fact is, as stated in Acts 10:28 11:3, that Cornelius and his house, according to Jewish and Jewish-Christian ideas, were unclean; and if, notwithstanding this, God had commanded his admission within the pale of the Christian Church, the command had essentially no less significance than it would have had if he had previously been quite unattached to Judaism. Ramsay (43) says, it is true, that Peter 'laid it down as a condition of reception into the Church that the non-Jew must approach by way of the synagogue (10:35) and become "one that fears God."' But Peter does not say this until after he has been taught by God in a vision. Without this instruction it would have been incumbent on him to exact, as conditions precedent, acceptance of circumcision and submission to the entire law (10:4). As soon as the divine command is recognised as a historical fact the dispute at the Council of Jerusalem becomes, as already stated, an impossibility.

(c) On one assumption alone, then, will it be possible to recognise a kernel of historical truth in the story of Cornelius: the assumption, namely, that he was a full proselyte,—circumcised, that is to say, and pledged to observance of the entire Law. Such a supposition, however, is in direct contradiction of the text (10:28 11:3). It would be strange indeed if, in order to make the narrative credible, one had first to change it in so important a point. It would be necessary to depart still further from the text if it were desired to put faith in what is said in the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (20:13), according to which Peter did not convert Cornelius at Caesarea to Christianity at all, but merely freed him from a demon's possession. It is not intrinsically impossible that here we have a fragment of good tradition preserved from some ancient source (see SIMON MAGUS); but, on account of its combination with manifest fancies (see below, § 6), to trust it would be unsafe.

All the more urgent becomes the question whether the narrative in Acts is derived from a written source.

4. Sources. Of the scholars enumerated under Acts (§ 11) the majority assume that it is, and point out verses in ch. 10, the proper connections of which (they say) have been obliterated by the final redactor of the book.² They further emphasise the point that in the narrative by Peter (11:5-17) certain details are not given precisely as in ch. 10. Still, even the most serious of these differences—namely, that in ch. 11 the Holy Spirit fell upon Cornelius and his household at the very beginning of Peter's discourse (v. 15)—admits of explanation: 10:34-43 may have been supposed to represent only a comparatively small part of what Peter meant to say. Were it necessary to make a choice between ch. 10 and ch. 11, it would be the worst possible course to try to see in the latter the source from which the fuller narrative of ch. 10 was originally derived by amplification (so Wendt, ZTK, 1891, pp. 230-254, esp. 250-4). That principle-determining character which, as we have seen, can in no case have attached to the assumed event, is imparted precisely by the justification which in ch. 11 the event receives before the church of Jerusalem; and against this it is of no avail that Wendt chooses to attribute some of the strongest passages, such as 11:1 and 11:18, to the latest redactor of Acts.

² 10:36 f., however, ought not to be reckoned among these: no redactor would have introduced such violent abnormalities into his text. The words from ἀρχαίως ('beginning') down to Γαλιλαίας ('Galilee'), or, it may be, to Ἰωάννης (end of v. 37), are absolutely foreign to the construction, and certainly ought to come between εἰς ('who') and διήλθεν (EV 'went about') in v. 38, whether it be that they originally belonged to this place, or that they originally stood on the margin as a reminiscence by a very early reader from Lk. 23:5 or Acts 1:22. In 10:36 the reading of WH ('[He] sent the word unto . . . Lord of all. Ye know the word which': cp RVmg.) is unquestionably a copyist's attempt to remove the difficulties of the construction; but their marginal reading (τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπέστειλεν, etc.; 'The word which' as in EV) it is as difficult to make dependent on the οἶδατε (ye know) of v. 37 as it is to construe in apposition to the whole sentence in v. 35. If we refuse to suppose that before v. 36 some such words as 'you also hath he thought worthy to hear' have fallen out before τὸν λόγον ὃν ἀπέστειλεν, etc. (the word which [he] sent), it will be necessary to take τὸν λόγον ὃν ('the word which') down to διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ ('by Jesus Christ'), as a marginal explanation of τὸ γενομένην ῥῆμα καθ' ὅλης τῆς Ἰουδαίας ('the word which was throughout all Judaea'), where ῥῆμα (RV 'saying') is wrongly understood in the sense of 'word' instead of the Hebrew sense of 'event, occurrence' as in Lk. 2:15; and οὗτος ἐστὶν πάντων κύριος ('he is lord of all') will be a further addition.

More important than any of the indications hitherto dealt with is the clue supplied in 10:44-47 11:15, 17. The 'speaking with tongues' of Cornelius and his household is here placed on a level with that of the apostles at the first Pentecost after the resurrection, but is not yet (as it is in the other passage) described as a speaking in the languages of foreign nations: it is undoubtedly meant, as in 1 Cor. 12:14, to be taken simply as a speaking in ecstatic tones (see GIFTS). Certainly this representation of the matter does not seem as if it had been due to the latest redactor of the book as a whole.

In favour of the credibility of the narrative, however, nothing is gained by all this search for a written source. It is a great error, widely diffused, to suppose that one may ipso facto take as historical everything that can be shown to have stood in one of the written sources of the NT authors. As far as the source was in substance identical with what we now have in the canonical Acts, it is equally exposed to the criticisms already offered. There is one assumption which would escape the force of that criticism—the assumption, namely, that Cornelius was a full proselyte (§ 3c);—but it cannot possibly by any analysis of sources be made out to have been the original tradition.

All the more remarkable is the clearness with which the tendency of the narrative may be seen. The initiative in missions to the Gentiles, 5. Tendency. which historically belongs to Paul, is here set down to the credit of Peter (see ACTS, § 3 f.). According to the representation given in Acts, it was preceded by the conversion of the Samaritans (8:5-25), who, however, were akin to the Jews, and consequently not Gentiles (Schürer, G/V 2:5-7, ET 8:5-7). It had been preceded also by the baptism of the Ethiopian eunuch (8:26-39); but he had not thereby been made a member of any Christian church. The really difficult problem was this: In what manner ought Jewish Christians to live together in one and the same church with Gentile Christians, who did not hold by the Mosaic Law? This question is brought by Peter, in the case of Cornelius, on the basis of a divine revelation, exactly to the solution which in reality it was left to Paul to achieve after hard battle at a much later date (see COUNCIL, §§ 4, 7). With a certain reserve, which bears witness to right feeling for essential historical truth in spite of all unhistoricity in the narrative, the author attributes no more conversions of Gentiles to Peter; and even the conversion of Cornelius himself is in some measure toned down by the previous Jewish sympathies with which he is credited. There is thus a further step left. It is not till later, in Antioch, that the gospel is preached to Gentiles who had not previously stood in any close connection with Judaism, and the new step is taken (as in the case of the Samaritans) in the first instance by subordinate persons, and not sanctioned by the authorities at Jerusalem till after the event (11:19-24). None the less are mission to the Gentiles and the abolition of the distinction between Jewish Christians and Gentile Christians so essentially vindicated in the case of Cornelius that Peter has necessarily to be considered their real initiator as far as Acts is concerned. The narrative, accordingly, is incomplete contrast to Gal. 2:11-21. In Galatians the historical Peter, on account of Jewish Christian prejudice not yet fully overcome, withdraws from table-fellowship which he had begun with Gentile Christians, and thereby exposes himself to the sharp censure of Paul (see COUNCIL, § 3); in Acts he has completely overcome those prejudices long before Paul begins his Christian activity. It is not necessary on this account to suppose that the author of Acts freely invented the whole story, including even the name of Cornelius; but, considering how markedly he brings it into the service of his theory, we have little prospect of ultimately being able to retain more than a very small kernel as historical.

According to the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (20:13; see above, § 3 c) and Recognitions (10:55) Cornelius took the side of Peter as against Paul. When

6. Later traditions. Simon the Sorcerer (i.e., Paul; see SIMON MAGUS) had stirred up all Antioch against Peter, Cornelius comes upon a mission from the Emperor and arrives at an understanding with the friends of Peter, at their request, to set abroad the rumour that his imperial commission has reference to the arrest of Simon. Thereupon Simon makes his escape to Judaea. Thus Cornelius here plays the part which in Acts 21:33-33 is assigned to Claudius Lysias.

According to the ὑπόμνημα on the Holy Apostles Peter and Paul, attributed to Symeon Metaphrastes, Cornelius is consecrated by Peter bishop of Ilium; according to the Greek Menaea (13th Sept.), he is sent by Peter to Skepsis on the Hellespont (Lipsius, Apokryph. Ap. Gesch. ii. 147, and 97). According to the pseudo-Clementine Homilies (8:63-72) and Recognitions (8:65 f.), Zacchæus was consecrated first bishop of Caesarea by Peter; in Ap. Const. vii. 46 i Zacchæus is succeeded by Cornelius. P. W. S.

CORNER-STONE (in Job קַרְנֵי בִּנְיָן; λιθοκωνιαίος; in Is. קַרְנֵי, λ. ακρογωνιαίος, and so in NT; in Ps. יְהִי כֶּקְאֵלֵּלֵי טִימֵמֵנוּ; Aq. εἰσιγωνία, Sym. γωνία?, (a) Job 38:6; (b) Is. 28:16 i Pet. 2:6 Eph. 2:20 (without λιθοκ.); (c) Ps. 144:12.

In (a) the phrase 'pinnacle-stone,' EV's 'corner-stone,' is parallel to יְהִי בְּיָסָדָם, 'its foundations' (or bases), just as in Jer. 51:26 'a stone for a pinnacle' (אֶבֶן לְקַרְנֵי) is parallel to 'a stone for foundations' (אֶבֶן לְיִסודֵיהֶם). In (b) we find the same connection between קַרְנֵי, pinnacle, and the foundation-stone. Clearly, therefore, the traditional rendering 'corner-stone' for קַרְנֵי is unsuitable. Indeed, the word קַרְנֵי elsewhere only in some cases means 'corner' (see Ex. 27:24 Ezek. 43:20 45:19 Job 1:19 Prov. 7:8). Besides this, the architectural term קַרְנֵי in Ps. 118:22 (λ. ακρογωνιαίος in i Pet. 2:6 cp Eph. 2:20; but not in Mt. 21:42 and parallel passages, Acts 4:11 i Pet. 2:7) evidently means, not 'corner-stone,' but 'top-stone of the battlement,' and 'battlement' is RV's rendering of קַרְנֵי in 2 Ch. 26:15 Zeph. 1:16 3:6.

In spite of tradition, therefore, it would seem that קַרְנֵי means, not a corner-stone, but a principal stone (cp קַרְנֵי, Ass. pānu, 'front'), one selected for its solidity and beauty to fill an important place in a building, whether in the foundation or in the battlement. Hence the metaphorical sense of קַרְנֵי, 'principal men,' Is. 19:13 (so point), i S. 14:38 Judg. 20:2. (c) The third EV passage (Ps. 144:12) with the word 'corner' is extremely obscure in MT. That Jewish maidens could be likened either to 'corner-stones' (EV, Del.) or to 'corner-pillars' (Baethg., We. in SBOT, comparing the Caryatides) puts a severe strain on the imagination. The student may consult the three critics named. Zech. 9:15 ('corners of the altar') by no means justifies either of the above interpretations of קַרְנֵי. The parallel passage, Ps. 128:3, indicates the sort of figure required; the text needs emendation. See further Che. Ps. 128.

In Is. 28:16 the stone described as a pinnacle-stone symbolises, not the theocracy or the Davidic dynasty, nor yet the (Jewish) Messiah, but the revealed relation of Yahwè to Israel, which Yahwè was establishing ever more and more by the words of his prophets and the solemn acts of his regal sway. That it should be applied to their divine Messiah by Christians is intelligible; and, since they read the Psalter as a book with a living power of self-adaptation to their own changing needs, it was natural that Christian disciples should find the words of Ps. 118:22, which originally referred to the Jewish people, verified in their Master. In Eph. 2:20 there is no absolute need to interpret ακρογωνιαίου otherwise than אֶבֶן פֶּנֶה; but in i Pet. 2:6 we seem to require the traditional sense 'corner-stone' (see v. 7).

CORNET. For Dan. 3:5 פָּרָן (קַרְנֵי) and i Ch. 15:23, etc. (שֹׁפָר) see MUSIC, § 5a. For 2 S. 6:5 פָּרָן (קַרְנֵי), see MUSIC, § 3 (3).

CORONATION. ANOINTING [q.v., § 3] was by itself an efficient mode of investiture with royal functions (i S. 10:1 i K. 1:34).¹ It is only in the case of Joash that coronation is mentioned as accompanying—indeed, it is mentioned as preceding—the anointing (2 K. 11:12). Perhaps 2 S. 1:10 refers to an older custom of transferring to the successor the personal adornments of the dead king; see CROWN. Perhaps too the anointing occurred near or on a particular massēbah or upright stone, as in the case of Abimelech, for we can hardly doubt that EV's rendering the 'pillar that was in Shechem' (Judg. 9:6) is correct, though the final letter of כְּמִבֵּה has been lost or removed (see Moore, ad loc.). Joash too is said to have stood 'by the pillar as the manner was' (2 K. 11:14); but here the word for 'pillar' is different (עֲמֹד), and we should perhaps follow RV^{mg} and Klostermann in rendering 'platform' (cp 2 K. 23:3 RV^{mg}).²

After the anointing the people greeted the new king with a flourish of trumpets (i K. 1:34 39 2 K. 9:13 בשֹׁפָר 2 K. 11:14 בחֲצֹצְרוֹת). In the case of Jehu and Absalom (2 S. 15:10) the trumpet sounds were the signal of accession, though they may have been simply an element in the popular expressions of joy (i S. 11:15 i K. 1:40), which included hand-clapping (קָרָא, קָרָא 2 K. 11:12 Ps. 47:1 [2]) and the exclamation 'Live the king' (יְהִי הַמֶּלֶךְ; i S. 10:24 2 S. 16:16 i K. 1:34 39 2 K. 11:12). Sometimes there was a procession with music; the new king rode on the royal mule (i K. 1:33 38) and finally took his seat on the throne.

It is possible that 'to-day' in Ps. 27 refers not to the birth but to the coronation of the king. See Baethg., Che. ad loc. The latter illustrates from the sculptures representing the coronation of the Egyptian queen Hat-shepsut,³ Naville, Temple of Deir el-Bahari, III., 1899, pp. 1-6. See Weinell's essay on קָרָא in ZATW 18:92 [93] and Diehl, Erkl. von Ps. xviii., Giessen, 1894. I. A.

2. In Zeph. 26 (EV 'cottages' RVmg. 'caves') the ἀν. λεγ. קִרְיָה is probably a dittograph of קִרְיָה 'dwellings' (Bohme, ZATW 7 212 [87]; Rothstein in Kau. HS; and Schwally, ZATW 10 186 [90]), under the influence of קִרְיָה in v. 5; or, transposing the two words, we may adopt with We. the reading of Θ ἱσται Κρήνη νομή, with the meaning 'Philistia shall become dwellings for,' etc.

COTTON¹ or Fine Cloth (RVmg.), or GREEN (hangings), EV (קַרְפָּס, karpas; ΚΑΡΠΤΑCΙΝΑ [BN*ALαβ]; Esth. 16†). The Heb. word, which appears also in Arab., Arm., Gr., and Lat., is derived from Pers. kārphās and ultimately from Sans. kārpāsa, 'the cotton plant.'² As a derived word it means, in the various languages, primarily 'muslin,' the fine cotton cloth which came from India, and also such stuffs as are named 'calico.' The nature and home of the cotton plant were known to the Greeks as early as Herodotus (3 106); but it was the expedition of Alexander that first made them familiar with the use of cotton fabrics. The earliest known occurrence of κάρπασος = carbasus in Greek or Latin is in a line of Cæcilius (219-166? B.C.)—'carbasina, molochina, ampelina'—which appears to be a transliteration of a line in a Greek play. Strabo (15 1, § 71) and the author of the Periplus Maris Erythr. (chap. 11), Lucan (3 239), and Quintus Curtius (8 9, § 21) used the word in special connection with India; but other references in classical writers show that the word obtained a wider sense, particularly in the poets. Thus it is used of fine Spanish linen or cambric (Pliny 19 1, § 2), of the awnings of theatres³ (Lucr. 6 109), often of sails (Æn. 3 357 4 417, etc.) and of robes of fine material (id. 8 34 11 776, etc.: see these and other passages discussed in Yates, Textorium Antiquorum, 1 338 ff.). We cannot, therefore, be certain as to the material called karpas in the particular case of Esth. 16, since according to the later usage any light material might be so called; but in view of the undoubted meaning of the original word in Sans., the presumption is in favour of cotton-muslin. Karpas certainly denotes a material, not a colour (the latter is a Jewish idea, found in Vg.).

Asiatic cotton in ancient times (like most modern cotton) was derived from the cotton plant, Gossypium herbaceum, L.—perennial in the tropics, but elsewhere annual—which had its first home in India, but by the time of Alexander had spread to Bactriana (De Candolle, Origine, 323 ff.). The cotton shrub (Gossypium arboreum, L.), on the other hand, which, though little known to the ancients, is described in one place by Pliny,⁴ had its first home according to modern investigation, in 'Upper Guinea, Abyssinia, Sennar, and Higher Egypt' (id. 325 ff.). This, brought down from the Soudan, was probably the earliest cotton cultivated in Lower Egypt. Prosper Alpinus saw it in Egypt in the sixteenth century (id., 327). It was afterwards displaced by the Indian G. herbaceum.

COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM. This council, if not the most important occurrence of the apostolic age, is the one that bears the most official character. The more contradictory the accounts of it which we seem to possess in Gal. 2 and Acts 15, the more necessary is it to adopt a careful method for its investigation. The first question that arises is whether both accounts really relate to the same occurrence. In order to answer this, it is needful to determine the times of Paul's journeys to Jerusalem after his conversion.

In Gal. 1 18 21 he protests, very solemnly (1 20), that he visited Jerusalem for the first time three years after his

1. Paul's Journeys to Jerusalem in Gal. and Acts. conversion, and for the second time fourteen years after his first visit (or, less probably, after his conversion). Unless we deny the genuineness of the epistle to the Galatians we cannot but give unqualified acceptance to this statement.

Paul was endeavouring to show how little he was dependent in his apostleship upon the original apostles. He was, therefore, bound in the interests of truth to mention all the occasions on which he had come into contact with them. Moreover, to pass over any such occasion would have been highly imprudent; for his opponents naturally were aware of all of them, and would have promptly exposed the falsehood to the Galatians.

Now, the journey mentioned in Acts 9 26 must unhesitatingly be identified with that in Gal. 1 18, even though the narrative of Acts contains not the smallest hint that it was not made until three years after Paul's conversion, and had been preceded by a sojourn in Arabia and a second sojourn in Damascus.

a. It would seem, then, that the second journey recorded in Galatians (21) must coincide with the one in Acts 11 30, which, according to Acts 12 25, did extend to Jerusalem.

The famine during the reign of Claudius (by which the journey was occasioned) occurred in Palestine² before 48, at the earliest in 44—i.e., as the narrative of Acts appears to imply (12 23), at the time of the death of Herod Agrippa I.—and, if the conversion of Paul occurred shortly after the death of Jesus, and this last not much more than a year after the appearance of the Baptist in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (i.e., 28-29 A.D.; Lk. 3 1), there remains the interval of seventeen (or, at least, fourteen) years demanded by Gal. 1 18-21 between Paul's conversion and the famine, cp CHRONOLOGY, § 74 ff. Thus the account of the journey in Acts requires correction only in one point: the alms were sent not before but after the beginning of the famine.

Still, since it mentions no object for the journey besides the sending of alms, the narrative of Acts may be charged with having passed over in complete silence the conference mentioned in Gal. 2 1-10.

This is no trifling matter. It is remarkable that a conference upon the same subject should follow in Acts 15, for a repetition of the discussion within the next few years is not conceivable; observe, too, that no reference is made in Acts 15 to an earlier decision. The journey mentioned in Acts 11 f.—at all events, as far as Paul is concerned—may, on other grounds, be considered open to the suspicion of having been detached from the circumstances recorded in Acts 20 3 21 17 (cp 1 Cor. 16 4 Rom. 15:25 f.), and of having been transferred, whether by mistake or purposely, to a far too early position in the narrative (see SIMON MAGUS).

b. In order to avoid recognising the contradiction between Gal. 2 and Acts 15, a whole class of writers have assigned the Council of Jerusalem to the journey recorded in Acts 18:22. They ignore the objection that on this view Paul in Galatians suppresses important facts so far as to pass over two journeys to Jerusalem without mention.

c. On the other hand, it is a mistake to suppose that Acts 18:22 does not imply a visit to Jerusalem at all.

Although ἀναβάς might signify the journey up from the shore to the town of Caesarea, a man could not possibly be said to go down (κατέβη) from a seaport town to an inland city like Antioch. Thus we are bound to supply 'to Jerusalem' in v. 22 a—as is done by many interpreters even when denying the historical actuality of the journey. On this last point, however, we cannot in fairness appeal to the negative evidence of Galatians. True, it is silent as to this journey; but its historical review never reaches the point at which mention of it would have come in; instead of continuing such a review, after describing the occurrence at Antioch (21:21) the writer passes on to dogmatic and thence to practical questions, entirely losing sight of his original purpose, which was to enumerate all his personal encounters with the original apostles. It may, indeed, be thought remarkable that Jerusalem, if intended, is not mentioned in Acts 18:22; but this does not warrant the assumption now to be mentioned.

d. Some critics have assumed that the Council of Jerusalem was really held on this occasion (Acts 18:22), and not earlier—the author, having purposely transposed it to an earlier date, would express himself as briefly and obscurely as possible when he came to the point at which it really occurred.

This assumption has the advantage of bringing not only the first (Acts 13 f.) but also the second (16:1-18:22) missionary journey within the first seventeen years after Paul's conversion, thus providing material to fill up a period otherwise inexplicably barren of events. It cannot, however, be urged in its favour that Barnabas was personally known to the Galatians and the Corinthians, and that he cannot have been separated from Paul (Acts 15:35-40) until after the second missionary journey, during which the communities in Galatia—i.e., Old Galatia (see GALATIA)—and in Corinth were established; for the passages Gal. 2:9-13 1 Cor. 9:6 are perfectly intelligible on the assumption that Barnabas was known to the readers by report alone.

The assumption of such a transposition is entirely wanting in probability.

The motive prompting the writer to transpose the Council of Jerusalem to an earlier date is supposed to have been the desire to bring the whole of Paul's missionary work from its beginning within the scope of the decree of the apostles (Acts 15:28 f.); but, had this really been the writer's intention, he would have introduced the council not before Acts 16, but before Acts 18. What should have hindered him from so doing, if it be assumed that he allowed himself to make free with his materials in this way at all, is not apparent.

e. Others actually transpose the journey described in Acts 13 f. so as to make it come between the Council of Jerusalem and the separation of Barnabas from Paul, and therefore after Acts 15:34.

Their strongest reason is the fact that Paul mentions only Syria and Cilicia as his places of residence up to the Council of Jerusalem (Gal. 1:21). This is hardly conclusive, for, although Paul was pledged to enumerate all his meetings with the original apostles, he was not bound to mention all the provinces in which he had resided without meeting them. In any case, even if the transposition of Acts 13 f. and Acts 15:1-34 be accepted, this gives no support to the assumption mentioned under d, since for that assumption the writer of Acts has put the two sections exactly in the wrong order: his supposed purpose, as well as the motive of historical accuracy, would have led him to put 15:1-34 before 13:1-14:28.

f. It is only by very bold treatment of the different sources of Acts, by which the accounts of Paul's journeys in Acts 11 f. 15:18 become merely the result of an erroneous combination of the writer's authorities, that Clement (Chronol. d. Paulin. Br. 1893) contrives to identify Gal. 2 with Acts 21, and Joh. Weiss (St. u. Kr., 1893, pp. 480-540; 1895, pp. 252-269), on the contrary, with Acts 9 and (at the same time) with Acts 15:1-12. It is, in fact, quite impossible to deny the identity of the events related in Gal. 2 and in Acts 15. See CHRONOLOGY, § 74.

In view, however, of the doubts cast upon Acts, it is an error of method to make that book the basis for an

2. Gal. 2:11-21 investigation of the present question. It might even seem well to begin by laying aside Acts altogether and ascertaining the facts from Galatians alone. That method, however, would prevent certain questions from receiving adequate consideration, and no harm need be apprehended in treating both accounts, circumspectly, together. It is, however, of unqualified importance to take Gal. 2:11-21 as the starting-point, because that passage alone throws any really clear light upon the circumstances.

Peter was no uncompromising Judaizer. Before the dispute at Antioch recorded in Gal. 2:11-21 he had eaten with Gentile Christians. If he

of the followers of James, he could not, accustomed as he was to adopt the attitude of a leader, have been influenced in the least by the fear of the representatives of circumcision—his alleged motive—had he not himself recognised their position as the right one. He must in his inmost heart have still been continuing to attach some importance to the Mosaic laws relating to food. Thus, he could not yet have attained to that liberty in principle which belonged to Paul. This freedom Paul conceivably assumed to be present in Peter, as it was in himself; in which case he could attribute Peter's antagonism only to hypocrisy. Critics have softened the charge of hypocrisy into a charge of inconsistency, such as is very frequently to be observed at times of transition in natures that have no very firm grasp of principles.

Different from Peter's position was that of James. Whether the 'certain' (τινές) were expressly sent by him in order to recall Peter to the Law, or whether they attempted to do this on their own account without his commission ('from James,' ἀπὸ Ἰακώβου, in NT Greek does not go necessarily with 'came,' ἔλθειν, and it may equally well be taken with 'certain,' τινές), is immaterial. Peter, the leader of the apostles, would certainly never have submitted to their commands if they had not had behind them the authority of James. Now, the position of James as distinct from that of Peter can only have been that a man born a Jew was still under religious obligation even as a Christian to observe the whole of the Mosaic Law. It cannot be supposed that he upheld this obligation only as convenient for the time, or even merely as a beautiful custom; a motive of the most serious kind must have been actually held out to Peter, if he was to submit to be driven to so absolute a renunciation of brotherly intercourse with the Gentile Christians.

As we are not informed of any answer from Peter to Paul's reprimand in Gal. 2:14-21, it is commonly (though very rashly) assumed that Peter admitted his error. That Paul should record an exculpatory answer from Peter, however, was hardly to be expected, if only for the reason that he must have thought it inconclusive. Still, even if Peter was thought to have yielded, the others who shared his opinion did not yield. Otherwise, why is the scene at Antioch followed so quickly by the entrance of the Judaizing party into the churches founded by Paul in Galatia and Corinth, in complete contravention of the agreement in Gal. 2:9, and by the nearly successful attempt to induce the Galatians to adopt circumcision (Gal. 5:2 f. 6:12 f. 4:10) and to alienate the Corinthians from Paul altogether (2 Cor. 11:4 12:16 4:3-5 5:12 f. 7:5-16)? How could so important and persistent a movement—it had already been encountered by Paul on two separate occasions, both in Galatia and in Corinth (Gal. 1:9 5:3 1 Cor. 9:1 2 Cor. 11:4)—have been carried on if it had been opposed by the first apostles? Whence came the letters of recommendation which, according to 2 Cor. 3:1, these emissaries brought with them? As they formed the ground upon which the suspicion against Paul as one who had never known Jesus (1 Cor. 9:1) proceeded, what weightier credentials could they have contained than the statement that their bearers represented immediate disciples of Jesus? Would the sceptical Corinthians have been satisfied if the authentication had come (let us say) from Ephesus, or from some other town outside Palestine?

How comes it, again, that even at the end of the second century the pseudo-Clementine homilies (1719) represent Peter as reproaching Simon—under whose name Paul is there attacked (see SIMON MAGUS)—for having called him a κατεγνωσμένος (Gal. 2:11; RV 'stood condemned')? This shows how deep a wound was inflicted on Judaising Christianity by Paul's bold attack on Peter. For this reason, not a word is said in Acts about the scene; though it is quite inconceivable that the author had no knowledge of it (see ACTS, § 6). Further, in the place in Acts where this scene ought to have been mentioned there is recorded a similar dispute (παροξυσμός; Acts 15:39) between Paul and Barnabas (see BARNABAS), who, according to Gal. 2:13, had gone over to the side of Peter. This dispute, however, does not turn on any question of principle. It was merely a personal matter (Acts 15:36-40). The conjecture is a tempting one that this scene, if not an invention, is at least an interpolation, based on some written source, introduced for the purpose of effacing the memory of the more important quarrels.

We are now in a position to investigate the Council of Jerusalem itself. It was occasioned, on the part of

4. Occasion of the council. Judaistic Christianity, by the appearance of the 'false brethren,' who had made their way unauthorised into the Pauline and other churches, seeking to spy out and to suppress the freedom from the Mosaic Law that had there been attained (Gal. 2:4). As this cannot have been in Jerusalem, we may accept the statement of Acts (15:1, cp 14:26) that it was to Antioch they came. Up to that time no such intrusion had occurred, although the circumstances at Antioch cannot have long remained unknown to the leaders at Jerusalem. It is, therefore, not improbable that the new and sudden aggressive movement proceeded from recently converted Pharisees, even though the statement to this effect in Acts 15:5 is made without reference to 15:1, and therefore appears to come from another source. Paul was prompted to go to the council of the apostles by a revelation (Gal. 2:2). Probably it came to him not as a bolt from the blue, but only after the question to be decided by the council had already stirred his soul to its depths. No less than his entire life-work—that of bringing the heathen to Christianity without binding them by the Mosaic Law—was at stake. According to Acts (15:2), he and Barnabas were deputed to go to Jerusalem by the church at Antioch in consequence of a fruitless discussion there. This motive for the journey is not, of course, absolutely incompatible with the revelation mentioned by Paul; but it is in any case significant that Paul speaks only of the revelation and Acts only of the delegation. What-ever the motive, what is it that Paul can have gone to Jerusalem in search of? A tribunal to whose verdict he would voluntarily submit, whatever its tenor? By no means. He had from a higher authority his gospel of freedom from the Law, and cared very little for the original apostles (Gal. 1:6-9 15:17 25:f.). Or did he expect to find among them assistance against the 'false brethren'? We think that he did not; if he did, his expectation was not justified by the event (see below, §§ 7, 8). The purpose with which he went to Jerusalem was to discover the source from which the 'false brethren' drew their support. He intended to take that support away from under them, and, in order to do so, it was necessary that he should appear in person. 'Lest by any means I should be running or had run in vain' (Gal. 2:2; μήπως εἰς κενὸν τρέχω ἢ ἔδραμον) is not an interrogative; Paul would never have made the justification of his work dependent on the judgment of the original apostles.

Were the conferences at Jerusalem public, or were they private? No clear picture of them is presented in Acts—perhaps because the account is compiled from various sources.

A general assembly is set before us in Acts 15:4. We may suppose the private assembly mentioned in 15:6 to have been on another day (though the author says nothing as to this). Suddenly, however, in 15:12, 'all the multitude' (πᾶν τὸ πλῆθος) is present; and it reappears in 15:22 as responsible for the final decision, although in 15:23 this is attributed to the apostles and elders only. Paul, on the other hand, in the words κατ' ἰδίαν, 'privately' (Gal. 2:2), passes from a public to a private conference, as also probably in 2:6—for the discussion about the circumcision of Titus (2:3-5) can most easily be supposed to have occurred in a public assembly, in which expression was also given to the position which the original apostles did not themselves finally adopt.

So far there is no inconsistency between Galatians and Acts: both know of meetings of both kinds. The crucial question, however, is, Was any final decision arrived at in a public assembly?

If the decision was not in Paul's favour, the claims of truth and of prudence alike must have led him to mention it. Much, however, of what is recorded in Acts—e.g., the speech of Peter (15:7-11)—points very clearly to a decision in Paul's favour; and to pass this over in silence would have been folly.

The picture presented in Acts, therefore, of a decisive public assembly is entirely incorrect.

The case is similar with what is said, or implied, as to Paul's attitude towards the original apostles. Accord-

6. Paul's attitude to the original apostles. ing to Acts, he holds quite a subordinate position. He is allowed to state his case, but not to take part in the debate: he has simply to submit to the decision. According to Galatians, he debates as with his equals. Indeed, he even refers to the original apostles ironically as 'of repute,' 'reputed to be pillars,' 'to be somewhat' (οἱ δοκοῦντες [στύλοι εἶναι ἢ εἶναι τι]; 2:9, 6).

Even if it be granted that the title, 'pillars' (οἱ στύλοι) may have been originally applied to them by their adherents as a term of honour, the phrase 'reputed' (οἱ δοκοῦντες) cannot have been so used. It is explicitly derogatory. The most that can be done to soften the force of Paul's irony is to conjecture that he did not invent the expression until the incident at Antioch had diminished his respect for them.

Paul took Titus as his companion of set purpose. The uncircumcised assistant of his missionary labours

7. Question of circumcision of Titus. would serve as an 'object-lesson' in support of his fundamental principle. An attempt was made to procure his circumcision; but, owing to the opposition of Paul and Barnabas, it had to be abandoned.

This is clearly the meaning of Gal. 2:3-5, and only the most violent feats of critical ingenuity can find any other explanation of the passage. One interpretation is that no attempt whatever was made (οὐκ ἠναγκάσθη) to procure the circumcision of Titus. If so, why the opposition of Paul and Barnabas? Again, the attempt was made, yet not on grounds of principle, but in the interest of Paul, to save him from daily defilement. How did he avoid defilement from other Gentile converts, with many of whom he associated daily? Perhaps, on account of the 'false brethren,' Paul did, after all, of his own accord, allow Titus to be circumcised. Did he hope thereby to maintain the truth of the gospel (Gal. 2:5) that no man need be circumcised? It has even been proposed to follow the Greek text and the Latin version of D with Irenæus, Tertullian, and other Western fathers, in omitting the negative (οὐδέ) in Gal. 2:5 (whether 'to whom,' οἷς, also be omitted is of less importance), as if Paul could have been so blind as to consider compliance at the most critical moment to be harmless, because only temporary (πρὸς ὥραν). It is, on the contrary, probable that after 2:5, to complete the sentence beginning with 2:4, we ought to supply not 'we did not give place' (οὐκ εἴδαμεν), as if, had the false brethren not appeared, Paul would have been prepared to comply, but 'on account of the false brethren' it was all the more necessary to offer a strenuous opposition. For at the outset they had demanded the circumcision of all Gentile converts even. As this is expressly stated in Acts 15:1, it is the more certain that it is necessarily presupposed by the negative (οὐδέ) of Gal. 2:3; nothing worse occurred, and not even Titus was compelled to be circumcised. The worst thing that might have occurred would, according to 2:2, have been that Paul should have run in vain (εἰς κενὸν ἔδραμεν)—i.e., that a decree should have been passed prohibiting the admission of Gentiles into Christianity without circumcision.

Thus the demand for the circumcision of Titus appears as a compromise proposed for the first time when the original proposal for the circumcision of all Gentile converts met with insuperable opposition from Paul and Barnabas. The very circumstantiality of a conference that passed through so many aspects is enough to show that these proposals could not possibly have been made without at least the moral support of the original apostles. Had the latter been on Paul's side from the first (it has been held that they are to be included in the subject of 'gave place,' εἴξαμεν), any attempt of the kind must have been instantly frustrated by their authority.

It is, therefore, useless to construe Gal. 2.4 as a reason subsequently introduced to explain 2.3, as though the circumcision of Titus was refused by all parties alike, for the reason that it was demanded by the 'false brethren' alone. Considerations of language also render inadmissible the other interpretation, which supplements so as to read 'and indeed on behalf of the "false brethren" . . . it was said that he ought to be compelled to be circumcised (ὑπαγκάσθῃ without οὐκ). The importance attached to the memory of the case of Titus is best shown in Acts; his name is never mentioned at all, those who accompanied Paul to the conference being 'Barnabas and certain others' (οἱ ἄλλοι, Acts 15.2; see Acts, § 9). It is not going too far, therefore, to say that the original apostles were at the outset undecided in their attitude; indeed, if we may judge by what occurred soon afterwards at Antioch, this understates the case.

In harmony with this attitude was that which they adopted towards the subsequent mission to the Gentiles.

8. The apostles and the mission to the Gentiles. Paul's practice of admitting Gentiles as members of the Christian Church without circumcision cannot have obtained the sanction of the other apostles at the outset. Assent was wrung from them with difficulty. Indeed, they did not give way on any ground of principle; otherwise their behaviour in the dispute at Antioch would have been impossible. They gave way only because of the divine verdict as shown by the event (ἰδόντες . . . γινόντες τὴν χάριν τὴν δοθεῖσάν μοι, Gal. 2.9; cp Acts 15.12), to which they submitted perforce, though without recognising its underlying justification. Peter and James, therefore, cannot have expressed themselves, even approximately, as in Acts 15.7-21 they are said to have spoken. Had what Peter (15.7f.) enjoins in regard to Cornelius really occurred, there would have been no Council of Jerusalem at all (Acts, § 4).

Peter is further said (15.9) to have declared that God had removed the difference between Jews and Gentiles by purifying the hearts of the Gentiles—as though in the eyes of a Jew the impurity of the Gentiles were impurity of the heart alone. He is, moreover, represented as saying (15.11) that his hope of salvation was through the grace of God alone, whereas at Antioch he maintained that the observance of the Law was necessary to salvation. Finally (15.10), he calls the Law a yoke intolerable even to the Jews; yet at Antioch he again submitted himself to it. He calls it a tempting of God to put the yoke on the Gentiles also; yet at Antioch he broke with the Gentiles because they did not take it on themselves, thus putting moral pressure upon them to 'Judaize' (σοδοαῖσεν: Gal. 2.14). In short, the speech of Peter is so eminently Pauline that Weizsäcker found it possible to believe that the author of Acts took the speech of Paul against Peter in Gal. 2.14-21 as the foundation for its composition.

There is evidence on the other side that the author did to some extent correctly estimate the positions of the speakers—in the fact that the speech of James is considerably more reserved. The reference to Cornelius in 15.14, however, is just as unhistorical as that in 15.7f. James cannot possibly have employed the quotation from Amos unless it be maintained that the discussion was carried on in the language of the hated foreigners; for in the original it is not said that the residue of men and all nations to whom God's name had been made known should seek the Lord—it is only said that the Israelites should again attain to political dominion over Edom and the other nations that had at any time been under the dominion of God (i.e., of Israel).¹ And James pays his tribute to Paulinism if he implies that the imposition of the whole Mosaic Law upon the Gentiles is a burden to them from which, as being such, they ought to be relieved (15.10). Furthermore, he did not make the positive proposal of 15.20. See below, § 10.

The result of the conference, according to Galatians, was a 'fellowship' (κοινωνία) (29). What the precise extent of this κοινωνία was can be learned only by inference from the incidental facts.

9. Result of Council according to Gal. A division of missionary districts was arranged. The reason why the original apostles desired to carry on their work only among the Jews can be gathered with absolute certainty from the situation of affairs which had been brought about. The separation of the missionary districts had been the result of the conference concerning the circumcision of the Gentile converts. Had the circumcision of these converts been decided on, the original apostles need have felt as little cause to shrink from missions to the Gentiles as a Jew had to shrink from the work of winning proselytes. As the sequel at Antioch shows, what they found intolerable was the idea of that intimate daily association with uncircumcised brethren which would have become unavoidable if missionary work had been engaged in by them without circumcision of the Gentiles. That was the reason why they abandoned this part of the work to Paul and Barnabas. To look for the reason of the separation of missionary districts in differences of aptitude for winning either Gentiles or natural Jews is to misapprehend the causes that were really at work. Such considerations as those mentioned may have had some concurrent influence; but how could the scene at Antioch have been possible if difference of aptitudes had been the sole or even the chief cause of the separation? Not a word is there said about Peter's missionary work: the only question is whether he is prepared to eat at the same table with Gentile converts.

It is equally certain that the separation of districts was intended in an ethnographical, not in a geographical, sense. Had the original apostles undertaken to labour for the conversion of the Gentiles as well as for that of the Jews in Palestine without insisting upon circumcision, they would immediately there have found themselves face to face with all the difficulties which had caused them to avoid the Gentile countries and confine their efforts to the land of their fathers. The separation had no purpose unless missions to natural Jews were to be assigned to them as their province. Conversely, Paul and Barnabas were, of course, to go only to men of Gentile birth: Jews seeking salvation whom they met in Gentile countries they were bound to turn away, referring them for guidance to itinerant Jewish-Christian missionaries. This might have led to the further consequence that in one and the same town there would have arisen two Christian communities, one of Jews and one of Gentiles. Association at meals, as well as at the Lord's Supper, would have been impossible between them. This intolerable state of affairs, however, was exactly what the Pauline churches had long ago contrived to avert; and this success was regarded by Paul as the highest triumph of the view of Christianity which he advocated. It is very reasonable to ask how he could have had any share in an arrangement by which, in the churches he had founded, the wall of separation between Jewish and Gentile Christians, which it had cost so much labour to destroy, was again raised up. To fall back on the view that the separation was intended to be geographical would, however, be wrong. A separation on such a basis the apostles, as has already been shown, could not possibly have accepted. It would be necessary to draw the conclusion that the statement of Galatians must be pronounced unhistorical, and the epistle itself non-Pauline, were there really no other way out of the difficulty. Before taking this step, however, we shall do well to remember that men have often enough agreed upon a compromise without having formed any adequately clear conception of its consequences. The Christian church would speedily have fallen asunder into two separate communities, the one of Jewish and the other of Gentile Christians, had no agreement been reached. Neither of the parties was able to abandon its view: each felt itself under a strict religious obligation to maintain its own principles. There must, therefore, have been the greatest eagerness to grasp at any formula that presented itself as a solution. 'We to the Jews, you to the Gentiles,' appeared to be a formula of the kind, and joy in the renewed sense of brotherhood may have blinded men's eyes to the impracticability of the proposal. This would happen all the more readily if the formula was so loose that each party could understand it in a different sense. In the absence of more precise definition, the geographical interpretation must have seemed to Paul as obviously the correct one as the ethnographical interpretation appeared to the other apostles—to Paul, who became not merely to the Gentiles a Gentile, but also to the Jews a Jew, that he might by all means win some, and, in order to save those belonging to his own race, would willingly have been accursed from Christ (1 Cor. 9.20 f. Rom. 9.3; cp BAN, § 1). In the scene at Antioch the misunderstanding revealed itself only too clearly; but this does not prove that there was no misunderstanding at Jerusalem. Even in the aspect under which the matter had to be presented at the conference at Jerusalem, the unity sought for was limited. The 'right hand of fellowship' (δεξιὰ κοινωνίας) which they held out to each other was at the same time a parting handshake. According to their fundamental principles, the Jewish Christians neither would nor could have any very intimate communion, any really brotherly intercourse, with the Gentile Christians. It is worthy of notice that the support of the poor is represented in Gal. 2.10 less as being the only demand made upon the Pauline churches than as being the only bond by which the two halves of Christendom were to be kept together.

There is, however, no necessity for assuming that these aims from the Gentile Christians were like temple dues, or intended to express a position of inferiority as compared with that of Jewish Christians. In view of the notorious poverty of the church at Jerusalem (see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5), it would have been unreasonable to require reciprocity, and doubtless Paul was glad to evince his goodwill on such neutral ground. For the rest, it was quite impossible that the Gentiles should be treated by the Jews as having equal rights and full citizenship in the kingdom of God. The OT promises applied only to the chosen race and to those who had been received into it by circumcision. The Jewish Christians had made the concession—from their point of view a concession of real magnitude—of sanctioning the mission to the Gentiles without circumcision; but it was not to be supposed that this could be granted except on the basis that this class of converts was to hold somewhat the same position as that of the semi-proselytes (σεβόμενοι τὸν θεόν) among the Jews; they figured only as a 'younger branch in the kingdom of God.' In no case could the original apostles have set the same value on the conversion of these Christians of the second class through the agency of Paul as on their own missionary activity. It is remarkable that Gal. 2.8b does not run, on the analogy of 2.8a, 'unto the apostleship of the Gentiles' (εἰς ἀποστολὴν τῶν ἐθνῶν). Freedom of construction is, of course, a characteristic of Paul's style, and thus 'unto the Gentiles' (εἰς τὰ ἔθνη) also may be explained as a case of brachylogy. Still, it is noteworthy that—e.g., in 1 Cor. 9.1—he does not base any appeal on the fact that apostleship (ἀποστολή) had been conceded to him by the original apostles. How effective—if open to him—this appeal would have been against the Judaizers at Corinth who called his apostleship in question, and set up those very apostles as the supreme authority! The truth is that he does not appear to have received any such recognition. Thus he would seem to have been recognised only as a fellow-worker, in the Christian field, not as a fully accredited apostle.

According to Acts, the result of the Council was the decree in 15.23-29. Nevertheless, as long as the words 10. The decree in Acts.

'imparted nothing to me' (ἐμοὶ οὐδὲν προσανέβητο), in Gal. 2.6, are allowed to stand, we shall be precluded from accepting this finding as a formal decree. Whether the words mean 'The δοκοῦντες imparted nothing further to me' (so according to 116), or that 'They made no further rejoinder to my communication' (so according to 22), is immaterial. Their meaning is made clear by 'contrariwise' (τροπῶντιον) in 2.7: 'Not only did they say nothing unfavourable to me, but also they pledged themselves to fellowship with me.' We cannot better convince ourselves of the certainty of this conclusion than by examining the attempts that have been made to avoid it.

Theologians have done their utmost to maintain that Paul was justified in using the words ἐμοὶ οὐδὲν προσανέβητο, instead of mentioning the decree of the apostles, because the decree was known to the Galatians already, or because he did not want to put a weapon into the hand of his opponents, or because the decree was only temporary—perhaps, not binding at all, but merely having reference to a custom, the object of which has been even discovered to be the protection of the Gentiles against trichinosis. In the last of these methods of evading the interpretation stated above, all idea of a formal decree having been promulgated is given up; but even if the agreement on the substance of the decision had been only verbal, Paul could not have said, ἐμοὶ οὐδὲν προσανέβητο.

Apart from this, the dispute at Antioch conclusively disproves the historicity of the decision, whether in the form of a regular decree or not. It is clear that any such arrangement, had it been come to, would have had the effect of rendering it possible for Jewish and Gentile Christians to associate with one another at meals. If (as is stated in Acts 16.4) Paul and Silas continued to enforce the decree during their next journey, we are bound all the more to suppose that it came into force at Antioch immediately after its promulgation there. In that case, James and his followers had no reason for taking offence at Peter's eating with Gentile converts.

If, then, we are forced to admit that no arrangement of this nature was made at the Council at all, there are many who would like to retain the opinion that Paul was substantially in favour of such an arrangement. This, however is a mistake. The four prohibitions are taken, either from the seven 'Noachic precepts' (as they are called in the Talmud), by means of which a modus vivendi is said to have been arrived at between the Jews and the 'sons of Noah' (the Gentiles), or directly from the original ordinances on which those are based (Lev. 17.10-18.30), which likewise were promulgated, not for the Israelites alone, but also for the foreigners in their midst. The latter source is the more probable, for the Talmud prohibits actual unchastity; but it cannot be doubted that, had such a prohibition appeared to be at all necessary in Acts 15, the prohibition of murder and of theft would also have been adopted from the Talmud. In its association with ordinances so far from being common to all mankind, so peculiarly Jewish, as the prohibition of blood, of the flesh of animals that had died or been strangled, and of the flesh of animals sacrificed to idols, it is much more likely that the interdict upon what is here called πορνεία refers to marriages within the degrees of affinity forbidden in Lev. 18.6-18 (cp BASTARD). Moreover, as the passage in Leviticus lies at the foundation of Acts 15, in a general way only, it is possible that marriages with Gentiles also may have been included; these were prohibited by Ex. 34.16 Dt. 7.3 Ezra 9.2, and would have made it quite impossible for a Jewish Christian to enter the house of a Gentile who had contracted such a marriage.

Now, as to Paul's view in regard to eating things sacrificed to idols, we have full and exact information. As a general rule (1 Cor. 8.10.23-33 Rom. 14.14) he allows it: it is to be avoided only in cases where it might cause offence to a weak Christian who mistakenly thinks that the Levitical prohibition of it is of perpetual obligation.

COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM

Paul does recognise, it is true, one exception, which he mentions in 1 Cor. 10¹⁴⁻²², though, curiously, not in the exactly similar case in 8¹⁰ (cp DEMONS, § 8); but even this passage contains no prohibition of the practice excepting at a religious ceremony of this kind. In the decree of Acts, on the contrary, the eating of things offered to idols is, it need hardly be said, forbidden in all circumstances, just as to partake of blood, or of the flesh of animals that have died or been strangled, is forbidden. Here the prohibition turns on the nature of the thing itself (cp ἀλλογενήματα, Acts 15²⁰): the soul was thought to reside in the blood (Lev. 17¹¹⁻¹⁴), and to eat the soul would have been an abomination. Now, as Paul does not concur in the decree of the apostles on the question of eating animals sacrificed to idols, it would not be wise to assume his agreement in regard to the prohibition of blood and of the flesh of animals that had died or been strangled, about which we have no expression of opinion by him. As to the question of marriage, he carried on an uncompromising warfare against unchastity of every kind (1 Cor. 5 6¹²⁻²⁰); but unchastity does not appear to have been what was intended in the decree of the apostles. Marriages with unbelievers, on the contrary, he did, it is true, advise against (1 Cor. 7³⁹), but in no case on grounds of principle. Otherwise he could not have enjoined that a Christian married to an unbelieving spouse should continue the relation if the other consented; nor could he have declared that the unbelieving spouse was sanctified by marriage with a Christian, and that even the children of a mixed marriage were holy (1 Cor. 7¹²⁻¹⁴). The children were not baptised; if they had been, their sanctity would have been a consequence of their baptism, and not deducible from their connection with their parents simply. Accordingly, if Paul discourages marriages with unbelievers for the future (7³⁹), his reason cannot have been that they were in themselves wrong, but only that they were incompatible with the deeper spiritual sympathy of true spouses. On these grounds we are obviously still less entitled to assume that Paul would have pronounced to be wrong all marriages within the degrees of affinity, down to that with a sister-in-law, forbidden in Lev. 18⁶⁻¹⁸, except in those cases which are manifestly contrary to nature, as, e.g., that given in 1 Cor. 5¹⁻⁸. On no single point, therefore, does Paul even express substantial agreement with the restrictions imposed by the decree of the apostles.¹

The last attempt to rescue some remnants of credibility for Acts connects itself with 21²⁵. Here Paul is acquainted with the decree of the apostles as if it were something new. It is absolutely impossible to reconcile this with the representation of Acts 15; but it is suggested that, if the latter has to be abandoned on account of Galatians, it may be possible to retain at least what is said in Acts 21. On this view the apostles issued the decree simply on their own responsibility, without consulting Paul; and this version of the matter was derived by the author from one of his sources. Unfortunately, the source of this passage (at least, according to all attempts hitherto made to distinguish the sources of Acts) is made out to be the same as that of Acts 15²⁰, or of 15²⁸ f., or of both those passages. To avoid this conspicuous failure in the argument, J. Weiss deletes from the account in 15 5-11 13-33 (for 15 1-4 12, see above, § 1 div. f.) all references to Paul and Barnabas (15²²⁻²⁵) as editorial additions, and assumes that in the original source 15 5-11 13-33 related only to the conference of the original apostles among themselves, which is then called to mind in 21²⁵. Apart from the extreme boldness of this assumption, it is to be remarked that this particular source is considered by Weiss himself, as well as by all other critics of the sources of Acts, to be untrustworthy. In particular, the verse in question (21²⁵) has been actually taken to be an interpolation, and in fact is so little necessary to the context that if it were wanting its absence would not be noticed. Read with the context, it causes no difficulty; but the context itself is not historical (see ACTS, § 7). In any conceivable view, therefore, suspicion is thrown on the verse by a critical examination of the sources. In the absence of any confirmation, it certainly does not possess enough of internal probability to justify its acceptance.

In fine, it appears that the Tübingen school is not without justification in maintaining that the decree of the apostles is a fiction invented by the author for the purpose of promoting a union of Jewish and Gentile Christians. Only, in the second century it would have been little calculated to secure this object. The assumption is that these regulations were new at the time of writing. Now, they contain very stringent restrictions upon the freedom of the Gentile Christians in the interests of the Jewish; but the Gentiles were at that time so largely in the majority and so full of the consciousness of their title to membership in the Church, that they would hardly have acquiesced in such restrictions then. Besides, the regulations contained in the decree of the apostles must, in their essence, have been actually in force at the time of the composition of Acts (see ACTS, § 16), however little they may have been so in the first century.

The Epistle of Barnabas (8646) betrays traces of this in the complaint that Christians believed themselves bound to observe the Mosaic Law, and from the middle of the second century there is evidence of this on all hands (Did. 63; Justin, Dial. 35; Luc. de mort. Peregr. 16; Epistle from Lugdunum of the year 177, in Eus. HEV. 1 26; Irenæus, adv. Hær. i. 62 [ch. 1, § 12]; Tertullian, Apol. chaps. 7 8; Min. Felix, Octav. 30; Clem. Hom. 1 3 f. 8, and Recog. 4 36; Clem. Alex. Pæd. iii. 25 [ii. 8 f., Strom. 4 99, ed. Syllburg, 62, 98, 219 f.]; Origen, c. Cels. 8 (24) 30; Orac. Sibyll. 2 96).

Possibly the first traces of such a custom or of an attempt to introduce it are to be found in Rev. 21²⁰⁻²⁵, where the writer speaks only of meat offered to idols and of πορνεῖα.

The solution of the question would thus seem to be that the author of Acts, finding this custom in his own day, assumed in simple faith that it must date back to the time of the apostles, and (by a bold process of combination) represented its establishment as being the settlement of the dispute which he knew to have raged in those early times. His reverence for the apostles and the assumption (to him a matter of course) that complete harmony had prevailed among them supplied colours for the picture which differs so widely from the truth. In any case, the gradual rise of the custom itself finds its explanation in the effort to establish a modus vivendi between Jewish and Gentile Christians. Only, it was due not to the demands of the strict Jewish Christians of the Council of Jerusalem—men who could not have been satisfied by the observance of so small a portion of the Law—but rather to the demands of the Jewish Christians of the Dispersion, who had on their own side long ago emancipated themselves from strict obedience to the Law, yet could not overcome their repugnance to certain extreme deviations from it.

In conclusion, we learn from our investigation of the subject that the Council of Jerusalem did not possess the importance which its comparatively

12. Conclusion. official character appears to claim for it. It had far less influence upon the history of primitive Christianity than the dispute at Antioch, which speedily undid everything that the Council of Jerusalem had achieved. The discussion of the question has led to elucidations of the highest value for a knowledge of the position of parties among the early Christians. These were not, as the Tübingen School assumed, only two. They were at least four—the parties (or, as they should rather be termed, the ‘schools’) of Paul, of Peter, of James, and of the ‘false brethren.’ Thus, even from the earliest period, there were the intermediate positions between extreme parties, which, according to the Tübingen School, only arose from compromises in the second century. Primitive Christianity presents a picture far more rich in detail and in colour than that view supposes. Its critics must be prepared to take into account the finest distinctions of shade.

The critical discussion of the subject was initiated by the Tübingen school: Baur (Paulus, 1845); Schwegler (Nach-apostolische Zeitalter, 1846); Zeller (Apostelgesch. 1854). COUNSELLOR, EV twice COUNCILLOR (4, below). Frequent in EV in a general sense, without any official meaning, or, more specifically, of the king's personal adviser or advisers, for which the technical term is כֹּזֶבֶר (EV RECORDER); see GOVERNMENT, § 21.

The following terms come into consideration:—

1. יִצְחָק, as a title, applied to Ahithophel (2 S. 15:12; 1 Ch. 27:33), and Jonathan (1 Ch. 27:32; אִישׁ כְּבִין וְיֹסֵף). Why Zechariah [g.v., 5] is styled ‘wise counsellor’ (יִצְחָק) in 1 Ch. 26:14 is hard to say; the text is probably faulty. יִצְחָק may mean ‘giver of oracles’ (see context); similarly in Is. 41:28 (cp 44:26) 2 Ch. 25:16. It is otherwise used generally; cp Is. 19:11 Pr. 11:14 Job 3:14, etc. ΒΟΥΛΕΥΤΗΣ in Job 3:14 12:17; but more commonly συμβουλος. In 2 S. 8:18 ΒΑΛ incorrectly applies the term συμβουλος to BENAIAH (1), apparently reading יִצְחָק for יהוירדן; in ESL's addition to 1 K. 2:46 h) on the other hand, δ συμβουλος referring to καχουσ (HP 93, αλ(α)χουσ) υιός Ναθαν may rest upon old tradition. He can be no other than Zabud (αχουσ [L], HP 93 αχουσ) b. Nathan who is mentioned in 1 K. 4:5 as the king's friend (so MT; see ZABUD, 1). The Aram. equivalent נְטוּחִי (pl. with suff.) in Ezra 7:14 f. is used in reference to the seven counsellors of the Persian king; cp the seven princes of Media and Persia in Esth. 1:13.

2. דִּתְהָרַיָּא, dethāberayyā, pl. Dan. 3:23, the Pers. dāta-bara, law-giver, hence a judicial authority.

3. הַדְּבָרַיָּא, haddāberayyā, pl. Dan. 3:24 27 4:36 [33] 6:7 [8], an unknown Aram. official title. No doubt a compound of the Pers. bāra (cp above): the first part of the name is perhaps corrupt. The context plainly shows that the personal attendants of the king are intended. For 2 and 3, see Comm. ad loc., and cp E. Meyer, Entst. 23.

4. ΒΟΥΛΕΥΤΗΣ, 1 Mk. 15:43 Lk. 23:50, RV ‘councillor,’ applied to Joseph of Arimathea (JOSEPH, 15), see GOVERNMENT, § 31.

5. συμβουλος, used generally, Rom. 11:34 (quoting Is. 40:13). συμβουλος occurs also in the Apoc, cp Ecclus. 6:87 7 f., and 42:21 (where Heb. כְּזִבֵּר).

COURT (כְּזִבֵּר, אֵלֶּה), ‘an open enclosure, used commonly in EV with reference to the TEMPLE [g.v.] (Ex. 27:9 Ezek. 8:16 and often) also of the court of a house (2 S. 17:18), or palace (1 K. 7:8); see HOUSE, § 2. For the ‘court of the guard’ (RV, AV ‘... of the prison’), כְּזִבֵּר, Jer. 32:4, etc., see JERUSALEM.

‘Court’ in Is. 34:13 EV, 85:7 EVmg., is used indefinitely of an abode. The MT has the corrupt form כְּזִבֵּר (אֵלֶּה) in 34:13 [BAQT]. In 2 K. 20:4 the AVmg. RV ‘city’ follows the Kt.

עֵר, for which the Kr. correctly presents כְּזִבֵּר ‘court’ (of the citadel; see AV, RVmg.). Finally, ‘court’ in Am. 7:13 AV is used in a different sense, with reference to the royal ‘palace’ (cp RV).

A later designation of the temple court is חֲזָרָה (אֵלֶּה, 2 Ch. 4:9, along with כְּזִבֵּר, and 6:13; אֵלֶּה), a word of uncertain origin common in MH, not to be confused with the equally obscure חֲזָרָה, EV ‘settle,’ RVmg., better, ‘ledge,’ viz. of the altar (Ezek. 43:14-20 45:19 f.).

In NT αὐλή is applied to the sheepfold (Jn. 10:116), and the temple enclosure (Rev. 11:2). Elsewhere (in the Gospels) RV regularly reads ‘court’ for AV ‘palace’ (e.g., Mt. 26:36 Mk. 14:54 66) or ‘hall’ (Mk. 15:16 Lk. 22:55), and nowhere recognises (with Meyer, etc.) the classical usage of αὐλή, to denote a house or building.

The ‘fore-court’ (Mk. 14:68 RVmg., προαυλίον) is the first of the two (or more) courts which the larger buildings contained: see HOUSE.

COUSIN (ἀνεψιός; Col. 4:10 RV, AV ‘sister's son’), in classical Greek a ‘first cousin’ or ‘cousin’ generally; also ‘nephew,’ ‘niece.’ In Nu. 36:11 it renders בֶּן דֹּר. Tobit is called the ἀνεψιός of Raguel (Tob. 7:2; also 9:6 [N]).

In Lk. 13:658 the word (συγγενής, συγγενίς) is quite general; RV in NT rightly always ‘kinsman,’ ‘kinswoman,’ pl. ‘kinsfolk.’ In 1 Esd. 8:7 44:2 1 Macc. 11:31 (RV ‘kinsman’) it is a title given by a king to one whom he desired to honour.

COUTH, RV CUTHA (κοῦθα [A], om. BL), a family of Nethinim in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 8) 1 Esd. 5:32 [A]—unmentioned in Ezra 2:52 Neh. 7:54—whose name may possibly be connected with CUTHAH (2 K. 17:24).

COVENANT. The word בְּרִית (berith) probably occurred about 285 times in the original OT. Its

1. Terms. constant rendering in ES is διαθήκη (συνθήκη Dan. 11:6; ἐντολαί [B] or προστάγματα [A], 1 K. 11:11). Διαθήκη is used in a few instances for a kindred term. Yet it is safe to assume that in the original Hebrew texts of Ecclesiasticus, 1 Maccabees, Psalter of Solomon, Assumption of Moses, Jubilees, Judith, the Apocalypse of Ezra, and Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, בְּרִית was used at least seventy times where our versions give διαθήκη, συνθήκη, or an equivalent.

Aquila and Symmachus usually, Theodotion frequently, rendered the word συνθήκη. Both words are found in Wisdom of Solomon and 2 Maccabees. The NT writers, following the Alexandrian version, used exclusively διαθήκη, and this determined the usage in early Christian literature. The Targums translated invariably כְּתִיב; the Pesh. of the OT gives ܡܫܬܬܐ, but in Mal. 2:4 Zech. 9:11 transliterates δισθήκη, the method adopted also by the Edessene versions of the NT. In Enoch 60:6, Ethiopic maḥala probably represents διαθήκη, originally כְּתִיב.

It is significant that the Assyrio-Babylonian is the only cognate language in which the word has been found.

2. Early history of word ‘berith.’ Berith means: (1) fetter; (2) alliance, covenant; (3) firmness, solidity. Fetters were placed upon the culprit, the vanquished enemy, the representative of a conquered city or country, to hold him and to signify power over him; in chains he received his own sentence or the decree touching his home and people (Sennacherib, ii. 71; 5 R. 2, 109 etc.). A fettered rival might be put under obligations and made an ally, and such an enforced subordination might, by a simple metaphor, be designated ‘enchainment.’ This term was then extended to every alliance, even where the parties were in a position to decide upon a mutually binding decree, as in the case of Kara-indaš and Ašur-bēl-niṣišu, 2 R 65 (K. 4406). As equals did not actually lay shackles upon each other, this is evidently a figurative use of the word; and as the thought of mutual obligation cannot have been immediately suggested by the imposition of fetters, it is as clearly secondary. The royal word of judgment or assurance, particularly when strengthened by an oath, was the fetter that could not be broken. A ‘fettered’ house was one firmly built, a 'fettered' place one surrounded by solid walls, 2 R 38, 15-17 (cp birtu; fortress, fortified town, from the same root, Shalm. ob. 34, and see Del. Ass. HWB, 185).

From the Amarna correspondence we know that some time before the Hebrew invasion a Babylonian dialect

3. Primary meaning in Heb. was written, and undoubtedly also to some extent spoken, in Palestine. The Israelites may therefore have become acquainted with this term through the Amorites. In the nomadic state, the priestly oracle by the casting of lots, חור, probably sufficed. Agricultural and city life called for increased civil authority. It is possible that בְּרִית in the sense of 'binding ordinance,' 'sentence,' was adopted to supply the need of a corresponding word to designate the judicial decision of a ruler.

In the Elohist narratives the denominative בְּרַח occurs with the significance 'to appoint' (1 S. 178). The noun was still used by the author of Ecclesiasticus to denote the sentence pronounced by a judge (3833). The fact that the dominant idea attached to the word at all times was that of a binding decree is better accounted for by this Babylonian derivation than by recourse to the Arabic darā 'to sever.' It also yields a satisfactory explanation of the early appearance of בְּרִית in the sense of 'alliance,' and its occurrence with the signification of 'community,' 'nation.' On the other hand, the sometimes-observed ceremony of passing between the severed pieces of an animal in making a solemn pledge may have been an inheritance from the nomadic period. In the phrase בְּרִית בָּרֶךְ, possibly testifying to this rite, the verb throws no more light upon the noun than in the Greek ἀρκτα τέμνεω; whilst the secondary meaning of בְּרַח, 'to decree' (cp the gloss to Hag. 25), bears witness to the primary and persistent significance of בְּרִית.

The classical distinction between διαθήκη (diathēkē, will) and συνθήκη (synthēkē, agreement) was not entirely lost in Hellenistic Greek.

συνθήκη is exclusively used of a political alliance in 1 and 2 Macc. Aquila's preference for συνθήκη cannot be explained by prejudice; its use by Symmachus was evidently dictated by considerations of style; even Theodotion's conservatism did not prevent him from abandoning at times the uniform rendering of the oldest Greek version. In view of this, the deliberate choice of διαθήκη by the Alexandrian translators can scarcely have been due to anything else than a consciousness of the fundamental meaning of בְּרִית. This likewise applies to the independent rendering of the word by קִים in the Targums.

(i.) Civil.—In civil life the Hebrews seem to have employed the word to denote sentence, decree, ordinance, statute, law, pledge, testament,

4. Specialised significations. alliance, covenant, community, nation. A successful leader against the enemy was in early Israel designated a judge (שופט), because the foe was regarded as a transgressor, the victory as a judgment, and the valorous chief as the natural arbiter in internal feuds (cp GOVERNMENT, § 17). Even the king was a judge as well as a warrior, 1 K. 3:16 ff. [J], 1 S. 8:20 [E]. When this unity of the judicial and administrative functions ceased, the old term designating the decision of a ruler remained in legal phraseology. A collection of judicial decisions (מִשְׁפָּטִים) was called a bērit-book, Ex. 24:7 [E], the sentence was termed a bērit (Ecclus. 38:33). But it also continued to denote the victor's decree affecting the condition of a city that capitulates (e.g., Jabesh, 1 S. 11:1 [J]), a territory that is ceded (e.g., Ishbaal's, represented by Abner, 2 S. 3:12 ff. 21 [J]), a rival kingdom that is forced to come to terms (e.g., Benhadad's, 1 K. 20:34 [E]), or a kingdom reduced to a state of dependence (e.g., Zedekiah's, Ez. 17:13-19); and it was applied to the ordinance, statute, law, or constitution imposed by a king upon his own people, as David's (2 S. 5:3 [J]), Josiah's (2 K. 23:3), Zedekiah's (Jer. 34:8 ff.), Antiochus's (Dan. 9:27: 'he shall impose severe regulations on the many during one week'). Such a royal declaration was considered inviolable; a king would not go beyond his word in severity, nor fail to fulfil his promise. The Jabeshites regarded their lives as safe, if Nahash would solemnly declare his willingness to rule over them as his servants. Antiochus Eupator is severely censured (Is. 33:8) for himself violating the constitutional rights he had granted (1 Macc. 6:59 ff.; 2 Macc. 13:22 ff.). Thus the word assumed the meaning of 'pledge.' The captains pledged themselves to obey Jehoiada (2 K. 11:4), the nobles of Jerusalem to set their slaves free (Jer. 34:8 ff.), Zechariah and other citizens to drive away their wives (Ezra 10:3).

(ii.) Domestic.—Applied to domestic relations the bērit was at first simply 'the law of the husband' (Rom. 7:2). Since a wife was captured, bought, or given in marriage, her absolute subjection to a man's authority was properly characterised as 'enchainment.' Social development, however, without introducing the idea of equality, tended to emphasise the obligations that go with power. The husband's bērit became a solemn pledge given before witnesses (Ez. 16:8 Mal. 2:14). In this sense the word could be used also of the wife. In Prov. 2:17 בְּרִית אֱלֹהִים seems to mean 'the promise by her God'; the same pledge of faithfulness is alluded to in Ez. 16:61 ('not for the sake of thy promise'), and possibly also in 4 Esdr. 2:5. A father's decision was binding upon his children. Especially the last paternal decree, the testament, was irrevocable. Whether it was a disposition of property or a dispensation of blessings and curses, deemed effectual in antiquity, it was termed a bērit (Gal. 3:15 Heb. 9:16 f.; Test. xii. patr. passim), and had the nature of a promise.

(iii.) International.—Between nations equal in power a favour conferred or promised calls for a gift in return. To perpetuate mutually advantageous relations, pledges are exchanged. In this way political alliances may arise with mutual obligations. The best example of such a covenant is that between Solomon and Hiram (provided the Deuteronomistic note, 1 K. 5:26 [12], can be relied upon). Of this nature were probably also the agreements between Hezion and Abijah, Benhadad and Asa, and Benhadad and Baasha, referred to in 1 K. 15:19 [J]. The bērit with Assyria, Hos. 12:2 [1], was originally intended as an alliance of this kind, though Hosea had reason to complain that out of such alliances there grew only new rights, i.e., demands (10:4). Simon's league with Rome was of the same character (1 Macc. 14:24-26 40; Jos. Ant. xiii. 7:3).¹

(iv.) Fictions.—Since the relations of nations were thus frequently regulated by a bērit, it is not strange that such a basis should sometimes have been assumed without sufficient foundation. When the once peaceful Arabic neighbours began to push the Edomites out of Mount Seir, Obadiah looked upon this as a breach of covenant on the part of allies (v. 7). The simultaneous attack of several peoples on the Jewish commonwealth described in 1 Macc. 5:1 ff., seemed to the author of Ps. 83:6 to be the result of an alliance against Yahweh—i.e., Israel. If Amos 1:9 is in its right place (see AMOS, § 9 a), Tyre is charged with forgetting the 'covenant of brothers' with some other city or people, probably Phœnician; kinship is the basis of the assumption. Zech. 11:10 ff. probably describes a change in the policy of the reigning pontiff as regards the Gentiles, rather than actual alliances with neighbouring states, as the consequent internal feud suggests. It is also natural that recourse should be had to the same fiction to justify or to condemn present conditions and demands. In the Negeb, tribes of Israelitish and Idumæan extraction assured themselves of their rights, against the Philistines, to certain wells and oases, by virtue of a solemn pledge given by Abimelech of Gerar to their heros eponymus, Isaac (Gen. 26:28 [J] 21:27 ff. [E]). Similarly, the border lines between Aramæan and Israelitish territory in Gilead were regarded as fixed by an agreement between Laban and Jacob, securing also the rights of certain Aramæan enclaves on Israelitish soil (Gen. 13:44 [J]). Certain remarkable facts in the history of the Gibeonites (see GIBEON), gave rise to the story told in Josh. 9:6 ff. 15 ff. [J] 9:11 [E]—a story which shows how unobjectionable such alliances with the natives were considered in earlier times. When prophetic teaching had led to a recognition of the baneful influences upon the life of Israel of Canaanitish modes of thought and worship, the warning took the form of a prohibition of alliances projected into the period previous to the invasion (Dt. 7.2 Jud. 2.2 [Dt.] Ex. 23.32 [E] Ex. 34.12-15 [J]). Gen. 14.13, though found in a late Midrash, may reflect the memory of a long dominant Canaanitish majority in Hebron, since, with all the glorification of Abram, the three chiefs Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner are designated as בעלי דברית, 'holders of the pledge.' To legitimatise the Davidic dynasty, Jonathan was represented as having abdicated the throne in favour of David, while Saul was still alive, on condition of remaining next to the king in rank (1 S. 23.17 f. [E]). Such an action on his part was then accounted for by the story of a still earlier Yahwè-bērith of friendship (1 S. 18.3 [E₂]), referred to again in 1 S. 20.8-16 [R]. The friendship itself is sufficient to explain David's kindness to Jonathan's family; but the passage testifies to the custom of pledging friendship by an oath and a solemn ceremony.

(v.) Bērith = 'nation.'—In Dan. 11.22 בְּרִית is the title given to Onias III. This probably means prince or ruler of the nation. The בְּרִית קֹשֶׁת, Dan. 11.28-30, is the holy nation against which Antiochus Epiphanes directed his attention and his fury; and עֹבְדֵי בְּרִית קֹשֶׁת are the apostates who abandoned the holy nation and lived like the Gentiles (cp. 1 Macc. 1.15, also Judith 9.13-1 Macc. 1.63). These renegades are called בְּרִית קֹשֶׁת, Dan. 11.32; 'those that bring condemnation upon the nation,' are responsible for its misfortunes. This significance should probably also be given to the word in Ps. 74.20 (Hitz., Che.). The בְּרִית מַלְאָךְ, Mal. 3.1, may be the angelic representative of the nation. At a somewhat earlier period in some inserted passages in II. Is. (see ISAIAH, ii. § 16, Che. SBOT) בְּרִית seems already to occur in this sense. The context indicates that בְּרִית עַם, Is. 42.6-49.8, is meant to designate Israel as an independent organised community (lit. 'a commonwealth of a people').¹ Until Israel had regained its status of independence it could not rebuild the ruined cities, or restore the land to its former glory. This meaning may possibly be traced still further back; BAAL-BERITH (g.v.), as the Elohist designates the god of Shechem, may mean 'god of the community.' The word used of the city-kingdom of Shechem in the seventh century (cp. Ass. birtu, בִּרְתוּ, fortified town) may well have been applied to the ardently desired kingdom of Zion at the end of the sixth.

(vi.) Metaphorical.—Metaphorically בְּרִית is used in Job 31.1 of the law that Job has imposed upon his eyes that they shall not look upon a virgin; in 40.28 [41.4] of the pledge which Leviathan is not likely to give, that he will allow himself to be captured and become a slave; and in 5.23 of Job's agreement with the stones of the field that they shall not prevent the cultivation of his land.

No important transaction was done in antiquity without religious sanction. The oath and the curse

5. Religious sanction. were extensively used in judicial proceedings, legislative enactments, and political treaties. Before passing sentence, the judge pronounced a curse or adjuration to arouse the conscience and elicit a confession (1 K. 8.31 [D] Nu. 5.21 [P] Lev. 5.1 [P] Prov. 29.24 Mt. 26.63). A pledge or promise was made more binding by a curse (אלה, Ez. 17.16 Deut. 29.11 [12] 20 [21]). To set forth symbolically this curse, animals were cut into pieces, and the person giving the pledge passed between the severed parts, signifying his readiness to be thus destroyed himself, if he should fail to keep his promise. It is to be observed that in the only passages where this ceremony is referred to (Gen.

¹ Cp. אֶרֶץ אֲזִי 'a wild ass of a man,' i.e., a wild man, Gen. 16.12. So in the main Duhm, though his conception of בְּרִית is different. Di., Kraetzschmar (Die Bundesvorstellung, 166), and Koster explain 'a covenant with the people'—i.e., one in or through whom my covenant with the people is realised.

15 and Jer. 34.18 f.), there is no question of an alliance, and only one party passed between the pieces (cp. Dictys Cretensis, Ephemeris belli Trojani, i. 15). Whether this custom was observed also in the conclusion of treaties, as was the case in Babylonia, if Ephrem was correctly informed (Comment. to Gen. 15), is uncertain, and there seems to be no justification for connecting this rite in particular with an agreement between two parties, or for supposing בְּרִית to have been the name of a ceremony of which it was an essential part. In most instances no doubt the oath sufficed. Sometimes the right hand was given in addition (Ez. 17.18, 2 Macc. 13.22), or a handshake took the place of the oath (Ezra 10.19 Prov. 6.1 17.18 22.26). It is possible that during the oath salt was sometimes thrown into the fire to intensify by the crackling sound the terror-inspiring character of the act, originally to render more audible the voice of the deity in the fire, hence the salt-bērith (Lev. 2.13 [P] Nu. 18.19 [P] 2 Ch. 13.5). As vows were taken and agreements made at some shrine, the numen dwelling in the sacred stone or structure was the chief witness (Gen. 31.48 [J] 52 [E] Josh. 24.27 [E] 2 K. 11.4 23.3), and a sacrificial meal preceded or followed the act (Gen. 26.30 [J] 31.46 [J] Ex. 24.11 [J] 2 S. 3.20 [J]). The sprinkling of sacrificial blood upon the worshipper, a survival of the custom of sharing it with the deity, appears to have disappeared early from the cult. But it may have continued longest in the case of persons taking a solemn pledge, as is suggested by its use in the installation of priests (Ex. 29.20 [P] Lev. 8.23 [P]). This would account for the term bērith-blood (Ex. 24.8 [E]). Where an alliance was desired presents were offered by the party taking the initiative (Gen. 21.27 [E]: probably the sacrificial animals; Hos. 12.2 [1] δ).

Since a decree, pledge, or compact was thus, as a rule, ratified by some sacred rite at a sanctuary, the word בְּרִית readily assumed a religious significance, and was applied to a solemn declaration of the deity.

6. Divine 'bērith.

(i.) In J, E, and early Prophets.—In the earliest Judean narrative Yahwè gives to Abram a promise that his descendants shall possess Palestine and symbolically invokes upon himself a curse, if he shall fail to keep it (Gen. 15.18 [J]; cp. Gen. 24.7 [J]). When Moses is reluctant to leave the mountain-home of his god and pleads for an assurance that Yahwè shall go with him, a solemn promise is given him (Ex. 34.10 a [J]; add, with ⁵בְּרִית, לִי). The original context can scarcely have been anything else than a declaration that Yahwè will accompany his servant, probably in 'the messenger,' מַלְאָךְ הַיְהוָה. This promise was no doubt also referred to by the Elohist, though the importance of the ark in his narrative (cp. Nu. 10.33 f. [E]) renders it probable that Yahwè's presence was here connected with this palladium. After the subjugation of the Canaanites by the first kings of Israel the question arose as to the justice of this deed. Israel's right to the land was then established by the fiction of a promise given to the mythical ancestor. A religious problem of grave importance was how Yahwè, whose home was on Sinai, or Horeb, could manifest himself at the Palestinian sanctuaries. The solution was that he had pledged himself to go with Moses in 'the messenger.' The story of Elijah's visit to Horeb was probably written early in the eighth century; in it בְּרִית occurs in the sense of commandment (1 K. 19.14). This is also the meaning of the term in Dt. 33.9 (the Blessing of Moses), as the parallel מְרִיךְ shows, and in Josh. 7.11 [E]. Hosea uses the word to denote an injunction of Yahwè upon the beasts of the field not to harm Israel (2.20 [18]), and a commandment of Yahwè in general (8.1; possibly also 6.7). It is noticeable that this prophet, who through a sad domestic experience learned to apply the figure of a marriage to Yahwè's relation to Israel, never employs bērith in the sense of a covenant. The בְּרִית הָאֵשׁ was probably still simply the law of the husband, and the idea of a covenant with Yahwè had not yet been formed. The covenant with death, the compact with Shēōl (Is. 28¹⁵ 18), appears to be an alliance with the powers of the nether world, implying mutual stipulations. Men who preached the destruction of Israel and Yahwè's independence of the people, would not be likely to characterize the existing relation by a term current in necromancy.

(ii.) Deuteronomist.—Even the transformation of the Yahwistic and Elohist narratives of the Horeb-bērith, in the reign of Manasseh, by which the promise given to Moses became a solemnly imposed law (the Decalogue of J, Ex. 34¹⁵⁻²⁶, and that of E, Ex. 20¹⁻¹⁷), and the judicial decisions of the bēriṯh book, Ex. 20²³⁻²³ 33, became divine injunctions, does not contemplate an alliance. In the law promulgated by Josiah in 621 (not likely to be found outside of Dt. 12-26; but see DEUTERONOMY, § 5 f.) the word does not occur. But this law was designated at the outset as a bēriṯh-book (2 K. 23²²). It seems to have been intended to take the place of Ex. 20²³ f. The promise to Abraham is strongly emphasised by the Deuteronomistic writers and enlarged to one given to Isaac and Jacob as well (Dt. 43¹ 7 12 8 18 2 K. 13²³ [Dt.]; cp also Dt. 18³⁵ 6 10 18 23 7 8 8 1 etc.). At a time when Judah was in imminent danger of losing its heritage, faith took refuge in this divine assurance, manifesting Yahwè's love, and justified by the obedience of the patriarchs (Dt. 43¹ 10 15 Gen. 26⁴ f. [Dt.]). One writer of this school declares that Yahwè announced on Horeb his bēriṯh consisting of the ten words (Dt. 4 13 5 2 f.), and that this bēriṯh was written on tablets of stone (99) and placed in the ark (see ARK, § 1 f., 3, 9). Another author made the Josianic code the basis of a covenant concluded in the fields of Moab (Dt. 29 9 12 14 21 [8 11 etc.] 26 17-19; cp the later gloss 29 1 [28 69]). Here the idea of a compact between Yahwè and Israel involving mutual rights and obligations is fully developed. Yahwè pledges himself to make Israel his own people, distinct from, honoured above all others; Israel declares that it will make Yahwè its god and obey his commandments. This conception was subsequently transferred also to the Horeb-bērith; cp Judg. 2 1 f. [Dt.].

(iii.) Jeremiah and Ezekiel.—Jeremiah does not seem to have participated in this development. He used bēriṯh only to designate Josiah's law, which he regarded as having been given through Moses at the time when Yahwè brought Israel out of Egypt (11 2 f. 68 10 34 13). It is evident from the context that הַבְּרִית (11 10) indicates not the disannulment of a covenant, but the breaking of a law by disobedience, the law still remaining in force. Ezekiel, on the other hand, not only employs בְּרִית in the sense of 'law' (20 37: 'the fetter of the law,' 44 7), but also applies it for the first time to the conjugal relation of Yahwè and Israel (16 8 59 60). Marriage is here based on mutual pledges: it is a covenant. According to Ezekiel's view of history, Yahwè had entered into such an alliance with Israel in Egypt, but the people had by a long career of unfaithfulness forced its dissolution (16 59). Yet he hopes that in the future Yahwè will renew his intimate relations with Israel. There will be no covenant, however (for Israel's pledge cannot be trusted; 16 61), but a gracious dispensation of Yahwè (16 62), everlasting (37 26), and full of prosperity (34 25), ushered in by the restoration of the Davidic rule and the temple-service (37 25 26).

(iv.) Exilic times.—How ardently the next generation expected that the fallen tent of David would be raised up again, may be seen in the appendix to Amos (9 11 f.) and in the more pregnant form given to the promise 2 S. 7 16 [E.] in 2 S. 23 5 (בְּרִית עוֹלָם). Such hopes may have been awakened by the honour shown to Jehoiachin by Amil Marduk in 561, and may have attached themselves to his son SHESHBAZZAR (q.v.). They were naturally encouraged by the sympathetic tone of Deutero-Isaiah's message (Is. 40-48), even though this writer himself knows no other Messiah than Cyrus. With the freer intercourse between the holy city and the Jews of the dispersion, possible after the Persian conquest (cp Zech. 6 10), and the appointment of Sheshbazzar, and after him of Zerubbabel, as governor, the Second Isaiah's evangel was brought to Palestine and changed the comfortless lamentations of the native population (Lam. 3) into songs of redemptive suffering (Is. 42 1-4 49 1-6 50 4-9 52 13-53 12), or of future restoration (the Zion songs in Is. 49-55). It was felt that by the accession of a king of the old dynasty, a living witness would appear of Yahwè's faithfulness to David (Is. 55 4 a), a restorer of the territory once possessed (Is. 55 4 b Mic. 4 8 13 5 1), a surety of the promised dispensation of everlasting peace (Is. 54 10 55 3), and that Zion would thus become again an organised community (בְּרִית עַם), able to build up what had fallen into ruins, to attract the exiles to their spiritual home, and to teach the nations the manner in which Yahwè should be worshipped (Is. 42 6 49 8).

(v.) Haggai, Zechariah, etc.—The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah bear witness to the strength of the royalist sentiment at Jerusalem. The hopes of the Jews proved illusory; but in the midst of disappointment the belief in Yahwè's promises lived on. 'Malachi' felt assured that Yahwè would return, and accounted for his delay by the sins of the degenerate priestly descendants of the faithful and reverent Levi, to whom Yahwè's promise (בְּרִית) of life and prosperity was given (2 1-9), and of those who, fascinated by foreign women, had forgotten the pledge (בְּרִית) given to the wives of their youth (2 14). The author or authors of Is. 56-66 also deplored the marriages with aliens and the survival of forbidden forms of worship, but saw the remedy in the law: the keeping of Yahwè's commandments (בְּרִית) would render the very eunuch fit for membership in Israel (56 4); the distinction of Israel lay in that gracious arrangement (בְּרִית) by which Yahwè's law, proclaimed by men of the spirit and repeated by a mindful people, would be its perpetual possession (59 21), a divine dispensation involving prosperity as a reward of obedience (61 8). The author of Jer. 30 f., however, rises to a far greater height. He looks forward to a new regime based solely on Yahwè's love, which will take the place of the old and less permanent relation (Jer. 31 31 f.). This work may perhaps be assigned to the time of the Græco-Persian war, when the writer confidently looked for extraordinary proofs of Yahwè's pardoning grace (see JEREMIAH, ii. § 7 [iii.] 8 [ii.]).

(vi.) P.—The conception of the bēriṯh as a gracious act on the part of God, by which he binds himself to a certain course of action in reference to Israel and the world, implying the bestowal of blessings and the revelation of his will, becomes dominant in the Priestly Code. The bēriṯh or engagement is here carried back to Abraham and Noah. Beside the Noah-bērith (Gen. 9 1-17) there is no room for an Adam-bērith; beside the Abrahamic (Gen. 17; cp Ex. 2 24 6 4), no need of a Sinaitic. The Noah-bērith secures the stability of earth's conditions and of man's life, and the accompanying law of blood is but a beneficent provision for the preservation of the race; the Abrahamic guarantees to Israel the land of Palestine and a large population, and the command of circumcision implies only a distinction conferred upon this people from which all further favours flow. The sign in the sky and the sign in the body are constant reminders to the deity of these merciful engagements. By the use of 'הָקִים ב' ('establish,' occasionally 'maintain') instead of 'בְּרִית the nature of the bēriṯh as a gift, a divine institution, is emphasised. Though the word has thus become a religious terminus technicus in this code, it still occurs with the sense simply of commandment, Ex. 31 16 (the law of the sabbath), Lev. 24 8 (the ordinance of the shew-bread), Lev. 2 13 (the injunction concerning salt), or of promise, Nu. 25 12 f. (the assurance to Phinehas of an everlasting priesthood in his line).

(vii.) Later writers.—The author of Jer. 50 f. (see JEREMIAH, ii. §§ 7, 8 [iii.]) refers to the Abrahamic dispensation in the spirit of the Priestly Writer (see that vividly expressed passage on the return of the men of Israel and Judah, Jer. 50:5);¹ and Jer. 14:21 reflects the same conception. Ps. 89:29 105:8 106:45 111:5 also show the influence of this idea.

On the other hand, in Ps. 25:10 14 132:12, בְּרִית is only a synonym of עֲקִידָה, and in 44:18 50:16 78:10 of תּוֹרָה. In Ps. 50:5, בְּרִיתִי עָלַי וְנָח, 'those who pledge their troth to me by sacrifice,' are graciously told that Yahwè will not demand excessive offerings,² and in 78:10 the men of the Mosaic period are charged with not being faithful to the pledge given to Yahwè. Besides the Abrahamic dispensation (1 Ch. 16:15 2 Ch. 6:14 Neh. 1:5 9:8 32), the Chronicler particularly emphasises the engagement made with David (2 Ch. 13:5 21:7), but also uses בְּרִית of a pledge in general (2 Ch. 29:10 34:32 Neh. 13:29). The Prayer of Jeremiah (Jer. 32:16-44) is quite after the fashion of the Chronicler; in 32:40 the author has in mind 31:33, but interprets the בְּרִית vaguely as a promise that Yahwè will not cease to show mercy to Israel.

The author of Ecclesiasticus (circa 200) introduces for the first time an Adam-bērith as an everlasting dispensation (17:12), is led by his biographical interest to mention severally the divine promises to Noah (44:18), Abraham (v. 19 f.), Isaac (v. 22), Jacob (v. 23), Aaron (45:7 15), Phinehas (v. 23 f.), and David (v. 25 47:11), and employs the term in the sense of law (24:23 45:5), and of covenant (14:12, based on Is. 28:15, but understood figuratively; cp Wisd. 1:16). The thought of Ecclus. 45:15 (ἐν ἡμέραις σὺν πατρὶ, בְּיָמֵי שְׂמִי) 25, is further developed in Jer. 33:14-26 (wanting in ^QBNA, but translated by Theodot.; see JEREMIAH, § 11); the divine arrangements as respects the house of Levi and the house of David are as inviolable as the divine arrangements in nature, the laws of day and night, of heaven and earth. Deutero-Zechariah (Zech. 9:14—after 198 B.C.; see ZECHARIAH, ii. § 5) promises deliverance to the Jews of the dispersion on the ground of the faithful observance of the sacrificial cult at the sanctuary by which Israel continually pledges its troth to Yahwè (בְּרִיתִי בְּיָמֵי, 'because of thy pledge-blood'; 9:11; cp Ps. 50:5). Dan. 9:4 (164 B.C.) refers to God's merciful promise to bless his people. The בְּרִית עוֹלָם, Is. 24:5 (c. 128 B.C.) is most naturally understood in the light of Ecclus. 17:12, where the Adam-bērith also involves the revelation of God's laws and judgments. In 1 Macc. 2:50 בְּרִית אֲבוֹתֵינוּ may be a designation of the holy nation, the theocracy, whilst 4:10 probably refers to the promise to the patriarchs, as 2:54 does to that to Phinehas. In Ps. Sol. 10:5, the law appears as a testimony of the eternal dispensation established with the Fathers (9:19). The author of Jubilees quotes (6:16) from Gen. 9:12 f. and (15:19) from Gen. 17:7, but in his independent use of the term shows no trace of the conception prevailing in the Priestly Code. He introduces the Noah-bērith as a pledge given by the patriarch (the original seems to have read "בְּרִית עוֹלָם לְפָנַי", בְּרִית עוֹלָם לְפָנַי, which is renewed by the people every year through observance of the feast of weeks (6:17), and the Sinai-bērith as a pledge which Moses takes from the people (6:11); he employs the word as a synonym of 'law,' 'statute' (1:10 15:34 24:11 30:21), and possibly uses it also in the sense of 'theocracy' (6:35), where the feasts of the Jewish community are contrasted with those of the Gentiles. 'Arbiter testamenti illius' (τῆς διαθήκης αὐτοῦ μεσότης), Assumption of Moses [Charles] 1:14, seems to be a translation of בְּרִיתוֹ (cp Job 9:33), and represents Moses, not as a third party effecting an agreement between God and his people, but as the preacher proclaiming his law (cp Amos 5:10 Prov. 25:12 etc.). This is to be inferred already from the suffix —it is God's בְּרִית—and it is distinctly stated in 3:11; 'the commandments in respect of which he was to us a mediator'—z.e., which he was the means of revealing to us (cp 2:7). The Abraham-bērith is mentioned in 1:2 3:10 4:12 f. Enoch 60:6 is a fragment of a lost Apocalypse of Noah; it presents the Noah-bērith as the all-sufficient blessing of the elect.

(i.) Gospels.—Lk. 1:72, which refers to God's promise to Abraham, would seem to have belonged originally to a Jewish Apocalypse of Zechariah current among the Baptist's disciples. Jesus himself does not seem to have used the term in any sense. The thought of a new dispensation, so attractive to his disciples, may not have been foreign to his own mind. If it is not found even where it might most naturally be expected, as in Mt. 21:43, the reason may be that his favourite expression, the kingdom of God, was intended to convey a similar idea. His words at the paschal table have evidently undergone successive modifications and expansions; and it is difficult not to trace Pauline influences. At any rate the declaration, 'This is the new διαθήκη in my blood' (1 Cor. 11:25 Lk. 22:20), seems to be an expansion of the earlier, 'This is my blood of the διαθήκη' (Mt. 26:28 Mk. 14:24). It is not inconceivable that Jesus actually said הָרִין דָּם קִימִי, meaning thereby 'This is the blood in which I pledge my loyalty' (cp Ps. 50:5 Zech. 9:11). But the Greek translation suggests an Aram. מְרִין דְּכִי קִימִי, in which the last word is likely to be an explanatory addition by a later hand, the original utterance being simply 'This (is) my blood.'

(ii.) Paul.—In Gal. 3:15 f. Paul compares God's assurance to Abraham with a man's testament (διαθήκη), which cannot lose its validity by any arrangement subsequent to his death, and in addition seeks a proof of the inferiority of the law in the fact that it was given not directly by God himself, but through angels and a human agent (μεσότης, used as in Assump. Mos. 1:14 3:12). In 4:24 he contrasts the present Jewish commonwealth (ἡ νῦν Ἰερουσαλὴμ), deriving its existence as a theocracy (διαθήκη) from the legislation on Sinai with the heavenly society (ἡ ἄνω Ἰερουσαλὴμ) from which by spirit-birth the new theocracy derives its life (cp Heb. 12:22). The new form of government (διαθήκη), according to Paul, was possible only through the death of Jesus abolishing the authority of the Law (hence the change to ἐν τῷ ἐμφ' αἵματι, 'through my blood,' 1 Cor. 11:25), and, as opposed to the maintenance of social order by enforced obedience to external statutes, consisted in a free, love-prompted surrender of life to the divine spirit's guidance (2 Cor. 3:6). The idea of a special arrangement (διαθήκη), still in the future, by which all Israel is to be saved (Rom. 11:26 f.), does not introduce a foreign element into Paul's conception of the spiritual theocracy (for it implies only deliverance from sin), but is a concession to particularism, out of harmony with his general attitude, and due to his patriotic feelings (Rom. 9 f.). Paul also uses the word as a designation of the OT (2 Cor. 3:14).

(iii.) Other writers.—In the epistle to the Hebrews, the Abrahamic dispensation yields to that of Melchizedek. Abraham is introduced only as an example of patient reliance upon God's promises (6:15), and as a representative of a priestly order inferior to that of Melchizedek (7:4 f.); Jer. 31:31 f. is recognised as a description of the often promised new constitution (διαθήκη 8:8 f. 10:16); but it is argued that, as a man's testament (διαθήκη) is not valid until after his death (9:16 f.), and as consequently the Mosaic constitution possessed no validity until a death had taken place (that of the sacrificial animal), so the better Christian dispensation could not but be ushered in except by the death of Jesus (9:15 18 f.); this departure of Jesus is, besides, regarded as necessary in order that he might be a priest—as he could not be on earth (713 f.)—in the celestial temple (620 911), and as such bear the responsibility for the new arrangement (ἐγγυος 722), and on God's behalf make it operative (μεσίτης 86 915 1224) by sprinkling the blood on men's consciences, thus pledging and devoting them to the new priestly service (1019, cp Ex. 2920 [P] Lev. 823 [P]). The 'ark of the law' (διαθήκη) is mentioned in Heb. 94 (cp Rev. 1119). In Eph. 212 the one great promise is considered as renewed by a series of solemn assurances (αὐ διαθήκαι τῆς ἐπαγγελίας). Peter's contemporaries are represented in Acts 325 as 'sons'—i.e., heirs, who might enter into possession of the promise (διαθήκη) to Abraham, whilst in 78 the word διαθήκη is used to designate the ordinance of circumcision.¹

CRANE (עֶגְרוֹ; στρουθία [BNAQ]), Is. 3814 Jer. 87† RV, AV by an error [see below] 'swallow.' In Is. 3814 there is no 'or' between the first two names in MT, and Θε^{BAQ} omits 'āgūr altogether, rendering the other word (סוּם) correctly χελιδών (see SWALLOW, 2); in the second passage where in MT the same two words occur (Jer. 87) the connective particle is again omitted, this time by Θε. Hence it has been suggested that in neither place should both words occur (Klostermann, Duhn, etc., omit עֶגְרוֹ in Is.); this receives some countenance from the fact that the MT order of the words is reversed in Targ. and Pesh. in Jer. 87. The transposition misled most Jewish authorities as to the real meaning of the two words respectively, and our translators followed them. That סוּם (or rather סוּם: see SWALLOW, 2) means 'swallow' or 'swift' there can be no doubt, and so the words 'crane' and 'swallow' should at least change places (as in RV).

What 'āgūr means is somewhat uncertain: ² probably Grus communis or cineria, which is the crane of Palestine. Once it bred in England. The passage in Isaiah refers to its 'chattering'; ³ and its powers of

Cranes are migratory birds, spending the summer in N. latitudes and the winter as a rule in Central Africa and S. Asia; but some pass the cold season in the plains of S. Judaea. While travelling they fly in great flocks, and at times come to rest on the borders of some stream or lake. They appear to have fixed roosting-places, to which they return at night in large numbers. Jeremiah notices the regularity of their seasonal migrations.

CREATION. 1. *Accounts*¹ of Creation.—It may be regarded as an axiom of modern study that the descriptions of creation contained in the biblical records, and especially in Gen. 1-24a,² are permanently valuable only in so far as they express certain religious truths which are still recognised as such (see below, § 25). To seek for even a kernel of historical fact in such cosmogonies is inconsistent with a scientific point of view. We can no longer state the critical problem thus: How can the biblical cosmogony be reconciled with the results of natural science? The question to be answered is rather this: From what source have the cosmogonic ideas expressed in the OT been derived? Are they ideas which belonged to the Hebrews from the first, or were they borrowed by the Hebrews from another people?

This question has passed into a new phase since the most complete form of the Creation-story of the Babylonians has become known to us in its cuneiform original. True, the story given in the tablets lies before us in a very fragmentary condition. The exact number of tablets is uncertain. Considerable lacunae, however, have been recently filled up by the discovery of missing passages, and there is good hope that further excavations will one day enable us to complete the entire record. At any rate we are now able to arrange all the extant fragments in their right order—which was not the case a few years ago—and so to recover at least the main features of the connection of the cuneiform narrative. Only a brief sketch of the contents can be given here.³

2. Babylonian epic. The 'Creation-epic' begins by telling us that in the beginning, before heaven and earth were made, there was only the primeval ocean-flood. This is personified as a male and a female being (Apsū and Tiāmat).

⁴ [Ass. Mummu Tiāmat. In line 17 of this first tablet we meet (most probably) with a god called Mummu. The name corresponds to the Μωμύς of Damascius (see below, § 15, end), and is rendered by Frd. Del. in 1.4, 'the roaring.' This is by no means certainly right; for the grounds see Del. 119. Pinches renders, Lady Tiāmat (Exp. Times, 3 166). But Jensen warns us that there is another mummu. At any rate, the supposed connection with 𐎢𐎠𐎶 must be abandoned.]

long since, when of the gods | not one had arisen,
when no name had been named, | no lot [been determined],
then were made | the gods, [. . .].

Thus the world of gods came into being. Its harmony, however, was not long maintained. Tīāmat, the mother of the gods, was discontented with things as they were, and from hatred (it would seem) to the newly produced Light, rebelled against the supreme gods, and drew some of the gods to her side. She also for her own behoof produced monstrous beings to help her in her fight. This falling away of Tīāmat called for divine vengeance. To reply to the call, however, required a courage which none of the upper gods possessed, till at last Marduk (Merodach) offered himself, on condition that, after he had conquered Tīāmat, the regal sway over heaven and earth should be his. In a solemn divine assembly this was assured to him. He then equipped himself for the fight, and rode on the war-chariot to meet Tīāmat and her crew. The victory fell to Marduk, who slew Tīāmat, and threw her abettors into chains.

This is followed by the account of the creation of the world by Marduk. The process is imagined thus. Marduk cuts in two the carcase of Tīāmat¹ (the personified ocean-flood), and out of the one part produces heaven, out of the other earth.²

He smote her as a . . . | into two parts;
one half he took, | he made it heaven's arch,
pushed bars before it, | stationed watchmen,
not to let out its waters | he gave them as a charge.

Thus the upper waters of Tīāmat, held back by bars, form heaven, just as in Gen. 1 the first step to the creation of heaven and earth consists in the separation of the upper from the lower waters by the firmament. Then follows a detailed description of the making of the heavenly bodies ('stations for the great gods').

After this most unfortunately comes a great lacuna. We can venture, however, to state so much as this—that the missing passage must have related the creation of the dry land, of plants, of animals, and of men. In support of this we can appeal (1) to separate small fragments, (2) to the account of Bērōssus, (3) to the recapitulation of the separate creative acts of Marduk in a hymn to that god at the close of the epic, and (4) to the description of the creative activity of Marduk in a second cuneiform recension of the Creation-story lately discovered (on the various Babylonian Creation-stories, see also below, § 13 ff.).

What then is the relation between this Babylonian and the chief biblical cosmogony? We have no right to assume without investigation that

3. Relation to the Hebrew myth of Creation appears in its original form in Gen. 1:1-2:4a. The present writer is entirely at one with Hermann Gunkel, whose work entitled *Schöpfung u. Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit*³ ('95) contains the fullest collection of the relevant evidence, that this myth has passed through a long development within the domain of Hebraism prior to the composition of Gen. 1:1-2:4a. Only with a clear perception of this does critical method allow us to compare the latter document directly with the Babylonian Creation-epic. Then, however, our surprise is all the greater that in spite of the preceding development there is still in the main points, a far-reaching coincidence between the myths. For instance, both stories place water and darkness alone at the beginning of things, and personify the primæval flood by the same name (Tīāmat = Tēhōm). In both the appearance of light forms the beginning of the new order. Whether the production of light in

² [Possibly the head of Tīāmat is referred to at a later point of the story by Bērōssus. See below, § 15.]

³ The sub-title of this work, which will be referred to again, is 'Eine religionsgeschichtliche Untersuchung über Gen. i. und Ap. Joh. xii. Mit Beiträgen von Heinrich Zimmern.'

CREATION

the Babylonian account was specified as a separate creative act or not (a point on which complete certainty cannot as yet be obtained), Marduk is at any rate the god of light κατ' ἐξοχήν, and, consequently, his battle with Tīāmat is essentially a battle between light and darkness. In both accounts the creation of heaven is effected through the divine creator's division of the waters of the primæval flood, so that the upper waters form the heaven. In the Babylonian epic this division of the waters of the flood is in the closest relation to the battle with Tīāmat; nor can we doubt that a parallel description once existed in the Hebrew myth of creation, though it is but faintly echoed in Gen. 1:6 f. The list of the several creative acts runs thus in the two accounts:—

BABYLONIAN.	GEN. 1, IN PRESENT ORDER. ¹
1. Heaven.	1. Heaven.
2. Heavenly bodies.	2. Earth.
3. Earth.	3. Plants.
4. Plants.	4. Heavenly bodies.
5. Animals.	5. Animals.
6. Men.	6. Men.

There is much, however, to be said for the view that the present position of the heavenly bodies after the plants is secondary,² and that originally the creation of the heavenly bodies was related directly after that of heaven; the order will then be the same in both accounts. Further coincidences can be traced in points of detail: e.g., the stress laid, in both accounts of the creation of the heavenly bodies, on their being destined to serve for the division of time (see also below, § 6). Can we doubt that, between accounts which have so many coincidences, there is a real historical connection?

We must now inquire how this connection is to be represented. There are two ways which are historically conceivable. Either the

4. Distinctively Babylonian background.

Hebrew and the Babylonian accounts are independent developments of a primitive Semitic myth, or the Hebrew is borrowed directly or indirectly from the Babylonian. Dillmann proposes the former view in connection with a remark that the Hebrew story cannot have been simply borrowed from the Babylonians on account of the patent differences between the two narratives. 'There is no doubt a common basis; but this basis comes from very early times, and its data have been developed and turned to account in different ways by the Israelites and the Babylonians.'³ In reply we may concede to Dillmann that the cosmogony in Gen. 1 cannot have been simply taken over from the Babylonians, and that there are strong a priori reasons for admitting the existence of a common stock of primitive Semitic myths. Still, that the Hebrew myth, which is still visible in Gen. 1, was borrowed at a later time from the Babylonians, is the only theory which accounts for the phenomena before us. There are features of the utmost importance to the story which cannot be satisfactorily explained except from the Babylonian point of view.

At the very outset, for instance, why, from a specifically Hebrew point of view, should the waters of the tēhōm be placed at the beginning of all things? Or we may put our objection to Di.'s theory thus, the question to be answered by a cosmogony is this, 'How did the visible heaven and earth first come into existence?' The answer given in Gen. 1 is unintelligible in the mouth of an early Israelite, for it implies a mental picture which is characteristically Babylonian. As the world still arises anew every year and every day, so, thought the Babylonian, must it originally have been produced. During the long winter the Babylonian plain looks like the sea (which in Babylonian is tīāntu, tīāmat), owing to the heavy rains. Then comes the spring, when the god of the vernal sun (Marduk) brings forth the land anew, and by his potent rays divides the waters of

² See Gunkel, Schöpfung 14; 'this unnatural arrangement may be explained by supposing that when the framework of the seven days was introduced, the plants, for which no special day remained, were combined with the earth, and so came to stand before the stars.'

Tiāmat which previously, as it were, formed a whole, and sends them partly upward as clouds, partly downward to the rivers and canals. So must it have been in the first spring, at the first New Year, when, after a fight between Marduk and Tiāmat, the organised world came into being.¹ Or (for Marduk is also the god of the early morning sun), just as the sun crosses and conquers the cosmic sea (Tiāmat) every morning, and out of the chaos of night causes to appear first the heaven and then the earth, so must heaven and earth have arisen for the first time on the first morning of creation. To imagine a similar origin of the myth from a Hebrew point of view, would be hopeless. The picture requires as its scene an alluvial land, which Babylonia is, and Palestine or the Syro-Arabian desert is not, and it requires further a special god of the spring sun, or of the early morning sun, such as Marduk is and Yahwē is not.²

In short, rightly to understand the Babylonian account as, in its origin, a mythic description of one of the most familiar natural phenomena of Babylonia gives the key to the problem before us. The Israelitish cosmogony must have been borrowed directly or indirectly from the Babylonian (cp also §§ 5 and 11). H. Z.

The preceding sections contain (1) an account of the great Babylonian creation epic (§ 2), (2) a comparison of this with the chief Hebrew cosmogony, and a criticism of Dillmann's theory (§ 3), and (3) an explanation of the Babylonian myth and of its pale Jewish copy (§ 4). Of these § 3 and § 4 relate to subjects on which it is not unbecoming for the present writer to speak.³ That there is more than one Hebrew cosmogony, will be shown presently; we will begin with that in Gen. 1:1-2:4a. It is a very unfortunate statement of Wellhausen⁴ that the only detail in this section derived from mythology is that of chaos in v. 2, the rest being, he thinks, due to reflection and systematic construction. Reflection, no doubt, is not absent—e.g., the framework of days is certainly late—but the basis of the story is mythical. Nor can we content ourselves with comparing the data of Gen. 1 with any single mythology, such as the Babylonian. Circumstanced as the Israelites were, we must allow for the possibility of Phœnician, Egyptian, and Persian, as well as Babylonian influences, and we must not refuse to take a passing glance at cosmogonies of less civilised peoples. For some elements in the Jewish Creation-story are so primitive that we can best understand them from the wide point of view of an anthropologist.

The Babylonian parallelisms may be summed up briefly (cp above, § 3). The points of contact are—(1)

6. Parallelisms: (1) the primæval flood (𒂍𒀭=Tiāmat), (2) the primæval light (Marduk was a god of light before the luminaries were created), (3) the production of heaven by the division of the primæval flood, (4) the appointment of the heavenly bodies to regulate times and seasons, (5) the order of the creative acts (the parallelism, however, in the present form of Gen. 1 is imperfect), (6) the divine admonitions addressed to men after their creation.⁵ To these may be added (7) creation by a word (see below, § 27), an idea which was doubtless prominent in the full Baby-

The view of the history of mythological ideas among the Israelites is that which the writer has advocated in a series of works (some of them are referred to later), and which, with a much fuller array of facts, but with some questionable critical statements, has been put forward lately by Gunkel (95). lonian epic, and (8) the creation of man in the divine image, and the participation of inferior divine beings in the work.¹

Phœnician mythology is an embarrassing combination of Babylonian and Egyptian (possibly we should add

7. Phœnician. Jewish² elements, and is, moreover, known to us only from fragments of older works cited by Philo of Byblus and Damascius.³ Still, distorted and discoloured as the myths presented to us may be, the main features of them have a very primitive appearance. The source of all things is described in the first of Philo's cosmogonies⁴ as a chaos turbid and black as Erebus, which was acted upon by a wind (the 𐤍𐤏 of Gen. 1:2 [cp below, col. 944, n. 2]) which became enamoured⁵ of its own elements (ἀρχαί). These ἀρχαί are the two sides or aspects of the divine being referred to⁶—the male and female principle, the latter of which in another of the Byblian cosmogonies (Müller, op. cit. iii. 500 f.) is called Baau. We may perhaps compare this Baau with Böhū⁷ in the Hebrew phrase tōhu wā-bōhu (wasteness and wideness=chaos) in Gen. 1:2. Some would also connect it with the Babylonian Ba'u, the 'great mother.' True, this goddess was held to be the consort of Ninib, the god of the rising sun, whereas Baau is the spouse of ἀνεμος κοιλίας and her name is said to mean 'night' (=chaos?). The connection of Ba'u with Ninib, however, may perhaps be of later origin. The result of the union of the two divine ἀρχαί was the birth of Μωτ—i.e., according to Halévy,⁸ τὸ Μωτ=חַמָּה (cp Prov. 8:24, חַמָּה וְיָמִין). Μωτ, we are told, was egg-shaped. Here one may detect Egyptian influence, for Egyptian mythology knows of a world-egg, which emerged out of the watery mass (the god Nun). This is confirmed by a reference in the cosmogony of Mochus (in Damascius, 385) to Χουσωρ 'the opener,' whom it is tempting to connect with Ptaḥ, the divine demiurge of Memphis; the name of Ptaḥ may have been explained in Phœnician as the 'opener (𐤍𐤏),' viz. of the cosmic egg. To the same cosmogony (Philo gives a different account) we owe the statement that this Χουσωρ split the egg in two,⁹ upon which one of the pieces became

² Considering the late date of the reporter, we cannot exclude this possibility.

⁶ De Vogüé, Mélanges, 60 f.

⁷ Holzinger (note on Gen. 1:2) objects to the combination of Baau and Böhū, that Baau appears as the mother of the two first men, which will not suit Böhū; but the Byblian mythologist is in error, as WRS (Burnett Lectures [MS]) has pointed out. Αἰών is not properly a 'mortal man,' and ἡρωτόγονος is a late invention based upon a wrong theory; here as elsewhere the dualism is artificial. Αἰών is identical with the Οἰάωμος of Mochus, the χρόνος of Eudemus—i.e., עוֹלָם 'the world' (see Eccl. 8:11). The connection with Bab. Ba'u is more doubtful. Cp Jensen, Kosmol. 245; Hommel, Die sem. Völker, i. 379 f., AHT, 66, GBA, 255; Haupt, Beitr. zur Assyriol. i. 181; and see KB, 8a 21. Whether Tōhu (תְּהוֹ) also was from the first a mythic word, is uncertain. The combination of tōhu and bōhu may be artificial; cp Jabel, Jubal, Tubal (Gen. 4:20-22), שִׁמְעֵה וְיָבֵל וְיֹבֵל (Job 30:3), שִׁמְעֵה וְיָבֵל (Ezek. 6:14).

⁸ Mél. 387; WRS in Burnett Lectures agrees.

⁹ Elsewhere Χουσωρ and his brother are said to have discovered the use of iron, like the Hebrew Tubal-Cain, himself probably a divine demiurge (see CAINITES, § 10). WRS (Burnett Lectures) suggests that he may have invented iron to cut open the cosmic egg (cp the arming of Marduk in the Creation-epic, Tab. iv.). This is clearly correct. Κρόνος in Philo's theogony makes ἀρχή and δένον to fight against Οὐρανός. Originally, however, the weapon of the demiurge was the lightning; see Jensen, Kosmol. 333.

heaven, and the other earth. Here we have a point of contact with the Babylonian and also with the Hebrew cosmogony, for the body of Tīāmat is, in fact, as Robertson Smith in his Burnett Lectures¹ remarks, 'the matrix or envelope of the dark seething waters of primæval chaos,' and the separation of the lower from the upper waters in Gen. 1.7 is only a less picturesque form of the same mythic statement. These are 'poor and beggarly elements,' no doubt; but then Phœnicia lacked what Babylonia possessed, a poet who could select, and to some extent moralise, such parts of the tradition as were best worth preserving. We shall see later (§ 28) that Judæa had a writer who in some important respects excelled even the author of the epic.

Egyptian mythology, which had perhaps an original kinship to the Babylonian² cannot be passed over, when

8. Egyptian. we consider the close relations which long existed between Egypt and Canaan. The common Egyptian belief was that for many ages the latent germs of things had slept in the bosom of the dark flood (personified as Nut or Nūit and Nun). How these germs were drawn forth and developed was a story told differently in the different nomes or districts.

At Elephantinē, for instance, the demiurge was called Hnumu; he was the potter who moulded his creatures out of the mud of the Nile (which was the earthly image of Nun); or, it was also said, who modelled the world-egg. His counterpart at Memphis, the artizan god Ptah, gave to the light-god, and to his body, the artistically perfect form. At Hermopolis it was Thoth who made the world, speaking it into existence. 'That which flows from his mouth,' it is said, 'happens, and what he speaks, comes into being.' In the east of the Delta, a more complicated account was given. Earth and sky were originally two lovers lost in the primæval waters, the god lying under the goddess. 'On the day of creation a new god, Shu, slipped between the two, and seizing Nūit with both hands, lifted her above his head with outstretched arms.' Thus, among other less striking parallelisms, we have in Egypt, as well as in Babylonia and in Palestine, the primæval flood, the forcible separation of heaven and earth, and creation by a word, as elements in the conceptions of creation.³

The subject of Iranian parallelisms has been treated at great length by Lagarde,⁴ who argues for the depend-

9. Iranian. ence of the Priestly Writer as regards the order of the works and days, on a Persian system, against which, however, in the very act of borrowing from it, this writer protests. It is not probable, however, that the indebtedness of the Jews to Persia began so early; it is not before the latter part of the Persian rule that the direct influence of Persian beliefs (themselves largely influenced by Babylonian) begins to be clearly traceable in Judaism. If we could venture to identify the ARTAXERXES (q.v.) of Ezra with Artaxerxes II., it would be easier to adopt Lagarde's view. In the present stage of critical inquiry, however, this course does not appear to be advisable. Nor is it at all certain that the Iranian belief in the creation of the world in six periods goes back so far as to the time of Artaxerxes II. It is referred to only in the late book called Bundeish, and in one or two passages of the Yasna (192.48) and the Vispered (74), which, on philological grounds, are regarded as comparatively late. Caland, indeed, has endeavoured to show⁵ that in the Yasht of the Fravashis (or protective spirits) a poetical reference is made to the creative works of Ahura Mazda, in the order in which these are given in the Bundeish.⁶ But what object can we have in tracing the Hebrew account to the Iranian, when we have, close at hand, the Babylonian story, from which the Iranian is plainly derived? The reference, or at least allusion, to chaos in Gen. 1.2 is at any rate not Iranian; why should the other features in the narrative be? It would no doubt be possible to give the epithet 'Iranian' to the ascription of ideal perfection to the newly created world in the Hebrew cosmogony. But it is by no means necessary to do so. Such idealisation would be naturally suggested by the thought that the evil now so prominent in the world cannot have lain within the purpose of the divine creator.¹ Besides, Jewish thinkers would inevitably be repelled by Zoroastrian dualism. The existence of the two primæval antagonistic spirits is not indeed alluded to in the rock-cut inscriptions of Darius and Xerxes; but the best scholars agree that it formed part of the old Zoroastrian creed; it is indeed expressly recognised in the Gāthās (Yasna xxx.). Ahura Mazda, the 'much-knowing Lord,' assisted by the six Amshaspands, is the creator of all the good things in the world. He is opposed, however, by Angra Mainyu, to whom the material and moral possession of the world is ascribed. All that we can venture to suppose, is a possible indirect influence of the high Zoroastrian conception of Ahura Mazda on the conception of Yahwē formed by the Babylonian Jews. The details of the Jewish Creation-story arose independently of Persia.

Points of contact with more primitive mythologies also are numerous. Abundant material will be found in 10. More primitive mythologies.

Sir George Grey's Polynesian Mythology, and vol. vi. of Waitz and Gerland's Anthropologie der Naturvölker. That dry land and animate life, but not matter, had a beginning, and that, before the present order of things, water held all things in solution, are opinions common among primitive races, and one of the most widely spread mythic symbols is the egg. The expression in Gen. 1.2, 'and the breath of Elohim was brooding² (רָחַץ) over the surface of the waters,' has its best illustration (in the absence of the mythic original which probably represented the deity as a bird) in the common Polynesian representation of Tangaloa, the god of heaven, and of the atmosphere, as a bird which hovered over the ocean-waters, till, as it is sometimes said, he laid an egg³ (the world-egg). This egg is the world-egg, and we may suppose that 'in the earliest form of the [Hebrew] narrative it may have been said "the bird of Elohim"; "wind" appears to be an interpretation.'⁴ The forcible separation of heaven and earth (Gen. 1.7-10) is illustrated, not only by the interesting Egyptian myth mentioned above (§ 8), but also by the delightful Maori story told by Sir George Grey, and illustrated by Lang in a not less delightful essay (Custom and Myth, 45 ff.). The anecdotal character of myths like these adds to their charm. It is only in the last stage of a religion that cosmogonies are systematised,—

Greek endings, each the little passing-bell
That signifies some faith's about to die, though the death-struggle may be prolonged, and may issue in a higher life.

We have thus seen that the Creation-story in Gen. 1-11

¹ Gunkel less naturally thinks that in the formula, 'And God saw that it was good,' there is an implied contrast to the evil state called tōhū-bōhū (chaos).

⁴ EB art. 'Cosmogony,' 1877. In 1895 the same idea occurred to Gunkel (Schöpfung, 8). It is of course not a storm-bird that is meant; storm-birds are not uncommon: see, e.g., the Babylonian myth of Adapa, in which the south wind is represented as having wings, and cp Ps. 18.10 [11]. See WINDS.

CREATION

24a is not, as Wellhausen represents (above, § 5), merely the product of reflection. It has a considerably mythic substratum. That substratum is mainly Babylonian; but Egyptian and even Persian influence is not excluded. Indeed, for that singular passage Gen. 1, Egyptian influence, either direct or more probably (through Phœnician or Canaanitish mythology) indirect, seems to be suggested. We are thus brought face to face with a new problem. How is it that the Priestly Writer, with his purified theology, and his comparatively slight interest in popular tradition, should have adopted so much mythology as the basis of his statement that 'God created the heaven, the earth, and all that is in the earth, and hallowed the seventh day'?

If the Yahwist had given a creation-story, corresponding to his Flood-story, the phenomena of Gen. 1 would not be so surprising. The Priestly Writer might thus be taken to have acted consistently by giving an improved version of both traditional stories.¹ But we have no Yahwistic creation-story, except indeed in a fragmentary form, and though the lost portion of the cosmogonic preface to J's Paradise-story (based probably on a Canaanitish story) must have differed greatly from the cosmogony in Gen. 1, yet it is most improbable that P would spontaneously have thought of competing with J by producing a new semi-Babylonian cosmogony. In the next place it should be noticed that the Flood-story which J has borrowed, directly or indirectly, from Babylon, stands in Babylonian mythology in close connection with the creation-story; the two events are in fact only separated by the ten antediluvian Chaldean kings and an uncertain interval between creation and the foundation of a dynasty. The list of the ten kings is certainly represented, however imperfectly, by J's Cainite genealogy (see CAINITES § 3 f.); it is probable therefore that J (as represented by the stratum called J₂) originally had a creation-story with strong Babylonian affinities, and that P used this story as the basis of his own cosmogony.

Accepting this hypothesis, we are no longer surprised at the echoes of mythology in Gen. 1-24a. Underneath P we recognise the debris of the cosmogony of J₂. The Priestly Writer did not go out of his way to collect Babylonian mythic data; he simply adopted and adapted the work of a much earlier writer. The hypothesis is due to the sagacity of Budde,² and the more clearly we discern the mythic elements in P's cosmogony, the more probable and indeed inevitable does the hypothesis become. That the old cosmogony has been lost, is much to be deplored; but we can easily believe that it would have been too trying to devout members of the 'congregation' to have had before them in the same book the early and almost half-heathenish recension of a Canaanitish-Babylonian cosmogony produced by J₂ and the much more sober but in all essentials thoroughly orthodox recast of this recension due to the Priestly Writer. Whether the latter found any reference to the sabbath in the older story which might seem to justify his insertion of the divine appointment of the sabbath, we do not know. Jensen finds a reference to the 17th and 14th days of the month in the fifth tablet of the epic (Il. 17 f.), and Zimmern even inserts conjecturally 'on the sabbath' (line 18); but whether any part of this obscure passage lay in any form before J₂, must remain uncertain.

The explanation given by Zimmern (above, § 4) does justice, as no other explanation can do, to the circumstances and the ideas of the ancient Babylonians at a comparatively remote period. If it somewhat closely resembles the explanation of the Babylonian flood-story, this is no objection. The post-diluvian earth may in a qualified sense be called a new earth, and some mythologies expressly recognise that the present creation is rather a re-creation.³ Still, it would be rash to suppose that even this explanation entirely accounts for the Babylonian myth. It may very possibly have been the theory of the most thoughtful of the Babylonian priests—of those who did most for the systematising of the mythic details. The details, however, are themselves so peculiar that they invite a close examination and a fuller application of the comparative method. When this has been given we see that a long mythic development must have preceded the story of the creation epic, which is not like an isolated rock rising out of a vast plain, but like a tree which derives its sustenance from a rich vegetable mould, itself of very gradual formation. It is out of the mould of primæval folklore that the great creation-myth has drawn its life; later ages recombined the old material, and gave the result a new meaning. Man invents but little; the Babylonians, we may be sure, borrowed their dragon-myth, and much besides, from earlier races, whose modes of thought lie outside of our present field of study.

The comparative lateness of the 'epic' (the title is not inappropriate) which Ašur-bāni-pal added to his royal library, is too obvious to require argument; but it is plain also that it is based upon archaic materials. In particular the myth of Apsū and Tiāmat can be traced as far back as to 1500 B.C. through inscriptions which refer to the 'abysses' or 'seas' of Babylonian temples (see NEHUSHTAN § 2); these 'seas' were in fact trophies of the victory of the young Sun-god over the primæval, cosmic sea, with which Tiāmat is to be identified. In 1500 B.C. this myth was doubtless already of immemorial antiquity.

Other less elaborate creation-stories are known to us—specimens of the very varied traditions which had at least a local circulation. Some are preserved in fragments of Bērōssus and 14. Parallel forms.

Damascius, others have only lately been revealed to us by T. G. Pinches and his predecessor the lamented G. Smith, whom Ašur-bāni-pal would certainly have recognised as worthy to have been one of the dupšarri, or scribes, of his library, for it was he who was the discoverer and the first translator of Ašur-bāni-pal's great 'Creation-epic.'

The Greek-reading world owed its chief acquaintance with Babylonian mythology to a Greek-writing priest of Bēl named Bērōssus (about 280 B.C.).

15. Berosian, etc.

It is unfortunate that we know his book Χαλδαϊκά only from very imperfect extracts;¹ but, considering his competence and his unique opportunities of consulting ancient documents, we cannot afford to neglect these extracts. One of the most important of them is a fragment of a cosmogony. Its resemblances to statements in both the creation-stories of Genesis, especially the first, are obvious. Among them we may mention (1) the description of the primæval darkness and water, (2) the name *Θαυρε*² (cp. תוהו), translated θάλασσα, which is given to the woman who ruled over the monsters of chaos,³ and (3) the origin ascribed to heaven and earth, which arose out of the two halves of the body of Θαυρε, cut asunder by Bēl, while the creation of man by one of the gods (at Bēl's command), who mixed with clay the blood which flowed from the severed head, not of Bēl, but of the dragon Tiāmat,⁴ may be compared, or contrasted, with Gen. 27.

⁴ The correction of ἐάνου (twice) in the text of Bērōssus (in Syncellus, 52 f.) is due to Dindorf; but its importance was noticed first by Stucken (Astralmythen 155). The text is translated by Lenormant, Les origines, 1 507, and Gunkel, Schöpfung. 19. Just before mention has been made of the formation of earth

The theogony of Damascius¹ (6th cent. A.D.) is at first sight of less importance. It shows, however, more clearly than the Berossian fragment that the essential features of the story of the epic were well known, for the two chief mythic names mentioned by Damascius—viz., Tauθε and Αρασω—are plainly derived from Tiāmat and Apsū, whilst the only begotten son of this couple is Movvius, which corresponds to the obscure name Mummu in the epic (Tab. 1, ll. 4, 13; see above, § 2, second note).

We now turn to the cuneiform records, among which the so-called Cuthæan cosmogony (RP⁽²⁾ 1 149 ff.)² is not to be included. (a) The chief of these is the great Creation-epic, of which the reader has already heard. Its place of origin was, of course, Babylon, as appears from the fact that its hero is the god Marduk, who was the patron of Babylon. Obviously this is only one of several local versions of the primitive myth. In the original story Bēl of Nippur was, no doubt, the great god who overcame Tiāmat, and prepared the way for creation. The priests of the other sacred cities, however, had to protect the interests of their patron deities, and local Creation-myths were the result.

16. Three cuneiform stories.

(b) In another version of the myth,³ the fight between the divine champion and Tiāmat occurs after the creation, and is waged for the deliverance of gods and men alike. 'Who will set forth (to slay) the dragon, to rescue the wide earth and seize the royal power? Set forth, O God ŠUH, slay the dragon, rescue the wide earth, and seize the royal power.' An extravagant account is given (in the manner of the Jewish Talmud) of the dragon's size, and it is said that when the dragon was slain its blood flowed night and day for three years and three (six?) months. This may suggest the ultimate mythic origin of 'a time, times, and a half' in Dan. 12.7 Rev. 12.14.

(c) A much fuller and, if we assume its antiquity, more important narrative is the 'non-Semitic' one translated by Pinches in 1890 from a bilingual text discovered by G. Smith.⁴ It is a mixture of creation- and culture-myth, and as a culture-myth we have already had occasion to refer to it (see CANITES, § 3). The creation-story is given only in allusions. It is stated that once upon a time there was no vegetation, and 'all the lands' (of Babylonia?) were sea. Then there arose a movement in the sea, and the most ancient cities and temples of Babylonia were created. Next the subordinate divine beings called Anunnaki were created, after which Marduk set a reed on the water,⁵ formed dust, and poured it out beside the reed. Then, 'to cause the gods to dwell in a delightful place,' he made mankind (cp Gen. 1.26 f.) with the co-operation of and heaven out of the two parts of Omop(ω)kar (with whom the reporter of Bērōssus identifies Tiāmat). It stands to reason that the severed head spoken of in connection with the creation of man must be Tiāmat's, not that of the Creator, though Eusebius already had before him the reading εαυτοῦ (see Budde, Urgesch. 479). The passage is therefore not a statement of the kinship of God and man (WRS Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 43), though it is of course to be assumed that the god spoken of made man in his own physical likeness (cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 110). Strange to say, the name Omop(ω)ka seems to have come into the text of Bērōssus by mistake. For most likely it is a corruption of Marduk (Jastrow, Rel. of Bab. and Ass. 5; cp J. H. Wright, ZA 10 71 ff.). The story, however, is only intelligible on the theory adopted in this note.

³ See Zimmern's transl. in Gunkel, Schöpfung, 417-419. The colophon assigns this tablet also to the library of Ašur-bani-pal.

⁴ Pinches, RP⁽²⁾ 6 109 ff.; cp Hommel, Deutsche Rundschau, (91), pp. 105-114. A. Jeremias represents this and similar myths as artificial products, composed in a Babylonian interest (Beitr. zur Assyriol. iii. 1108); but the priests certainly did not invent altogether.

⁵ Cp the name 'land of reeds and canals,' given to S. Babylonia on the vases of Esaganna, king of Erech, before 4500 B.C.; and see the illustration of gigantic Chaldean reeds, Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 552.

CREATION

the goddess Aruru (whom we shall have to refer to again, col. 949, n. 4). We are allowed to infer that this waste of water had been converted into a fruitful plain by the industry of the newly created men, acting under the direction of the gods; and to these gods is ascribed the greatest of all human works, the erection of the sacred cities of Babylonia with their temples. Thus the most characteristic part of the Babylonian myth—viz., the fight of the sun-god with Tiāmat—is conspicuous by its absence. The reader should notice this, as it illustrates one of the two chief Hebrew cosmogonies (see below, § 20 [c]).

The statement that the myth which underlies Gen. 1 is of Babylonian origin may now be supplemented thus.

1. The epic of Ašur-bāni-pal's library stands at the height of a great mythic development. We cannot therefore presume that we have recovered the exact form of the Babylonian myth on which the narrative in Gen. 1 (or the earlier narrative out of which that in Gen. 1 has grown) is based.

2. Since there were several creation-stories in Babylonia, it is a priori probable that other stories besides that referred to may, either as wholes or in parts, have influenced the creation-stories in Palestine.

These reasonable inferences suggest two fresh inquiries.

We have to ask, 1. What is the earliest date at which the adoption of Babylonian myths by the Israelites is historically conceivable? and 2. What evidence have we of the existence of other Hebrew creation-myths than that in Gen. 1.1-2.4a, some of which may even enable us to fill up incomplete parts of that narrative?

In reply to the first question it is enough to refer to recent studies on the Amarna tablets. The letters in Babylonian cuneiform sent by kings and governors of Western Asia to Amen-hotep III. and Amen-hotep IV. prove that, even before the Egyptian conquests and the rise of the Assyrian kingdom, Babylonian culture had spread to the shores of the Mediterranean. 'Religious myths must have formed part of this culture.'¹ It is therefore in the highest degree probable that Babylonian creation- and deluge-myths penetrated into Canaan before the fifteenth century B.C., and as soon as the Israelites became settled in Palestine they would have opportunities enough of absorbing these myths.

At the same time it should be noticed that there are also several other periods in Israelitish history when either an introduction of new or a revival of old myths is historically conceivable.² The first is the time of David and Solomon. The former appears to have had a Babylonian secretary (see SHAVSHA); the latter admitted into his temple a brazen 'sea' (representing, as shown already, the primæval īlēm or tiāmat) and a brazen serpent (representing the dragon; see NEHUSHTAN). The second is the eighth and seventh centuries B.C., when Aramæan, Assyrian, and neo-Babylonian influences became exceedingly strong, and were felt even in the sphere of religion. The third and fourth are the exilic and post-exilic periods, when (see e.g., Job and Is. 40-55) there was a revival of mythology which the religious organisation of Judaism could neutralise but not put down.

In replying to the second question (as to the evidence for other cosmogonic stories in the OT), we must of course be satisfied with very incomplete references. Such we can find both in 20. OT. reff. pre-exilic and in post-exilic writings. Pre-exilic references occur in (a) Gen. 1.1-2.4a, in (b) Judg. 5.20, and especially in (c) the introduction to the Eden-story; post-exilic in (d) Job 157f. (e) 384-11 (f) Prov. 822-31 (besides the passages on the DRAGON).

(a) The phrase in the Blessing of Joseph, 'the flood (tehom) couching¹ beneath' (cp Gen. 711), is certainly the echo of a Tiamat-myth, and (b) the 'stars from their roads' (a Babylonian phrase²) in Judg. 520 of a myth like that in the fifth tablet of the epic.

(c) Gen. 24d-7 needs more special, even if brief, treatment. It runs thus, the original introduction of the Eden-story having been abridged by the editor of JEP. '... when Yahwè [Elohim] made earth and heaven. Now there were no bushes as yet upon the earth, and no herbage as yet sprouted forth, for Yahwè [Elohim] had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was no man to till the ground, but a flood³ used to come up from the earth and drench the whole face of the ground; then Yahwè [Elohim] formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils breath of life, and man became a living being.'

Evidently this belongs to the second section of a mythological creation-story, and its details are all of Babylonian origin. Like Pinches' non-Semitic creation-story (above, § 16 [d]), it describes, though with mythic exaggeration, the phenomena witnessed by the first colonists of Babylonia. The extremely small rainfall in Lower Mesopotamia was remarked upon by Herodotus (1193); consequently, without the careful direction and control of the yearly inundation of the Euphrates and the Tigris the land would be either marsh or desert. Water-plants there must have been for a season even in the most desolate tracts; but the myth-writers imagine a time when even reeds had not yet appeared, and when 'all the lands were sea' (myth, I. 10), since 'a flood used to come up (it seemed) from the earth' (Gen. 26). Next, the Hebrew writer tells us that Yahwè formed man out of dust (27), just as, in the myth (II. 20 f.), Marduk, with the help of the potter-goddess Aruru,⁴ makes man (no doubt) of clay, and somewhat as, in the story of Bērōssus (see above, § 15), one of the gods forms men out of earth moistened with Tiamat's (not Bēl's) blood. The sequel in the Hebrew story has obviously been abridged. There must have been some reference to the peaceful subjugation of the yearly flood, otherwise how could Yahwè have 'planted a garden (or park) in Eden' (v. 8)? So in the old myth we hear next that Marduk made the Tigris and the Euphrates 'in their places', the reeds and the woods, and the green of the fields (II. 23-26). Besides this affinity of its contents to the non-Semitic Creation-myth the Yahwistic passage has a striking resemblance in form to the first tablet of the Creation-epic, which, as it now stands, is of course a Semitic work.

On (d) Job 157f., (e) 384-11, (f) Prov. 822-31 we must be brief.

In (d) we have apparently a reference to a more heroic πρωτόγονος than the Adam of the Yahwist (like the Yima of the Avesta and the Maui of New Zealand mythology, and somewhat like the Adapa of a Babylonian myth),⁵ who shared the privileges of the divine or semi-divine members of the council of Elōāh. This first man was an embodiment of absolute Wisdom, and it is noteworthy that the

² קִכְלִי = Bab. alkāte, plur. of alaktu (כֶּלֶךְ = אֶלֶכְתָּ). Cp šā kakkabāni šamāne al-kat-su-nu 'the way of the stars of heaven' (Del. Ass. HVB 68b).

⁴ Aruru probably means 'potter' (Jensen). In the Gilgamesh-epic (334) this goddess kneads Eabani out of clay (tiṭu). The Yahwist puts 'dust' (עֶפֶר) for 'clay' (רָצָר); but we find the latter word in Job 336, קִיחָר קִיחָר (the same root קִיח is used in the epic).

⁵ Cp Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 659ff.

same word כִּיח 'to be brought forth,' is used of this wondrous personage and of the Wisdom who is described in Prov. 8, and that, equally with the Wisdom of Proverbs, the first man spoken of by Eliphaz came into existence before the hills. This myth has a very Babylonian appearance, and may conceivably belong to the same cycle as the myth of Enoch (= Noah, the 'first man' of the second age of the world), who was said to have derived his wisdom from his intercourse with angels.

In (e) Job 384-11 we find the singular notion (v. 7) that the stars are older than the earth. In the creation-epic the creation of the stars as 'stations for the great gods' (see STARS, § 3 d), follows on the subjugation of the dragon of chaos and the creation of heaven and earth (out of the carcase of Tiamat). The Hebrew poet, however, does not perhaps consider this story, or even its purified offshoot in Gen. 1, to be a worthy representation. Heaven and its stars must always have existed for Yahwè and the 'holy ones' to dwell in (cp Is. 2619 'dew of lights' and the 'endless lights' where Ahura dwells,¹ in the Avesta). He admits, indeed, that the ocean once on a time resisted Yahwè, and was forced into obedience (cp Ps. 1046-9). Of a separation of upper and lower waters, however, he has nothing to say.

In (f) Prov. 822-31 we find the same careful restriction of the mythological element. The mysterious caprices of the ocean still suggest a primæval rebellion on its part against Yahwè; but this is described in the simplest manner. Of a time when chaos reigned supreme we hear nothing. Yahwè and Wisdom were together before the earth was.² In fact the new quasi-mythic representation of Wisdom was incompatible with the antique Babylonian cosmogony.

These passages seem to show that there was a great variety of view in the post-exilic period respecting the best way of imagining creation. Some 22. Prophetic writers seem to have refused the dragon-myth (except in the palest form); others seem to have found it symbolically useful. To this we shall return presently (§ 23). There is a remarkable phenomenon respecting the pre-exilic time which has a prior claim on our attention. Though both J₁ and J₂ have a cosmogony (§ 12), there is an almost complete silence respecting such myths in the pre-exilic prophetic literature. There is, in fact, only one passage (Am. 93) that remotely suggests the existence of a creation-myth. This obscure passage has been considered elsewhere (see SERPENT, § 3 f.), and it may suffice here to point out that mythology did not come naturally to the early Israelites, and that one great aim of the prophets was to recall their countrymen to old Israelitish ways: Solomon who affected foreign fashions was no true Israelite. We need not be surprised, therefore, at the scanty references in the greater prophets to such figures of the Babylonian and Canaanitish myths as the Dragon, the Cherubim, the Seraphim. It is to a historical writer that we are indebted for the information that there was a brazen serpent, symbolising probably the Dragon (see NEHUSHTAN, § 2), in Solomon's temple. At a later period (post-exilic) references to the Chaos-dragon, to the subjugation of the primæval sea by Yahwè, and to some other features of mythic tradition, abound. Nor was the spring of mythic imagery dried up even in still later times, as the apocalyptic writings show. See DRAGON, RAHAB, SERPENT, ANTICHRIST, ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION, ABYSS, ARMAGEDDON, APOCALYPSE.

If the above presentation of facts be correct, it is a mistake to assert that the Israelites had, from their entrance into Canaan onwards, a fairly complete creation-myth, in which Yahwè took the place of Marduk, and šihām, liwyāthān, tannin, rahab, etc., that of the dragon Tiamat. This theory has indeed been vigorously defended by Gunkel; but it is liable to grave critical objections. It is a significant fact that Amos (see last §) has little if any comprehension of the mythical serpent (שָׁרָף), and that the Israelites who worshipped in Solomon's temple completely misunderstood the true meaning of 'Nehush-tan,' while from the time of the Babylonian 'exile' unmistakable references to the dragon-myth abound. This implies, not of course that there was not previously a Hebrew dragon-myth, but that a revival of mythology had brought the old myth into fresh prominence. It is probable that before the 'exile' the cosmogonic myths of the Israelites at large were in a very fragmentary state, and that if the myth on which the creation-story of Gen. 1 is based then existed (as it most probably did), it was uncomprehended by the people, and had no influence upon their thoughts. It appears, however, that, from the last pre-exilic century onwards, increased contact with Syria and (especially) Babylonia brought about a reawakening of the mythological interest, and that the myths which at a very early date had been derived by the Israelites from the Canaanites, were revived by religious writers (not prophets, at any rate in the proper sense of the word) and adapted to general use. This was done, sometimes with a rougher, sometimes with a gentler hand, but always without any dangerous concession to antiquated, naturalistic religion—a grand result, which the Babylonian priests, noble as their own higher religion was, never accomplished. To inquire into the cause of this success belongs to the history of Jewish religion.

The question has been raised whether Gen. 1:2-4a is, or is not, a poem. The theory was first propounded by d'Eichthal, Texte primitif du premier récit de la Création ('75), who found a true poem, composed of perfectly regular strophes, which had been distorted by the editor (32 ff.). Briggs (Old Test. Student, April '84) added to this the discovery of a metre (five tones in each line with caesura). The possibility of this is established by the undoubted existence of metre in the Babylonian creation-epic (see Del. Weltschöpfung); but unless we had before us J₂'s form of the creation-story, how could we expect to restore without arbitrariness the true Hebrew metre?

II. Conceptions of Creation.—It has been shown above that there circulated in Judah in the regal period at least two mythic stories of creation (cp § 22), both of which were directly or indirectly of Babylonian origin. It is still with the former that we are specially concerned for the present. That there is no clear reference to this myth in the fragmentary remains (cp below, § 29) of the pre-exilic prophets, is, no doubt, a fact which has to be accounted for; but when we consider the Canaanitish-Babylonian origin of the myth we cease to be surprised at it. Certainly Isaiah and the other great prophets believed in the creatorship of Yahwè; but they could not have given their sanction to even a simplified edition of any of the grotesque and heathenish myths of the Canaanites and the Babylonians. Why, then, it may be asked, did they not, like the Second Isaiah (Is. 40-48), preach the creatorship of Yahwè without any mythic ornamentation? The answer is, that their object was not to teach an improved theology, but to dispel those illusions which threatened, they believed, to involve good and bad Israelites alike in one common ruin. The pre-exilic prophets were preachers of judgment: the truth they had to announce was that Yahwè was not merely the god of Israel, but also the moral governor of the world, who would punish all guilty nations, and more especially the most favoured nation, the Israelites. It was for the late exilic and the post-exilic prophets and other religious writers, whose function was, not so much threatening, as edification and consolation, to draw out the manifold applications of that other great truth that Yahwè is the creator of the world.

On the pre-exilic conception of creation, therefore, not much can be said. There were, no doubt, hymns to Yahwè as the creator; but the divine that early age, and could not have been expressed in a form congenial to the later worshippers. We have, however, a fragment of a song in the Book of Jashar (1 K. 8:12 f.), which the narrator who quotes it ascribes to Solomon. With the help of the LXX we may restore it thus:—

The sun did Yahwè settle in heaven,
But he said he would (himself) dwell in dark clouds.
I have built a lofty house for thee,
A settled place for thy perpetual habitation.¹

Here Yahwè is described as the creator of the sun. He is therefore greater than the solar deity Marduk, the creator in the Babylonian cosmogony. None of the heavenly bodies serves Yahwè as a mansion; dark clouds are round about him (cp Ps. 97:2 18:1, לְחֻמֵּי עָנָן again). It is of his condescension that he dwells in Solomon's temple, which will therefore be as enduring as the sun in the firmament (cp Ps. 78:69). Considering that Solomon (it would seem) put up in the temple a trophy of Yahwè's victory over the Dragon of chaos (see NEHUSHTAN), it is conceivable, though scarcely probable, that a hymn to the creator which contained these four lines was actually written for use at the dedication of the first temple. At any rate, even if not of the Solomonic age, the fragment is presumably pre-exilic, and confirms the idea that the creation of the world (i.e., the world known to the Israelites) was early spoken of as a proof of Yahwè's greatness. Nor can we be surprised that some scanty reference to Yahwè as the Maker κατ' ἐξοχὴν is traceable in pre-exilic proper names (see NAMES, § 30, and cp the Bab. and Ass. names Sin-bani, Bel-bani, Bel-ibni).

It was the Second Isaiah, however, so far as we know, who made the creatorship of Yahwè a fundamental Jewish belief. Is. 40 gives the key to the later doctrine of creation. Living after the collapse of the ancient state, and amidst new scenery and other men, gifted moreover with a tenderly devout spirit and a rich poetic imagination, the Second Isaiah felt what was needed to regenerate Jewish religion—a wider view of the divine nature. To him Yahwè was far too high for the common sacrificial cultus, far too great to be merely a local deity; both nature and mankind owed their existence to Yahwè. He had indeed chosen Israel for a special possession; but it was for purely moral ends. Therefore Israel's fall could not be for ever; Israel's and the world's creator would certainly, for his own great ends, restore his people. Let Israel then look up to him as the creator of all things, and therefore also as the Redeemer (רִשְׁיָא) of Israel. However the Second Isaiah does not stop here. He rectifies some of the notions which were presumably current among the Israelites—old notions, now awaking to a fresh life under Babylonian influence. Israel was, no doubt, one of the youngest of the nations; but Yahwè was not, like Marduk, according to the old myth, one of the youngest of the gods; 'before me (Yahwè) no god was made' (Is. 43:10). Nor could it be right either to make an image of Yahwè (as if he were no better than the sun-god Marduk), or to say that other Elōhim helped Yahwè (as they were said to have helped Marduk) in the work of creation (Is. 40 18, etc. 44 24). Whether there was really a chaos at the beginning of all things, he does not expressly say. He does tell us, however, that there is nothing chaotic (tōhū) in the earth as it came from Yahwè; the inference from which is, that both in history and in prophecy God's dealings are clear and comprehensible, and designed for the good of man (Is. 45 18 f.). He pointedly declares that Yahwè not only formed light but also made darkness (Is. 45 7), whereas the old cosmogony of J₂ (see § 12) ascribed only light, not darkness, to the creative activity of Elohim.

The Second Isaiah does not assert that the creatorship of Yahwè is a new truth. All that he professes to do is to unfold the meaning of one of the great truths of primeval tradition (Is. 40 21; see SBOT). His view of creative activity is a large one. Creatorship consists, he thinks, not only in bringing into existence that which before was not, but also in the direction of the course of history (41 20 45 8 48 7). He affirms that both men and things are 'called' into existence by Yahwè (41 4; cp 40 26 44 26 48 13); but he does not refuse to speak also of Yahwè's hand (48 13 cp 40 22, etc.), or of his breath (44 3 cp 40 24), as the agent of production. Ease and irresistibility are two leading characteristics of Yahwè's action, and hence it is that the Second Isaiah prefers (though less distinctly than the Priestly Writer) the conception of creation by the voice to that of creation by the hand. Creation by the voice is also a specially characteristic idea of Zoroastrianism;¹ but the Jews probably derived the idea, directly or indirectly, not from Persia but from Babylonia. No more striking expression of it could be wished for than that contained in the following lines from the Creation-epic (Tab. iv.) :—

Then in their midst they laid a garment,
To Marduk their first-born thus they spoke:
Let thy rule, O Lord, surpass that of the gods,
Perishing and becoming—speak and let it be!
At the opening of thy mouth let the garment perish;
Again command it, then let the garment reappear!
He spoke with his mouth, and the garment perished;
Again he commanded it, and the garment reappeared.²

Did the Priestly Writer really believe in a pre-existent chaos, out of which the world was made? Or is the 28. P. retention of chaos in his cosmogony simply due to educational considerations? Considering the line taken by the Second Isaiah, and still more by the later wise men, we may venture to class the reference to chaos in Gen. 1 2 with those other concessions to popular superstition which make Ezra's law-book an ecclesiastical compromise rather than an ideal standard.³ A similar remark applies to the other mythic features in the cosmogony; all that the Priestly Writer really cares for are the religious truths at the base of the story, such as the creatorship of Yahwè, the divine image (surely not, according to P, physical) in man, and the fundamental cosmic importance of the sabbath.

The later writings show that the teaching of the Second Isaiah and the Priestly Writer was not thrown away. Two of the most beautiful psalms 29. Later writings. (8 104) are suggested by the priestly cosmogony, and in Ps. 33 9 148 5 creation by the word of God, without any mention of chaos, is affirmed with emphatic conciseness. The fragments of the older prophetic writings were deficient in references to creation; the post-exilic adapters and supplementers of prophecy have remedied this defect (see e.g., Am. 4 13 Jer. 4 23-26 5 22b 10 12 31 35-37), whilst the Book of Job is pervaded by the belief in the Creator. The Praise of Wisdom, too (Prov. 8 22-31), gives a grand picture of the activity of the Creator, who requires no sabbath-rest, for he cannot be fatigued.¹ Nothing is said here, or in the Book of Job,² of chaos or pre-existent matter. The first of the late didactic writers who distinctly asserts the creation of the world out of matter is the author of the Book of Wisdom³ (11 17 κτίσασα τὸν κόσμον ἐξ ἀνόρφου ὕλης). He may no doubt be said to Platonize; but Philo before him, not indeed without some hesitation, held the belief of the eternity of matter,⁴ and he appears to have been influenced by contemporary Jewish interpretations of Gen. 1 2. In 2 Macc., however (a Pharisaean record), we find the statement that the world and its contents were made οὐκ ἐξ ὕτων (7 28), a guarded phrase,⁵ which reminds one of Heb. 11 3, and is at any rate incompatible with a belief in ἀνορφος ὕλη; and, in two fine passages in Apoc. Bar. (Charles), God is addressed thus, 'O Thou . . . that hast called from the beginning that which did not yet exist, and they obey thee' (21 4), and 'with a word thou quickenest that which was not' (48 8). Parallel passages in NT are Rom. 4 17 Heb. 11 3 (where, however, μὴ ἐκ φαινομένων is not to be confused with ἐκ μὴ φαινομένων).⁶ We must not, however, overlook the fact that in one of the latest books a distinct reference to chaos occurs. In 2 Pet. 3 5 the earth is described as 'compacted out of water . . . by the word of God.' Here 'water' obviously means that portion of the chaotic waters which was under the firmament; out of this, according to Gen. 1 6, the dry land emerged at the fiat of Yahwè. The importance given to the Logos in Jn. 1 3, and to the Son of God in Heb. 1 2, as the organ of the divine creative activity, is best treated in another connection (see LOGOS). On the doctrine of the re-creation of heaven and earth, see DELUGE, § 19.

כָּרָא (of which Ass. banū, 'to make, create,' is a phonetic modification)⁷ is a characteristic word of P (Gen. 1 often, 2 3 f. 5 1 f.; ᾠ ποιῶν [AEL], but in 2 4 ὅτε ἐγένετο 30. Words [AEL]);⁸ also cp Is. 40-66 (twenty times); ᾠ for 'create,' various renderings). Di. (Gen. 17) wishes to claim כָּרָא for JE; but Ex. 34 10 Nu. 16 30 have been manipulated by R. In Gen. 6 7 כָּרָא (for קָרָא) is assigned to R by Di. himself. Is. 45 and Am. 4 13 are interpolations (see AMOS, § 12, ISAIAH, ii., § 5). Jer. 31 22 occurs in a section written or rewritten late. Dt. 4 22 (where כָּרָא stands of the creation of man) is hardly pre-exilic (cp DEUTERONOMY, § 19). In spite of these facts, it would be unwise to say that the narrative in J (see above, § 12) cannot have contained the word כָּרָא, corresponding to Ass. banū.

קָרָא 'to fabricate, make, create,' Gen. 14 19 22 ('creator of heaven and earth'; ὁς ἐκτίσεν [ADL]), Dt. 32 6 ('thy father that made thee'; but ἐκτίσας [BAFL]); Prov. 8 22 (Yahwè's creation of Wisdom, ἐκτίσεν [BNA]); Ps. 139 13 ('thou didst create my reins'; but ἐκτίσας [BNA]). All these passages are late; but קָרָא is probably a divine title (see CAIN, § 5), and Eve, in Gen. 4 1, says (probably) 'I have produced, created (but ἐκτίσας [ADEL]), a man like (the Creator) Yahwè' (חָוָה יִצְרָאֵל?). קָרָא, 'to make,' Gen. 2 4 18 (J), Is. 43 7. יָצָא 'to form,' Gen. 2 7 19 (J) Is. 43 17 Jer. 10 16 Am. 4 13 Zech. 12 1.

According to the Pseudo-Sophronius, who enumerates Timothy, Titus, Crescens, and the Ethiopian eunuch immediately after the twelve apostles, he was founder of the church of Vienne in Gaul. CRETE (ΚΡΗΤΗ: mod. Candia), the largest island in the Aegean sea, of which it is also the S. limit.

Crete extends 140 m. from W. to E., consisting of an irregular ridge of mountains which fall into three distinct groups, the central and loftiest (mod. Psiloriti) being the Mount Ida of the ancients. The N. coast is broken into a series of large bays and promontories; on the S. there are few harbours, and only one considerable bay—that of Messara, under Mt. Ida. The physical character of Crete is succinctly described by Strabo (475, ὁρεῖσιν καὶ δασείᾳ ἢ νήσος, ἔχει δ' αὐτὸν εὐκαρπύς).

Lying at almost equal distance from Europe, Asia, and Africa, Crete was one of the earliest stages in the passage of Oriental civilisation to the W. In historical times it was of little importance—chiefly as a recruiting ground for mercenary troops (Pol. 31:26, Jos. Ant. xiii. 43; cp 1 Macc. 11:31).¹ Quintus Metellus reduced the island in 67 B.C., and it was combined with the Cyrenaica to form one province—senatorial under the emperors.

The Jews were early connected with Crete (cp the story told in Tac. Hist. 5:2 that the Jews were originally fugitives from Crete). In 5:20* of Ezek. 25:16 and Zeph. 2:5 [BNAQ] Κρήτες is read for the 'Cherethites' or 'Cherethims' (קרתיים) of EV, and Κρήτη [BNAQ] in Zeph. 2:6 for כרת, which, however, is certainly not Crete, but denotes 'land of the Cherethites'—i.e., Philistia. Κρήτες also occurs in 5 of Ezek. 30:5 apparently for כרת. See CHERETHITES; and, on the hypothesis connecting the Philistines with Crete, CAPHTOR, PHILISTINES. Gortyna (near modern H. Deka in the Messara, the only considerable plain in the island) is mentioned as containing many Jews (1 Macc. 15:23 cp 10:67), and Philo (Leg. ad Cai. 36) says that Crete, like all the Mediterranean islands, was full of them (cp Acts 2:11 Tit. 1:10 14, Jos. Ant. xvii. 121, Vita, § 76).

The account of Paul's voyage to Rome furnishes several geographical details. From Cnidus his ship ran under the lee of Crete (Acts 27:7 ὑπεπλεύσαμεν τὴν Κρήτην κατὰ Σαλαμώνην), and some time appears to have been spent in the shelter of the Fair Havens. Whether the apostle was able to accomplish there any missionary work cannot even be guessed; and we are thus left without any information as to the process of the evangelisation of the island. When we next hear of it the gospel has apparently been widely established (see PASTORAL EPISTLES).

The character of the Cretans as gathered from the epistle to Titus, is entirely in accord with what is known from other sources. The epistle (Tit. 1:12) quotes 'a prophet of their own' (i.e., Epimenides, called θεῖος ἀνὴρ by Plato, Latius, 1642; θεοφιλὴς Plut. Sol. 12), who stigmatised them as liars and beasts. It was a popular saying that it was impossible to out-Cretan a Cretan (Pol. 8:21, cp Pol. 6:46 f. 8:18 33:16). Polybius (6:46) writes that 'greed and avarice are so native to the soil in Crete, that they are the only people among whom no stigma attaches to any sort of gain whatever' (cp Tit. 1:11, 'teaching things which they ought not for an ignominious gain'—a similar phrase occurs in Tit. 1:7). The repetition of the thought of Tit. 1:7 μὴ πάροινον, 22 νηφαλίου, 23 μηδὲ σὺν πολλῷ δεδουλωμένον is equally ominous (Cretan wine was famous in antiquity; cp Juv. Sat. 14:270). Tit. 3:1 bears obvious reference to the turbulence of the Cretans, a characteristic which runs through their history.

CRICKET (קִרְבָּן), Lev. 11:22, RV. AV BEETLE (q.v.).

CRIME (צִדְקָה), Job 31:11; see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 10 f.

CRIMSON, תוֹלַעַת, tōlā', a word common in the fem.

form תוֹלַעְתָּה, tōlā'ah, or תוֹלַעְתָּה, tōlā'ath, is used in Ex. 16:20 in the general sense of 'worm' [EV], in Is. 1:8 (EV 'crimson'), Lam. 4:5 (EV 'scarlet') for the crimson dye prepared from the body of the female Coccus ilicis, a Homopterous insect belonging to the family Coccidae.

The female, which grows to the size of a grain of corn, is in the adult or imago stage attached by its inserted proboscis into the leaves and twigs of the Syrian Holm-oak, whose juices it lives on. The male is winged and flies about. The bodies of the females are collected and dried, and from them are prepared the colouring matters known as Cochineal, Lake, and Crimson. Since the discovery of America a Mexican species of Coccus, C. cacti, which lives on the India fig, has largely supplanted the first-named species as the source of the pigment, and at the present day both have lost their commercial value owing to the invention of aniline dyes. In old literature the name Kermes (see below) is frequently used for Coccus.

Other names for this colour are קֶרְמִי, kānī (Jer. 4:30, RV 'scarlet'; elsewhere EV 'scarlet'; see COLOURS, § 14) and the late equivalent קֶרְמִיל, karmīl (2 Ch. 27:14 [6:13] 31:4²). The origin of the termination -il in קֶרְמִיל is obscure; it can scarcely be explained (as in Ges.^[18]) by the Pers. affix -in; for there is no word kirmīn in Pers., nor would it signify the colour if there were.

For Is. 63:1 (חֲכִימָן, RV^{ms.} 'crimsoned,' EV 'dyed'), see COLOURS, § 13 f.

CRISPING PINS (קִרְיִים), Is. 3:22. See BAG (2).

CRISPUS (ΚΡΙΣΠΟΣ [Ti. WH]; a Roman name), ruler of the synagogue at Corinth, and one of Paul's converts there (Acts 18:8 1 Cor. 1:14).

In Ap. Const. 7:46 he is said to have been ordained bishop of Aegina. In Mart. Rom. Vit. he is commemorated on Oct. 4.

CROCODILE. 'Beasts of the reeds' is an alternative rendering (in AV^{ms.}) of קָהָל קִרְיָה, Ps. 68:30 [31] (ΘΗΡΙΑ ΤΟΥ ΚΑΛΑΜΟΥ), AV 'company of spearmen,' RV rightly 'wild beast of the reeds.' This means the crocodile (hardly Bēhēmōth—i.e., the hippopotamus), used to symbolise the Egyptian power. Cp Hupfeld and Del. ad loc.

According to 5 the קֶרֶךְ of Lev. 11:29 (AV 'tortoise') was a 'land-crocodile'; see LIZARD, 1. For 'land-crocodile,' RV's rendering of קֶרֶךְ, a kind of lizard (Lev. 11:30), see CHAMELEON, 1. For Jer. 14:6 RV^{ms.} (תַּנִּינִים; AV 'dragons,' RV 'jackals'), see DRAGON, § 4. For Job 41:1 f. RV^{ms.} [40:25] (EV 'Leviathan,' AV^{ms.} 'whale,' 'whirlpool'), see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN.

The animal described poetically in Job has generally been identified with the crocodile (see especially Bochart 3:737 f.). Until recent times, when the propriety of making any zoological identification has been questioned, the chief dissentient has been Schultens. This great eighteenth-century scholar thinks that the arguments for the crocodile and the whale are about equal; the poet does not seem to him to have been consistent in his description. Tristram, however (NHB 258), is of opinion as a naturalist that the crocodile is described under the name Leviathan, and if Budde's translation and exposition be adopted, the characteristics of the crocodile—the difficulty of capturing or taming it, its vast size, its formidable row of teeth, its impervious scales, its gleaming eyes, its violent snorting, and its immense strength,—all come out with marvellous exactness. Riehm (HWB, s.v. 'Leviathan') leaves it an open question whether the poet may not even have seen crocodiles in Palestine. Certainly the Nahr ez-Zerkā near Caesarea is believed to have had crocodiles quite lately,¹ and, as the climate of this marsh region resembles that of the Delta, there is in this nothing surprising. Still, though Pliny (HN 5.19) speaks of this river as the Crocodile river, and mentions a town called Crocodilon, we have no evidence that there were crocodiles there in biblical times. A thirteenth-century tract gives a strange story of fierce beasts called 'cocatrices' having been brought there (see COCKATRICE). Sir John Maundeville designates them corcodrils. See further Budde's elaborate commentary on Job 40 f.; and for another view (connecting the description in Job with mythology) see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN, § 3.

Cp Sans. kirmī, which is probably identical with our word 'worm' (ib. s.v. 'worm'). On the other hand, Del. (ZLT 89:593 [78]) may be right in connecting Ar. and Pers. kirmīz, from which carmesinus and crimson are most naturally derived, with an independent Turkish root beginning with ק instead of כ.

Crocodilus niloticus, formerly common throughout the Nile, has been almost exterminated in the lower part of the river, though it still flourishes above the second cataract. It is found from the Nile and the Senegal to the Cape of Good Hope, and in Madagascar and Syria. Large specimens attain a length of 15 feet. It was worshipped by the ancient Egyptians at Ombos and in the Fayūm (by Lake Moeris) under the name of Sobku (transcribed in Gk. as Σούκος); for a possible explanation of this, see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 103 f. CROCUS (רֹבֶלֶת), Cant. 2.1, RVmg.; EV ROSE (q.v.).

CROSS. We shall not attempt to introduce the reader to the archaeological study of the symbolism of the cross. Interesting as the task would be, it is really superfluous. If there was a time when it could be supposed that between Christianity and the non-Christian religions there was, in respect of the symbol of the cross, an affinity that was divinely appointed, that time is passed. We are no longer tempted to imagine that between the sign of the cross in baptism, and the heathen custom of bearing a mark indicating the special religious communion of the individual, there is a kind of pre-ordained relation. On the other hand, the fact that heathen notions did affect popular Christian beliefs in very early times, cannot be denied: the magic virtue ascribed to the cross has doubtless a non-Christian origin. For these matters it is enough to refer to Zöckler (Das Kreuz Christi), who fully recognises the original purity and simplicity of the earliest Christian view of the cross. His sobriety contrasts with the fantastic subjectivity of E. von Bunsen (Das Symbol des Kreuzes, 1876).

First as to the meaning of the Greek word σταυρός, which has a wider range than the word 'cross' by which it is rendered in English. We find it frequently used for the most primitive instrument of execution, the upright stake (crux simplex) to which the delinquent was bound when no tree was at hand (cp infelix arbor and infelix lignum; Liv. 1.26 Cic. Pro Rabir. 4), or on which he was impaled (cp HANGING), as well as for the fabricated cross (crux composita) of various shapes.

CROSS

The origin of crucifixion is traced back to the Phoenicians. The cross was also used at quite an early date in some form or other by Egyptians (Thuc. 1.110), Persians (Herod. 9.120), Carthaginians (Valerius Maximus; Polyb. 1.11, etc.), Indians (Diod. 2.18), Scythians (Justin, 25), and others, besides the Greeks (Q. Curtius, 44) and the Romans.¹ Among the last-named, however, this cruel form of punishment (cp Cic. Verr. 5.64 'crudelissimum terribilissimumque supplicium'; Jos. BJ v. 11.1) was originally reserved for slaves (servile supplicium; compare the application of the term fureifer to slaves) and criminals of the worst kind.² It was at first considered too shameful a punishment to be inflicted upon Roman citizens (Cic. Verr. 1.5 561 etc.).

Of the cross proper there were three shapes—the crux immissa or four-armed cross, the crux commissa or

2. Shape. three-armed cross, and the crux decussata which is more commonly known as St. Andrew's cross. Following the old tradition of the Church (Iren. Haer. ii. 24.4; Justin. Tryph. 91; Tert. adv. Jud. 10, etc.) which finds some support in the assertion of the Gospels that above the head of Jesus was placed a title (Mk. 15.26 ἐπιγραφὴ τῆς αἰτίας; Lk. 23.38 ἐπιγραφὴ; Mt. 27.37 αἰτία; Jn. 19.19 τίτλος), the cross of the NT has commonly been taken to be the crux immissa.³ The accounts of the manner of the crucifixion being so meagre, any degree of certainty on this point is impossible;⁴ but the evidence seems to preponderate in favour of the traditional view.

The four-armed cross in use at the time of the crucifixion of Jesus was most probably of the following

3. NT cross. description. It consisted of two pieces—an upright stake (stipes, staticulum), which was firmly fixed in the ground with pegs or fastened to the stump of a tree, and a cross-beam (antenna, patibulum), which was carried by the condemned to the place of execution. High up in the upright stake an indentation was probably made in which to fasten with cord and perhaps also to nail the cross-beam (cp Lucian's ἑλὼτα τεκταίνειν; also Hor. Carm. 1.35; Cic. Verr. 5.21). At a suitable height from the ground was fixed a peg (πῆγμα, sedile; see Iren. Haer. ii. 24.4) on which to set the body astride (cp Justin, Dial. 91; Iren. I.c.; Tert. cont. Marc. 3.18) so that the whole weight might not rest upon the hands and arms.⁵ This, together with the fastenings, made a rest for the feet (ὑποπόδιον, suppedaneum lignum; cp Greg. of Tours, De Glor. Martyr., chap. 6) unnecessary.

It is probable that on such a cross as this Jesus was crucified,⁶ and that the execution was carried out

4. Crucifixion. in the regular manner. Soon after the sentence (Val. Max. 1.16; Dion. Hal. 9.48), or on the way to execution (Liv. 33.36; cp Cic. Verr. 5.54) the condemned was scourged.⁷ He was led, bearing his own cross, or rather part of it (Plut. De sera numinis vindicta, chap. 9; Artemid. 2.56

¹ In some of these cases (e.g., Persians), no doubt, only the crux simplex is intended. The cross in the strict sense of the word was not used by the early Jews. In Esth. 7.9 13 ὁ represents הָנָה 'to hang' (cp the application of the term הָנָה to Jesus by the later Jews), by σταυροῖν. See, however, HANGING. It was introduced into Palestine by the Romans (see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 12; and cp Jos. Ant. xii. 142 xx. 6.2, BJ ii. 126). Pesh. in the Gospels uses zēkaph, which seems to mean primarily 'to elevate.' Qur'ān (4.156) uses salaba.

² Cp Lk. 23.32, Sen. Ep. 7, Cic. Petron. 71, Dion. 5.52, Jos. Ant. 13.22, Apul. Asin. 3.

⁴ Some scholars (Keim, etc.) have contended for the crux commissa (cp Seneca, Consol. ad Mar., 20, Jos. BJ v. 11.1).

⁵ Jeremy Taylor (Life of Christ) supposes the body to have 'rested upon nothing but four great wounds.'

⁷ The scourging of Lk. 23.22 Jn. 19.1 was probably a preliminary and therefore an irregular one.

and cp the symbolical phrase in Mt. 10:38 16:24) to which he was bound, along the public roads to an eminence (see GOLGOTHA) outside the city gates (Cic. Verr. 5:66; Plaut. Mil. glor. ii. 4:6). In front of him went a herald bearing a tablet (titulus; Suet., Cal. 32) of condemnation, or he himself carried the alula (cp savls, Socr. HE 1:17; πῖναξ, Euseb. HE v. 144; λεῦκωμα, Soz. HE 1:17) suspended by a cord from his neck (Suet. Calig. 32; Domit. 10; Dio Cass. 54:3; Euseb. HE v. 144). On arrival at the place of execution the cruciarus was stripped of his clothing and laid on the ground upon his back. The cross-beam was then thrust under his head, and his arms were stretched out across it to the right and left and perhaps bound to the wood (cp Lucan, Phars. 6:543 f. Plin. HN xxviii. 411), the hand being fastened by means of a long nail (cp cruci figere, affigere). Already, before or after the arrival of the condemned (see Cic. Verr. v. 66, and cp Polyb. i. 86:6; Diod. xxv. 5:2; Jos. BJ vii. 64), the upright stake had been firmly fastened in the ground. The cross-beam was then, with the help of ropes (cp perhaps Plin. HN xxix. 4:57) and perhaps of some other simple contrivance, raised to its place on the stake. Here it was hung provisionally, by a rope attached to its ends, on a firm nail or notch,¹ whilst the body was placed astride the lower peg in the stake, and the legs bound. The beams were then probably bound and nailed together at the point of intersection. Nails like those already used for the hands would be employed to fix the feet (Lk. 24:39; cp Plautus, Mostell. ii. 1:13; Just. Dial. chap. 97; Tert. Adv. Marc. 3:19, etc.), which were only slightly elevated above the ground. The nails were driven through each foot either in front, through the instep and sole, or at the side, through the tendo Achillis.² The body remained on the cross until it decayed (Hor. Ep. i. 16:48 Lucan, Phars. 6:543), or (from the time of Augustus) until it was given up to the friends of the condemned for burial (Quintil. Decl. 6:9; cp Jos. BJ iv. 5:2). Soldiers were set to watch the crucified (Cic. Pro Rabir. 4:11; Petron. Sat. 3; Quint. Decl. 6:9; Mt. 27:66 Jn. 19:23). Death resulted from hunger (Euseb. HE 88) or pain (Seneca, Ep. 101). To alleviate the latter the Jews offered the victim a stupefying draught (Mk. 15:23 Mt. 27:34 Bab. Sanh. f. 43r). Breaking of the legs (σκελετοκομία; see § 6) was a distinct form of punishment among the Romans (Seneca, De Ira 3:2; Suet. Aug. 67; cp, however, Origen on Mt. 27:54).

M. A. C.

Modern realism takes an interest in these painful details which was unknown to primitive Christianity and to the evangelists. From an archaeological point of view this may be justified; but it is necessary to point out that the evangelists are entirely indifferent to the archaeology of the circumstances of the Passion. All indeed that they seem to care for is (1) the opportunity which the Cross gave for Christ to make fresh disclosures (in speech) of his wonderful character, and (2) the proofs which the Passion gave, as it appeared to them, of a 'pre-established harmony' between prophecy and the life of Jesus. When the ἐσμπνισμένος οἶνος (wine mingled with myrrh) or δξος (vinegar) is mentioned, it is chiefly, we may presume, to suggest a connection with Ps. 69:21.³ So the 'casting lots' doubtless fixed itself in tradition because of the parallelism of Ps. 22:18.¹ The only NT passages in which a clear trace of sympathy with the physical pains of Jesus is discernible are Lk. 22:44 and Heb. 5:7, especially the former. Here also great reserve is noticeable. Though Wetstein (NT, 1751) quotes several ancient writers who state that sweat, in some circumstances, is really tinged with blood,² yet the early writer of Lk. 22:43 f.³ contents himself with saying that the sweat of Jesus in his agony was 'as it were clots of blood' (ὡσεὶ θρόμβοι

² See Brandt, Die Evangelische Geschichte, from which this part of the description is borrowed. For the two nails cp Plautus, Mostell. ii. 1:13 and see Meyer. Others (Keim, Farrar, etc.) think that only one nail was used.

6. Death of Jesus.

NT writer had formed the idea that Jesus died of a broken heart, as W. Stroud, M.D., supposed (Treatise on the Physical Cause of the Death of Christ, 1847)—certainly an idea for which many modern readers of the Gospel would be glad to find sufficient evidence. The hypothesis is based on Jn. 19:34, where we read that 'one of the soldiers with a spear pierced (ἐννύξε) his side, and forthwith there came out blood and water.' From a critical point of view, we can hardly say that the fact that Jesus received this wound after he had breathed his last is well established; theorising upon it therefore, with a view to determine the cause of Jesus' death, is excluded. We have reason to believe (see Orig. on Mt. 27:54) that a lance wound was sometimes given to those who were crucified to accelerate death. The probability is (if the kernel of Jn. 19:31-37 be accepted as historical) that the two malefactors first had their legs broken (crurifragium) and then received their coup de grâce by being pierced with a lance. This is not opposed to the literal interpretation of v. 34, for all that the evangelist denies is that the legs of Jesus were broken. That the statement of the 'eye-witness' (ὁ ὡρακὼς) has come down to us in its original form, cannot, however, safely be asserted, because of the impossibility of explaining the issuing of 'blood and water' from an internal source physiologically. Perhaps one may suppose that the writer of Jn. 19:31-37 in its present form has accommodated the facts of tradition (the tradition attested by the 'eye-witness') to his theological needs. There is a theological commentary on the 'blood and water' in 1 Jn. 5:7 8 f., where the 'water' and the 'blood' have become, as it were, technical expressions for permanent supernatural channels of divine grace, though the commentary may to us (not to its first readers) be as obscure as the text.

With regard to the hypothesis of Dr. Stroud (viz., that death was sudden from rupture of the heart, and that the blood and water were the separated clot and serum of the escaped blood in the pericardial sac, which the spear had pierced), it is sufficient to mention the invariable fact, of which this physician appears to have been ignorant, that the blood escaping into a serum cavity from rupture of a great organ, such as the heart (aneurysmal aorta) or parturient uterus, does not show the smallest tendency to separate into clot and serum ('blood' and 'water,' as he takes it), but remains thick, dark-red liquid blood. The notion that the wound was on the left side is comparatively late. It is embodied in some of the newer crucifixes, where the wound is placed horizontally about the fifth costal interspace; but in most modern crucifixes, and probably in all the more ancient, the wound is placed somewhat low on the right side. That it was deep and wide, is inferred from the language of Jn. 20:27, where Thomas is bidden to 'reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side'—namely the side of the spiritual body.

[The ordinary view of the motive of the soldier (Jn. 19:34)—viz., that he wished to make sure of the death of Jesus—is of course a mere conjecture. If, therefore, the expression ἐξεκέντησαν (= ἐκέντησαν, 'they thrust through,' in Zech. 12:10) will permit it, some may prefer to accept a new hypothesis that the wound inflicted by the lance was only a slight one. The author of this hypothesis thus explains it.—Ep.] 'May it not have been a thoughtless, rather than a brutal act, the point of the lance being directed at something on the surface of the body, perhaps a dis-

23:35 and especially Jn. 19:28 f., which allude to the same passage (the διδῶ of Jn. corresponds to the εἰς τὴν διδῶν μὲν of the psalm). δξος is most naturally rendered VINEGAR [q.v.]; cp quotations in Wetstein. This too suits Ps. 69.

² Numerous more or less unauthentic modern instances have also been needlessly brought together.—C.C.

coloured wheal, bleb, or exudation, such as the scourging (Mt. 27:26) might have left, or the pressure of the (assumed) ligature supporting the weight of the body might have produced? Water not unmixed with blood from some such superficial source is conceivable; but blood and water from an internal source are a mystery.—C. C.

Apart from the references to the cross in the evangelical narratives, there are a few passages in which the cross is mentioned, or has been thought to be mentioned, in a manner which has the note of originality.

7. Biblical References.

1. If Sellin (Serubbabel, 106) were right in reading זֶרֶבְבַבֶּל in Is. 53:9 we should get a striking though unconscious anticipation of the cross of Jesus in prophecy. It is this writer's rather strange theory that ZERUBBABEL [q.v.], whom he idealises in the light of Is. 53 and kindred passages, suffered impalement as the Jewish Messianic king. Unfortunately the sense of 'cross' (σταυρός) for זֶרֶב is justified neither by its etymology (see Ges.-Buhl) nor by usage. Taw means properly a tribal or religious sign, and is used in Ezek. 9:46 for a mark of religious import on the forehead (cp CUTTINGS, § 6) and in Job 31:35 (if the text is right) for a signature.¹ No Jew would have used זֶרֶב for σταυρός, though, the crux commissa being in the shape of a T, the cross is often referred to by early Christian writers as the mystical Tau.

2. Mt. 10:38 'He that taketh not (οὐ λαμβάνει) his cross, and followeth after me, is not worthy of me'; cp Lk. 14:27 'doth not bear (οὐ βαστάζει) his cross'; Mt. 16:24 'let him take up (ἀράτω) his cross' (so Mk. 8:34 Lk. 9:23). Two views are held: (1) That to take, or take up, or bear a cross was a proverbial phrase for undergoing a great disgrace, suggested by the sight of the Roman punishment of crucifixion; and (2) that though the substance of the saying may be due to Jesus himself, the form, as perhaps in many other cases, is due to the recasting of the saying by a later generation, possibly under the influence of the highly original phraseology of Paul.

3. Gal. 2:20 χριστῷ συνεσταύρωμαι; 'I have been crucified with Christ' (cp 6:14). It would be difficult to assert that this strong expression was suggested by any saying of Jesus; it has obviously arisen out of the previous statement, 'through the law I died to the law.' The crucifixion of Jesus is of slight interest to Paul as a mere historical event; it becomes all-important through the apostle's mystical connexion with Christ. The crucifixion has an ideal as well as a real character, and the former gives a value to the latter (cp ADAM AND EVE, § 2). On Gal. 3:13 see HANGING. T. K. C.

CROWN. In considering the crown of the Hebrews the primary signification of the English word, and the origin of the crown itself, must not

As to the form of the Israelite crown we have no certain information. The ancient Egyptian forms of the upper and lower country crowns, the one with high receding slope, the other bottle-shaped (see hieroglyphs in EGYPT, § 43 n.), are less to be thought of than the Assyrian truncated cone with its small pointed elevation rising in the centre. The latter was worn by the highest classes, and may well have been the head-dress of

¹ So RV, with most critics; but the text of v. 34 f. is certainly in disorder (see Beer, ad loc.). זֶרֶב 'my sign' (= 'my signature') is a most improbable expression. Tg. and Vg. presuppose זֶרֶב 'my desire.'

Hebrew royalty. Another important variety was the DIADEM [q.v.], which was worn as a fillet (see TURBAN, 1), or encircled the high imperial hat of Persian sovereigns. From this has probably been derived the high priest's MITRE [q.v., 2]. The Persian hat is perhaps referred to in the late Heb. keṯher (כֶּתֶר) Esth. 1:11 2:17 6:8 and perhaps Ps. 45:9 [10] [Grä. Che.], in Esth. διδάθημα,¹ and in the kīdāpis of 1 Esd. 3:6 (EV 'headtire'). The Hebrews must have been familiar with the ancient custom of distinguishing rulers by special forms of headgear; but in the frequent allusions

2. Royal crown. to the ceremonies of a royal accession coronation is mentioned only once—in the case of Joash (2 K. 11:12). See CORONATION. Besides the bracelets (תַּקְשֵׁרוֹת; so We.'s emendation: see BRACELET), we see that the distinctive ornament worn by King Joash was the nēser (נֶזֶר). It means simply 'mark of separation or consecration,'² and, originally, was perhaps nothing more than a fillet (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 483 f.). In post-exilic literature it forms part of the high priest's headdress (see MITRE, 34). Of its earliest use we are ignorant. It is true that according to 2 S. 1:10 Saul's nēser was transferred to his rival David; but we cannot be sure that the statement is historical. The representation that kings went into battle wearing their insignia need not be disputed;³ but there is good ground for suspecting that the writer (who is an Ephraimite) is imaginative. See SAMUEL, i. § 4 (2). Nowack (HA 1307) holds that Solomon was the first to introduce a royal crown. Certainly David did not have his son crowned (anxious though he was to have Solomon's right popularly recognised: 1 K. 1:33), and neither Absalom nor Adonijah went through the rite of coronation when claiming the throne; but it is remarkable that, when so much is said of Solomon's throne (1 K. 10:18), nothing is hinted about a crown. That the šārāh (שָׂרָה) was, at least for a limited period, the usual ornament of Jewish kings may be taken as certain. It is possible that this also was originally a diadem or fillet, although in Job 31:36 we read that it could be 'bound' upon the head (עָנָה), which suggests that it was a turban. In Cant. 3:11 it represents the bridegroom's (Hellenic?) garland.⁴ Not only does the šārāh, by a common metaphor, typify dignity and honour, but also in late passages its possession implies sovereignty and its loss is synonymous with the king's degradation. A case of the former is Ps. 21:3 [4], 'Thou settest a crown (קֶטֶר) of fine gold on his head' (στéφανον ἐκ λίθου τιμίου); of the latter, Ezek. 21:26 [31], 'Remove the mitre (מִצְנֶת) kīdāpis, and take off the crown (קֶטֶר) στéφανος.' Here we may follow Smend and Bertholet in explaining both mitre and crown of the royal insignia: Zedekiah is to be stripped of all his dignity. For the

priestly עֲטָרָה (cp Eccus. 45:12), see MITRE; and for other Heb. words to designate distinguished head-gear, see DIADEM, TURBAN.

Crowns or garlands were worn by brides (Ezek. 16:12 עֲטָרָה תַּקְרָן) and by bridegrooms (Is. 61:10 פָּאָר, RV

3. Bride-groom's crown. garland).¹ The 'oil of joy' (ib., v. 3) recalls the royal anointing (see CORONATION), and it may be that the bridegroom wore a chaplet as king of the festival. Delitzsch thinks that the bridegroom's פֶּטֶר was a turban. Solomon (Cant. 3:11) is represented as wearing a diadem or 'āfārāh on the day of his espousals (cp CANTICLES, § 9). In the time of Vespasian the bridegroom's chaplet was abandoned (Mish. Sotah 9:14). In the Middle Ages the Jews resumed the use of wreaths for brides.

Josephus asserts that after the return from the exile Aristobolus, eldest son of Hyrcanus I., was the first to put

4. Post-exilic and NT usages. 'a diadem on his head' (διάδημα, Ant. xiii. 11:1). From Zech. 6:9-15, however, it would appear that Zechariah was directed to select from the exiles' gifts enough gold and silver to make crowns (עֲטָרֹת) or a crown (קִרְיָת, We., Now.) for Zerubbabel.² Josephus was perhaps thinking solely of the Hasmonæan kings; those priest-kings wore 'buckles of gold' on their shoulders, not crowns on their heads (1 Macc. 10:39 14:4, πόρτην χρυσήν; see BUCKLE, 3). The Talmud thinks that Hyrcanus, the 'second David,' wore two separate crowns, one royal and one priestly (Kidd. 66 a); and Josephus reports a present to this king of a golden crown from Athens (στέφανος, Ant. xiv. 85).

The Gr. στέφανος, which properly denotes the badge of merit as distinct from διάδημα the badge of royalty (see DIADEM), is frequently used by G to represent עֲטָרָה; but the distinction between διάδημα and στέφανος was not consistently observed in Hellenistic Greek.

In the NT στέφανος is used of the garlands given to the victors in games (1 Cor. 9:25; cp 2 Tim. 2:5), of the ornaments worn by the 'elders,' etc. in the visions of the Apocalypse (Rev. 4:4 to 6:2 9:7 14:14 [here, the Son of Man]), and of Jesus' crown of thorns. The last perhaps affects the Roman rather than the Jewish idea as to the symbolism of the crown; but Judean ideas on such matters must by that date have been assimilated to the Roman.

In RV 1 Macc. 10:29 11:35 13:37 39 2 Macc. 14:4 (στέφανος) 'crown' (AV 'crown tax') refers to a 'fixed money payment like the Roman aurum coronarium (Cic. in Pison. ch. 37), in room of the wreath or crown of gold which at one time it was customary, and even obligatory, for subject peoples to present as a gift of honour (cp 2 Macc. 14:4 and § 2 above) to the reigning king on certain occasions' (Camb. Bib. ad 1 Macc. 10:29); see TAXATION.

On the šēr of the altar (Ex. 30:3 f. 37:26 f. EV 'crown,' RV 'rim' or 'moulding'), see ALTAR, § 11; on that of the ark (ib. 25:11 37:2), see ARK, § 13; and on that of the table of shewbread' (ib. 25:24 f. 37:11 f.), see ALTAR, § 10. G renders by κυμάτων στρεπτόν and στέφανον.

CRUSE. 1. The cruse of water (צִפְתָּח, ṣappāḥath) which stood by Saul's head when he was surprised by David (1 S. 26:11 26:16; cp 1 K. 19:6) was probably a small water-jar of porous clay like the 'ibriḥ (vulgar pronunciation, brīḥ) of the modern Syrians and Egyptians. The porosity of the clay enables the water to be kept cool if the brīḥ is placed in a draught.

² The MT assigns Zechariah's crown to Joshua the high priest, but this can hardly be maintained (see ZERUBBABEL, and cp Kimhi ad loc.).

CUCKOW

The same vessel was used by the poor to hold oil (cp 1 K. 17:12 14:16, where it is distinguished from the larger נָר or water-jar [EV 'pitcher'] in which the household supply was fetched from the well [Gen. 24:14 f. G ὑδρία]).

In 1 K. 17:12, in 196 and in Judith 10:5, G uses the word καψάκης, also written καμψάκης, which, if from κάμνω, would suggest the shape of the Roman ampulla.

2. The cruse of honey which Jeroboam's wife took as part of her present to Ahijah (1 K. 14:3) was the bakbūk or earthenware bottle (see BOTTLE). The Greek translators (G^{AL} Aq.) render by στάμνος, a wine-jar, which, it is interesting to note, is also used by G^{BAFL} for the sinsebeth (EV 'pot of manna') laid up in the sanctuary (Ex. 16:33). This cruse or jar of manna was of earthenware according to the Targum, but of gold according to G (loc. cit.).

3. The cruse (חִיץ, ὑδρία) of 2 K. 2:20 f., used by Elisha to hold salt, was probably a flat dish or plate rather than a bottle or jar (cp חִיץ, 2 Ch. 35:13 [G καὶ εὐδοῶθη]; חִיץ in 2 K. 21:13 ὁ ἀλάσαστρος [B], τὸ ἀλάσαστρον [A], τὸ πυξίον [L], PAN).

4. On the cruse (ἡ ἀλάσαστρος; AV Box, 2) of Mt. 26:7, etc., strictly a jar or phial of alabaster, usually pear-shaped or pyramidal (Pliny, HN 9:56), see ALABASTER.

CRYSTAL. There can be little doubt that rock crystal is intended by the κρύσταλλος of Rev. 21:1: glass is represented by ὑαλός (see GLASS). Theophrastus (54) reckons crystal among the pellucid stones used for engraved seals. In modern speech we apply the term crystal (as the ancients apparently did) to a glass-like transparent stone (commonly of a hexagonal form) of the flint family, the most refined kind of quartz.

In G κρύσταλλος represents—

a. קֶרֶךְ, 'frost' or 'ice,' perhaps even in Ezek. 1:22.¹

b. אֲבִנֵי אֶשֶׁת (Is. 54:12, EV 'carbuncles'),—that is, 'stones of fire' (cp Ass. aban iṣṣiti, 'stone of fire' = hipindū), on an assumed derivation from קר, 'to kindle' (lit. by rubbing): hence the rendering of Aq. λθ. τρυπανισμοῦ, Sym. Theod. [λθ.] γλυφῆς, Vg. lapides sculptos [sculptos]. LXX and Pesh. have κρυστάλλου (קר?)

c. קֶדֶלֶה, EV 'bdellium' Nu. 11:7 (cp Field, Hexap.)

d. קִישוֹר, EV 'vapour' (Ps. 148:8).

For Job 28:7 f. (קִישוֹר), RV 'glass'; see GLASS.

קִישוֹ, qābāṣ (Job 28:8; RV 'crystal,' AV 'pearls'), is of obscure origin; cp perhaps Ass. gabāṣu, 'be thick, massive.'

The RV 'crystal' finds support in the Heb. קִישוֹ, 'hail' (on the relation of meanings see BDB, s.v. קִישוֹ), and possibly in the Targ. קִישוֹ (Lag. also קִישוֹ = qābāṣu, qābāṣum [Dan. 10:5 2 Ch. 8:5 Vg.; cp OPHIR]), which, like Ar. Pers. billawur (the word is slightly transposed), means 'crystal' or even 'glass,' as well as 'beryl.' Blau understands 'glass pearls.'

G^{BAFL} transliterates γαβεις and so Theod. γαβεις; the Pesh. is too paraphrastic to be of any use; and 'ὑπερηρμένα [Sym.]

ἵλας [Syr. Hex., mg. ἵλας] are appellatives derived from MH קִישוֹ, 'to heap up,' קִישוֹ, 'heap,' 'hill.'

CUB (כֹּבֵד), Ezek. 30:5 RV; AV CHUB (g.v.).

CUBIT. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The common term is אַמָּה, 'ammah' (prop. length of fore-arm? see BDB; Ass. ammātu, אַמָּה in the Siloam inscription [S.], Gen. 6:15; cp אֲמָתִי, 'an ordinary cubit' (Dt. 3:11) אֲמָתִי, one handbreadth longer than the usual cubit (Ezek. 40:5), etc.

נֶקֶד, gōmed, Judg. 3:16 f. seems to be a short cubit; so Jewish tradition; see Moore, JBL 12:104 [93].

The NT term is πῆχυς, Mt. 6:27 Lk. 12:25.

CUCKOW, RV 'seamew' (חֲפָז; lāpos [BAFL]; Lev. 11:16 Dt. 14:15†), is mentioned among unclean birds. It cannot be identified with certainty. The Heb. root probably signifies leanness; thus the kindred word נֶחֱשֵׁף, ṣahhēpheth (cp Ar. ṣahāf), denotes consumption or phthisis. There is no settled Jewish tradition; but 𐤀 and Vg. are very likely right in understanding some kind of aquatic bird, perhaps the tern (Sterna fluviatilis, FFP, 135). The AV 'cuckow' comes from the Geneva Bible.

CUCUMBERS

Two species of cuckoo spend the summer in Palestine: Cuculus canorus, the widely-spread common cuckoo, which returns from its winter quarters towards the end of March; and the great spotted cuckoo, Coccyzus glandarius, which arrives rather earlier. Canon Tristram enumerates nine species of tern belonging to two genera found in Palestine, some of which are plentiful along the sea coasts and around the inland waters, especially in winter. The shearwater, Puffinus, is another identification suggested for the Ṣahāph. P. yelkouanus, an inhabitant of the Mediterranean and other seas, has acquired the name of 'âme damnée' from the French-speaking inhabitants of the Bosphorus, its restless habits having given rise among the Mohammedan population to the notion that it is the corporeal habitation of lost souls. N. M. —A. E. S.

CUCUMBERS (כִּמְצִי, kīṣṣi'im; CIKYAI [-YOI BābL], Nu. 11:5†) and Garden of Cucumbers (כִּמְצִי, mīṣṣāh; CIKYHATON, Is. 18 Bar. 6:70[69]†). Forms analogous to the word rendered 'cucumber' occur in Arabic, Aramaic, Ethiopic, Assyrian, and Carthaginian; and probably Gr. *κυκίνιον*¹ is the same word with the first two consonants transposed.² It is thus known that what is meant is some kind of gourd, cucumber, or melon, perhaps primarily Cucumis Chate, L. (Löw, 330), which is now regarded as a variety of the melon (Cucumis Melo; see Hasselquist, Iter Palest. 491).

The cucumber itself, Cucumis sativus, originated in NW. India, and certainly the Sanscrit name saukasa looks strikingly like σκωσος. It seems clear that the cucumber reached the Mediterranean region pretty early. De Candolle (Or. Pl. Cult. 212) says that there is no evidence that it was known in ancient Egypt; this, however, applies equally to the melon (208).

כִּמְצִי (for כִּמְצִי) is simply 'place of cucumbers'; Ar. and Syr. have similar words with the same meaning. Cp FOOD, § 5. N. M. —W. T. T. -D.

CUMMIN (כִּמְצִי, kyminon, cyminum, Is. 28:25† Mt. 23:23†) is the seed of an umbelliferous herbaceous plant (Cuminum cyminum, L.) which is used as a condiment with different kinds of food. A native of the Mediterranean region,³ it was from an early period largely spread over W. Asia.⁴ The Heb. name, which is of unknown origin, is found also in Arab., Syr., Eth., and Carthaginian, and has passed into Greek, Latin, and many modern languages, including English.

Cummin is often referred to by ancient writers. Thus two early Greek comedians include it in lists of condiments (Meineke, 738 437); Dioscorides (861 f.) and Pliny (20 14 [57]) describe its medicinal properties, the latter noticing especially its effect in producing paleness—referred to by Horace (Ep. i. 19 18, 'exsangue cuminum') and by Persius (v. 55, 'pallentis grana cumini').

The mention of the seed in Mt. 23:23 as a trifling object on which tithe was rigidly imposed by the Pharisees reminds us of the Greek use of κυμνοπλῆστης ('cummin-sawer') for a niggard or skinflint (Arist. Eth. N. iv. 139). In Is. 28:27, where Yahwē's varied discipline of Israel is illustrated by the care and discrimination with which the husbandman performs his appointed task, it is noticed that finer grains, cummin and נֶחֱשֵׁף (see FITCHES), are threshed with staff and rod, the heavier treatment by the threshing wain being reserved for coarser seeds. textile fabrics (Ex. 26:13† 286:15 368:35 393:8 [P]) suggests some specialised meaning (see EMBROIDERY).¹

𐤀 usually has ὑφάντης or ὑφαντός; Vg. usually polymitaris or opus polymitarium, the work of the damask weaver (see WEAVING). AVmg. (Ex. 26:1), perhaps less accurately, has 'embroiderer' (see EMBROIDERY). On the other hand, the 'cunning work' (כִּנְיָה) of Ex. 31:4 35:32 33:35 2 Ch. 2:14 [13] is mainly that of the metal worker and jeweller; in 2 Ch. 20:15 it is that of the military engineer.

CUP. The seven Hebrew and Greek words rendered 'cup' in EV can be but imperfectly distinguished; see, however, FLAGON, GOBLET, MEALS, POTTERY; also, on Joseph's divining cup, DIVINATION, § 3 [3], JOSEPH; and on the 'cup of blessing' (1 Cor. 10:16), EUCHARIST, PASSOVER.

The figure of a wine-cup occurs frequently to express the effect, whether cheering (Ps. 23:5) or the reverse,² of providential appointments.

Special applications. The prophets being primarily messengers of woe, the second of these applications predominates. In the NT the figure describes the sufferings willingly accepted by Christ and his followers (Mt. 20:22 f. 26:39, etc.), and is used in the older Jewish sense in Revelation (e.g., 14:10 16:19). Nowhere does the term 'cup' stand by itself in the sense of 'destiny'; the use described above never produced what may be called a technical sense of כּוֹס, 'cup.' In Ps. 116:165 it is a second כּוֹס, meaning 'appointment, destiny,' from כּוֹס = כּוֹס, 'to number, to determine,' that is used. 'The portion of my (or their) cup' should be 'my (or their) destined portion.' No one can drink 'fire and brimstone,' nor can 'cup' and 'lot' stand as parallel expressions. From the list of passages we designedly omit Ps. 116:13; 'lift up the cup of salvation' should be 'lift up the ensign of victory' (reading נִסִּי; see ENSIGN).

For 'aggān, נֶגֶן, Is. 22:24 EV, see BASON, 1. For Jer. 35:5, נֶגֶן, gābiū, Joseph's silver divining cup, Gen. 44:2 22:16 f., see above. For the bowls upon the golden candlestick (Ex. 25:31 f. 37:17 f.) see CANDLESTICK, § 2. For כּוֹס, kōs, the common term (Gen. 40:11, etc.), see MEALS, § 12. For Jer. 52:19, נֶגֶן, neṣāḥḥiṭh (AV 'cup'), and Jer. 52:19, נֶגֶן, saph (RV 'cup'), see BASON, 4. For Nu. 4:7 RV, 1 Ch. 28:17 EV, נֶגֶן, kesāwōth, see FLAGON. The NT term is ποτήριον (in 𐤀 for kōs), Mt. 23:25 26:27, etc.

CUPBEARER (כִּנְיָה, lit. 'one who gives to drink'; ΟΙΝΟΧΟΟΣ). In Eastern courts, where the fear of intrigues and plots was never absent, cupbearers were naturally men whose loyalty was above suspicion; they frequently enjoyed the sovereign's confidence, and their post was one of high importance and honour (so, e.g., at the court of Cambyses, Her. 3:34; cp Marquart, Philologus, 55 229). The only reference to cupbearers in Israel is in the unique chapter describing Solomon's court, 1 K. 10:5 (οἰνοχόους [L]) = 2 Ch. 9:4. Elsewhere cupbearers are spoken of in connection with Egypt (Gen. 40:1-23 41:9), Shushan (Neh. 1:11 οἰνοχόους [B⁹ a]), and Nineveh (Tob. 1:22). It is perhaps hardly necessary to add that the Assyrian RABSHAKEH [g. v.] has nothing to do with 'cupbearer.'

In Gen. 12:1, EV 'butler' כִּנְיָה, 'chief butler' (40:2 ἀρχιοινοχόος [ADL]). In v. 13 𐤀 aptly uses ἀρχιοινοχόος where the Hebrew has נֶגֶן, 'position, office.' With reference to Neh. 1:11, it is worth noticing that Nehemiah was only one of the cupbearers to Artaxerxes (not the cupbearer; cp Be. -Rys.). 𐤀 finds a reference to male and female cupbearers in Eccles. 2:8 (יְשׁוּת) שָׁה, οἰνοχόον [-ους N^c a] και οἰνοχόας; but see ECCLESIASTES, § 2. The chance allusion in Jos. Ant. xvi. 8 i says that at the court of Herod (as was also the case in Assyria) the cupbearers were eunuchs (𐤀's οἰνοχόος above may, of course, be nothing more than an error). See, generally, MEALS, § 11 end.

CUSH. 1. A (non-Semitic) people called Kašše is mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as dwelling in the border country between N. Elam and Media. Sennacherib (Tayl. Cyl. 164 ff.; KB 187) describes this region as difficult to traverse, and as not subjugated by any of his predecessors. In fact, it was a conquering race that dwelt there. To it belonged the dynasty which ruled over Babylonia for nearly six centuries—a lengthened rule, the consequence of which was the infusion of a large Kaššite element into the population of Babylonia, especially S. Babylonia, which might fitly be called the land of Kaš. It is this Kaš or Koš (whence MT's Kūš)¹ that is intended in Gen. 10.8, where NIMROD [g.v.] is called the son of Cush. That the Babylonian Kaš is meant in Gen. 2.13 as the passage now stands, is much less easy to make out (see PARADISE), while to hold with Winckler (AT Untersuch. 146 ff.) that Isaiah refers to the S. Babylonian Kaš in the difficult prophecy, Is. 18, can be rendered possible only by somewhat improbable textual criticism and exegesis.

Wi.'s result (1892) is that the embassy mentioned by Isaiah is that of Merodach-baladan to Hezekiah in 720 B.C., and his strongest argument is that 'the streams of Cush' in Is. 18.1 is not applicable to the kingdom of Ethiopia, which had but one stream, the Nile. The answer is that the geographical knowledge of the writer was naturally but small, and that the island of Meroë, to which the residence of the Ethiopian kings was removed after Taharka's time, is formed by the union of the Nile, the Atbara, and the Blue Nile. On grounds independent of Wi.'s hypothesis, the words מִן־קִישׁ are correctly held to be a late interpolation. (See further Che. and Haupt in Isaiah, Heb. SBOT.)

2. The question of the existence of an Arabian Cush has passed into a new phase since the discovery by

2. Arabian. Winckler (Musri, 2 [198]) of a N. Arabian land of Kuš contiguous to the N. Arabian Muṣr or Muṣri, and together with it forming the region called Meluhha (see MIZRAIM, § 2b). The land being known as Kūš (= קִישׁ) to the Assyrians, we cannot avoid a re-examination of the more difficult OT passages in which קִישׁ (Cush) or קִישִׁי (Cushi) occurs. Referring first to the Pentateuch and reserving the complicated question arising out of Gen. 2.13 for subsequent consideration, we see at once (a) how probable it is that in the list of names in Gen. 10.6 Cush is an Arabian and not an African country; for none of the eleven names in Gen. 10.67 can be supposed to be African except Cush, Mizraim, Put, and Seba, and of these Mizraim (read rather Mizrim) has been claimed elsewhere for Arabia, while PUT [g.v.] is at any rate not Libya, and Seba (סְבָא), which resists all attempts to localise it in Africa, may well be suspected to be only another form of Sheba (שֶׁבָא)—i.e., the well-known Arabian Sabæans. It is true Sheba appears in v. 7 as a son of Raamah; but no objection can be based upon that. The same name probably fixed itself in slightly different forms in different localities, and in Ps. 72.10 we even find סְבָא (which has intruded into the text) as a variant to שְׁבָא. (Possibly Shēbā, שֶׁבָא should everywhere rather be Sēbā, שֶׁבָא.) This conclusion greatly reduces the error committed by the redactor of Gen. 10 in inserting vv. 8.10-15.18-19 (which belong to J) between vv. 6.f. and v. 20 (which belong to P); for the population of the Babylonian land of Kaš, to which Nimrod belonged, was largely formed by the immigration of 'Chaldean' tribes (כְּשִׁימִים) whose home was probably in E. Arabia. If Kaš be taken, not ethnically but geographically, as a designation of the Arabian home of the ancestors of a large part of the people of S. Babylonia, it was not incorrect to regard Nimrod as related to the Cush mentioned in v. 6.f. (For I's view see NIMROD, MIZRAIM.)

(b) In Nu. 11.1 (E) we hear of 'the Cushite woman' whom Moses had married. In Ex. 2.16.21 (J) his wife Zipporah is represented as a Midianite. A northern locality for Midianites is probable even without the very doubtful passage 1 K. 11.18 (cp HADAD, 3). There is no necessity to follow Wellhausen in his excision of the whole of Nu. 12.1; at any rate 'the Cushite woman' comes from an early source. See MOSES.

(g) Am. 9.7. Who are the קִישִׁים? Hardly the 'children of the Ethiopians' (EV). What evidence have we that the Ethiopians were regarded with contempt in Amos's time? Probably the prophet looked nearer home, and saw the misery inflicted on the Arabian Cush by some great mischance in war (cp Wi., op. cit. 8).

(h) Hab. 3.7, 'the tents of Cushan.' מִשְׁכְּן should perhaps become מִשְׁכָּן, Cush; at any rate, N. Arabian peoples are meant in both parts of the verse. See CUSHAN.

(i) Job 1.17. It is quite possible to read קִישִׁים or קִישִׁים, Cushi(ים) מִן־קִישׁ (Che. JQR 4.575) for כְּשִׁימִים (EV 'Chaldeans' [g.v.]), which is not without difficulty, and to explain this of the N. Arabian Cushites, who must at any rate be referred to.

(j) In 2 Ch. 21.16 we hear of 'Cushites' beside the Arabians (cp ARABIA), a reminiscence of whose predatory raids probably underlies the distorted tradition of 'Zerah the Cushite' (see ZERAH) in 2 Ch. 14.9 ff.

(k) Ps. 83.7 [8]. עִמְיָן־צֹר, 'with the inhabitants of Tyre,' should be מִצֹּר וְקִישׁ, 'Muṣri and Cush'; a similar emendation is required in Ps. 87.4. The combination of Philistines and Tyrians, Tyrians and Ethiopians, presented in MT, is extremely improbable.

CUSH (קִישׁ) [BNAR], chusi [Vg.], קִישׁ [Tg.] a Benjamite (Ps. 7, heading). The text, however, is corrupt.

Cushi (Q al.) is a very poor conjecture (see CUSHI, 3). No doubt 'Cush' should be 'Kish' (see Tg.), and the text should run קִישׁ בְּיָמֵי מֶלְכִּי. The missing name was either Mordecai (Esth. 2.5; cp Che. OPS 229 f.) or, perhaps more probably, Shimei (g.v., 10), a member of the clan of Kish (so Kay, Che. Ps. (2)). In the former case, David was supposed to be speaking in the name of Mordecai; in the latter, the curses of Shimei are the supposed occasion of the psalm.

CUSHAN (כִּשְׁיָן; αἰθιοπικ [BN^a, c, bAQ], εθ. [N*]), Hab. 3.7. The name should mean '(a clan) belonging to Cush,' on the analogy of Ithran, Kenan, Lotan (but see CUSH, i. § 2 h). It is at any rate parallel to Midian. This agrees with OT passages which appear to place the Midianites in N. Arabia, where, according to the evidence produced by Winckler, there was a region known to the Assyrians as Kūš or Cush. See CUSH, i. 2; MIDIAN.

The name of a king of Aram (MT ARAM-NAHARAIM [q.v.]: a very rare expression), who is said to have

1. The story oppressed the Israelites after their conquest of Canaan for eight years, till Othniel ben Kenaz overthrew him (Judg. 3.7-11). The story of this oppression and deliverance is introduced as a typical illustration of the edifying theory of Israelitish history put forward in Judg. 2.11-19, and was wanting in the pre-Deuteronomistic book of heroic stories which forms the basis of our JUDGES (q.v., §§ 35). Hence we are not surprised that it presents none of the characteristics of narratives founded upon genuine popular traditions, and that only two assertions emerge out of the phrases of which it mainly consists—viz., that the land of Israel was conquered by an early Aramaean king, and that the Israelites were delivered by the Judahite (Kenizzite) hero Othniel. These assertions, however, are contradictory. Even in the early time of David the clans of Judah had but a slight connection with Israel, and in the time of Debōrah's insurrection, it appears, they stood entirely aloof from the Israelites (see Judg. 5). It is historically impossible that the Judahite clan of Othniel could have played the glorious part ascribed to it in the story. Budde (Ri. Sa. 95), therefore, while admitting that the oppression of Cushan-rishathaim may conceivably rest on a traditional basis, rejects Othniel's championship. The editor of Judges, he remarks, belonged no doubt to the tribe of Judah, and took a pleasure in giving it a representative among the 'judges.' Similarly Wellhausen and Stade.

It is more probable, however, that the whole trouble is caused by an error in the text.

There is some reason to think that the true reading of 5 in Judg. 3.8 is . . . Χουσαρσάθαιμ βασιλεύς (βασιλέα) Συρίας

(note the position of ποταμῶν in v. 8, and see Field's Hex. on v. 10).¹ Even apart from this, it is not too bold to emend ארם, 'Aram,' into the name. ארם, Edom (as in 2 K. 16.6), and to omit נהרם as a gloss (with Grätz, Klost.). That Othniel the Kenizzite should be the deliverer of Judah from the Edomite tyranny is only natural. Observe that the next oppressors are the Moabites. Whether we may go on to correct Rishathaim into Kosh-hat-timāni, 'the chief of the Temanites,' with Klost. (Gesch. 122), and to work into this paragraph the isolated passage 1.36 by prefixing הן, 'and he smote,' is problematical. It seems to the present writer enough to read, for הַיְשָׁעִי הַיְשָׁעִי הַיְשָׁעִי, 'from the land of the Temanites,' which is the description attached to the name of the Edomite king Husham in Gen. 36.34. The letters became partly defaced, and an editor wittily read הַיְשָׁעִי. It is very possible, too, that the name כושן (Cushan) is a corruption of הושן (הושן) Husham (cp Klost. 119). The writer was at a loss for a name, and took one from the list of Edomite kings. Husham's son Hadad was a great warrior (v. 35); it was natural to make the father equal to him in this respect. Whether we may suppose that the editor to whom we are indebted for 'Cushan-rishathaim, king of Aram-naharaim,' had in his mind Kassite (Cushite) incursions such as some scholars connect with NIMROD and ZERAH (q.v.), which might be loosely stated to have proceeded from 'Aram-naharaim,' may be doubted. For a different view of the origin of the story as given in MT see Moore (Judges, 88 f.), who thinks that we have here a distortion of the tradition of a raid of Midianitish 'Cushites' into Judah.

Those who prefer to take the book of Judges as it

3. Other stands, without applying critical methods, theories. Cushan-rishathaim to choose from.

Prof. M'Curdy (Hist. Proph. Mon. 1.230; cp 221) thinks that the 'whole land' (of Canaan) may have been subdued by the Aramaeans, who, during the enfeeblement of Assyria, had re-occupied the land of Mitāni, the Egyptian Naharina, which includes W. Mesopotamia (see RP (2) 859), some time before the accession of Tiglath-pileser I. (1120 B.C.). In the ease with which the asserted conquest of the strong cities of Canaan was effected by the Aramaeans, in the name Cushan-rishathaim, and in the championship of a Kenizzite or Judahite hero, he finds no difficulty. Prof. Sayce, too, in his ingenious defence of a non-critical view of the narrative (Crit. Mon. 297-300), makes no remark on the name of Israel's oppressor, and holds Othniel to have been the deliverer of 'S. Palestine' from the tyranny of the army of the king of Mitāni at the time of the invasion of Egypt by the N. peoples somewhere about 1210 B.C. (reign of Rameses III.). The imaginativeness of Prof. Sayce's statements respecting the king of Mitāni's movements has been pointed out by Driver (Contemp. Rev. 65.420 f. [94]). In fact, the statement that the king of Mitāni 'participated in the southward movement of the peoples of the N.,' but 'lingered on the way,' and presumably 'sought to secure that dominion in Canaan which had belonged to some of his predecessors,' has no monumental evidence in its favour. If tradition had preserved the memory of any incident in the great migration of the N. peoples, would it not have been the desolation of the land of Amur (N. Palestine) caused by the N. peoples themselves? It should be added that Stade (Gesch. 1.69) positively denies that there is any basis of tradition in the story, and both Budde and G. F. Moore (whose treatment of Judg. 3.7-11 is thoroughly good) are half inclined to agree with him. Stade, however, goes too far when he says that the form of the name Cushan-rishathaim is enough to prove it unhistorical (Gesch. 1.69; cp Kuonen, Einführung, 1, § 19, n. 1). Nor is this assumption at all essential to his theory. [Since the above was written, Klost.'s view has been adopted by J. Marquart (Pund. 11).] T. K. C.

CUSHI (כּוּשִׁי, 'Cushite'; cp JEHUDI and the Moabite name Mušuri (man of Mušur) in the lists of Esarhaddon and Ašur-bāni-pal, KAT (2) 356, no. 4; ΧΟΥΣΕΙ [BAL], chusi [Vg.]).

3. הַכּוּשִׁי, RV 'the Cushite,' the messenger whom Joab despatched, in preference to Ahimaaz, to inform David of the death of Absalom. Ahimaaz, we are told, following later ran by the way of the plain² and reached David first (2 S. 18.19-32). Two questions arise. Who was 'the Cushite'? and why did Joab prefer him to Ahimaaz as the messenger? The account, which has been taken from a fuller narrative, does not say. Evidently 'the Cushite' was a foreigner, and this was the reason why, like the Amalekite in 2 S. 1, he could without offence be the bearer of evil tidings. That David had foreign soldiers (e.g., the Hittite Uriah) is well known. 'The Cushite' was not (as H. P. Sm. supposes) a negro. We can hardly doubt that he belonged to the N. Arabian Cush³ (see CUSH, § 2).

Israel (2 K. 17.24), identified with Tell-Ibrāhim, NE. of Babylon, where remains of Nergal's temple have been found. It is the Kutā or Kutū of the cuneiform inscriptions. Before the rise of Babylon, Kutā and Sippar, it appears, were the chief cities of N. Babylonia. As late as the time of Ašur-bāni-pal it was obligatory on the kings of Assyria to sacrifice to Šamaš and NERGAL (q.v.) at Sippar and Kutā respectively, a custom apparently due to the primitive importance of these cities in the 'kingdom of the Four Quarters of the World'; (Winckler, G.A. 33.281).

We have a record of the building of the temple of Nergal in Kutā by Dungi, King of Ur (K.B. 2.81); and Nebuchadnezzar mentions among his pious acts that he restored the temples of the great gods at Kutā (KB 3651). It was from the temple of Nergal that one of the creation-stories brought from Ašur-bān-pāl's library is stated to have come (CP 21147-153); see CREATION, § 16. The name 'Cuthæans' lies hidden under ARCHVITES (q.v.) in Ezra 49. In the phraseology of the later Jews 'Cuthæans' is equivalent to 'Samaritans' (so in Jos. and the Talmud). With this name is probably to be connected the COUTH of 1 Esd. 5 32 (not in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah).

T. K. C.

CUTTING OFF. This penalty ('I [Yahwè] will cut him off from among his people,' 'he shall be cut off from his people,' 'from Israel,' 'from the assembly,' and the like; הכרתו אתו מקרב עמו) is first met with in H¹ (see LEVITICUS), where it is attached to a variety of offences, many of them of a ceremonial or technical character (Lev. 17 49, failure to bring slain ox, lamb, or goat to the tabernacle; 17 10 14, eating blood; 18 29, various 'abominations'; 20 5 f., Moloch-worship; 20 17 f., incest, etc.; 22 3, unclean approach to holy things). It occurs frequently in P (Gen. 17 14, neglect of circumcision; Ex. 12 15, eating leaven in paschal season; Ex. 30 33 38, imitating or putting to secular use the holy oil or incense; Ex. 31 14, sabbath profanation; Lev. 7 20 f., unclean sacrificial eating; 7 25 27, eating of fat or blood; 19 8, eating sacrifice on third day; 23 29, non-observance of day of atonement; Nu. 9 13, failure to keep the passover though clean and not on a journey; 15 30 f., high-handed sin, insult to Yahwè; 19 13, contact with dead; 19 20, failure to remove uncleanness from contact with dead by sprinkling).

The view of the older interpreters was that the expression meant the death penalty. It is worth noticing, however, that in Ex. 31¹⁴ f. separate emphasis is laid on 'he shall be put to death' (מוֹת יוֹמָה) as distinguished from 'that soul shall be cut off' (וְנִכְרְתָה הַנֶּפֶשׁ הַזֶּה); cp. Lev. 20²⁷ (death penalty on witchcraft, the Deuteronomic expression בָּעֵר הָרֵעַ, 'put away the evil,' Dt. 13⁵ [6] (in connection with the death penalty on the false prophet or dreamer of dreams), and perhaps also Lev. 23²⁹ f., וְנִכְרְתָה, followed by הָאֲבוֹרֵי, gradation of penalties. If account be taken of the actual circumstances amid which H and P arose, it seems more probable that the writers had in their mind either some such idea as that which was carried into practice under Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 10⁸, 'separated from the congregation of the captivity,' || 1 Esd. 9⁴, 'cast out from the multitude of them that were of the captivity'), and ultimately developed into the minor and major excommunications of the synagogue (see SYNAGOGUE), or that they thought only of death through divine agency, not of punishment inflicted at the hands of the community (Driver on Lev. 7²⁰ f.). See, further, BAN.

CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH (Ceremonial Mutilations). The former heading is derived from the EV of Lev. 19:28 21:5. It is, however, too narrow in its range. Circumcision cannot altogether be left out in dealing with the 'cuttings' referred to in these passages; nor can we forget how intimately the laceration of the flesh in mourning is associated with the practice of shaving the head or cutting off part of the hair. The origin and significance of CIRCUMCISION [q.v.] is treated elsewhere. The present article will deal with (1) incisions (§ 1 f.), (2) the cutting off of the hair (§§ 3-5), and (3) tattooing (§ 6 f.), regarded as ceremonial mutilations (see further SACRIFICE).

The technical Hebrew terms for ceremonial incisions are שרט, שרטה (שרט verb);² the verb התנדר also is used.

1. References to cuttings. In Lev. 215 [H] we read (with reference to mourning for the dead), 'They shall not make . . . any cuttings in their flesh' (point שרמט, as plur. of שרמט?). The practice

¹ It may be noted that the 'I' is peculiar to H, as also the phrase 'I will set my face' (Lev. 17 to 20 36 26 17) or 'put my face' (20 5) against the offender.

² Aram. ܥܪܬܐ, Ass. šarātu, Ar. šaraṭa, strictly 'to cut into,' 'nick,' or 'notch.'

CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH

was forbidden especially to the priests, who would thereby 'profane' themselves. The substantive שָׂרֵפִים occurs in Lev. 19:28: 'Ye shall not make any cutting in your flesh for a (departed) soul.' (On the only other passage [Zech. 12:3] in which שָׂרֵפִים occurs no stress can be laid).¹ There is no exact parallel for this Hebrew usage in Assyrian; but we do find karātu used of rending a garment in token of grief (a passage in Sargon's Annals, 294, gives a striking parallel to 2S. 12), and probably enough this rending was an attenuation of the more savage custom of rending the flesh.² Ašur-bāni-pal (Smith, 1278r) too speaks of his warriors as those who 'at the behest of the gods let themselves be hacked to pieces in the fray' (ittanašrafu). On this it may be remarked that the case of mourners who shed their blood to feed the manes of departed friends is analogous to that of soldiers who do this on the battlefield in obedience to the gods. A supposed second term for ceremonial incisions (יָדָה) is simply due to misunderstanding. In Jer. 48³⁷ we should read with ^{BA} כָּל יָדַיִם ('all hands are cut into'); the prefixed יָד in MT is an error; יָדָה is, in fact, participial. The reflexive form יִתְחַדֵּד occurs in Dt. 14r (parallel to the already cited passage of Lev.), and at least six times elsewhere. The primary meaning of the simple stem is obviously 'to cut off'; cp Ar. jadda, jadda, יָדָה. The ceremonial cutting referred to was an ordinary custom of mourners in the time of Jeremiah, to dispense with which would have been something very strange and unusual (Jer. 166 415 475); evidently the contemporaries of the prophet did not recognise the law in Dt. 141. The incisions referred to in Mic. 5:1 [414], 'Now hack thyself [so Nowack], O daughter of attack,' must also be signs of mourning; and this may well be the case too in Jer. 57, where מְתוּרִי, 'they would cut themselves,' implies that the apostate Jews who resorted to the Whore's House (i.e., the idol temple) wished to bring over the Deity to their side by self-mutilation. This description of the prophet may be illustrated by 1 K. 1828, where the 'cutting' practised by the priests of Baal is said to have been after this custom or ritual, and to have followed the ritual dance by or round the altar (see DANCE, § 5). Hosea, too (714), speaks of Israelites who 'because of corn and new wine cut themselves,' to propitiate their god (reading מְתוּרִי with 5BAQ, We., Che., RV^{mg}).

The practice of shedding the blood in one way or another as an honour due to the dead is world-wide.

2. Significance. It is found not only among the Hebrews and the Arabs (We. Heid.⁽²⁾ 181), but also among the ancient Greeks and the modern African and Polynesian peoples. 'The blood is the life'; and it is probable that when in primitive times the mourning kin 'cut themselves for the dead,' they did it in the belief that the departed drank in new life with the blood thus poured out by the willing self-sacrifice of sorrowing friends, and at the same time renewed their bond of union with the living (cp Eschatology § 3, 4).

Such acts doubtless had a sacrificial or sacramental aspect; and in view of the fact that the disembodied spirit was conceived as possessing a quasi-divine or dæmonic character, with undefined potencies for good and evil, it may be assumed that the blood-offering was, or became, as much a conciliatory present to the manes of the dead as that of slain victims was intended to be to the higher gods. It may even have been thought that, as the deceased man had passed into another world on leaving the circle of his kin, he had in some sense become a stranger to them, and that therefore it was necessary to make a blood-covenant with him, and so secure his good-will for the tribe or family. The radical change of death might suggest that as the corporate unity of the departed with his clan had been broken, it must be restored by giving the dead to drink of the blood of the living kindred.

² There was no longer any consciousness of this when the post-exilic prophet Joel wrote, 'Rend your heart, and not your garments' (Joel 2:13). Else he would have said, 'Rend your heart, and not your flesh' (cp Jer. 4:4).

CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH

Bearing in mind that ritual practices acquire a new symbolism as time goes on, and that affection for the dead has often evinced itself, even at a high stage of culture, by suicide over the corpse, and by such customs as the Hindu Sati, we may be inclined to see in the 'incisions for the dead,' as practised in the period of the great prophets, a symbolical expression for the willingness of the mourner to depart and be with the loved and lost one.

The passages which mention incisions of the flesh also mention cutting off the hair as a sign of mourning.

3. Cutting off hair.

Thus Lev. 21.5 [H]: 'They (the priests) shall not make a bare bald patch on their head, and the corner of their beard they shall not shave off' (cp Lev. 19.27 Dt. 14.1, 'And ye shall not set baldness between your eyes'—i.e., on the forehead—for one that is dead'); Ezekiel, too (44.20), forbids artificial baldness to the priests. The prevalence of the custom of cutting off the hair in token of deep grief is, however, presupposed by the earlier prophets, who take no exception to it. Micah says, addressing a city community, 'Make thee bald and shear thee for thy darling children; make broad thy baldness like the vulture's; for they are carried away captive from thee' (Mic. 1.14). See also Am. 8.10 Is. 22.12 (cp 3.24) Jer. 7.29 166 Ezek. 7.18; such passages show that the prohibition of the custom referred to belongs to a later age of religious legalism. In Dt. 14.1 these practices are forbidden to Israelites generally, on account of their relation to Yahwè, on the principle on which Aaronites with any physical defect are excluded from the service of the altar (Lev. 21.16-23).

Cutting off the hair was also the most characteristic expression of an Arab woman's mourning. When Hâlid b. al-Walid died, all the women of his family offered their hair at his grave (Agh. 15.12; We. Heid. (2) 182). It was a sacrifice to the dead, and the underlying idea of the offering is suggested by the story of Samson. 'If I be shaven,' said that hero, 'my strength will go from me' (Judg. 16.17). In other words, the hair, the growth of which was continually renewed, appeared to the ancients a centre of vitality, like the blood;¹ and thus to offer it, whether to deity (Nu. 6.18) or to the spirits of the dead, had essentially the same import and purpose as to offer one's blood, the aim being to originate or to renew a bond of vital union between the worshipper and the unseen power. Regarded as sacrificial acts, both blood-

4. Initiatory ceremonials. letting and offering the hair were 'private acts of worship,' performed by the individual for his own good as distinct from that of the community; and both are common elements in ceremonies of initiation by which youths are admitted to the rights of manhood, especially to marriage and participation in the tribal worship. Thus CIRCUMCISION [q.v., § 4] was originally a rite preliminary to marriage (Ex. 4.24-26); and Lucian (Dea Syr. 60) informs us that the long locks of young people were shorn and dedicated at the old Syrian sanctuaries on the same occasion. In the course of time the barbarous character of the blood-offering caused it to lapse from general use, except among certain priesthoods and votaries; whilst the hair-offering, which in origin and principle was identical, survived to the close of Paganism, and may be recognised in the tonsure of early Christian Monachism.

The passage Lev. 19.27 (H; about 570 B.C.) has already been referred to. It is a prohibition of a cated, it seems, by the nickname 'Shorn-pates' (צָרוּרָה) applied by Jeremiah to some Arabian peoples (RV, also AV mg., 'all that have the corners [of their hair] polled'; Jer. 9.26 [25] 25.23 49.32). There can be little doubt that this, like most other ancient tribal badges and customs, had religious associations and a religious significance; in fact, Herodotus (38) expressly says that the Arabs pretended to imitate their national god Orotal-Dionysos by their peculiar tonsure. Hence, no doubt, the practice was forbidden to the Jews by the older Levitical code (Lev. 19.27), the object being to isolate the people of Yahwè from the neighbouring nations and their worships. On the other hand, there were some important religious customs which, though of ethnic origin, were not abolished by the law. Hence it was that the Nazirite continued to make an offering to Yahwè of his shorn hair (see NAZIRITE)—a practice which survived, in a shape modified by circumstances, in the days of Paul (Acts 21.23-26; cp 18.18). See HAIR, § 2 f.

What we call 'tattooing' also is prohibited (Lev. 19.28). The expression טָטֹעַ נֶחֱוָה does not occur again in the OT; but in New Hebrew טָטֹעַ means the same as the Greek στιγματίζειν, to set a mark on a thing by pricking, puncturing, or branding (see Buxtorf; it is also used of fowls scratching the ground).

6. Tattooing, etc.

The object of graving or branding marks on the flesh would appear to be dedication of the person to his god. Herodotus (2.113) mentions a temple of Herakles at Taricheia, by the Canopic mouth of the Nile, where a runaway slave might find asylum if he 'gave himself to the god' by having certain 'sacred stigmata' made on him.¹ In Is. 44.5 we have a good instance of graving a divine name on the hand, in token of self-dedication: 'One will say, I am Yahwè's; and another will name himself by the name of Jacob; and another will mark on his hand Yahwè's, and receive the surname Israel' (SBOT; cp critical notes). As far as they indicated the ownership or property of the god, such marks are analogous to the wusum or cattle-marks of the Bedawi tribes, and may have had their origin in that necessary practice of primitive pastoral life (cp col. 711, n. 1). In Ezek. 9.46 we read of marking a

Tau or cross, the symbol of life (cp the Egyptian , nh, life, with , the Phœnician form of the letter Tau) on the foreheads of the faithful in Jerusalem, who are to be spared from slaughter; which recalls the sealing of the 144,000 servants of God on their foreheads (Rev. 7.3 f.), and further, the mark of the Beast (χάρagma, something graven, Acts 17.29) on the right hand or the forehead of his worshippers (Rev. 13.16 f. 20.4). The strongly metaphorical words of Paul, too, I bear in my body the marks (or brands) of Jesus, τὰ στιγματα τοῦ Ἰησοῦ (Gal. 6.17) clearly presuppose a custom of tattooing or branding the flesh with sacred names and symbols, which would be familiar as a heathen practice to Paul's Asiatic converts.²

In Ex. 13.9 Dt. 6.8 11.18 and elsewhere we have what may be regarded as a substitute for the painful processes

7. Substitutes. of tattooing and branding. The Israelite is to bind the precepts of the Law on his hand for a sign; they are also to serve as FRONTLETS [q.v.] (פָּרָשִׁים, phylacteries) between his eyes,—i.e., on his forehead (cp Dt. 6.8 Rev. 7.3). The sign on the hand recalls the sign which Yahwè set on Cain (Gen. 4.15: see CAIN, § 4), whilst those strips of inscribed vellum, the phylacteries (= 'frontlets,' EV of OT) of Mt. 23.5, were looked upon as having magical qualities, not less than the old tattooings and brandings; they were a protection against harm,¹ and probably also secured health and good fortune (cp Targ. Cant. 83).

CYAMON (ΚΥΑΜΩΝ [BNA]; chelmon [Vg.]; سحلون [Syr.]), 'which is over against Esdraelon' (Judith 73), looks like a corruption of JOKNEAM or (Movers) JOKMEAM. Robinson, however, noting that κυάμων means 'beanfield,' identifies it with the modern El Füleh, 'the bean,' on the plain itself but 'over against' the city 'of Jezreel.' Cp Bu. Pal. 210. The name Cyamon should probably be restored in Judith 44 for Κωνα [B]. See KONAE.

CYPRESS, RV HOLM TREE (הָיָתָן, Is. 44:14), a tree which in the single passage where it occurs is coupled with the oak. The Hebrew tirzah does not appear in any cognate language, but may be connected with Ar. tarasa, 'to be hard.'² LXX and Pesh. omit the word; Aq. and Th. render ἀγριοβάλανος ('wild acorn'). Vg. has ilex, which is defended by Celsius (2269 ff.), and has been wisely adopted by our revisers. It is difficult, however, to be certain; for the evergreen oak (Quercus ilex, L.) is at the present day rare in Palestine (FFP 412). The heavy, hard nature of its wood would harmonise well with the probable etymology of tirzah. 'Cypress' (perhaps a mere guess) comes from the Genevan Bible. David Kimhi and others thought that what was meant was the fir tree; Luther preferred the beech. Cheyne (Is. SBOT, Heb.) thinks צִרְיָה corrupt, and with Gr., reads צִרְיָה (see PINE).

CYPRUS (ΚΥΠΡΟΣ [Ti. WH]), the third largest island of the Mediterranean, placed in the angle between the coast of Syria and that of Asia Minor (Strabo, 681), called Alasia in the Amarna letters, where its copper is specially referred to (so E. Meyer, Petrie, etc.), 'Asi' by the Egyptians, Yavnan by the Assyrians, and KITTIM (g.v.) by the Hebrews. Its physical structure is simple.

1. Description. It consists of a central plain running across the island from E. to W., bounded by a long mountain ridge to the N., and by a broader mountain district to the S.

The central plain was likened in antiquity to the valley of the Nile, being flooded annually by the Pedæus, which left rich deposits of mud. Strabo sketches the productiveness of Cyprus (684: εὐοίχως ἐστὶ καὶ εὐέλαιος, σίτω τε ἀντάρκει χρῆται). Copper (named after the island) was found in the mountains, and timber for shipbuilding.

In situation, climate, and productions, Cyprus belongs to all the three surrounding continents, and historically it has constantly shared in their vicissitudes. It is most accessible from the E. and the S., and, lying right over against Syria, was early visited by the Phoenicians, who founded Amathus, Paphos, and Citium, the last, the Phoenician capital, giving its name to the whole island.¹

² We should perhaps associate with this Syr. taras, 'to be straight.'

CYPRUS

The Phoenicians were not, however, the earliest inhabitants of Cyprus. They found in possession a people closely connected, as their art and

2. History. alphabet show, with the primitive races of Asia Minor (for WMM's theory see KITTIM, and cp As. u. Eur. 337). The Greek colonists arrived before the eighth century B.C. The discoveries in the island indicate clearly its partition between the Phœnician element in the S. and the Hellenic in the central depression stretching from Soli in the W. to Salamis in the E., at which latter site we find an art that is largely Greek. The Cypriote character was wanting in energy, and the island was almost wholly under the influence alternately of Asia and of Egypt.

(1) In 709 B.C. Sargon II., king of Assyria, was recognised as overlord by seven Cypriote princes; their tribute was continued to his grandson Esarhaddon, Schr. KA 77⁽²⁾ 368 355. (2) In the sixth century Amasis, king of Egypt, conquered the island (Herod. 2:182). Perhaps it had been conquered even before his time, by Thotmes III. In any case the πρώτος ἀνθρώπων of Herod. is an error. (3) After the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses, Cyprus fell to Persia, being included in the fifth satrapy (Herod. 3:1991).

The connection with Greece and with Hellenic ideals was brilliant but purely episodic (Evagoras, king of Salamis: 410 B.C.). The island fell into the hands of Alexander the Great, and finally remained with the Ptolemies as one of their most cherished possessions until its conquest by the Romans (cp 2 Macc. 10:13: Mahaffy, Emp. of the Ptolemies, pass.).

The Jews probably settled in Cyprus before the time of Alexander the Great (1 Macc. 15:23). Many would be attracted later by the fact that its copper mines were at one time farmed to Herod the Great (Jos. Ant. xvi. 45: a Cyprian inscr., Boeckh 2628, refers to one of the family). After the rising of the Jews in 116 A.D. in Cyrene, in Egypt, and in Cyprus had been suppressed, it was decreed that no Jew might set foot upon the island, under penalty of death, even for shipwrecked Israelites (Dio Cass. 68:32. See SALAMIS). In the history of the spread of Christianity Cyprus holds an honourable place (Acts 4:36, Joseph surnamed Barnabas). Its Jewish population heard the Gospel after Stephen's death from those whom the persecution had driven from Judæa (Acts 11:19). Some of these were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who fled to Antioch and addressed the Greeks of the city (v. 20). Cyprus was in turn the first scene of the labours of Paul with Barnabas and Mark (Acts 13:4-12), afterwards of Barnabas and Mark alone (Acts 15:39). One of the first Christian missionaries may have been that 'old disciple' Mnason with whom Paul lodged at Jerusalem (Acts 21:16). Returning to Palestine at the close of his third journey, Paul and his companions sighted Cyprus (Acts 21:3, ἀναφάναντες τὴν Κ.; AV 'discovered'), leaving it on the left hand as they ran from Patāra to Tyre. In the voyage to Rome from Cæsarea the ship 'sailed under Cyprus' (Acts 27:4, ὑπεπλεύσαμεν)—i.e., northwards 'over the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia' (v. 5: cp Str. 681)—taking advantage of the northerly and westerly set of the current, in order to reach Myra.

After its seizure by the Romans in 58 B.C. Cyprus had been united for administrative purposes with Cilicia; but in the first partition of the Roman world after Actium it was made an imperial province (Dio Cass. 53:12)—i.e., its governor, if it had one of its own, and were not rather united with Cilicia to form a single province, bore the title legatus Augusti propretore (πρεσβευτὴς Σεβαστοῦ ἀντιστράτηγος, cp Dio Cass. 53:13; in NT always ἡγεμών, cp Lk. 2:2, Str. 840 ἡγεμόνας καὶ διοικητὰς Καῖσαρ πέμπει). Why then does the writer of Acts 13:7

call Sergius Paulus 'proconsul' (ἀνθύπατος, the proper title of governors of senatorial provinces, AV 'deputy'; cp Acts 18:12-1938)? Some have argued that he used the word loosely, and appeal to Strabo (685, ἐγένετο ἐπαρχία ἡ νήσος καθάπερ καὶ νῦν ἐστὶ στρατηγική) to prove that the island was governed by a propraetor appointed by the emperor; but the writer of Acts is quite correct. From Dio Cassius (53:12) we learn that, in 22 B.C., Augustus restored Cyprus to the Senate in exchange for S. Gaul (cp Dio Cass. 54:4). In Paul's time, therefore, its governor was properly called 'proconsul.' The passage quoted from Strabo is misunderstood, as is clear from id. 840 (εἰς δὲ τὰς δημοσίας ὁ δῆμος στρατηγὸς ἢ ὑπάτος πέμπει—i.e., governors of senatorial provinces were either of consular or of praetorian rank, in either case the official title being proconsul). In the case of Cyprus, authors, inscriptions, and coins have preserved the names of some twenty of her propraetorian governors with the 'brevet' rank of proconsul. Lucius Sergius Paulus (governor at the time of Paul's visit, about 47 A.D.) is known to us from an inscription from the site of Soli (see Hogarth, Devia Cypria, 114 f. and Appendix).

CYRENE (ΚΥΡΗΝΗ [Ti. WH]), a city on the N. coast of Africa. It was the capital of that part of LIBYA

1. Position [q.v.] between the Egyptian and Carthaginian territories, which bore the name of Cyrenaica or Pentapolis; the phrase in Acts 2:10, 'the parts of Libya about Cyrene,' τὰ μέρη τῆς Λιβύης τῆς κατὰ Κυρήνην, is equivalent to the Λιβύη ἡ περὶ Κ. of Dio Cass. (53:12) and ἡ πρὸς Κυρήνη Λιβ. of Jos. Ant. xvi. 6:1. The city was thoroughly Greek in character, and won a high reputation as the mother of physicians (Herod. 3:131; temple of Asclepius, Paus. ii. 26:9; Tac. Ann. 14:18), philosophers, and poets. Callimachus, Carneades, Eratosthenes, Aristippus (Strabo, 837), and Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, are only a few of the many famous men who were sprung from the Cyrenaica. After the death of Alexander the Great, Cyrene with its territory was absorbed by Egypt. Though so thoroughly Hellenic, it had, since the time of Ptolemy son of Lagos (Jos. c. Ap. 24, end of 4th century B.C.), a large Jewish population. Strabo, quoted by Jos. Ant. xiv. 7:2, says that the Jews formed one of the four classes of the inhabitants. The privileges granted to the Jews by Ptolemy were continued and augmented by the Romans (Jos. Ant. xvi. 6:5), who received the Cyrenaica, under the will of the childless Ptolemy Apion, in 96 B.C., though for twenty years they shirked the responsibility of the legacy. In 74 B.C. the territory was made a province, which was combined with Crete when that island was subjugated in 67 B.C. (see CRETE). In 27 B.C. the Cyrenaica and Crete were definitely united to form a single province, under the title Creta Cyrenae, or Creta et Cyrenae (but either name might be used to denote the dual province: cp Tac. Ann. 3:38-70). The province was senatorial—i.e., governed by proconsuls of praetorian rank, and so remained to the time of Diocletian. The subsequent history of Cyrene is connected with its Jewish inhabitants, the chief event being their terrible massacre of the Greek and Roman citizens in the reign of Trajan (Dio Cass. 68:32).

The modern province of Barca, on the E. of the gulf of Sidra, represents the ancient Cyrenaica, and in this province Grennath marks the exact site of Cyrene, which was placed on the edge of a plateau 1800 feet above the sea-level, overlooking the Mediterranean at a distance of ten miles (Str. 837; πόλεως μεγάλης ἐν τραπέζοειδὲ πεδίῳ κειμένης, ὡς ἐκ τοῦ πελάγους ἐωράμεν αὐτήν). The port was called Apollonia. The surrounding district was, and is, of remarkable fertility (Str. l.c., ἱπποτρόφος ἀρίστη, καλλίκαρπος; Herod. 4:138 f.). The prosperity of Cyrene was based upon its export of the drug silphium, derived from an umbelliferous plant, not yet certainly identified, growing in the S. desert (see Mon. d. Inst., Pl. 47: a vase representing King Arcesilaus superintending the weighing of silphium; cp the coins; Aristoph. Plut. 925, τὸ βάττον σίλφιον).

That the Jews of Cyrene were largely Hellenised, is beyond question. Jason of Cyrene is mentioned as an

2. Jewish connection. SECOND, § 2). In the NT we hear of Simon of Cyrene who bore the cross of Jesus (Mk. 15:21 Lk. 23:26, 'S. a Cyrenian' AV; cp Matt. 27:32, 'a man of C.'; RV, 'of Cyrene' in all three passages: the adj. Κυρηναῖος is used in each case). Jews from the Cyrenaica were in the Pentecostal audience of Peter (Acts 2:10; see above on the phrase used). Cyrenæans joined with the Alexandrian and Asiatic Jews to attack Stephen (Acts 6:9), and Cyrenæan converts helped to found the first Gentile church at Antioch (ἐλάλουν καὶ πρὸς τοὺς Ἕλληνας [-νιστάς WH]; Acts 11:20). One of their first missionaries may have been the 'Lucius of Cyrene' of Acts 13:1, one of the 'prophets and teachers' who 'ministered to the Lord' in Antioch. He is said to have been the first bishop of Cyrene. Other traditions connect Mark with the foundation of the Cyrenaic church.

CYRENIUS (ΚΥΡΗΝΙΟΣ [Ti. WH]), Lk. 2:2 AV; RV QUIRINIUS.

CYRUS (צָרוּר; κύρος [BAL]), the founder of the old-Persian empire, belonged to the ancient princely

1. Origin. race of the Achæmenidæ, so called after their ancestor Achæmenes (Hakhâmanish). He was the second¹ of his name, his grandfather having been called Cyrus (Kurush, in the Babylonian inscriptions Ku-ra-as, Kur-raš, Ku-ur-ra-fu).² Cyrus was thus, without a doubt, an Aryan and Persian by descent—not an Elamite, as has recently been conjectured. For Darius Hystaspis speaks of Cambyses the son of Cyrus as being one 'of our race' (amâkham taumâyâ [Behist. i. 11]), and calls himself a Persian, son of a Persian, an Aryan of Aryan descent (Našš-i-Rustâm, a. § 2; Suez c. § 3). At first Cyrus was king only of Persia and of Anšan, or Anzan, an Elamite province—probably with Susa (Shushan) for capital—which, after the fall of the Elamite kingdom, and certainly as early as the time of his ancestor Teispes (Cišpiš), had come under the dominion of the Achæmenidæ.³ In Babylonia Cyrus calls himself by preference king of Anšan; but once, in the annals of Nabû-nâ'id (Nabonnedus), col. 2, 15, he is spoken of as 'king of Persia.' Neither state, however, was then of much importance in comparison with the great Median and Chaldean empires; both states, too, were tributary to Media. Nabû-nâ'id mentions Cyrus as the 'petty vassal' of Astyages, who had only a very small army at his disposal (5 R 64, i. 28 ff.). The career of this vassal-king, who rose till he brought under his sway the whole of Western Asia, so struck the popular imagination that a legend of world-wide diffusion respecting the foundling prince who was brought up among poor people and afterwards became a famous monarch was applied to him as it had already been applied to others; and this Persian tradition is the source from which Herodotus (1:107 ff.), and the authority upon whom Justinus depends (i. 48-13), may be supposed to have drawn. From Cyrus's own inscriptions, however, it appears that at least three of his ancestors had the same kingdom before him. It is possible, but not certain, that Cyrus in his youth may have attended the Median court, and that either he himself or his father was son-in-law of Astyages.¹

¹ In Herod. 5:11—from which Nöldeke (Aufsätze zur pers. Gesch. 15) seeks to show that Cyrus was the third of the name—Herodotus simply places the genealogies of Cambyses and of Xerxes one above the other.

² According to Herod. 1:113 f., Cyrus had previously borne another name, and Strabo (15:729) says that he was originally called Agradates, and that he did not assume the name of Cyrus till his accession to the throne. On this point cp R. Schubert, Herodot's Darstellung der Cyrrussage, 60 ff. (Breslau, '90).

Astyages (Ishruvagu on the inscriptions of Nabū-nā'id) is called at one time king of Media, at another king of the Ummān-manda,² by which, it has been conjectured, are meant the Scythians. On this assumption, Astyages might with some reason be regarded as a Scythian usurper. In the third year of Nabū-nā'id (553 B.C.) there seems to have arisen within the Median kingdom a revolt against the foreign domination. At least, at that date the Ummān-manda who were in occupation of Ḥarrān were recalled (5 Rawl. 64, i. 28 ff.) Some time had still to elapse, however, before Cyrus contrived, by treachery in the Median camp, to become master of Astyages and at the same time of the throne of Media. This happened probably in the sixth, or at all events before the seventh, year of Nabū-nā'id (before 550 B.C.). Ann. col. 2 l. 1 ff. The two texts cited can hardly otherwise be brought into agreement with each other. In the following years Cyrus extended his dominion over the whole Median empire, and after subjugating Lydia he directed his energies against Babylon. By the fall of Croesus the alliance between that monarch, Nabū-nā'id, and Amasis of Egypt (Herod. 1.77 ff.) was broken up, and each one had to look out for himself. In 538 the end came. For several years the king of Babylon had withdrawn himself from Babylon, and alienated priests and people alike by neglect of the sacred feasts and of the worship of Marduk, as well as by other arbitrary proceedings. When, in his seventeenth year, he returned to his capital, it was already too late. Cyrus with his victorious bands had been steadily advancing upon the northern frontier of Accad, which the king's son, probably the Bēl-šar-ušur who (in 1 R 69, col. 2, 26; 59 and 68, n. 1, col. 2, 24 ff.) is called his first-born, was guarding with the army. The brave prince did what he could; but after his army had been defeated—first near the city of Opis (Upē), and again as often as he rallied it—and after the Accadians or North Babylonians had revolted against the Chaldean king, Sippar opened its gates to the enemy, and Babylon also fell into his hands without further resistance. After Gobryas (Ugbaru or Gubaru), governor of Gutium, had taken possession with the vanguard, Cyrus himself made his entry into the city with the main body of his troops on the third day of the eighth month, 539-38, being received (so at least his inscriptions tell us) by all classes, and especially by the priesthood and nobles, as a liberator, with every manifestation of joy. Some days afterwards Gobryas seems to have pursued Bēl-šar-ušur and put him to death; but the place where decipherers think this ought to be read (Ann. col. 3, 22 ff.) is very much injured. Nabū-nā'id had already been captured. Cyrus reigned about nine years from this time. In his last year he handed over the sovereignty of Babylon to his son Cambyses (see Strassmaier, Inscriften von Cambyses, Leipsic, 1890, Pref.). Cp BABYLONIA, § 69.

Under the name of Kōrēš (see above, § 1), this Cyrus is repeatedly referred to in the OT, usually as 'king of the Persians' (2 Ch. 36.22 ff. Ezra 1.1 ff. 8.37 43 Dan. 10.1), once as 'the Persian' (Dan. 6.29), once as 'king of Babylon' (Ezra 5.13).

Great expectations were cherished of him by the Jews. When, after his defeat of Croesus, he advanced to the conquest of the whole of Asia Minor, there arose one of the exiles in Babylon, who pointed him out as the king raised up by Yahwē to be Israel's redeemer. From his pen comes Is. 40-48 (so much will be admitted by all critics), where Cyrus is represented as expressly called to accomplish the divine judgment upon Babylon, to set the captives free, and to restore Jerusalem and the temple (48.14 ff. 44.28 45.13). It was for this end, we are told, that Yahwē had given Cyrus victory upon victory, and would still lead him on to fresh triumphs (41.25 45.1-8). Whether he received recompense for his services or not is left uncertain (cp 43.3 ff. with 45.13); but at any rate he was no mere passive tool in Yahwē's hand. He did not, indeed, know Yahwē before he was called (45.3 ff.); but, once called, he fulfilled his mission invoking Yahwē's name (41.25) and received the honourable titles of 'Yahwē's friend' and 'Yahwē's anointed' (44.28 45.1).

Bitter must have been the disappointment of the Jews; for, whatever else Cyrus may have done for them, he did not realise the high-pitched expectations of the Exile prophet. Hence 4. Trans-formation. a younger prophet, living in Palestine (see ISAIAH, ii. § 21), announces that, for the deliverance of Israel, Yahwē alone will judge the nations, without any allies from among 'the peoples' (Is. 63.1-6, cp 59.16 ff.), thus reversing the old expectation respecting Cyrus. The later Jews, however, found it difficult to believe that the deliverance which Yahwē was to have wrought through the instrumentality of the great Persian king had never been accomplished. The prophecy must somehow or other have come to pass. Cyrus was not regarded, it is true, as the man who had finally delivered Israel—the deliverance was still one of the hopes of the future—but the Jews desired to recognise in him, at least, the initiator of the restoration of Israel. Such is the reflection inevitably suggested by a strictly critical reading of the work of the Chronicler (see EZRA, ii. § 7).

The restoration of Israel might be considered to have begun with the rebuilding of the temple, and the problem now arose, how to bring this event into connection with Cyrus. A difficulty instantly presented itself.

5. Building of Temple: three versions. (a) According to the evidence of Haggai, of Zech. 1-8 and of Ezra 5.1-10, the building was first begun under Darius, in whose reign it was also completed. This made it necessary to give another account of the origin and course of the building, if the work was to be attributed to Cyrus. More than one way of effecting this was found. (b) According to the author of Ezra 5.13-17 6.3-5, Cyrus committed the task of rebuilding the temple to his governor Sheshbazzar, and the work thus begun by him was carried on without interruption till the reign of Darius. (c) The Chronicler, however, from whose hand we have Ezra 1.3-4.5.24, gives another version. He too has it that Cyrus ordered the restoration. The work was not taken in hand by the king himself; but permission was given by him to the exiles to return to Jerusalem for the purpose. 'Immediately on their arrival in the holy city they set up the altar and laid the foundations of the temple; but while Cyrus was still on the throne they were compelled to stop the work by order of the king himself, who had been stirred up by the adversaries of the Jews. Not till the second year of Darius could the building be resumed.

However widely these accounts may differ from one another in detail, they agree in stating that the restoration of the temple was originated by Cyrus, and in representing him as a worshipper of Yahwē, whom he recognised as the one true God. Yahwē is the God of heaven, who has bestowed universal empire upon Cyrus in order that he may restore the true worship in Jerusalem; the temple there is for Cyrus no mere ordinary temple, of which there were so many, but the veritable House of God.

At the same time, the discrepancies which we find in the narratives b and c are by no means unimportant. According to the older (b), the building of the temple was entirely the work of Cyrus, which he caused to be carried on uninterruptedly, defraying the entire cost out of the royal treasury. According to the other (c), it was carried out at the instance of Cyrus; not by himself, however, but only by returned exiles, who, along with their comrades left behind in Babylon, contributed the expenses of the undertaking (146 268 f. 37). So far, indeed, is the restoration of the temple from being, according to this account, the work of Cyrus, that it is actually represented as broken off during his reign at his command. Probably the Jews in the long run found the idea unbearable, that the sanctuary should have been built by a foreigner, even though the foreigner was Cyrus, and therefore his share in the work was reduced by the Chronicler to more modest dimensions.

The importance of Cyrus for Israel lies less in anything he actually did for them than in the great expectations that he excited, expectations which in their turn exercised a great influence on the ideas ultimately formed by the Jews as to the earlier stages of their restoration after the misfortunes of the 'exile.' Cp ISRAEL, § 50; DISPERSION, § 5.

In the OT Cyrus is mentioned also in Dan. 6:28 [29] 10:1; in the first-cited passage as the successor of Darius, that is, of 'Darius the Mede' (Dan. 5:31 [6:1]). See DARIUS, 1.

The preceding sketch of the result of a critical examination of the passages of the OT relating to

6. Policy of the victorious Cyrus.

Cyrus is not contradicted by anything contained in the inscriptions of Cyrus himself discovered some years ago. It is certainly worthy of note how closely, even down to details, the representation of the Persian conqueror in these inscriptions agrees with that which is found in Is. 44:28 and 45:1. Evidently the second Isaiah had a correct idea of what a Persian king, as opposed to a Babylonian, would be likely to do. In the cylinder inscription (5 R 35; cp Hagen, 'Cyrus-texte' in Beitr. z. Assyriol. 2 205 ff., and KB 3 b 120 ff.) Cyrus is the deliverer of oppressed peoples, chosen by Marduk himself, and hailed by all Šumer and Accad as a saviour, exactly as with the Israelite prophet he is the called, the anointed, of Yahwè. A difference there is between the joyous hope which the Jewish exiles cherished and the official statements which Babylonian scribes at royal command had to chronicle on their cylinders; but the coincidences referred to are too close to be entirely accidental. Moreover, priests and people alike had reason enough to be dissatisfied with the arbitrariness and misgovernment of their former sovereign, and Cyrus, with fine political tact, knew how to utilise this temper and win hearts by deference towards the national religion, restraint of robbery and violence, and redress of grievances. No wonder that the Jewish exiles also hoped for enlargement at his hands. * That he fulfilled this expectation does not appear at least from his inscriptions.

The passage in which some scholars have thought that this may be read demands another interpretation. In Cyl. Z. 11 the words irtaši taairu kullat matāta were taken together and translated, 'he (Marduk) decreed return from all lands'; but it is certain that, with Hagen and Del., we must connect the words irtaši taaira with those which precede, and kullat matāta with those which follow, so that the meaning is: 'after that Marduk, in his wrath, had brought all sorts of miseries upon the land] he changed [his disposition] and had compassion. Round all lands he looked; he sought [and so found as the right prince, the fulfiller of his gracious decrees, Cyrus, etc.]'. In this passage nothing is said of any restoration of exiles to their native land.

More interest attaches to the passage L. 30 ff., where, however, the names on which the question chiefly turns are, unfortunately, obliterated. Here Cyrus says that he returned to their places the gods of a great many towns, brought together the inhabitants, and restored both temples and dwelling-houses. The towns referred to were all named, and it was added that they lay on the banks of the Tigris,² and that their territory extended from [lacuna in the text] to Aššur and Šušan (according to the correct interpretation of Delitzsch and Hagen), by which expressions are intended not the cities of the name but the countries of Assyria and West Elam (the city of Ašur lay on the right bank of the river). The obliterated names (or name) can have denoted only the western and southern boundaries of the district referred to—probably Šumer and Accad, which are separately mentioned immediately afterwards. Accordingly, there can be no doubt that reference is here made to Cyrus's care for the restoration of neglected worship and for the return of the inhabitants of certain cities to their former habitations; this, however, only in the immediate neighbourhood of Babylon. At the same time, although in these inscriptions, which doubtless belong to the earlier period of Cyrus's rule over Babylon, no mention is made of any general measure extending also to exiles from the West, there remains the possibility that the Persian conqueror may have taken up this work of restoration at a later time.³ At all events the conciliatory policy of which he had already given positive evidence can very well have aroused among the Jews the hope and expectation that they also would one day benefit by it.

The tomb of Cyrus 'the king, the Achæmenid,' at Murghāb (Pasargadæ?) is now assigned by Weissbach (ZDMG 48 653 f.) to the younger Cyrus. At any rate the Egyptian head-dress of the king on the monument shows that it can have been erected only after the conquest of Egypt by Cambyses.

¹ Probably the words usāhhir ka . . . should be completed so as to read either ka[bittānu] or ka[ab-ba-as-su]. (So Tiele.)

² The words ša ištu apnana nadu šubatun are not clear. Schr. translates: 'whose place from of old lay in ruins'; Hagen, Del., 'founded in the most ancient time.' But does nadu ever mean this? In our present inquiry the question is of subordinate importance.

DABAREH (דַּבָּרֶה), Josh. 21:28 AV; RV DABERATH.

DABBASHETH, RV Dabbesheth (דַּבְּשֶׁת), § 99; Βαῖθδαραθ [B], Δαβακθαῖ [A], -θε [L]; 'a hump,' i.e., 'a hill'; cp Jos. B/iv. 11, a place on the W. border of Zebulun (Josh. 19:11). Conder identifies it with Kh. Dabsheh, on the left bank of the W. el Karn (i.e., according to him, the Valley of JIPHTAH-EL, mentioned in v. 14); but this spot is too high up in the hills, and is scarcely on the boundary line, in addition to which the name is not a probable one.

GA reads דַּבְּשֶׁת; BT בִּיתֶרְכָה. All the readings may be reconciled by reading בִּיתֶרְכָה. The initial ב was lost, owing to the preposition ב which precedes; ית (תי) was transferred to the end of the name, thus producing בִּיתֶרְכָה; י was lost, and so MT's reading was produced: עֶרְכָה (BT) is simply a conjecture for עֶרְכָה. T. K. C.

DABERATH (דַּבְּרָת or דַּבְּרֶת; Δαβραθ [AL];

(Vit. 62), the Dabira (δαβειρα) of Eus. and Jer. (OS 115:20 250:54), the modern Dabūriyeh, a small and unimportant village, 'lying on the side of a ledge of rocks at the W. base of Mount Tabor' (Rob. BR 3210). It occupies a strategic position above the great plain at the mouth of the pass leading northwards between Tabor and the Nazareth hills. Apparently it was here that the Israelite forces mustered under Barak (GASm. HG 394); and it is possible to trace a connection between the name of the village and that of Deborah, without rushing to the extreme represented by C. Niebuhr (Reconstitution des Deborahliedes, 11 f.). May not the home of the prophetess have been at Daberah? (so Moore, Judges, 113 f.). We learn from Jos. B/ii. 21:3 that there was a Jewish garrison here in the Roman war, 'to keep watch on the Great Plain.'

2. δαγερῖδιον, Bar. 6:15 [14]. This word represents דָּגֶר four times in BT, but in Jer. 50:42 it represents דַּגֶּר. Bel's 'dagger' was, on mythological grounds, a javelin. See WEAPONS, and cp JAVELIN.

DAGON (דָּגוֹן; Δαγων [BAL]), a god of the Philistines, who had temples at Gaza (Judg. 16:21 ff.)

1. The name. and Ashdod (1 S. 5 1 Macc. 10:82-85 11 4).¹ It appears from the passages cited, especially from the story of Samson, that the worship of Dagon was general among the Philistines (Jerome on Is. 46:1),² though it would perhaps be a mistake to regard him as a national god. Places bearing the name BETH-DAGON (q.v.) are found in the Judean Lowlands and on the boundary of Asher; in Christian times there was a Caferdago between Diospolis and Jamnia (Jerome).¹ All these places lie within a region which had been for a time in the possession of the Philistines, and it is conceivable that they received the name from them. This can hardly be the case, however, with Beit Dejan, SE. of Nābulus, which also seems to represent an ancient Beth-dagon; and it is at least equally possible that the worship of Dagon to which these names bear witness preceded the Philistine invasion—in other words, that Dagon was a god of the older Canaanite inhabitants. Philo Byblius gives Dagon a place in his Phoenician theogony, making him a son of Ouranos and Ge, and brother of Elos (El) or Kronos, Baitulos, and Atlas;² but we should hesitate to conclude, on this testimony alone, that Dagon was worshipped among the Phoenicians. A cylindrical seal now in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford, attributed by Sayce to the seventh century B.C., is inscribed with the words 'Baal Dagon' in Phoenician characters (Sayce, Higher Criticism, 327).

Of the character of the god we know nothing definite. Philo Byblius, deriving the name from dāgān, corn, interprets στῆτω, and makes Dagon a god of husbandry, Zeῦς ἀρόριος. Others derived the name Dagon from dāg, fish (cp Shimshon [SAMSON], from shemesh, sun).³ It was natural, therefore, to imagine that the god was represented in the form of a fish (so Rashi). From 1 S. 5:4 we learn, however, that the idol of Dagon at Ashdod had a head, and hands which projected from the body; by its fall these were broken off, leaving only the trunk of the image. The Hebrew text, by some corruption, reads, 'only Dagon was left on him,' which David Kimhi (ob. circa 1235 A.D.) ingeniously interprets, only the form of a fish was left, adding, 'It is said that Dagon, from his navel down, had the form of a fish (whence his name, Dagon), and from his navel up, the form of a man, as it is said, his two hands were cut off.'⁴ It is not impossible that this theory, for which there does not seem to be any older Jewish authority,⁵ merely transfers to Dagon, by the help of etymology, the description given by Lucian and others of the goddess Derceto, who was worshipped on the same coast.⁶ Not a few more modern scholars have identified her with Dagon. The prevailing opinion that Dagon was sea monster, upward man

And downward fish,

has no other foundation than these very doubtful etymological and mythological combinations.

¹ OS 235:14 (κεραρ δαγων) 104:15. In the inscription of Eshmunazar, king of Sidon, in connection with Dor and Joppa, occur the words דַּגֶּר, which Schlottmann interpreted, 'land of Dagon,' others, 'cornlands.' Δαγων near Jericho (Jos. Ant. xiii. 8 1 = B/i. 23 [= Δακ, 1 Macc. 16:15]) has nothing to do with the name of the god (see Docus).

⁷ First attested on coins of Hadrian. See Jer. Ep. 107:2, Vit. S. Hilar. 14:20; esp. Marc. Diac., Vit. S. Porphyrii, passim.

Κρηταγενής, is not certain. Marnas is the Aramaic marnā, our Lord, and it is not impossible that the god worshipped under this appellation was, by his proper name, the old Dagon.

In the fragments of Bērōssus, one of the mythical monsters, part fish, part man, who at long intervals came up from the Persian Gulf to repeat to the Chaldaeans the original revelation of Oannes, is named Odacon ('Ὠδάκων');¹ and as, since Kimhi, a like form was generally attributed to Dagon, it was natural to combine the two names (Selden and many others). Layard published a figure of a merman from Khorsabad, and in a note suggested that it might represent Odacon-Dagon (Nineveh, 1849, 2466f.). Some later Assyriologists reproduce Layard's cut with the legend 'the fish-god Dagon'.²

There was a Babylonian god Dagān, whose name appears in conjunction with Anu and often with 'Ninib': he was, therefore, probably a god of heaven (Sayce, Jensen).³ As Sir Henry Rawlinson perceived, there is no connection whatever between this god and Bērōssus' sea-monster, Odacon. Whether the Philistine Dagon is originally the same as the Babylonian Dagān cannot, with our present knowledge, be determined. The long and profound influence of Babylonia in Palestine in early times, which is attested by the Amarna tablets, makes it quite possible that Dagon, like Anath, came thence.⁴ Dagon, however, does not seem to have occupied a place of much importance in the Babylonian religion, and is much less often mentioned than the other great gods. The Assyrians did not recognise the name of the god Dagān in the town Beth-dagon, Bit-daganna (Sennacherib, Prism Inscr. 265), and possibly the similarity of the names may be accidental.

Of the worship of Dagon we know nothing. According to 1 S. 5 the priests and others entering his temple at Ashdod were careful not to set foot on the sill (Zeph. 19); cp Marc. Diac. 76. What we learn from the last-named author about the worship of Marnas at Gaza—for example, that the god was invoked to send rain; that he gave oracles; that there were certain marmora in the temple which were peculiarly sacred, and guarded from the approach (especially) of women; that there were wells in the temple precincts—is not distinctive. Whether human sacrifices were offered there in the writer's day may be doubted; the indictment in 66 68 may refer to an earlier time.

DALMANUTHA (τὰ μέρη δαλμανουθα [Ti. WH]) takes the place in Mk. 8:10 of the MAGADAN (q.v.) of || Mt. 15:39. It was 'into the parts of Dalmanutha,' we are told (Mk. 8:10), that Jesus came in 'the boat' with his disciples after he had 'sent away about four thousand' whom he had fed. Since in v. 13

he 'departed to the other side' (εἰς τὸ πέραν), it has seemed natural to look for Dalmanutha on the W. coast of the lake. No such place, however, is known. The name does not appear in Eus. or Jer.; nor is there any trace of an analogy to it in any of the ancient itineraries or mediæval travels.

Lightfoot ('Decas Chorogr.' in Opera, 2413 f.; cp Opp. Fosth. 71) suggested that it might be an Aramaic form of Salmōn, סַלְמוֹן, several times mentioned in Talmudic writings (Mishna, Yebamoth, 166; Kela'im, 49; Orlah, 12; Talm. Baba Bathr. 82 b.) as if in the neighbourhood of Tiberias; and similarly Ewald (Hist., ET, 6348, n. 4) interprets it as the Galilean pronunciation of Salmōn. Keim (Jesus, ET, 4238) takes it for Salmānūt—i.e., 'Shady Place.' Schwarz (Das Heil. Land, 189) suggests that Talmanutha, as another name for Magdala, may be derived from the cave of Tēlimān טְלִימָן (Talm. Jerus.

Demai 2a), for which he proposes the caves on the cliff behind Mejdol. Neubauer, however (Geog. Talm. 268), says that this cave should be in the neighbourhood of Herod's Caesarea. Recently two other derivations from Aramaic have been proposed. Herz (Exp. T. 8563 [Sept. '97]) suggests that Dalmanuth is a transliteration of דַּלְמָנוּתָה, the emphatic form of דַּלְמָנָה, the Talmudic name for harbour—i.e., the bay or harbour in which Magdala stood—a designation 'one might expect of the evangelist whose gospel is founded on the preaching of Peter the fisherman.' Then Nestle (ib. 945 [Oct. '97]), after pronouncing Herz's דַּלְמָנוּתָה an impossible form for the emphatic of דַּלְמָנָה, suggests דַּלְמָנוּתָה(י)=εἰς τὰ μέρη, 'into the parts'—i.e., of Magdala. Herz replies (ib. 995 [Nov. '97]) that דַּלְמָנוּתָה is possible in the laxity of Talmudic transliteration and points out that in Nestle's suggestion the י remains unaccounted for, as well as the intrusion of a needless Syriac equivalent of the Greek. Those who place Magdala on the SE. shore of the lake have sought there for traces of the name, and Thomson (LB 393) suggests a ruined site half a mile up the Yarmūk from the Jordan, called Dalmahia or Dalmamia (Rob. BR 3264 Delhemiyeh); but this is some distance from the Lake. None of these derivations and identifications seems perfectly satisfactory.

DALMATIA (ΔΑΛΜΑΤΙΑ [Ti. WH], Tac., Dio Cass., Dalmatia: Inscr. Dalmatia and Dalmatia. The name does not occur in early Greek writers). The Dalmatians were an Illyrian tribe, or perhaps rather a confederation of tribes, round the town Delmion or Delminium, from which their name was derived (Strabo, 315). They had fifty settlements (κατοικίας ἀξιολόγους; but cp Cic. ad Fam. 5:20a), of which some ranked as cities—e.g., Salonæ or Salona (mod. Salona near Spalato). These tribes had in earlier times been loosely dependent upon the rulers of Scodra (mod. Skutari), and had therefore suffered from the Roman expeditions directed against Queen Teuta (229 B.C.) and Demetrios of Pharos (219 B.C.). On the accession of Genthius they revolted, and thus escaped the fate of southern Illyricum, which, on the subjugation of Macedonia, became permanently dependent upon Rome (see ILLYRICUM). Brigandage and piracy were the only native trades (Str. 317). In 155 B.C. Publius Scipio Nasica took the capital, and the Dalmatians professed subjection. A series of almost endless wars had to be waged before this central part of Illyricum was finally reduced by Octavian (33 B.C.). In the partition of provinces in 27 B.C. so peaceful was Illyricum (τὸ Δαλματικὸν, Dio Cass. 53:12) that it was made senatorial; but sixteen years later the Emperor was compelled to take charge of its two main sections, Dalmatia and Pannonia (id. 54:34). A final struggle for freedom (6-9 A.D.; cp Suet. Tib. 16, who compares the crisis with that of the Punic Wars) was crushed by Tiberius. The coastland from Lissus to the Arsia was thereafter organised as an independent province (for its importance, see Tac. Ann. 45). The title of the province was 'Superior Provincia Illyricum' (CIL 3, 1741), or 'maritima pars Illyrici' (Vell. ii. 125). After Augustus 'Dalmatia' is apparently the more usual title (cp Jos. B. ii. 164). Its northern boundary towards Pannonia is not clearly marked; in the S. it extended to the province of Macedonia. The mention of Dalmatia in the NT is confined to a single instance ('Titus is gone to Dalmatia,' perhaps from Nicopolis: 2 Tim. 4:10).

The connection may be illustrated from Tac. Ann. 253: honorem (consulatus) Germanicus iniit apud urbem Achaia

DAMASCUS. The English Damascus is the Greek ΔΑΜΑΣΚΟΣ. The Heb. is usually דַּמְשֶׁק, Dammeseq;

Both forms occur in the Targums. The Aramaic form is Dammeseq, later Syriac Dammēsk; Talmud, Dūrmāskīn. Both forms occur in the Egyptian lists: Ti-mas-ku in the sixteenth century B.C., and Sa-ra-mas-ki for Ti-ra-mas-ki in the thirteenth (WMM, As. u. Eur.). In Assyrian the town is Dimaški or Dimaška; the kingdom (in Heb., Aram of Damascus) Māt ša imērišu, a phrase of uncertain meaning. The Arabic is Dimašk, or Dimišk eš Šām—i.e., Damascus of Syria—usually contracted to eš-Šām. The instances of the form with mm in OT are later than those with double m; but, if the Egyptian transliteration be correct, mm is as old as the thirteenth century B.C. Whether mm arose by assimilation (see below, § 6) from rm, or rm by dissimilation from mm, is not clear.

Damascus has occupied its present site certainly since Greek times, probably from the remotest antiquity.

2. Geography. The city lies in the NW. corner of the Gūta, a fertile plain to the E. of Hermon. To the E. of the city this is known as el-Merj, the Ager Damascenus.

The Gūta is some 30 m. by 8 or 10, and 2300 ft. above sea-level. It is bounded on the W. by Hermon, on the N. by a long barren offshoot of Antilibanus, on the E. by a long line of volcanic hills, the Tellūl, which shut out the great desert, and on the S. by the Jebel 'Aswad, beyond which lies Haurān. It is traversed on the N. by the seven streams of the Baradā and on the S. by the Barbar and A'waj (see ABANA, PHARPAR). The fertility is very great. There are many fields of corn and maize; but groves of poplar and walnut, orchards of apricot, pomegranate, pistachio, and almond, with hedges and underwood, so abound (see below, § 10), that the distant view of the Gūta is as of an almost unbroken sea of verdure. From this the white, smokeless city rises like an island, near the barren limestone hills on the north of it.

The bulk of the city is set along the main stream of the Baradā, 2 m. from where the latter breaks upon the plain. It spreads about a mile from

3. The City. E. to W. and half a mile from N. to S.; but from the southern gate a suburb, the Meidān, consisting almost wholly of one street, stretches for another mile. The city is thus mallet-shaped, the head lying N. to the Baradā, the shaft S. along the Meccan road. Between the Baradā and the hills there is another suburb, Šālīhiyeh; but it is scattered and half hidden in trees.

The position is almost absolutely level, and commanded by the hills. There is no real citadel; a castle surrounded by a moat lies a little to the south of the river. The wall, pierced by seven gates, runs straight along the river and then round the bulk of the city, the mallet head. The upper part of it is Arab or Turkish work; but much of the lower half may date from NT times (Acts 9:25; cp 2 Cor. 11:32/3). Through the southern part of the city and parallel to the river ran (as through every other Greek town in Coelestria) a long colonnaded street, generally identified with that 'called Straight' (Acts 9:11). The bases of some columns are still standing. E. of the castle, the Great Mosque (partly burned in 1894) occupies the site and contains some of the structure of the Cathedral of St. John, built by Arcadius in the beginning of the fifth century on the ruins of a Greek temple, which again was probably the successor of the house of Rimmon (2 K. 5:18; cp 16:10-16). The rest of Damascus is occupied by bazaars, mosques, a few open places, and streets of private houses. On its approach to the walls, the Baradā has much of its water drawn off through channels, by which it is conveyed to every corner of the city. The chief gardens lie along the N. bank of the river; but others, interspersed with cemeteries, stretch all round the wall. Despite various drawbacks, her rich streams, bursting, as they do, on the very edge of the desert, and creating a delicious verdure, have won for Damascus the name of the earthly Paradise of the Arab world.

That a site so defenceless and so shut off by lofty mountains from the most of Syria should yet have held in perennial vigour one of the most ancient of cities, the real capital of Syria, and enabled it to survive wars and changes of empire which have overthrown or reduced to poverty every other great city of that part of the world, is due to the combination of so rich a fertility with a position so forward on the desert and so central to Western Asia.

Damascus is an indispensable harbour of refuge on the desert; the market of the nomads; the outpost of the Mediterranean world towards farther Asia; central to Egypt, the Levant, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Khūrdistan. Her great roads lead to N. Syria, the upper Euphrates by Palmyra to Baghdād and the Persian Gulf; by the Gulf of 'Akāba to Mecca; through Syria to Cairo; and by the upper Jordan and Galilee to Acre, which is her natural port on the Mediterranean—though at times political exigencies have connected her more closely with Tyre, Sidon, or Tripoli, and to-day the great French road and railway across the Lebanon carry her western trade to Bērūt. She thus lay on the commercial lines of traffic between Western Europe and India by the Persian Gulf: between the valleys of the Euphrates and the Nile; between Arabia and Asia Minor. So inevitable an emporium, Damascus was only less favourable a seat of empire. She has always been the natural capital of Lebanon and Eastern Palestine. As long as an Eastern power ruled, she remained the capital also of Syria; but during the Greek and Roman dominion (330 B.C.—634 A.D.) she yielded her supremacy to Antioch.

The Arabs first made for Damascus, and then used her as the base of their Syrian conquests. Under the Omayyad Khalifs she was the capital of the Moslem empire from Spain to India.

With so many communications Damascus has always been the home of a motley crowd—Syrians, Arabs,

5. Arts. Greeks, and Kurds, with Turks and Jews. Yet it has preserved, apparently through all ages, a very distinctive character for skill in handicrafts. Damascus, though it has never been a great school of letters, has always been a school of arts; even more a manufactory than a market or a garden. The English terms, Damask (originally any figured or patterned textile)¹ and Damascene blade; the German Damast and Damascieren and Damascener; the French Damasquinerie and Damasquinure (embossing on steel) are proofs of the inventiveness and technical skill of the people, which seem to reach back to a very remote time. In the middle ages Damascus was famous for its patterned and brocaded cloths, especially silks and wools ('an inimitable perfection of work' according to Idrisi), its glass, sword-blades, and embossed and enamelled metal-work. In the beginning of the Christian era, to 'carry wool to Damascus' was, according to the Talmud, a proverb, equivalent to our 'carrying coals to Newcastle.' Ezekiel (27:18) speaks of the city's exportation of wine and wool for the manufactures of Phoenicia (cp Toy, SBOT, but see Cornill, ad loc.); 2 K. 8:9 mentions the 'goods of Damascus.' Ahaz made a copy of its richly decorated altar (2 K. 16:10 ff.).

The extreme antiquity of Damascus (Jos. Ant. i. 64:7) was a not unnatural inference from its perennial vigour throughout historical times. Down

6. Early History. to the eleventh century B.C., however, the references to it are few and uncertain. A local tradition (found also in Nicolaus Dam. Fr. 30, ap. Jos. Ant. i. 72) connects Damascus with Abraham; and there is twice mention of it in the JE narrative of the patriarch's life (Gen. 14:15 15:2; see HOBAB, ELIEZER, 1). In the sixteenth century Ti-mas-ku occurs as the thirteenth in the list of the Syrian conquests of Thotmes III. (*KP*² 544); Timaš-gi, Dimaš-ka are read in the Amarna tablets (15th cent.) (139 63 142 21). These tablets describe the invasion of N. Syria by the Hittites, before whom the Egyptian outposts had to give way, and for the next three centuries Damascus lay upon the vacillating frontier between the two powers. In the fourteenth century, Rameses II. extended his conquests to Beirūt and probably included Damascus. At the close of the thirteenth century, in lists of the conquests of Rameses III., Sa-ra-maski for Ti-ra-mas-ki (WMM As. u. Eur. 227) is mentioned. The addition of r to the name is taken (ib. 234) as proof that the regions of Damascus had meanwhile come under Aramæan influence (but see ARAM), and so when at last they appear in the OT historical books, in the campaigns of David toward the end of the eleventh century, we find them possessed by a number of Aramæan states, for the rise of which room had been made by the overthrow of the Hittites nearly a hundred years previously by Tiglath-pileser I. (circa 1106). The chief of these Aramæan states was Šobah (see DAVID, § 8 b) under king Hadadezer, to whose help against David came Aram of Dammeseḳ (2 S. 8:5; cp 1 Ch. 18:5). David, after his victory, is said to have planted garrisons in the territory of Damascus; but that these had no permanence is plain from what we hear of Rešōn ben Eliādā the freebooter, who 'came to Damascus, and dwelt there, and reigned in Damascus, and was a foe to Israel all the days of Solqmon' (1 K. 11:23-25).

¹ It is not at all probable that Damascus had acquired a reputation for the manufacture of damask as early as the time of Amos, though RV of Am. 3:12b assumes this; 'Damask' and 'Damascus' may have no connection. In Ar. the forms are different—dimaḳs for the stuff, and Dimaḳš for the city. Probably (as Fränkel, Fremdwörter, 40, referred to by Driver, ad loc., is of opinion) dimaḳs comes by metathesis from midakš. On Am. loc., see AMOS, § 5 n.; BED, § 5.

We have now reached the point at which Damascus becomes chief of the Aramæan confederacy, and enters upon her first great period of political supremacy (circa 1000-733 B.C.). Her history is articulate, and we have a pretty full, though not complete, list of her kings. Who Rešōn b. Eliādā (1 K. 11:23) was is disputed; probably (see, however, HEZION) he was the same as Hezion, father of Tabrimmon, father of the Ben-hadad (Bir-idri, known as Ben-hadad I.) who about 925 B.C. helped ASA (q.v.) against Baasha (1 K. 15:18 ff.). It was perhaps the same Ben-hadad who, some twenty years later, defeated Omri and won the right of 'establishing quarters' (see TRADE AND COMMERCE) in Samaria (1 K. 20:34; Nic. Dam. Fr. 31). The son of Ben-hadad I. (or Ben-hadad himself? See BEN-HADAD, § 2), whom also the OT calls Ben-hadad, but a contemporary inscription of Shalmaneser II. of Assyria (854 B.C.) calls Hadadezer (see, however, BEN-HADAD, § 2), besieged AHAB (q.v.) in Samaria, but was repulsed there and again at Aphek, on which Ahab received the right to 'establish quarters for himself' in Damascus. In 854 the combined forces of N. Israel, Damascus, and other states were defeated at Ẕarḳar (see AHAB) by Shalmaneser II., who again, in 850 and in 847, overthrew Ben-hadad. The Assyrian empire was thus steadily advancing on Damascus; but the latter was still the terror of Israel (2 K. 5:7, the story of Naaman), made regular raids over Jordan, and even besieged Samaria (2 K. 6:7; see JEHORAM, 1) till Ben-hadad was drawn off by rumours of northern war. Disgraced by defeats so numerous, he was slain by HAZAEL (q.v.), at least if the text of 2 K. 8:15 is correct. Hazael then became king, and warred with Jehoram (ib. 28 ff.), also with Shalmaneser II., by whom he was defeated in 843 and in 840, the second time with the loss of four cities and much spoil out of Damascus. Still, he succeeded in depriving Jehu of all Israel's territory E. of Jordan, and in extending the dominion of Damascus southwards to the Arnon (2 K. 10:32; cp Am. 13). He also took Gath, and was bought off from an invasion of Judah only by large tribute from Jehoash (12:17 [18] ff.). Hazael and his son Ben-hadad III. (or II.) were able to oppress Israel through the reigns of Jehu's successors Jehoahaz and Joash (2 K. 13:25), for under Šamši-rammān the Assyrian armies did not cross the Euphrates (ASSYRIA, § 32), and Damascus was free for the time from the Northern terror. By 805 Assyria was again pressing

9. Mari'. (Ben-hadad II.?) of Damascus (see BEN-HADAD, § 3) was successfully besieged by Ramman-nirari III. This disaster to Damascus permitted JEROBOAM II. (q.v.) to recover the territory that Hazael had taken from Israel, and for a time Israel held part of the territory of Damascus (2 K. 14:28; not necessarily the city). In 773 Damascus again suffered from the Assyrians, who invaded the country also in 772, 767, 755, and 754 (ASSYRIA, § 32).

10. Rezin. It was the beginning of the end. In 743-740 Tiglath-pileser III. made his first Syrian campaign, and his annals (KB 230) contain the name Ra-šun-nu (maḥ) Gar-imeri-šu (i.e., of Damascus) as paying tribute. This Ra-šun-nu is the Rezin of the Syro-Israelitish war (see AHAB, TABEEL), whose invasion of Judah brought about an Assyrian intervention (2 K. 16:7 ff.). Perhaps the danger which now threatened Damascus was the occasion of the allusions to the city in Is. 17:1. In 733 Tiglath-pileser—whether before or after his subjection of N. Israel and the Philistine cities is not quite clear—defeated Rezin, shut him up in Damascus, cut down the plantations (see above, § 2) round the city (he numbers the trees at 13,520), took the city, executed Rezin, and carried the people into captivity (Schr. COT 1252 ff.; cp 2 K. 169). It was after this, in 732, that Ahaz visited Damascus, and obtained the pattern of the altar which he saw there (ib. 10).

Up to this time Damascus had possessed great political influence: her confidence in herself, her power of recuperation, and her military skill

11. Decline. are amply proved by her restless energy in Syrian politics, even while she was bleeding from the reiterated attacks of Assyria. The blow which Tiglath-pileser inflicted, however, absolutely destroyed her political power. She seems to have been reduced to the same position as Samaria.

Shalmaneser IV., Sargon, and Sennacherib mention no king of Damascus in all their Syrian lists; and the only notice of the town for a century is in the Khorsabad inscription of Sargon, where (about the year 713) Damascus is said to have joined Arpad, Simirra (see ZEMARITE), and Samaria in a league formed by Hamath against Assyria. The allied forces were crushed by Assyria at Karkar (KB 257). Next century Damascus is omitted from the list of twenty-two kingdoms given by Esarhaddon.

She is not mentioned by the prophets, except in a doubtful passage of the Book of Jeremiah (4923-27) where she is given over to fear and flight, and by Ezekiel who names her, only in passing, as a customer of Tyre (2718), and a point of measurement for the Holy Land (4716 ff.). If then important, she would be certainly occupied by Pharaoh Necho in 610 and Nebuchadrezzar in 604 ff.

Under the Persians Damascus was a seat of authority, and very prosperous (Strabo xvi. 220).

Cambyes died there (Jos. Ant. xi. 22), and there Darius deposited his family and treasures before the battle of Issus, after which they were surrendered to Alexander's general Parmenio (Quint. Curt. 813). After an unsuccessful revolt the Greek supremacy was established (ib. 41), and there are extant coins of Alexander issued from the city.

At the death of Alexander, Syria with Phœnicia fell to Laomedon, the capital being Damascus (ib. 1010).

12. Supplanted by Antioch. The western people, however, to whom Syria was now subject, required a centre near the Levant, and Damascus became second in Syria to Antioch, the upstart capital of the Seleucidæ.

The diminished importance of Damascus is well illustrated by the small part it plays, as contrasted with Antioch, in those books of the Antiquities of Josephus (xii. 7) which deal with the third and second centuries B.C. Its more natural connection with N. Syria than with S. kept Damascus in the hands of the Seleucidæ, even when Palestine and Phœnicia were held by the Ptolemies; but several times it fell to the latter: e.g., in 320 under Ptolemy I. (regained by Antigonus in 314); in 280 when Ptolemy II. probably occupied it (regained by Antiochus I. 280-262); in 246 when, however, it was only besieged by Ptolemy III. and relieved by Seleucus II. in 242 (cp Schürer, Hist. 895).

In the Books of the Maccabees Damascus is mentioned only as being twice visited by Jonathan (circa 144 B.C.: 1 Macc. 1162 1232; Jos. Ant. xiii. 5510).

The kingdom of the Seleucidæ was divided in 111 B.C., and Damascus must have fallen with the southern part to Antiochus IX. or Kyzikenus (cp Eus. Chron. ed. Schoene, in Schür. op. cit. 97, and Jos. Ant. xiii. 184). It was retained by Antiochus' son, and then fell to Demetrius Eukærus, and after his overthrow (circa 86 B.C.) to Antiochus XII. or Dionysus, from whom it was transferred (though only for a short time) by Mithridates, the governor of the citadel, and the populace, to his brother Philip (Jos. ib. 151).

Antiochus XII. was defeated by ARETAS (q.v.), the Nabatean, and with Coele Syria Damascus continued

13. Roman times. in Arabian hands (though pressed hard by Alex. Jannæus [ib. 153], and Ptolemy Menneus, against whom Queen Alexandra of Judea [78-69 B.C.] sent her son Aristobulus [ib. 163; BJ i. 53]) till the occupation in 65 by the Roman legions under Lollius and Metellus (Ant. xiv. 23; BJ i. 62), who were followed in 64 by Pompey.

After this the exact political position of Damascus is difficult to define.

DAN

Though Josephus does not know Damascus as a member of the Decapolis (he calls Scythopolis the greatest town of the latter), the name is in Pliny's list (HN 516). Under Cassius (44-42 B.C.) there was a Roman commandant, Fabius, in Damascus (Jos. Ant. xiv. 117 121; BJ i. 121 f.), and the Nabateans appear to have been driven to the E. and to the S. of Haurān. Somewhere about 38 B.C. Mark Antony gave Cleopatra 'Coele Syria' and parts of the Judæan and Arabian territories (Jos. Ant. xv. 3841 f.; BJ i. 85); she visited Damascus, and we have coins of 37, 36, and 32 that were struck in her honour, though other coins of about the same date do not bear any mark of her (De Saulcy, Numism. de la Terre Sainte, 30 ff.).

In 31 B.C. occurred the battle of Actium, and the Damascene coins bear till 33 A.D. the names of Augustus and Tiberius, under the latter of whom the Damascenes had a dispute with the Sidonians about their boundaries (Jos. Ant. xviii. 63), a fact which shows how extensive their territory must have been (Schürer, 98). There are, however, no coins of Caligula nor of Claudius, nor any of Nero till his ninth year in 63. It was during this time that the apostle Paul tells us (see ARETAS) that not the Romans but 'an ethnarch under Aretas the king held the city of the Damascenes' (a form of expression which betrays the fact that it was usual to think of Damascus as an independent city); see ETHNARCH.

We do not know to what degree power in Damascus passed from the Romans to the Nabatean king. Nor, indeed, whether Rome actually held it then (cp Schür. IIJ 2 356 ff. 398; McGiffert, Apoc. 164 n. 2). At any rate, the city again came under Rome in Nero's reign (53-68 A.D.); but the Nabateans continued to hold the neighbourhood to the E. till 106, when Trajan brought their whole kingdom into the Empire. Under Hadrian and his successors Damascus bore the title μετρόπολις (De Saulcy, 37 ff.), under Alexander Severus, colonia (ib. 43).

Under both Romans and Byzantines the city continued to flourish; yet so long as these Westerns ruled Syria she was only second to Antioch; and it was not till

14. Under Islam. 634, Antioch in 635—that the city in the desert resumed the first rank, and the city on the Levant began to decline. For a century, 650-750, Damascus had the Khalifate under the Omayyads; she was never taken by the Crusaders, whose pivot was Antioch; she was the capital of Saladin, and being bound to Mecca by the Hajj, which starts from her gates, she has kept her place in the regard of Islam, while her fertility and her unique position have enabled her to survive the depopulations to which she has been subjected by conquerors like Timur, and the awful pestilences with which she has again and again been infected by her annual connection with Mecca.

DAN (17 see below, § 1; דָּאן [BAL]; gentilic Danite, דָּנִיָּי; דָּאנֵי [B], דָּאן [BAL], דָּאנֵי [ITAI]

1. Name. [BNA 1 Ch. 1235]), eponymous head of the tribe of the same name. The name, like many other tribal names, is obscure. It appears, however, to bear the same relation to the personal names Daniel and Abidan as the clan name Ram does to Jehoram and Abiram, or on the other hand Jacob and Joseph to two ancient town names ending in -el (see JACOB, JOSEPH, § 1). It is therefore no doubt a divine title, 'judge' (i.e., 'deliverer'?). Cp the Assyrian repeatedly recurring royal name Ašur-dan—'Ašur is judge' (cp Nabudan)—and the name of Shalmaneser II.'s general Dayan-Ašur, as also the epithet dānu (daianu) applied to the sun-god (cp SAMSON, § 1) and the moon-god.

Dan is apparently etymologically related to the name of another Israelitish tribe of whose history still less is known (see DINAH); but it would be less safe to assume any etymological connection with Midian. That the meaning of the name was not quite forgotten appears, e.g., from the popular derivation in Gen. 306 (E) and the paronomasia in Gen. 4916 (J), although the latter passage applies the epithet to the tribe itself, not to its god.

The verb dān is used quite freely, not only in the earlier literature (JE, Gen. 15 14; 1s. 3 13) but also (especially) from the 'exile' onwards (Jer. Pss. etc.); so also the derivatives; but, as in the case of other old tribe names, the root does not seem to have been used in the formation of proper names in later times (see ABI-DAN, ENOCH, § 1), its place being apparently taken by the synonymous shaphat (see JEHOSEPHAT), which on the whole prevailed in Hebrew and Phœnician, while less used in Assyrian and not certainly used at all in the southern Semitic dialects where dān continued to prevail.

Dan evidently belonged to the N. (Joseph) group of Israelitish clans. Not, however, in the same sense as Benjamin. Dan was a Bilhah clan and may, not improbably, have been older than Joseph, as the patriarch stories represent (see BILHAH). If so, the onward pressure of Joseph, though probably not hostile, may have co-operated with the other influences that prevented it from settling permanently in central Palestine—though the apparent southward movement of the Danites from Zorah-Eshtaol to Kirjath-jearim (Judg. 18 12) could not well be quoted in support of such a possibility (see MAHANEH-DAN). Whilst Dinah, if it was a prehistoric clan of the same or a kindred stock (it is called indeed daughter of Leah; but Dan took as its priest a Levite of Judah), suffered the fate of absorption (see DINAH), Dan, though it may have allied itself with Joseph for a time, was eventually compelled by its own energy and the force of circumstances to emigrate, just as perhaps the older Leah tribes emigrated in the opposite direction. If Dan was not older than Joseph, it must be regarded as an unsuccessful precursor of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 1 f.; so Stade).

The earliest mention of the tribe is in the 'Song of Deborah.' The poet upbraids Dan for seeking protection of (or living heedlessly by) the ships, instead of coming forward manfully like the brother Bilhah tribe to fight 'on the heights of the open field' (see NAPHTALI). This reference to ships is obscure. It has been interpreted of the southern seat of the tribe;¹ but its proximity and resemblance to the phrase about Asher seems to suggest that the tribe is thought of as in its northern seat (so Moore and Bu., ad loc.).

The expression used of Dan is quite unique. One shrinks from drawing any definite conclusion from the passage. If the text is sound,² it may mean that Dan was, like Asher, though no doubt to a less extent (18 7c), under the sway of Phœnician influence. It is much more likely, however, to have been involved with the Arameans than with the Phœnicians; for although Tell el-Kādi is fully 40 m. distant from Damascus and not 30 from Tyre, the latter was not in historic times so energetic in extending its influence in the Palestine hinterland as Damascus was (cp DAMASCUS, § 4). Although we do not know when the Arameans began to press southwards, there is no reason to suppose that the Aramean element represented by such places as Beth-Maacah appeared only after the times of the Song of Deborah. However that may be, in time at least the Arameans made their influence felt very decidedly. We are still far from understanding fully the history of their relations with Israel; but it may well be doubted whether there ever was a stable or even a definite line between their respective domains. The population of the border region seems to have been largely Aramean. Benhadad I. had no difficulty in seizing Dan and other places in its neighbourhood, and it does not appear whether Israel was ever able politically to assert a serious, or at least a lasting, claim to them. The fact that the operations of Tiglath-pileser III. (860 years later), in suppression of the plot of Rezon and his accomplice Pekah, were confined to this same district, would be accounted for if it were more unequivocally connected with Damascus than the rest of Israel was (so Winckler).

¹ Nöldeke suggests (in a private communication) that it is not inconceivable that members of the tribe may have taken to fishing.

When J wrote, Dan was still indeed honoured (2 S. 20 18 6), but possibly somewhat as a survival of a time gone by; it was not felt to be a living force in Israel—Bilhah was but a concubine (Gen. 35 22). It must not, however, be inferred, from the fact that the 'Blessing of Jacob' says Dan judges its people like an Israelitish tribe (v. 16), that, when the Blessing took shape, Dan was felt to be hardly in reality a part of genuine Israel at all. It is clear, from the early authority referred to above (2 S. 20 18 6), that the city of Dan was proverbial as a well-known home of genuine old Israelitish ideas and practices, which is the more credible that we are told that its priests traced their origin to Moses¹ himself (Judg. 18 30). We need not wonder, then, if the importance of this sanctuary was formally acknowledged in some way or other (see CALF, GOLDEN, § 1) by Jeroboam I. [2. v.]. The N. settlement of Dan, however, perhaps did not amount to much more than the town of that name. Nor need the repeated mention of the town in the standing phrase 'from Dan to Beersheba,'² which not unnaturally suggests that it had some importance, have really had any political significance. Both places may have owed their celebrity to their ancient sanctuaries.

This may perhaps help us to understand the preservation of such an unrivalled collection of popular legend as we find in the latter part of Judges, unless indeed the stories of the Samson cycle are quite as much connected with the geographical district about Zorah, etc. (cp the mention of a place called Sa-ma-sha-nā in that neighbourhood at least as early as Rameses II.; Lepsius, Denkm. 1441; cp BETH-SHEMESH, 1; SAMSON) as with any particular Israelitish tribe; they involve Hebron, in Judg. 16 3 is correct, and may be thought to have some relation to the stories of SHAMMAH and SHAMGAR (qq.v.).

In Amos's time the northern Dan still ranked with Bethel (? so We. ad loc.) and Beersheba as a representative sanctuary (Am. 8 14; on the reading cp AMOS, § 20); but, whatever it was then, the troublous time which ended with the fall of the N. kingdom (2 K. 15 29) and the changed conditions which resulted must have profoundly modified the position even of an ancient sanctuary town. This would perhaps account for the absence of all mention of it from P's geographical scheme. Still, even in the days of Jeremiah, although the phrase 'Dan to Beersheba' had given place to 'Geba to Beersheba' (2 K. 23 8), an invasion was felt to be begun when the enemy passed Dan (Jer. 4 15 8 16).

If any legends ever gathered round the name of the eponymous head of Dan, they have entirely perished.

4. Traditions. All the more noteworthy is the abundance of traditions about the tribe. These are of two kinds. First there are the stories which, after circulating orally for many generations, were eventually committed to writing, and afterwards given so large a place in the latter portion of our present Book of Judges (q.v., § 16). These are among the best-known of the traditions of Israel. Then there are the most valuable fragmentary notices in Josh. 19 47³ Judg. 1 34 f.—mere scraps rescued from what the pre-exilic histories had to tell of the fortunes of this tribe (on the 'Blessings' see below, § 8). All these traditions, however,—both those that may fairly be treated as historical in their nature, and those that are mainly legendary—deal with two closely related points, the struggles which the tribe had with its non-Israelite neighbours, and its migration northwards.

Dan, it would seem, made the attempt to push its way down from the highlands of Ephraim (see above, § 2) into the territory still completely dominated by the

³ 6 has louba for day in v. 47 (i.e., 47 bc of MT), lou having been dittographed from the preceding vuv.

Canaanites. Whether it at first succeeded (Josh. 19 47^a, if we read דָּן; cp 6 and 2 K. 6 1) and then was driven back (Judg. 1 34) by the Philistines (cp Bu. Ri. Sa. 18, n. 1) or—since it is difficult to see how 'Philistines' could be changed, editorially or by a gloss, to Amorites—by the Canaanites (Judg. 1 34^f), or whether it never really established itself at all satisfactorily to the SW. of Ephraim, being forced back before it had really settled, we can hardly say. On some grounds it would perhaps seem probable either that it separated quite late from Ephraim or that it settled for some considerable time. Otherwise we should perhaps hardly have such clear traditions of the incidents of the subsequent migration (contrast the legendary character of the Samson stories); although it is not at all clear what the history of these traditions is (see above, § 4). In any case, it seems pretty clear that the main strength of the clan (דָּן) migrated northwards; but did not some remain? Probably.

Not so much because the MT represents the 600 fighting men as being some of the clan (Judg. 18 11; 6 'clans', δῆμον) of Dan (for the partitive preposition 7, which here has the same letter not only after it but also before it, might very well be due to dittography), nor perhaps because the existence of a remnant is needed to explain the copious traditions of the early fortunes of the tribe already referred to (see also below), but because it is difficult otherwise to account for the priestly writer assigning it solely to the southern territory.

Those who remained, however, seem hardly to have been able to make good a separate tribal existence; for it was, according to J, not Dan, but the house of Joseph, that finally gained the upper hand over the Canaanites (Judg. 1 35)—whatever that may refer to (see Bu. Ri. Sa. 18, n. 2).

According to Josh. 19 47 (emended text), the border of the children of Dan was too narrow for them, and so

6. Migration. Leshem (Lesham?) and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called it Dan. It is possibly the same writer who explains in Judg. 1 34 that the over-crowding of Dan was because 'the Amorite' forced them into the hill country. This Dan (see next article) became, as we have seen, if it was not already, a famous sanctuary, and it is not surprising that the story of its incorporation into Israel was a favourite with those who put into literary form the traditions of Israel's early days.

Many as are the obscurities of the narrative as we now have it in Judg. 17 ^f, one thing is clear: several hands have worked at it (see JUDGES, §§ 3 12). A deputation of Danites, after consulting a priest in Mount Ephraim, find a roomy district, easy of attack, in the far north, and return to Zorah to conduct their tribesmen thither. On the route they manage in one way or another to get the priest they had consulted to accompany them with the image he tended, which, having settled in their new home, they constitute their national palladium.

The main points in this story must be facts. How long the sanctuary maintained itself we do not know exactly (see the two independent representations in Judg. 18 30 ^f, and cp

7. Cycle of legends. SHILOH, JONATHAN, 1). Of a very different character are the stories that have gathered round the name of Samson; but they are more naturally treated elsewhere, the more so that we cannot be quite sure how far they are really to be regarded as Israelite in any ordinary sense, not to say Danite. See SAMSON.

Whether the metaphors of the serpent (Gen. 49 17) and the lion's whelp (Dt. 33 22) in the several 'Blessings' are simply later echoes perpetuating the memory of the famous raid on Leshem,

8. Later writings. or whether they point to a repetition of such raids by this lion-city itself (Stade, GV I 186), we do not know; the latter is not perhaps unlikely.¹

¹ The metaphor of the serpent on the way, biting the horse's heels and throwing the rider backwards, has been supposed to refer to embarrassment of the Aramæans in their wars with Israel.

At a later date, indeed, these references came to be interpreted of the southern Dan (Targ. Onk.) and of Samson in particular (Targ. Jon. and Jerus.). The fact, however, that P has nothing whatever to tell us of the territory of the N. Danites perhaps shows how this might come about.¹ On the other hand, the eulogistic sense in which the words are explained is remarkable in view of the ill odour that attached to the name of Dan in later times (see below, § 9).

What the outlines of the district assigned by P to Dan were, P nowhere states; perhaps he was himself unable to formulate any (cp the case of Simeon, Josh. 19 1-9). That he meant them to be inferred from his account of the adjacent tribes (Benjamin, Judah, Ephraim) is possible; but he is not usually afraid of repetition. Of the sixteen (in MT seventeen) places which P assigns to Dan, eight may be regarded as identified beyond reasonable doubt (see ZORAH, ESHTAOL, IR-SHEMESH, AIJALON, TIMNAH, EKRON, JEHUD, BENE-BERAK), while ME-JARKON (q.v., and see RAKKON, MAKAZ) must probably be sought in the neighbourhood of Rūs el-Ain. In Josh. 15 the same writer assigns not only Timnah (v. 57) and Ekron (v. 45), which are historically best known as Philistine cities, but also Zorah and Eshtaol, where if anywhere the Danites were settled, to JUDAH.²

Still less to be trusted is the account of Josephus (Ant. v. 1 22, end), which, likewise ignoring altogether the N. Dan, actually makes S. Dan extend as far N. as Dor and as far S. as Ashdod. Although P represents Dan as, next to Judah, the largest tribe at the end of the nomadic period (Nu. 26 43), both P and the Chronicler³ tend otherwise to give the tribe the scantiest possible consideration. In Joshua it is the last to have its lot assigned it (19 40 ^f). The Dan fragment is the last of those collected in Judg. 1 (v. 34 ^f). The tribe stands last in the list in 1 Ch. 27 16-22. In Rev. (chap. 7) it is omitted altogether (see below, § 9), and the same fate seems to have befallen it in the genealogical lists in 1 Ch. 2 ^f.⁴ In the form of the list now appearing in Gen. 46 23=Nu. 26 42 ^f.⁵ (both P), indeed, Dan is credited with one family; but one cannot be quite sure that the statement may not be a very late addition founded on the notion (propounded in modern times by Bertheau, ad loc.) that Aher (= 'another') in 'HUSHIM, the sons of Aher' (1 Ch. 7 12d), was a circumlocution for Dan rather than a corruption of Ahihor or some other name (see BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. a). At all events, the omission of a Dan list from his lists by the Chronicler would be no

² On the other hand, the Chronicler probably did not really mean to make Gath-rimmon Ephraimite (1 Ch. 6 69 [54]); see next note but one.

⁴ In the Chronicler's list of tribes in which Levitical cities were appointed (1 Ch. 6 54 [39] ^f) Dan appears to be omitted; but v. 61 [46] is obviously corrupt. A comparison with its source in Josh. 21 20-26 [P] shows that the name of Dan has dropped out, whilst the fact that Ephraim also, though preserved by 61 in 1 Ch. 6 61 [46], is dropped in MT shows that the omission is not intentional. It has accordingly been restored by Kau. in HS and Ki. in SBO T. In the enumeration of the towns by name farther down (v. 67 [52]-81 [66]) Dan is again omitted (this time without the company of Ephraim); but the probable explanation of this omission of Dan is that either the Chronicler or some copyist has accidentally omitted Josh. 21 23; for the consequence is that v. 24 is copied as if it belonged to v. 22, Aijalon and Gath-rimmon being assigned to Ephraim, and the Kohathite cities becoming eight, instead of ten, as stated above in 1 Ch. 6 61 [46].

stranger than his omission of Zebulun, which has three families assigned it by P in Gen. 46 14 = Nu. 26 26.

It is a fact, however, that in later times Dan was in disrepute. In the Targums, indeed, as we have seen, the tribe is held in high esteem; but in Talmudic times this is changed. Thus Midr. Rab. on Numb. declares that when Jeroboam went from tribe to tribe none joined him so readily as Dan. In the Talmud (Shabbath 66), accordingly, Dan represents idolatry. Further, out of the very same passages so favourably interpreted in the Targums, there was evolved, in connection with Jer. 8 16, the remarkable notion (appearing in Test. xii. Patr.) that Beliar is in some peculiar way connected with the tribe, which, it is declared, will transgress against Levi and Judah, 'for in the Book of Enoch it is said that their ruler is Satan; but the salvation of the Lord will arise out of Judah and Levi, and he will fight against Beliar.' With this is connected the tradition that the Antichrist is to come of the tribe of Dan. Already in Iren. (v. 302) we find the fancy—it may be more than a fancy—that this is the explanation of the omission of Dan from the list of those that are sealed (Rev. 7 5-8). H. W. H.

DAN (דָּן; דָּאן). 1. A city 'in the valley which belongs to BETH-REHOV [q.v.]' Judg. 18 28; conquered by the Danites. It was the most northern city of Israel: note the phrase 'from Dan as far as Beersheba' (see above, 994, n. 2). Its original name was LAISH [q.v.]; in Judg. 18 29 the change of name is accounted for. Historical references to it occur, not only in Judg. 18, but also in 2 S. 24 6 (where jaan is appended to Dan by a singular error of the text; see DAN-JAAN); also in 1 K. 12 29 (golden calf), and 1 K. 15 20, and 2 Ch. 16 4 (Benhadad's invasion). The reference to the name Dan in Gen. 14 14 need not, in the present writer's opinion, be counted; it is true, the city afterwards called Dan is meant, but the anachronistic 'Dan' is simply a scribe's error for 'Laish'; the true text probably is, '... and pressed after them, he and his servants, as far as Laish, and smote them.'¹

One of the supposed arguments for the late date of Gen. 14 must therefore be abandoned; but this by no means involves regarding that strange narrative as historical. The anachronism in Dt. 34 1 remains. The site of Dan has recently been fixed by G. A. Smith (HG, 473, 480 f.) at Bāniās, on the ground

2. Identification. that the situation of Bāniās is so much stronger than that of Tell el-Kāḍī (cp CÆSAREA, § 7). The fact is undeniable, yet not decisive. From Judg. 18 we do not gather that Laish was a place of exceptional natural strength; its inhabitants were a peaceful folk, who trusted not in their fortress but in their remoteness from troublesome people like the Danites.

Theodoret no doubt favours our eminent geographer's view. 'The present Paneas,' he says, 'was called Dan,'² and even Jerome (on Ezek. 48 18 and on Am. 8 14) speaks of Dan as being where Paneas now is. The Jerus. Targ., too (on Gen. 14 14), calls Cæsarea Philippi 'Dan of Cæsarea.' These vague statements, however, do not carry much weight. On the other hand, Josephus (Ant. i. 10 1 v. 3 1 viii. 84; Bj iv. 1 1) expressly says that Dan stood at the 'lesser' fountain of the Jordan, in the plain of Sidon, a day's journey from that city, and that the plain around it was extremely fertile. Eus. and Jer. (OS 2) 114 26 249 32) speak still more definitely. 'A village four miles distant from Paneas, on the road to Tyre; it was the boundary of Judæa (ὁριον τῆς Ἰουδαίας), and at it the Jordan takes its rise.' Jerome adds: 'De quo et Jordanis flumen erumpens a loco sortitus est nomen. Ior quippe πεῖλον (id est fluvium sive rivum) Hebræi vocant' (cp JORDAN). A glance at any handbook of geography will show what spot is here meant.

Four miles west of Bāniās, in a well-watered district, is one of the two great fountains of the Jordan. It rises at the W. base of an extensive cup-shaped mound, called Tell el-Kāḍī. Now Kāḍī in Arabic and Dān in Hebrew both mean 'judge,' and the fountain bears a name (Leddān) which also may perhaps be an echo of the name of the old city. The very fact that Tell el-Kāḍī is now said to be unhealthy suggests one reason more for identifying it with Dan, for Josephus (Bj iv. 1 1) expressly says that the marshes of Lake Semachonitis (Hüle) extend northwards as far as Daphnē (Dan), where are the sources of the Little Jordan (Leddān). Probably, however, in antiquity, when irrigation was better cared for, the place now called Tell el-Kāḍī was perfectly healthy. On the whole, the grounds of the proposed identification seem to the present writer to be strong. Robinson, Guérin, Porter, Luhl, and Moore have given their support to the same theory.

Tell el-Kāḍī rises out of a dense jungle of thorn-bushes and rank weeds. Its circumference is about half a mile, and its greatest elevation above the plain eighty feet. There are some traces of old foundations, and heaps of large stones on the top and sides of the S. part of the rim, where perhaps the citadel or a temple may have stood. There are also ruins in the plain a short distance N. of the tell. There are doubtless other remains, but they are now covered with grass and jungle' (Porter).

DANCE. 'There is a time to raise the death-wail and a time to dance,' says the Preacher (Eccl. 3 4).

We have not now to discuss the origin of the practice of dancing, nor its connection with funeral, as well as with festival, observances. We may assume that from a very early period it has been an expression of joy, and has been accompanied by music and song. The musical instrument employed may be no better than a wooden drum;¹ but without some music there can be none of that rhythmic movement which we call dancing. The principal occasions of dancing are, in an ancient community, religious. If these assumptions are, as far as our evidence goes, true for Polynesia, still more obviously are they true for early Egypt and Babylonia. The happy-tempered Egyptians loved their various dances, and cultivated the art both in public and in private festivities, both in war and in peace; but the primary impulse was religious.² In Babylonia and Assyria, too, the art of dancing flourished. 'To dance' (raḳāḏu) is a synonym for 'to rejoice'; and so great was the demand for singers (music and singing naturally go together with dancing) that Hezekiah king of Judah was made to send singers as well as other women of the palace to Nineveh (Prism Inscr. 3 39).³

Neither Egypt nor early Babylonia, however, can be presumed to have influenced the primitive Israelitish

2. Among the customs, except, indeed, through the Canaanites. Of much greater importance are our scanty notices of Arabian dancing. What the Bedouin dancing is to-day can be seen as near to civilisation as Jericho. Wild as it is, it is not without rhythm and measure.⁴ There are also still some relics of the primitive religious dance. Besides the dancing at the merry Circumcision Feast (muzayyin), combined with sacrifice, there is the well-known custom of 'circumambulating' the Ka'ba or Holy House at Mecca seven times. This procession is a true substitute for a very old heathen rite.⁵ The prince-poet Imrāl-Kais likens a herd of wild kine (ox antelopes) to a group of girls, gown-clad, going swiftly round the Dawâr or sacred stone. Mohammed himself could not abolish this custom. The procession round the Kaaba is really the Hajj: this term is now applied to the Mecca pilgrimage; but its root-meaning plainly is to go in a circle (cp Ps. 107 27 מְהוֹלֵךְ).

Pre-Islamic Arabia explains much that is characteristic in Israelitish life. This is specially true of religious rites.

The chief original Hebrew term for a religious dance was doubtless מָנָה, hag.

The rendering 'feast' or 'festival' will indeed suffice in most cases, but only because religious festivals necessarily included the sacred dance, at least as long as the sacred stones remained in the sanctuaries. In Ps. 118 27 Cheyne (Psalms⁽¹⁾) renders 'Bind the procession with branches,' with reference to the swiftly moving procession which took the place of the older dance; Baer, more boldly, 'Bind the dance' (i.e. the dancers). Unfortunately, the text of this passage is not free from corruption;¹ but it is, at any rate, permissible to recognise the sacred dance in Ex. 109, 'Let my people go that they may keep a feast with dancing to me in the desert'—not that all would take part in the dance: the dancers would represent the people, all of whom would 'rejoice before Yahwè,' as the phrase was. Perhaps we may compare 1 S. 30 16, if מְהוֹלֵךְ (applied to the Amalekites who had plundered Ziklag) means 'circling in the sacred dance' (see BDB). At any rate, in Ps. 42 4 [5] the best sense is obtained by reading, not מְהוֹלֵךְ, 'a multitude that kept holyday' (AV), but מְהוֹלֵךְ, 'the music of those who kept festival'² (הַמִּוֶּזֶן, 'music,' Am. 5 23 Ezek. 28 13). That dancing is here referred to, however, is not evident.

Words for dancing in general. (1) מְהוֹלֵךְ, sihlek, or מְהוֹלֵךְ, sihlek (Arab. ḍahika 'to laugh,' whence madhakan 'mimus'; Syr. ḡahak; G. maileu) meaning 'to sport, to jest.' Though commonly used to denote any kind of sport (Gen. 21 9, RVmg. 'playing'; 26 8 RV 'sporting'), it may denote simply 'dancing' (see 2 S. 6 5 = 1 Ch. 13 8 Judg. 16 25 Jer. 31 4).

2. In late writings we meet with מְהוֹלֵךְ, rāḡadh, prop. 'to leap,' 1 Ch. 15 29; Ass. raḡādu [see above]; Syr. rāḡadh, Pa. 'to dance,' Aph. 'to lament' (plangere); Tg. מְהוֹלֵךְ; G. ḡraieōhai, σκιρτάν; cp Ar. raḡada, 'to move the feet, to hop.'

3. The root מְהוֹלֵךְ, hāl, 'to writhe, whirl,' Judg. 21 21 (whence מְהוֹלֵךְ, māhāl, מְהוֹלֵךְ, meḥōlah, 'dance,' χορός) suggests a more intricate movement.

4. Lastly, we have in 2 S. 6 16 the two אֲנָ. לֵעַי. מְהוֹלֵךְ, piššēz, and מְהוֹלֵךְ, kirkēr (the latter also in v. 14) (Ar. karra, 'to advance and retreat,' karkara, id.; 2 S. 6 14 מְהוֹלֵךְ, Targ., מְהוֹלֵךְ, Pesh. mešabbah, Vg. saltabat). Most probably, however, מְהוֹלֵךְ should rather be read מְהוֹלֵךְ (Che.); the former of these participles is justified by the facts brought together by Toy, JBL 16 178 f. [197], which show that מְהוֹלֵךְ (pāsaḥ), the root of מְהוֹלֵךְ, means virtually 'to dance,' and the latter by the authority of 1 Ch. 15 29.

Dancing, then, was of the essence of a primitive religious festival. It was not the choral dances (מְהוֹלֵךְ)

5. A part of that provoked the wrath of Moses (Exod. 32 19): Miriam's 'dances' were evidently primitive religion congenial to all (Exod. 15 20 f.; cp Judg. 11 34 1 S. 18 6 21 11 [12]). It was the worship of the steer-god that angered the great leader. The Hebrews never ceased to be religious dancers, though the form of the ceremony may have changed. Some idea of the early rite may be gained from the account in 2 S. 6 14 of David's dancing 'before Yahwè' (i.e., before the ark; cp. v. 5). Michal indeed took her husband's act amiss. She was too unimaginative to see the meaning of a practice which was beginning to be antiquated. She thought that by leading the dance in such attire, and mixing with the common people, her husband was playing a part which was within the province of a woman only, and unworthy of his character and office. David's answer well expresses his own devoutness, though he cannot have guessed what issues of world-wide importance hung upon the transference of the ark to Jerusalem.¹

Again, at the great religious crisis in the reign of Ahab it is not the 'dancing' that Elijah disapproves, but its connection with a bad, foreign religion. The prophets of Baal, we are told, 'leaped'—i.e., danced after a special rite—around their altar, not eucharistically, but as suppliants (1 K. 18 26). Elijah, though too confident of his God's favour to attempt to work upon him by ritual, does not hesitate to use the word מְהוֹלֵךְ ('to leap') in his taunting address to the Israelites (v. 21).² Indeed, Toy seems to have shown that the spring-festival called Pesah (EV Passover) derived its name from the dances (מְהוֹלֵךְ, see above, § 4 4) connected with it. A conservative prophet like Elijah could never have opposed religious dances.

Indeed, one may fairly say that prophecy itself—at any rate, that represented by Elisha—was under some obligations to dancing. The inspiration of those who belonged to the guilds of prophets (see PROPHECY) was prepared for by music and rhythmic movements of the body (cp 1 S. 10 10 11 19 20 24). It was the wild proceedings of prophets when in this preparatory state that degraded the whole order in the eyes of many Israelites (cp 2 K. 9 11). It is difficult, when looking at dervishes performing their exercises, not to think of the so-called 'sons of the prophets' (again see PROPHECY). 'Ulemas and dervishes with the chief muftis at their head were leaping, bounding, swaying their arms, and whirling in time to the din of drums, trumpets, and cymbals which followed them' (Tristram).

For the stated religious ritual of the pre-exilic age we are ill-provided with authorities. Still, we know that

6. At festivals. the three great festivals (especially that of Tabernacles) were celebrated with an exuberant joy which expressed itself in dancing. The Psalter proves that even in the post-exilic age dancing as well as music formed part of divine service (see Pss. 149 3 150 4). Eucharistic procession (no doubt at a quick pace) round the altar was customary (266, and according to MT [see above], 118 27). Processions of God also, which, from the mention of maidens with timbrels, may be presumed to have been a dance-festival, are spoken of (Ps. 68 24 [25], SBOT). Ps. 876, however, is too obscure to be quoted.

There was dancing at tribal and family festivals (cp the place-name ABEL-MEHOLAH [g.v.], 'dancing meadow'; 1 K. 19 16). It was at a yearly tribal festival that the daughters of Shiloh came forth for choral dances (Judg. 21 21 מְהוֹלֵךְ, מְהוֹלֵךְ), and there is a singular story, which almost seems like an attempt to account for marriage by capture (see M'Lennan, Primitive Marriage), respecting the Benjamites who chose wives from among the dancers (מְהוֹלֵךְ, מְהוֹלֵךְ). We must apparently take this in connection with the curious custom referred to elsewhere (CANTICLES, § 9; ATONEMENT, DAY OF), which was evidently greatly toned down in post-exilic times. The young men and maidens of Jerusalem danced in the vineyards, not without results, on the evening of the 15th of Ab (this was the festival of Wood-carrying³) and of the Day of Atonement, and sang edifying songs on marriage (Mishna, Ta'anith, iv. 8). A dance performed by the chief men of the city was a special incident in the festivities of the Feast of Tabernacles. At the close of the first day men of piety and repute, singing hymns, danced with torches in their hands. No one who has not seen this joy, said a proverb, has seen true joy (Succa, 5 r-4). Thus the severity of the Law could not extinguish the impulse in the Jewish people towards rhythmic movement.

There was, however, one kind of dancing against which wise men protested. It is no doubt of Greek dancing-girls that Ben Sira is thinking when he warns his readers not to 'use the company of a woman that is a singer' (Ecclus. 9.4). Hellenism, indeed, was even more dangerous morally than religiously. It is just possible, too, that when on Herod's birthday the daughter of Herodias came forward to amuse the guests (ἐν τῷ μέσῳ, Mt. 14.6; cp Mk. 6.22 Lk. 15.25) her style of dancing was derived from the pantomimic solo-dance of the hired female dancers of Greece.¹

The few occasions in the Bible in which dancing is referred to may be said to have an interpretative value.

7. Biblical references.

It was not always necessary to mention that a happy event was celebrated by dancing, because early readers would supply this detail mentally for themselves. We are thankful, however, that the writers did sometimes mention the dancing, and that so they interpreted for us many other passages. Dancing was continually in request in Israelitish and in Jewish society (Jer. 31.4-3 Mt. 11.17 Lk. 7.32 15.25). Thus (as in Assyrian) 'dancing' and 'rejoicing' were synonymous terms (Lam. 5.15 Eccles. 3.4 Ps. 30.11 [12]). It is an improbable idea of Leyrer (PRB) that there is a reference to a kind of square dance in Cant. 7.1 [6.13] (הַחֲמִשָּׁה הַחֲמִשָּׁה; see MAHANAIM). Much more safely may we suppose a reference to a sword-dance, such as Wetzstein found as a part of the wedding ceremonies in Syria (cp CANTICLES, § 9). Dancing has, of course, always been popular at weddings; and the virgins in the parable who go out to meet the bridegroom no doubt looked forward to a merry choral dance. Modern Arabs still sing and dance with lighted torches on the day of a wedding.

The name דָּנִיֵּאל occurs in a Palmyrene inscription (De Vogüé, La Syrie centrale, no. 93). On the name Daniel in Ezek., see the suggestion in ENOCH, § 1.

1. A man of extraordinary wisdom and righteousness (Ezek.; see above). This Daniel appears to have become proverbial, as did Noah and Job; but when and where he was thought to have lived we are not told.

2. A Jewish captive, said to have been carried to Babylon 'in the third year of Jehoiakim' when Jerusalem was taken (Dan. 1.1-6), and to have become, through his supernatural wisdom, chief of the sages of Babylon and the minister of successive dynasties. The latest date mentioned in his life is the third year of Cyrus (Dan. 10.1; cp, however, 12.1). Outside the book which bears his name, and the apocryphal additions to it, the only biblical passages which mention this Daniel are 1 Macc. 2.60 and Mt. 24.15 (= Mk. 13.14). The former contains only a didactic reference to the story of the lions' den. The latter apparently makes Jesus speak of 'Daniel the prophet'; but, as the form of the citation shows, it is rather the evangelist who speaks (cp B. Weiss, Das Matthäusevangel. 508). 3. A priest of the line of Ithamar in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA, i. § 2; ii. § 15 (1) d), Ezra 8.2 = 1 Esd. 8.29 (γαμψλος [B], γαμψα [A], a corruption of δανηλ [os], not = Gamaliel, as van Hoonacker); and signatory to the covenant (see EZRA, i. § 7), Neh. 10.6 [7]. Among his contemporaries we find a Mishaël (Neh. 8.4), an Azariah (Neh. 10.2 [3]), and a Hananiah (Neh. 10.23 [24]). Cp. Dan. 1.7.

4. One of the six sons born to David in Hebron; his mother was Abigail (1 Ch. 3.1; see DAVID, § 11, iii. d). According to Be. the name is miswritten for Delaiah (cp 3); but, as Klo. more plausibly thinks, it is rather a corruption of Dodiël (דָּדִיֵּאל); BAL reads Δαλουνια—i.e., Δαδουνια = Dodiiah (דָּדִיֵּאל), another form of the same name. Cp the names Doda, Dodo, Dodavahu. BAL, however, has Δαμνηα; Jos. (Ant. vii. 14) Δανίηλος. The 2 S. 3.3 has Chileab (צִלְיָא) in MT, but BAL has Δαλουνια; the other versions (Cod. 243, in Field, 1550) Αβια. Chileab, though adopted by Ki. (Chron. SBOT), is surely wrong¹ (cp Berachoth, 4a). This was David's second son, and after the death of Amnon would be the heir to the throne. His brothers Absalom and Adonijah played so important a part that it is surprising that nothing is told of their elder brother. Perhaps he died early or was removed.

DANIEL, BOOK OF. If we adopt the mediæval division of the book into twelve chapters,² the first six form a narrative half, which can be distinguished naturally enough from the second, in which Daniel records his visions. More important, however, than any such division into twice six chapters is a recognition of the fact that the aim of the book is not historical but parenetic: it aimed at exhortation and encouragement. It falls, accordingly, into several more or less detached and (so to speak) independent pieces or pictures, designed to lift the minds and hearts of its original readers, the contemporaries of the tyrant Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, above the oppressive present to the heights of a glowing piety and a strong spiritual faith. These detached pieces, of which there are ten, Ewald groups so as to divide the book into (a) an introductory part (chap. 1 f.); (b) a second part (chap. 3-6), containing four narratives prefiguring events; and (c) a third part (chap. 7-12), containing four prophetic pieces. This threefold division is favoured by the consideration that the twice four pieces contained in parts (b) and (c) then serve as further amplifications of part (a)—for (a) also contains a narrative prefiguring events (chap. 1), and a Messianic prophecy (chap. 2) in which four kingdoms (corresponding to the four beasts of chap. 7) are followed by the everlasting Messianic kingdom which brings the history of the world to its close.

1. Subdivisions.

The first of the ten pieces thus indicated (chap. 1) tells how Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, after a siege and capture of Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim king of Judah (605 B.C.), took Daniel and three other youths of noble descent from Judah to Babylon, where he had them brought up for the service of the royal court. Casual mention is made of some of the sacred vessels having been conveyed to Babylon—as the author intends afterwards (chap. 5) to speak of their desecration—and we are told with some minuteness of the scrupulousity with which Daniel, Hananiah, Mishaël, and Azariah guarded themselves against certain pollutions, and how marvellously God rewarded them for this: when they came to stand before the king, he found them ten times better than all the magicians and enchanters in his realm.

The second piece (chap. 2) relates an astonishing proof of the supernatural wisdom of Daniel, by means of which he was able to save his own life and the lives of the other magicians. The king insists on having the dream which has disturbed him not only interpreted but also, first of all, recovered for him, and Daniel meets the unreasonable demand. The great image seen by the king is interpreted as signifying by its head of gold the present kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, whilst the remaining parts of the body, of silver, brass, and iron, are referred to three kingdoms which are destined to follow the Babylonian. The fourth kingdom, to which, as a divided kingdom, the legs (of iron) and the feet (partly of iron and partly of clay) correspond, is followed by the everlasting kingdom set up by the God of heaven. Just as the stone cut out without hands breaks in pieces the whole image, and itself becomes a great mountain that fills the whole

² The division into chapters has been unskillfully made at three points: chap. 11 ought not to begin till 11.26; and in MT chaps. 3 and 5 ought to end, as in EV, with 3.30 and 5.31 [6.1] respectively.

DANIEL, BOOK OF

earth, so every earthly dominion must give way before the imperishable kingdom of God.

In the third piece (8:1-30) we are told how, as a punishment for their refusal to worship the great golden image which Nebuchadnezzar had set up, the three friends of Daniel (himself silently passed over) were cast into the burning fiery furnace, and how at last, when the fire had not been able to hurt the men of Judah who had been thus steadfast to their faith, the great king was compelled to do homage to their god.

The fourth piece (4:1 [3:31]-4:37 [34]) tells, in the form of a proclamation by Nebuchadnezzar to all the peoples of the whole world—a form which is not carried out with uniform consistency—how an evil dream (which the king himself in this instance relates) had thrown him into dismay, and how Daniel alone was able rightly to interpret the vision, prophesying to the king that as a punishment for his pride he should for a long time be bereft of reason. Nebuchadnezzar is thus for a third time constrained to give the glory to the Ruler of heaven.

Next, in the fifth piece (5:1-5:31 [6:1]), we have Belshazzar's feast and overthrow: we are told how in a wild orgy this king, unwarned by the fate of his father Nebuchadnezzar, desecrated the sacred vessels of the temple, and thereupon was horror-stricken by the miraculous handwriting on the wall.¹ The explanation of this, which Daniel alone was able to give, was soon shown to have been correct, for that very night the king was slain, and his crown passed to Darius the Mede.

The sixth piece (6:1-28 [2:29]), that of Daniel in the lions' den, has reference exclusively to Daniel—just as a corresponding section, that of the burning fiery furnace, relates only to his three friends. We here read how King Darius suffered himself to be induced by his nobles, who were envious of Daniel, to promulgate the foolish decree that any one who for the space of a month should offer any petition to god or man should be thrown to the lions. Naturally Daniel transgressed this command; but the king, who had been compelled against his will to consign his faithful servant to punishment, soon became convinced of his error by the protection which Daniel's god vouchsafed to his worshipper, and, condemning the accusers to the fate which they had prepared for Daniel, commanded all his subjects to serve Daniel's god.

The seventh piece (7), the first in the prophetic section, is a picture in companionship to chap. 2, and dates from the first year of Belshazzar, not from the time of Nebuchadnezzar, to which the first group of four pieces belong. If, moreover, as we read in 10:1, the last great vision which Daniel saw immediately before his death is to be assigned to the third year of Cyrus, exactly seventy years after Daniel's deportation from Judah, it seems fitting that the eighth piece also should be assigned to the Babylonian period, and that only the last two prophetic sections should be given to that of the Medes and Persians. Most of the years—they amounted to an ordinary lifetime—that Daniel spent in the East must have fallen under the reigns of the Babylonian kings; for, whilst Darius the Mede was already in his sixty-second year when he ascended the throne of Babylon (5:31 [6:1]), Daniel saw only the beginning of the reign of his successor Cyrus the Persian.

In chap. 7 we have Daniel's account of his vision of the four beasts, from each of which successively the supremacy is taken away to be at last and for ever bestowed upon the Messiah, one 'like a son of man' who comes from heaven, and so at the same time the kingdom is possessed by the saints of the Most High.

If, in 7:25, the angel's interpretation of one of the horns of the fourth beast has already unmistakably pointed to a king who persecuted the Jews on account of their religion, it is made still more apparent in the eighth piece (in the interpretation which Gabriel gives of Daniel's vision in the third year of Belshazzar) that by the fourth kingdom, which arises after the reigns of the Medes and Persians, we are to understand the Grecian empire of Alexander the Great and his successors. By the reader acquainted with Jewish history the description of the horn which at first was small, or of the bold overbearing king who deprives the Most High of his continual burnt-offering and gives up his sanctuary to wanton desecration, and at the same time rages furiously against the holy people, cannot fail to be understood as referring to the Syrian king Antiochus IV. Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.) who, by his religious edict (1 Macc. 1:41 f.), designed to bring about the establishment of the Greek cultus throughout his whole dominions, and, by setting up an altar to the Olympian Zeus upon the altar of burnt-offering in Jerusalem (Dec. 168), provoked the revolt of the Maccabees (167). The eighth piece contains the comforting promise that after 2300 evenings and mornings the temple of God will be again restored to its rightful position, and the shameless king overthrown, but not by human hand.

The ninth piece (chap. 9), after a prayer of Daniel which, notwithstanding its borrowings from Ezra 9 and ¹ Clermont Ganneau's theory (J.A., 1886), accepted by Nöld. (Z.A. 141 f.) and Bevan, that the mysterious inscription consists really of names of weights, is rejected by Behrmann. See MENE.

Neh. 9, is still pathetic, gives Gabriel's interpretation of the seventy years, predicted by Jeremiah, as meaning seventy weeks of years, after the lapse of which the day of salvation is to dawn.

Whilst this vision comes to Daniel in the first year of the reign of Darius the Mede over the kingdom of Babylon, the last or tenth piece (chaps. 10-12) is dated from the third year of Cyrus his successor. In correspondence with the great importance of this last vision is the long introduction, after which, by a sketch (chap. 11) mainly devoted to the complicated relations between the Seleucids and the Ptolemies, and a picture of the downfall of the Syrian tyrant, the final destiny of the people of God is brought more precisely into connection with universal history. Chap. 12, however, does not give any one absolutely precise indication of the exact time when the troublous days, such as have never before been known, are to come to an end: it vacillates between 1290 and 1335 as the number of days that are to elapse between the setting up of the idolatrous worship in the temple and the coming of the glorious time of the end.

The view taken over by the church from the synagogue, which makes Daniel not only the principal hero

3. Authorship. but also the author of the book, has not unreasonably passed current among theologians down to the present century. To the unprejudiced reader the book appears to claim to have been written by Daniel. The narratives in the first six chapters do not expressly make this claim; but in 7:2 we find Daniel himself presented as the narrator by the use of the first person singular. The use of the third person in chaps. 1-6 and in the beginnings of chaps. 7 and 10 is not against the authorship of Daniel (cp Am. 7:12 f.), who, at the beginning of chap. 8 and of chap. 9, speaks in the first person in giving the date. The close connection of chaps. 1-6 with the visions which follow may fairly be held to carry over the claim for Daniel's authorship to the beginning of the book also. No attentive reader will allow himself to be

4. Unity. misled as to the oneness of the authorship of the book by the fragmentary or detached character of the ten pieces of which it is composed, if he attentively observes how the earlier portions allude to the later, and conversely how the later portions attach themselves to the earlier, and how the same general manner of presentation, thought, and language pervades the whole.

The organic unity of the Book of Daniel, denied by Reuss and Lagarde, has been once more defended by Frhr. von Gall in a monograph (see below, § 23). The grounds, however, which he offers (123 f.) for regarding 9:4-20 as a late insertion are no more than plausible. The contents of this section are of a higher type than those of the hymns in the apocryphal additions to Daniel. A certain solemn fulness is characteristic of the liturgical style, and is not wanting in passages which may have served the author as his models—e.g., Ezra 9 and Neh. 9. Von Gall's changes in 9:2 f. are arbitrary; the change in the names of God, which is quite appropriate, proves nothing. It is a pure fancy that the author of Daniel, who was acquainted with the Book of Jeremiah, does not regard misfortune as penal, see 4:34 5:22 30, etc. Besides, if we expunge 9:4-20, how much remains for chap. 9? Only ten verses. This is surely not enough for the ninth of the pieces which form the book.

What has been said as to the true unity of the book is only apparently contradicted by the

5. Interchange use from 2:46 to the end of chap. 7 of of language. the Aramaic language in a book otherwise written in Hebrew.

This interchange of language has given rise to many hypotheses. Spinoza thought the first seven chapters might be an extract made in the time of Judas the Maccabees from old writings of the Chaldeans (cp Berthold, Einh. 1508 f.). Huetius, on the other hand, suggested that the whole Book of Daniel had been originally written in Aramaic, and shortly afterwards translated into Hebrew, and that, the original work having been partly destroyed in the dark days of the Seleucids, the text was restored by borrowing the Heb. sections that we now have from the Heb. version (cp Berth. Einh. 1544, 1549). It is hardly an improvement on this view when J. D. Prince, adopting the theory of Lenormant and Bevan, says: 'The work was probably written at first all in Hebrew; but for the convenience of the general reader, whose language was Aramaic, a translation, possibly from the same pen as the original, was made into the Aramaic vernacular. It must be supposed then that, certain parts of the Heb. manuscript being lost, the missing places were supplied from the current Aramaic translation (Book of Daniel [199], p. 13).

The hypothesis that 'the Heb. edition was partly destroyed in the troubled Seleucid period, and the missing portions supplied from the Aramaic version,' leaves unexplained why the change of language should occur precisely at 2.4, where the Aramaic language happens to be mentioned. This name cannot be regarded as a gloss, although 'the author of Daniel evidently fell into the error of regarding "Chaldean" as the language of Babylonia.' If, to begin with, the loss of part of a MS of no great length is in itself very improbable, still less satisfactory is the assertion that in the second century before Christ such Palestinian Jews as were able to read books at all could hardly understand any Hebrew. Reusch is right when he says (*Eint. in das AT*⁴), 1870, p. 118: 'The change of language occurs in the middle of a section that cannot be divided (2.4), which shows that the author was so familiar with both languages that he could glide from one into the other without noticing it, and could assume for a great proportion of his contemporaries a knowledge of them both.' No one asserts, as Prince expresses it, that both languages 'were used quite indifferently'; the author of Daniel and his readers were certainly more at home in the Aramaic vernacular. When Prince asks why chap. 7, 'which is indivisible from the succeeding prophetic Hebrew portions,' was written not in Heb. but in Aram., we may answer that chap. 7 was written in the same Aramaic idiom as chap. 2 simply in order to make every observant reader feel that the book was one, and that the four visions were inseparable from the six narratives.¹

The change of dialect is made quite naturally thus: In chap. 2 the author has introduced the 'Chaldeans' as speaking the language which he believed to be customary with them; afterwards he continues to use the same language on account of its greater convenience both for himself and for his original readers, both in the narrative portions and in the following (seventh) chapter, the piece in companionship to chap. 2; for the last three visions (8-12) a return to Hebrew was suggested by the consideration that this had from old been the usual sacred language for prophetic subjects. Whether the Aramaic of Daniel, which is closely allied to that in Ezra, can really be taken as historically the language spoken in the Babylonian court in the sixth century B.C., or for the native language of the Chaldeans, cannot be discussed until we have faced the whole question of the historical validity or invalidity of the book (see § 10). It is enough in the meantime to say that the Aramaic or 'Chaldee' portion of Daniel cannot possibly have formed an independent work; on the contrary, the change of language serves to bind the different parts of the work into a firmer unity.

The position of the Book of Daniel with reference to historical fact, a question most intimately bound up with that of its date, can be discussed to advantage only after we have, in a purely exegetical way (Bleek in JDT, 1860, p. 53 ff.), firmly established the fact that makes for the unity of authorship in all five prophetic pieces (chaps. 2 and 7-12): the fact, namely, that the range of vision in each case reaches down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, in whom afflicted Israel discerned the culmination of all that had been hostile to God in all history, and that, with Epiphanes' destruction, which is regarded as imminent, the dawn of the Messianic time is expected. This done, we shall have no difficulty in finding other weighty reasons for fixing the composition of the book of Daniel at a date shortly before the death of Antiochus IV.

The extraordinary precision with which the exilic Daniel seems to prophesy about things that are to happen several centuries afterwards is particularly conspicuous in chap. 11, where, for example, reference is made in v. 18 to the victory which the Consul Lucius Scipio gained over Antiochus III. at Magnesia, in Lydia, in 190 B.C., or in v. 30 to Popilius Lænas, who in the name of the Roman Senate forced Antiochus Epiphanes in 168 B.C. to quit Egypt with great precipitancy, upon which the king, as we learn from 1 Macc. 1.30 ff., wreaked his wrath upon his Jewish subjects. Although predictions of this sort are nowhere found in the writings of the prophets of the OT (cp PROPHECY), orthodoxy was long accustomed to take special delight in contemplating predictions which had been so wonderfully fulfilled (cp the case of the name of Cyrus in Is. 44.28). In the present century, however, as the historical sense became quickened, difficulties began to present themselves against assumptions which were contrary to the analogy of the prophetic writings and found their support merely in the dogma of a magical inspiration.

7. Always In spite of Pusey's energetic warning against 'half-measures,' modern Antiochus IV. apologists, pressed by the constantly increasing historical difficulties caused by cuneiform decipherments, have been driven more and more to seek refuge in the 'half-measures' thus deprecated, so that, as Bevan (Dan. 8) humorously says, 'the defenders of Daniel have, during the last few years, been employed chiefly in cutting Daniel to pieces.'

It may suffice if reference is made here to but one of the equally arbitrary and nugatory attempts which have been made to save the authenticity of the book as a whole by surrendering its oneness of authorship. Zöckler in his exposition of the Book of Daniel (70) declared 11.5-39 to be a later interpolation; he had come to see quite clearly that such a piece of history could never have been penned by an exilic prophet. The attempt, however, was just as vain as the attempt made elsewhere to change the name of Cyrus (Is. 45.1) into an appellative, for it left altogether out of account Dan. 2.43 and the relation of that verse to 11.6. These two verses treat of two unlucky intermarriages between Seleucids and the Ptolemies: namely, v. 6, of the marriage of Berenice, daughter of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, with Antiochus II. Theos, and v. 17, of that of Cleopatra (daughter of the Seleucid Antiochus III., the Great, and thus sister of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes), from whom all the Egyptian Cleopatras have taken their name, with Ptolemy V. Epiphanes. But these marriages are quite plainly alluded to in 2.43, where we read as follows regarding the kingdom represented in the vision by the legs of iron and the feet partly of iron and partly of clay: 'And whereas thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men, but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron doth not mingle with clay.' From this it follows at once that by the fourth kingdom in chap. 2 is meant that of Alexander the Great, which became divided into that of the Seleucids and that of the Ptolemies (the other kingdoms of the successors of Alexander have here no interest for the author, and are, therefore, passed over). But if in chap. 2 the first of the four kingdoms has been made out to be the Babylonian, and the Greek to be the fourth, it follows, from what we are told of the dynasties under which Daniel himself lived, that the second and the third kingdoms, touched upon so lightly in Daniel's interpretation in 2.39, must be the Median and the Persian. Still more clearly than in chap. 2 does the author's special interest in the period of the fourth kingdom disclose itself in the visions of Daniel; the relations of the people of God to Antiochus Epiphanes possess such great importance, because, immediately upon the fall of this tyrant—which is to be brought about without human intervention (cp 2.34.45 with 8.25)—the Messianic kingdom is forthwith to be set up. It is universally admitted that the reference to Antiochus Epiphanes is as plainly manifest in the second vision (8.9-14.23-25) as it is in the last vision (11.21-45), which occupies itself wholly with the reign of this king. Chap. 12.7.11 ff. also relates to his persecution of the saints and its longed-for cessation. To the unprejudiced interpreter there can be no possibility of doubt that in the three other pieces also the range of vision is limited to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. What is true of 2.43 is true also of 7.8 ff. 20 ff., where the little horn (cp. 8.9), to whose power the saints are delivered up for three times and a half (cp 7.25 with 12.7), must again be the same persecutor who had made himself so hateful to the Jews. The same holds good, finally, of chap. 9. Here the sixty-two year-weeks which follow the first seven present, it is true, a historical difficulty which will have to be discussed (see § 20); but thus much at least is certain, that the 'anointed one' in 9.26 is the high-priest Onias III., who was put to death in 171 B.C.,² so that the last year-week comes down to 164 B.C., and the suspension of sacrifice and offering which is predicted in 9.27 for the second half of this week enables us plainly to see that it is the action of Antiochus Epiphanes that is referred to.

Now, on the assumption of the authenticity of the book, it is very hard indeed to understand how, out of the ten pieces of which it is composed, so many as five, in which the coming of the Messianic kingdom is predicted, should stop short at the reign of a Seleucid sovereign whose kingdom—not to speak of the Greek kingdom out of which it and the other Seleucid kingdoms had arisen—had no existence in the days of the exilic Daniel.

Even the early father Hippolytus did not fail to notice the allusions to the history of the Seleucidae and the Ptolemies which occur in the book of Daniel; but it was the Neo-platonist Porphyry (c. 304 A.D.) who first drew the right inference from the acknowledged facts, and took Daniel's professed authorship to be a mere literary form, ascribing the book to a Jew who wrote during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. As, however, this denial of the authenticity of the book came from an opponent of Christianity, it produced no effect. It was necessary that, within the Church itself, a truly scientific and historical method of dealing with the OT should arise.¹ This has at last come to pass. As the result of the labours of several generations, we can safely hold it to have been established, as one of the ascertained results of science, that in chap. 7 we are to understand by the fourth beast the Grecian Empire, by the eleventh horn Antiochus Epiphanes, and by what is related regarding this horn the religious persecution under that king; as also that the author of the book wrote in his reign. A fundamental rule of all sound exegesis was violated when the utterances of chap. 7 were not interpreted in the light of the other four parallel texts, but were torn from their connection in the book in order to give them a meaning divergent from the sense of the rest of the book, as if the fourth beast signified not the Grecian but the Roman Empire. To interpret the four kingdoms as denoting those of Babylonia, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome, seems, indeed, by grouping the Medes and Persians under one empire, to offer a series which, from a historical point of view, can be more easily accepted than that of Babylonia, Media, Persia, and Greece; but this last series alone gives the true sense of the book, which represents the Median kingdom of Darius as being the second of the four world-monarchies, and places this as an independent intermediate link between the Chaldean and the Persian monarchies (cp 6:1 [5:31] 8:320 9:1), distinguishing it quite plainly from the Persian, which it makes out to be the third. With our perfectly certain knowledge, derived from the cuneiform inscriptions, that there never was any such Median empire between those of Babylonia and Persia (cp PERSIA), the authenticity of the Book of Daniel falls to the ground. Quite apart, however, from the numerous contradictions of history to be afterwards spoken of (§ 10, etc.),—contradictions which absolutely exclude the supposition that the author was an eye-witness living during the period of the 'exile,'—the fact that the horizon of the book is throughout bounded by the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the fierce persecutor of the Jews and their religion, with whose fall the Messianic salvation is represented as being ushered in, makes it abundantly plain that the figure of the exilic Daniel is employed only as a literary form. The Messianic hope could not possibly have taken this special form so early as during the 'exile,' but only under the oppression of the Syrian tyrant who sought to extirpate the religion of Israel, and to compel the Jews to adopt the idolatrous worship of Greece.

The book of Daniel being, as Wellhausen well describes it (IJG⁽²⁾, 240 f.), 'a hortatory and consolatory writing for the persecuted, designed to strengthen

9. Aim. and cheer them by the knowledge that within a very short time the overbent bow will break,' its author was able to allow himself great freedom in the use of his materials. His aim was not the communication of historical information. Using as a vehicle the materials, historical or unhistorical, that tradition had placed at his disposal, he availed himself of the literary artifice of employing the name of the exilic Daniel to gain weight for the ethical and religious truths which he desired to set forth.¹ As in the cases of Job and Jonah, so also in that of the book of Daniel, a great injustice is done if the standard of strict historicity is applied,—a standard by which the book is not in the least intended to be tried. We find in it (cp Kamph.

10. Unconcern Daniel, 16 f., 28 ff., 45) not only about history. many historical errors but also, frequently, a magnificent unconcern about historical possibilities, of which the author, in spite of his great literary art, certainly was not always conscious. If it is permissible to find in 6:8, no less than in the demand mentioned in 2:11, a scornful reference to that religious edict of Antiochus Epiphanes which the pious Jew could regard only as a piece of insanity, these passages without doubt contain other conscious allusions to historical fact. In many cases, we can quite confidently conjecture their presence, though we do not always quite understand them. If it is only with difficulty that we are able to form any visual image of the fiery furnace (3), or of the lion's den (6), still less are we able to comprehend how Daniel, who had constantly remained steadfast to the God of Israel, could have come to be the chief of the heathen Magi (2:48); and in like manner we fail to make clear to ourselves how Daniel (cp 8:26 12:4) could have managed to secure that what he had seen should remain a secret for centuries. The matter becomes at once natural and intelligible if we suppose that the exilic Daniel was simply employed as a literary device by a writer of much later date, who regarded the fury of Antiochus Epiphanes as the last visitation of the people of God before the blessed time of the end should come. Anachronisms and historical difficulties of every sort occur throughout the whole of the book, not only in its preliminary narratives.

Orthodoxy shows a natural reluctance to recognise the unhistorical character of the book. As even its latest expounder,² although dating it in the Maccabean period, greatly exaggerates its historical value, and justifies himself in his refusal to recognise its true character by urging that in substance the book is not pure invention, but rests upon tradition, it seems fitting to call attention to one outstanding instance in which tradition is no guarantee of historical truth, before we proceed to enumerate some samples of the unhistoricity of the book.—Among the apocryphal additions to Daniel contained in Q, that of the 'Dragon at Babel' (cp Schr. in Riehm's HWB) is certainly not pure invention. This legend, which in its present literary form is very late, had already been brought into relation with the old Babylonian mythology by Schrader and Ball (Wace, Apocr. ii. 348 ff.); but quite recently Gunkel (ut sup. 320 ff.) has conclusively shown that what lies at the root of it is the primeval Babylonian myth of the conquest of the Chaos-monster or the great dragon Tiāmat by the god Marduk.¹ Instead of merely pronouncing this apocryphal narrative, as Zöckler (Apocr. [91], 215-221) somewhat imprudently does, foolish and silly, we ought rather to learn from it that dependence on ancient tradition is not incompatible with complete unhistoricity.

¹ 'It is possible, no doubt, that he derived some part of these narratives from Jewish or Babylonian popular stories. But even if we accept this conjecture, the historical setting, the moral purpose, and the skill in presentation are all his own' (Che. EB⁽³⁾, art. 'Daniel').

As a contemporary, the author of Daniel 11:21-39 was in circumstances which enabled him to depict with the utmost accuracy the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes and his two Egyptian campaigns; but for the concluding portion of ch. 11 he can no longer be taken as a historical source, inasmuch as vv. 40-45 go beyond the author's present; the actual course of events in which Antiochus Epiphanes perished on an eastern raid in the Persian city of Tabæ in 164 B.C. is glaringly inconsistent with the author's anticipation that the king, after a successful expedition against Egypt, was to meet his end suddenly in Palestine.

We are thus led to the conclusion that the book was written during the life-time of Antiochus Epiphanes.

11. Language. The conclusion that it belongs to a very late date in the post-exilic period is forced upon us also by its language.

The many Persian words in the book are, in the mouth of Daniel, anachronisms which clearly testify against the authenticity of the book; as also testifies the use of the word Kasdim (EV 'Chaldeans' [g.v.]) for the Babylonian priests, soothsayers, or magicians. True, our book sometimes, in agreement with those prophets who lived under the new Babylonian kingdom, understands by the Kasdim the people who had the predominance in Babylon (cp. Dan. 38:530-91 with Is. 43:14); but it stands alone, opposed not only to the Assyrio-Babylonian usus loquendi but also to that of all the rest of the OT, in the manner in which it everywhere else (cp. 2:24, etc.) makes Kasdim synonymous with 'Magi', a practice which is found, long after the downfall of the Babylonian empire, in Greek and Roman authors. As the number of words borrowed from Persian certainly exceeds a dozen, the few Greek expressions do not come so much into account; but attention is worth calling to psalterin in Dan. 3:5, because this form, alongside of the Greek psalterion, proves the influence of the Macedonian dialect (which substituted n for l), and because it is in the case of this word that the Semitic derivation of the foreign words in Daniel, so much insisted on in the apologetic interest, is strikingly seen to be untenable.

The non-Hebrew language of Dan. 2:4 ff. is introduced as being the speech of the 'Chaldeans,' and is kept up by the author down to the end of chap.

12. Aramaic. 7, because in his time (though not so in 2 K. 18:26) both languages were readily understood; it is thus possible for us to form definite conclusions as to its character. Although it is called Aramaic correctly, it is at the same time intended to be taken as the language of the 'Chaldeans,' and this on any assumption involves a historical error. The biblical Aramaic (see ARAMAIC LANGUAGE, § 3 f.) is now known to belong to the West Aramaic group and to be closely related to the language of the Targums and of the Palmyrene and other inscriptions. We know also that this language, of which the remains preserved to us come for the most part from Palestine, did not, as the language of current intercourse, supersede the old Hebrew (which had now begun to assert its claim to be regarded as a sacred language) until the end of the third century B.C. The actual language of the 'Chaldeans' also we know from the cuneiform inscriptions to have been Semitic, but very different from the West Aramaic, so that Luther's free translation of 24—'Then spake the Chaldee to the king in Chaldee'—is indeed exegetically correct but historically false. If, on the other hand, in order to avoid supposing that Aramaic was confounded with

'Chaldean,' it is maintained that the court language at Babylon was Aramaic, we may point to the linguistic peculiarities of the old Aramaic inscriptions,¹ which abundantly show that the Aramaic of the Book of Daniel could not have been spoken in Babylon in the sixth century.

How little the Book of Daniel can be depended on in matters of history appears from its very first verse. Not only do the real contemporaries (cp. Jer. 13. Mistakes in names. 46:2 Ez. 26:7) of the famous Chaldean king call him Nebuchadrezzar; but also Strabo, in transliterating the name, comes near the cuneiform form. In Dan. 1:1, on the other hand, the name is given in a later corrupt form (with n instead of r) in connection with the unhistorical statement (cp. Jer. 25:36:19-29) that Nebuchadrezzar conquered Jerusalem in the third year of Jehoiakim. Whatever be the case with the rest of the OT, Daniel betrays no trace of acquaintance with cuneiform; the error made in 48 [5] is an urgent warning against any attempt to interpret the writing on the wall in 5:25 by reference to the real speech of the 'Chaldeans.' In 48 [5] Daniel's name Belteshazzar, which is already taken in the LXX to be the same as Belshazzar (5:1), the name of the alleged last Babylonian king, is wrongly supposed to be a compound of the divine name Bēl (Is. 46:1), although Bēl-šar-ušur (that is, 'Bēl preserve the king') and Belaṣu-ušur (that is, 'may his life be preserved') are philologically distinct.² It would take us too far afield were we to show how even Nebuchadrezzar's insanity and the equally unhistorical conception of Belshazzar or even of the legendary Darius the Mede (whom Xenophon's romance, the Cyropædia, cannot make a historical person) carry us back to traditions which, widely different as they seem, in part at least, to have been, were in any case greatly distorted. How strained are the author's relations with history can be seen by a glance at chap. 11:2 f. As only two Babylonian kings are known to him, so he knows of only three Persian sovereigns besides Cyrus (10:1), their names being those of the four that occur elsewhere in the OT (cp. Ezra 4:5-7); as Xerxes is clearly intended by the fourth, this sovereign is made to be the successor of Artaxerxes (whom he really preceded), and the contemporary of Alexander the Great.

In these circumstances Driver's correct statement (Introd. (6) 510), that 'the book rests upon a traditional basis,' ought not to have been followed.

14. Daniel the hero. by the statement that 'Daniel, it cannot be doubted, was a historical person, one of the Jewish exiles in Babylon.' A book which does not admit of being used as a historical source, save for the author's own time, cannot possibly be a guarantee for the existence of an exilic Daniel. When we cast about us for information concerning Daniel independent of our present book, we find that the name Daniel is of rare occurrence in the OT, being met with (see DANIEL i. 1) only once on perfectly historical ground; and, moreover, what is very remarkable, we find also in Ezra's time (see DANIEL i. 3) a Mithael, an Azariah, and a Hananiah (cp. Dan. 1:6)—a coincidence of rare names which led Bleek to conjecture that our author had thrown back the contemporaries of Ezra by more than a century in order that he might represent them as living in the time of the 'exile' at a heathen court, and showing an example to his countrymen under the oppression of the heathen. This hypothesis and that of Cheyne (OPs. 107) are, at any rate, preferable to the view of Ewald, who places the original Daniel among the North Israelitish exiles at the court of Nineveh (Prophecy, 511).

¹ Cp. Dr. Introd. (6) 503 f. (the language of Daniel, [c] end). We possess monuments of the official use of Aramaic for the times of the Assyrian, the Babylonian, and the Persian supremacies, which indicate that there was in the case of the smaller parts of speech, such as the relative and demonstrative pronouns which have special value for the determination of the age of a language, a notable difference of form between the older and the younger Aramaic. Whilst the old Aramaic of the inscriptions from the eighth to the fifth centuries B.C. has ṣ, ṣ and ṣ, in biblical Aramaic these much used particles have the forms ṣ, ṣ and ṣ. The Book of Daniel is thus, in its use of ṣ for the older ṣ, quite in agreement with what we know of the usage prevailing in Aramaic inscriptions and books dating from the last centuries B.C. and the first centuries A.D.

In confirmation of the date (during the lifetime of Antiochus Epiphanes) already made out, we have many additional facts which point to the early Maccabean period even if they do not enable us to fix the time with absolute precision. Among these are the argumenta e silentio supplied by the fact that Daniel is not named by the son of Sirach who wrote about 190 B.C. (Eccles. 48 f.), and—a still weightier argument—by the complete absence of any influence of Daniel upon post-exilic prophetic literature. Conversely this book, to which the angelic names Gabriel and Michael, the resurrection (122; cp ESCHATOLOGY), and a collection of sacred books that included the prophecies of Jeremiah (92) are known, plainly reveals its dependence not only on Jeremiah and Ezekiel but also on the post-exilic Book of Zechariah. If the absence of Daniel from Eccles. 496-10 is itself a proof of late origin, a still stronger proof lies in the fact that it has found its place in the Hebrew canon, not in the second division, the collection of prophetic books, but in the third or last division, between Esther and Ezra (cp CANON, § 49). Not until the time of the LXX (which, moreover, has treated the text of Daniel in a very arbitrary fashion) does it find a place, after Ezekiel, as the fourth of the 'great' prophets, and thus it comes to pass that once in the NT¹ Daniel is designated as a prophet.

The very arbitrary treatment of the MT of Daniel in the LXX, particularly in chaps. 8-6, and the false interpretation of 925 ff. (šābhū'im, 'weeks' confounded with šibh'im, 'seventy') brought it about that long before Jerome's time, Theodotion's translation of Daniel (already employed by Irenæus)² superseded the LXX in ecclesiastical use. Though Theodotion did not remove the apocryphal additions not found in MT, yet, by making use of Aquila's version, he brought the text of the LXX into closer relation with MT. From a MS (Cod. Chisianus) of the LXX in the library of Cardinal Chigi, not very old, but supplied with Origen's obeli and asterisks, an edition of the LXX Daniel was published at Rome in 1772, and another and better one by Cozza in 1877. The Syriac Hexaplar version of Paul of Tella, edited by Bugati in 1788 and photographically reproduced by Ceriani in 1874, is justly held to be purer than the text of the Cod. Chisianus (Swete's 87), which is, indeed, full of errors. The text-critical importance of 65 is, for the Book of Daniel, fortunately very small; so far as the integrity of the consonants of the original text is concerned, the book is one of the best preserved in the whole OT.

As distinguished from the older prophets the Book of Daniel is often spoken of as the first apocalypse (cp Dan. 219). It makes a revelation of the coming end of the world, although in a veiled manner, so as to avoid the dangers of open speech. Upon the basis of his study of earlier writers (92),³ and conscious of his own divine enlightenment, the author wrote his work of admonition and comfort in the name of the ancient Daniel; it is only

17. Pseudo-ignorance (cp the excellent remarks of Ball in Wace's Apocr. 2307) or misapprehension that can lay to his charge as a fault his employment of a literary form which was common throughout antiquity. We must not, of course, unduly exaggerate the feeling, no doubt prevalent in the Maccabean period, that prophecy had become extinct—a feeling which may have contributed, along with other causes, to the choice of this literary form. Our author pursues the same lofty moral and religious aims which were sought by the older prophets, and it is by no means his intention to gratify a merely idle curiosity. In presenting, as still future, past occurrences in which, as one world-empire perished after another, he saw the hand of his God only as preparing the way for that which was still really in the future, the downfall of the last and most direful enemy of the good, and the coming of Messiah's salvation, there was a double advantage. The people who were in the secret were able to recognise in what he wrote the circumstances of their own time, although only darkly alluded to; and what had happened already supplied a guarantee for the certainty of that which was still to happen. The author lives in the firm faith that everything has been fully foreordained in the counsels of God (cp 712): the Almighty is steering the whole course of history towards the salvation of his people (cp Smend's lecture on 'Jewish Apocalyptic' in ZATW, 1885, p. 222 ff.). Cp ESCHATOLOGY.

If we turn now to the question how our author set about fixing by computation the date of the accomplish-

18. Chronological data.—ment of the Messianic hopes of the Jews, we are able to arrive at a more precise determination of the date of his writing.

It must have been either soon before, or soon after, the purification of the temple. This we learn from the number given in 814. As already said, the years of weeks (cp 2 Ch. 3621) present some historical difficulty, inasmuch as, after the first seven weeks of years (which suit the Babylonian 'exile'), instead of the $62 \times 7 = 434$ years of the interval which we should expect to find between Cyrus and the death of Onias III. (538-171 B.C.), we are, according to the actual chronology (which gives 367 years), 67 years short. As the Jewish Hellenist Demetrius, however, who wrote about 210 B.C., has fallen into a mistake precisely similar to our author's—a mistake which could easily be made in the absence of a fixed era—we need not be surprised at such an error in a book historically so inaccurate as that of Daniel. The last week of years, which begins in 171 B.C., extends (precisely reckoned) to 164 B.C., and it has certainly contributed greatly to the esteem in which the book has been held, that Antiochus Epiphanes actually did die in the year 164. For our author the division of the seventieth week of years into two equal parts was suggested by the history of his time, inasmuch as towards the end of 168 B.C. the Abomination of Desolation was set up, and idolatrous worship in the temple began. The three-years-and-a-half which remain after deduction of the historical three-years-and-a-half stand for the still incomplete period of the last and greatest tribulation in the course of which our book was written. For the correctness of this second number ($3\frac{1}{2}$) faith had to be the guarantee; and that it was known to be a round number or a number of faith is shown not only by the vague periphrasis in 725 and 127, where the plural 'times' takes the place of the linguistically impossible dual, but also by the three numbers, 1150 (cp the 2300 evenings and mornings in 814), 1290, and 1335 days, used in an approximate way to express three years and a half—apparently with precision but in reality only in round obtained through the angel in vv. 24-27. Besides, it is unnatural to explain the phrase 'the books' as referring to the Pentateuch when the context speaks only of Jeremiah. Behrmann's rendering of בְּתוֹרָה ('I took notice of') is preferable to that of Bevan and of EV ('I understood').

³ Following out a suggestion of Nöldeke (Alttest. Litt. 224), Prof. Bevan has offered this interpretation of 92, 'I understood the number of years by the Pentateuch,' the special reference being to Lev. 26 18-21 24 28, where it is declared that the Israelites are to be punished seven times for their sins. 'The 70 weeks become intelligible if we suppose that the author of Daniel combined Jer. 25 11 29 10 with Lev. 26 18 ff.' 'The 70 years of Jeremiah were to be repeated 7 times, and at the end of the 490th year the long-promised deliverance might be confidently expected.' But the expression 'seven times' has here, as in Prov. 24 16, simply the sense of 'often.' The text in 92 cannot ascribe to Daniel a comprehension of 'the number of the years by the (חֲבָלִים) books,' because such a comprehension is, as a fact, only numbers. Behrmann, with Cornill, continues to fix the date of the book as in the beginning of the year 164, because the number in 814, which does not seem to be symbolical, is held to point to the purification of the temple as having already been accomplished; but Cornill,¹ reckoning backwards 1150 days from 25th December 165 B.C., sought to make out 27th October 168 as the probable date of the religious edict of Antiochus Epiphanes. The difference of 45 days between the number in 1211 and that in 1212, which it is merely arbitrary to attempt to explain as a gloss, points to months of 30 days. In that case the 1290 days (v. 11), or 43 months, would fit in if we were to add an intercalary month to the 42 months of the three years and a half. However we may reckon (cp H. Oort in Th. T. 28, 450 [94]), the end of chap. 9 forbids the dissociation of the restoration of the temple service from the final close so decidedly that the present writer now unites with Kuenen and Wellhausen in preferring the usual view, according to which 814 still lies in the author's future, and holds the date of the book to be 165 B.C.

When the book, which rapidly became popular, first began, perhaps as early as 150 B.C. (cp 1 Macc. 154

19. Apocryphal additions. 259 f.), to be translated by Egyptian Jews into Greek, the legends of Susanna, and of Bēl and the Dragon (cp Bevan, 45), which may very well have had an independent circulation,² had certainly not as yet been taken up into it. In fact, as late as the fifth century A.D. we have it on the authority of Polychronius that the Song of the Three Children was still absent alike from the Syriac version and from the original text. We cannot tell at what date it was that these apocryphal additions (which are contained in all the MSS that have reached us) were taken up into the Greek and the Syriac Daniel. In view of the great popularity of their contents, shown by the variety of the forms in which they are presented, we can only conjecture that they must have been adopted comparatively early (the book from the first was freely rendered rather than faithfully translated in the LXX), although the growth of the four different Syriac texts of Susanna (cp Wace, 2330 f.) may have been later. The so-called genuine LXX text, which we possess in the Cod. Chisianus (Sw. 87) and (in Syriac) in a valuable Milan MS (cp Swete, Septuagint, vol. 3, p. ii f.) contains, of course, the additions just as fully as do the many MSS which give us Daniel in the text of Theodotion, already described above (§ 16) as a revision of the LXX. Swete (as above) has conveniently printed together the text of Theodotion, which obtained ecclesiastical sanction, and that of the LXX, which had lain in oblivion for almost fifteen centuries. Even if we suppose, with Schürer (PRE⁽³⁾ 1640), that the LXX text must have been in existence before the Daniel legend received new developments in Greek, we may safely assume that the additions to the Greek Daniel had been made before the beginning of the Christian era. The balance of probability is that they were not translated from any Semitic source, but were originally written in Greek (cp Pusey, Daniel, 378 f.). They are distinguished—as indeed is the LXX version of Daniel—from the Jewish Greek that prevails in the rest of the LXX by their purer and more elegant diction; another indication in the same direction is the well-known play upon Greek words in Susanna (vv. 54 f. 58 f., cp HOLMTREE), which even Julius Africanus urged as proof of the spuriousness of the piece in his letter to Origen, who wished the narrative to be retained in the canon. As Protestants are in no way bound by the

20. Susanna. decree of the Council of Trent (cp Wace, Apocr. 1368 f.), which declares the apocryphal additions to be true history, and as we hardly require a full enumeration of reasons such as is given, e.g., by Reuss (Das AT übersetzt, 1894, 7411 f.) in proof of the unhistorical character of the Susanna legend, we are able to approach without any prejudice the question as to the language in which it was originally written. It may be frankly conceded that in view of the small extent of the additions—plainly the work of a Hellenistic Jew (or Jews)—and in view of the fact that even in the case of a comparatively poor language it is always possible by free translation to imitate any play upon words whatever, we have not the means that would enable us to prove conclusively that the original language was Greek.

To estimate the additions correctly, we must consider their substance rather than their present Greek form. Without prejudice to the literary freedom which is manifestly presupposed by their present form and by the fact that the Susanna legend appears in several shapes (cp Salmon in Wace, p. xlvii), it is clear that they contain more or less of traditional matter, and, like the canonical book itself, cannot be regarded as pure invention. So long ago as 1832 Zunz (Gottesdienstl. Vortr. 122 f.) called attention to the fact that traces are preserved in the Haggādā of wonderful doings of a Daniel famous for his wisdom—e.g., the fight with the dragon, already mentioned, in Midrash Ber. Rab. par. 68 (in Wünsche's transl., Leipsic, 1881, p. 334). As for the position of the legend of the beautiful Susanna, whom Daniel (represented in v. 45 as a very youthful boy) saves from the false accusation of the two elders by his wise judgment, Theodotion, for the sake of the presumed chronological order, has placed it before Dan. 1 (though after chap. 1 would be more appropriate), while the LXX and Vg., on the other hand, place it as a thirteenth chapter after the twelve canonical chapters; Bēl and the Dragon being a fourteenth. Daniel's wise judgment recalls 1 K. 3:16 f.; but the lascivious old men recall still more Ahab and Zedekiah, the two adulterous-false prophets living in Babylon and threatened by Jeremiah (cp Jer. 29:20-23 with Sus. v. 57), about whom the Talmud and Midrash have so much to say. Brüll even thought that he had discovered the explanation of the flower-name Susanna in the Midrash Wayyikra Rabba, par. 19 (p. 129 in Wünsche's transl.), and Ball (Wace, 2330) would fain have it that the piece is an anti-Sadducean 'tendency' writing. More likely is the connection suggested by Ewald (GVV⁽⁸⁾ 4636) of the Susanna story with a Babylonian legend, an allusion to which occurs in the Koran (Sur. 296), of the seduction of two old men by the goddess of love.

While in Susanna Daniel, as his name implies, appears as a judge, he comes before us in the other

21. Bēl and the Dragon. two related pieces—Bēl and the Dragon of Babylon (see vv. 24, 28)—which immediately follow in all MSS and editions, as the successful opponent of heathenism, distinguished for wisdom and piety. In the first of the two, Daniel convinces the king (called Cyrus only in Theod.) of the fraud practised by the priests of Bēl, who pretended that their god was an actual living deity, while it was they themselves with their wives and families who consumed the food and drink offered to Bēl. After the execution of the priests and the destruction of the helpless Bēl and his temple (v. 22) we read (vv. 23-42) of further exploits of Daniel in Babylon. He subdued the invulnerable dragon (Job 41:18 [26] f.) which they worshipped with divine honours, by throwing indigestible substances into its jaws, whereupon the king at the instigation of his enraged people caused the destroyer of their gods to be cast into the lions' den (cp Dan. 6); here he was divinely protected, and supported by food miraculously brought to him from the land of Judæa by the prophet Habakkuk (cp Ezek. 83). In § 87 (see Sw.) the superscription of the twofold narrative of Bēl and the Dragon runs: 'From the prophesy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesu, of the tribe of Levi.' Here, doubtless, there is a reference to some Jewish prophetic legend, although only Theodotion calls this Habakkuk a prophet (see HABAKKUK). The only addition which, strictly speaking, supplements the canonical book of Daniel is the double hymn introduced after 323, consisting of 67 verses numbered in Greek and Vg. as vv. 24-90. The EV treats this entire

Three Children'; Luther, following the Vatican superscription, divides it into two, under the titles 'The Prayer of Azariah' and 'The Song of the Three Men in the Fiery Furnace.' The prayer named after Azariah (cp Dan. 17) is spoken in the name of the three friends; but its language is as general as if the entire Jewish people, oppressed and penitent, were speaking. After a brief connecting narrative relating their miraculous preservation from the devouring fire—a preservation regarded as an answer to Azariah's prayer—we have in vv. 52-90 the song of praise sung at the same time by all three together. This speaks of the deliverance from the fire only in the verse where they call upon themselves by name (v. 88), whilst the rest takes the form of a prolonged litany, reminiscent of Ps. 103²⁰ ff. and still more of Pss. 136 148 and Ecclus. 43, where in quite general terms all created things are summoned to praise the Lord.

DAN-JAAN (דַּן יָאָן; εἰς δαν εἰδαν καὶ οὐδαν [B], εἰς δαν ἰδαν καὶ ἰουδαν [A], εἰς δαν [L]; IN DAN SILVESTRIA [Vg.]), a place mentioned (2 S. 246) in a description of the limits of David's kingdom, after the 'land of TAHTIM-HODSHI' (q.v.). Conder (Hdbk. 408), following Schultz, identifies it with Daniān, a ruined place between Tyre and Akka, 4 m. N. of Achzib. That, however, is too far west. 'Dan' must be the historic Dan, and -jaan (for which Ges.'s ya'ar 'forest' is a poor conjecture; but see ^{6A} Vg.) is plainly corrupt. To emend the text so as to read '(they went) to Dan, and from Dan they went round (יָצְאוּ מִדָּן) to Zidon' (We., Dr., Ki., Bu.) is possible. It is better, however, especially if Klostermann is right in his emendation of Tahtim-hodshi, to change -jaan into wē-iygōn, 'and (to) Ijon'; Ijon, like Kedesh, belonged to the territory of Naphtali. We should then continue, 'and they went round (יָצְאוּ מִדָּן καὶ ἐκύκλωσαν) to Zidon.' Observe that Klostermann's emendation (יָצְאוּ) is easier, and probably gives a better sense than that of Wellhausen and Driver. It is also proposed by Grätz.

In 1 Ch. 26 the name appears as Dara (δαρα [BA], δαραδε [L]); but, as it seems intended to be analogous in form to Chalcol (Chalcal?), a second d is indispensable. The largest group of MSS of 5 read in 1 K. and 1 Ch. τον δαρδα; three cursives in 1 K. have τον δαρδαν (so Arm.). Pesh. Targ. and some MSS (Kenn.) support MT in both passages.

1. Darius the Mede, son of Ahasuerus, Dan. 61 [2] 28 [29] 91 and 111 (κυρου [BAQ—i.e., Theod.; 87 —i.e., the LXX], Δαρειου [Aq. Sym.]). The name is here applied in error to the conqueror of the new Babylonian empire. In Dan. 91 Ahasuerus is the father of Darius the Mede, who, we are informed (cp 111), 'was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans' after the death of Belshazzar. We are told of Darius that he was then (638 B.C.) sixty-two years old, from which it follows that Ahasuerus his father must have been a contemporary of Nebuchadnezzar. With this agrees Tob. 14 15, where it is said (but not by N*) that the population of Nineveh was deported by Nebuchadnezzar and Ahasuerus. All this proceeds upon a mistake. Nineveh was conquered by Cyaxares (Old Pers. Uvakhshātara), the predecessor of Astyages, with the assistance of Nabopolassar (Nabū-pal-ušur) the father of Nebuchadnezzar. In the list of Median kings one searches in vain for a name that can by any possibility be taken for that of Ahasuerus or Darius. Even if it be argued that Darius was indeed a Mede, though nowhere called king of Media, we have to reckon not only with the notices given by the Greek historians but also with the Nabū-nā'id-Cyrus cylinder, from which it appears that Cyrus himself, immediately after the fall of the capital, ascended the throne of Babylon, and appointed to the governorship of the province of Babylon Gobryas (Old Pers. Gaubaruva, Bab. Ugbaru or Gubaru), governor of Gutium, who, it would appear, was superseded, as king, by Cambyses the Persian. This Gobryas may very well have been the person who, seventeen years afterwards, joined forces with Darius Hystaspis against the pseudo-Smerdis. As governor of Gutium, which lay on the Median frontier, he may well have been called a Mede, and, as the ally of Darius, have been confounded with him. The name, however, of the father of Gobryas was Mardonius (Marduniya), not Xerxes, and it is not to be supposed that Cyrus made such a political blunder as to entrust the control of so important a province as Gutium to a Mede. See DANIEL, BOOK OF, § 13.

2. Darius I. Hystaspis, king of Persia (521-485 B.C.), who allowed the Jews to rebuild their temple, is referred to in Ezra 4524 55 61 Hag. 11 210 Zech. 117, and probably in Neh. 12 22.¹ His liberality towards the Jews is in complete accord with what we know otherwise of his general policy in religious matters towards the subject nations. He took the great Cyrus for his model, and contrasts strongly with Cambyses.

If Cambyses dealt the sacred Apis-bull of Memphis a mortal wound, Darius presented the city with a new Apis, and restored the temple of Amun-Ra at the oasis of El-Khargeh with great splendour. In Asia Minor and the islands of the Aegean, temples were indeed sometimes destroyed by his generals, especially where, as at Naxos and at Eretria (Herod. 696 101), revenge was to be gratified; but he himself gave special orders to spare Delos, and also caused three hundred talents of incense to be burnt on the altars of Apollo and Artemis. If he discerned some affinity between Apollo and his own god Mithra, he may well have seen resemblance enough between Yahwè and Ahuramazda to lead him to do homage to the god of Israel.

DATHAN AND ABIRAM (דָּתָן, אֲבִירָאִם, meaning obscure; and אֲבִירָאִם, see ABIRAM), Reubenites who led a revolt against Moses in the interval between the return of the spies and the final march towards Canaan.

In Nu. 15-17 the revolt of Dathan and Abiram is mingled and confused with another revolt, that of Korah.

1. The story: Consequently, it is difficult, indeed impossible, to interpret the narrative as it stands. There are sections of the narrative from which Korah disappears altogether. We have three causes for the revolt: impatience with the civil authority of Moses, discontent with the exclusive right of the Levitical tribe (as against Israel in general) to exercise priestly functions, and a desire on the part of the Levites who were not descended from Aaron to vindicate their equal right to the priesthood. These various motives are not combined, but appear in various parts of the narrative independently. The confusion reaches its highest point when we are told that the company of rebels who had already been swallowed up by the open earth were devoured by fire from Yahwè (cp 16 33 with 35).

If, however, we turn to Dt. 11 6, we find the means of escaping from this confusion ready to our hand. There

2. In Deuteronomy. Moses begs the Israelites to remember what Yahwè their God 'did to Dathan and Abiram the sons of Eliab, the sons of Reuben; how the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up and their households and their tents and every living thing that followed them, in the midst of all Israel.' From this passage, with which cp Ps. 106 17, we might naturally conclude that the Deuteronomist had a text of early Israelite history before him, in which the revolt of Dathan and Abiram was mentioned without any reference to Korah, and the rebels, instead of being devoured by fire, were swallowed up alive by the earth.

We ask, therefore, if any such independent narrative of the revolt led by Dathan and Abiram can be extracted

3. Original narrative. from the composite text of Nu. 16. The answer must be given, and is in fact given by all recent scholars, in the affirmative. We have but to read 16 1b 2a 12-15 25 26 27b-32a 33 34 by themselves, in order to obtain an account which is nearly complete and is also consistent and intelligible. This is the history from which the Deuteronomist has borrowed his summary—from which he has taken not only his facts but also his words and phrases. That, however, is not all. The verses just mentioned form a literary unity. Their style is partly that of the Yahwist, partly that of the Elohist, whose allied works here, as elsewhere, have been combined by an editor into a whole. The rest of the narrative in ch. 16 f. is in the style of the priestly writer (P), a style so clearly marked and uniform that it cannot be mistaken. The Deuteronomist makes no allusion to the priestly narrative—for the simple reason that in his time it did not exist. One difficulty remains. In v. 1 On is mentioned as one of the rebels; but not a word is said of him in the sequel. Here in all probability the text is corrupt, and most scholars accept the emendation proposed by Graf (Gesch. Bücher, 89): 'Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab, son of Pallu, son of Reuben.' The emendation is abundantly justified by a comparison of Gen. 46 9 Ex. 6 14 Nu. 26 8 1 Ch. 5 3.

When disentangled from the later priestly story of the rebellion of Korah, with which it was mingled

4. The old tradition. by the compiler of the Hexateuch, the old tradition is in substance as follows.

Dathan and Abiram belonged to Reuben, the oldest tribe, which had, however, forfeited its claim to the hegemony or principedom among the sons of Jacob (see the so-called Blessing of Jacob; Gen. 49 3 f.). As Reubenites, Dathan and Abiram resent the supremacy of Moses. When Moses bids them come up to judgment, they insolently refuse. They reproach him with his unfitness for rule. Instead of leading them into a land flowing with milk and honey, he has led them away from Egypt, which deserved to be so described, and has exposed them to the deadly perils of the wilderness. It is only by blinding the people that he can maintain his position. Moses, in answer, protests that he has neither done them any hurt nor robbed them of so much as an ass, and he begs Yahwè to pay no respect to their offering. These last words refer, apparently, to the sacrifice which every Israelite might offer for his household, and may be compared with Gen. 44 f., where the Yahwist tells us that Yahwè looked favourably on the offering of Abel but not on that of Cain. The writer is not thinking of any special priesthood, but simply takes for granted that Yahwè, whose favour was always sought by sacrifice, will not accept the offering of rebels against just authority. Thereupon Moses, accompanied by the elders of Israel, goes down to the tents of his opponents. He predicts the divine chastisement which will fall upon them, and his threat is fulfilled. The earth opens her mouth and Dathan and Abiram go down into Shēōl, the receptacle of the shades: only, they, unlike other men, go down into it alive. Their wives and little ones perish with them.

We have made no attempt to distinguish between the work of the Yahwist and that of the Elohist. There

5. Redaction. are marks of style and expressions proper to the one and to the other, and again and again the same thing is mentioned twice. Kuenen (Ond. (2) § 8, n. 14) and Kittel (Hist. 1 212 n.) attribute the narrative (of course after exclusion of P) as a whole to the Elohist; Cornill (Eint. (4) 20), with better right, to the Yahwist. The frequent doublets show that two hands have been at work. We believe that Yahwist and Elohist told much the same story, and that the editor who combined their histories into one here made the Yahwist his basis, adopting at the same time some expressions from the Elohist. We cannot see any solid ground for Dillmann's belief that the Yahwist represented Dathan and Abiram as claiming the priesthood. He urges the words in v. 15, 'respect not thou their offering'; but such a curse, while all Israelites were allowed to sacrifice, might be naturally invoked against any enemy. The Yahwist makes little or no mention of a special priesthood, and though, no doubt, he was familiar with the institution, assuredly did not impugn the right of lay Israelites to offer sacrifice. The whole narrative now before us depicts a rebellion directed against Moses as a civil ruler. Had Dathan and Abiram claimed to exercise priestly functions we should have heard more about it. See KORAH.

DATHEMA (ΔΑΘΕΜΑ [A], -ΘΑΙΜΑ [N], -ΜΕΘΑ [V], Syr. ܕܬܡܐ in 1 Macc. 5 9; ΔΙΑΘΗΜΑ ΤΟ ΦΡΟΥΡΙΟΝ, Jos. Ant. xii. 8 1), one of the strong places in Gilead to which the Jews had betaken themselves when threatened by Timotheus and his host. It was relieved, with great slaughter of the enemy, by Judas the Maccabee (1 Macc. 5 9 ff. 24 ff. 29 ff.).

DAUGHTER

Dathena has not been identified; from the description it must have lain between Bosora and Maspha (Mizpeh). The Syr. reading may be only a mistake for Dantha (Ew. Hist. 5314); but within the distance from Bosra of a night's march (cp Jos. Ant. xii. 83) lies the modern Renthah, a considerable village and station on the Hajj road (Doughty, Ar. Des. 17).

DAUGHTER. The word 'daughter' (בַּת, בָּתִּילָה) in EV often has Hebraistic senses, the chief of which are here mentioned.

1. Native Canaanite or Philistine women are 'daughters' of Canaan (Gen. 382) or of Philistia (2 S. 120).
2. 'Daughter' is a synonym for 'girl' or 'woman' (Gen. 3013 Judg. 129 [30 'daughters'] Cant. 22 69); in addressing a person (Ruth 28 Ps. 4511 Mt. 922).
3. The population of a place, or the place and its population, may be called collectively a 'daughter.' A typical phrase is בַּת צִיּוֹן (Is. 18 1032, etc.): lit. 'daughter of Zion,' but, since the genitive is appositional, more correctly rendered 'people of Zion' (so sometimes in SBOT). So, too, 'daughter of Babylon' (Ps. 1378), 'daughter of Egypt' (Jer. 4611 1924); also 'daughter of my people'—i.e., my country-people (Is. 224 Jer. 411). A phrase which is generally synonymous is 'sons' (i.e., inhabitants) of Zion, Babylon, etc. See ZDMG, 40169; König, Syntax, § 255 c.
4. Dependent towns may be called 'daughters.' Thus the 'daughters of Judah' in Ps. 4811 [12] are the cities of Judah (cp GENEALOGIES, i. § 1). Cp the use of 'mother' for a provincial capital in 2 S. 2019. See TOWN, VILLAGE.
5. 'Daughter,' like 'son,' in combination with a noun, may also express some speciality of character or capacity. Examples of this are few in number. A 'daughter of Belial' is certainly a 'grossly wicked person' (1 S. 116). 'Daughter of troops' (בַּת צִבְיָה; Mic. 51 [414]) is explained 'those who subject to attack'; but the text is doubtful. 'Daughters of music' (בָּתִּילָה, 'daughters of song') in Eccles. 124 might be singing women; but others think that the sounds of music are thus figuratively described.

DAVID (דָּוִד, דָּוִיד; ΔΑΥ[Ε]ΙΔ [BAL]). The name may be explained (1) as meaning 'beloved, a friend, NAMES, §§ 5, 56; or (2) as meaning 'paternal uncle,' if we pronounce דָּוִד (i.e., Dōd), for which Gray (HPN 83) offers Semitic analogies, though the explanation is certainly 'at first sight unlikely'; or (3), best of all, as an abbreviation of Dodieli, which was perhaps the name of one of David's sons (see DANIEL i. 4), or of Dodijah = DODAI (q.v.). See also DODO.

The chronology of the life of David is most uncertain. We have elsewhere (see CHRONOLOGY, §§ 29, 37) assumed 930 B.C. as the first year of the reign of Rehoboam. To accept the round number of forty years assigned to the reign of Solomon in 1 K. 1142 and to that of David in 2 S. 54 and in 1 K. 211 as strictly historical, would be uncritical. The chronological statements referred to are, at most, editorial guesses which may, as good critics think, be not very far from the mark.² The early history also of David is in many respects uncertain. It intertwines to a great extent with the still obscurer record of his predecessor (see SAUL); and keen criticism is necessary to arrive at the kernel of fact which there undoubtedly is in the legends that have come down to us. Winckler indeed denies that there is such a kernel of facts in the romantic story of David's early vicissitudes. Such exaggerated distrust, however, appears to arise from a pre-conceived theory respecting David, and most critics hold strongly to the view that the imaginative element in the story of David is but the vesture which half conceals, half discloses, certain facts treasured in popular tradition. If it should appear that this imaginative element contains some details which we have allowed a warm place in our regard and it would pain us to miss from the history of Israel, we must comfort ourselves with the thought (1) that what remains unshaken becomes more precious than ever, and (2) that even pure legends are of great historical value for the characterisation of the age which produced them.

DAVID

known to early traditions was his father Jesse,¹ who was believed to have been a citizen of Bethlehem.² David was the youngest of his four³ sons (so 1 S. 171314 [B omits]; cp 165-9), and was sent to keep his father's sheep in the steppes of Judah. Such at least is the statement of one of our traditions, which, at any rate, has the merit of accounting for the agility, endurance, and courage, so constantly ascribed to David (cp 1 S. 1734 242 2 S. 179). There, too, David is supposed to have acquired that skill in music (cp Gen. 420 f.) which led to his first introduction to Saul, after which he became the king's armour-bearer and slew Goliath. This, however, is not in accordance with the older and more trustworthy account, which simply tells us that David was a valiant Israelitish warrior who happened to be also clever with his tongue and with his lyre, and who was sent for from Bethlehem (a feature borrowed, perhaps, from the other tradition) to charm away Saul's melancholy. Nor is the statement that the shepherd-lad slew Goliath the Philistine consistent with the plain and thoroughly credible, because unlegendary, tradition given elsewhere, that the slayer of Goliath was Elhanan, and the period of his exploit not in Saul's but in David's reign⁴ (see ELHANAN, GOLIATH). We must, therefore, if the superior antiquity and probability of a narrative are to count as recommendations, give up the more romantic of the two sets of statements respecting David's introduction to Saul and his early prowess. That he became Saul's armour-bearer and musician need not be disputed.

(b) Break with Saul.—Another point in which the ordinary view of the life of David needs rectification is the occasion which gave birth to Saul's jealousy of David. The MT of 1 S. 186 states that 'when David returned from the slaughter of the Philistines,' the women came out of the cities of Israel, singing, 'Saul hath slain'—

1 This is intelligible enough in the light of David's words in 1 S. 1818 (not in B¹). That a later age claimed descent for the most popular of the kings from the ancient princes of Judah (Ruth 418 ff.) is also intelligible (see RUTH, BOOK OF); David was not to be of less distinguished origin than Saul (1 S. 911). Cp the case of Sargon. It was only in the time of Esar-haddon that a genealogy was produced giving the Sargonic dynasty (which had simply usurped the throne) the necessary line of ancestors. See the inscriptions quoted by Wl. (Hebraica, 452 f.).

2 The connection with Bethlehem has been rendered doubtful by Marq. (Fund. 23 ff.), who thinks that the belief in it arose from a false reading in 1 S. 2028, where, for 'asked leave of me unto Bethlehem' (cp B¹ BAL) he reads (with Klo.) 'asked leave of me until the meal-time' ('eth lehem for beth lehem)—a sound emendation. From the fact that David's sister ABIGAIL (1 q.v.) married a man of Jezreel (near Carmel in Judah, the native place of David's favourite wife Abigail), and that David himself took his first wife from that place (see AHINOAM), Marquart suspects that the hero's real home was farther south than Bethlehem, perhaps at Arad. This view he supports by a plausible but unprovable conjecture, viz., that Shammah the Aradite (so he reads in 2 S. 2325; see HARODITE)—i.e., the man of Arad—is Shammah, David's brother, and that Ahiam b. Shobab the Aradite (2 S. 2333; see HARARITE) was also a relation of David. Both these persons were enrolled among David's 'thirty.' The name of the home of David may conceivably have been forgotten, and (quite apart from 1 S. 2028) a tradition such as that in 2 S. 2314-17 may have suggested to narrators the choice of Bethlehem for his birthplace. This is probable. Cp Winckler, Gesch. 124.

3 A later tradition increased the number to seven (1 Ch. 21315) or rather eight (1 S. 1610 f. 1712 [B om.]). The names of three out of the seven in 1 Ch. 1 c. (viz., NETHANIEL, 2; OZEM, 1; and RADDAL) appear to be fictitious; cp Gray, HPN 233, Marq. Fund. 25.

4 The duplicate narratives of Saul's first meeting with David and of the slaying of Goliath respectively are:—

- (a) 1 S. 1614-23 1711-184 (part), and
- (b) 1 S. 1711-184 (part), 2 S. 2119.

On these passages what is most necessary has been stated by Dr. Introd. 169; cp also the writers referred to in GOLIATH. WRS (OTJC [433] finds some of the arguments for the existence of two opposite traditions as to David's introduction to Saul inconclusive. But there seems no strong objection to regarding the words בָּתִּילָה 'who is with the sheep' in 1 S. 1619 as a harmonistic interpolation (see St. GVI 1224 n. 2; Bu. Ri. Sa. 211), and it seems unnatural to take the words of Saul's servant in 1 S. 1618 proleptically. The true continuation of 1 S. 1623 is not 171, but a lost description of David's early exploits (see above), which was followed by 186 (in a shorter form)—8a.

his thousands and David his ten thousands,' from which (see v. 86) Saul inferred that the ambition of his spoiled favourite would not rest satisfied without the crown itself. It is certain, however, that MT does not give the original form of this passage. Whether the Hebrew text underlying the LXX contained the words 'when David returned,' etc., and the clause at the end of v. 8, is a point on which critics differ. Even if, as Budde supposes, the LXX translator, to produce a simpler narrative, omitted these clauses, it is not denied by that critic that the former clause is an editorial insertion;¹ it was not, therefore, the slaughter of Goliath by the shepherd lad that (according to the tradition) made Saul suspect that David nourished hopes of becoming king.

This, however, is merely a negative statement. What was it, we may ask, that, according to the best analysis of chap. 17, aroused the jealousy of Saul? To the present writer, as well as to Stade and Wellhausen, 1 S. 186 (with the omission of the reference to Goliath) seems to presuppose some account of David's early exploits as a warrior which stood in no connection with the story of Goliath, and indeed was removed by the editor to make room for it. It was these early exploits of a trained warrior that excited the jealousy of Saul, but (since v. 86-11, which CB omits, are derived, like vv. 17-19, which also CB omits, from another source) did not suggest the thought of David's wish for the crown. This is no doubt psychologically intelligible. Saul could not bear the sight of his too popular armour-bearer, and so he transferred him to a post which would remove him from his own immediate presence. The tradition adds that this served to promote David's interests. Even Michal, Saul's daughter (see MICHAL, EGLAH, ITHREAM), fell under his fascination, and her jealous father resolved to put the young captain on a perilous enterprise, promising him his daughter's hand in return for the customary proofs of victory, but secretly hoping that he would never return. David went forth, slew a hundred Philistines, and won his wife;² but the anxiety of Saul went on increasing after such a manifest proof of the divine protection of David.

This is certainly an improvement upon the ordinary view which treats chap. 18 as a homogeneous narrative; but who can assert that this view of the facts produces the impression of being perfectly historical? It will be noticed that we have laid no stress on the song of the women (187). The fragment is indeed clearly ancient; but it seems best understood as coming from a time when David was already king. This, however, is not the most important point. We need a narrative of still greater simplicity and verisimilitude. It is, as Stade remarks,³ more credible that Saul gave his daughter in marriage to David of his own accord, in order to bind the young hero to the family of his benefactor, and that Saul's jealousy broke out after, not before the marriage. Besides, it would be inconsistent in Saul, first, to send David away as a captain of a thousand (1813), and then to bring him back to the court as the king's son-in-law. For this position had attached to it the captaincy of the body-guard (see 1 S. 2214, CBAL), which gave its holder a rank next to Abner the general (1 S. 2025), so that Saul would be continually liable to fresh irritation from the sight of David. We cannot, however, positively assert that Stade's correction of the tradition brings us face to face with facts, and must be content to believe that the early story of David's life is not altogether a popular fiction, without insisting too much on the most romantic and interesting, and therefore least certain, parts of it. One of these least certain parts is the account of David's early relations with MICHAL (q.v.).

(c) Various late narratives.—On the episode of Saul's broken promise of Merab as a wife for David (1 S. 1817-19) it is unnecessary to dwell. The story, as all agree, interrupts the original context of chap. 18, to which the insertion has been clumsily fitted by an interpolation in v. 216. We have here, therefore, a notice drawn from a distinct source. The language of vv. 17 and 19 seems to presuppose the story of David and Goliath (17 25 speaks of the king's promise of his daughter, and the whole narrative implies that David is as yet a mere lad, too young in fact to marry). It might of course be historical in spite of its close connection with that highly imaginative story. Since, however, Michal, not Merab (CB 1, however, has Μερόβ), appears in 2 S. 218 as the mother of Adriel's children, it is more than probable that the whole episode of Merab rests on a confusion of names.¹ In short, we have two variants of the same tradition, and the form given in 1820 ff. is the more likely to be historical.

Nor need we pause long on some other late narratives. (i.) The account of Samuel's solemn consecration of David as king in 1 S. 161-13 has evidently not a historical but a religious motive. To devout readers the 'man according to God's mind' would have seemed to be disparaged if he had not, equally with his predecessor, been anointed by Samuel. (ii.) The episode of David's visit to the prophetic community at Ramah (1918-24) is an attempt, in the style of the midrash, to explain the proverb, 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' On this, as well as on (i.), see SAMUEL, ii. § 5. (iii.) The pretended madness of David at Gath (2111-16; see ACHISH). To these we should, not inconceivably, add (iv.) a part of the story of David and Bathsheba (see BATHSHEBA).

Let us now resume the thread of the narrative. David was at first known to the servants of Saul as a brave warrior and a skilled musician, and also as clever of speech and comely in person. Whatever he did seemed to prosper, for he had not only unusual abilities, but also a power of fascination which seemed a special sign of the divine favour (cp Ps. 452). His prowess in the war against the Philistines marked him out as one worthy to be the king's friend. He was, in fact, rewarded, first of all with the position of a royal armour-bearer, and then with the hand of Saul's daughter, Michal. For a time all went well. In the intervals of military service he played on his harp, and by his skill in music chased away the 'evil spirit' of melancholy, which already threatened to mar the king's career. Saul's gratitude, however, was not proof against the severe trial to which it was exposed by David's growing popularity, and, it would seem, by his close intimacy with Jonathan. The heir to the throne had, like Michal, passed under the spell of David, and become his devoted friend, probably his sworn brother,² and the disturbed mind of the king conceived the idea that Jonathan had stirred up David to be his father's enemy, in the expectation (we must suppose) of succeeding him as king (228). Saul brooded over this idea, and even reasoned with his son on the folly of supposing that his crown, if he came by these unholy means to wear it before the time, would be secure from such a powerful and ambitious subject as David (2031). Hence, tradition reports, Saul 'spoke to Jonathan his son, and to all his servants, that they should slay David' (191), and even sought, in a fit of frenzy, to pierce David with his javelin (1810 f. [CB omits] 199). Whether it was due to Jonathan's influence that the final breach between Saul and David was averted, we cannot tell; the story in 191-7 seems really another version of that in chap. 20. It is equally uncertain whether the story in 191-17 has any claim to represent the closing scene in David's life at Gibeah. There are difficulties in regarding it as the true sequel to 198-10. It may possibly come from another source,³ and refer to a slightly later period in David's life. The daring spirit of that hero might prompt him to visit his wife, even after his first flight,¹ or at least the first reciters of the tale may have meant it to be so understood. There remains the story in chap. 20, which (putting aside the opening words as a misleading editorial insertion, and 22. 4-17 as an expansion, due to an early editor² who loved the theme of Jonathan's friendship for David) evidently gives a traditional account of the rupture between Saul and David. Whether it is historical, however, is quite uncertain. There were, of course, gaps in the tradition, especially as regards the earlier period of David's life. Two great facts were certain, viz., the transformation of Saul's original kindness towards David into its opposite, and the firm friendship between David and Jonathan. Out of these facts the reciters of legends, aided by a traditional acquaintance with the general circumstances of the time, had to produce the best detailed account of David's flight from Saul that they could.

As was natural, David turned his steps southward. In the hill-country of Judah he would find hiding-places

3. Flight. enough, and if the arm of Saul threatened to reach him even there, he could easily seek the hospitality of some one of the neighbouring peoples. This, it is true, would be most displeasing to a worshipper of Yahwē (see 26:19); but it must have already occurred to David as a possibility, for he soon afterwards placed his father and mother under the protection of the king of Moab (22:3 f.; see MOAB). At present, his first impulse was to fly with his men to the sanctuary at Nob, or perhaps rather Gibeon (see NOB), where he had already, it would seem, had occasion to consult the priestly oracle (22:15). On his arrival, so the tradition declares, he obtained bread, by a plausible but fictitious story, from the consecrated table, and, as a pledge of victory in the king's 'business,' the mighty sword of Goliath (see GOLIATH, § 3). We can hardly venture to accept this account as correct;³ it is most probably a later writer's attempt to fill up a gap in the old tradition. Whatever took place, it is certain that David very soon hastened on to the fortified hill-town of Adullam. Here he was still in his native land, though probably not among Israelites (see ADULLAM); he could worship his own god, and might hope to be safe from his pursuers. In the fort (not the cave) of Adullam he was joined by his family, and by a small band of fellow-outlaws (about 400 in number). Meantime Doeg, the Edomite, who had seen David conversing with the priest Ahimelech at Nob (or Gibeon), had reported the circumstance with details, which may or may not have been his own invention,⁴ to Saul, and the king inferred from the report that Ahimelech had used the sacred oracle in support of treasonable designs of David. It is only his rooted belief in David's treason that excuses the fierceness with which Saul destroyed, not only the eighty-five priests,⁵ but also the entire population of the city of Nob or rather Gibeon (22:18 f.); see GIBEON, DOEG, ABIATHAR, BAN. He also indicated the expulsion of David from the royal family by giving Michal, David's wife, to a new husband (see MICHAL).

David now became a captain of freebooters, levying

² See the text as exhibited by Budde in SBOT.

³ It is incredible that David should have passed by the sanctuary without 'inquiring of Yahwē,' nor does the reference to the 'sword of Goliath' incline us much to accept the rest of the story. That the words assigned to Saul in 22:8 rightly express the king's belief is, however, more than probable.

blackmail on those who could pay it, in return for protection against Amalekites, Philistines,

4. An outlaw. or other enemies. We have an attractive and sympathetic sketch of his conduct, and of the generous spirit which softened the harsher details, in chap. 25. Besides the means of subsistence, David looked, of course, for timely warning of the approach of his bitter enemies. In this way he held his ground manfully (with the support of the priest Abiathar) against almost overwhelming odds, trusting that he was being preserved for high ends. He must have felt that none but he could provide Israel with the leader that it needed, though to work directly towards the attainment of the crown would have been contrary to his loyal nature. One point in his favour there was, the value of which can hardly be overrated—viz., the peculiar conformation of the hill-country of Judah. It is necessary for the untravelled student to form by books and photographs some idea of those 'tossed and broken hills' where the valleys are all alike, and large bodies of men may camp near each other without knowing it. Major Conder goes even further, and claims that through recent identifications the narrative assumes a consistency which traditional sites have destroyed. 'From Gibeath (Jeba' near Mukhmās) David flies southward to Nob, thence down the great valley to Gath (Tell eṣ-Ṣāfieh), from Gath he returns into the land of Judah, then bounded by the Shēphēlah, most of which seems to have been in the hands of the Philistines; and on the edge of the country between Achish and Saul, Philistia and Judah, he collects his band into the strongest site to be found in the neighbourhood of the rich cornlands of Judah. At the advice of the seer he retires to the hills, and if my identification of Hareth be correct, it is but a march of 4 m. distance. Here, as at Adullam, he was also within easy reach of his family at Bethlehem. At Hārās he hears that the Philistines, whose advance he probably barred when holding Adullam, had invaded Kē'ilah immediately beneath him, and it is this propinquity alone which accounts for his attack upon the marauders.'¹ There can be no doubt that exact identifications of the sites referred to would give the narrative of David's outlaw-period a greater approximation to consistency. But this able explorer's identifications are too often (like that of Gath above) unproven, and he has, on principle, omitted to take account of the composite character of the biblical narrative.²

We left David at Adullam; we next find him before another fortified town (1 S. 23:1-13), called KEILAH (7.v.), of which Ahithophel was perhaps a native (see GILOH). His hope was to secure the gratitude of the inhabitants by chastising the Philistines who were besieging it. Supported by an oracle, he attacked and defeated those most dangerous of foes. He was disturbed, however, by another oracle, warning him that the men of Kē'ilah would surrender their benefactor to Saul. The king was, in fact, on his way with his whole fighting force, and David would sooner trust himself to the intricacies of the wilderness than to the 'bolts and bars' of Kē'ilah. Whether David really went from the 'forest of Hareth' to Kē'ilah, is highly uncertain. The anecdote in 23:1-13 is not necessarily the sequel of the connected narrative in 21:9-22. Nor can we assume (with Conder) that the generous action related in chap. 24 took place immediately before the events described in chap. 25; for, as critics agree, the narrative is but a duplicate of the traditional story given in a better form in chap. 26.³ If we ask how much of the details of these hairbreadth escapes is historical, the reply must be equally disappointing to literalists. The central facts of the stories are all that we can safely rely upon. Such a detail, for instance, as the meeting of David and Jonathan in the wilderness of Ziph (23:16-18) is obviously an innocent piece of romance; in fact it is but another version of the favourite story of the 'covenant' between the friends. Nor can we venture to assume that, if David once, in accordance with a chivalrous rule still common in Arabia, spared the life of his sleeping foe, either he or Saul displayed that delicacy of sentiment which a later age attributed to them.

Strangely enough, the two accounts of David's generosity towards Saul are the setting of a perhaps more completely historical story—that of David and Nabal (chap. 25). The portrait of David here given is less idealistic, but seems much more truthful than that in chaps. 24 and 26. Not less interesting is the sketch of Abigail. To her it was that David owed his avoidance of blood-guiltiness. To her, too, he was indebted for the improvement which took place in his social status. As the husband of Abigail, he was no longer a mere freebooter, but the wealthy head of a powerful Calebite family, and so took one step forward towards his ultimate enthronement at Hebron as king of Judah.¹

How long David remained in the Calebite district of Carmel, we do not know. He is next introduced as despairing of being able to hold out any longer against his foe; 'there is nothing better for me,' he said, 'than speedily to escape into the land of the Philistines' (27:1). So he placed himself and his 600 at the disposal of Achish, king of Gath. Ill at ease, however, among the Philistine chieftains, he induced his new suzerain to give him as a residence the outlying town of Ziklag. Here he still maintained amicable relations with his friends in Judah, and though he craftily professed to be engaged in raids against the Negeb of Judah, he was in reality more honourably employed (see ACHISH, AMALEK, § 3).

At length, in the second year, a change in his relation to Achish became imminent. The Philistine lords, who had probably long been suspicious of his intentions, refused to let David join them in their campaign against Saul. David on his side professed eagerness to fight for Achish; but we are not bound to take his words too literally. Historians, it is true, differ in their view of David's conduct. It seems psychologically probable, however, that David was only too glad to be sent back by Achish to Ziklag, with a charge not to cherish revengeful thoughts against his friendly suzerain (1 S. 29:10, 15). A picture, Homeric in its vividness, is given of the effect produced on David and his men by the sight that met them at Ziklag, which the cruel Amalekites had plundered (30:3-6). An oracle encouraged David to pursue his foes. He came up with them, and chastised them severely. The account closes with a list of the towns in Judah, to which David sent politic gifts. His ambitious plans were no doubt maturing.

Meantime Saul had fallen on Gilboa and Israel was in a state of chaos. The Philistines were masters of the

6. At Hebron. fertile lowlands of Jezreel and the Jordan, but disdained to interfere with the poorer country of Judah. There were some even in northern Israel who thought that David and David alone could help them, and among these were probably the men of Jabesh-gilead, to whom he sent graciously expressed thanks for their chivalrous rescue of the bodies of Saul and his sons (2 S. 25:7 cp 3:17). David, however, was content to let Abner have his way, and attempt to consolidate the weakened regal authority in the North, nominally for Saul's incompetent son, Ishbaal. For the present, David transferred his residence, in obedience to an oracle, to Hebron, placing his men in the neighbouring towns or villages. The elders of Judah took the hint, and solemnly acknowledged him as their king.

It was not a grand position. As king of Judah, David was no less a vassal of the Philistines than when he was only lord of Ziklag;¹ indeed, he still retained Ziklag. This only shows his caution, however, not his want of patriotism. Even Abner could not venture to let the puppet king Ishbaal revolt from the Philistines;² rest was the first need both of Israel and of Judah. We cannot, however, suppose that David and his band were idle. It is, on the whole, probable that the conquest of the Jebusite fortress of Zion belongs to the period of David's tribal kingship,³ and not (as is generally supposed) to the commencement of his enlarged sovereignty. When the Philistines made that bold attempt to seize David which is related in 2 S. 5:17, David, we hear, took refuge in 'the stronghold.' It is difficult to suppose that a different 'stronghold' is meant from that mentioned in vv. 79 (which there is reason to assign to the same document). The Philistines themselves are uncertain where they will find David; clearly then David had more than one place of residence. We are also told that they 'came up' to seek David, and spread themselves out in the valley of Rephaim near Jerusalem. It is true that where the narrative 2 S. 5:6-9 is placed, it seems to have reference to the beginning of David's kingship over Israel. Probably, however, something has fallen out before v. 6. The lost passage presumably referred to David's removal of his residence to Jerusalem; the narrative which has been preserved explains how the king and 'his men' possessed themselves of the all but impregnable fortress.

By this important conquest David secured his position from all possible enemies, whether Philistine or Israelite. He also doubtless hoped to make Zion what it ultimately became—the capital of united Israel. We may assume that this caused uneasiness to Abner, who doubtless had dreams of a reunited Israel under the sceptre of a descendant or kinsman of Saul. These dreams must have been rudely interrupted by the news of David's success. Abner well understood what the conquest of Zion portended, and it was natural that he should seek to counteract David's ambition. He had no occasion to form an elaborate plan of operations; he had but to allow the unsleeping jealousy of Israel and Judah to display itself. There would be constant border hostilities, and Judah, as the weaker of the two, would (he must have hoped) be reduced to vassalage to Israel, and in time perhaps incorporated into the kingdom. A 'very sore battle' is reported between the men of Ishbaal and those of David by the pool of Gibeon. It began with a mere sham fight; but such a contest could not be expected to end without bloodshed, and Abner must have foreseen this when he and the men of Ishbaal set out from Mahanaim (2 S. 2:12-17). The result was disastrous for the cause of Ishbaal, and year after year the war was renewed with constant loss of prestige to the house of Saul. Fierce private passions, too, added to the horrors of the time (see ABNER; ISHBAAL, 1; JOAB, 1). At length, Ishbaal being removed, David stood alone, sad but confident, for who else could be thought of in this hour of need? Had he not in the olden time been Israel's leader against the Philistines, and was he not by marriage a member of ² See Kamph ZATW 643-97 [186]; Ki. Hist. ii. The older view (see St.) was that Abner upheld the banner of Israel against the Philistines; but Kamph. shows at great length that the evidence will not justify this.

Saul's house (2 S. 52 313-16)? So the elders of Israel accepted the inevitable, and anointed the son of Jesse king over Israel.

David was now, according to a not very early tradition,¹ in his thirty-eighth year; seven and a half years

7. King over Israel: had elapsed since he first became king at Hebron. His training had been long and varied, and he might now fairly hope to finish the work which Saul had begun, and remove for ever the danger of Philistine invasions. The Philistines knew what they had to expect from the new king of 'all Israel and Judah,' and lost not a moment in 'seeking him.' They felt towards him as the Syrian king felt towards Ahab: if he were only slain or captured, the fate of Israel was settled. They knew, too, the rapidity of his movements, and sought to capture him before he could retire into his newly-won stronghold of Zion. They were too late for this, and challenged him to battle in the valley of Rephaim westward from Jerusalem (2 S. 518-25; cp BAAL-PERAZIM). Two great victories are said to have been won on this occasion by David. We have also a record of individual exploits and of personal dangers run by David in 2 S. 21 15-22 238-17 (see ISHBIBENOB, etc.), which must, it would seem, have stood originally close to 56-12 17-25. It is singular that this should be almost all that is told us respecting what, if entirely David's work, would be the greatest of all his achievements. One more notice indeed has come down to us (2 S. 81); but it is tantalisingly short. It states that 'David smote the Philistines and subdued them, and took' something of importance 'out of the hand of the Philistines.' The Chronicler thinks that what David 'took' was 'Gath and its towns' (1 Ch. 181), and this is certainly plausible, for deeds of high renown were performed near Gath (see ELHANAN, 1), and afterwards we find 600 men of Gath in David's service (2 S. 1518; see below, § 11). It is more probable, however, that Ashdod was the city spoken of in the true text (see METHEG-AMMAH). Still it is doubtful whether such a total defeat of the Philistines as the passage just quoted ascribes to David, is historical. That the Israelites were delivered from the dread of these foes is indisputable; but that David broke the power of the Philistines is not probable. It is a reasonable conjecture that the deliverance of the Israelites was helped either by an Egyptian, or by a Musrite (N. Arabian) intervention.² Moreover, the friendly terms on which David appears to have stood with the Philistines at a later time suggest that he had made a treaty of peace with this people on conditions equally honourable to both sides, one of which, as we have elsewhere seen reason to think, was the restoration of the ark (see ARK, § 5).

However this may be, David was certainly not deficient in the qualities of a general. This is plain from his wise measures on the rebellion of 8. Other wars. Absalom, of which we have very full particulars. His other wars, with neighbours only less dangerous than the Philistines, may be conveniently referred to here. We have a summary of them in the same section that refers to the subduing of the Philistines (2 S. 81-14, cp 1 S. 1447, and see SAUL, 1 § 3), and further information respecting the Ammonite war in 2 S. 10 11 1226-31. It is important, however, to study these notices critically, both from a purely literary, and from a historical, point of view. The two points of view, it is true, cannot be kept very long apart. A preliminary literary analysis, however, will quickly show us that in 2 S. 81-14 we are dealing, not with an original narrative, but with a panegyric made up from various sources, containing strong traces of editorial work. As to 2 S. 10 the case is not at first sight so clear; but a further investigation reveals here, too, the hand of the editor. The contents also must be criticised, and this will greatly clear up the problems of literary analysis. The historical results of the whole process are not unimportant.¹

(a) Moab.—Little enough is told us of David's war with the Moabites (cp MOAB); but that little is suggestive. With cold-blooded precision the conqueror destroyed two-thirds (such is the meaning of 2 S. 82) of the entire fighting force of Moab. The description seems to imply that it was an act of national retaliation, and the offence which caused this may be plausibly conjectured. The kingdom of Ishbaal, as Kamphausen has shown, was by no means so powerful as the early writers supposed. The defeat on Gilboa had brought the Israelites to the verge of ruin, and Saul's feeble successor had to make terms, not only with the Philistines, but also with the Moabites and the Ammonites, to whom his capital, Mahanaim, was only too accessible. It is probable that both Moab and Ammon granted him peace only under insulting conditions, and we can form some idea of the insults that were possible in such circumstances from 1 S. 112 2 S. 104. David of course had to give these insolent neighbours a lesson.

(b) Ammon.—Passing on to the Ammonites, we notice that, if there is a doubt as to the degree of the severity of their punishment (2 S. 1231),² there is none as to the gravity of their offence (2 S. 101-5). The account of the details of the war requires very careful criticism. The conduct of the host of Israel was entrusted to Joab, and it was owing to the politic self-restraint of this general that David in person stormed the Ammonitish capital, and carried away the crown of the idol-god Milcom (see AMMON, § 8). The difficulty of the narrative is caused by the statements which it contains respecting the Aramæan allies of the Ammonites and the successes which David gained over them.³ Was the Zobah mentioned in 2 S. 106 (undoubtedly an ancient passage) as joining with Beth-rehob to send help to the Ammonites, a powerful kingdom N. of Damascus, to which all Aram W. of the Euphrates was subject (as stated in 2 S. 1016), or was it a small state near the land of Ammon, which on various grounds agrees best with our expectations? If the latter view be adopted, we must regard 2 S. 1015-19a as a late editorial insertion, akin to the much edited passage 83-8, and all that we know respecting David's relations to the Aramæans is that Joab routed the forces sent by them to help the Ammonites, so that they 'feared to help the Ammonites any more' (2 S. 101319b). The statement of 86, in itself so improbable, that David annexed Damascus, is due to a misreading of a passage which appears over again in v. 14. The editor, by mistake, read 'Aram' instead of 'Edom,' and then interpreted 'Aram' as 'Aram-Damascus.'⁴

(c) Edom.—Lastly we come to the war with Edom, which, as we are told in 2 S. 814, was incorporated by David into his kingdom. We are left entirely ignorant as to the cause of the war,⁵ and know next to nothing of the details, though the conquest of such a difficult region would have been well worth describing. A great

⁴ Klo., on the other hand, wishes to correct 'Edom' in v. 14 into 'Aram.' The traditional view of 2 S. 85 f. has been thought to be confirmed by 1 K. 11 24; but there the words 'when David slew them' are a gloss, not found in CBL, as Klo. himself candidly points out.

² If an Egyptian intervention be supposed we must place it during the twenty-first Egyptian dynasty. See WMM (As. u. Eur. 389), who thinks that the notice in 1 K. 9 16 presupposes the Egyptian occupation of Philistia. Observe that Caphtorim is called a 'son' of Mizraim (see CAPHTOR, § 4). The alternative theory, however, seems much more probable (see JQR 11 [1901] 559, and cp MIZRAIM, § 2).

victory is ascribed to David in the VALLEY OF SALT (g.v.), to the S. of the Dead Sea (2 S. 8₁₃, where read 'Edom' for 'Aram' with ^QBAL; Ps. 60, title). There is also an incidental reference to the war in 1 K. 11_{15 f.}, which tells us that the Edomites contested every inch of ground, but received no quarter from their conqueror. This is the extent of our information.

To sum up. If it is one of David's titles to fame that he for a time united 'all the tribes of Israel from Dan to Beersheba' (2 S. 24₂), it is another that he secured the united kingdom from foreign attack. From Assyria and Egypt indeed there was then nothing to fear;¹ but the small neighbouring peoples needed the lesson which he gave them. That his suzerainty or sphere of influence extended to the Euphrates is not, however, supported, in the opinion of the present writer, by a thorough criticism of the documents. The editor of 2 S. 8, who perhaps wrote also 10_{15-19a}, confounded the two Zobahs² and made other mistakes, and on the basis of this mis-reading of the evidence he and his school erected the airy fabric of a Davidic empire large enough to be named respectfully among the 'world-powers.' This theory (for such we must call it) fell in with the later tendency to glorify David, and with the idea of a great Messianic kingdom of which the Davidic was a type (Am. 9_{11 f.}, post-exilic; see AMOS, § 10, CHRONICLES, § 9). It cannot be resigned without regret, and should archaeological discoveries disclose some grains of fact which may have assisted the growth of historical error, it will be a satisfaction to find that the ancient editors were not entirely arbitrary in their procedure. That David's power was respected as far north as Hamath (even if the report in 2 S. 8₁₀ be not altogether accurate) need not be denied. The question is, Can it be proved that friendship had given place, on David's side, to suzerainty?

David's next aim was to provide a worthy centre for the united people of Israel. In this he showed a truly masterly statesmanship. The kingship of Saul was not altogether different from the authority exercised by the greater 'judges.' It never entirely divested itself of a tribal character, as is clear from the striking narrative, 1 S. 226-8. At the risk of alienating the men of Judah, who, in fact, appear as the chief malcontents in subsequent civil disturbances, David transferred his royal residence from the remote southern city, Hebron, to Jerusalem. The new capital had not indeed all the natural advantages which could be wished (see JERUSALEM); but it had two great recommendations: (1) it was neither Israelite nor Judahite, having been recently won by David and his men, and (2) whilst easily accessible from the north, it lay close to David's own tribe of Judah. The king not only strengthened its fortifications, but also consecrated it by solemnly transferring to it the newly recovered national sanctuary (see ARK, § 6) from its temporary home at Baal (see KIRJATH-JEARIM) in Judah. This must not be disparaged as merely a proof of political wisdom. It was this, no doubt; but it also sprang from deep religious feeling, as the old tradition clearly states (2 S. 6₂₁; see ^QBAL). David felt that the true principle of national unity and strength lay in fidelity to Yahweh, and it is to him therefore that the world is ultimately indebted for the streams of spiritual life which have issued from Jerusalem. That he built a palace for himself, but no temple for the ark, seemed a strange inconsistency to a later age. Whether the course that he took was prescribed by an oracle, it is now impossible to say; the narrative in 2 S. 7, with the accompanying prophecy, is one of the late Deuteronomistic insertions and cannot be safely followed.¹

(a) Army.—Both in military and in civil affairs David was careful to combine the necessary innovations with a due regard for the old habits and feelings of the people, which he thoroughly understood. The tendency to disintegration inherent in the old clan-organisation (see GOVERNMENT, § 18) he sought to counteract by the institution of a bodyguard, which was a natural development out of his old band of freebooters. This well-disciplined and absolutely trustworthy 'standing army' was sufficient to exhibit a high standard to the old national militia, but not so large as to excite popular suspicion. Specially honoured were the thirty-seven heroes of whom a list is given in 2 S. 23 (see below, i.). It is uncertain whether they were called 'the thirty' or 'the knights';² but most are in favour of the former view. They were conspicuous for their fearless courage, of which some anecdotes are preserved. Foreigners were by no means excluded from the ranks of the Gībōrīm (AV 'mighty men'). Shortly before the rebellion of Absalom, Ittai the Gittite had entered David's service with 600 other Philistines³ (2 S. 15₁₈), and Uriah the Hittite was one of the trusted 'thirty.' How well these Philistine mercenaries repaid David's confidence, is proved by 2 S. 15₁₈ 20₇ 1 K. 1₃₈. (See CHERETHITES, and on later OT references to the king's foreign guards [e.g., Zeph. 18 Ezek. 446 f.], WRS OT/C⁽²⁾ 262 n.)

(i.) The list of heroes in 2 S. 23 enumerates 'the Three' κατ' ἐξῆκον:—ISHBAAL (2), ELEAZAR (3), and SHAMMAH (3); then follow Abishai and Benaiah, who occupy an intermediary position; and finally, the heroes themselves, thirty-seven in all (v. 39). There is some difficulty in arriving at this number (see ELIKA, ELIPHELET, 2), and the numerous textual corruptions preclude complete certainty as to their names and origin (besides the special articles cp Marq. Fund. 15 f.).

The heroes seem to have been originally arranged in pairs according to their homes; thus Maharai and Heleb from Netophah (28₂, 29), two from Jattir (38), one each from the neighbouring places of Pirathon and Gaash (30), etc. It is noticeable that they are almost wholly of Benjamite and Judæan origin, and this supports the conjecture that the list in the main refers to the early part of David's life (cp. e.g., 1 S. 22_{1 f.}), before his supremacy was spread over the rest of Israel. Note the mention of Asahel and Uriah, and that Benaiah is merely the head of David's guard, and has not apparently reached the position he holds in 2 S. 8₁₈ (see below [c] 2). The omission of Joab as the holder of any official position is remarkable, and suggests that he had not yet become 'captain of the host,' although the references in vv. 18 (Abishai, the brother of Joab; cp. v. 24), 37 seem to show that he was not unknown. It is highly probable that the whole chapter owes its present form to a comparatively late editor (cp. Kue. Einl. i. 2, § 22, n. 13).

(ii.) In 1 Ch. 11 the same list is substantially repeated—in a few cases with better readings, and a few names recur in 1 Ch. 27₁₋₁₄ (see below, [c] i.). Verses 41₆₋₄₇ add sixteen other heroes, who, to judge from the gentilicia (often doubtful, see MAHAVITE, MESOBAITE, MITHNITE) were partly of east-Jordanic origin. The authenticity of these names is a difficult question. They may have proceeded from a source common to both compilers (see Kue. Einl. 1.2, § 30, n. 11); but the mention of Reubenites, and the preponderating proportion of theophorous names as well as the relative lateness of such names as Jaasiel, Jeiel, Jothaviah in this chapter, render their genuineness open to question.

(iii.) Further lists of warriors are found in 1 Ch. 12, which enumerates those who came to David (a) at Ziklag (1-22), and (b) at Hebron (23 f.). (b) The latter is purely fabulous. It represents the warriors as assembling from all the tribes (not excluding the two halves of Manasseh¹), and gives a theocratic air to the whole by the inclusion of Aaronites. (a) In the first half (1-22) we have probably a few traces of David's early life. The lists comprise men of Saul's brethren and of Benjamin (3 ff.), Korahites (6) and men of Gedor (7). In the case of the Korahites it is possible that the Chronicler is thinking of the later priestly class. His inclusion of such warriors among David's band is as intelligible as his ascription to David of the division of priestly courses and other works dealing with the priests and Levites. On the other hand, with Be., we may more probably think of the Judean Korah (1 Ch. 243). It was under David that the S. Judean populations attained power, and it is perfectly natural to suppose that individuals from among them joined him. This, of course, does not mean that the names are necessarily old or genuine. Finally, are enumerated (1) certain Gadites, 'captains of the host' (גִּדִּי מִלְחָמָה), who put to flight David's enemies on either side of the Jordan (8-15); (2) Amasai (= AMASA, q.v.), who, at the head of men of Benjamin and Judah, came to David in the 'hold' (16-18); and (3) certain chiliarchs of Manasseh (19). Underlying the account of Amasai, we may possibly find the traces of a confused and mutilated recollection of the revolt of Absalom, wherein Amasa plays so prominent a part in bringing Judah and the king together (2 S. 1914). S. A. C.]

² שְׁלִישִׁים and שְׁלִשִׁים were sometimes confounded (see 1 Ch. 11₁₁ 15, 124 18, Var. Bib.). K^lo. prefers שְׁלִישִׁים (cp. Di. on Ex. 14₇). At any rate such a term as 'the thirty' would soon become conventional (see 2 S. 23₃₉). CP. CHARIOT, § 10.

(b) Justice.—To the chief civil duty of a king—the administration of justice—David paid the utmost attention (2 S. 815, cp 144 ff.), for Absalom's complaint that the king was inaccessible (2 S. 153) is merely factious. He does not appear to have made any change in the old local administration of justice; but he introduced—simply by acting as supreme judge—an element which profoundly modified the traditional system (see GOVERNMENT, § 19).

(c) Officers.—In this and other departments David was aided by his great officers of state (2 S. 816-18); see BENAIAH, HUSHAI, JEHOSEPHAT 2, JOAB, and below. It is important to notice that in all probability he had a Babylonian scribe or secretary (see SHAVSHA)—a late trace of the early preponderance of Babylonian civilisation in Palestine.

[It will be convenient here to note briefly the lists of David's officers, treasurers, etc.

i. 1 Ch. 27, a passage of obviously complex character, after reproducing (vv. 1-15) the first part of the list of David's warriors (see above a. i.) in the form of a list of twelve captains of divisions (עֲלֵי צִבְאוֹת 1-15), enumerates twelve princes (שָׂרִים) of the tribes of Israel (16-24), including Levites, Aaronites, the twofold division of Manasseh and the post-exilic priestly names Hoshea, Iddo, Jeroham (?), Zichri; Jaasiel (v. 21) is probably borrowed from 1 Ch. 1147. This is followed in 25-31 by a third list of twelve—David's overscers or treasurers; the names seem to be old (Gray, HPN 230 ff.), and so far as this goes, the list might be trusted worthy (but cp Kue. Eint. 12, § 31, n. 11. Besides Gray, HPN 229 ff., see CHRONICLES, § 9, and cp We. Prod. (4) 71 ff.).

ii. David's supreme officers of state are variously enumerated in 2 S. 816-18 (cp 2023-26 [where they are obviously out of place], 1 Ch. 1814-17) and 1 Ch. 2732-34 (cp Solomon's officers 1 K. 4, and the list given by GBL at the end of 1 K. 2). In the case of the list in 2 S. the genuineness of the passage has been questioned by Bonk (ZATW 12143) and probably rightly. JOAB b. Zeruiah is said to be 'over the host' (רִצְפָּאֵל), but with the exception of 8 10 (David's wars) he appears, on the other hand, to be over the Cherethites and Pelethites (2 S. 207); and BENAIAH, who in the list is credited with this office (v. 18), was 'head of the מִשְׁכָּן' 2 S. 2823b (see COUNCIL, i. 2) and perhaps also 'chief of the brick-kiln' (1 K. 2464 GBL; cp 12727 2 S. 1231). JEHOSEPHAT (q.v.) b. Ahilud was recorder (cp GOVERNMENT, § 21) and Shisha (see SHAVSHA) the secretary. The priests were David's sons (but see MINISTER, CHIEF); but at the head stood Zadok b. Ahitub and Abiathar b. Ahimelech. Abiathar is a descendant of the famous Eli, Zadok is of unknown origin, and although mentioned first (cp similarly 2 S. 15 24 ff. 36) did not obtain pre-eminence until the time of Solomon.

The Chronicler's list (2732-34) mentions a Jonathan, the נָחִי of David, as a counsellor, and JEHIEL (q.v.), who was 'with the king's sons.' Ahithophel, and Hushai the 'friend' of David (see HUSHAI), are well-known characters in the revolt of Absalom; according to the Chronicler their places were filled by Benaiah and Abiathar. S. A. C.]

(d) In another respect too David followed the example of Oriental kings: with the aid of his ally, Hiram, king of Tyre, he built himself a palace of stone and cedar wood which rose proudly above the low dwellings of Jerusalem. There he combined a regal generosity with a not less regal luxury. Mephibosheth (MERIBBAAL) and Chimham were among his court-pensioners (2 S.

97 ff. 1928 33 38); singing men and singing women enlivened his repasts (2 S. 1935).

Another piece of genuine Oriental magnificence was the harem (2 S. 5 13, etc.), which, though it does not seem to have shocked the nation (2 S. 1621), was fraught with moral danger to the king, and was the source of much of the unhappiness of his later years. It is clear from passages like 2 S. 1321 1424 15 14 19 6 12 14 that the moral weakness of his last days had begun many years before, under the influences of his harem.

[Lists of David's sons are found in (a) 2 S. 31-5 (= 1 Ch. 31-3) and (b) 2 S. 513-16 (= 1 Ch. 35-8 = 1 Ch. 143-7). It is probable that originally these stood together, and Budde (SBOT) accordingly places them before 815. (a) The former list gives the names of the six sons born at Hebron and reflects David's policy of strengthening his power by alliances with neighbouring clans or tribes. Besides the two wives from Jezreel (in Judah) and Carmel (Caleb), we have one from the S. Palestinian GESHUR (q.v., 2) and, possibly, one from Gath (see HAGGITH). The two remaining names, SHEPHATIAH (more common in later literature) and ITHREAM, are unknown. The death of Amnon left Chileab (if the name be correct—see CHILEAB) heir to the throne, and it is therefore the more remarkable that nothing whatever is told us of his fate: for an ingenious conjecture, cp Marq. Fund. 25 f. (b) The second list contains eleven names—sons born at Jerusalem. Of these the first two, Shammua (or Shimeah) and Shobab, may probably recur (see above § 1, n. 2). These and the two following (Nathan and Solomon) are according to 1 Ch. 35, all sons of Bathsheba. The statement in Ch. has probably arisen from the desire to render Solomon's birth as stainless as possible (Solomon is mentioned last), since from 2 S. 11 f. it appears that Solomon was really the second son. These names are increased to thirteen in 1 Ch. 3=14 by the addition of Nogah and a second Eliphelet. Perhaps Nogah is original and should be inserted in 2 S. (Th. Be.), thus raising the number to twelve; but it is possible that it has arisen from the following Nepheg and should (with Eliphelet) be omitted. It is noteworthy that in 2 S. 513-16, GBL (but not GA) has a double list the second of which (based upon Ch.) agrees with GBL in including the two doubtful names. S. A. C.]

That the government of this great king was perfectly successful cannot, of course, be maintained. His people was far from homogeneous, and it is not surprising that the jealousies of Judah and Israel reappeared. Great discontent was also produced by his attempt to number the people, which was no doubt regarded by his subjects as introductory to an attempt upon their liberties, and was checked only by the rebukes of his seer Gad and the breaking out of a pestilence¹ (2 S. 24).

According to the early narrative, the conscience of the king accepted the rebuke; but most probably David still felt as a statesman that the position of Israel was precarious without that improved military organisation which he had contemplated. On the other hand, he continued to tolerate some ancient usages inconsistent with the interests of internal harmony. The practice of blood-revenge was not put down,² and, by allowing the Gibeonites to enforce it against the house of Saul (see GIBEON, RIZPAH), the king involved himself in a feud with the Benjamites (cp 2 S. 21 with 168, which refers to a later date). Yet he might have braved all these dangers but for the disorders of his own family. Need we tell over again the story of his great moral disaster? Nowhere is the impossibility of upholding the saintliness of this king more apparent than here. And yet a laudable desire to believe the best of David has perhaps blunted the edge of the scalpel of the critic (see BATHSHEBA).

It is certain that the narrative in 2 S. 111-1225 is not without later insertions, and it is very probable that the most fascinating part of the story was imagined by an editor in the interests of reverence and edification,—in fact, that the process of converting David into a saint had already begun. That later ages were profoundly shocked at David's action is a proof of the providential education of Israel to be the greatest of moral teachers. The Chronicler shows his own feeling very clearly by omitting the narrative altogether, though, had he accepted the view adopted in the late heading of Ps. 51, he would have shown

² It is clear, however, from 2 S. 328 f., 14 1-10, that his sympathies were against this barbarous usage.

David to be more nearly a saint than he appears to us in almost any part of the Chronicler's biography.

The effects of David's sin lasted to the close of his life, for the undue influence of Bathsheba is conspicuous in the sad story of the competition for David's crown. Even apart from this, however, the royal princes could not but display the faults due to their birth and education. The narrative is impartially exact. We shudder at the brutal passion of Amnon, and the shameless counsel of the wily Jonadab. If a brilliant suggestion of Ewald may be accepted, we see the 'inauspicious expression,' or in plain English the black scowl that for two long years rested on the face of Absalom,¹ and the panic of the court when the blow was struck, and Amnon was assassinated in the midst of his brethren. Not less valuable psychologically is the graphic description of Absalom's unfilial revolt (see ABSALOM, 1).

On the tragic death of the popular favourite, better thoughts came to David's people, who bethought themselves of the many occasions on which he had saved them from their enemies. The men of Judah, however, took the opportunity of putting forward that claim to precedence (2 S. 19⁴¹⁻⁴³) which the king's policy had steadily ignored, and a rupture ensued between north and south, which, but for Joab's energy, might have led to a second and more dangerous rebellion (see, however, SHEBA, ii. 1). After this nothing seems to have occurred to trouble the peace of the kingdom. David had not many more years to live, for Absalom's rebellion must have occurred near the last decade of his father's life (Kittel, Hist. 2:175). The closing scene in the biography (1 K. 1:2-11) represents David as decrepit and bedridden, and an easy prey to the partisans of Solomon. The unedifying account of the palace-intrigue (see ADONIJAH, 1), which placed Bathsheba's son upon the throne, and was followed by the execution of Adonijah and Joab, shocked the Chronicler's sense of reverence. He therefore (as also perhaps the author of a lost Midrash on which he bases his work) substitutes for it a great religious function, in which David plays the leading part, and Solomon appears as the meek recipient of much highly spiritual advice and of minute instructions as to the building of the temple (1 Ch. 22-29).

We have now to estimate the character of David.² We may safely assert that, if the narratives can in the

12. David's character. David, and that he owed this not merely to his physical but also to his moral qualities. In him the better elements of the Israelitish character start at once into a new life. There are some points in him that repel us; in these he is the child of the past. There is more in him that attracts us; in this he is a herald of the future. One of the later writers who have contributed to the story of Saul and David describes the latter as 'a man according to God's mind' (1 S. 13:14), which means, as the context interprets it, one in whom Yahweh God of Israel has found the qualities of a leader of his people (cp Jer. 3:15). That David was an honest and vigorous ruler both in peace and in war, the evidence given above sufficiently shows. In after-times his name became the symbol of a righteous rule (Jer. 23:5), and further criticism of the records has only confirmed the eulogy given to David by Robertson Smith in 1877—that his administration of justice 'was never stained by selfish considerations or motives of personal rancour.'¹ Nor does he deserve to be blamed for his cruelty to Israel's foreign enemies, when we consider the imperfect development of the idea of morality in his time, and the fate that would have been in store for himself and his people, had the conquerors and the conquered changed places. He doubtless thought it absolutely necessary to cripple Israel's cruel and malicious neighbours; to the Canaanites at his own door he was gentle.² Compare him with Sargon or Ašur-bāni-pal, in whom cruelty was joined to the lust of conquest, and how great is his moral superiority! Nor can we easily admit a doubt as to the genuineness of his religion. He lived in the fear of God, according to the standard of his times.

² The most helpful characterisation of David from a moderate traditional point of view is that of Köh. Lehrb. der bibl. Gesch. ii. 1:184-188 373 ('84). Owing to the progress of criticism, however, all the earlier sketches of David's character need a thorough revision. A bridge between the old and the new is offered in Cheyne's Aids, 15-73, where the results of recent criticism of the Books of Samuel and of the Psalter are presupposed, and all that is still tenable in the earlier estimates of David is restated. See also ISRAEL, §§ 17-22.

The generous elevation of David's character is seen most clearly in those parts of his life where an inferior nature would have been most at fault—in his conduct towards Saul (with which the story of RIZPAH is in no way inconsistent), in the blameless reputation of himself and his band of outlaws in the wilderness of Judah, in his repentance (which we so greatly desire to believe) under the rebuke of Nathan, and in his noble and truly religious bearing on the revolt of Absalom, the accuracy of the account of which is guaranteed by the antique elements which it contains. His unflinching insight into character, and his power of winning men's hearts and touching their better impulses, appear in innumerable traits of the history (e.g., 2 S. 14:18-20 33:1-39 23:15-17). His knowledge of men was the divination of a poet rather than the acquired genius of a statesman, and his capacity for rule stood in harmonious unity with his lyrical genius. But was David really a poet? Did he, like the Arabian prince Imra' al-Kais, fascinate his half-primitive people by song? The old tradition knows him as a musician (1 S. 16:14-32); late editors of the psalms, but not Amos (as most have supposed³), as a poet. Several poems, too, are ascribed to his authorship in the Books of Samuel, and those who inserted them had a very definite belief on the subject (see SAMUEL, ii. § 7). One of them—the deeply-felt elegy on Saul and Jonathan—was taken from the so-called Book of JASHAR (g.v., § 2), and another—the short elegy on Abner—may have been copied from the same book. These occur in 2 S. 1:9-27 and 3:33^{f.} respectively. They have an antique air and are worthy of David. Whether any religious elements formerly present have been removed, we cannot say; but there is no special reason to think so. That the song of triumph in 2 S. 22 (= Ps. 18) and the 'last words of David' in 23:1-7 (both highly religious compositions) are Davidic, is not, on grounds of criticism, tenable. Nor can any of the psalms in the Psalter be ascribed with any probability to David. The eager search for possible Davidic psalms seems to be a proof that the seekers have taken up the study of the Psalter at the wrong end. That David composed religious songs is of course probable enough. When he and his companions 'played before Yahwè with all their might, and with songs and with (divers musical instruments)',¹ it is reasonable to conjecture that 'some of these songs had been made for the purpose by the poet-king.'² But how much resemblance would these psalms have had to the psalms of the second temple? and how could the David known to us from history have entered into the ideas of Psalms 32 and 51, which are assigned by Delitzsch and Orelli to the sad period of David's great sin? Would not that have been one of the greatest of miracles? See PSALMS.

² The allusion is to Araunah, or rather Adonijah, as the name should probably be read. See ARAUNAH.

DAY. Among the ancients the day was reckoned in a great variety of ways. 'The Babylonians reckoned from sunrise to sunset, the Athenians from sunset to sunset, the Umbrians from noon to noon, the common people everywhere from dawn to dark, the Roman priests and those by whom the civil day has been defined, as also the Egyptians and Hipparchus, from midnight to midnight' (Plin. HN 2:79, § 188). 'From dawn to dark' (a luce ad tenebras) was the ancient and ordinary meaning of a day (יוֹם) among the Israelites; night, as being the time 'when no man can work' (Jn. 9:4), might, it was considered, be left out of account altogether, or, at all

1. Ancient reckoning. sunset to sunset, the Umbrians from noon to noon, the common people everywhere from dawn to dark, the Roman priests and those by whom the civil day has been defined, as also the Egyptians and Hipparchus, from midnight to midnight' (Plin. HN 2:79, § 188). 'From dawn to dark' (a luce ad tenebras) was the ancient and ordinary meaning of a day (יוֹם) among the Israelites; night, as being the time 'when no man can work' (Jn. 9:4), might, it was considered, be left out of account altogether, or, at all events, as being the evident complement of the 'day' and involved in it, did not require explicit mention. Thus the word 'day' came to have a twofold meaning: at one time signifying the period from sunrise to sunset; at another including day's inseparable accompaniment, the night, and embracing the whole period from one sunrise to the next. Only in cases where the contrast had to be brought out, or there was risk of ambiguity, was it necessary to name the night (לַיְלָה) expressly, as, for example, in Gen. 7:4 12 31:39. Apart from יוֹם and the combination of יוֹם and לַיְלָה, the Hebrews possessed no expression for the civil day as including day and night; for the designation בֹּקֶר 'evening morning,' which makes its first appearance in the second century B.C. (Dan. 8:14), equivalent to the Greek νυχθήμερον (2 Cor. 11:25), is but a combination precisely similar to the older יוֹם and לַיְלָה.

The Israelites regarded the morning as the beginning of the day; in the evening the day 'declined' or 'went down,' and until the new day (בֹּקֶר, 'morning') broke it was necessary to 'tarry all night' (cp. Judg. 19:6-9 and the series in Nu. 11:32, 'all that day and all the night and all the next day'). Not till post-exilic times do we find traces of a new mode of reckoning which makes day begin at sunset and continue till the sunset following. In P, it is true, the expression 'day and night' (e.g., Lev. 8:35 Nu. 9:21) is unhesitatingly used, not 'night and day,' and the evening following the fourteenth day of the first month is regarded as the evening of that day (Ex. 12:18); but Lev. 23:32 certainly reckons the day as extending from evening to evening, and the same mode of reckoning seems to have been in the mind of the writer (P) when, after describing the work of each day, he invariably adds, 'So there was evening and there was morning, a first [second, third, etc.] day' (Gen. 1:5 8 13, etc., וַיְהִי עֶרְבַּי וַיְהִי בֹקֶר יוֹם אֶחָד, שֵׁנִי, שְׁלִישִׁי, etc.). The later mode of reckoning is shown also in the above-mentioned expression in Dan. 8:14 (עֶרְבַּי בֹּקֶר), in the order of the words 'evening, morning, noon' in Ps. 55:17 [18], and in the 'night and day,' 'night or day,' of the late passages Is. 27:3 34:10 Esth. 4:16.¹ In connection with this later Jewish custom one has to remember the importance which the new moon (visible only in the evening) had for the Israelites in the determination of their feasts, and it must not be forgotten that other ancient peoples who observed lunar divisions of time (Athenians, Gauls, Germans) also began their day with evening. All the same, it is undeniably a somewhat unnatural mode of reckoning, and as far as Israel is concerned can have come into use only when it was desired to fix times with legal and uniform precision for the nation at large.

The ancient Israelites had no precise subdivision of the day for accurate measurement of time. They designated the various periods of the day by the natural changes which marked its successive stages, or by the successive occupations in ordinary daily routine. Thus it was in the nature of things that morning (בֹּקֶר), midday (אֶחְרָיִם), and evening (עֶרְבַּי) should be distinguished, and equally so that morning should be spoken of as the rising of the morning, the breaking of the day (Gen. 19:15 32:24 [25]), or the rising of the sun (Gen. 19:23 32:31 [32]); midday, the heat of the day (Gen. 18:1 1 S. 11:11) or the height of the day [EV the perfect day] (Prov. 4:18); afternoon, the time of the day's decline (Judg. 19:8); and evening, the time of the going down of the sun (Gen. 15:12 17) or of 'the wind of the day' or evening breeze (Gen. 38 Cant. 2:17 [when the day is cool] 46). Specially noticeable is the expression בֵּין הָעֶרְבַּיִם, 'between the two evenings,' met with only in

DAY

P (Ex. 126 16 12 29 39 41 308 Lev. 23 5 Nu. 9 3 5 11 28 48), which can mean only 'towards evening,' 'about the evening time,' since it is used to indicate the same period that is called in Dt. 166 the time of the going down of the sun (cp Ex. 126 Nu. 9 3 5 11). Whether the form ought to be taken as a dual, and 'the two evenings' understood as meaning 'the evening of the sun and the evening of its still visible light,' may be left an open question; but it is important to note that the evening sacrifice prescribed by the law to be made בין הערבים—i.e., towards evening (Ex. 29 39 41 Nu. 28 48)—was offered in the first century of our era in the afternoon between half-past two and half-past three (cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 43 and Mishna, Pesahim 5 1; also Acts 3 1 10 30, where the prayer associated with the evening sacrifice also is made at the ninth hour), and that only the Samaritans and Karaites maintain the old correct interpretation. The change possibly may not have taken place till after the Maccabean period; for in Daniel (9 21) the daily offering is still spoken of as קרבן ערב, 'the evening oblation,' and no place in the OT gives any hint of a change (cp on the other hand, the reminiscences of psalmody by night in the temple: 1 Ch. 9 33 23 30 Ps. 92 2 3 [3 4] 134 1; cp 119 62). By reference to functions of daily recurrence, morning is called 'the time of incense' (Lk. 1 10); the middle of the afternoon, the time of the offering of the Minha (1 K. 18 29 36); and the evening, 'the time that women go out to draw water' (Gen. 24 11), or 'the time of the evening oblation' (Dan. 9 21; cp Ezra 9 4 f.). Cp also 'cock-crowing' as denoting early morning (Mk. 14 30 72).

The OT affords no evidence that the Israelites divided their day into twelve hours as the Babylonians did.

3. The term 'hour.' The sundial (?) of Ahaz (2 K. 20 9-11 Is. 38 8), whatever it was (see DIAL), did not lead to a more accurate measurement of time on the part of the people, and even at so late a date as that of Daniel (4 16 5 5) the Aramaic word שעה ('hour') does not mean any exact portion of time. Reckoning by hours is met with first in the NT, where the day consists of twelve hours (Jn. 11 9) or twelfths simply designated as first [second, etc.] of the day, reckoned as beginning at sunrise (cp Acts 2 15 Mt. 20 3 5 6 27 45 46 etc.). The hour was thus with the Jews a variable quantity, as it was also with the Babylonians, the twelfth part of the day ranging from forty-nine to seventy-one minutes according to the season of the year. The division of the day into twelve parts and the further development of the sexagesimal system as a whole had commended itself to the Babylonians from their observation that, at the vernal equinox, the time between the appearance of the first direct ray of the sun and that of visibility of the entire disk above the horizon amounted to a 360th of the whole time during which the sun was visible in the heavens, or the 720th part of a full day reckoned from one sunrise to another.

Equal divisions of the night were of older date than equal divisions of the day. Three night-watches were recognised: the first (ראש השחר); Lam.

4. Night-watches. 2 19, the middle (השני); Judg. 7 19; within which, of course, midnight fell, Ex. 11 4 and the last (השלישית); Ex. 14 24 1 S. 11 11). From the NT we learn that, in the first century of our era at least, the Roman division into four watches had in common use superseded the old division into three (Mk. 13 35 ὡς, μεσονύκτιον, ἀλεκτοροφωνία [s] and πρωί; Mt. 14 25 Mk. 6 48 Lk. 12 38, cp Acts 12 4). From the division of the day into twelve hours the step to a similar division of the night was easy (so, certainly, in Acts 23 23; cp also Acts 16 33 Lk. 12 39 and, for the last-cited passage, see the parallel in Mt. 24 43 which speaks of 'watch,' not 'hour').

'Day' is sometimes used in a half-metaphorical sense. Thus in Hos. 2 15 7 5 it means 'high day'; in Job 3 1 'birth-day'; in Jer. 50 27 Job 18 20 15 23 Ps. 87 13, etc., 'day of doom'; in Is. 9 3 [4] 'day of battle.' On the expression 'day of Yahweh' (Joel

DEACON AND DEACONESS (ΔΙΑΚΟΝΟC)

1. The Word.—We may consider first the use of the word and of its cognates.

In the Gospels the word διάκονος is used (1) literally, of a servant who prepares or serves a meal, Mt. 22 13 Jn. 2 5 9; (2) metaphorically (Mk. 9 35 10 43 || Mt. 23 11 20 26, Jn. 12 26). It is never used by Lk. who,

1. Usage in Gospels. in what seems a parallel to sayings in Mk., prefers the participle ὁ διακονῶν (22 26 f.); in one place (10 40), however, he uses διακονία of the preparation of a meal. The verb (διακονεῖν) is likewise used (1) literally, of preparing or supplying food (Mk. 1 13 || Mt. 4 11 of the angels; 1 31 || Mt. Lk.), Lk. 10 40 12 37 17 8 Jn. 12 2 Mt. 25 44 (rather more widely); and again somewhat more widely (Mk. 15 41 || Mt. 27 55 Lk. 8 3) of the women who ministered to Jesus in his journeyings in Galilee; (2) metaphorically (Lk. 22 26 f.; Jn. 12 26).

The ordinary word for a servant in the Gospels is δούλος, a bond-servant or slave; but a δούλος may be called upon to διακονεῖν (Lk. 17 7 f.), and in discharge of this function may be termed διάκονος (Mt. 22 8 10 12). Δούλος emphasises relation to a master; διάκονος, performance of service. The latter word is free from the associations of slavery which belong to the former. It was thus fitted for adoption as the description of any form of Christian service rendered to Christ or to his Church.

Accordingly in Acts we find διακονία frequently in this sense: Acts 1 17 25, the διακονία of apostleship; 6 1, the daily διακονία by which the needs of the poorer brethren were

2. In Acts. supplied; and, in contrast to this, the διακονία of the word (6 4). In 11 29 and 12 25 διακονία is used of the help in the famine rendered by Antioch to the brethren in Judaea (a sense which recurs in Paul's epistles). In 20 24 Paul speaks more generally of fulfilling the διακονία which he has received of the Lord Jesus; and in 21 19 he declares what God has wrought among the Gentiles through his διακονία. The word διάκονος does not occur at all in Acts (as it does not in Lk.); but διακονεῖν is used in a literal sense in 6 2 of serving the tables; and metaphorically of Timothy and Erastus, who 'ministered' to Paul (19 22).

In the first of the four chronological groups of the Pauline epistles, the only instance of the word or its cognates is 1 Thess.

3. In Epistles. 3 2, where Timothy is called 'the διάκονος of Christ.' [or συνεργός, BD arm.*] of God in the gospel of Christ. In the second group the words are freely used. Paul and Apollos are 'διάκονοι through whom ye believed' (1 Cor. 3 5). 'Differences of διακονία' are spoken of in 12 5; and of the household of Stephanas the remarkable phrase is used, 'they appointed (or 'set') themselves unto διακονία to the saints' (16 15). This passage alone would show that the words were not yet limited to an official use. In 2 Cor. the most noteworthy passages are 8 4 19 20 9 1 12 13, where the words are applied to the collection in the Greek churches for the poor saints in Jerusalem, a service on which Paul laid the greatest stress as being a means of cementing the union between the Jewish and the Gentile portions of the Church. The Epistle to the Romans (15 25 31) shows us his anxiety on this matter, and his fixed resolve to carry out his project in person at any risk to liberty or life. Here again, then, διακονεῖν and διακονία are used of the ministrations to temporal needs. In the same epistle (11 13) occur the notable words 'I glorify my διακονία (as apostle of the Gentiles); and the wide range with which he uses the term is seen when he speaks of the temporal ruler as 'the διάκονος of God' (13 4). The application of the word to Phœbe of Cenchreæ (16 1) will be considered presently (§ 4).

In the third group Paul himself is twice styled a 'διάκονος of the gospel' (Eph. 3 7 Col. 1 23), and once 'a διάκονος of the church' (Col. 1 24 f.). Tychicus is twice described as 'the beloved brother and faithful διάκονος in the Lord' (Eph. 6 21 Col. 4 7; in the latter place the description 'fellow-servant'

DEACON AND DEACONESS

also is inserted); similarly, 'Epaphras, who is a faithful διάκονος, on our behalf, of Christ' (Col. 1.7). 'The work of διακονία is referred to in the widest sense in Eph. 4.12; and in Col. 4.17 Archippus receives the message: 'Look to the διακονία which thou hast received in the Lord, that thou mayest fulfil it.' In Philemon Paul says of Onesimus the runaway slave, 'that on thy behalf he may minister to me' (διακονῇ, v. 13). In Philippians the only instance is of special importance; for the epistle is addressed 'to all the saints . . . in Philippi, together with ἐπίσκοποι and διάκονοι' (1.1).

The fourth group consists of the Pastoral Epistles; and here the general sense of the words is still the most frequent. The apostle thanks God (1 Tim. 1.12) for having appointed him unto διακονία. Timothy is to be a good διάκονος of Christ Jesus (4.5), and is charged to fulfil his διακονία (2 Tim. 4.5). Of Onesiphorus the apostle recalls how he 'ministered' in Ephesus (1.18); and of Mark he says, 'he is useful to me for διακονία' (4.11). On the other hand, the passage of most importance for our purpose is the code of regulations laid down in 1 Tim. 3.8-13 for a class of persons who are definitely designated διάκονοι.

Before considering these regulations we may return to Rom. 16.1, 'I commend to you Phœbe our sister, who is [also] διάκονος of the church which is in Cenchreae.' It is possible to interpret the word here either in the general sense in which Paul uses it so often, or in the official sense which we find in the later epistles to the Philippians and to Timothy. It is no objection to the official sense that the person so designated is a woman; for we shall presently see that at Ephesus the Order included deacons of either sex.

4. Case of Phœbe.

On the other hand, since there is not in the two earlier groups of Paul's epistles any other indication that διακονία is a special office in the Church, this, which occurs in the second group, would be a solitary and somewhat puzzling exception. Moreover, as Cenchreae was the E. port of Corinth, this case practically belongs to the Corinthian church. In that church special mention is made of the διακονία of Stephanas and his household, the word διακονία being used in its broadest sense. There also Chloe and her household were of note. It may be, therefore, that Phœbe was another woman of influence who held a corresponding pre-eminence of service in the neighbouring port, a pre-eminence that earned for her at the apostle's hands the honourable title of διάκονος of the church; for she had been a helper (perhaps we should render it 'a patroness,' προστάτης) of many and of the apostle himself. If we could assume that the diaconate was formally established in the Corinthian church at this time, we should certainly conclude that Phœbe was one of the women who served it; but this assumption is in sharp contrast with the silence of Paul's epistles as to any kind of definite ecclesiastical organisation at Corinth.

Of Phœbe, then, we may say with security that she is a witness to the important services rendered by women in the primitive Church; but in tracing the history of the diaconate it will not be wise to assume that the word διάκονος is used of her in the strictly official sense. As a matter of historical evidence this passage must be left out of the count as being, at any rate, uncertain testimony. For a technical diaconate in Paul's writings we are thus reduced to two passages, Phil. 1.1 and 1 Tim. 3.8-13.

II. Origin and functions of the Diaconate.—The first recognition of any need of organisation in the Christian community occurs in connection with the daily meal in Jerusalem (see CHURCH, Diaconate, § 11). The word deacon is not applied in Acts to the seven men who were on this occasion appointed to the service of the poor;¹ we have already noted that διάκονος does not occur in Lk. or Acts. Nevertheless, by the later Church tradition, they were constantly regarded as the earliest deacons; and so strong was this feeling that the number of deacons in some churches was limited to seven. Names apart, they truly represented the essential feature of the diaconate, as the Church's organ for service to her poorer members. In other communities, especially in the Greek world, this service was destined to take a different form; but the deacons of the Pauline epistles at Philippi and Ephesus had a similar function, though the circumstances in which they discharged it were very dissimilar. The definite title is met with first in the Greek churches, and here the order from its commencement is found to include the services of men and women alike. The admission of women to the diaconate could scarcely have arisen in the Jewish communities; but it was probably felt to be natural in places where women were in general accorded a larger liberty. Whilst then we recognise the germ of the institution in the appointment of the Seven in Jerusalem, we must look to the Greek churches for the development of the definite and permanent order.

As the personal ministry of Paul drew to a close, and as it became evident that the 'return' of Christ was indefinitely postponed, it was natural that ecclesiastical organisation should assume a new and increasing importance. It is in harmony with this that we find the apostle in a later epistle recognising expressly 'the bishops and deacons' at Philippi, very much as he had recognised the 'episcopate' of the presbyters of Ephesus, when he thought that he should see them again no more (Acts 20.28). 'Those who ruled,' and 'those who served' under them, were coming to form definite classes, to which the natural designations of overseers (ἐπίσκοποι) and servants (διάκονοι) were beginning to be formally appropriated. Accordingly, in the first epistle to Timothy the apostle lays down regulations for the two classes under these titles. The differences in the regulations help to show us the nature of the functions to be discharged in the two cases (1 Tim. 3.1-13). The rules which should govern the choice of deacons must be cited in full:—

'Deacons in like manner must be grave, not double-tongued, not given to much wine, not eager for petty gains, holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience. And they too are first to be tested, and then to minister, if they be irreproachable. Women in like manner must be grave, not slanderers, sober, faithful in all things. Deacons are to be husbands of one wife, ruling well their children and their own houses; for they that have ministered well acquire a good standing for themselves and much boldness in the faith which is in Christ Jesus.'

The essence of these regulations is that deacons, whether men or women, must be persons of character, who can rule their tongues and are temperate in the use of wine. Trustworthiness is demanded of the woman, as strict honesty is of the man: this doubtless points to the fact that Church moneys would pass through their hands. Deacons are to know what they believe, and to live in accordance with it; but no aptitude for teaching is demanded of them, nor any qualifications for exercising discipline. The service of the deacons is the house to house service, which deals primarily with temporal wants.

In the AV the women spoken of here are represented as the wives of the deacons. This interpretation puts a serious strain on the original Greek, and it is now generally abandoned. It finds no parallel in any demand for special qualifications in the wives of bishops. It belongs to a period when the diaconate of women had been wholly lost sight of; and it cannot be maintained in face of the fact that women were undoubtedly admitted to this office in the early ages of the Church's history.

For the later confusion between deaconesses and widows see WIDOW; and for a full historical account of the female diaconate see The Ministry of Deaconesses by Deaconess Cecilia Robinson (98). J. A. R.

DEAD, THE, and DEATH. The preliminaries may first be briefly considered. To kiss the dead (Gen.

50.1) and to close their eyes (Gen. 46.4) and mouth (Mishna, Shab. 23.5) immediately after death was looked upon as a deed of natural piety. In NT times the body was washed (Acts 9.37), anointed with sweet-smelling ointments (Mk. 16.1; Lk. 24.1; Jn. 12.7), and wrapped in linen cloth (Mt. 27.59; Mk. 15.46; Lk. 23.53), or the hands and feet were bound with grave-clothes and the head covered with a napkin (Jn. 11.44). The age of these customs must remain uncertain, as they are not alluded to in OT; but the old belief that in Shēōl the dead would be known by their dress, the king by his diadem, the soldier by his sword, the prophet by his mantle (1 S. 28.14; Ezek. 32.27), leads to the inference that the dead were buried dressed as in life. In later times, delicate foods, ornaments, gold and silver, and all kinds of valuables were placed with the body in the graves of princes and nobles¹ (Jos. Ant. xv. 34). If what we read (Jos. Ant. xiii. 84 xvi. 71) as to the plundering of David's grave by Hyrcanus and Herod is to be accepted, this custom also is very old. EMBALMING [q.v.] was not in use. On sacrifices to the dead, cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 3.

The usual method of disposing of the dead was by burial (Gen. 23:9 25:9 35:8 Judg. 2:9 8:32 etc.). In 1 S. 31:13, where we read of the burning of the body of Saul, the text is corrupt (see Klost. ad loc.), as is also the case with Am. 6:10.² Burning was looked upon as something abominable, as an injury to the dead (Am. 2:1); it was used, by priestly law and old custom, only in a few cases, to render the death sentence more severe (Josh. 7:25 Lev. 20:14 21:9); cp LAW AND JUSTICE, § 12. The aversion to the burning of the body was connected with the belief that the soul even after death was bound to the body. Not to be buried was a terrible disgrace which one could hardly wish even to one's greatest enemy (Am. 2:1 1 K. 13:22 14:11 16:4 21:24 2 K. 9:10 Is. 33:12 Jer. 7:32 8:2 9:22 [21] 14:16 16:4 Ezek. 29:5). The spirits of the unburied dead wander restlessly about, and in Shēōl are condemned to lie in the corners (Ezek. 32:23 Is. 14:15 etc.). Burial alone so bound the spirit to the body that it had rest and could harm no one. It was therefore the sacred duty of every one who found a corpse in the open field to give it burial (1 K. 14:11 16:4 21:24 Jer. 7:33 2 S. 21:10, and especially Tob. 1:8 28). In cases of death by stoning the pile of stones took the place of a regular grave (Josh. 7:26). Cp the Greek idea as given, for example, in the Antigone of Sophocles.

Rapid interment was necessary on account of the hot climate, and even without express biblical authority we may assume that then, as now, in the East, it usually took place on the day of death (cp Dt. 21 23). The body was carried to the grave on a bier (2 S. 3 31 [מָרָא]; Lk. 7 14 [σώψis]). Coffins were not used by the Israelites (2 K. 13 21); Joseph's bones were placed in a coffin (יִרְמָ; σόψis) in conformity with the custom of the Egyptians (Gen. 50 26).³ The stone coffin (sarcophagus)⁴ was adopted by the Jews (as also by the Phœnicians) from the Egyptians long after the exile, but only by the wealthy. The procession of friends, who would of course often be mourners,⁵ was accompanied by hired mourners singing lamentations (2 S. 3 31; cp MOURNING CUSTOMS).⁶ The place of burial was determined by the belief that the unity of the family and tribe continued after death. The bodies of those who wished to be reunited with their parents and family in Shēōl had to be buried in the family sepulchre (see TOMBS. ESCHATOLOGY).

'Death' (מָוֶת, ΘΑΝΑΤΟΣ) can mean, not only the process or state of death, but also the realm of the dead, 'Death-land'. See Is 28:17, Hos 13:14.

Both are personifications; cp the later Jewish representations of ABADDON [g.v.] and Maweth ('Death') as two of God's chief angels (cp DESTROYER). DEAD SEA. THE [11] Prov. 218 918 2116 Is. 149 261419; inconsistently Job 265, 'dead things'). RV sometimes has 'they that are deceased' (e.g., Job 265); in mg. always 'the shades': Heb. Rephaim.'

We will examine the above passages, beginning with :
(a) Job 26 5, of which Schultens remarks, 'Subita nox diem solemque adimit.' RV, and virtually Davidson, render thus—

They that are deceased tremble

Beneath the waters and the inhabitants thereof.

Davidson comments, 'This abode of deceased persons lies deep down under the waters of the sea and all the inhabitants of these waters, for the sea belongs to the upper world. Yet the power of God is felt even at this immeasurable distance from his abode on high.' To us this may appear natural; but to those who believed that the 'shades' were 'forgotten by God' (Ps. 88 5[6]), it would scarcely appear so. The Hebrew of 20 5 is also not worthy of the context. Probably we should read (Exp. Times, 10 382 [May '90]):

He makes the sea and its billows to start (in alarm),
He terrifies the waters and the floods thereof.¹

(b) In Ps. 88 10 [11] the shades are represented as incapable of 'arising and praising God.' In 'arise' Kirkpatrick sees a reference to the resurrection, an idea which the psalmist finds inconceivable. (c) Prov. 2 18, 'no return from the shades.' (d) Prov. 9 18. Those who frequent the house of Madam Folly (v. 13) are, as it were, shades already (anticipating Dante). (e) Prov. 21 16. Folly leads surely to the shades. (f) Is. 14. When the overthrown king of Babylon appears in Sheol, the shades themselves, especially the royal shades, are in excitement. Some tidings of his greatness have reached them, and they marvel to see one who had claimed to sit with the gods reduced to their own miserable state. The poet takes some liberty with the popular belief, or else revives an earlier form of it. In the legend of Istar, Is. 29 we read, 'I will raise up the dead to eat the living.'² (g) Is. 26 14 19. 'The shades will not rise . . . to life shall the earth bring the shades' (SBOT). The resurrection hope. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 28 ff.

Böttcher (De inferis, § 112 ff.) derives the word Rephā'im (רפאים) from רפה, projicere. The giants are

3. Origin of term

Rephā'im. the whole population. Duhm (on Is. 149 and Job 265) holds the same view as to the transference of the title Rephā'im from the giants to all other inhabitants of Deathland. This theory mistakes the meaning of the Rephā'im of Genesis, Numbers, Deuteronomy, and gives a doubtful meaning to רִפְּהִיִּם. It also assumes as correct a passage (Job 265) which is certainly corrupt. It is an old view revived (see Schultens on Job, 1737, p. 705). Most critics, however, hold that Rephā'im = 'the flaccid, weak,' a natural development of רִפְּהִי (cp Jer. 624 etc.). 'Art thou also become weak (רִפְּהִי) as we?' ask the shades (Is. 14 10, RV). But this is far too easy, and the Hebrews would hardly have spoken of the spirits of the dead as 'the weak ones.' 'I see a god coming up out of the earth,' says the wise woman to Saul (1 S. 28 13 RV). The word ought to mean 'the terrible,' or 'the wise,' or the like. In the later OT books the condition of those in Shēōl is portrayed in very gloomy colours; but these books do not express the primitive popular belief. No doubt Rephā'im is a mutilated or modified form of some primitive religious term. A sister-form is most probably TERAPHIM [q.v.]. Cp Sayce, Hibbert Lects. 450, n. 5.

DEAD SEA, THE, the usual designation of the lake in which the course of the Jordan terminates, occurs

1. Names. nowhere in OT or NT though it was not uncommon in antiquity (θάλασσα νεκρά; Paus. v. 73; Galen 420; Justin xxxvi. 36; Eus. OS 261₃₂), and is found in Vg. of Josh. 3:16* (mare solitudinis quod nunc vocatur mortuum).

In the OT this lake is occasionally called simply 'the sea.' (יָם, four times, and in the expression 'from sea to sea'); also 'the Salt sea' (יָם הַמֶּלַח יָם, nine times; ἡ θάλασσα τῶν ἁλῶν [ἁλός, ἡ ἁλυκή], mare salis, u. salissimum); 'the sea of the plain,' RV 'sea of the Arabah' (יָם הַעֲרָבִית, five times; [ἡ] θάλασσα [τῆς] Ἀραβίᾱ; mare solitudinis, u. deserti); in the three places where both designations are employed 'Salt sea' is used to explain the expression 'sea of the Arabah'; and, in three places, 'the eastern [east, former] sea' (יַם הַיְּמָנִי: hā yāmāssā ή προς ανατολὰς Φοινικῶνος, ή θ. ή πρώτη; mare orientale).¹ In Diod. Sic. (2.48 1998) and in Josephus (often: see especially B./iv. 8.4) it is Ἀσφαλτίτης λίμνη; so also in Pliny (lacus Asphaltites; HN v. 15.15). Josephus also has ή Σοδομῖτις λίμνη (Ant. v. 122); cp 'the Sodomitic sea' (mare Sodomiticum) of 4 Esd. 5.7. This name occurs also in Edrisi (85, transl. Jaubert, 1338), who calls it the sea of Sodom and Gomorrah and the sea of Za'rah (Zoar). Its name in Arabic (at least since the eleventh century) is Bahr (or Buheirat) Lūt; but this does not prove the name of Lot to have remained attached to the sea in local tradition for four thousand years. It arises simply from the fact that Lot and the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah are mentioned in the Koran.

From the biblical point of view the Dead Sea is not very important. The references to it in the OT occur generally in topographical connections, especially in definitions of the eastern frontier of the land of Israel. There are two notable exceptions: (a) where it comes into the story of the Cities of the Plain, and (b) where it is referred to in the prophetic descriptions of Ezek. 47 and Zech. 14.8. The NT does not refer to it at all.

From the geographical point of view it is otherwise: the interest of this lake is quite extraordinary.

2. Geographical interest. The Jordan valley, running from N. to S., begins to sink below sea-level as far N. as a little below Lake Hūleh; the Lake of Galilee is some 680 feet lower, and thence the 'Arābah or Ghōr continues to fall till the surface of the Dead Sea is reached at a distance below the sea of some 1300² feet. At the opposite extremity of this lake ends another valley, coming from the S., formerly called the ARABAH [q.v.]. Thus the lake constitutes the deepest portion of what is the most strongly marked depression (unconnected with the sea) on the surface of the globe.³ It has no effluent. Should the question be asked, whether in former times the Jordan, after passing through the Dead Sea, may not have flowed on southward falling at last into the Red Sea (Elanite Gulf or Gulf of 'Akabah), it may suffice to point out how much below sea-level the Dead Sea is, and further, that the valley to the S. of the Dead Sea is really two valleys. One runs N., the other S., and the intersection or watershed is at a height of 650 feet above the level of the Red Sea and of the Mediterranean (according to the PEF survey).⁴ Thus the two basins are hydrographically distinct, which is confirmed by a stratigraphical study of the sedimentary deposits on the valley floor (Lartet).

The geological investigation of Palestine and of the Dead Sea, carried on mainly by Fraas, Lartet, Hull,

3. Geological investigation. and Blanckenhorn, has proved, contrary to previous ideas, that the Dead Sea cannot possibly date from the historical epoch, and that it must have presented, at any rate from the beginning of the quaternary epoch, practically the same aspect and configuration as at present. Traces can still be seen, however, of a past time when the water stood as much as 1180 feet above its present level, as well as of another phase in which the difference was only 348 feet; in short, the waters have gradually subsided to their present position.

The actual level is that at which the evaporation exactly counterbalances the daily influx of water from the Jordan and the other affluents. Of these last, the chief, including certain winter torrents, are: (a) on the eastern side, reckoning from N. to S., the Wady Ghuweir, the Wadys Zerkā-Ma'in (Callirhoe)-Mōjib (Arnon), Beni-Hamād, ed-Derā'a (Kerak), Numēreh, el-Ahsā (or es-Sāfiyeh); (b) on the S., the Wadys Tūfīleh, el-Jēib, el-Fikreh (these three traverse a marshy plain, the Sebkhah, which stretches immediately southwards from the Dead Sea and is bordered by gigantic thickets of reeds); (c) on the western side, going from S. to N., the Wady el-Muhāwāt, the Wady Seyāl (to the S. of which lies Sebbhe, the ancient fortress of Masada), the spring of 'Ain-Jedy (Engedi), the Wady en-Nār (Kedron), and the spring of 'Ain el-Feshkhah (cp BETH-ARABAH), to the S. of which is the headland known as Rās el-Feshkhah.

The amount of daily evaporation¹ has been estimated at 13½ millimetres, and the daily contribution of the Jordan alone at 6,000,000 tons (the volume of the Rhone at its influx into the Lake of Geneva is 22,000,000 tons). Another feature of it is its great density, which arises from its salinity (the mean is 1.166). At a depth of 1000 feet the solid matters contained in the water represent 27 per cent of the total weight. These substances are mainly chlorides of sodium, magnesium, and calcium, also certain derivatives of bromium. The chloride of magnesium gives the water a very disagreeable taste; the chloride of calcium gives it its slightly oily consistency. The eyes, and some assert also the skin, are powerfully affected by contact with it. Garments receive from the evaporating water a saline deposit, with indelible spots of an oily appearance. The salt encrusts also the many trees and pieces of wood which lie stranded on the shore; so much so that they form a characteristic feature of the landscape, and recall the striking antithesis in Jer. 17.5-8.

A bath in the Dead Sea at once proves its difference in density from other seas or from fresh-water lakes.

4. Characteristic features. Eggs float on it. The human body being lighter than the water, swimming becomes difficult, the head alone of the swimmer tending to sink. The boiling point of the water is 221° F. It is remarkably limpid, and has a beautiful colour, now blue, now green. To think of this lake as sombre and sad is quite an illusion; its intense colouring, its varied effects of light, its scarped overhanging slopes broken by deep gorges, produce a picture of wild and sublime beauty. 'The scenery round the sea is very fine,' says Conder; 'it is compared, by those who have seen both, to that of the Lake of Geneva.' The present writer, whose home is in Geneva, agrees with this comparison, it being understood that it is between the northern portion of the Dead Sea and the eastern end of the Lake of Geneva towards the embouchure of the Rhone. Another common error about the Dead Sea is that its waters have no motion; on the contrary, it is constantly agitated by the winds, and storms sometimes drive huge billows to the shore. It does not owe its name to this imagined immobility, but rather to the fact that no sort of living creature—fish, crustacean, mollusc, etc.—can subsist in its waters, the only exceptions being certain inferior organisms and microbes, as shown by the investigations of Ehrenberg and of the zoologist Lortet (not to be confused with the geologist Lartet). This fact—which is conclusively proved by the death not only of the fish carried down into it by the Jordan (their bodies serve as food for numerous birds which frequent the neighbourhood), but also of salt-water fishes—has given rise to various incorrect ideas. Thus it has been said that birds attempting to fly over it drop down dead; this is a mere imagination—a fable which, like a host of earlier witnesses, the present writer is able to contradict from ocular testimony—or perhaps it may be the result of a confusion with some other lake (see Reland, 244 ff.). It is equally false to say that the shores of the Dead Sea derive their barrenness from the pernicious action of its waters. What hinders the growth of plants in its vicinity is not the presence of the lake itself, but the absence of fresh water whether from affluents or by precipitation. Wherever there is fresh

DEAD SEA, THE

running water, as at Engedi, where there is a thermal spring (79° F.), vegetation flourishes (cp Cant. 1.14) and, as elsewhere throughout the Ghôr, exhibits a combination of tropical plants with others belonging to the Mediterranean region. Finally, the scant population of its shores is to be accounted for more by the torrid temperature (above 100° F. in the shade) than by any infertility or positive insalubrity.

In fact, the lake has not always been so deserted: witness, for example, the town of TAMAR at the SW. extremity. Even the shores of the Sea of Galilee have gradually come to be wholly abandoned except in three or four localities. The shores of the Dead Sea too had once a very different aspect. Both in antiquity (we learn this from Tac. Hist. 5.6 and also from the Madaba mosaic) and so recently as the time of the Crusades when Kerak and other fortresses had such an important position, the waters of the Dead Sea were enlivened with passing vessels. Nor were the curative qualities of the water of the Dead Sea unknown in the Roman period. Julius Africanus speaks of these baths as wholesome (Reland, 253 f.), as also does Galen (ib. 241 f.), who (wrongly) adds that an artificial substitute could be obtained by the simple expedient of saturating ordinary sea water with added salt. Mention is often made of the mephitic odour exhaled by the Dead Sea (see NIBSHAN); but it has not been shown that the lake itself is the cause of this. It may be occasioned either by the marshy lagoons by which the lake is bordered, or by the mineral springs of the neighbourhood. The sulphurous odour, which reminds one of that of rotten eggs, is particularly noticeable near 'Ain el-Feshkhah.

The lake, as we have seen, lies N. and S., with a maximum length of 47½ m., a maximum breadth of 10 m. (Josephus gives 66 and 17 m.

5. Dimensions. respectively) and a superficial area of 360 sq. m. (the Lake of Geneva being 224 sq. m.). It is divided into two unequal portions by a peninsula, 11-12 m. in length and about 40-80 ft. above the level of the lake, flat for the most part, but with a range of hills rising 300 ft. This peninsula, formed of white calcareous marl, with deposits of salt and gypsum, projects from the E. shore; it is separated from the W. shore by a channel about 3 m. in breadth. The name of the peninsula is el-Mezra'ah or el-Lisân; the last designation, meaning 'the tongue', has been brought into connection with the mention of the לִשָּׁן (EV 'the bay [mg. : 'Heb. tongue'] that looketh southward') in Josh. 15.5; but whilst the modern Arabic term is applied to the land in the middle of the lake, the two biblical passages refer to the water at the two ends of the lake (cp Is. 11.15; 'the tongue of the Egyptian sea').

The N. promontory of the Lisân has been named Cape Costigan and the S. Cape Molyneux in honour of two bold explorers who navigated the Dead Sea in 1835 and 1847 respectively. We ought also to mention the expeditions of Moore and Beek in 1837 and of Symonds in 1841, and especially that of Lieut. Lynch of the U.S. navy in 1848 and that of the Duc de Luynes in 1864, both of which were of great importance.¹

The portion of the Dead Sea to the N. of the Lisân is much the larger, and reaches a great depth (1278 ft.). The S. smaller portion is quite shallow (10-18 ft.), and in parts even fordable. Possibly this portion is of less ancient date than the rest of the lake, and may have arisen within historic times in consequence of some subsidence of the land. The shores immediately bordering on this section are the most saline of the whole country. There are salt marshes in the neighbourhood, and it is there that, running parallel with the W. shore, the curious ridge of rock salt, a veritable hors d'œuvre as Lartet (p. 87) picturesquely calls it, occurs. It is called Jebel Usdum or Hajar-Usdum or Khasm-Usdum,—thus echoing the name of Sodom,—and rises to a height of 600 ft., with a length of 3½ m. and a breadth of over half a mile. In its immediate vicinity can be seen, occasionally at least, detached pillars of salt, suggesting some resemblance to a rudimentary colossal statue.

Another peculiarity is the presence of asphalt in the Dead Sea basin (see BITUMEN), whence the Greek name of Asphaltitis (cp Tac. Hist. 5.6; Str.

6. Its asphalt. 16.2.42; Dioscor. 1.99; Diod. Sic. 19.28).

¹ Since 1893 rowing boats, sailing boats, and, more recently, even steam launches have occasionally been at the service of travellers.

Near the lake are found beds of a whitish chalky marl¹ and also of bituminous marl. It is not, however, from these deposits on its shores that the water of the Dead Sea derives its bituminous constituents, but rather, no doubt, from deep subaqueous beds; there has been observed a marked coincidence between the appearance of considerable bituminous masses floating on the surface and the occurrence of the earthquakes which at intervals desolate the whole of that region. When these take place quantities of bitumen are broken loose and come to the surface; the natives are diligent in collecting them, but hitherto no methodical exploitation of these mineral resources on a commercial basis has been attempted. The existence of bituminous constituents in small quantity in the water can always be shown.

Notwithstanding the presence of this bitumen, of sulphur springs, and of masses of sulphur which are met with here and there, as also of certain igneous formations, the region of the Dead Sea must not be included in the category of volcanic territories properly so called. On the contrary, in opposition to the assertions of certain travellers too richly endowed with imagination (e.g., Russeger and van de Velde), the very competent geologists already named agree in doubting whether any large part in the formation of this region ought to be attributed to igneous forces.¹

The cretaceous beds rise in regular stages on the W. bank from the margin of the lake. On the other shore the arrangement is no less regular; but under the cretaceous beds there are carboniferous strata and beneath these are other formations still more ancient. At the most it may be admitted that certain volcanic agitations have made themselves felt in the depths of the lake. Blanckenhorn (ZDPV, 1896, p. 59) recalls and attaches importance to an observation made by Molyneux and quoted by Ritter (705 f.) relating to a whitish belt of foam stretching from the NW. of the lake towards the Lisân and following on the whole the median line of the lake, above which a whitish vapour lingered in the air. From this phenomenon, supported by certain other indications, he concludes the existence of a fault in the floor of the lake which is prolonged in the channel skirting the Lisân and terminates in the S. portion of the lake near the embouchure of the W. Muhauwat. On 12th March of this year (1899) the author of this article witnessed the same phenomenon as that seen by Molyneux in 1847.

In a general way we might describe the geological formation of the Jordan valley and Dead Sea basin by the technical expression effondrement.

7. The story The phenomenon occurred at the time of in Gen. 19. the transition from the tertiary to the quaternary epoch. It is not possible, therefore, to establish any relation between the formation of the Dead Sea as a whole and the catastrophe described in Gen. 19. At most that narrative might possibly admit of being connected with certain events of a more local character and of secondary importance, which might have occurred within historic times (see LOT, SIDDIM, SODOM).

As we have not to deal with the historical side of the question, but with the geographical only, it will suffice to say (a) that the text of Genesis speaks of a rain of fire and brimstone and a pillar of smoke rising to heaven, but neither of an earthquake, nor of an igneous eruption, nor of an inundation; (b) that there is nothing to show that the cities of the Pentapolis were in the plain of Siddim; (c) that the remark in Gen. 14.3 'the plain of Siddim which is the Salt Sea' may be a conjecture of the narrator or even the gloss of a copyist or late reader; (d) that account must be taken of the mention of the kikkâr of Jordan (Gen. 13.10-12 19.17 25.28 29); (e) that possibly a distinction must be made between the actual position of the Pentapolis and the position assigned to it by later writers, inasmuch as these entertained perhaps divergent opinions as to this point; (f) that the position of Zoar is as problematical as that of the other four cities; finally (g) that scholars are divided into two camps—those who place the Pentapolis in the N. of the Dead Sea, and those who place it in the S.

In complete contrast with its sombre narratives regarding these doomed cities, the OT, in two prophetic passages of Ezekiel and Zechariah already cited, describes the transformation of the waste and barren regions of the Dead Sea by a life-giving stream issuing from the temple, fertilising all that it touches so that fish and fruit-bearing trees abound.

DEBORA, RV Deborah (ΔΕΒΒΩΡΑ [BN], ΔΕΜΒΩΡΑ [A]), the grandmother of Tobit (Tob. 18).

DEBORAH (דְּבִרָה, 'a bee,' § 68; cp WRS in Journ. Phil. 14 [85] 120 f.; ΔΕΒΒΩΡΑ [BAL]). 1. A heroine who, with the aid of Barak, delivered the Israelites from their Canaanite oppressors. The victory is celebrated in the triumphal ode, Judg. 5. The Israelites, particularly the tribes which had settled about the plain of Jezreel, had been reduced to great straits by the Canaanites, who, holding the fortified cities along the plain (Judg. 1.27), blockaded the main roads and cut off communication, while from their strongholds they harried the country so that the unwallled villages were deserted (56 f.). Incited by Deborah, the Israelites at last took up arms against their oppressors. Under Barak as their leader, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh united with Issachar, Zebulun, and Naphtali, and gave battle to Sisera and the confederate Canaanite kings in the plain not far from Taanach and Megiddo. The Canaanites, notwithstanding their formidable iron chariots, were put to rout; the waters of the Kishon completed their ruin. Sisera, seeking refuge in flight at a nomad's tent, was killed by a woman, Jael.

The history of the struggle is related somewhat differently in chap. 4,² according to which Barak, at the summons of Deborah, raised ten thousand men of the tribes of Zebulun and Naphtali, occupied Mt. Tabor, and from that position attacked Sisera as the latter was advancing against him. A more serious difference is that in chap. 4 the oppressor of Israel, from whom it is delivered by Deborah, is Jabin king of Hazor, a city in Upper Galilee; whilst Sisera is only Jabin's general. In the action, however, Jabin plays no part; and we can only surmise that the story of Sisera has, by mistake, been connected with a tradition of a conflict between some of the northern tribes and the king of Hazor (cp also Josh. 11).

² On the relation of chaps. 4 and 5 in general, see JUDGES, § 7.

From chap. 4 we learn that Deborah was a prophetess—an inspired woman; that her husband's name was Lappidoth; and that her home was between Bethel and Ramah, whither the Israelites resorted to her for judgment. Chap. 5.15, however, seems to prove that she was of the tribe of Issachar; and other considerations would incline us to think that she lived in or near the plain of Jezreel. (For a conjecture on this subject see DABERATH.) That her home was in Mt. Ephraim may have been inferred by the author of 4.5 (an editorial addition to the narrative) from the existence of a tomb of Deborah under a tree below Bethel, where, according to the patriarchal legend (see below, no. 2), the nurse of Rebekah was buried (Gen. 35.8).

Barak, who shares with Deborah the glory of the victory, was from Kedesh in Naphtali (46). This city is somewhat remote, and in the account of

2. Barak. Sisera's flight seems impossible. It has been conjectured by Wellhausen (CH 221) that the name of the more famous Kedesh in Galilee has here supplanted an obscure KEDESH (g.v., 2) in Issachar (1 Ch. 6.72 [57]—mentioned with Daberath not far from Mt. Tabor); a suggestion which is the more plausible than 5.15, if the text be sound, connects Barak also with Issachar (cp BEZAANANNIM, KISHION). It is possible that Kedesh in Naphtali, in the immediate vicinity of Hazor, comes in some way from the story of Jabin.

The Song of Deborah bears in itself the evidence that it is the work of one who had lived through the great struggle which it celebrates, and is for

3. The Song that reason of inestimable value as an of Deborah. historical monument. It is also not only one of the oldest Hebrew poems which have come down to us, but one of the greatest. On its date cp SISERA and POETICAL LITERATURE, § 4 (iv.). See also HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 2.

Few odes in the world's literature, indeed, can be compared with this triumphal Te Deum. Unfortunately, the text, especially in vv. 8-15, has suffered grievously from the injuries of time.

Until very recent times, Deborah has been universally believed to be the author. It is ascribed to her in the title; and this testimony was thought to be conclusively confirmed by v. 7, 'Until I, Deborah, arose.' The form of the Hebrew verbs in this verse, however, is ambiguous, and the clause might equally well be interpreted, 'Until thou didst arise, Deborah' (cp v. 12); whilst ⑤ and Vg. render in the third person (cp v. 15). On the other hand, the natural inference from v. 15, and especially from v. 12, is that the heroine is not the poet.

2. Rebekah's nurse who, according to J, died and was buried below Bethel under the oak known as ALLON-BACUTH (Gen. 35.8, ΔΕΒΒΩΡΑ [E], ΔΕΒΟΡΡΑ [L]). She is alluded to, but unnamed, in 24.59, where she accompanies Rebekah on her departure from Bethuel [J]. To connect these two traditions would make her about 150 years old at the time of her death. [For a radical emendation of the text which removes this difficulty, see DINAH.] See, further, DEBORAH (1).

DEBT (נֶשֶׁךְ, 2 K. 4.7; ΔΑΝΙΟΝ, Mt. 18.27), DEBTOR

DECALOGUE

(צִוִּי עֶזֶק. 187; χρεοφιλέτης, Lk. 741). See LAW AND JUSTICE, § 16, and TRADE AND COMMERCE.

DECALOGUE (ἡ δεκάλογος, sc. βιβλος; decalogus, sc. liber), a term adopted from Patristic Greek and Latin, and meaning what we commonly call the ten commandments. Ultimately, the name comes from the LXX which in this case adheres closely to the original Hebrew and speaks, not of ten commandments, but of ten words (δέκα λόγοι or ῥήματα, Ex. 34:28 Dt. 4:13 10:4). The decalogue, according to the biblical narrative, was uttered by God from Horeb and written by him on two tables of stone which he had prepared. Afterwards, when Moses had broken the tables in indignation at the idolatry of the people, he was bidden to hew other tables on which God again wrote the ten words. They were the foundation of a covenant (bērit̃h) between Yahwè and his people (Dt. 4:13) and were placed in the ark as the 'testimony' (ʿēdūt̃h) or revelation of Yahwè's will (Ex. 25:16); see COVENANT, § 6 (ii.).

The two parallel texts of the decalogue, one in Ex. 20 the other in Dt. 5, present striking points of difference.

2. The two texts. In Exodus the sabbath is to be kept, because Yahwè made all things in six days and rested the seventh; in Deuteronomy, because the slave as well as his master needs rest. Here, too, as in the command to honour parents, there are amplifications of language peculiar to the recension in Deuteronomy. In Exodus the Israelite is forbidden to covet his neighbour's house, and then wife, slave, and cattle are specified as possessions included within the Hebrew idea of house or household. In Deuteronomy the commandment is adapted to a later and more humane view. First, the Israelite is not to 'covet' his neighbour's wife. Next, he is not to 'desire' his neighbour's house, land, slaves, etc. The separation of the wife from mere property is very significant (see FAMILY, § 6).

How comes it that the parallel texts vary so seriously? The answer now generally given is that originally the decalogue was composed of concise precepts, which were expanded in different ways by later editors. The decalogue was incorporated in his work by the Elohist; it was repeated by the Deuteronomist and lastly by the Priestly Writer. No wonder then that, in the final redaction of the Pentateuch, each text of the decalogue offers clear marks of the Deuteronomical style, whilst in Ex. 20:8-11 the Deuteronomical motive of humanity has been supplanted by the example of God's rest after the week of creation—evidence of a super-redaction in the spirit of P (cp Ex. 31:17b Gen. 2:2b). Commandments 6-9 preserve their primitive form. We may therefore on that analogy restore the decalogue to its original form thus:—

DECALOGUE OF EXODUS 20

1. Thou shalt have no other gods beside me.
2. Thou shalt not make unto thee any (graven) image.
3. Thou shalt not take the name of Yahwè thy God for a vain end.¹
4. Remember the sabbath day to hallow it.
5. Honour thy father and thy mother.
6. Thou shalt do no murder.
7. Thou shalt not commit adultery.
8. Thou shalt not steal.
9. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.
10. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house.

(a) In their arrangement the commandments fall into two pentads, or sets of five each, corresponding to the two tables. The first table sets forth the law of piety in the pure worship of

3. Arrangement. Yahwè and in reverence to parents, the second table exhibits the law of probity or duty to fellow Israelites, conceived, however, in an exclusively negative form. This is the scheme known to Philo (De Decalogo, 12) and Josephus (Ant. iii. 55), adopted by the Greek and Anglican churches, as also by the Scottish and other churches of the Calvinistic type, and approved, among recent scholars, by Dillmann.

Another arrangement (adopted by Knobel and, in 1869, by Kuenen) is to count the opening statement, 'I am Yahwè thy God,' etc., as the first 'word,' and bind the commandments against foreign gods and image worship into one. This is the Talmudic division, which is still in force among the Jews, and is also of greater antiquity in the Greek church than some have supposed.¹

Augustine, too (and he is followed by Roman Catholics and Lutherans), treats the prohibition of serving other gods and worshipping images as one commandment. He makes this the first, however, not, like the modern Jews, the second 'word.' Hence he has to divide the prohibition of coveting into two commandments, viz.: one against coveting a neighbour's wife, the other against coveting his goods. The objection to the Talmudic scheme is the awkwardness of a law which makes up the number ten from one statement of fact and nine precepts. The Augustinian scheme cannot be fitted to the text in Exodus and can scarcely have been intended even by the Deuteronomist.

The order given by the Vatican text of the LXX in Exodus is 'Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not murder,' and in Deuteronomy 'Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not murder, Thou shalt not steal.' Probably the variation arose from the feeling that the prohibition of adultery, as the destruction of family life, should be immediately connected with the injunction to honour parents.

We come next to the question of date. The Elohist document (perhaps a later edition of it) is our earliest

4. Date. external witness, and that does not carry us back beyond the middle of the eighth century B.C. Nor does internal evidence point to a much earlier time. The character of the decalogue, which is not ritual but almost purely moral; the prohibition of images, apparently unknown to Elijah and Elisha; the refinement which forbids thoughts of covetousness (the Hebrew cannot fairly be taken otherwise); all lend support to the view that the decalogue is grounded on the teaching of the great prophets of whose discourses we have written records. It has been compared with the loftier teaching in Micah 6:6-8, and may belong to the same age, i.e., at earliest that of Manasseh (see, further, MOSES).

The reasons against a date very much earlier are clinched by the modern discovery that there was another

5. Second and older Decalogue. decalogue older in character. True, we cannot say for certain how each particular precept of this older decalogue ran. We do know, however, that reference is made to it by the Yahwist in Ex. 34:28, and further, that the decalogue itself is imbedded in 10:26, and there is, therefore, no doubt about its general character. Wellhausen's reconstruction is as follows:—

DECALOGUE OF EXODUS 34

1. Thou shalt worship no other god.
2. Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.
3. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep.
4. Every firstling is mine.
5. Thou shalt observe the feast of weeks.
6. And the feast of ingathering at the year's end.
7. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leaven.
8. The fat of my feast shall not be left over till the morning.³
9. The best of the firstfruits of thy land shalt thou bring to the house of Yahwè thy God.
10. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in its mother's milk.⁴

The Yahwistic legend which encloses this decalogue is simpler and more natural, for here it is Moses, not

DECAPOLIS (ΔΕΚΑΠΟΛΙΣ [Ti. WH]) is the name given in the gospels (Mt. 4 25 Mk. 5 20) to a territory in

1. Greek cities and confederations. Bashan and Gilead covered, or affected, by the power of a league of ten or more Greek cities (called in Mk. 7 31 τὰ δέκα Δεκαπόλεις, by Pliny HN v. 15, Decapolitana regio). Josephus calls the league itself both Δεκαπόλις (BJ iii. 97) and αὐτὴ τῇ Συρία δέκα πόλεις (Vita, 65 74). Other early instances of the name are Ptolemy v. 15 22, and CIG, no. 450, of the time of Hadrian. Eusebius describes the Decapolis of the Gospels as a region (see below, § 2).

The first Greek cities in Syria were founded by the veterans of Alexander, and from his time their numbers were rapidly increased by the immigration of Greeks under the patronage of the Seleucids and Ptolemies. On the west the Greeks settled in ultimately Hellenised Phoenician and Philistine towns; but beyond Jordan many of their settlements were upon fresh sites. Among the oldest were Pella, Dion, Philadelphia (on the site of Rabbath-Ammon), Gadara, and Abila—all strong fortresses by 218 B.C. (Polyb. 5 71; 16 39; Jos. Ant. xii. 33; Stark, Gasa, 381). Bosra had become largely Greek in the time of the Maccabees (1 Macc. 5 24 ff.). Gerasa and Hippus are not mentioned till the first century B.C. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 153 4; BJ i. 48).

As the Hellenic world came under Roman sway, various confederacies of Greek cities were formed, both for purposes of trade, like the Hanseatic League, and for defence against alien races (Mommson, Prov. of the Rom. Emp., Eng. ed. 1 264 f.). Such confederation was nowhere more necessary than in Syria, where, after the success of the Maccabees, and especially under the Jewish king Alexander Jannæus (104-78 B.C.), the Greek cities must needs have combined against the common danger of overthrow and absorption by their Semitic neighbours. Such combinations, however, if they were formed, proved a failure till the Roman legions led by Pompey reached Syria in 65. Then the Greek cities took a new lease of life. Several called themselves after Pompey, and several dated their eras from the year of his Syrian campaign, 64-63 B.C. Among these were Gadara, Hippus, Pella, Dion, Abila, Kanata, Kanatha, and Philadelphia. Pompey gave them, or after this time they gradually received, municipal freedom, the rights of coinage, asylum, property in the surrounding districts, and association with one another. They were, however, put under the Roman Province of Syria (Ant. xiv. 4 4 BJ i. 77), and taxed for imperial purposes; their coins bore 'the image of Cæsar'; and they were liable to military service (BJ ii. 18 19). Some of them, certainly with the reservation of their rights, were afterwards transferred from the Governor of Syria to the direct authority of Herod.

From Pompey's time to Hadrian's (106 A.D.), Rome's grasp of Eastern Palestine was neither constant nor effective. It was during this time, and in this region of unsettlement, that the League of the Decapolis arose. The precise year we are unable to fix; it may not have been till after Herod's death in 4 B.C., but probably was soon after Pompey's campaign.

2. The Decapollitan league. At first, as the name implies, the League comprised ten cities. Only one lay W. of Jordan—Scythopolis, the ancient Bethshean. Commanding the approach to the others, by Esdraelon, from the Greek cities of the coast and the Levant, Scythopolis remained the capital of the league. All the other nine lay either upon the three great roads which, crossing Jordan, traversed E. Palestine, or on the trunk road which these ultimately joined: Pella, Gadara, and Hippus on the E. edge of the Jordan valley, and the Lake of Galilee; Dion, Gerasa (modern Jerash), and Philadelphia on or near the S. road; Raphana, somewhere near the central road; Kanatha (now Kanawât, see KENATH), where the central road joins the great trunk road from N. to S. at the foot of the Jebel Haurân; and Damascus, at the junction of this road with the northernmost of the three roads. All the sites are certain except those of Raphana and of Dion. These form the earliest list that we have—Pliny's in HN 5 16 [18]. Other cities were added. Ptolemy gives eighteen, omitting Raphana, and adding other nine, mostly towards Damascus,—Abila, on a branch of the Yarmûk 12 m. E. of Gadara; Kanata, either the modern Kerak or el-Kuneiyeh in en-Nukra; Kapitolas, probably the modern Beit er-Râs, near Irbid; and some of the Semitic towns incorporated in the extension of the Empire in 106, such as Edrei and Bosra. Each of these cities held sway over the territory in its neighbourhood. Round Hippus was Hippene (BJ iii. 31); round Gadara the country of the Gadarenes (Mk. 5 1 according to one reading), which, if we can judge from the trireme on some Gadarene coins, extended to the Lake of Galilee. In the fourth century Jerome calls all Gilead the 'region of Gerasa.' These suburban properties or spheres of influence must have touched one another, and the remains of the long aqueduct from the centre of Haurân by Edrei to Gadara is one proof of how far they extended. The 'Decapollitan region' (coasts of Decapolis) was, therefore, a wide and solid, if loosely defined, territory lying on the E. of the Lake of Galilee and stretching across a large part of Gilead. Eusebius (OS) defines the Decapolis of the Gospels as lying in Peræa round Hippus, Pella, and Gadara. Pliny, however, describes it as interpenetrated by the Jewish Tetrarchies (HN 5 16); and in particular the territories of Herod Antipas in Galilee and Peræa were probably so joined across Jordan as to cut off, from the E. Decapolis, the suburban territory of Scythopolis.

Within this region of Decapolis Hellenism was predominant in the time of the ministry of Jesus, and thence it flowed out upon Galilee. This is

3. Civilization. proved by a trace or two in the Gospels themselves (e.g., the presence of a large herd of swine in Gadara), by the ample ruins, still extant, of Greek architecture (the most glorious period of which, however, was not till the time of the Antonines), and especially by the constant communication between the Decapolis and the Mediterranean ports and Greece, and by the flourishing state of Greek literature in the Ten Cities. The Decapolis had, in each city, temples to purely Hellenic deities, theatres, amphitheatres, and various athletic institutions. Yearly were the παγκράτια celebrated—games in which every form of physical strength was exhibited. There was a vigorous municipal life of democratic constitution. Gadara was the birthplace or home of Philodēmus the Epicurean (a contemporary of Cicero), Mēlēager the epigrammatist, Mēnippus the satirist, Theodōrus the rhetorician (the tutor of Tiberius), and others. The Greek writers of Damascus are still better known. Gerāsa had a school famous for its teachers. Besides, the League, being largely a commercial union, pushed the Greek methods of trade across W. Palestine; the result is seen in the many commercial and travellers' terms and names for objects of trade and human consumption which, in the centuries immediately before and after Christ, passed from Greek into Hebrew. See TRADE AND COMMERCE.

These passages (to which add Gen. 253 i Ch. 132) all point to Arabia, but some to the southern, some to the northern region. דֶּדָן occurs in Min. and Sab. inscriptions (see especially Glaser, Skizze 2397). There is the dedication of the temple in 1 K. 81-63 (see v. 63: ἐγκαίνισεν) || 2 Ch. 52-75 (75: ἐγκαίνισεν), a 'dedication' of the altar being separately referred to in 2 Ch. 79 (ἐγκαίνισμὸν); that of the altar of the tabernacle is described in Nu. 710 ff. (P3 ἐγκαίνισμὸν); that of the walls of Jerusalem as rebuilt by Nehemiah in Neh. 1227 ff. (ἐν ἑγκαίνιόις τείχεος). No special rite is prescribed for the dedication of a new house referred to in Dt. 205 (ἐγκαίνισεν).—On the dedication of temple and altar in the Maccabean period, see the following article.—The dedication or ratification of a covenant with blood, and the dedication or inauguration of a new and vital way of access to God are alluded to in Heb. 918 (see COVENANT) and Heb. 1020.

DEDICATION, FEAST OF THE. On the 15th of Chislew of the year 145 of the Seleucid era (=Dec. 168 B.C.), during the religious persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes, a pagan altar was set up on the altar of burnt offering at Jerusalem, and on the 25th of the same month sacrifice was for the first time offered upon it (1 Macc. 141-64 2 Macc. 61-11; Jos. Ant. xii. 54). Three years afterwards (165 B.C.), Judas the Maccabee had recovered Jerusalem and the temple. The temple was then cleansed, the altar of burnt offering displaced by one entirely new, new sacred vessels made, and the temple reconsecrated with great festivities. These lasted for eight days, beginning on 25th Chislew 148 of the Seleucid era (Dec. 165 B.C.),—that is, on the very day on which, three years before, the altar had been desecrated (1 Macc. 436-39).

In commemoration of these events, the feast of the dedication (דְּחָה) [Megilla, iii. 46; Bilkurim, 16; Rosh hashana, 13, etc.]; τὰ ἐγκαίνια, Jn. 1022; αἱ ἡμέραι ἐγκαίνισμοῦ τοῦ θυιαστηρίου, 1 Macc. 459; καθαρισμὸς τοῦ ιεροῦ 2 Macc. 118), lasting eight days from the 25th of Chislew, was celebrated 'with mirth and joy' (μετ' εὐφροσύνης καὶ χαρᾶς) annually. According to 2 Macc.

106 it was observed after the manner of the feast of Tabernacles, and in another passage it is even called the feast of tabernacles of the month Chislew (ἡμέραι τῆς σκηνοπηγίας τοῦ χασέλευ, 2 Macc. 19). The special and distinguishing peculiarity in its celebration was the illumination of synagogues and houses.

At the door of each house one light, at least—in the case of those who could afford the expense, as many lights as there were persons in the house—had to be displayed; on the second day the number of lights must be doubled, on the third trebled, and so on.

Jewish tradition explains the eight-days' duration of the feast, and the custom of displaying lights, by the assertion that Judas found only one small cruse of consecrated oil, but that it lasted for eight days instead of only for one.

The probability is that the illumination, like the duration and other features of the feast, was taken over from the feast of tabernacles and referred to the relighting of the golden candlestick (1 Macc. 450). See CANDLESTICK.

No mention of this custom of illumination is made in the books of Maccabees or by Josephus; the description of the feast by Josephus as 'the feast of lights' (φῶτα), however, doubtless has reference to them (Ant. xii. 77), and his explanation of the name as coming from the unexpectedness of the restoration of religious freedom to the nation (ἐκ τοῦ παρ' ἐλπίδος οἶμαι ταύτην ἡμῖν φανῆναι τὴν ἐξουσίαν [sc. τῆς θρησκείας]) also may be safely taken as having the same reference. In both of the letters prefixed to 2 Macc. the observance of this feast is urgently pressed on the Jews in Egypt (2 Macc. 1918216); it is natural to presume that when, in the second of these (on the text of which see Ball in Var. Apocrypha), the story of Nehemiah's miraculous discovery of the sacred fire is referred to, the writer saw a parallel to it in the relighting of the altar-fire by Judas, and desired to associate the commemoration of both events with one feast. From the time of year and the employment of lights and green branches in the celebration, Wellhausen (UJG 210 [3rd ed. 256]) conjectures that the feast originally had reference to the winter solstice, and only afterwards came to be associated with the events recorded in Maccabees.

The proper psalm for the Feast of the Dedication is Ps. 30; hence its inscription, דְּחָה דְּחָה דְּחָה, ψαλμὸς ᾠδῆς τοῦ ἐγκαίνισμοῦ τοῦ οἴκου, 'Dedication-song of the house (temple).'

DEGREE occurs in a passage of some interest with reference to early church offices. What is the 'good degree' (AV) or rather, 'good standing' (RV) which is assured to those who have 'served well as deacons'? βαθμὸς καλὸς is the phrase. According to Hort (Chr. Eccl. 202) it means the vantage-ground of influence and moral authority won by the excellent discharge of diaconal duties. Theodoret, de Wette, etc., however, find a reference to a divine reward at the great judgment; whilst Jerome and other Fathers, Baur, Holtzmann, and von Soden think it is promotion to the episcopate that is intended. Observe that the qualities required of an ἐπίσκοπος in vv. 2-7 are analogous to those required of a deacon.

DEHAVITES

DEHAVITES, RV Dehaites (דֵּהַיִּטִּי, Kt., but דֵּהַיִּי, Kr.; דֵּהַיִּטִּי [A], דֵּהַיִּי [L], but A omits 'Elamites'), generally regarded as one of the peoples represented in Samaria among the colonists of ASNAPPER (Ezra 49). They stand apparently between the Susanchites (Susi-ansians) and the Elamites. No plausible identification has yet been offered (see Schr. *KA T*² 376, 616).

The reason is plain, as soon as it is mentioned. If we point, with G. Hoffmann (ZA 254), דֵּהַיִּי, and take this with the following word דֵּהַיִּי, we shall get the phrase 'that is, Elamites' (דֵּהַיִּי already has עֵינֵי הָאֱלָמִיִּים): which is an explanatory gloss on the preceding word 'Susanchites.' Delilah dwelt in the vale of SOREK (q.v.), and we may presume that the tradition regarded her as a Philistine. Her temporary relation to the Philistine princes hardly warrants us in calling her a 'political agent' (Smith's *DB*² s.v.). See SAMSON.

DELUGE. Postponing the various interesting questions, as well of comparative folk-lore (§§ 18-20) as of biblical theology (§§ 10 ff. 17), which are connected with the title of this article, let us confine ourselves at present to the relation between the Hebrew Flood-story and that of Babylonia. Of all the parallel traditions of a deluge the Babylonian is undeniably the most important, because the points of contact between it and the Hebrew story are so striking that the view of the dependence of one of the two on the other is directly suggested even to the most cautious of students. The account in the Berossian excerpts will be referred to below (see § 16); but we may state here that the genuine Babylonian character of the Berossian story has, since 1872, been raised above all doubt by George Smith's discovery, in the remains of the library of Ašur-bāni-pal, of a copy of a very ancient cuneiform Deluge-story derived, it would seem, from the city of Šurippak in Babylonia, and by a more recent discovery by Scheil (see § 6). The former story fills the first four columns of the eleventh tablet of the Gilgames.

2. Epic of Gilgames, a cycle of legends to which, in studying the early narratives of Genesis, we have so frequently to refer (see, e.g., CAINITES, § 6).

A paraphrase of its contents is all that we can give here: translations of recent date and critical in character will be found in *KA T*² 55 ff. (by Paul Haupt); Jensen's Kosm. 367 ff.; A. Jeremias's Isdubar-Nimrod, 32 ff.; Muss-Arnolt's essay in Bibl. World, 3 109 ff. ('94);

1 [The exploits of this hero are celebrated in the twelve chants or lays of the epic. The text of the Deluge-story was published in 4 R (1st ed. 50 ff., 2nd ed. 43 ff.) and most recently by Haupt, Das Bab. Nimrodepos, 95-150 ('92)].

DELUGE

and Gunkel's Schöpfung. 423 ff. (by H. Zimmern).¹ The gods, more especially Bēl, wroth at the sins of men, determine to bring upon them a judgment consisting in a great all-destroying flood. One of the gods, however, namely Ea, selects a favoured man, named Pār(?) napišti,² of the city of Šurippak, for deliverance. This is the Xisuthrus of Bērōssus, and be it observed that the name Xisuthrus is found, in all probability, by transposing the two component parts of Atra-ḫasis—i.e., 'the very wise,' or, still better perhaps (so Haupt), 'the very pious'—one designation of the hero of the cuneiform account. Pār(?) napišti is in a dream acquainted by Ea with the purpose of the gods, and commanded to build a ship (elippu, cp Aram. נֶפֶשׁ), the form of which is prescribed, as a means of saving his life, and to take with him into it 'seeds of life of all kinds' (L 25). Accordingly, the ship is built; its dimensions³ are given with great precision by the poet, who mentions that it was coated within and without with bitumen (kupru), and that cells were made in it. Into this vessel Pār(?) napišti brings gold and silver and 'seeds of life of all kinds,' besides his family and servants, beasts of the field, and wild beasts of the field (L 84 f.). Shortly before the Flood, the beginning of which is made known to him by a special sign, Pār(?) napišti himself enters the ship and bars the door, while his steersman, named Puzur-Bēl, takes over the direction of the vessel (L 94). Upon this the deluge begins: it is thought of as an unloosing of all the elemental powers, torrents of rain, storm and tempest, together with thick darkness. The waters rise higher and higher, till the whole land becomes a sea; all men and animals, except those in the ship, perish. Six days and nights the flood rages; on the seventh day a calm sets in. Then Pār(?) napišti opens the air-hole (L 136; nappāšu=nanpāšu, cp vān), and sees the widespread ruin. At the same time land emerges, and the ship grounds on the mountain of Nišir (L 141).⁴ After seven days more Pār(?) napišti sends out successively a dove, a swallow, and a raven. The dove and the swallow, finding no place of rest, return to the ship; but the raven is seen no more. Upon this Pār(?) napišti clears the ship and offers a sacrifice on the summit of the mountain. 'The gods smelt the savour, the gods smelt the sweet savour. The gods gathered like flies about the sacrificer' (L 160-162). As for Bēl, however, he is at first displeased at the deliverance of Pār(?) napišti and his household; but on the representations of Ea,⁵ who points out the rashness of his act in causing a universal deluge, and recommends the sending of wild animals, famine, and pestilence, as a more fitting mode of punishing human sins, Bēl becomes reconciled to the escape of Pār(?) napišti, and even gives him and his wife a share of the divine nature, and causes them to dwell 'afar off, at the mouth of the rivers' (L 199-205).

Before attempting to explain this Deluge-story, and comparing it with the corresponding Hebrew account, we must consider the position which it occupies in Babylonian literature. It stands at present, as we have seen, in close connection with other traditional stories, and particularly with the cycle of Gilgames-legends. The hero, Gilgames, who, after his various adventures, is visited with a sore disease, sets out on the way to his ancestor Pār(?)-napišti, whose dwelling is remote from that of all other men, beyond the river of death (cp CAINITES, § 6, ENOCH, § 2). From this fortunate possessor of eternal life, Gilgameš hopes to learn how to obtain, not only the cure of his disease, but also the same supreme felicity. Pār(?)-napišti answers by a detailed description of the Deluge, in which he was himself so prominent a figure, and at the end of which he was admitted to the life of the gods. Obviously, the present connection of the Deluge-story with the Gilgameš-tradition is secondary in character, and it becomes all the more reasonable to maintain that the Hebrew Deluge-story too has only an artificial connection with the framework in which it now stands. Noah may originally have had no more connection with Nimrod than Pār(?)-napišti with Gilgameš (see NIMROD, NOAH).

The secondary character of the present connection of the Babylonian Deluge-story being granted, can we

3. Hint from Bērōssus. venture to indicate a more original connection? According to Bērōssus,¹ Xisuthrus (the hero of the Deluge) was the last of the ten primitive Babylonian kings, whose immensely long lives so forcibly remind us of those ascribed to the antediluvian patriarchs in Genesis, and, as has been repeatedly pointed out,² are closely related to the theory of an artificially-calculated cosmic year. The Berossian cosmic year had the enormous duration of 518,400 ordinary years, and each of its twelve months consisted of 12 sari—i.e., (12 × 3600), 43,200 ordinary years. According to this system, ten cosmic months are equivalent to 432,000 years, and this is exactly the number of the years assigned by Bērōssus to the ten antediluvian Babylonian kings (cp CHRONOLOGY, § 4, end). The theory of the Babylonians appears to have been that these ten primitive kings reigned during the first ten cosmic months of the great cosmic year (each king for a cosmic month), and that the Deluge fell at the end of the tenth month. Now, the eleventh month was for the Babylonians (who began the year with the vernal equinox) the time from the middle of January to the middle of February—in other words, the middle of the rainy or winter season.

It is also to the winter season that the position of the Deluge-narrative in the Gilgameš-epic points—

4. Confirmed by epic. more particularly to the eleventh month Šebāt (Jan.-Feb.). For, as Sir Henry Rawlinson saw, the twelve tablets of the adventures of Gilgameš stand in relation to the passage of the sun-god through the twelve months of the year, and the principal event on every tablet has its analogue in the corresponding one of the twelve signs of the zodiac, which, as is now certainly known, had their origin in Babylonia. Now, it is the eleventh tablet that contains the Deluge-story, and the eleventh zodiacal sign is Aquarius. The conclusion is obvious. Lastly, it is also probable that the Assyrian name of the eleventh month, Šabātu (probably 'destruction'), and its ideographic designation as '(month of the) curse of rain,' both have reference to the Deluge. Clearly the connection of the Deluge-story with the story of the ten primitive kings is much more close and original than its present connection with the Gilgameš-legends. The fixing of the great catastrophe in the eleventh month is a fact of importance with reference to the question, which will shortly (§ 8) claim to be answered: Has the Deluge-story a historical kernel, or is it simply and entirely a nature-myth?

The elaborate account in the Gilgameš-epic is not the only cuneiform record of the Babylonian Deluge-story. Peiser has published (ZA 4 369 f.

5. 3rd Bab. document (Peiser). [89]) a mythological text, with a map, giving a primitive picture of Babylonia at the time of the Deluge under

Pār(?)-napišti. The text is very fragmentary; but as far as it can, with the help of the map, be understood, this is the notion of the Flood which it suggests. —The Persian Gulf was conceived of as encompassing Babylonia, and round about this ocean lay seven islands. The mountain of the Deluge was due north of Babylon, but still within the tract enclosed by the ocean. It is noteworthy that the time of the Deluge is apparently designated in this text—'the year of the great serpent.'

[Further, among the tablets in the Constantinople museum Scheil has recently discovered a mutilated frag-

6. Scheil's fragment. ment of a new Deluge-story, containing part of columns 1 f. 7 f. In the twelfth line occurs the word hībīš ('effaced'), which, according to Scheil, suggests that our tablet is but a copy of a much older original which had been injured. The date of the tablet itself, however, is sufficiently ancient: 'month of Šebāt, day 28, the year in which Ammi-zaduga built the fortress of Ammi-zaduga at the mouth of the Euphrates'—not much later than 2140 B.C. By whom the story is told, is not evident. The complaints of mankind are spoken of first: the god Rammān appears to be angry with them. Thereupon a god pronounces sentence upon mankind; reference is made to a destroying rain-storm. In the seventh column the god Ea speaks. He expostulates with the other god for wishing to destroy men. Some men at least, Ea will save; 'let them come into [the vessel . . .], . . . the oar (?) . . . let him come . . . let him bring . . . let him . . .'. That the great Deluge is referred to is now clear: the occurrence of the word abūbu must dispel all doubt. In the eighth column only two lines are complete; but these contain a reference to Atra-ḫasis (Xisuthrus), who is introduced speaking 'to his lord'—i.e., to the god who has proved himself a friend to the human race. The name of the scribe suggests to Scheil that this version of the Deluge-story is that which was current in the city of Sippar¹ (see § 16).]

We have also a list of royal names which bears the inscription, 'These are the postdiluvian kings of Babylon,' thus implicitly confirming the Berossian 7. Other references. distinction between kings before and kings after the Deluge (cp COT 161).

The word here used for Deluge is abūbu (cp below, § 13), which elsewhere is of frequent occurrence,² the Deluge being referred to as an event of hoary antiquity—e.g., when it is said of old inscriptions that they go back to the time before the Deluge (abūbu). See TEL-ABIB.

We have now to take up the question, What was probably the true origin of this Babylonian Deluge-

8. Origin of Deluge-story. story, looking at it by itself, without comparing the Hebrew records? The first thing that strikes us is the harmony between the narrative and the local conditions of Babylonia, which justifies us in regarding that country as the native place of the story. It is more difficult to determine whether any real historical event lies at the foundation of the narrative, or whether we have to do with a mere myth. In itself it would, of course, not be inconceivable that in days of yore an unusually extensive flood from the Persian Gulf, combined with continuous rain, burst upon the Babylonian lowlands, and destroyed countless human lives; that a dim tradition of this event was preserved; and that the Babylonian Deluge-story was a last deposit produced by this genuine occurrence. Judging, however, from what is known of the growth of myths and legends, especially among the Babylonians,

² [Abūbu, 'Storm,' is also used as a title for the god Marduk's weapon in the Creation-story, Tab. iv. 49, and King Hammur-rābi calls himself abūbu tuḫmatim, 'tempest of battles,' KB 8a 115.]

² See especially Marcus v. Niebuhr, Gesch. Assurs und Babels (1877), 237 ff.

DELUGE

we think that this is far from probable. The entire character of the narrative, and the connection with other myths indicated above, are much more favourable to the view that we have to do, not with a legend based upon facts, but with a myth which has assumed the form of a history (cp below, col. 1063, note 3). The colouring may have been partly supplied by the cyclones which, in an alluvial country like Babylonia, frequently make their appearance from the sea; but the origin of this myth will have to be sought in quite another direction. We noticed above that the great catastrophe is placed by the Babylonians in the middle of the winter season, in the eleventh month¹ (Šebāt=Jan.-Feb.), which was regarded as specially the time of storms, and had for its patron the rain-god and storm-god Rammān. To the present writer it seems most probable that the Deluge-story was originally a nature-myth, representing the phenomena of winter, which in Babylonia especially is a time of rain. The hero rescued in the ship must originally have been the sun-god.² Thus, the Deluge and the deliverance of Pār(?)-napīšti are ultimately but a variant to the Babylonian Creation-myth (see CREATION, § 2 f.). Now we can understand the very peculiar designation of the Deluge-period mentioned already. The 'great serpent' is no other than the personified ocean, which on the old Babylonian map (see above, § 5) encircles Babylonia, just as 'Leviathan the wreathed serpent' (Is. 27.1) is the world-encircling ocean personified as a serpent:³ it is the same monster that is a central figure in the Creation-story.

The question as to the relation of the Babylonian to the Hebrew Deluge-story can now be satisfactorily answered. If, as we believe, the former had its origin in Babylonia, and is fundamentally a myth of winter and the sun-god, the Hebrew story must have been borrowed from the Babylonian. In this case, Dillmann's theory of a common Semitic tradition, which developed among the Hebrews in one way, and among the Babylonians in another, is once more put out of court (see CREATION, § 4).

9. Of Hebrew story.

The Israelitish story of the submergence of the earth (i.e., of the part known to the narrators) by a Deluge is found in the Book of Genesis (6.5-9.19) in two forms, belonging respectively to J₂ and to P, which have been welded together (see GENESIS, § 8). There are also allusions to the story (all late) in Ezek. 14.14-20 Is. 54.9 Ps. 29.10 Is. 24.18 Job 22.15 f. (?). It remains to be seen, however, whether the two forms of the tradition in Genesis are really independent; it may be that, as in the case of the Creation-story (see CREATION, § 12), P has only given a somewhat different setting to data which he has derived from J₂. It is no objection to this view that P's account is longer and in some respects less fragmentary than that of J₂. The editor (or editors) naturally preferred the former, because P's work was systematically adopted as the framework of the combined historical narrative. The three principal points in which P is fuller than J₂ are (1) the announcement of the coming deluge to Noah, and the command to build an ark (or chest), the measurements of which are prescribed; (2) the notice of the place where the ark grounded; and (3) the appointment of the rainbow as the sign of the covenant between God and man. On all these points, we may

³ Gunkel, Schöpfung, 46. See BEHEMOTH and LEVIATHAN, § 3 (C), SERPENT, § 3 (C).

DELUGE

safely presume, information was given in the original J₂. To suppose that the latter began with the words, 'And Yahwē said to Noah, Go thou with all thy house into the ark,' would be absurd, and Budde seems to be right in supposing that the measurements of the ark in Gen. 7.15 come from J₂, who on his side may have derived them from some form of the Babylonian myth (cp GOPHER-WOOD). Budde has also made it probable that J₂ gave a statement as to the resting-place of the ark, which he placed among the mountains E. of Ur-Kasdim. P knew that there were higher mountains than these in the N., and transferred the locality to ARARAT (g.v., § 3); though it is probable that he had the support of the later Babylonian tradition (cp Bērōssus).

Nor need we doubt that the episode of the rainbow also was told by J₂, to whose delicate imagination it would be in a high degree congenial. It is true, there is nothing like it in the Deluge-story given in the Gilgames-epic; but we do not know all the variants of the Babylonian myth. Most probably, however, J₂ may claim the honour of having invented this exquisite sign of the covenant. The covenant is distinctly Israelitish, and the sign should be Israelitish too. A probable point of contact for the rainbow episode is suggested by these words of the Babylonian poet (II, 92-102, Jensen): 'A dark cloud came up from the foundation of heaven; Rammān (the storm-god) thundered therein. . . . The noise of Rammān penetrated to heaven; it turned all brightness into obscurity.' The flashes of lightning are the storm-god's arrows (Ps. 76.3 [4] 78.48 Hab. 3.11), and when the storm ceases, the god lays aside his bow (this is said, e.g., of the god Indra, after his battle with the demons). If the Hebrew story in its original form referred to the thundering of Yahwē, we can well believe that when J₂ appended the account of the covenant he said to himself that the bow which Yahwē had laid aside could be no other than the rainbow. There is, at any rate, no exact mythic parallel elsewhere to the use made of the rainbow in Gen. 9.12-17.

There are also other points of difference between J₂ and P. (a) The latter is without the vivid details of the sending out of the birds (Gen. 8.6-12, J₂); such a prosaic writer would probably think these superfluous. (b) A more important point is P's non-recognition of the distinction between clean and unclean animals (Gen. 7.2-8 J₂), and his not mentioning the sacrifice which, according to J₂ (Gen. 8.20), Noah offered after leaving the ark. The cause of these deviations of P is obvious. His historical theory of the origin of the cultus imposed on him the necessity of harmonising the tradition with it.

(c) Not less remarkable is the difference between J₂ and P as to the duration of the Deluge. According to J₂, seven days elapsed after the command to Noah to enter the ark; then the rain-storm¹ came, and it lasted forty days and forty nights; then in three times seven days the waters disappeared. The computation of P gives more occasion to debate.

It is stated in MT (7.11) that the deluge began on the seventeenth of the second month, and that on the twenty-seventh of the second month in the following year the earth was dry (8.14). If this is correct, the flood lasted x year 11 days; i.e., if the lunar year forms the basis of the computation, 354+11 days which make a solar year. This looks very much like an editorial correction; the flood really lasted a lunar year. ² However, reads in 7.11 'twenty-seventh' (ŠADEL) instead of 'seventeenth.' In this case the solar year would be meant,³ and the duration of the deluge (365 days) would be the same as that of the life of Enoch (365 years). We also learn that 'the waters prevailed on the earth 150 days' (7.24 cp 8.3). This ought to be equal to five months (71184). But 150 days are more than five lunar months; it is clear that solar months must be meant (see, however, Di. Gen. 129 f., and his dissertation on the Calendar, Monatsber. der Berl. Akad., 1881, pp. 930 f.; Bacon, 'Chronology of the Account of the Flood in P', Hebraica, 8 (92) 79-88; Nowack, HA 222).

¹ Cp Ps. 29.10. P (7.11) ascribes the deluge partly to rain, partly to the breaking up of the 'fountains of the great deep' (i.e., of the waters under the earth, cp Gen. 49.25). This approaches more nearly to the Babylonian account, which speaks of the sea as being driven on the land by a hurricane. Possibly J₂, in its original form, made some reference to the sea or to the subterranean waters.

² On P's year cp also YEAR.

We are thus enabled to some extent to reconstruct the Deluge-story of J₂. No doubt some archaic incidents 13. J₂'s narrative. have been lost, but P has preserved three of the most important details which were found in the earlier narrative, though he has moved the Mountain of the Ark northwards. He has also retained קִיבּוֹל (κατακλυσμός), J₂'s term for the Deluge: ¹ outside of J₂ and P in the Deluge-story, the term occurs only in Ps. 2910 (post-exilic), and in Gen. 617 76 an editor has glossed it by the word קִי 'waters'; also קִיבּוֹל, 'chest' ² (κιβωτός, Vg. arca), used elsewhere only of Moses' ark of Nile-reeds (Ex. 235, θ[ε]λ[ε]μ[ε]ν[ε]ς [BAF] θηβη [L]), and we may presume that the words קִיבּוֹל (see GOPHER-WOOD) and קִיבּוֹל ³ 'bitumen,' both occurring in 614 and nowhere else, were retained from the lost narrative of J₂.

But what of J₁? Did his narrative of the origin of man contain any Deluge-story? No—at any rate, if

14. J₁ had no Deluge-story. the theory ably propounded by Budde be accepted. J₁'s narrative contained Gen. 24b-3 412a 16b-24 61 f. 4 920-27 (but on v. 27 see JAPHETH) 1118-81: it included no Deluge-story. In this record Noah appears as the first agriculturist, and the inventor of wine. A corruption of the text, and perhaps editorial convenience, led to his identification with the hero of the Deluge, who (it is held) had originally the name of Enoch, but had now to take that of Noah in exchange (see NOAH). We need not, however, suppose that the Deluge-myth was unknown to the Israelites before J₂ wrote. It is in reality a pendant to the Creation-story: we should naturally have expected both stories to reach the Israelites at the same time. We have, indeed, no direct evidence of this; but the expression קִיבּוֹל has a very archaic appearance. At one time קִיבּוֹל must have had a meaning in Hebrew, and that time must have been long anterior to J₂. But the Deluge-myth, like the companion-story which underlies Gen. 1, did not, it seems, take a firm hold on the Israelitish people: when J₂, or (more probably) the earlier writer from whom he draws, shaped his story, the Deluge-myth had passed out of mind, and needed to be revived by the help of some one acquainted with cuneiform documents (cp CREATION, § 11 f.). (a)

15. Other Semitic Del.-stories lost. Of the earliest Israelitish Deluge-myth and of its Canaanitish original we know nothing. (b) Lucian (160 A.D.), laughing in his sleeve, gives the Syrian Flood-story of his day; ⁴ but it has been partly Hellenised, and probably Judaised (a 'great box or chest,' λάβραξ, is spoken of), and we can lay no stress upon it. Its origin was no doubt Babylonian. 'Most people,' says Lucian, 'relate that the founder of the temple (of Hierapolis) was Deucalion-Sisythes.' (c) The Phoenician version of the myth, if there ever was one, has perished. ⁵ (d) The

² קִיבּוֹל may be of Egyptian, but can scarcely be of Bab. origin, as Jensen (ZA 4 273 f.) represents. The word qebitum in the phrase ina elippi qebitum is most naturally connected with קִיבּוֹל.

³ Cp kupri in the parallel passage in the Gilgameš-epic.

⁵ Gruppe's opposite view (ZATW 9 135 f. [1891]) is unsatisfactory.

Arabs, like the Egyptians, ¹ certainly never had any, though the legendary el-Ḥiḍr (see col. 1064, n. 1), who in the Alexander-legend conducts the hero to the waters of life, and in the Koran, according to the commentators (Sur. 1859), is found by Moses 'at the confluence of two seas (rivers?),' may be a reflection of Pār-napišti, or rather Ḥasis-atra (from a shortened form of which el-Ḥiḍr may be derived).

Outside of Babylonia, therefore, the only extant Semitic tradition is that of J₂ and P. This is obviously based on the Babylonian myth, for the substitution of a 'chest' for a 'ship' is due either to reflection or to a confusion between two Babylonian words, and in any case not to independent tradition. J₂'s account is the typical one; P's statements as to the length of Enoch's life and the duration of the Deluge seem to rest on Jewish Aggada.

The typical Babylonian myth is that in the Gilgameš-epic (see above), which appears to be the local tradition

16. Berossian of the city of Šurippak (see Frd. Del. Par. 224; Jensen, Kosmol. 387); but the variant discovered by Peiser ² (§ 5), and the much fuller one transmitted by Bērōssus, ³ also are valuable. The Babylonian king, Xisuthrus, is the hero of the Berossian Deluge-story; in this way Bērōssus disguised the name of Atra-ḥasis, transposing the two parts of the name or title. ⁴ Xisuthrus, he says, was accompanied on board the ship (σκάφος, πλοῖον, ναὺς) by wife, children, friends, and steersman, and took with him quadrupeds and birds. He was ordered to turn the course of his vessel 'towards the gods.' How long the flood lasted we are not told. When it went down, he sent out birds three times; the third time the birds did not return. Then he discovered that the ship had grounded 'on a certain mountain.' With wife, daughter, and steersman, he disembarked, erected an altar, sacrificed, and then passed out of sight with his companions. Those who remained heard a voice which announced that Xisuthrus had been taken to be with the gods as a reward for his piety; also that the land in which they were was Armenia (cp Gen. 84 P). They were, further, commanded to dig up the sacred books which Xisuthrus, before embarking, had buried at Sispara to transmit them to mankind. This form of the story was, therefore, the local tradition of the ancient city of Sippar, on the left bank of the Euphrates (the Abu Ḥabba of to-day). We may plausibly assume that the fragment discovered by Scheil (see § 6) also belonged to the story current at Sippar. Here, however, we find, only Atra-ḥasis as the name of the hero of the Deluge. This name, however, is perhaps to be regarded rather as a title than as a personal name.

The epic narrative fills up the lacuna in the Berossian story. It presupposes a division of the period of the 17. The Epic, J₂, and Gen. 523. Deluge into an (at present) uncertain number of weeks. The same predilection for the number seven is visible in J₂'s account (see Gen. 724 8 [6] 1012).

Similarly the epic agrees more definitely than Bērōssus with J₂ in its notice respecting the birds. Seven days after the calming of the waters, Pār-napišti sends out first a dove, then a swallow, then a raven. J₂ less naturally puts the raven before the dove: probably he did not draw directly from a Babylonian source (see above, § 11, end; § 14, end). The other details of the Deluge have been simplified by J₂ (or his predecessor). The rather grotesque polytheistic setting has disappeared: P, who retained the plural form ('Let us make man') in Gen. 1.26, found nothing corresponding to this in the old Deluge-story. In Gen. 8.21 ('And Yahwè smelled the sweet savour') we find a reminiscence of the mythic description in the epic (see above, § 2); but the most startling part of the description has vanished. The cause assigned to the Deluge is nobler in J₂ (P) than in the epic. In the latter (Il. 168-175) Ea reproaches Bêl with having punished the innocent with the guilty: the offence consisted, it appears, in the neglect of the accustomed sacrifices to the gods.¹ In J₂ (P), on the other hand, no special stress is laid on sacrifices, and no limitation is made to the sweeping declaration that 'the earth is filled with violence' (Gen. 6.13), whilst the injunction laid upon the survivors after the Deluge is not that they should be 'reverent' in a ritual sense, but that they should not deface the image of God by shedding man's blood (Gen. 9.6). The close of the epic narrative, however, redeems the character of the poet, and irresistibly suggests the theory, supported elsewhere, that 'Noah' should rather be 'Enoch.' It was for the children of the Hebrew Xisuthrus to re-found a human race of finer quality than that which had perished. Xisuthrus himself was too great and good a man to encounter once more the ordinary trials of humanity. Atra-hasis was transported to the earthly Paradise, 'afar off at the mouth of the rivers' (the Euphrates and the Tigris). The Hebrew Xisuthrus, like his model in the Berossian account, 'was not (= disappeared), for God had taken him' (Gen. 5.24).

Both Bêrôssus and the priestly writer represent a period later than Ašur-bāni-pāl's epic. The earthly Paradise was no doubt the original home of the translated Xisuthrus, though we cannot suppose that it was always placed 'at the mouth of the rivers': mythic geography is notoriously fluctuating. The earliest location of Paradise was on the slopes of the mysterious mythic mountain which reached upward to the sky (cp CHERUB, i. § 7). When the idea of an earthly Paradise had worn out, men thought of Xisuthrus as in heaven, and this is really more in accord with the earliest form of the myth. For, though the theory offered above by Zimmern (§ 8) probably does embody the interpretation of the most cultured Babylonian priests, we can hardly regard it as a complete explanation. It is more like the afterthought of a semi-philosophic age than like the spontaneous imagination of primitive men. There would be more plausibility in the notion that some definite historical catastrophe lies at the root of the story, if we could only believe that tradition could preserve so remote an occurrence. The truth is that a definite occurrence does lie at the root of the story: only, it is an imaginary, not a historical occurrence.

The Deluge-myth in Babylonia and elsewhere seems to have grown out of an archaic ether-myth, akin to that prevalent in Egypt. Originally the sun was imagined as a man voyaging on a boat in the heavenly ocean. When this story had been told and retold a long time, rationalism suggested that the sea was not in heaven but on earth, and observation of the damage wrought in winter by incessant rains and the inundations of great rivers suggested the introduction of corresponding details into the new earthly Deluge-myth. This theory is supported by the Polynesian Deluge-myths collected by Gerland,³ the origin of which is still plainly visible. In these, the sun and the moon were imagined sometimes as peaks emerging out of a flood, sometimes as canoes, sometimes as a man and his wife; the stars, sometimes as ships, sometimes as human beings—the children of the sun and moon; the clouds too were described as ships—the 'ships of Tangaloo' (the heaven- and air-god). The flood itself was called sometimes 'flood of the moon' (so at Hawaii), sometimes 'flood of day's eye,'—i.e., the sun (so at Tahiti). This accounts for the strongly mythological characters of Pār-napišti in Babylonia and of Maui in New Zealand, who are, in fact, solar personages. Enoch too must be classed in this category; his perfect righteousness and superhuman wisdom¹ now first become intelligible. Moreover, we now comprehend how the goddess Sabitu (the guardian of the entrance to the sea) can say to Gilgameš (himself a solar personage) 'Šamaš the mighty (i.e., the sun-god) crossed the sea; besides (?) Šamaš, who can cross it?'² For, though the 'sea' in the epic is no doubt the earth-circling ocean, it was hardly this in the myth from which the words were taken.

³ Waitz-Gerland, Anthropologie der Naturvölker, 6 296-373. See also Schirren, Wanderungen der Neuseeländer ('56), p. 193.

The transference of the Deluge from heaven to earth had two effects. First, it produced a virtual duplication of the Creation-myth.³ This points the way to a probable explanation of the appearance of the raven, the swallow, and the dove in the Babylonian account, and of the dove and the raven in the Hebrew account. An authentic and striking Polynesian parallel to the description in Gen. 1.2 ('... brooding over the face of the waters') has been given already (see CREATION, § 10). N. American tribes, too, frequently connect the emergence of the earth from the primordial ocean with the descent of a raven, and their flood-myths, according to Brinton, connect the rebuilding of the earth with the agency of birds.⁴ In the Algonkin account, however, the muskrat succeeds, when the raven fails, in finding a portion of the submerged earth.⁵ In the primitive Babylonian myths of Creation and Deluge a bird (whether raven or dove), or birds, probably had a share in the process of creation and re-creation.

The second effect of the transference spoken of was a new speculative theory. It occurred to the early men that the idea of a second construction of the world lightened the problem of the origin of things. How the primeval world arose might be difficult to explain satisfactorily: various mythic stories were current; but it was not so hard to conceive of a world once destroyed being reconstructed. Thus, in course of time, systematisers devised schemes bearing some resemblance to the cycles of the Stoics. It seemed to them as if the Creator were constantly being baffled in his experiments by physical or moral perversity in the materials. Thus the priests of the Aztecs spoke of four antecedent ages, separated by universal cataclysms, the present being the fifth and last,⁶ and a similar belief, in rudimentary forms, ¹ Enoch, like Pār-napišti, might be called Atra-hasis, 'the very wise.' Omniscience is an attribute of the sun-god. The same title appears to be given to the young eagle in the myth of Etana (see ETHAN)—a supernatural bird (Beitr. zur. Ass. 2.444). Notice, too, that the old eagle in the Etana-myth and Pār-napišti are both mentioned in connection with magical plants. The legendary el-Hidr of the Moslems, whom Guyard and Lenormant (Les origines, 2 12 f.) identify with Hasis-atra, was also the wisest of beings. Cp above, § 15. On this interesting parallel, cp Lidzbarski, ZA 7 104 ff., 8 263 ff., and Dyroff, ZA 7 310 ff.; also Clermont Ganneau, Rev. Archéol. 82 388 ff. See also ELIJAH, § 5.

² See Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 584; Jeremias, Izd. Nimrod, 37. Sabitu, it has been remarked, has some slight affinity to Circe.

⁴ Brinton, Myths of the New World, 204; cp Macdonell, JRAS, 1895, p. 189.

⁵ Brinton (op. cit. 209 ff.) gives the 'authentic form' on the authority of Father Le Jeune (1634). It appears that the Algonkins supposed all mankind to have perished in the Deluge. This is against deriving this Deluge-myth from a previous ether-myth. The Algonkin view, however, is not largely represented.

DELUGE

is still prevalent throughout the American-Indian tribes. The Zoroastrians believed in six ages of the world, with a final catastrophe issuing in a renovation. The six ages are of late origin (see CREATION, § 9); but the renovation, as Darmesteter admits, goes back to the Achaemenian period. Not without stimulus from Zoroastrianism, the Jews in later times advanced to the same belief.¹ They were assured that the present world would be destroyed and that a new heaven and earth would take its place (Is. 24:18-20, 51:6² 65:17 66:22 Mt. 19:28 2 Pet. 3:12 f. Enoch 45:4 f. Apoc. Bar. 326); in harmony with Gen. 9:15 fire was to be the destroying agency (2 Pet. 3:10). These beliefs were naturally fostered by the moral idealism of the best men, as we see, not only from the biblical writings (e.g., Gen. 6:11 2 Pet. 2:5 κέρπος ἀρεβῶν, 37), and from the Babylonian story, but also from an American (Quiché) story, which says, 'They did not think or speak of the Creator who had created them, and who had caused their birth.'³ The intense moral fervour of the ancient Zoroastrian hope of world-renovation is well known (see PERSIA).

If it were possible to believe in a primitive tradition respecting early human history, and to accept all

20. Other mythic narratives as independent traditions, we should have a weary waste of Deluge-myths. Deluge-stories still to plod through. There are, however, only three more such accounts which have any special interest from our present point of view. (a) The Indian Deluge-story is the first.⁴ This can hardly be a genuine Aryan myth, for there is no clear reference to it in the Rig Veda.

The Satapatha Brahmana, where it first occurs, was written (Weber) not long before the Christian era. Another version, in which the lacunae of the earlier one are filled up, is given in the Mahābhārata; but this poem, though it existed in part before the Christian era, did not assume its present form till long afterwards. A third version, still more decidedly Indian in character, but with some suspicious resemblances to the Semitic accounts, is given in the Bhāgavata Purāna; but the earliest possible date of this work is the twelfth century A.D., which deprives its account of the deluge of all claim to originality.

The principal characteristic of the older Flood-story is the part assigned to the fish which warns Manu of the Deluge, and ultimately saves him by drawing his ship to a northern mountain. This is surely out of character with Aryan mythology. The horned fish, in which Brahma appears, reminds us strongly of the Babylonian fish-god Ea. It was Ea who gave notice of the coming Deluge to Pār-napišti. Zimmer (Altindisches Leben, 101), Jensen (Kösmol. 497) and Oldenberg (Rel. des Veda, 276) consider the Babylonian origin of the Indian Flood-story to be certain; but on the other hand cp Usener, Untersuch. 3:240-244.

(b) The second account is a Zoroastrian myth in the Avesta (Vendidad, 2:46 ff.). In its present form (even after the prosaic additions have been removed; see Geldner, in Usener, 3:209 ff.) it seems to have been influenced by the Hebrew Deluge-story.

The Var, a square enclosure constructed by Yima (=Yama, the Vedic god of the dead), had a door and perhaps a window,⁵ like Noah's Ark, and it was designed to preserve men, women, and animals. Apart from this, it reminds us of the biblical Eden, and the calamity which was to be averted was, not a flood, but a terrible winter's frost, connected, however, with the end of the world.⁶ The myth seems to be a recast of elements from more than one source.

(c) The third is a Phrygian myth. Possibly there was a primitive native Deluge-story; but, if so, it was vitalised from a Jewish source, some time during the third or the second century, B.C., when (as Ramsay has pointed out) many thousands of Jews from Babylonia were settled as colonists in the cities which the Seleucid kings had built. This was the period of the intermingling of religions, when Judaism too made conquests, especially in Asia Minor. Even those who were not otherwise Judaized were influenced by Jewish legends (cp SODOM AND GOMORRAH). Important cities exhibited on their coins biblical symbols, and harmonised their old traditions with biblical narratives.¹

Thus Apamea (formerly Kelainai) adopted the Noah-legend; Iconium, that of Enoch, whose name was connected with the Phrygian name of Narrakos or Arrakos. This king (for such tradition made him) was said to have lived more than 300 years, to have announced the coming Deluge, and to have prayed for his people. The mountain hard by Apamea was said to be that on which Noah's ark grounded; the city therefore assumed the title κιβωτός (Ark).

The references already given are almost sufficient (they may be supplemented from Dillmann's Genesis); but at least a brief mention is due to 21. Appendix Lenormant's study in Les origines on Lenormant. Lenormant's study in Les origines de l'histoire, 1:382 ff. The conclusion arrived at is that of Franz Delitzsch and Dillmann, that the Deluge is no 'myth,' but a historical fact. Lenormant, at any rate, holds that the three great civilised races of the ancient world preserved a dim recollection of it. This implies a self-propagating power in tradition which the researches of experts in popular traditions do not justify. Lenormant died, a martyr of patriotism, in 1884. Would he have changed his mind had he lived? At any rate, he would have respected the honesty of those who regard the Deluge-story as a precious record of the myth-forming imagination which has been made subservient to a high moral idealism. See ADAM AND EVE.

Lastly, the writer would call attention to Jastrow's two articles on Scheil's Deluge-story (§ 6) in the New York Independent, 10th and 17th Feb.

22. And on Jastrow's theory. 1898 (cp his Rel. of Bab. and Ass. 502, 506). It is here maintained that a local tradition of a rain-storm which submerged a single city has been combined in the Gilgamesh-epic with a myth of the destruction of mankind based upon the annual phenomenon of the overflow of the Euphrates. Pār-napišti or Pār-napišti (as Haupt in *KAT*³) and Jastrow prefer to read the name) is the hero of the local tradition, while Hasis-adra (= חֲסִיס אֲדָרָה, Gen. 6:9, according to Jastrow) is the hero of the larger nature-myth. The present writer admits that the version in the epic is of composite origin, and that the names Pār-napišti and Hasis-adra may perhaps come from different sources; but he holds that all the Babylonian deluge-stories, whether simple or composite, have a mythic basis. Moreover, he does not recognise that the simplicity of the oldest Hebrew version of the Deluge-story heightens the probability that the Hebrews carried that story with them when they left their Euphratean settlements. The account given above of the origin and development of the Hebrew story has surely not lost any of its probability in consequence of Scheil's discovery.

smallest of the Cyclades, regarded by the ancients as the centre of the group—a confusion of the geographical and religious points of view (cp Str. 485). Delos was both a shrine and a commercial centre, and 'her whole destiny is explained by her religious traditions and her geographical situation.' Though nominally free, the island was really subject to the dominant power for the time being in the Aegean. It was a free port as early as 168 B.C., and attracted a great part of the Rhodian trade (Polyb. 31.7). After 146 B.C. it entered upon the heritage of Corinth (Str. 486). The acquisition of the province of Asia by the Romans in 133 B.C. added greatly to the wealth and importance of Delos. Now began the most brilliant epoch of its history: the inscriptions show that its commercial relations were with the Levant, chiefly Syria and Egypt. So Pausanias calls the island τὸ κοινὸν Ἑλληνῶν ἐμπόριον (viii. 33.2). For long it was the chief emporium of merchandise from the E. to the W., so that the fine bronze or copper wares of Greece were called indifferently Corinthian, or Delian, from the place of export (Pl. HN xxxiv. 29; Cic. Verr. ii. 283). The island became especially a great slave mart, where the Asiatic slave dealers disposed of their human cargoes to Italian speculators; as many as ten thousand were landed and sold in a day (Str. 668). Naturally such a spot attracted large numbers of Jews (Jos. Ant. xiv. 108; Philo, Leg. ad Cai. 36; cp 1 Macc. 15.23). According to a Greek inscription, a company of Tyrian merchants was settled there as early as the second century B.C. (CIG 2271). At the altar of Delos Antiochus Epiphanes set up statues (Polyb. 26.1), and an inscription to Herod Antipas has been discovered in the island (cp Schür. GVI 1358). In 88 B.C. 20,000 men, mostly Italians, were massacred in the island by Archelaos, admiral of the Pontic fleet of Mithridates, a blow from which it partially recovered, only to be finally ruined about twenty years later by the systematic and wholesale destruction wrought by the pirate Athenodorus. The resurrection of the island was rendered impossible by the rapid growth of Puteoli and the revival of Corinth (for its decay, cp Paus. viii. 33.2 ix. 34.6).

DEMAS (ΔΗΜΑΣ [Ti. WH]) is enumerated by the apostle Paul as among his 'fellow-workers' at the time of his (first) Roman captivity (Philem. 24; see also Col. 4.14). In 2 Tim. 4.10 he is thus alluded to: 'Demas forsook me, having loved this present world, and went to Thessalonica.' Nothing is known of him beyond what may be inferred or conjectured from these allusions.

He is enumerated in the 'list of the seventy disciples of our Lord' compiled by the Pseudo-Dorotheus of Tyre (Chr. Pasch., Bonn ed., 2.121) and is stated to have become a priest of idols in Thessalonica. Along with Hermogenes, he figures prominently in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla as a hypocritical companion of the former, and to Hermogenes and Demas is assigned the particular heresy about the resurrection which in 2 Tim. 2.17 is attributed to Hymenæus and Philetus.

DEMETRIUS (ΔΗΜΗΤΡΙΟΣ [ANV]—i.e., of, or belonging to, Demeter, a proper name of very common occurrence among the Greeks).

1. Demetrius I., surnamed Soter,¹ king of Syria, son of Seleucus IV. Philopator, was sent in his early youth to Rome as a hostage, the throne meanwhile being occupied by his uncle Antiochus Epiphanes (see ANTIOCHUS, 2). After some time he effected his escape to Tripolis (chiefly through the aid of the historian Polybius), and thence proceeded to Antioch where he proclaimed himself king, securing his position by putting to death his cousin Antiochus Eupator (ANTIOCHUS, 3), and LYSIAS (1 Macc. 7; 162 B.C.). He lost no time in pleasing the Hellenizing party by sending Bacchides to instal Alcimus as high-priest (see BACCHIDES, ALCIMUS). The disturbances caused by the latter need not here be described; the Syrian general NICANOR [q.v.] was defeated at Capharsalama (726 ff.), and at Adasa (739 ff.). A warning was sent from Rome to Demetrius not to interfere with the Jews; but it was too late. Less than two months after the fall of Nicanor a fresh invasion under Bacchides took place; the Judæan power was seriously crippled (chap. 9, 160 B.C.; see further BACCHIDES). Seven years later Demetrius, disputing the sovereignty with Alexander Balas, endeavoured, though in vain, to secure the support of the Maccabean party (chap. 10), and after some hostilities died fighting his rival¹ (vv. 49 f.; 150 B.C.). See MACCABEES, § 5.

2. Demetrius II., Nicātor, son of the above, who had been living in exile in Crete, came over to Cilicia to avenge his father's ill success in 147 B.C., and secured a powerful follower in the person of APOLLONIUS (q.v., 2). An engagement took place at Ashdod, and Apollonius was decisively beaten (1 Macc. 10.67 ff.). Shortly afterwards, however, his hands were unexpectedly strengthened by the secession of Ptolemy VI. Philomētor (see PTOLEMY, 1), who transferred to him his daughter Cleopatra, the wife of Alexander Balas (see ALEXANDER, 2). Alexander was put to flight and Demetrius became king in 145 B.C. (11.19). A treaty by which Jonathan obtained favourable concessions was concluded (MACCABEES, § 5), and Demetrius, believing his position secure, took the unwise step of discharging his regular troops, who at once went over to Tryphon, the guardian of the young son of Alexander Balas (11.38 ff.; see TRYPHON). Profiting by the approach of a disturbance, Jonathan obtained fresh concessions from Demetrius on the understanding that Tryphon's rebellion in Antioch should be put down. This was successfully accomplished; but when Jonathan saw that Demetrius showed no signs of carrying out his promises he was easily persuaded to transfer his allegiance to Tryphon. Demetrius' princes entered Judæa and after a temporary success were routed in the neighbourhood of Hazer (11.63 ff.). Another invasion was meditated in B.C. 144, but was successfully warded off by Jonathan's skilful generalship (12.24 ff.). The scene suddenly changed when Tryphon usurped the throne of Syria, and endeavoured, with some success, to reduce Judæa. Jonathan was dead and Simon busied himself in strengthening the defences. An embassy was sent to Demetrius II., who, to obtain Simon's support, readily granted all the Jewish demands including even a complete immunity from taxation² (13.31 ff.). Trusting Simon to continue the struggle against Tryphon, Demetrius marched to Persia, partly for conquest, partly to acquire auxiliaries; but he was captured by Mithridates I. (see PERSIA) and imprisoned, his place in Syria being taken by his younger brother Antiochus Sidētes (1 Macc. 14.1 ff.; see ANTIOCHUS, 5). From non-biblical sources we know that, at the expiration of ten years, he resumed the throne (128 B.C.), quarrelled with Ptolemy Physkon and his protégé Alexander Zabinas, and was finally conquered at Damascus, after fleeing from which place he was murdered at Tyre in 125 B.C. (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 93).

3. A silversmith of Ephesus, who was the chief instigator of the tumult in the interests of his craft which brought Paul's mission in that city to a close (Acts 19.24 ff.). See DIANA, § 2, EPHESUS. The conjecture that he figures again in 3 Jn. 12 as a convert to Christianity, precarious at best, becomes singularly so when the commonness of the name is considered.

4. A Christian mentioned with commendation in 3 Jn. (v. 12). That he was the bearer of the epistle is sometimes inferred; but

² This independence gained by the Jews was marked by the introduction of a new era; cp CHRONOLOGY, § 1.

the inference has no more stringency than that mentioned in no. 3. S. A. C.

DEMONS. Demons are a survival from an earlier faith; continued belief in them is due to the conservative instincts of the ordinary religious mind, and is thus particularly characteristic of the popular religion. For this reason references to demons scarcely occur in the earlier OT literature, which is so largely prophetic. Such references increase in frequency, however, in the later Jewish writings, and are numerous in NT; this is due partly to the foreign influences (Babylonian, Persian, and Greek) under which the Jews came in exilic and post-exilic times, and partly to the fact that the earlier beliefs, after being transformed, lent themselves as explanations of some of the religious problems that were arising.

For the Gk. (Hellenistic) term δαίμωνιον or δαίμων (see below, § 6), whence the English term 'demon' is derived, Hebrew possesses no clear equivalent. Δαίμωνιον occurs in the LXX only in Dt. 32:17 Ps. 90:6 95:106 37:13 132:34 14:65 31:11 [BA] and in Tobit; yet it represents no fewer than five Hebrew words, viz., ʿilil, gad, šāʾir, šiyri, and šed (Dt. 32:17 Ps. 106:37, cp 91:6, where š reads שָׁדַי for שָׁדַי). Of these the first is a general term for false gods; details as to the second and the third will be found in the articles FORTUNE and SATYR, and as to the fourth in WILD BEASTS; only the last is translated 'demon' in RV.

Similar objects of popular superstition are LILITH, AZAZEL, ASMODEUS (in Tobit), and probably the 'horse-leech' of Prov. 30:15 (see HORSE-LEECH). For details of these also reference must be made to the separate articles. Closely connected with the present subject is the practice of consulting the dead,¹ to which we have reference in the earliest narrative literature (1 S. 28). See DIVINATION, § 4.

Jewish demonology, then, is the result of the survival of primitive Hebrew (Semitic) beliefs, which, having been neither suppressed by, nor wholly assimilated to, the prophetic religion, were quickened by contact with Babylonian, Persian, and Greece (cp š's use of δαίμωνιον, as above, § 2). The chief primitive survivals in the Jewish belief are the quasi-divine character of these beings as shown by the sacrifices offered to them (Dt. 32:17, cp Bar. 4:7 1 Cor. 10:20 Ps. 106:37 Lev. 17:7; cp further, in š, Is. 65:11, and the sacrifice to AZAZEL [q.v.] described in Lev. 16), their undefined yet local character shown by their association with waste places (Is. 13:21 34:14, cp Rev. 18:2 Bar. 4:35, and [Vg.] Tob. 8:3), and their connection with animals, indicated by their sharing the waste places with wild beasts (foregoing references, and Mk. 1:13), and the meaning of such a term as šāʾirīm (hairy ones, goats); on the similar character of the Arabian jinn, see Robertson Smith's Rel. Sem. (2) 120 ff.

The term that is most generic in character is certainly šēdīm. Unfortunately the etymology of the word is doubtful, for the view that it signifies 4. šēdīm. 'lord' (Mühlau and Volck's Gesenius) cannot be said to be well supported. The cognate word in Assyrian (šidu) denotes the gods or genii who, in the form of huge winged bulls, guard the entrances of the temples (COT 140). In both passages (exilic or post-exilic) where šēdīm occurs in OT it is used quite generally of illegitimate objects of worship (Dt. 32:17 Ps. 106:37), and in the Pesh. šidā is the equivalent of δαίμωνιον. In the later Jewish writings the šēdīm are frequently referred to as noxious spirits (see Buxtorf, Lex., s.v.); this they have not definitely become in the

OT (on the šēdīm see further Dr. and Di. on Dt. 32:17; Hi., Now. on Hos. 12:12 (read לְשֵׁרִים for לְשֵׁרִים); Che. Psalms, 258; OPs. 334; G. Hoffmann, Ueber einige phönikische Inschriften, 55, n. 1). See SHADDAI, § 2, and cp SIDDIM, VALE OF.

When angels came to be differentiated as helpful and harmful, and, later, as good and bad (see ANGELS, § 5), the harmful or bad angels closely resembled demons; the difference between the two became, in consequence, less and less. Speculations on the difference may be found in Enoch; the same uncertainty prevails in Mohammedan theology, where, e.g., it is disputed whether Iblis was an angel or a demon. G. B. G.

The classical inferiority of δαίμων (and δαίμωνιον) to θεός finds its lowest depth in the Old and the New Testaments, most plainly so in the New. Even as early as Homer the general equivalence of the two words (Od. 21.195 201) was varied by the frequent distinction between θεός as the personality (deus), and δαίμων as the more abstract, less nameable influence (numen), and by the sense of lucklessness in the adjective δαίμονιος (Od. 18.406), as well as by such epithets for δαίμων as κακός and στυγερός. In post-Homeric Greek the inferiority grew in distinctness and degree, and gathered round itself more and more a sense of evil; and, while δαίμων (dæmon) never altogether ceased in profane Greek to be a vox media, the tendency to degradation overwhelmingly prevailed. Thus the word that stood to Hesiod (Opp. 121) for the benignant souls of heroes of the golden age, served Plato (Lys. 223) for an evil apparition, and the tragedians (Æsch. Ag. 1569, Soph. OT 1194) and the Attic orators (Lys. 278) for gloomy genii of misfortune, often attached to families or to individuals; and finally Plutarch (probably under the influence of Eastern and Alexandrian dualism) included in its category the δαίμονες φάυλοι, to whom he attributed all that was barbarous and cruel (De defectu orac. 14).

The sense of evil spirit for δαίμωνιον is in the NT quite unmistakable.

Δαίμων does not occur in the LXX, except once in ᾠ, and, according to the best authorities, appears but twice in the NT, viz. in Mt. and Mk.'s accounts of the Gerasene demoniac (Mt. 8:31 Mk. 5:12; not in Ti. WH in the second passage). Perhaps δαίμόνιον—neut. of adj. δαίμόνιος (cp τὸ θεῖον)—supplanted δαίμων as representing even more fitly the abstract and unnameable. Cp δαίμόνια κακὰ, Plat. Ἀπολ. 26B and ξένα δαίμόνια, Acts 17:18.

The word δαίμόνιον (used in the NT about sixty times), best reproduced as 'dæmon,' is almost entirely confined to genii in the worst form, evil spirits possessing human beings, though it is used occasionally of evil spirits in general (Ja. 2:19), and once (as above, Acts 17:18) of heathen gods of an inferior order, as well as three times in one passage (1 Cor. 10:20 f.) of evil spirits working in the background of idolatry. (See The Thinker, May 1895.¹)

The identity of dæmon and evil spirit is obvious from such passages as Lk. 8:2 and 1 Tim. 4:1, and from the comparison of such passages as Mk. 1:26 and Lk. 4:35, Mk. 8:30 and Jn. 10:20, Rev. 16:13 and 14.

The accounts of evil spirits as possessing are confined to the Synoptists and Acts, though the idea crops up also in Jn., only however in 7:20 8:48 f. 52, and 10:20 f. (δαίμωνιζομαι and ἔχειν δαίμόνιον, said of Jesus himself), and never as actually posited by the writer.

The period immediately embracing the Christian era saw a vast development of the idea of dæmons or genii, which may be traced to the survival of early animistic conceptions in a higher stage of culture (see Tylor, Prim. Cult., chap. 14 f.). For our present purpose it is most important to refer to the Persian, the Hellenistic-Jewish, and the Talmudic beliefs. We shall, however, here limit ourselves to the second of these classes of evidence, which appeals most to ordinary educated readers (see also below, § 11, and cp PERSIA).

On the philosophic basis of the Platonic Ideai or Forms, and the Stoic Logoi or Reasons, combined with the Hebrew conception of angels, Philo had bridged over his dualistic gulf between God and the world with intermediate beings, some 'blessed' and others 'profane'; the incorporeal souls being pure and hovering in the air, which was full of them, some of them, however, descending into bodies and so becoming impure. These 'souls' are identified by him with the 'angels' of Moses and the 'dæmons' of 'other philosophers' (de Conf. Ling. 35; de Gigant. 2-4). A kindred belief in dæmons as good and evil media of divine action pervaded the cosmology of the Pythagoreans and Neo-Platonists towards the close of the first century A.D. (Hatch, Hibb. Lect. 216 ff.; Zeller, Die Phil. der Griech. iii. 1(4) 291); and Epicetetus, about the same date, held that 'all things were full of gods and dæmons' (Zeller, iii. 1(3) 745). Josephus also (seeking, like Philo, to conciliate Jewish and heathen views) testifies to the prevalence of a similar belief among his countrymen, but in his description makes the dæmons exclusively πνεύματα ἀνθρώπων (Ant. viii. 25; BJ vii. 63). On the Talmudic evidence for the contemporary Jewish acceptance (doubtless developed under Parsee influence) of a countless number of spirits, good and bad, and legions of dæmons lying in wait for men, see Edersheim, Life of Jesus, Ap. xiii., and cp Weber, Altsyn. Theol. 242 ff.

The number, prominence, and activity, therefore, of evil spirits in the NT is in general harmony with the views of the times.

Germinal ideas of possession are to be found even in Homer (Od. 5.396, where a δαίμων στυγερὸς causes a wasting sickness). The verb δαμονῶν represents insanity in Æschylus (Choeph. 566), Euripides (Phæn. 888), Aristophanes (Thesm. 1054) and Plutarch (Vit. Marcell. 20); whilst Herodotus (479), Euripides (Bacch. 298 ff.), and other writers attribute to divine possession the frenzy of the Bacchantes and Corybantes. To a sense of the same mysterious power may be traced Herodotus's name ἱπὸ νόστος for epilepsy (Hippocrates, 400 B.C., attributed the disease to natural causes), and the phrase of the Greek physician Aretæus (1st century, A.D.), δαίμονος εἰς τὸν ἄνθρωπον εἰσόδος. That the nations with whom the Jews in later times were brought into contact held similar views in systematised forms has often been shown (see below, § 11), and we cannot doubt that, though not originating in any one of these forms, the popular belief of the Jews was largely influenced by the beliefs of their neighbours. That belief, as reflected in the NT, regards the dæmons (which are spirits entirely evil) as a definite class of beings, injuriously affecting, mostly internally and by possession, the human, and (in the case of the Gerasene swine) the animal personality, the subjects being usually described as δαμονιζόμενοι, 'dæmonised' (all the Gospels, though only once each in Lk. and Jn.)—the less classical form of δαμονώμενοι, and the equivalent of Josephus's οἱ ὑπὸ τῶν δαιμονίων λαμβανόμενοι, by which phrase is justified the rendering 'possessed.' The moral connexion of dæmons in the NT is subordinate. Without doubt they are regarded as diametrically (though by no means with dualistic equality) opposed to the work of Christ, and their subjugation is looked upon (especially by Lk.) as his primary healing function and as the sign above all others, that the kingdom of God had come (Lk. 13.32-11.20). Their moral and spiritual influence is recognised in Jesus' parable of the unclean spirit (Mt. 12.43 Lk. 11.24); in what Paul says of the 'table of dæmons' (1 Cor. 10.20 f.); in the 'doctrines of dæmons' of 1 Tim. 4.1, and in Rev. 9.20, where the worshipping of dæmons (cp Dt. 32.17 ὄ) is another expression for idolatry. This moral and spiritual evil in the dæmonic world is also certainly kept in view whenever the NT writers speak of the opposition of God and the devil (Ja. 4.7); of the subjugation thenceforth by Christ of the kingdom of evil (Lk. 10.18 f. 1 Jn. 3.8 Rom. 16.20); and of the final destruction (Mk. 1.24 Mt. 8.29) of the devil and his angels in the lake of fire (Rev. 20.10), after a period of relative independence which finds its counterpart in the moral and spiritual freedom of man.

The effects of dæmonic possession which are constantly

¹ [On this second theory relative to the demons, viz., that they are the spirits of the (wicked) dead, see Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, 191 f., where, on the ground of their residence in the tombs and of the passage from Josephus referred to above, it is maintained that the two demoniacs in Mt. 8.28 were (thought themselves) possessed by spirits of the dead.]

prominent in the Synoptists, however, appearing occasionally in Jn. and in Acts (87 16.16 19.16), are physical and psychical, and must be distinguished from Satanic influence such as that upon David in 1 Ch. 21.1, or upon Judas in Jn. 13.27. It is not a mere influence: it is a besetting internal malady. This form of possession, which presupposes a large development of the belief in dæmons, is distinctive of late Jewish times, as we see not only from the Gospels, but also from the references of Josephus (especially Ant. viii. 25), and from the quasi-professional status of Jewish¹ (as previously of Egyptian and Persian) exorcists (Acts 19.13 [περιερχομένων] Mk. 9.38 Mt. 12.27; Justin, Apol. 26 Trypho, 311; Pliny, HN 80.2), as well as from the many methods of expulsion recorded in the Talmudic writings (Edersheim, Life of Jesus, Ap. xvi.; cp Jos. Ant. viii. 25 BJ vii. 63; Solomon's ring and the root baaras).²

One point to be carefully noted is that, whilst at times disease is attributed to dæmons, possession is not a comprehensive word for disease in general. The practice of the Synoptists in this respect is not quite uniform.

They all, in their summary records of healings, agree in distinguishing the dæmonised from the sick (Mt. 10.8 Mk. 1.32 Lk. 6.17 f.), while Mt. (4.24) expressly distinguishes them also from the lunatic (σκληροζόμενοι). They all likewise, in the mention of individual cases, agree in speaking of maladies without making any reference to possession (Mt. 9.27-31 Lk. 17.11-19 Mk. 7.32-37). Out of twelve individual cases which Mk. records, eight are so presented; and, in the six of these recorded by Mt. and Lk., as well as in cases peculiar to them, reference to possession is also absent. Mk., in the four remaining cases, confines possession to psychical maladies, such as insanity and epilepsy; Mt. and Lk. add cases in which possession takes the form of purely bodily disease—dumbness, Lk. 11.14 Mt. 9.32 f.; dumbness and blindness, Mt. 12.22; curvature of the spine, Lk. 13.10-17. The comparison of these agreements and differences suggests that the tendency to account for purely bodily disease by possession was a tendency, not of Mt. and Lk. themselves, but of a source or sources used by them but unknown to Mk. (see Schür. JPT, vol. xviii., 1892).

The drift of the evidence seems to carry us to the conclusion that the idea of possession was associated, in the main, with psychical disease (cp also Mk. 5.15 Lk. 7.33 Jn. 7.20), and this is confirmed by the hints thrown out here and there that this affliction was of all afflictions the direst and most impracticable. The peculiar emphasis laid by Jesus upon the power given to the missionary disciples to expel demons (Mt. 10.1 and parallels); the special exultation of the Seventy upon their return, 'Even the dæmons are subject unto us' (Lk. 10.17); the intense amazement at the ease with which Jesus cast out the spirits (e.g., Lk. 4.36), dispensing with the more elaborate incantations and manipulations of the professional exorcist;³ the helplessness of will in the possessed; their identification of themselves with the dæmon, their aversion to deliverance (Lk. 9.39), and the wrench with which the deliverance was sometimes effected (Mk. 1.24); the fact that Jesus never in these cases called for faith, but seems to have felt that only some external force, acting in spite of the subjects of the disease, could free them from it; all these considerations point to psychical, nervous disorder, which could, of course, manifest itself in various forms.

There is no sign on the part of Jesus any more than on the part of the evangelists, of mere accommodation to the current belief. It is true that

10. Attitude of Jesus. 'Satan' is used metaphorically in the rebuke of Peter (Mt. 16.23) and that 'unclean spirit' (πνεῦμα ἀκάθαρτον) is figurative in Mt. 12.43. Accommodation is just admissible in the commission to the disciples (Mt. 108), in Jesus' exultation at their success (Lk. 10¹⁷ f.), and his reproof of their failure (Mt. 17²⁰); or the phraseology may possibly have been coloured by the belief of the writers (as also in Mk. 134, where the knowledge of the daemons is described as superhuman). Acceptance of the current belief is clearly at the basis of Jesus' argument with the Pharisees in Lk. 11¹⁶ ff., however, and this is quoted by Keim as irrefragable evidence. On the other hand, the indefinite multiplication of spirits, and the grotesque functions ascribed to them in contemporary and later Jewish literature, and the wholesale belief in possession in the second century A.D., find no favour with Jesus or his biographers or in NT literature generally. While the existence of Satan's ministers is recognised, the tendency is rather to concentrate the influences for evil in Satan himself. Finally, that Jesus believed in the power of others besides himself and his disciples to expel demons in some sense, at any rate, seems clear in the presence of such passages as Mt. 12²⁷ Lk. 11¹⁹, where he attributes the power to the disciples of the Pharisees; he recognises also the fact that similar success was attained by some who used his name without actually following him (Mk. 9³⁸), or without being more than professed disciples (Mt. 7²²). J. M.

² The plant which gave rise to the fable of Baaras was probably a strange-looking crucifer described by Tristram, Land of Moab, who found it near Callirrhoe.

The chief foreign influence on Jewish demonology was no doubt Babylonian. It was partly direct, partly indirect. For though Iranian superstition had an internal principle of development, it was early fertilised from Babylonia. For instance, the seven devas or arch-demons of Zoroastrianism are a reflection of the seven evil or destructive spirits who play such a part in Babylonian mythology (see Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 634, 776), and who in a famous incantation are called 'the Seven' (see Zimmer's translation of the text, Vater, Sohn u. Fürsprecher, 7 f. [196]), and the supposed capacity of the formula of the Ahuna-vairya to drive away the devas is but a sublimated form of the Babylonian belief in the recitation of the hymns to the gods. Hence, even when a Jewish belief, such as the grouping of seven demons, characteristic of Jewish popular superstition (Mt. 12⁴⁵ Lk. 11²⁶ Mk. 16⁹ Lk. 8²), appears to be shaped by Persian influences (for names of demons of Persian origin besides ASMODEUS [g.v.] see Hamburger, RE ii.1 281), it is very possible that Babylonia gave the first impulse to Persia. The doctrine of 'disease-possession' among the Jews may very well have been taught in pre-exilic times;¹ but it is probable that it was when the Jews were conscious of the displeasure of their God, and when they became more and more exposed to foreign influences, that this doctrine attained its full dimensions, as we see it in the NT. It is not so much from Persia as from Egypt and Babylon that the stimulus for its development was derived. The Egyptian view described in Orig. c. Cels. 8⁵⁸ (Schürer), that the human body was divided into thirty-six members, and that with each of these was connected a separate demon, by rebuking whom a member could be cured of disease, is but a more specialised form of the doctrine of the Book of the Dead.² The doctrine of disease among the ancient Babylonians was that the swarming demons could enter a man's body and cause sickness. On a fragment of a tablet Budge has found six evil spirits mentioned by name. The first attacked the head; the second, the lips; the third, the forehead; the fourth, the breast; the fifth, the viscera; the sixth, the hand.³ It was the duty of the exorcist to expel these demons by incantations, and the Zoroastrians believed that Zarathustra, by reciting the formula called the Ahuna-vairya, 'caused all the devas to vanish in the ground who aforetime flew about the earth in human shape.'¹ The Zoroastrian religion, therefore, gave its adherents some rest from this baleful belief. Fidelity to its law could avert the danger which arose from the existence of the devas created by Angra-mainyu. That was also a part of the mission of the Law as consolidated by Ezra, and above all of a greater than either Moses or Ezra. The 'authority and power' with which Jesus Christ 'commanded the unclean spirits' (Lk. 4³⁶) astonished his contemporaries, and contrasts even with the comparative facility ascribed to Zarathustra. It is hardly necessary to add that similar phenomena to those described in the Gospels are still to be met with, not only in savage districts, but also in countries of an ancient civilisation such as India and China.

¹ [The sacrifices to the še'irim [2 K. 238, as emended by G. Hoffmann, ZATW 2175 (82); Lev. 17⁷] may have been in part designed to avert diseases (cp the Arabian belief in jinn described by We. Ar. Heid. 138, 2nd ed. 154; WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 120). Cp also the rite of AZAZEL.]

On this subject see J. L. Nevins, Demon Possession and allied Themes; being an inductive Study of Phenomena of our own Times (Chicago, New York, and Toronto, 1895). Of Babylonian demonology we still lack an adequate presentation. Among the older books Lenormant's La magie chez les Chaldéens (1st ed., 1874) bears most directly on the subject. For evidence of the long-continued influence of Babylonian on Jewish superstition, see Stübe, Jüdisch-babylonische Zaubertexte (95). On Zoroastrian beliefs, see the translation of the Zendavesta in SBE. DEPOSIT. The OT law of deposit is laid down in E (Ex. 22⁷⁻¹³ [6-12]; cp the paraphrase in Jos. Ant. iv. 8³⁸).

With the exception of v. 9 [8] the law is clear. Two kinds of deposit are specified: (a) money (מָנֶה), or goods (מִלְכָּאָה), (b) ass, ox, sheep, or any beast. (b) To take the second group of cases first: if the deposit be stolen the depositary must make restitution (12 [11]). Should it be torn by wild beasts the production of a piece is sufficient witness, and a man cannot be called upon to make good that which was torn (13 [12], cp CATTLE, § 9). Where culpability cannot be made out the depositary swears that he is innocent and the depositor is bound to accept his word (10 f. [9 f.]). (a) In cases of the first description, should the deposit be stolen, the thief, if found, must restore twofold 7 [6], cp v. 4 [3]; if the culprit be not found the depositary must come before the Elōhim and swear that he has not put his hand to his neighbour's property (8 [7]). The result must have been as above in v. 11² that the depositor was bound to accept his word. Verse 9 [8] alone remains and is not easily reconciled with the foregoing; it may be a later law added to cover general cases (both a and b) involving alleged gross carelessness, false accusations, and libel.²

The later law of Lev. 62-7 [521-26] applies the law of the 'guilt offering' to sin and trespass in 'a matter of deposit' (so RV; מִלְכָּאָה; παραθήκη, depositum). The only case here contemplated, however, is that in which voluntary confession is made; the penitent depositary is to make restitution in full, and the fifth part more thereto, and offer a ram to Yahwē. Cp LAW AND JUSTICE, § 17.

The use of the words παραθήκη, παρατίθεμαι, παρακαταθήκη, and παρακατατίθεμαι in E (Lev. 624 Tob. 10¹³ [12] [1] commit my daughter unto thee in special trust 12 Macc. 8¹⁰ 15⁹ 25 Jer. 40⁷ 41¹⁰) sufficiently explains the expressions in 1 Tim. 6²⁰ 2 Tim. 1¹² 14 (RVmg. 'deposit' in all three cases). At Jerusalem (as at Rome, Olympia, Delphi, and elsewhere) a large amount of wealth ('which did not pertain to the account of the sacrifices,' but was in fact private property) was consigned to the safe custody of the temple (see the story of Heliodorus in 2 Macc. 3, where in v. 15 express reference is made to the 'law concerning deposits'). DERBE (Δερβη [Ti. WH; Str.], Δερβαι [Hier. Synec. 675]). Paul visited Derbe at least twice (Acts 14.20 16.1), and probably once again, in his third journey (Acts 18.23 'went over all the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order'). From the fact that the name does not occur in the list of places in which he had suffered persecution (2 Tim. 3.11), it may perhaps be inferred that the work of evangelisation encountered no obstacle there. That success attended the apostles at Derbe we learn from Acts 14.21. Gaius, one of Paul's companions from Corinth to Asia, was a native of the town (Acts 20.4).

From Steph. Byz. we learn that the town was called also Δέλεβει, 'which in the Lycaonian tongue signifies a juniper-bush.' The site was approximately discovered by Sterrett, who put it between Bossola and Zosta (or Losta), villages two miles apart (Wolfe Exped. 23). Ramsay, however, says that the ruins at Bossola are merely those of a Seljuk khan, whilst those at Zosta have all been transported thither from some other site. The great site of the district is the mound of Gudelissin in the plain about 3 m. NW. of Zosta, and 45 m. S. of Konia, (Iconium) at the foot of the Masallah Dag. The mound is of the class called by Strabo (537) 'mounds of Semiramis,' which are largely artificial, and of Oriental origin. It contains numerous traces of Roman occupation. The earliest city of Derbe must be sought in the mountains to the south.

This situation agrees with the notices in Strabo. After describing the ten Strategia of Cappadocia, he adds that in the first century B.C. there was an eleventh Strategia, consisting of part of Lycaonia, Cilicia, and Cappadocia (535, ἡ περὶ Καστάβαλδ τε καὶ Κύβιστρα μέχρι τῆς Ἀντιπάτρου τοῦ ληστοῦ Δέρβης). He refers to the same district (537) as the additional (ἐπιπλεονέουσα) Strategia. Derbe is further described as lying on the frontier of Isauria (Str. 569, τῆς δ' Ἰσαυρίας ἔστιν ἐν πλευραῖς ἡ Δέρβη); the words which immediately follow (μάλιστα τῇ Καππαδοκίᾳ ἐπιπεφυκὸς τοῦ Ἀντιπάτρου τυραννείου) refer to the fact that it was also on the frontier of the eleventh Strategia, an external addition to Cappadocia as above described. It is clear that Strabo's eleventh Strategia is identical with Ptolemy's 'Strategia Antiochiane,' in which he enumerates Derbe (Ptol. 56).

Derbe was the stronghold of the brigand chief Antipater (Cic. Ep. ad Fam. 13.73; Str. 535, 569, ὁ 2. History. Δερβήτης). When, however, King Amyntas slew Antipater, he added the town to his own Lycaonian and Galatian dominions (29-27 B.C.).

On the death of Amyntas himself in 25 B.C. the larger part of his kingdom was made by the Romans into the province Galatia; but apparently Derbe, along with Cilicia Tracheia (i.e., the eleventh Strategia), was given to Archelaos, king of Cappadocia (circa 20 B.C.). When Archelaos died in 17 A.D. the Cappadocian part of his kingdom was taken over by the Romans; but the Lycaonian part was left to his son Archelaos II., who was still reigning in 36 A.D. (cp Tac. Ann. 2.42 6.41). Two years later the region described by Strabo as the eleventh Strategia, and by Ptolemy as the Strategia Antiochiane, was assigned by Caligula to Antiochus IV. and Iotape Philadelphos. Soon afterwards Antiochus lost favour, and was deprived of his kingdom. In 41 A.D. Claudius restored the territory to Antiochus and Iotape, who ruled until 72 A.D. It appears, however, that on this restoration the Lycaonian section of the realm of Antiochus was detached and permanently assigned to Galatia. Derbe therefore became part of that province. The transference was due to the importance of the town as a frontier post in the SE. of the Roman province. Claudius remodelled its constitution and honoured the place with the title Claudio-Derbe (see Rams. Hist. Geog. of A.M., 336, 371 f., and Church in Rom. Emp. 54).

Thus we can understand how at the time of Paul's visit (46 or 48 A.D.) Derbe could be correctly described as a city of Lycaonia (Acts 14.6), for so it was from the point of view of geography or ethnography. Politically, however, Derbe belonged to the province of Galatia, and it is argued by Ramsay that in the language of polite address its inhabitants must have been ἄνδρες Γαλάται (Gal. 3.1), not Λυκάονες, which latter term signified the population of the non-Roman part of Lycaonia (see, however, GALATIA). DESERT. The English word 'desert' ordinarily means a sterile sandy plain without vegetation and water —a 'sea of sand,' such as, e.g., parts of the Sahara. This is not the meaning of the Hebrew words. No desert of this kind was known to Israel either before or after the occupation of Canaan. The districts to which the term 'desert' is applied in EV are, at the present day, frequently covered with vegetation, and were probably even more prosperous in the past (see more fully the articles on the place-names enumerated in § 3). 'Wilderness,' by which the Hebrew terms are sometimes translated, is a somewhat better rendering; but it is not always adequate. It will be convenient here to record the Hebrew words, and to indicate other terms of analogous meaning.

1. General meaning.

(1) דֶּשֶׁת, horbāh (from דָּרַב 'to lay waste,' ἐρημος; also ἐρημία, Ezek. 35.4, ἐρημωσις, Jer. 7.34 [BAQ] 22.5; οἰκόμενον Ps. 102.6 [7], 'desert,' RV 'waste places'; so EV 'waste,'

2. Hebrew terms.

Lev. 26.31 Is. 61.4; or 'desolation,' Jer. 44.2; cp Ezek. 38.12 AV only), used of cities and regions formerly inhabited but now lying waste or in ruins from war or neglect; cp Jer. 44.2, 'the cities are a desolation and no man dwelleth therein'; hence in threats (e.g., Lev. 26.31), or in promises (with בְּיָמֶיךָ)—once with reference to the wilderness of wanderings (Is. 48.21).

(2) שִׁמּוֹן, šimōn (שָׁמַן, 'be desolate'; for cognates see below, 7), [שָׁמַן] šimōn, used of a district riverless and uninhabited (Is. 43.19, EV 'desert,' [מִדְבָּר], of the wilderness of wanderings (Dt. 32.10, EV 'wilderness'; Ps. 78.40, EV 'desert,' [מִדְבָּר]; otherwise, a geographical designation; cp § 3, 2, 3, and see BETH-JESHIMOTH, JESHIMON).

(3) מִדְבָּר, midbār (ērmos, etc.; once [Is. 41.19] ἀνδρος γῆ; AV 'desert,' RV 'wilderness'; but in Gen. 14.6, etc., EV 'wilderness'; once, Ps. 75.6 [7], EV 'south' [RVmg. 'wilderness of the mountains' 1]). The idea of 'desert' is totally foreign to this word (on its derivation see CATTLE, § 5). Midbār is a district possessing pastures (Joel 2.22, Ps. 65.12 [13]) and cities (Is. 42.11), but occupied by nomads, not by settled tillers of the soil (cp esp. Nu. 14.33). It is commonly employed to denote the wilderness of wanderings, which itself is a mountainous region, not without pasture grounds, and so devoid of sand that the one tract which forms an exception has the characteristic name Debbet er-Ramlah, 'plain of sand'; see below, § 3, 1.

(4) עֲרָבָה, arābah (āraḥa [ḥ] πρὸς δυσμαίς, Josh. 11.16, etc.), in poetical literature often occurs in parallelism with midbār (Is. 35.1 [ērmos] 40.3 41.19, EV 'desert'). In Jer. 50.12 it approximates more closely to the modern idea of 'desert' (cp Is. 35.1 Jer. 51.43; [עֲרָבָה]; but in historical writings (early and late) it is a geographical term (see § 3, 2, below).

(5) צִיָּה, ṣiyāh ('dry land' [so Ps. 63.1 (2), EV], Job 80.3, AV RVmg. 'wilderness,' RV 'dry ground'; cp [צִיָּה], 'dry place,' Is. 25.5 32.2), used of the wilderness of wanderings, Ps. 137 (AV 'wilderness,' RV 'desert,' RVmg. 'dry land'). For צִיָּה, dwellers of the 'desert' (Is. 13.21 34.14, EV; also 23.13, AV; referring to wild beasts) or 'wilderness' (Ps. 72.9 74.14, EV; referring to human beings), see CAT, WILD BEASTS.

DESIRE

A still more forcible term is—

(6) ḥēḇēl (Ps. 107.40 Job 12.24; EV 'wilderness'), used of the wilderness of wandering, Dt. 32.10 (with ḥēḇēl 'howling waste'). The word (cp et-Tih) suggests the idea of wasteness and confusion (Jer. 4.23 Job 26.7 Is. 24.10; cp Ecclus. 41.10 [Heb.]), such as existed before the creation (Gen. 1.2, see CREATION, § 7). For the sake of completeness mention may be made also of:—

(7) šāṁmāh (Is. 5.9 Jer. 42.18), šāṁmāh (Is. 1.7 6.11), šāṁmāh (Ezek. 35.7), all of which involve the idea of a devastation, not a natural state (šāṁmāh; cp no. 2).

(8) šāṁmāh, Is. 35.7 (ḥēḇēl), RV 'glowing sand,' RVmg. MIRAGE (q.v.). AV 'parched ground' is preferable; cp Aram. šāṁmāh, 'to be burnt or dried up,' and see Che. Intr. Is. 26.9. The NT terms to be mentioned are:—

(9) ἐρημία (e.g., Heb. 11.38, EV 'desert,' Mt. 15.33, 'wilderness,' RV 'desert place') and ἐρημος (e.g., Mt. 14.13, EV 'desert').

The chief districts and regions to which the above terms are applied may be here enumerated.

1. The most prominent is that which was the scene of the wanderings of Israel. It is commonly called ham-

3. Geographical midbār (Dt. 1.1, etc.); but other geographical terms (Shur, Sinai, etc.; see APPLICATIONS, GEOGRAPHY, § 7) are added to indicate more particularly the region intended. On the character of this tract, which stretches from the S. border of Palestine to Elath and forms the W. boundary of Edom, see SINAI. The only part which can fairly be described as a desert is the bare and parched district of et-Tih, and it is here that D and (more elaborately) P place the forty years' wanderings (see WANDERINGS, §§ 10. f. 16), and with this agrees the circumstance that it is only in the later writings that the horror and lonesomeness of the 'wilderness' is referred to (e.g., Dt. 8.15).

2. The great crack or depression which includes the Jordan valley, and extends N. to Antioch and S. to the gulf of Akabah, is the second great 'desert.' To the N. lay the midbār Rīblāh (Ezek. 6.14), midbār Damascus (1 K. 19.5); cp perhaps the ἐρημία of Mt. 15.33. The well-known geographical term Arābāh (see above, § 2, 4) is confined chiefly to the lower half (cp midbār Moab, Dt. 28 Nu. 21.11; midbār Kedemoth, Dt. 2.26; midbār Bezer, Dt. 4.43), see ARABAH.¹ To the NE. of the Dead Sea is applied also the term 'Jeshimon' (see JESHIMON). Allusions to the Arābāh on the W. side of the Jordan are found in 2 S. 15.23 17.16, and in it we should perhaps include the midbār Beth-Aven (Josh. 18.12), midbār Gibeon (2 S. 2.24; but see GIBEON), midbār Jericho (Jos. 16.1), and the references in Judg. 20.42 f. 1 S. 13.18. Here, too, was probably the ἐρημος of the narrative of the Temptation (Mt. 4.1). See further DEAD SEA, § 2.

3. The third tract is the midbār Judah (Josh. 15.61, Judg. 1.16), the E. part of which, along the Dead Sea, is called Jeshimon (1 S. 23.19 26.13); special limitations are the midbār Maon ('in the Arābāh' 1 S. 23.24 f.), midbār Ziph (ib. 23.14), and midbār En-gedi (1 S. 24.2 [1]). To the N. it approached the Arābāh. Here are found the midbār Tekoa (2 Ch. 20.20; cp midbār Jeruel, ib. 16), and probably the midbār of 1 K. 2.34 (Bethlehem? cp 2 S. 2.32, and see ATROTH-BETH-JOAB). To the S. lay Tamar 'in the midbār' (1 K. 9.18, בְּמִדְבָּר is a gloss), probably forming part of the great midbār in no. 1 above. On the 'desert' (ἐρημος) of Acts 8.26, see GAZA. See, further, DEAD SEA, JUDAH, PALESTINE, § 11.

DESTROYER, THE (הַמְשִׁחִית), Ex. 12.23, ΤΟΝ ΟΛΕΘΡΕΥΟΝΤΑ, cp Heb. 11.28; ο ολοθρευνων, Wisd. 18.25; ο ολοθρευντης, 1 Cor. 10.10.

In his account of the last plague, J implies that the death of the first-born was the work of the Destroyer. In the light of 2 S. 24.16, where the angel of Yahwē is described as 'the angel that destroyed the people' (הַמְשִׁחִית בָּעָם), and of 2 K. 19.35 = Is. 37.36, where the destruction of the Assyrian army is attributed to the 'angel of Yahwē,' we should be ready to infer that the 'Destroyer' of the firstborn is not a being distinct from Yahwē, but rather 'the angel of Yahwē' himself; i.e., the term denotes a self-manifestation of Yahwē in destructive activity (cp THEOPHANY, § 4). This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that the narrative speaks of 'The Destroyer' or Yahwē (v. 29) indifferently, just as other narratives use the terms 'angel of Yahwē' and 'Yahwē' interchangeably. Cp also Ex. 12.27 (Rd). The 'destroyer' is clearly identified with Yahwē by the author of the Wisdom of Solomon, who attributes the death of the firstborn to the word of God (Wisd. 18.14-16). The meaning attributed to the term by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews (11.28) is less clear.

The death of the Israelites in the plague recorded in Nu. 16.41-50 [17.6-15] is attributed directly to God. In Wisd. 18.25 it is said that these people perished by the 'Destroyer'; but here, again, the Destroyer seems to be identified by the writer with God (cp Grimm on the passage, vv. 20-25); and the same identification is possibly intended by Paul (1 Cor. 10.10). On the other hand, in 4 Macc. 7.11 the executor of death appears as a distinct angel; and generally¹ in later Jewish literature the angel of death (מלאך מוֹת) has a well-marked and distinct individuality (cp Weber, Altyn. Theol. 247 ff.) and is identified with Satan or the Devil (cp in NT Heb. 2.14 f. 1 Pet. 5.8). All this is quite foreign to the belief underlying Ex. 12.23.

It is quite in accordance with the general character of the Priestly Code, which avoids reference to angels or to the theophanic 'angel of Yahwē' (cp ANGEL, § 6), that מְשַׁחֵת, which is used in the personal sense of 'destroyer' by J (Ex. 12.23), is used as an abstract term—destruction—by P (12.13 [RVmg. 'a destroyer']; cp Ezek. 5.16 21.36 [31] 25.15). A plurality of beings who accomplish the death of men is referred to in Job 38.22 by the term מְשַׁחֵת ('slayers'), which is rendered in RV 'destroyers.' According to some commentators, such angelic ministers of death form the unnamed subject of the plural verb in Lk. 12.20.

DESTRUCTION, MOUNT OF (הַר הַמְשַׁחֵת); τοῦ ὄρους τοῦ μοσοῦθ [B], τ. ο. τ. μοσοῦθ [A^{vid.}], τ. ο. ἀμεσσῶθ [L], 2 K. 23.13, RVmg., a name so read by the later Jews on account of the idolatrous 'high places' spoken of. Tradition identified the mountain with the Mount of Olives (so Tg., followed by AVmg.), and the name has been supposed to have a double meaning—'mount of oil' (cp Aram. מִשְׁחָה) and 'mount of destruction' (so Rashi, Buxtorf). A much better explanation can be given.

Hoffmann (ZATW 2.175) and Perles (Analekten, 31) prefer to read הַר הַמְשַׁחֵת, 'mount of oil,' with some MSS; מִשְׁחָה will then be a deliberate alteration of the text. Considering, however, that we have no evidence for a Heb. word מִשְׁחָה 'oil,' it is better to suppose that the 'mount which is on the east of Jerusalem' (1 K. 11 7) was anciently called, not only 'the ascent of the olives' (2 S. 15 30), and in a late prophecy 'the mount of olives' (Zech. 14 4), but הַר הַבְּשִׁטִּים ('mount of those who worship'), of which הַר הַבְּשִׁטִּים would be a purely accidental corruption. Cp 2 S. 15 32, 'And when David had come to the summit, where men are wont to worship the deity' (אִשֵּׁר יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה), which comes near proving that this view is correct. Observe, too, that the Mt. of Olives appears to be once referred to as the 'hill of God' (Is. 10 32 emended text). See Nob.

Brocardus (1283 A.D.) gives the name Mons Offensionis (cp Vg.) to the most southern eminence of the Mt. of Olives, because Solomon set up there the image of Moloch; on the northern summit, afterwards called Mons Scandalis, he placed the idol of Chemosh. Quaresmius, however (circa 1630 A.D.), calls the southern ridge Mons Offensionis et Scandalis. Grätz, after a full discussion, pronounces in favour of the northern summit, i.e., the 'Viri Galilaei' (MGWJ, '73, p. 97 ff.); so also Stanley (SP 188, n. 2). No doubt this view is correct; Solomon would certainly prefer an eminence already consecrated by tradition.

The phrase 'mount of destruction' is found also in Jer. 51 25 as a symbolic term for Babylon (EV 'destroying mountain').

DEUTERONOMY. The name comes ultimately from the Greek translation of Dt. 17 18, in which the

1. Name and contents. words מִשְׁנֵה הַתּוֹרָה הַזֹּאת duplicate (i.e., a copy) of this law, are rendered ὁ δευτερονόμιος νόμος.¹ As a title of the book, δευτερονόμιος (without the article) occurs first in Philo.² Philo takes the word to mean 'second or supplementary legislation,' and more than once cites the book as ἑρμηνεύς.³ Others, with Theodoret, explain the name, 'repetition, recapitulation of the law.' Criticism has shown that Deuteronomy is neither a supplement to the legislation in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, nor a résumé of it; but to modern critics also it is the Second Legislation, an expansion and revision of older collections of laws such as are preserved in Ex. 21-23 34.

Deuteronomy contains the last injunctions and admonitions of Moses, delivered to Israel in the land of Moab, as they were about to cross the Jordan to the conquest of Canaan; and, with the exception of chaps. 27 31 34, and a few verses elsewhere, is all in the form of address. It is not, however, one continuous discourse, but consists of at least three distinct speeches (1-4 40, 5-26, 28, 29 ff.), together with two poems recited by Moses in the hearing of the people (32 ff.). The narrative chapters record doings and sayings of Moses in the last days of his life, and are more or less closely connected with the speeches. Besides this unity of situation and subject there is a certain unity of texture; the sources from which the other books of the Hexateuch are chiefly compiled (JE, P) are in Deuteronomy recognisable only in the narrative chapters, and in a few scattered fragments in the speeches; a strong and distinctive individuality of thought, diction, and style pervades the entire book.

It was observed by more than one of the fathers that Deuteronomy is the book the finding of which in the temple gave the impulse to the reforms of the eighteenth year of Josiah (622-621 B.C.).⁵ In conformity with the prescriptions of the newly discovered book, the king not only extirpated the various foreign religions which had been introduced in ancient or recent times, together with the rites and symbols of a heathenish worship of Yahwè, but also destroyed the high places of Yahwè, desecrating every altar in the land except that in the temple in Jerusalem (2 K. 22 f.). In Deuteronomy, and there alone, all the laws thus enforced are found; the inference is inevitable that Deuteronomy furnished the reformers with their new model. This is confirmed by the references to the book found in the temple as 'the law-book' (2 K. 22 8; cp 23 24 f.) and 'the covenant book' (23 2 f. 21).

The former of these names is found in the Pentateuch only in the secondary parts of Dt. (28 61 29 20 30 10 31 24 26), and, like the phrase 'this law' (48 27 38 29 29), signifies Dt. or the deuteronomic legislation exclusively; 'covenant book' is an appropriate designation for a book in which the covenant of Yahwè with Israel (see COVENANT, § 6) is an often recurring theme (5 2 f. 17 2 29 1 4 13 23 29 9 12 14 21 25, etc.).¹

That the book read by Shaphan before Josiah was Deuteronomy has been inferred also from the king's consternation (2 K. 22 11 ff.), which seems to show that the law was accompanied by such denunciations of the consequences of disobedience as are found especially in Dt. 28.

The opinion, once very generally entertained, that the book found by Hilkiah was the whole Pentateuch, is no longer tenable. In addition to arguments of more or less weight drawn from the narrative in Kings,—that the whole Pentateuch would hardly be described as a law-book; that a book as long as the Pentateuch could not be read through twice in a single day (2 K. 22 8); that, with the entire legislation before him, the king would not have based his reforms on deuteronomic laws exclusively,—recent investigation has proved that the priestly legislation in the Pentateuch was not united with Deuteronomy till long after the time of Josiah.² Modern critics are, therefore, almost unanimous in the opinion that the law-book, the discovery and the introduction of which are related in 2 K. 22 f. (see next §), is to be sought in Deuteronomy; and they are very generally agreed, further, that the book was written either in the earlier years of Josiah, or at least under one of his next predecessors, Manasseh or Hezekiah (see § 16).

The soundness of these conclusions has recently been impugned by several French and German scholars (Seinecke, Havet, d'Eichthal, Vernes, Horst),³ on the ground,

3. Account in 2 K. 22 f. partly of sweeping doubts concerning the trustworthiness of 2 K. 22 f., partly of peculiar theories of the composition of Dt. These theories cannot be discussed here; but the great importance of 2 K. 22 f., in the modern construction of the history of Hebrew literature and religion, makes it necessary to examine briefly the historical character of those chapters. It is generally agreed that the account of Josiah's reforms, as it lies before us, is the work of an author of the deuteronomic school, who wrote after the destruction of Jerusalem. If this author had drawn solely upon oral tradition, he might well have derived his information from eye-witnesses of the events of 621; but it seems to be demonstrable that in 22 3-23 24 he made use of an older written source, a contemporary account of Josiah's reign, which was probably included in the pre-exilic history of the kings. This narrative was wrought over and enlarged by the exilic writer; in particular, the original response of Huldah, which was not confirmed by the event, was superseded, after the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C., by a wholly different one, in which the judgment is represented as inevitable (22 15-20; cp 23 26 f.); 23 15-20, also, is generally recognised as a legendary addition; but, notwithstanding these changes, the outlines of the original account can be reconstructed with reasonable confidence, and it appears to be in all respects deserving of credence.⁴ See KINGS.

The historical evidence proves only that the law-book which was put into force by Josiah contained certain

4. Josiah's Dt. deuteronomic laws concerning religion, =chaps. 5-26 28 not that it comprised the whole of the present Book of Deuteronomy. A superficial examination of the book shows that the latter cannot have been the case.

Chaps. 31-34 are composite. Besides the two poems, 32 1-43 and 33, they contain the links which connect not only Dt.

¹ Ex. 21-23, often called by modern scholars 'The Covenant Book' (see 24 7), cannot be meant; for, so far from putting the high places under the ban, these laws assume the existence and legitimacy of many local sanctuaries (see 21 6 23 14 ff.; cp 22 24).

but also the narratives of JE and P in Nu. with Josh. Chap. 27, also in narrative form, may, both on external and on internal grounds, with equal confidence be set aside.¹ What remains (1-26 28-30) is all in the form of address; but even this is not a unit, as is shown by the fresh superscriptions in 5:12; 29:2, and the formal closes in 26:16-19 and 29:1 [28 69]; in particular, 1:1-4 and 44:4-9 are completely parallel introductions, which strictly exclude each other. Chaps. 5-26 contain no allusion to a former discourse such as 1-4 40; nor do the latter chapters form a natural introduction to 5-26 or 12-26. Chaps. 1-4 are distinguished also by slight, but not insignificant, peculiarities of style, and more decisive differences of historical representation. The short prophetic discourse, 29:7, bears all the marks of a later addition to the book; 29:1 [28 69] is a formal subscription; the following chapters have their own brief superscription; the tone of 29:7 is noticeably different from that of the exhortations and warnings in the body of the book.

Most recent critics conclude that the original Deuteronomy contained only the one long speech of Moses, 5-26 28, to which 44:5-9 is the introduction and 29:1 [28 69] the conclusion.

Others, urging that the book put into the hands of Josiah is uniformly described as a law-book, infer that it is to be sought in Dt. 12-26 alone; 5-11, as well as 1-4, is an introduction subsequently prefixed to the original Deuteronomy by another hand. This conclusion is confirmed by the way in which the author of 5-11 dilates on the motives for keeping the laws, as though the laws themselves were already known to his readers.²

Against this view, which would limit the primitive Dt. to 12-26, it is argued that the law-book itself presupposes some such introduction as is found in 5-11. In 12-26 there is nothing to show when or by whom the law was promulgated; 5:1 supplies precisely the information which 12:1 presumes; 5:2-22 recites the covenant at Horeb, with the Decalogue, its fundamental law; 5:23 ff. explains the relation of the laws now about to be delivered to that former law and covenant. To this answers 29:1 [28 69], which is the subscription, not to 28 alone, but to the whole law-book: 'These are the words of the covenant which Yahweh commanded Moses to make with the Israelites in the land of Moab, besides the covenant which he made with them at Horeb.'

The situation supposed in 12-26 is throughout the same as that described in 5-11. The language and style of the two portions present just that degree of resemblance and of difference which, remembering the difference of subject matter, we should expect to find in the writing of one author; nothing indicates diversity of origin.³

In regard to chap. 28 also, critics are divided. Wellhausen finds in 28:58 ff.—where, as in 30:10, the law is already a book—evidence that 28, as well as 29 ff., is secondary; these three chapters formed the conclusion of an enlarged edition of the law-book, to which 5-11 was the introduction.⁴ On independent grounds, however, 28:47-68 is to be recognised as a later addition to the chapter, and with these verses the only reason for connecting 28 with the two following chapters disappears. Not only are they separated by 29:1 ff. [28 69 and 29:1], but also the whole attitude and outlook of 29 ff. are different from those of 28:1-46. On the other hand, it would be natural for the author of 12-26 to conclude his book by urging as strongly as he could the motives to obedience, and solemnly warning his readers of the consequences of disobedience. Similar exhortations and warnings are found at the end of the so-called Covenant Book (Ex. 23:20 ff.), and at the end of the Law of Holiness (Lev. 26), the latter passage being strikingly parallel to Dt. 28; and such a peroration was the more appropriate in Dt., because its laws are all in the form of address. The profound impression made upon the king by the reading of the book is most naturally explained if it expressly and emphatically denounced the wrath of God against the nation which had so long ignored his law.

The Deuteronomy of 621 B.C. has not come into our hands unchanged. Not only have the exhortations and warnings been amplified and heightened. 6. Later pieces but also, in all probability, many additions have been made to the laws.

At the very beginning of the code in 12, and in connection with the most distinctive of the Deuteronomic ordinances—the restriction of sacrifice to Jerusalem—there are unmistakable doublets; cp 12:5-7 with 11:7, and especially 15-19 with 20-28. In the following chapters a good many laws are suspected, because of their contents, or the unsuitable place in which they stand.

Thus, the detailed prescriptions of 14:3-20 are foreign to the usual manner of Dt. (cp 24:8 ff.), and appear to be closely related to Lev. 11; the law of the kingdom, 17:14-20, represents the law as written (thus anticipating 31:9 26), is in conflict with the legitimate prerogatives of the monarch, and is clearly dependent on 1 S. 8:4 ff. 10:25; the rules for the conduct of war in 20 are not reconcilable with the necessities of national defence, and can hardly have been dreamed of before the 'exile.' To others, however, the utopian character of these laws seems not a sufficient reason for excluding them from the primitive Deuteronomy.¹

While many of the instances alleged by critics are in themselves susceptible of a different explanation, there seems to be sufficient evidence that the Deuteronomic code received many additions before the book reached its present form. Certain supplementary provisions may have been introduced soon after the law was subjected to the test of practice; others in the Exile; while still others probably date from the period of the restoration; cp HIST. LIT. § 6 f.

In 5-11 also, it is evident that the original contents of the chapters have been amplified, and 5-11 28. their order and connection disturbed by later hands.

The story of the sin at Horeb in 9:7 is a long and confused digression. Chap. 7:16 25 ff. repeats 1-5; 1-5 is separated from 12-15 by 6-11, which has no obvious appositeness in this place; 17-24 intrudes in the same way between 16 and 25 ff. Similar phenomena may be observed in the following chapters.² Nor has 28 come down to us unaltered. Verses 45 ff. plainly mark what was, at one stage of its history, the end of the chapter of comminations. The two pieces which follow, 47-57 and 58-68, are shown by internal evidence to be additions, presupposing the destruction of Jerusalem and the dispersion of the miserable remnant of the people, the consequence of neglecting 'the words of this law, which are written in this book' (58; cp also 61). Verses 36 ff. also, which threaten the deportation of the king and people in phrases derived from Jeremiah (with 35, which repeats 27), are probably glosses.³

In the Hebrew legislation three strata are to be recognised: the collections of laws incorporated in JE

(Ex. 21-23, often called the Book of the Covenant; Ex. 34); the Law of Holiness, relation to contained (in a priestly recension) in Lev. P and JE. 17-26 and cognate passages (H); and the rest of the laws in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, predominantly liturgical, ceremonial, and sacerdotal, which, though not all of the same age or origin, may here be treated as forming a single body of priestly law (P). The result of modern criticism has been to establish more and more conclusively that P, as a whole, is later than Deuteronomy.⁴ On the other hand, it is agreed by all that the little collections of laws in JE are older than Deuteronomy. The most convincing proof of this is given, of course, by the Deuteronomic laws restricting the worship of Yahwè to the one temple at Jerusalem. It may confidently be inferred also from the prominence given throughout Deuteronomy to motives of humanity, and the way in which old religious customs, like the triennial tithe, are transformed into sacred charities, as well as from the constant appeal to the memory of God's goodness as a motive for goodness to fellow-men. Where the provisions of Deuteronomy differ from those of the Book of the Covenant, they sometimes appear to be adapted to a more advanced stage of society; as when the old agricultural fallow-year is replaced by an experiment in the septennial remission of debts. The many laws dealing with contracts of one kind or another also are to be noted.

Most recent critics are of the opinion, further, that the author of the Deuteronomic law-book was not only acquainted with Ex. 21-23, but also made this code the basis of his own work; Deuteronomy, it is said, is a revised and enlarged Covenant Book, adapted to some extent to new conditions, but with only one change of far-reaching effect, the centralisation of worship in Jerusalem. It may be questioned, however, whether the evidence will sustain so strong a statement of the dependence of Deuteronomy on the Book of the Covenant.

Verbally identical clauses are very few, and in some instances, at least, have probably arisen from subsequent conformation. There is no trace of the influence of the Covenant Book either in the general arrangement of Dt. 12-26 or in the sequence of particular laws. To fully one half of the Covenant Book (after the subtraction of the religious precepts), viz., the title Assaults and Injuries, Ex. 21:18-23:17, there is no parallel in Dt.; while the subject of Authorities in Dt. 16:18-18 has no counterpart in Ex. 21:23; of thirty-five laws in Dt. 21:10-25:16 only seven have parallels in the older code. Finally, in the corresponding laws¹ the coincidences are hardly more frequent or more nearly exact than we should expect in two collections originating at no great distance in place or time, and based upon the same religious customs and consuetudinary law; the evidence of literary dependence is much less abundant and convincing than it must be if Dt. were merely a revised and enlarged Book of the Covenant.²

Certain laws in Deuteronomy have parallels also in H; but, whilst the provisions of these laws are often closely similar, the formulation and phraseology are throughout entirely different.³

10. To H. In some points H seems to be a stage beyond Dt.; but the differences are not of a kind to imply a considerable interval of time so much as a diversity of dominant interest, such as distinguishes Ezekiel from Jeremiah.

Dt. 14:3-21, compared with Lev. 11, has been thought to prove that Dt. is dependent upon H; but the truth seems rather to be that both are based on a common original, a piece of priestly Torah, which each reproduces and modifies in its own way.⁴

References to the history of Israel are much fewer in Dt. 12-26 than in 1-3 4; they are of a more incidental and allusive character, and the author

11. D's history and JE's. exercises some freedom in the use of his material; but, as far as they can be certainly traced, they appear to be all derived from JE, or from the cycle of tradition represented by that work. That the author did not have before him JE united with P is proved by his reference to the fate of Dathan and Abiram (11:6); if he had read Nu. 16 in its present form, in which the story of Dathan and Abiram (JE) is almost inextricably entangled with that of Korah (P), he could hardly have failed to name the latter, who is the central figure of the composite narrative (cp Nu. 26:9 f. 27:3 Jude 11, and see KORAH and DATHAN AND antiquity; nor that in particular instances they may be more primitive than the corresponding titles of Dt.; nor that some of them may have attained a comparatively fixed form, oral or written, before the 'exile.'

ABIRAM). But even if he had possessed P separately, it would be almost inexplicable that he so uniformly follows the representation of JE where it differs from P or conflicts with it. The instances which have been adduced to prove that he was acquainted with P are too few and uncertain to sustain the conclusion; moreover, they are all found in the long digression, 9:9-10:11, which probably was no part of the primitive Deuteronomy.¹

The traditional opinion among Jews and Christians, that Deuteronomy was written by Moses shortly before

12. Date: not pre-monarchic. his death, though resting on the testimony of the book itself (31:9 ff. 24 ff.), is contradicted by both the internal and the external evidence; the contents of the book and the entire religious history of Israel prove that Deuteronomy is the product of a much later time. The legislation of JE (in the main, doubtless, merely the booking of an ancient consuetudinary law) is without exception the law of a settled people, engaged in husbandry. Deuteronomy reflects a still more advanced stage of culture, and must be ascribed to a time when Israel had long been established in Palestine. The fundamental law for the Hebrew monarchy, Dt. 17:14-20, presumes not only the existence of the kingdom, but also considerable experience of its evils. Solomon appears to have sat for the portrait of the king as he ought not to be.² In the prohibition of the multiplication of horses and treasure we may recognise the influence of the prophets, to whom the political and military ambition of the kings seemed apostasy (see, e.g., Is. 27). The constitution of the high court in Jerusalem (Dt. 17:8-13, cp 19:17) is thought to be modelled after the tribunal which Jehoshaphat (middle of 9th century B.C.) established (2 Ch. 19:8-11).³

More convincing than the arguments derived from these special laws are the ruling ideas and motives of the whole book. The thing upon which

13. Idea of one sanctuary. Deuteronomy insists with urgent and unwearied iteration is that Yahwè shall be worshipped only at one place, which he himself will choose, where alone sacrifices may be offered and the annual festivals celebrated. Although no place is named, there can be no doubt, as there was none in the minds of Josiah and his counsellors, that Jerusalem is meant.

Jerusalem was not one of the ancient holy places of Israel. It owed its religious importance to the fact that it was the royal temple of the Judæan kings; but this was far from putting it upon an equality with the venerable sanctuaries of Bethel and Shechem, Gilgal and Beersheba. The actual pre-eminence of Jerusalem, without which the attempt to assert for it an exclusive sanctity is inconceivable, was the result of the historical events of the eighth century.

The fall of the kingdom of Israel (721 B.C.) left Judah the only 'people of Yahwè.' The holy places of Israel were profaned by the conquerors—proof that Yahwè repudiated the worship offered to him there, as the prophets had declared. A quarter of a century later Sennacherib invaded Judah, ravaged the land, destroyed its cities, and carried off their inhabitants; the capital itself was at the last extremity (see HEZEKIAH, 1; ISRAEL, § 33 f.). The deliverance of the city from this peril seemed to be a direct interposition of Yahwè, and Jerusalem and its temple must have gained greatly in prestige through this token of God's signal favour.

This of itself, however, would not give rise to the idea that Yahwè was to be worshipped in Jerusalem alone. The genesis of this idea must be sought in the monotheism of the prophets. At a time when monotheism had not yet become conscious of its own universalism, men could hardly fail to reason that if there was but one true God, he was to be worshipped in but one place. And that place, in the light of history and prophecy, could only be Jerusalem. The way in which Dt. attempts to carry out this principle, by simply transferring to Jerusalem the cultus of the local sanctuaries with their priesthoods, was only practicable within narrow territorial limits, such as those of the kingdom of Judah in the seventh century.

We have the explicit testimony of the Books of Kings that there was no attempt to suppress the old local sanctuaries in Judah until the reign of Hezekiah; the most godly kings left the high-places unmolested (1 K. 15.14 22.43 2 K. 12.4 14.3 15.4 35). The deuteronomist author of Kings, to whom the temple in Jerusalem was, from the moment when Yahwè took up his abode in it (1 K. 8.10 f.), the only legitimate place of sacrifice, condemns this remissness as a great sin; but there is no evidence that the religious leaders of Israel down to the end of the eighth century so regarded it. Elijah is in despair over the sacrilege which threw down the altars of Yahwè; when he goes to meet God face to face, it is not to Jerusalem, but to Horeb, the old holy mountain in the distant S., that he turns his steps. Amos and Hosea inveigh against the worship at the holy places of the Northern Kingdom because it is morally corrupt and religiously false, not because its seats are illegitimate; nor is their repudiation of the worship on the high-places more unqualified than Isaiah's rejection of the cultus in Jerusalem (Is. 1.10 f.). The older law-books, far from forbidding sacrifice at altars other than that in Jerusalem, formally sanction the erection of such altars, and promise that at every recognised place of worship Yahwè will visit his worshippers and bless them (Ex. 20.24).

According to 2 K. 18.4 22.21 3, Hezekiah removed the high-places, demolished the standing stones, hewed down the sacred posts.¹ The false tenses prove, however, that 18.4 has been interpolated by a very late hand; the original text said only that Hezekiah removed the bronze serpent which was worshipped in the temple (see NEHUSHTAN); nor can much greater reliance be put upon the reference in the speech of the Rabshakeh (18.22). It may well be that Hezekiah, after the retreat of Sennacherib, took vigorous measures to suppress the idolatry against which Isaiah thundered in both his earlier and his later prophecies (28.18 30.32 31.7), perhaps including the sacred trees and other survivals of rude natural religion (Is. 1.29).² In any case, the reaction of the following reign swept away all traces of his work. Cp HEZEKIAH, 1; ISALAH, i., § 15.

Another very distinct indication of the age in which Dt. was written is found in the foreign religions which it combats. The worship of 'the whole host of heaven' (Dt. 17.3 cp 4.19), an Assyrian cult frequently condemned by the prophets of the seventh century (Jer. 8.2 19.13 32.29 Zeph. 1.5),³ but not mentioned by any earlier writer, was probably introduced by Manasseh, during whose reign Assyrian influence was at its height in Judah. The sacrifice of children, 'sending them through the fire' to the King-God (Dt. 18.10 12.31), also belongs to the seventh century (see MOLECH); neither Isaiah nor any of the other prophets of the eighth century alludes to these rites.

A relatively late date has been inferred also from the laws against the erection of steles and sacred poles (maš-šêbôth and āšhêrim) by the altars of Yahwè (Dt. 16.21 f.).

The older laws only enjoin the destruction of the Canaanite holy-places with all their appurtenances (Ex. 34.13 23.24; cp Dt. 12.3). The prophets of the eighth century, especially Hosea and Isaiah, assail the idols of Yahwè, but not the more primitive standing stones and posts; the polemic against the latter begins with Jeremiah.

The age of Dt. may be determined also by its relation to other works of known date. From the time of

Jeremiah, the influence of Dt. is unmistakably to be recognised in the whole prophetic and historical literature, whilst we look in vain for any trace of this influence in ¹ Cp the much more extended account of these reforms in 2 Ch. 29-31.

² If it were established that Hezekiah put down the high-places, it would not follow that Dt. is older than Hezekiah; the more probable hypothesis, in view of all the testimony of the prophets and the historical books, would be that the Deuteronomic law was in the line of the measures adopted by the king.

³ Cp also the worship of the Queen of Heaven, Jer. 7.13 44.17. See QUEEN OF HEAVEN.

DEUTERONOMY

the prophets of the eighth century; neither the impressive ideas nor the haunting phrases of Dt. have left their mark there.¹ The inference that Dt. was unknown to the religious leaders of Israel before the seventh century is hardly to be avoided.

On the other hand, in all its ruling ideas, Dt. is dependent upon the prophecy of the eighth century. We have already seen that the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib prepared the way for the belief that the temple on Mt. Zion was the only sanctuary at which Yahwè should be worshipped, and that the monotheism of the prophets was the theological basis of the same belief. The lofty theism of Dt., which exalts Yahwè, not only in might and majesty, but also in righteousness, goodness, and truth—the moral transformation of the old conception of 'holiness' (see CLEAN, § 1)—is of the same origin, whilst the central idea of the book, that the essence and end of true religion is the mutual love of God and his people, is derived from Hosea. In general, the theology of Dt. is an advance upon that of the prophets of the eighth century, whose teaching it fuses and assimilates, and approximates to that of Jeremiah and Isaiah 40-55.

To the same result we are led by the literary character of Dt. Its style is more copious and flowing than that of earlier writers; but it lacks their terse vigour, and is not free from the faults of looseness, prolixity, and repetition, into which a facile pen so easily glides. In these respects it exhibits the tendencies which mark the literature of the seventh century and the Exile. The diction, also, is distinctly that of the same period, closely resembling that of Jeremiah.²

Evidence of every kind thus concurs to prove that the primitive Dt. was a product of the seventh century.

16. Result as to date of D. The fact that it combats foreign cults which were introduced by Manasseh militates against the opinion entertained by some scholars, that it had its origin in the last years of Hezekiah, perhaps in connection with the reforms of that king. A hypothesis which commends itself to many critics is that Dt. was composed in the reign of Manasseh as a protest against the evils of the time and as a programme of reform. Its authors died without being able to accomplish their object, and the book was lost, until, many years after, it was accidentally discovered in the temple by Hilkiah. To others it seems more probable that Dt. was written under Josiah, shortly before it was brought to light, by men who thought the time ripe for an attempt to introduce the reforms by which alone, they believed, Judah could be saved, and had intelligently planned the way in which this should be effected.³

Everything points to Jerusalem as the place where Dt. was written: a work whose aim was to exalt the temple to the position of the sole sanctuary of Yahwè can hardly have originated anywhere else. The Torah of the priests is throughout so intimately united with the religious teachings of the prophets that we are constrained to believe that both priests and prophets were associated in its production, or at least that its priestly authors were thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the prophets. Who these authors were cannot be more definitely determined.⁴

That the authors of the primitive Dt. freely used older collections of laws has been generally recognised.

17a. Sources of D. Beside Ex. 21-23 (on which see above, § 9), remains of another collection are found in Dt. 22-25. Staerk and Steuernagel have recently undertaken to show by minute analysis that both the hortatory and the legislative parts of Dt. are in a stricter sense composite.

According to Steuernagel, the book discovered in the temple in the eighteenth year of Josiah (Dt. 5 2628) was the work of a redactor, who combined with considerable skill—but mechanically, and without substantial additions—two older works of like character, each consisting of a hortatory introduction and a body of laws. One of them (Sg.) is marked by the direct address to Israel in the second person singular; the other (Pl.) uses the plural. The older of these works (Sg.) is assigned to the early years of Manasseh's reign (shortly after 700 B.C.), the other (Pl.) was composed about 670. The union of the two by the redactor (Dr.) falls in the middle of the century, twenty-five years or more before the discovery of the book in the temple. Both Sg. and Pl. made use of older collections of laws, and these sources can still in part be recognised. One of the chief sources of Sg. (the 'Grundsammlung') was put out in support of Hezekiah's reforms, probably not long after 722 B.C.

Chaps. 1-3, in the form of an address of Moses to Israel, contain a review of the principal events of the

18. Additions: migration, from the departure of the Israelites from Horeb to the moment at chaps. 1-3 which he is speaking to them.¹ This related to E. retrospect throughout follows the history of JE, from which its material is drawn and many phrases and whole clauses are borrowed.² Upon closer examination it appears that the chief source of the chapters is E, which the author had* before him separately; whether he made use of J is doubtful; of dependence on P there is no trace.

The retrospect begins abruptly with the command to remove from Horeb (1-8), and it has been conjectured that 9-10-11 (or at least 9-25-10-11), which recites the transgression at Horeb, and brings the narrative to the precise point where it is taken up in 1, once stood before 17. More probably, however, 9-10-11 is not a misplaced fragment of the retrospect, but the product of successive editorial amplifications.³ The review ends as abruptly as it begins; the words, 'And we abode in the valley in front of Beth-peor' (3 29), must originally have been followed by an account of the sin at Baal-peor (Nu. 25 1-5; cp Dt. 43 f.).

The chapters (1-3) are not by the author of 5-26. The resemblance in language and style is unquestionably very close, though there are some noticeable differences; but the diversity of historical representation is decisive; cp 29 with 23-6 7 f., 135 f. 214-16 with 112 f. 52 f. The opinion of some critics, that 1-4 was prefixed to the primitive Dt. to connect it with the history in Ex. and Nu., is improbable; for such a purpose a recapitulation of the history was more than superfluous. Others, with better reason, suppose that the historical résumé was intended as the introduction to a separate edition of Dt. The way in which it begins and ends (see above, small type) suggests that it was not composed for the purpose, but was extracted and adapted by the editor from some older source. Conclusive marks of the age of the chapters, further than their dependence upon E and the general affinity to the deuteronomistic school, are hardly to be discovered.

Chap. 41-40 has generally been taken with 1-3, as a hortatory close to the historical introduction.

19. Chap. 4 There is, however, neither a formal nor 1-40 exilic. a material connection between them.

The historical allusions in the exhortation are to events related, not in 1-3, but in 5 f.; 4 10 f. 32-35 differ from the retrospect (139 f. etc.) and agree with 52 f. 112 f. 292 f., in making the speaker's audience witnesses of the scenes at Horeb; the greater part of 4 is only a homiletical enlargement on 5 25 f.

In other points 4 goes beyond 5-11; its monotheism takes a loftier tone, like that of Is. 40-55 (see 435 39 15-19). In 4 25-31 deportation and dispersion are inevitable; the prediction that in the far country Israel will return to Yahwé and find forgiveness takes the central place which it has in the exilic prophets.

The language resembles 5-11 more closely than 1-3, but has peculiarities of its own: 4 17 f. are full of words and phrases which remind us of Ezekiel, H, and P (cp also 32); 28 seems to be directly dependent upon Jeremiah (16 13; cp 65). Chap. 4 thus appears to be a secondary addition to Dt., composed in the Exile, and closely akin to 29, if not by the same hand.¹

Chap. 44-43, the designation by Moses of three asylum cities east of the Jordan, has no connection either with what precedes or with what follows. In phraseology the verses agree

4 41-43 44-49. closely with Dt. 19 1 f., after which they are probably modelled. They may originally have stood after 3 17 or 20, or perhaps after 29.

Chap. 44-49, the title and superscription to 5 f., like the corresponding superscription 1 1-5, appears to be the product of successive additions and redactions by scribes or editors; the oldest form of the title may have been simply, 'This is the law which Moses laid before the Israelites on the other side of Jordan, in the land of Moab' (cp 1 5).

Chap. 27, in narrative form, stands entirely disconnected in the midst of the speeches of Moses,

21. Chap. 27 separating 28 from 26. Graf, accordingly, regarded it as an interpolation, introduced four pieces. when Dt. was united with the older historical book (JE), whilst Wellhausen sees in it the conclusion of a separate edition of the Deuteronomistic law-book (1-4 40 12-26 27). The chapter (27) consists of four distinct parts: viz., 1-8 9 f. 11-13 14-26. Vv. 9 f. may, as many critics think, have originally connected 26 with 28. In 1-8, where there is much repetition, 5-7a has long been recognised as a fragment of the ancient source to which Ex. 20 24-26 [21-23] belongs. Vv. 12 f. seem to be the sequel of 11 29 f., the whole being a liturgical embodiment of 11 26-28, and plainly secondary. Vv. 14-26 cannot be by the author of 11-13: the things on which Dt. lays the greatest stress are lacking in this decalogue, which is a cento gathered from all strata of the legislation, especially from Lev. 18-20.

Chap. 29 f. contain a new address of exhortation and warning, introduced, like 5 f., by the words, 'And

22. Chap. 29 f. Moses convoked all Israel.' The stand-point of the writer is similar to that of 41-40, and differs in the same way from that of 5-26 28 1-46; cp in particular 30 1-10 with 4 25-31. The author had before him the deuteronomistic law, with its blessings and curses, in a book (29 20 f. 27 30 10, cp also 29 9 28 58 61). The diction differs considerably from that of 5-26, and approximates more closely to that of Jeremiah, upon whom the author is evidently dependent. Chaps. 29 f. are, therefore, like 4, an exilic addition to Dt. The movement of thought in these chapters is far from being orderly or coherent: 29 16-28 [15-27] does not naturally follow 10-15 [9-14], and the latter verses have no obvious connection with 2-9 [1-8]; 30 1-10 cannot originally have stood between 29 and 30 11-20. The position of these chapters is difficult to explain. Chap. 28 1-46 is the proper conclusion of the long speech of Moses, 5-26; 29 1 [28 69] is a formal subscription, marking the end of the book. The only natural place for fresh admonitions to observe the law would be after the law had been committed to writing (31 9-13; cp 24-27); and it has been conjectured, not without probability, that this was the original position of the parting charge.²

Chap. 31, which takes up the narrative again, is composite, and presents to criticism most difficult problems.

Verses 1-8 are not the sequel of 29 f. or of 28; they take up the story at the point which the historical introduction reaches in 3 23 f.; they are deuteronomistic in colour,

23. Chap. 31. and Dillmann surmises that once they followed 3 28 immediately. A parallel to 1-8 is found in 14 f. 23, in which Yahwé himself gives the charge to Joshua at the sacred tent; these verses are probably derived from E. The intervening verses, 16-22, are an introduction to the 'Song of Moses,' 32 1-43, to which 32 44 is the corresponding close. This introduction is not deuteronomic, as the language proves; it is equally clear that it is not by the author of 14 f. 23. The question of the source of the verses will recur in connection with the age of the poem itself (next §, second par.). Vv. 9-13, relating how the law was committed to writing and preserved, form an appropriate conclusion to the account of the giving of the law, and are by many critics connected with 5-26 28. The preservation of the law is the subject of 24-27, which the repetition and the different motive prove to be by another hand; 28 f. seems to be a preparation for the recitation of the 'Song' (30), and is as much out of place after 19-22 as 24-27 after 9-13; the whole passage, 24-29 (30), is, therefore, ascribed to a redactor. Dillmann conjectures that 28 f. (in substance) originally constituted the introduction, not to the Song of Moses, but to a speech the close of which is to be found in 32.45-47. This speech, containing the last exhortations and admonitions of Moses, was removed from its place after 31.9-13 to make room for the Song, and is preserved, though worked over and extensively interpolated, in 4.29 f. For reasons which have already been indicated, we should not, however, with Dillmann, attribute this speech to the author of 5-26 28, but to a later deuteronomic writer.

Chap. 32.1-43; The Song of Moses.¹—The theme of the Ode is the goodness of Yahwè, the sin of Israel in rejecting him, and the ruin which this apostasy entails. The poem contains no definite allusions to historical events by which its age may be exactly determined. The conquest of Canaan evidently lies for the writer in a remote past (7 f.); and he has had ample experience of the propensity of Israel to adopt foreign religions, and of the national calamities in which the prophets saw the judgments of Yahwè upon this defection. The language has been thought to indicate that the author was a native of the North; and many scholars believe that the situation reflected in the poem is that of the kingdom of Israel in the reign of Jehoash (797-783 B.C.) or the early years of Jeroboam II. (782-743), when, after the long and disastrous Syrian wars, Israel was beginning to recover its former power and prosperity.² Others, understanding by the 'no people' (עַם לֹא עָם), the 'foolish nation' (גוֹי נָחַל), the Assyrians, to whom such terms would be applied more naturally than they could be to the Syrians (cp Is. 33.19,³ 5.26 f.), ascribe the poem to the latter half of the eighth century. The words may, however, with even greater probability, be interpreted of the Babylonians (cp Jer. 5.15 f. 6.22 f., especially Hab. 1.6 f., Dt. 28.49 f.). In the vocabulary of the Song there are several words which are not found in writers of the eighth century, but are common in the literature of the seventh and sixth; the Aramaisms in word and form which have been looked upon as evidence of Ephraimite origin may equally well be marks of a later age. The poem contains many reminiscences of the older prophets, especially of Hosea and Isaiah; but in its whole spirit and tone, as well as in particular expressions, it is much more closely akin to Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Is. 40-55. It has a strong resemblance, also, to the exilic additions to Dt. (4.29 f.); its theology is that of these chapters and of Is. 40 f. Its affinities to the Psalms and the products of Jewish Wisdom are to be noted.⁴ It is, in fact, a didactic poem, embodying in lofty verse the prophetic interpretation of Israel's history from beginning to end. Kuenen and others ascribe the Song to the end of the seventh century (say 630-600 B.C.); but the considerations last adduced, and others which might be mentioned, point rather to an exilic or post-exilic date.

It has commonly been assumed that the introduction to the Song (31.16-22) is pre-deuteronomic (J or E);⁵ not so much, however, upon internal evidence as in consequence of general theories about the age of the poem and the composition of the last chapters of Dt. It is intrinsically at least equally probable that the introduction is post-deuteronomic; and this hypothesis is strongly commended by the fact that the Song itself has apparently been put in the place of the last discourse of Moses (29 f.), which is itself a product of the 'exile.'

Chap. 32.44 is the closing note to the poem, corresponding to 31.30 at its beginning. Verses 45-47 are the close of the speech, answering to 31.28 f.;¹ they contain no allusion to the Song; their literary affinities are to 31.28 f., not to 31.16-22 or 32.44. Chap. 32.48-52 belongs to the priestly stratum; the same command is given somewhat more briefly in Nu. 27.12-14 (P).

Chap. 33: 'The Blessing wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the Israelites before he died.'¹ Beyond this superscription, no attempt is made to connect the poem with the history of Moses' last days; from which it may be inferred that it was not introduced by a deuteronomic editor. The opening verses (1-5), which are very obscure, in part through corruption of the text, describe the coming of Yahwè from Sinai, the giving of the Law, the acquisition of the territory of Jacob (?), and the rise of the kingdom in Israel.² Thereupon come, without any transition, Blessings on eleven tribes, following a geographical order from south to north, and differing greatly in length and in character.

The Blessing of Moses is a composition of the same kind as the so-called Blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49.1-27), though not a mere imitation of it. The historical situation reflected in the Blessings of the several tribes in Dt. is that of a time considerably later than that in Gen.; cp particularly Levi (Gen. 49.5-7 Dt. 33.8-11) and Judah (Gen. 49.8-12 Dt. 33.7). On the other hand, the situation is entirely different from that represented in the Song of Moses, Dt. 32. While in the latter, apostasy has drawn upon Israel the consuming anger of Yahwè, and the very existence of the people is threatened, the Blessing breathes from end to end a national spirit exalted by power and prosperity and unbroken by disaster. The author was a member of one of the northern tribes, or a Levite at one of the northern sanctuaries. The blessing of Joseph (13-17) was written at a time when the kingdom of Israel, in the pride of its power, and perhaps flushed with victory, was thinking of foreign conquests (17). Recent critics have generally followed Graf in ascribing the poem to the time of Jeroboam II. (782-743 B.C.), when for a brief space Israel seemed to have regained all its ancient power and glory; 20 is then referred to the recovery of the territories of which Gad had been stripped by the Syrians of Damascus in the disastrous period which preceded.

The prayer in 7, 'Hear, O Yahwè, the voice of Judah, and bring him to his people,' has been understood as the wish of the Ephraimite poet that Judah might be reunited to Israel, and is thought by many to point to a time soon after the division of the kingdom, when the desire for the restoration of the national unity was still strong. This obscure verse, however, cannot be allowed to outweigh the clearer testimony of other parts of the chapter. The Blessing of Levi (8-11) describes the privileges and offices of the priesthood, and the fidelity of Levi to its sacred trust. There is nothing to indicate that the author was a priest of the temple in Jerusalem³—the priests of other temples also were Levites,—nor any cogent reason for thinking that 9.11 are Jewish interpolations. Verse 11, however, is hardly a blessing for the priesthood, and would unquestionably be more appropriate to one of the other tribes; but that it was the original sequel of 7b, as has been conjectured, is not evident.

On the whole, the age of Jeroboam II. seems best to satisfy the implications of the Blessings. Verses 2-5, 1 See above, § 23.

DEUTERONOMY

26-29, have no connection with the Blessings, and it is not improbable that they are fragments of another poem. Whether the Blessing of Moses was contained in J or E is a question which we have no means of answering: neither the short introduction, nor the titles of the several Blessings (which alone can be attributed to an editorial hand), offer anything distinctive; nor do the reminiscences of the earlier history.

Chap. 34. The story of the death of Moses is highly composite, elements from JE and P, as well as the hand of more than one editor, being recognisable in it.

Deuteronomy is the prophetic law-book, an attempt to embody the ideal of the prophets in institutions and laws by which the whole religious, social, and civil life of the people should be governed. We recognise this aim in the treatment of the older right and custom of Israel, and more clearly in those provisions which are peculiar to Deuteronomy, above all in the fundamental law, chap. 5 ff. It seeks, not to regulate conduct by outward rule, but to form morality from within by the power of a supreme principle.

The dominant idea of Deuteronomy is monotheism. The first sentence of the older Decalogue,¹ repeated 27. Religious character of Dt. in 56 f., expresses, indeed, only a relative monotheism; but the fundamental deuteronomic law, 'Yahwè our God is one Yahwè' (64 f.), declares, not only that there are not many Yahwès, as there are many Baals, but also that there is no other who shares with him the attributes of supreme godhead which are connoted by his name. He is 'the God of gods and the Lord of lords, the great, mighty, and awful God' (10 17), to whom belong 'the heavens and the heavens of heavens, the earth and all that therein is' (10 14), 'the [only] God in the heavens above or in the earth beneath; there is no other' (439, cp 35).² The unapproachable majesty of Yahwè (51 ff. 22 ff. 49 ff.), his constancy to his purpose, and his faithfulness to his word are often recurring themes (78-10 12 ff. 95, etc.). He is a God who requites his enemies to the full (7 10); yet a compassionate and forgiving God to those who under his judgments turn to him again (429-31, cp 30 1 ff.).

Idolatry is strictly forbidden. The images and emblems of the Canaanite gods are to be totally destroyed (12 2 f. 75 25). The Decalogue

29. Objects of worship. prohibits the making of images of Yahwè in the likeness of any object in heaven, or on the earth, or in the sea; and in 415 ff., where this prohibition is emphatically repeated, Israel is reminded that at Horeb, when Yahwè spoke to them out of the midst of the fire, they saw no form—a lesson to them not to image him in any form. The more primitive standing stones and sacred poles are included in the prohibition (16 21 f. 123 f.). All kinds of divination, sorcery, and necromancy are condemned as heathenish (189-14); Yahwè's will and purpose are made known, not by such signs as are interpreted by the mantic art, but by the mouth of his prophet (18 15 ff.).

Yahwè is to be worshipped, not at many sanctuaries, but at one only, in the place which he chooses to fix his name there (12 pass., 14 23 15 20 16 pass., etc.). The unity of the sanctuary is a consequence of the unity of God.

30. Exclusive-ness. The suppression of the high-places, which is so strenuously insisted on in Dt., was primarily dictated, not by practical considerations, but by the instinctive feeling that their existence was incompatible with monotheism: as long as there were many altars there were as many local Yahwès. It is doubtless true that, for the religious consciousness of the great mass of worshippers, the Yahwè of Dan was not just the same as the Yahwè of Bethel or of Beersheba. But the great doctrine of Dt. is, 'Yahwè thy God is one Yahwè.' The exclusive principle, 'Thou shalt have no other gods beside me,' is strongly reaffirmed (6 12-15 10 20-22 11 16 f. 28, etc.); the worship of other gods is punished by death (17 2-7, see also 18), the apostasy of the nation by national ruin (6 14 f. 7 4 8 19 f. 425-28 30 17 f., etc.); for Yahwè is a jealous God (6 15 4 24). Not only in Israel, which is Yahwè's people, but also in Canaan, which is his land, there shall be no other god or cult. Every trace of the old religions of Palestine is to be obliterated. The Canaanites themselves must be exterminated, lest, in intercourse with them, Israel be infected with their religion (7 1 ff. 16 93, cp 12 29 f. 20 16 ff.).¹ Alliance and intermarriage with the heathen are stringently prohibited (7 3 f., etc.); and many special laws are directed against heathen customs and rites: see, e.g., 22 5 23 17 f. No less urgent warnings are given against the religions of remoter peoples (136 f.).

The essence of the religious relation between Yahwè and his people is love. He has loved Israel from the beginning (10 15 7 7 f. 23 5), and if they keep his commandments he will love and bless them in all the future (7 13, cp 4 37 f.).

31. Principle of love. They are the children of Yahwè their God (14 1); his discipline and his care are parental (85 131). All good things are from him; but the signal proofs of his love to Israel are the deliverance from Egypt (passim, e.g., 8 14 ff.), and the law which he has given them (45-8 32 ff.). The love of Yahwè to his people demands, as it should inspire, their love: 'Thou shalt love Yahwè thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might' (6 5) is the first commandment of the law, the first principle of religion (10 12 f. 11 1 13 22 13 4 19 9 30 6 16 20). Love to God constrains to do his will; to love God and to keep his commandments are inseparable. His commandments are not remote or incomprehensible: they are in men's hearts and on their lips (30 11-14, cp Jer. 31 31-34); nor are they difficult and burdensome (10 12 f., cp Mic. 6 8): to keep them is for man's own good (6 24 10 13). It is a religion of the heart, not of outward observances or of formal legality. Observances are not rejected; a religion without worship and distinctive ceremonial is not contemplated; but festivals and sacrifices are only the expression of religious feeling—above all, of loving and joyful gratitude for God's love and goodness.

The relation of Yahwè to Israel is not a natural and indissoluble relation, such as subsists between a tribal

32. Moral basis. god and his people; it is a moral relation, which has its origin in his choice of Israel to be his people. He chose it, not for any good in it (7 9 4 ff.), but because he loved its forefathers (10 15); and love and faithfulness bind him to their descendants (78 95). The election by which Israel alone of all the nations of the earth is made the people of Yahwè is Israel's glorious distinction; but it imposes the greatest obligation. Sin, in this light, is more heinous, judgment more necessary and more severe; but in God's constancy to his purpose and his promise faith finds the assurance that the severest judgment will not be utter destruction.

The bond between Yahwè and Israel is the covenant which he made with them at Horeb (5 2 ff.) and renewed on the plains of Moab (29 1 [28 69]). The deuteronomic law sets forth the obligations imposed by Yahwè and accepted by Israel (17 2); strict observance of the law is the condition of the fulfilment of the promises of Yahwè, the obligations which he voluntarily took upon himself in the pact (7 9-13 11 22 ff., etc.).

Israel is to be a holy people (76 14 22 26 19)—that is, one set apart to Yahwè in all its life. The stringency of the laws which are to preserve the purity of the people and the land from false religion and immorality is thus explained and justified: 'Thou shalt exterminate the evil from the community' (13₅ and pass.; see 22 13-30 21 8-21 19 16-21 etc.).

Notwithstanding the sanguinary thoroughness with which it demands the extirpation of heathenism, and the severity of many of the special laws, the distinctive note of the deuteronomic legislation is humanity, philanthropy, charity. Regard not only for the rights, but also for the needs of the widow, the orphan, the landless Levite, the foreign denizen, is urged at every turn.¹ The interests of debtors (23 20 24 10-13 15 1-11), slaves (5 14 15 12-18), and hired labourers (24 4 f.) are carefully guarded. Various provisions protect the rights of the wife or the female slave (24 1-4 22 13-19 21 10-14 15-17). Nor are the animals forgotten (25 4 22 6 f.). The spirit of the legislation is seen not least clearly in the laws which appear to us altogether utopian, such as 20 (cp 24 15 17 14-20 15 1-6).

In conformity with its prophetic character, Dt. presents itself not merely as a law-book, but also as a book of religious instruction. Its lessons are to be diligently remembered, and not forgotten in times of prosperity (86-12 8 11-18 etc.). Its fundamental precepts are to be repeated daily, to be worn as amulets, to be inscribed in public places (6 7-9 11 8-21). They are to be taught to children, that each succeeding generation may be brought up in the knowledge of Yahwe's will (6 7 20-25 11 9 49); and every seven years the whole law is to be publicly read in the hearing of the assembled people (31 9-13).

Taken all in all, Dt. will ever stand as one of the noblest monuments of the religion of Israel, and as one of the most noteworthy attempts in history to regulate the whole life of a people by its highest religious principles.

DEW (טָל; ἄρορος). 'Dew' is a theme which kindles the enthusiasm of the OT writers; but what does 'dew' mean in the OT? and are the common explanations of the biblical references altogether correct?

During the spring and autumn the phenomenon which we call dew is, at least in the intervals of fine weather, as familiar in Palestine as in western countries: the moisture held in suspension in the atmosphere during the day is deposited, in cloudless nights, owing to the cooling of the surface of the ground, in the form of 'dew.' It is not, however, simply this phenomenon of spring and autumn that excites the enthusiasm of the Hebrew writers; for it is not the dew but the former and the latter rains that are in these seasons of vital importance to the agriculturist (see RAIN). During the summer season, however, from the beginning of May to the latter part of October, there is an almost unbroken succession of cloudless days, when vegetation becomes parched, and would altogether perish but for another phenomenon which has a prior claim to the descriptive Hebrew name tal ('sprinkled moisture') uniformly represented in the EV by the word 'dew.' During the summer, but more especially (when the need is greatest) in the latter part of August and during September and October, westerly winds bring a large amount of moisture from the Mediterranean (see WINDS). This moisture becomes condensed by the cool night air on the land into something not unlike a Scotch mist, which, though specially thick on the mountains, is yet abundant enough everywhere to sustain with its moisture the summer crops, and to keep some life in the pastures of the wilderness.¹

Coming only in the night, and being so much finer than ordinary rain, this beneficent provision of nature received a special name, tal, to which the Arabic fallūn, 'fine rain,' corresponds. The Greek poetical terms δρόσος ποτρία and θαλασσία, δροσραὶ νεφέλαι, seem more adequate than the simple δρόσος,

1 The true meaning of טָל is most clearly set forth by Neil, Palestine Explored (82), pp. 129-151, to whom this article owes its central idea.

and, but for the shock to our associations, 'night mist'¹ would be a preferable rendering to 'dew.'

This explanation clears up certain otherwise obscure passages. It also enables us to identify with considerable probability the season to which any important passage mentioning tal refers. The miracle of Gideon's fleece, e.g., was presumably placed by the writer in the summer. At the same time, when perfectly general language is used respecting tal ('dew'), it may be open to us to suppose that a confusion exists in the writer's mind between the genuine 'dew' of winter (spring and autumn) and the 'night mist' of summer, which is not, in our sense of the word, dew at all, since the vapour becomes condensed in the air before it reaches the ground.

In illustration, see Lane's Arabic Lexicon, s.v. ṭalla. One example given is, 'The sky rained-small-rain (ṭalla) upon the earth.' Ṭallun is defined as 'light or weak (i.e., drizzling) rain, or the lightest and weakest of rain; or dew that descends from the sky in cloudless weather.' Cp also Koran, Sur. 2:67, 'And if no heavy shower (waḥīṭun) falls on it, the mist (ṭallun) does.'

(a) Where the 'dew' comes from.—Job 38:28 is, probably enough, a scribe's insertion (Bt., Duhm); but, if so, the scribe gives an invaluable early summary of what precedes. He states that what is said of the rain in vv. 25-27 refers not only to the winter rains or to the occasional thunderstorms but also to the 'night mist.'

Has the rain a father?

Or who has begotten the streams² (not 'drops') of 'dew'?

To this question a wise man replies (Prov. 3:20),

By his (God's) knowledge the depths were opened (i.e., at creation),

And the sky drops down 'dew.'

So Gen. 27:28 Dt. 33:28 Hag. 1:10 Zech. 8:12; cp also Judg. 5:4 (G³ and Theod.).³ A more complete answer is given in Enoch, where the 'treasures' of snow and hail (Job 38:22) and also of dew and rain are described. If Job did not 'come to those treasures' Enoch did, according to the current legend. The statements are important: 'The spirit of the dew has its dwelling at the ends of the heaven, and is connected with the chambers of the rain, and its course is in winter and summer; and its clouds, and the clouds of the mist are connected, and the one passes over into the other' (80:20, Charles).

In chap. 76 the twelve portals of the winds are described. From eight of them dew and rain are said to proceed; the winds are not, however, always beneficial. The author is by no means a good observer, and his statement is of value only as confirming the statement of 60:20 that 'dew' and 'rain' are connected.

(b) Preciousness of 'dew.'—The land of Israel is called 'a land of corn and wine; yea, his heavens drop down dew' (Dt. 33:28). The blessing of Jacob says: 'God give thee of the dew of heaven, and of the fatness of the land' (Gen. 27:28; contrast v. 39, RVmg.). Yahwē himself resembles 'dew'; 'I will be as the dew for Israel' (parched up, desolate Israel, Hos. 14:5 [6]). The preciousness of the 'dew' is shown by its effects, which are next described.

Perhaps, however, tal here includes rain. Dew is an emblem of resurrection; 'A dew of lights is thy dew, and to life shall the earth bring the shades' (Is. 26:19, SBOY). From the world of perfect light where Yahwē dwells a supernatural 'dew' will descend on the dead Israelites. 'The dew of resurrection' (חֵטֶן שֶׁל חַיִּים) is a Talmudic phrase based on this prophecy. In the Koran, also (e.g., Sur. 41:39), rain is referred to as a sign of the resurrection. Probably, too, Micah 5:7 [6] also should be mentioned here. The traditional text, as it stands, is unintelligible. The 'remnant of Jacob' among the nations cannot be at the same time like showers of night mist on the earth and like a lion. The upright line (Pasek) placed after 'And shall be' (וְהָיָה) warns us (as so often) that there is something doubtful in the text. Possibly וְעַל, 'upon' has dropped out. The passage

² MT reads טָלִים, generally rendered 'drops' (G³ βάλοις). 'Reservoirs' would be more defensible; but this does not suit 'begotten.' The obvious emendation is טָלִים. Rain is called טָלִים in Ps. 65:10. The scribe is thinking of the 'channel' (חֵטֶן) in v. 25.

³ Heb. text has only 'dropped.'

then reads thus, 'And there shall be on the remnant of Jacob . . . as it were "dew" from Yahwē . . . which carries not for man, etc.—i.e., which is independent of human effort. Reluctant as one may be to deviate from an unquestioned tradition, it becomes necessary to do so, when even the acute Wellhausen admits that the point of the comparison in the present text is unintelligible to him.

(c) Other illustrative passages.—The dew (night mist), like the rain, comes by the word of a prophet (1 K. 17:1). It falls suddenly (2 S. 17:12), and gently, like persuasive eloquence (Dt. 32:2); it lies all night (Job 29:19), but early disappears like superficial goodness (Hos. 6:4). Such a night mist is to be expected in the early summer, in the settled hot weather of harvest (Is. 18:4; but, on text, see VINE, § 1). It has a healing effect on vegetation (Ecclus. 18:16 43:22); but for a man to be exposed to it is a trying experience (Cant. 5:2). It is all-pervading; hence Gideon asks, as a sign of his divine mission, first, that the fleece which he has put on the threshing-floor may be wet with a night mist (tal) when the floor itself is dry, and next, that the fleece may be dry when the floor is wet. So abundant is the moisture of the night mist that in the morning after the first experience Gideon is able to wring out of the fleece a whole bowlful of water (Judg. 6:36-40).

(d) Two doubtful passages.—In Ps. 110:3, if the scribes have correctly transmitted the text, there is a condensed comparison of a king's youthful army to the countless drops of dew: a highly poetic figure, adopted by Milton in speaking of the angels. The words, however, 'thou hast the dew of thy youth' ('dew' is not attested by the LXX, though the other Greek translators all have ῥόσος), are probably corrupt (see Che. Psalms (2)). The other passage (Ps. 133:3) appears to state that it is the dew of Hermon that comes down on the mountains of Zion. Some (so Del.) have thought that a plentiful dew in Jerusalem might be the result of the abundance of vapours on Hermon; others (so Baethg.), that 'dew of Hermon' is a proverbial expression for a plentiful dew. Robertson Smith (OT/C (2) 212) suggests that the expressions may be hyperbolic; the gathering of pious pilgrims from all parts at the great feasts at Jerusalem was 'as if the fertilising dews of great Hermon were all concentrated on the little hill of Zion'; but the passage, as it stands, is incapable of a natural interpretation. The text, came into the editor's hand in an imperfect condition. Hermon and Zion can by no possibility be brought into connection either here or in the equally corrupt passage, Ps. 42:6 [7]. T. K. C.

DIADEM. Strictly διάδημα (diadēma, to bind round) is no more than a rich fillet or head-band. It was worn around the Persian royal hat (see MITRE, 2), and, as distinguished from στέφανος (see CROWN), is the badge of royalty; cp 1 Macc. 19:6 15:8 14 etc., Rev. 12:3 13:1 19:12 (RV, AV 'crown,' and so EV in 1 Esd. 4:30). It is probable that fillets of a more or less ornate character are referred to in the Heb. כִּנִּיף, עֲטָרָה (see CROWN) and קֶצֶץ (see MITRE).

1. Διάδημα is used by G³ to render כִּנִּיף, ketzer, Esth. 1:11, and וְעַל, nēser, 2 S. 1:10 [L, Sym. Theod.] (see CROWN, § 2), וְעַלְיָה, talrīk, Esth. 8:15 (see MANTLE), and וְעַלְיָה, sānīph, Is. 62:3 (cp Ecclus. 47:6); see 4 below.

Diadem, in EV, represents the following words:—

2. μίτρα, Bar. 5:2 (EV, in Judith 10:3 16:8, EV 'tire,' AVmg. 'mitre').

3. מִצְנֶפֶת, miznepheth, Ezek. 21:26 [31] AV; see MITRE, 1.

4. ῥῆμα, sānīph, Is. 62:3 EV, Zech. 8:5 RVmg. (EV 'mitre'), Job 29:14 EV (RVmg. 'turban'); see TURBAN, 2.

5. ῥῆμα, sēphērāh (properly 'a plait'; √ to weave), Is. 28:5 (⌌ ῥῆμα, ὁ πλεκτός or πλεκετός, etc. [BNAQT], πλέγμα [Aq. Theod.], κίδαρις [Sym.]). In Ezek. 17:10 (RV 'doom'), according to Co., sēphērāh means 'crown' (cp RVmg. 'crowning time'); text perhaps faulty, see Co., Bertholet.

DIAL and SUN-DIAL (שֶׁלֹּת, literally 'steps,' ἀνάβαθμοι; Tg. שְׁעֵי אֶבֶן, 'hour-stone'; Sym. in Is. 38:8 ὠρολόγιον; horologium), 2 K. 20:11 Is. 38:8. The term occurs in the account of Hezekiah's illness.

In point of fact, however, the narrator says nothing of a 'dial' and of 'degrees' but only of 'steps'; where AV says, 'The sun returned ten degrees,' RV more correctly says, 'The sun returned ten steps,' though immediately afterwards it uses the incorrect term 'dial' (with a marginal note, 'Heb. steps'). Hence both in AV and in RV the account is more obscure than it need have been. It is true, the parallel accounts in 2 K. 20 and Is. 38 differ, which produces some difficulty.

DIAMOND

On the whole, Is. 387 f. is probably nearer to the original text than 2 K. 208-11. It is not, however, free from awkwardness. Explanatory words have evidently been introduced, after removing which we get something like this: 'Behold, I will cause the shadow to go back as many steps as the sun has gone down on the steps of Ahaz. So the sun went back as many degrees as it had gone down.'¹ The date of this part of the narrative is long after the age of Isaiah, who was ordinarily no worker of miracles (see ISAIAH, ii. § 15, and cp 1 Cor. 122); and, if Duhm is correct, the phrase 'on the steps of Ahaz' is the awkward insertion of an editor. The reference is, therefore, of very small archaeological value. Still, we may fairly ask what the late writer meant, and the most usual answer is that the steps were those which led up to the base of an obelisk, the shadow of which fell on the upper steps at noon, and on the lower in the morning and the evening. We may suppose the monument to have been near enough to the palace for Hezekiah to see it from his chamber. This, however, is quite uncertain, and, nothing being said of such heathenish objects elsewhere,² it is scarcely probable. (See Is. 388, and cp Jos. Ant. x. 21) thinks that the steps were those of the palace. This has been too hastily rejected. It is perfectly possible that בֵּית, 'house (of),' fell out of the text before אֲחָז, 'Ahaz.' We must at any rate abandon the view that a dial with concentric circles and a central gnomon is meant. Ahaz might no doubt have borrowed this invention from Assyria (cp Herod. 2109). There is no evidence, however, that טֵמֶלֶח can mean 'degrees,' and it must be repeated that the narrative appears to be a glorification of Isaiah (cp Ecclus. 4823), based on no ascertainable tradition of fact,³ either as regards the wonder or the 'steps.' 'Steps' was the simplest word to use in such a context, in speaking of a comparatively remote age. T. K. C.

DIAMOND (שֵׁמֶרֶץ, יְהֵלֶם; see below, § 2). The name diamond is merely a modification of adamant, though, unlike the latter word, it has a quite definite meaning, designating the well-known gem composed of crystallised carbon, with traces of silica and earths. It is usually colourless, but is often tinged white, gray, or brown; more rarely yellow, pink, etc.

The diamond does not appear to have become known to the Greeks till the time of Alexander's successors, when the Greek kings had much intercourse with India, the only place in the ancient world where diamonds are known to have been obtained. Delitzsch has, indeed, ascribed to the Assyrians an acquaintance with the diamond (comparing elmēšu with Ar. 'almās); but this is precarious. Nor is it any more likely that the diamond was known to the Egyptians; the cutting point used by them in working hard stones was more probably corundum (Petrie, Pyramids and Temples of Gizeh, 173). We need have little hesitation, therefore, in deciding that it was not one of the stones known to the Hebrews of the sixth century B.C. (Ezek. 2813 EV). Much less could it have been an inscribed gem in the high-priestly 'breastplate' of P (Ex. 2818=3911 EV); for neither Greeks nor Romans could engrave the diamond.

It was not until the sixteenth century A.D. that the wonderful skill of the cinque-cento engravers succeeded in producing intagli upon the diamond. No doubt, even many of the works celebrated under this name may have been in reality cut in the white topaz or the colourless sapphire; but Clusius, a most competent judge, declares not only that Clement Birago had engraved on a diamond the portrait of Don Carlos as a betrothal present to Anna, daughter of the emperor Maximilian II., but also that he had himself seen it during his stay in Spain in 1564. Birago had engraved the arms of Spain as a seal. Paolo

³ Bosanquet (TSBA 337) explained the alleged phenomenon as the disturbance of the shadow during the solar eclipse of 11th Jan. 689 B.C. It is needless to discuss this. Cp CHRONOLOGY, § 17.

DIANA

Morigia, too, says that Torezzo discovered the method and engraved the arms of Charles V. on a diamond, whilst Jacobus Thronus is said to have engraved on a diamond the arms of England, for Queen Mary of England, Philip's consort.

Diamond occurs four times in EV—once (Jer. 171) to translate the Heb. שֵׁמֶרֶץ (shāmīr), which was almost

2. The Hebrew certainly corundum (see ADAMANT, § 3), the only substance used by the terms. Greeks to engrave gems down to the end of the fourth century B.C., and thrice (Ex. 2818 3911 Ezek. 2813) to translate the Heb. יְהֵלֶם (yahēlēm). See PRECIOUS STONES. W. R.

DIANA (Ἀρτεμις [Ti. WH], Acts 1924 ff.). The characteristic feature of the early religion of Asia Minor

1. The goddess was the worship of a mother-goddess and her in whom was adored the mystery of Nature, perpetually dying and perpetually self-reproducing. She 'had her chosen home in the mountains, amid the undisturbed life of Nature, among the wild animals who continue free from the artificial and unnatural rules constructed by men' (Ramsay, Hist. Phryg. 189); the lakes with their luxuriant shores also were her favoured abode; and, generally, in all the world of plants and animals her power was manifest. It was easy to identify such a goddess with the Greek Artemis, for the latter also was originally the queen of nature and the nurse of all life; but from first to last the Ephesian goddess was an oriental divinity.

Under different names, but with essential identity of character, the great goddess was worshipped throughout Asia Minor, and the various modifications of the fundamental conception often came into contact with, and influenced, one another, as though they were originally distinct. In northern and eastern Phrygia the great Nature-goddess was worshipped as Cybele. In Lydia Katakakumēnē she was invoked as Artemis, and also by the Persian name Anaitis, introduced perhaps by Asiatic colonists planted in the Hermos valley by Cyrus (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of As. Min. 131). She was known there also as Leto, which is her title at Hierapolis and Dionysopolis. As Leto she is traceable through Lycia and western Pisidia to the Pamphylian Perga, where again she is also called Artemis (Str. 667). The name Leto is the Semitic Al-lat (לֵילַת, cp 'Al-lāt, Herod. 1131), and points to Semitic influence, radiating perhaps from Cyprus (Rams. Hist. Phryg. 190).

The world-renowned seat of this worship was Ephesus (Acts 1927 ἡ ἐν δὴ ἡ Ἀσία καὶ ἡ οἰκουμένη σέβεται: the festival in her honour was called Ὀλκουμένη). The fame of the Ephesian shrine was primarily due to the fact that 'the Asian mead by the streams of the Cayster' (Hom. Il. 2461) was the natural meeting-point of the religious ideas brought westwards by the expansion of the pre-Aryan kingdom of Asia Minor (Sayce, Anc. Emp. 430), and of the foreign, Semitic, influences which penetrated the peninsula at various points on the coast where intercourse with the Phoenicians was active. Thus must we explain the peculiar composite features of the hierarchy which early grew up round the temple on the bank of the Cayster. It consisted of certain vestals (παρθέναι)¹ under the presidency of a eunuch-priest, bearing the titular name Megabyzos (Str. 641). Some have understood the passage in Strabo to assert the existence of a College of Megabyzoi; but probably merely a succession is meant (one only in Xen. Anab. 53, § 6 f. and App. BC 59). Persia was probably the source of supply. There were three grades among the vestals, who seem to have had, besides, a female superintendent (Plut. An seni. 79534 Reiske). There is no evidence (Hicks, Inscr. Brit. Mus. 32, p. 85) that they were called μέλισσαι, though the statement is usually made (after Guhl, Ephesiaca, 108); certain priestesses of the Great Mother were so called, however, according to Lactantius (Inst. 122), and the bee was the regular type on the coins (Head, Coins of Eph.).

There was also a college of priests ('Εσθῆτες). The popular derivation of the name was from ἐσμός=

¹ For the meaning of this word in connection with the Anatolian system, see Ramsay, Hist. Phryg. 196.

'swarm' (so Curtius, Ephesos, 36); but it is perhaps wrong to follow Lightfoot (Coloss. Intro. p. 94) in denying all connection with the name of the Jewish sect of the Essenes. These priests were the connecting link between the hierarchy and civic life—e.g., they cast the lot which determined the Thousand and Tribe of a newly created citizen (Hicks, l.c., no. 447, etc.). Neither their number nor the mode of their appointment is known, but they held office only for a year and superintended the feasts at the Artemisium following the sacrifices at the Artemisia, or annual Festival (Paus. viii. 131). For minor sacred officials see Hicks, l.c. 85 f.

The analogous establishments of the goddess Ma in the remote E. of Asia Minor, at the two Komanae (Cappadocia, Str. 535; Pontus, id. 557), show us the system in a more thorough-going form; Strabo's words (ὡν δὲ τὰ μὲν φυλάττεται τῶν νομίμων τὰ δ' ἥρωα) imply that the grosser features of the cult had been got rid of at Ephesus. In the eastern shrines we have a presiding priest allied in blood to the reigning family, and second only to him in honour, ruling the temple and the attendant ἱερόδουλοι (6000 in number), and enjoying the vast revenues of the sacred estates.

The cult-statue was thoroughly oriental in form, being a cone surmounted by a bust covered with breasts (Jer. Pref. Eph.). Like the most ancient image of Athena at Athens (Paus. i. 266) and the statue of Artemis at Tauris (Eur. Iph. T. 977), and that of the allied Cybele of Pessinus, it 'fell down from Jupiter' (so AV and RV in Acts 19:35: τοῦ διωπετοῦς, 'that fell from heaven'). Such was her form wherever she was worshipped as Ephesian Artemis; but on the coins we find mostly the purely Hellenic type. The 'silver shrines' (Acts 19:24 ναοί) were offered by the rich in the temple: poorer worshippers would dedicate shrines of marble or terra-cotta.

Numerous examples in marble, and some in terra-cotta, are extant (Athen. Mitth. 249, Arch. Zeit., 1880); the series shows continuous development from the earliest known representation of the Mother-goddess (the so-called 'Niobe' at Magnesia near Mt. Sipylus) to such as that figured in Harrison, Myth. and Mon. of Athens, 48 (cp Rams. in JHS, 1882, p. 45). Such shrines were perhaps also kept in private houses (Paus. iv. 31.8 ἀνδρες ἰδίᾳ θεῶν μάλιστ' ἀγούσιν ἐν τῇμῃ). Similar shrines were carried in the sacred processions which constituted an important part of ancient ritual (Ignat. ad Eph. 9 σύνδοσι πάντες, θεοφόροι καὶ ναοφόροι; Metaphr. Vit. Timoth. 1:69: εἰδωλα διὰ χειρὸς ἔχοντες in the festival called Καταγωγίον; Inscr. Brit. Mus. 3 no. 481, referring to the thirty gold and silver ἀπεικονίσματα presented by C. Vibius Salutaris in 104 A.D.).

In the manufacture of these shrines many hands and much capital were employed (Acts 19:24 παρελχετο τοῖς τεχνίταις οὐκ ὀλίγην ἐργασίαν).

The characteristic formula of invocation was μεγάλη Ἄρτεμις (whence we must accept the reading of D as against the μεγάλη ἡ Ἄρτεμις of the other MSS). The epithet is applied in inscriptions (CIG 2963 C, τῆς μεγάλης θεᾶς Ἀρτέμιδος; ib. 6797, Ἐφέσου Ἀνασσα). Its use in invocation has been detected at other centres of the allied cults.

This was the case, for example, at the shrine of Artemis-Leto and Apollo-Lairbenos at Dionysopolis (Rams. Hist. Phryg. 1:151, n. 49, μέγας Ἀπόλλω Λετομνός, see J. Hell. Stud., 1889, p. 216 f.; cp Hist. Phryg. 1:53, n. 53, εὐχαριστῶ Μητρί Λητώ ὅτι ἐξ ἀδυνάτων δυνατὰ ποιεῖ). In an inscription from the Limnai (mod. Egirdir Geul and Hoiran G.), where Artemis of the lakes was revered, we have the formula Μεγάλη Ἄρτεμις (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM, 410). The Artemis of Therma in Lesbos is invoked by the phrase 'Great Artemis of Therma' which appears on a stone still standing by the road between Therma and Mitylene (Bull. de Corr. Hell., 1880, p. 430). The Artemis of Perga also affords a parallel (Rams. Church in R. Emp. 1:38; cp also id. Hist. Geogr. of AM, 292).

All these examples show that the power of the goddess was a prominent idea in the cult, and give point to the reiteration of the formula by the mob (Acts 19:34). Cp Xen. Eph. 1:11, ὁμνῶν τέ σοι τὴν πάτριον ἡμῶν θεὸν, τὴν μεγάλην Ἐφεσίων Ἄρτεμιν.

One of the secrets of the popularity of the temple was its right of asylum. Whatever the fate of the town, the

3. The temple. temple and all within the precinct were safe (Paus. vii. 28 τοῖς δὲ περὶ τὸ ἱερὸν οἰκοῦσι δέμας ἦν οὐδέν. Cp also Herod. 1:26; Cic. Verr. ii. 1:33; Strabo, 641). The peribolos-area was several times enlarged—by Alexander the Great who extended it to a radius of a stade from the temple, and again by Mithridates. Antony doubled it, taking in μέγος τι τῆς πόλεως—i.e., part of the suburbs. This extension worked in favour of the criminal classes (Strabo, l.c., Tac. Ann. 360), so that Augustus in 6 B.C. narrowed the sanctuary area, and surrounded it with a wall (Hicks, l.c. no. 522 f.). There was a further revision by Tiberius in 22 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 361). Connected with this security was the use of the place as a national and private bank of deposit (Dio Chrys. Rhod. Or. 595; see also Cæs. Bell. Civ. 3:33 105; Strabo, 640). From the deposits, loans were issued to individuals or communities (Hicks, Manual Gr. Hist. Inscr. no. 205).

It is noteworthy that the opposition to Paul did not originate among the priests (see EPHEBUS). The energies of the priests of the great shrines must have been largely directed to the absorption of kindred elements in the new cults with which they came in contact, or at any rate to the harmonising of the various rival worshipers. In this they were assisted by the tendency of the Greeks to see in foreign deities the figures of their own pantheon. That very definite steps were taken in Ephesus to avoid conflict with the cult of Apollo is proved by the localisation there of the birth-place of Apollo and Artemis (Str. 639, Tac. Ann. 361; cp Pauly's Realenc. 1373). The teaching of Paul would seem but another importation from the E., likely to effect a revival redounding to the advantage of the temple. This blindness of the priesthood to the real tendencies of the new teaching is well illustrated at Lystra, where the priest of Zeus Propoleos is foremost in doing honour to Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14:13). Not until a later period was this attitude exchanged for one of hostility; the earliest pagan opposition was based on lower grounds than those of religion (Rams. Church in R. Emp. 1:31, 200). DIBLAH (דִּבְלָה; Δεβλαθα [BAQ]), Ezek. 6:14 RV. See RIBLAH.

DIBLAIM (דִּבְלַיִם), Hos. 13; see GOMER (2).

DIBLATH (דִּבְלָתָה) in MT; the statement that the true Palestinian reading is 'BT' is weakly attested [Bä.]; Δεβλαθα [BAQ], Ezek. 6:14 AV (RV DIBLAH), where the 'toward' of EV demands an emended text. See RIBLAH.

DIBLATHAIM (דִּבְלָתַיִם), Nu. 33:46; see BETH-DIBLATHAIM.

DIBON (דִּיבּוֹן; so thrice [Bä. ad Is. 15:2]; elsewhere in OT and on Moabite stone דִּיבּוֹן, and so Δαίβων [BAFL]—whence the true pronunciation is probably Daibon, Meyer, ZAW 1:128, n. 2—but in Josh. 13:17 Δαίβων [A], Δεβων [L]).

1. A city of Moab (Is. 15:2, Δαβων [BN^{corr.pl.}], Δαιβηδων [N*], Δεβ. [QT], Jer. 48:1822 δεβων [N], [α]δαιβων [Q]), the modern Dibān, about 3 m. N. from Arero and 4 from the Arnon. A fragment of an ancient song preserved by JE in Nu. 21 commemorates the conquests of the Amorite king Sihon over Moab 'from Heshbon to Dibon' (v. 30). According to Nu. 32:34 [E] it was 'built' by the Gadites, and it is alluded to as Dibon-Gad in Nu. 33:45 f. [P]. Josh. 13:17 [P] gives it to the Reubenites. In Is. 15:9 the name is written DIMON [q.v.]. It was at Dibān that the famous stone of King Mesha was discovered in 1868.

2. In list of Judahite villages (EZRA, ii. § 5 [δ] § 15 [1] a), Neh. 11:25 [Δαβων [N^{ca.mg.}], om. BA); perhaps the DIMONAH [q.v.] of Josh. 15:22.

DIBRI (דִּבְרִי; Δαβρι [e], [BAF], Δαμβρι [L]; DABRI), father of SHELOMITH [q.v., no. 1]; Lev. 24:11.† P's story of the son of Shelomith who blasphemes 'the Name'¹ bears a close family likeness to the incident in

Nu. 25¹⁴ ff. There the marriage of Zimri (a name not unlike Dibri)¹ with a Midianitess is the cause of sin, and here the offender is the son of a mixed union. Zimri belongs to the tribe of Simeon which, according to Gen. 46¹⁰, had Canaanite relations, and in the person of Dibri the tribe of Dan is pilloried (see DAN, § 8). In both stories the prevailing principle is the necessity of cutting off Israel from all strangers; cp Neh 9² 13³⁰, and see Bertholet, Stellung d. Israel. 147.

DIDYMUS (Διδυμος [Ti. WH]), Jn. 11¹⁶ etc.; see THOMAS.

DIKLAH (דִּיקְלָה; Δεκλα [AEL], in Ch. Δεκλαμ [A]; om. B; decla), son of Joktan (Gen. 10²⁷ 1 Ch. 1²¹). The name is obscure; it has been supposed by Bochart and others to designate 'a palm-bearing district' (cp Ar. daḡal^m, a sort of palm tree, and see BDB). Hommel connects it with the name of the Paradise river Hid-dekel (see PARADISE).

DILEAN, RV Dīlan (דִּילָן; דלאל [B]; -לאא [A]; -לאאן [L], Pesh. ܕܠܝܢ), an unidentified city in the Shephelah of Judah (Josh. 15³⁸). It occurs with Mizpeh (Tell es-Sāfiyeh) in a group apparently N. of the group comprising Lachish and Eglon.

DILL (TO ΔΗΛΘΟΝ), Mt. 23²³ RV^{ms}; EV ANISE (q.v.).

DIMNAH (דִּמְנָה; Δάμνα [AL]; Δελλα [B]), one of the cities of Zebulun theoretically assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21³⁵ P). It is mentioned together with NAHALAL (q.v.). The form, however, seems incorrect; we should rather read Rimmonah, with Di., Berth., Bennett. Cp Rimmon (1 Ch. 6⁶² [77]), and see RIMMON, ii. 3.

DIMON (דִּמּוֹן; Δειμων [B twice]; Δειμων [N^{ca}, c.b twice, AΓ once, Q* once]; Δειμων [once M¹ sup ras N^{a2}; Δερμων N* fort]; Διμων [once Q^{ms}]; Νειμων [once N*]), a town of Moab mentioned only in Is. 15⁹ (twice). According to Che. דִּמּוֹן is a corruption of נִמְרִים NIMRIM [q.v.]; it is no objection to this view that Nimrim has already been mentioned in v. 6; MADMEN in Jer. 48² is still more plainly a corruption of Nimrim. Those who adhere to the traditional text suppose that Dimon=Dibon, the former with m being chosen on account of the assonance with dām, 'blood,' or else that some unknown place is referred to (according to Duhm, on the border of Edom; cp 16¹ and see 2 K. 3²²). The former view is the more prevalent one. If Abana=Amana, may not Dimon be equivalent to Dibon? Jerome in his commentary says, 'Usque hodie indifferenter et Dimon et Dibon hoc oppidulum dicitur,' and in the OT itself we find DIMONAH [q.v.] and Dibon (2) used for the same place. If Dibon be meant in Is. 15, 'the waters of Dimon' may, according to Hitzig and Dillmann, be a reservoir such as many cities probably possessed (cp Cant. 7⁴ [5], but see HESHBON). The Arnon flowed too far off from the town to be meant. Still the text may be admitted to be doubtful.

DIMONAH (דִּמּוֹנָה; Δειμων [B], Διμων [AL]), a Judahite city on the border of Edom (Josh. 15²²). Perhaps the DIBON (2) of Neh. 11²⁵ (cp Dibon and Dimon in Moab). Knobel and others suggest the modern Kh. adh-Dheib or et-Ṭeiyibeh, 2½ m. NE. of Tell 'Arād; but this is quite uncertain. Pesh. ܕܡܢܐ presupposes a form דִּמְנָה; cp the variation given under DANNAH.

DINAH (דִּינָה; Δ[ε]ινα [AL]), 'daughter' of Leah and 'sister' of Simeon and Levi.

Whilst Ben-oni left behind it some memorials (see BEN-ONI), the disappearance of Dinah, to judge from the absence of all later traces, seems to have been absolute. In J's story, however, when Simeon and Levi fell upon the people of Shechem, as the Danites fell upon Laish, their attempt to carry Dinah away was successful. Two explanations are possible. Dinah may have disappeared as a tribe later along with its rescuers¹—there is, however, a difference: the brother tribes left traces (see LEVI, SIMEON)—or the success of the raid may be an element of exaggeration in the story: Dinah may have been absorbed into Shechem. Indeed the question suggests itself, as it does in the case of the other 'wives' in the patriarch stories (see ZILPAH, BILHAH, RACHEL, LEAH), Have we here really a distinct tribe? or does Dinah simply mean Israelitish families (of whatever clan) that settled in Shechem?

Unfortunately J's story is incomplete: we are not told what the dowry demanded of Shechem was, or why the city was attacked. A later age forgot that in Canaan only the Philistines were uncircumcised (see CIRCUMCISION, § 3), and thought that Israel could never have consented to settle in Shechem unless that town adopted the circumcision rite. J cannot have meant this.

Unlike the raid on Laish, that on Shechem seems to have been condemned by public sentiment. 'Cursed be their anger,' says the 'Blessing of Jacob,'

2. Motive. 'for it was fierce, and their wrath, for it was cruel'; but according to J the chief reason of this disfavour was that the safety of Israel had been imperilled. The judgment that overtook the perpetration of the raid is clearly indicated in the Blessing: they should be divided and scattered. One instinctively asks, How does this 'judgment' stand related to the name dināh? Does one explain the other? and, if so, which?

The Dinah story may be regarded as an explanation of the 'judgment' either on Shechem or on Simeon-Levi. It is also, however, fitted to serve as a popular explanation of the name Jacob, which it assigns to the immigrant people: Jacob was a wily people; and he paid back an injury done him. Stories are easily worked up so as to explain several distinct points.

It was a common belief in the days of the monarchy that the Leah tribes had been in the highlands of Ephraim before they settled in the south

3. Meaning. (see ISRAEL, § 7, LEVI, SIMEON, DAN, § 2). The point that concerns us here is whether some of them settled in Shechem. Unfortunately the earliest traditions that have come down to us belong to an age when there was no distinct memory of the real course of events. Every one knew that there was a time when Israelites had planted themselves in the hill-country but had not yet incorporated Shechem—the belief of a later age, that it was the resting-place of the remains of Joseph, had not arisen—but as to how it became Israelite there were already various theories. One story told of deeds of sword and bow (Gen. 48²² Judg. 9⁴⁵); another made more of a treaty or contract of some kind (connubium? circumcision? a sale of property? an alliance [בְּרִית]?; 33¹⁹ 34). It might perhaps be suggested that the ṣadīḡa-alliance with the Shechemites (Judg. 8³¹) points to a third story, a story of an Abiezrite settlement in Shechem. The idea of the covenant, however, may be simply a popular attempt to explain the name BAAL-BERITH (q.v.), like the story connected with the name Jerubbaal (see GIDEON). The warlike story, though early, may have to be classed with others of the same type. The peaceable settlement theory is historically the most probable; but it is hardly necessary to question the occurrence of a Dinah raid, less successful than the Danite. See, further, LEVI, SIMEON, JUDAH.

¹ Prof. Cheyne thinks that the disappearance of the tribe is actually recorded in 35⁸; that what E wrote was not 'and there died Deborah,' but 'and there died Dinah.' There are certainly, as he urges, difficulties in the text as it stands; the connecting of a famous tree with a nurse; the preservation of the name (contrast Gen. 24⁵⁹, where moreover E read כְּנָנָה for מְנָנָה: ṣā ṭupāḡḡonra aṭṭāṣ; cp 31¹⁸); the presence of the nurse in the train of Jacob; the whole Jacob-clan making a solemn mourning over her; the geographical discrepancy between Gen. 35⁸ and Judg. 43. He therefore proposes to emend מְנָנָה בְּרִית דְּבִרָה into מְנָנָה בְּרִית דִּינָה and to read: 'And Dinah, Jacob's eldest daughter, died, and was buried at the foot of [the hill of] Bethel, and was buried under the Tree; so its name is called Allon-bakuth' (see ALLON-BACUTH). The destruction of a tribe would certainly fully account for the mourning (bākūth). Both J (Gen. 37³) and P (Gen. 46⁷) represent Jacob as having more than one daughter.

DINAITES (דִּנַּיִתִּים), mentioned with the APHARSATHCHITES, TARPELITES [qq.v.], and others, in the Aramaic letter from Rehūm to Artaxerxes (Ezra 49). It is improbable that the word is an ethnic name (so GBA, δ[ε] δῖναϊοι, dinaii [Vg.]), and we should rather point דִּנַּיִתִּים 'judges' (so GB ¹ οἱ κριταί). It is the Aramaic translation of the Persian title dātābhar. Cp Hoffmann, ZA, 1887, p. 55; Schrader, *HWB*²; Andreas in Marti Bibl. Aram. Gram. 59*.

DINHABAH (דִּנְהַבָּה; ΔΕΝΝΑΒΑ [ADEL]), the city of the Edomite king BELA (q.v.), Gen. 36³². Almost beyond a doubt דִּנְהַבָּה is a corruption of דְּנֹחַבָּה (cp v. 37). See BELA, and cp Che. OLZ, May '99. It is a mere accident that several names can be quoted somewhat resembling Dinhabah. Thus in the Amarna tablets Tunip or Dunip is mentioned as in the land of Martu. Tunipa also occurs in the list of the N. Syrian places conquered by Thotmes III. (Tomkins, *RP*² 529). There was a Danaba in Palmyrene Syria (Ptol. v. 1524; Assemani, Bibl. Or. 32, p. 595f. 606, quoted by Kn.), and a Danabe in Babylonia (Zosim. Hist. 327). There was also a Dannaba in N. Moab (OS 11431). A Toneib (PEF map) or Thenib (Tristram) is to be found NE. of Hesbān; the PEF map calls it Hodbat el Toneib, but the Beni Sakhr 'knew not Hodbat' (Gray Hill, PEFQ, 1896, p. 46). With this place Dinhabah is identified by v. Riess, Bibel-Atlas, and Tomkins, PEFQ, 1891, p. 322f. T. K. C.

DIONYSIA (ΔΙΟΝΥΣΙΑ [VA]), 2 Macc. 67 RV^{mg.}; EV BACCHUS.

DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE (ΔΙΟΝΥΣΙΟΣ [O] ΑΡΕΟΠΑΓΙΤΗΣ [Ti. WH]), one of Paul's Athenian converts (Acts 1734). See DAMARIS.

Eusebius (HE 34 423) tells us on the authority of Dionysius, bishop of Corinth, who flourished about 171 A.D., that Dionysius the Areopagite became first bishop of Athens. In ecclesiastical tradition he is sometimes confounded with St. Denis, the first apostle of France, a confusion which was greatly fostered by Abbot Hilduin of St. Denis (834 A.D.) in his Areopagitica, which made large use of spurious documents. The important writings of the Pseudo-Dionysius Areopagita, first mentioned in the sixth century, do not fall within the scope of a Dictionary of the Bible.

DISCIPLE. One who learns (cp Gk. μαθητής, from ΜΑΘΕΩ), as opposed to one who teaches (ΔΙΔΑΚΤΑΛΟΣ); see RABBI, TEACHER.

AV and RV both give 'disciples' in Is. 816 (discipuli [Vg.]), and RV^{mg.} in 504 and 5413 (παῖδες, διδασκός [B⁹⁶AQ]). In

1. OT usage. each case this represents דִּתְּמִי, 'those who are taught or trained.' A synonymous word from the same root is דִּתְּמִי, common in late Jewish writings (cp esp. מַתְּמִי, 'disciples of the wise'), and found once in 1 Ch. 258, where the contrast between δ μαθητής and δ διδάσκαλος (for which cp also Mt. 1025) is expressed by מַתְּמִי וְדִתְּמִי 'as well . . . the teacher as the scholar' (τελείων καὶ μαθητῶν [BAL], [συνὴν μετὰ μαθητῶντος, L], doctus pariter et indoctus [Vg.]). The apparent parallel in 'master and scholar' Mal. 212 AV (MT מַתְּמִי וְדִתְּמִי magistrum et discipulum) is untrustworthy; the passage is rendered in many different ways, and is certainly corrupt.¹ In the LXX μαθητής occurs only in A, for דִּתְּמִי 'friends' (as if from דִּתְּמִי 'to teach'), viz., in Jer. 1321, and in Jer. 2011 469 where B (and in 469 A²), see Hatch-Redpath, Concordance) correctly reads μαχητής. On the subject generally see EDUCATION.

In the NT μαθητής (fem. μαθήτρια, Acts 936), though limited to the Gospels and Acts, is of frequent occurrence. Here it sometimes agrees

2. NT usage. with the usage in Attic (cp especially Plato) and designates merely the pupil, one who is taught by another (Mt. 1024=Lk. 640). It is then applied to the followers of a particular teacher, or sect: as, for example, of Moses as opposed to Jesus (Jn. 928), of the Baptist (Mt. 914 Mk. 218), of the Pharisees (Mt. 2216 Mk. 218); it is also used of Jesus and his teaching (Jn. 666 and often). As referring to the followers of Jesus we find that μαθητής is applied (a), widely, to all his adherents and followers (Mt. 1042, and esp. in Acts 627 etc., only once followed by τοῦ κυρίου, 91), including, even, those who had been baptized only 'into John's baptism' (Acts 1913); and (b), in a more restricted manner, to denote the nucleus out of which the Twelve were chosen, who, themselves, are also called μαθηταί in addition to the more familiar name of ἀπόστολοι (Lk. 613 compared with Mt. 101, cp also Mk. 827 1024 etc.); see APOSTLE.²

Finally, in ecclesiastical language, the term 'disciple' is applied (in the plur.) more particularly to the Seventy

3. Later Christian usage. who were sent out by Jesus to preach the Kingdom of Heaven (Lk. 101-17). The number varies between seventy (so Text. Rec., Pesh. NA^{CL}) and seventy-two (Vg. Cur. B, D etc.; see more fully Variorum Bible and Comm.). Lists of the names are extant in various forms and are ascribed to Dorotheos, Epiphanius, Hippolytus,³ and Sophronius. They comprise the names in the Acts and Pauline Epistles; but variations are to be found in each list. See Lipsius, Die Apokryphen Apostelgesch. u. Apostellegend. 1193-206.

DISCUS (ΔΙΣΚΟΣ [VA]), the Greek game played at the palaestra introduced by Jason among the Hellenistic Jews of Jerusalem (2 Macc. 414); see HELLENISM, § 4; also CAP. It is mentioned alone, either as the chief, or perhaps only as an example, of the games played.

On the discus (a circular plate of stone or metal [cp 'dish']); see Class. Dict. s.v. 'Discus,' 'Pentathlon.' The indignation which the writer displays towards this Hellenizing innovation is paralleled in later times by the abhorrence the Jews felt at the introduction of the Grecian game of 'dice' (קוביא, κυβία); see Shabb. 232 and cp Schür. GVI 233, n. 154.

DISEASES. OT terms for diseases are, as might be expected, vague (it is still a widespread practice in the East to refer euphemistically to any illness of a severe nature rather than to give it a name), and the nosological explanations⁴ which will presently be given are but plausible or probable conjectures. Not to spend time on general terms such as חֲלִי, קִדְמָה, רֹסוֹס (rendered 'sickness, disease'), or on terms implying a theological theory of disease, such as נֶגַע, נֶחֱשׁ, קָדָה (words which are often rendered 'plague,' but properly mean 'stroke,' cp Is. 534), we pass to special terms for pestilence.

Such are (a) מִדְּבָר, (b) מִדְּבָר, (c) מִדְּבָר, (d) מִדְּבָר. (a) מִדְּבָר, māweth (cp Ass. mātānu), θάνατος (properly 'death'), is used for a fatal sickness, such as the plague, in Jer. 15a 18a 27 15. Cp the use of θάνατος in Rev. 68 18a. (b) דִּבְחָר, dibhār (perhaps originally a boil (Socin), θάνατος, is the most distinctive term (see, e.g., Ex. 93 Dt. 2821). Possibly, too, in the phrase בִּלְיַעַל דִּבְחָר rendered 'an evil disease' (Ps. 418), we should point דִּבְחָר (with Lag. Che.). (c) קָטַט, qatṭṭ and qatṭṭḥ, 'cutting off' (Dt. 3224 Ps. 916 Hos. 13 14), and (d) רִשְׁפָּה, rišeph (properly 'flame,' cp RESHEPH; Dt. 3224 Hab. 35 || רִשְׁפָּה) are poetical words. See PESTILENCE.

¹ Torrey's correction is plausible—to read שֶׁשׁ וְעֵץ, 'root and branch' (cp 19 [41]).

DISEASES

The following terms, which are of a more specific character, occur chiefly in the threatenings of Lev. 22 26 Dt. 28 :—

1. חֲרִיר, harhūr (ἑρεθισμός), Dt. 2821, 'extreme burning,' RV 'fiery heat,' may refer to some special fever, such as typhus or relapsing fever.
2. דַּלֵּהֶת, dalleheth (δίγος), Dt. 2821; probably inflammation.
3. חֶרֶס, heres (κνήφη), Dt. 2821, the itch, probably some eruptive disease, such as the lichen tropicus.
4. יִלְפֶּת, yallepheth ('accretion'?) לֵאֲחָזֶה, Lev. 2120 2221, EV 'scab(bed),' is, according to Jewish tradition, חֲרִירֵי הַיִּשְׂרָאֵל the Egyptian herpes.
5. גַּבְבֵּלֶת, gabbaleth (μυρμηκιάνα), 'one suffering from warts' (so Jew. trad.), Lev. 2221; AV 'having a wen'; RVmg. 'having sores' (ulcers); from אָבַל, 'to flow,' hence 'a supuration'; see translation of Lev. in SBOT.
6. חַדְדָּהַת, ḥaddahath (μυρετός), Lev. 2616 Dt. 2821, fever (AV in Lev. 'burning ague').

Under the last of these (ḥaddahath) may be included malarial or intermittent fevers, which are met with in the Jordan valley, but are not specially a disease of Syria and Palestine, owing to the equable climate and the moderate variation of temperature. It was at Capernaum (a place liable probably to malaria) that Simon's wife's mother was 'taken with a great fever' (Lk. 438)—an expression which is thought to indicate medical knowledge.¹ Certainly Galen and Hippocrates use the phrase, as Wetstein has pointed out. There are parallel cases in Acts 1228 288 (see 910). According to Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller; cp Expositor, July 1899, pp. 20-23) the 'thorn (stake) in the flesh' spoken of in 2 Cor. 127 means the severe headache ('like a hot bar') which follows an attack of the malarial fever of Asia Minor.

7. זָהָהֶת, zahēpheth, Lev. 2616 Dt. 2821, 'consumption,' perhaps to be understood as the wasting of marasmus, which may attend various sicknesses. Pulmonary consumption is not, however, frequent in Syria (Pruner, 283).
8. גָּרָאֵה, gārāh,² Lev. 2120 2222 Dt. 2827, 'scurvy' (but AV in Dt. 'scab'). The reference seems to be to some chronic skin disease such as eczema; a sense in which 'scurvy' and 'scorbatic' were once used.
9. δυσεντερῖον (so the best MSS), Acts 288; RV 'dysentery.'

The last of these terms, 'dysentery,' occurs in Acts 2828, where the combination of relapsing malarial fever (μυρετός) with dysentery is carefully noted. According to Josephus (Ant. vi. 11) the disease of the Philistines in 1 S. 5 was dysentery, a view which, if the traditional Hebrew readings of the text may be accepted, has some plausibility. The more usual biblical expression for dysentery is the falling out of the bowels, implying either painful straining as if the bowels would fall out, or some shedding of the mucous membrane, or a degree of prolapse, such as occurs normally in the horse, mule, etc.

There is a singular combination of the idea of bursting asunder with that of falling out in Acts 118; but the second part of this passage will not bear the stress of critical treatment: it is the conventional fate of traitors in apocryphal legends that is assigned to Judas. The statement must, if this view is correct, be classed with the less historical portions of Acts. Cp ACELDAMA.

10. σκωληκόβρωτος ('eaten of worms') gives us the only detail as to the disease by which Herod Agrippa I. was carried off (Acts 1228). It reminds us, however, of the disease of which, acc. to Josephus (Ant. xvii.

One is almost led to think that, in the deficiency of evidence, narrators imagined such a fate as this for wicked kings. Sir R. Bennett conjectures, partly on the ground of Josephus' statement (Ant. xix. 82), that the cause of Herod Agrippa's death was perforation of the bowels by intestinal worms (Diseases of the Bible, 103).

2. Gen. 3626, RVmg., EV DISHON (g.v.).

DISHON (דִּישָׁן [1 Ch. 141]; דִּישָׁן [1 Ch. 138]; wrongly pointed דִּישָׁן [Gen. 3626]; דִּישָׁן [Gen. 3621]; דִּישָׁן [zv. 2530]; § 68; ΔΗCΩN [BADEL]). Twice reckoned as the fifth son of Seir (Gen. 3621 1 Ch. 138), but once (Gen. 3625 [ΔΑΙCΩN (L)]) as the son of Anah the son of Seir. His sons are enumerated in Gen. 3626 (RVmg. DISHAN, following present MT), 1 Ch. 141 (ΔΑΙCΩN [BAL]). Cp DUKE, 1.

In spite of his genealogical phraseology, the writer is fully conscious that he is dealing not with individuals but with clans. Dishon, like Lotan and the other names, belongs to a Horite clan. Its meaning seems to be some sort of mountain-goat (see PYGARG). As Di. and WRS agree, the Horite genealogy is full of animal names.

DISPERSION. ΔΙΑCΠOPA, so rendered by RV of 2 Macc. 127 Jn. 735 Ja. 11 1 Pet. 11, is used partly to denote the process itself, the gradual distribution of Israelites among foreign lands, and partly as a collective term for the persons so dispersed or for their surroundings. In the present article it is proposed to treat briefly of the origin of the Jewish Dispersion (§§ 1-14), its legal standing (§ 15), and its inner and outer life (§§ 16-22).

διασπορά occurs in 10 of Dt. 2825 Jer. 34 [41] 17 for Heb. הֲפִיץ, 'tossing to and fro' (?). In Jer. 1314 8. [N*] is apparently a corruption for διασπορά [so BA, etc.]. It renders הֲפִיץ (a collective) in Dt. 304 and Neh. 19, and הֲפִיץ in Ps. 1472 ('outcasts'—'dispersed ones'), and in Is. 496 διασπορά τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ—נִצְרֵי (Kth. נִצְרֵי) 'the preserved of Israel.' It also occurs in Jer. 157 Dan. (cod. 87) 122.

I. Permanent settlements of Israelites in regions outside Canaan had their origin in one or other of two causes—the exigencies of commerce and the

1. Origin. chances of war. The regular commercial relations into which Solomon and his successors entered with Egypt, Phoenicia, and the countries of Middle and Northern Syria (1 K. 1028 f.) must of necessity have led to the formation of small Israelite colonies outside of Palestine. These enjoyed the protection of the foreign prince under whom they lived, and had in the city of their choice a separate quarter of their own, where they could follow their distinctive customs without disturbance or offence (cp 1 K. 2034, and see DAMASCUS, § 7; ISRAEL, § 23 f.). Prisoners of war, on the other hand, either remained under the power of their captors or were sold as slaves all over the world (Am. 16). Obviously it was only in the first of these cases that the prisoners could by any possibility have formed the nucleus of a permanent Israelite community living abroad; but we know of no actual instance in which this happened.

The forced migrations arising out of the conquests of the Assyrian and the Babylonian kings were of a quite different character. The first was brought about in 734 by Tiglath-pileser III. (2 K. 1529); at a later date Sargon deported 27,280 inhabitants of Samaria to Mesopotamia and Media (2 K. 176). These large colonies seem to have become completely absorbed; history furnishes no clear trace of their continued separate existence. Still, there is no improbability in the supposition that many of the banished Israelites subsequently became united with the later exiles from Judah. These later exiles were transported by Nebuchadrezzar II. to Babylon in 597, 586, and 582,—according to Jer. 52:28-30 to the number of 4600 souls. They did not readily accommodate themselves to the arrangements made by the king in their behalf, having been led by their prophets to expect a speedy return to Jerusalem (Jer. 29 Ezek. 13).

3. Feelings of Israelites. This view, as we know, was not shared by Jeremiah and Ezekiel; and hence it is that the first-named prophet has left us a clear utterance with regard to that (for Israel) perplexing event—the 'exile.' For him the Babylonian Exile is a prolonged punishment from God. It must be submitted to with resignation and patience, and relief will come only to those in whom the chastisement has fulfilled its purpose. Hence he admonishes the exiles to settle quietly down in Babylonia, to think of the welfare of their families, and to seek their own good in that of the foreigners among whom their lot is cast (Jer. 29:4-7). On the other hand, in his view the intention of those men of Judah who were proposing of their own proper motion to forsake the land of Yahwê and remove to Egypt was against the will of God: it was the road to ruin (Jer. 42:1). This view of the prophet did not, however, turn them from their purpose (see JEREMIAH). Nor did the distinction made by the prophet between involuntary and voluntary exile, however obvious in itself, affect the theorists of a later age, whom we find expecting the return of the Israelites indiscriminately from all the lands of the dispersion (Is. 11:12 43:5 f.).

Let us now seek to trace the subsequent history of the diaspora in the various lands of its abode. The Judahites deported to Babylonia constituted, alike in numbers and in worth, the very kernel of their people (2 K. 24:12-16 25:11 Jer. 52:15). They carried with them, accordingly, as we learn from the Book of Ezekiel, into their new home all the political and religious tendencies of the later period. In particular, there was in Babylonia no want of persons who cherished and developed the ideas of the prophets of the eighth and the seventh centuries. For proof we have only to look at the great zeal which was shown in preserving and adapting the older historical and legal literature, or to call to mind the many prophetic utterances belonging to this period. Those who cherished these ideals did not constitute any 'close' community; they mingled freely with those who were opposed to them, and the prophetic conception always had much to contend with. Still, there were certain centres for Israelitic piety at which fidelity to the Law and hope in the return of the exiles were sedulously and specially cherished. TEL-ABIB (Ezek. 3:15), the river CHERAR (Ezek. 1:3), AHAVA (Ezra 8:15), and CASIPHIA (Ezra 8:17) are the only names of such places that have come down to us; but doubtless there were others. When we find Ezra fetching Levites from Casiphia we have evidence enough to mark the place as a centre of deuteronomistic legalism. The Babylonian Diaspora was by no means entirely deprived of these devoted religious workers in the sixth and fifth centuries. The return under Cyrus must not be construed exactly as we find it represented in Ezra 1-3 (see ISRAEL, § 50 f.; EZRA, ii.; CYRUS). The command of Cyrus to rebuild the temple of Yahwê in Jerusalem and the mission of Sheshbazzar in 538 led to the return of but few families to the ancestral home; the tidings that the restoration of the temple had been accomplished (519-515) led only to the sending of deputations and of gifts to Jerusalem (Zech. 6:9 f.); it was not more than some 5000 or 6000 persons that Ezra led back to Judæa about 430 B.C. All this abundantly proves that the inclination to return was not very strongly felt by the exiles.

5. Few returned to Judah.

For this there were various causes. Many of the exiles were indifferent in religious matters; some had in the interval adapted themselves too closely to the new conditions in which they found themselves; others held the return to be premature, deeming that the times of fulfilment had not yet come. In accordance with prophecy, the last-mentioned were expecting some special divine interposition to put an end to the 'exile' and to give the signal for the beginning of the glorification of Israel (Jer. 32:36 f. Ezek. 34:11 f. Is. 40:3 f. 9 f. Mic. 5:2). Just as, in Jerusalem, men hesitated as to whether they should proceed with the building of the temple and not rather wait for Yahwê's manifestation of himself in glory (Hag. 1:2 f.), so in Babylonia they hesitated as to whether they ought to return forthwith and not rather await some special divine interposition. It is possible that a few additional families may have migrated to Jerusalem after the post-exilic community there had been reconstituted under Nehemiah and Ezra (430 B.C.); but in any case it is certain that a very considerable body of Jews who still adhered to the law remained behind in Babylonia, and thus that the same tendencies which had led to the great changes in Jerusalem brought about through the help of the Persian kings continued to be influential in Babylonia also. The Babylonian Diaspora received an accession under the reign of Artaxerxes III. Ochus (358-338) when he transported Jews to Hyrcania and Babylonia (Georg. Syncell. ed. Dindorf, 1:486).

The Persian overlordship may be assumed to have helped to open the way for the Jews of Babylonia towards the E. and the N. (The case of Nehemiah [Neh. 1 f.] is a clear example of the kind of thing that must often have happened; compare also Tobit 1:9-22. Wherever a Jew had established himself in some advantageous position there were never wanting others to press forward and follow this up for themselves.) From Babylonia (and Hyrcania) the Jews advanced to Elam (Is. 11:11), Persia, Media, Armenia, Cappadocia, and the Black Sea. The relations which Herod the Great had established with the princes of the Upper Euphrates were utilised, we may be sure, by the Jewish Diaspora. Their centre of radiation for the whole of these Eastern countries, however, continued always to be in Babylonia, where the Euphrates and the Tigris begin to merge. Here was situated Nehardea (נְהַרְדָּעָא, Naardā), where the temple tax levied in these parts was annually collected (see below, § 16). In the same neighbourhood two Jews named Asinæus and Anilæus, in the time of Caligula, founded a sort of robber state which held its own for sixteen years (Jos. Ant. xviii. 91). Another important focus of Judaism was the city of Nisibis (נִסְבִּיִן), in the upper basin of the Chaboras. The Jewish community in Babylonia could boast of the conversion of King Izates of Adiabēnē (חֲזִיָּיִב), on the upper Tigris, along with his mother and the rest of his kindred, in the reign of Claudius (Jos. Ant. xx. 2-4).

The development of the Diaspora in Egypt followed a quite different course from that which has just been sketched. Whilst the Judaism of Babylonia maintained its Oriental character with considerable strictness, in Egypt, or (to speak more precisely) in Alexandria, it entered upon that remarkable alliance with Hellenism which was destined to have such important effects on the history of religion. Whether Psametik I. (663-609 B.C.) actually had Jewish mercenaries in his service (Letter of Aristeas) may be left an open question. We know, however, that in 609 Necho II. condemned King Jehoahaz to exile in Egypt, and that in 586 a body of Jews, including Jeremiah the prophet, under the leadership of Johanan b. Kareah, migrated to TAHAPANES (Tell Defenne; cp Jer. 42 f.). According to Jer. 44:16 (an insertion dating from about the fifth century) Jews settled also in MIGDOL, NOPH (Memphis), and PATHROS (Upper Egypt). Their settlement in Alexandria is assigned by the Pseudo-Hecataeus, by Aristeas, and by Josephus to the period of Alexander the Great or Ptolemy I. It has been shown by H. Willrich,¹ however, that the statements of these writers must be taken with great caution. In his own view there was no considerable Jewish element in Alexandria until the second century B.C. Against this theory two objections can be urged. First, the statement of Apion that the Jews settled to the E. of the harbour of Alexandria (Jos. c. Ap. 24) can be understood only with reference to the time of the rise of the city. Secondly, the statement of Josephus (ib.; cp BJ ii. 187) that the Jews in Alexandria received the honorific name of Macedonian can hardly be doubted. Josephus indeed exaggerates; the Jews in Alexandria were in the first instance under the protection of the 'phyle' of the Macedonians, and the Jewish quarter formed a part of this 'phyle'; in the limited sense only came they to be called Macedonians. As the later Ptolemies, especially from the time of Ptolemy VI. Philometor onwards, favoured the Egyptian more than the Grecian element in Alexandria, it is not to be supposed that the Jews reached this privileged position so late as the second century.² This being so, they can have obtained it only under the first Ptolemies, and in that case it is very far indeed from improbable that Jews were included among the earliest inhabitants of Alexandria and thus acquired special privileges there. They had a separate quarter of their own, known as the Δ (Delta) quarter (Jos. BJ ii. 188). The repeated struggles between Ptolemies and Seleucids, and the preference of the Jews for the former dynasty, may be presumed to have led in succeeding generations to further Jewish migrations into Egypt, especially to Alexandria, partly even as prisoners of war (cp Jer. in Dan. 11:4).

We are told of Ptolemy II. Philadelphus (Jos. Ant. xii. 21) that, as a fitting prelude to the Greek translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, he redeemed some 120,000 Jewish prisoners of war. The story is doubtless a fiction; but it throws light on some of the circumstances which had to do with the increase of the Jewish population in Egypt. Ptolemy VI. Philometor (181-145) also is mentioned in history as a friend to the Jews; Ptolemy VII. (see Euergetes), as a relentless enemy. For the former see Jos. Ant. xiii. 31 f.; for the latter Jos. c. Ap. 25. We may take it that Euergetes for some years regarded the Jews as his political opponents, siding as they did with his rival Ptolemy Philometor; but we have evidence of papyri and inscriptions that he also showed them various marks of favour (Willrich, op. cit. 142 ff.).

In Philo's time (40 A.D.) the Jews in Alexandria were so many as to occupy two entire quarters, besides furnishing a sprinkling over the rest of the city (in Flaccum, 8, ed. Mangey, 2325).

An exceptional position was taken by the Onias colony in the nome of Heliopolis. The high priest ONIAS (7.v.), son of Simon the Just, had taken refuge from his adversaries, the children of Tobias, and from Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, in 173 or 170, by flight into Egypt. He was accompanied by a body of his adherents—among them DOSITHEUS (4), who is named in the subscription to the Greek version of the Book of Esther. From Ptolemy VI. Philometor he and his people received permission to settle on the eastern border of the Nile delta in the nome of Heliopolis. Here Onias built a fortress, and within this a sanctuary (on the pattern of the temple of Jerusalem), in which he established a legal worship of Yahweh. Philometor endowed the temple with land (cp Jos. BJ i. 11; vii. 102 ff.; Ant. xii. 51; 97; xiii. 31 ff.; also the recent discussions of the date of this exodus and the persons engaged in it in Willrich, op. cit. 64 ff. 126 ff.; Wellh. GGA, 1895, p. 947 ff.; also ISRAEL, § 7).

The temple of Onias, however, did not receive universal recognition even in Egypt (not to speak of Palestine). It had, indeed, the legitimate high priest, of the family of Aaron; but it did not occupy the legitimate site. Thus the Diaspora in Egypt was brought to a state of schism, which is alluded to in a veiled manner in Ant. xiii. 34 and elsewhere, as Willrich (op. cit. 129 ff.) has conjectured, no doubt correctly. At the same time, the antagonism between Leontopolis (as the city of the Onias-temple was called) and Jerusalem does not seem to have been very intense: otherwise the allusion to the temple of Onias in Is. 19:18 f. (but cp HERES, CITY OF) would hardly have been allowed to pass. Moreover, national feeling appears on repeated occasions to have overridden religious or ecclesiastical differences (Jos. Ant. xii. 182; xiv. 81; BJ i. 94). Particularly noteworthy is the readiness for war and the ability for self-defence to which Josephus frequently calls attention in the followers of Onias (c. Ap. 25; Ant. xiii. 104; 131 f.; BJ i. 94; Ant. xiv. 81). The temple at Leontopolis was destroyed in 73 A.D. by Lupus and Paulinus by order of Vespasian (Jos. BJ vii. 102 ff.).

Jews penetrated also into Upper Egypt and Cush (Is. 11:11), as we learn from lately published papyri.

They were strongly represented in Cyrenaica also (c. Ap. 24; Jer. on Dan. 11:4). Strabo (cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 72), writing of 85 B.C., divides the inhabitants of the city of Cyrène into four classes—citizens, peasants, settlers (metœci), and Jews. In the city of Berenice the inscriptions show a special πολιτευμα of the Jews dating from 13 B.C. (cp CIG iii. no. 5361).

The Diaspora in Egypt did not owe its origin entirely—as, in the first instance, did that of Babylonia—to external compulsion. It owed its growth and its reputable standing mainly to the great changes produced throughout the East generally by the conquests of Alexander. The greatly enlarged channels of commerce, especially by sea-routes, attracted many from the interior to the coasts. The newly-founded Grecian cities, rendered attractive by all the achievements of Greek art and civilisation, became favourite resorts. Henceforth trade relations, the desire to see the world, soon also political considerations and (we may well suppose) a certain conscious or unconscious craving for culture, became operative in promoting the dispersion of the Jews over the civilised world.

Such things seem to have been specially influential in bringing about the settlement of Jews in Syria.³ It is quite possible, indeed, that the old

11. Diaspora in Syria. Israelite colony in Damascus (see above, § 1) may have maintained an uninterrupted existence and gradually developed into the Jewish community to the largeness of which Josephus bears witness (BJ ii. 202; vii. 87). In some of the Phœnician cities also, as, for example, in Tyre (cp Ezek. 27) and Sidon, Israelites may have settled from a very early period; as at the main points on the great trade route between Jerusalem and Mesopotamia, such as Hamath (Is. 11:11). The Syria of the Seleucids, however, seems first to have become thoroughly accessible to Jews only after the reign of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes. It was his successors, for example, who first conceded to them the right of free settlement in Antioch (Jos. Ant. vii. 33). The later Seleucids had abundant occasion for showing consideration to the resident Jews: in the frequent struggles for the crown, the support of the Maccabees became important (Jos. Ant. xiii. 53). The opposite statement of Josephus that it was Seleucus I. (306-280 B.C.) who granted to the Jews the rights of citizenship in Antioch (c. Ap. 24), or even equal rights with Greeks in all the cities founded by him in Asia and Lower Syria (Ant. xii. 31), is probably to be understood only as meaning that the Jews ultimately received the rights of citizenship in all the places named. It is easy to understand how the astonishing increase in numbers, power, and influence, which the Jewish commonwealth gained under the rule of the Maccabees, should first have made itself felt in the neighbouring kingdom of the Seleucidæ. The Maccabees had subjugated and converted the Idumæans in the south as well as the Ituræans in the north; Galilee and Peræa also became Judaised during their supremacy. What was the little community founded by Ezra and Nehemiah, either in extent or in numbers, in comparison with this? Jerusalem had become so strong that—reversing the prophetic prediction—it could lend to the Dispersion from the abundance of its own forces. From this time forward it was, we may plausibly conjecture, that the Diaspora in Syria became so strong as to exhibit the largest admixture of the Jewish element known anywhere (Jos. BJ vii. 33). Precise details regarding the individual localities are, however, lacking.

The immigration of Jews to Asia Minor and its islands was partly overland by way of Syria and Mesopotamia, and partly by sea from Egypt and Phœnicia, but for the most part not before the Grecian period. It is possible, however, that Jews may have been sold as slaves into these regions at an earlier date (cp Ezek. 27¹³ Joel 3[47]). It is interesting that Clearchus of Soli (circa 320 B.C.) speaks of a meeting between his master Aristotle and an already Hellenised Jew (Jos. c. Ap. i. 22). In the passage in question the Jews are represented as descendants of the Indian philosophers; which shows that at that time and place the Jew was looked upon with wonder as a new phenomenon—the educated Jew, at least. Josephus (Ant. xii. 34) will have it that a colony of 2000 Jewish families was transported by Antiochus III. the Great (224-187) from Mesopotamia and Babylonia into Lydia and Phrygia. The form and the substance of the statement alike arouse suspicion (Willrich, 39 ff.). Here again we are in ignorance as to the details of the migration. In any case, it was to the advantage of the Jewish Diaspora when Greece and Asia Minor in 146 and 130 B.C. became Roman provinces and the kings of Eastern Asia Minor accepted the supremacy of Rome. From the days of Simon, the Maccabees had been in friendly alliance with Rome, and the Jews very soon began to realise that under the Roman rule they enjoyed greater freedom in the exercise of their religious customs than they had found in the Grecian kingdoms (cp Jos. Ant. xvi. 24, and below). Accordingly, as early as the first century B.C., we find them making use of their good relations with the Romans to secure any doubtful or disputed rights in the cities of Asia Minor and Syria by decisions of the supreme authority (cp decrees and the names therein mentioned as given in Jos. Ant. xiv. 10, xiv. 123 ff., xvi. 23 ff., 62 ff.; for Cyprus, Ant. xiii. 104, Acts 134 ff.; for Crete, BJ ii. 71; also Acts 13-21 passim).

12. In Asia Minor and the West.

Jews arrived in Greece and Italy in the second century B.C. if not earlier. Between 170 and 156 we find an emancipated Jewish slave named in a acquaintance. Jewish inscriptions, moreover, occur in Greece, and the apostle Paul found firmly organised communities there (Acts 17 f.). In 63 B.C., Jewish captives were brought to Rome by Pompey and sold as slaves. Soon emancipated, they acquired the Roman citizenship and founded the Jewish colony upon the right bank of the Tiber (Philo, ed. Mangey, 2568). Cæsar conferred upon the Jews many favours: compare the decree of the senate in Jos. Ant. xiv. 85, and the immediately preceding narrative. Herod the Great, who always interested himself in the welfare of the Jewish Diaspora (Ant. xvi. 22-5, 61-8), cultivated relations with Rome assiduously, and greatly promoted the Jewish settlements there. Thus in the course of the first Christian century the Jews had already been able to establish themselves on the left bank of the Tiber beside the Porta Capēna (Juv. Sat. 3 12-16), and at a somewhat later date on the Campus Martius and even in the Subura. In connection with events in the year 4 B.C. Josephus (BJ ii. 61) speaks of a Jewish embassy to Rome as having been supported by more than 8000 Jews there. Under the same year he incidentally mentions (BJ ii. 71) the existence of Jews in Dicæarchia (Puteoli). The friendship of the two Agrippas with the imperial house, the relations of Josephus with the Flavii, the love of Titus for Berenice, all testify to the progress which Judaism had made in the highest Roman circles; and no one will imagine the Jews of that day to have been so self-forgetful as not to utilise such favouring circumstances, as far as they possibly could, for their own advantage.

To complete the present survey, Arabia also ought to be mentioned as one of the fields of the Jewish Diaspora. From Acts 211 and Gal. 1 17 the inference that in the first century there were Jewish communities there is certain; but as to their origin we are left entirely to conjecture.

Philo (in Flacc. 6, ed. Mangey, 2523) estimates the number of Jews living in Egypt alone in the time of 14. Approximate numbers.

Caligula at a million. If to this figure we add the total of the other groups mentioned above, we shall not be far wrong in putting the figure at three or four millions. The violent breaking-up of the Jewish population in Palestine in consequence of the war of 66-70 A.D. (cp Jos. BJ vi. 82, 93) raised this number still further; and thus the expression of Dio Cassius (693) in speaking of the Jewish insurrection under Hadrian—that all the world, so to say (ἡ οἰκουμένη), was stirred—is intelligible enough.

in the Assyrio-Babylonian empire were crown possessions, under royal protection (Ezra 4 14). The lands they tilled were grants from the king, on which they were free to live in accordance with their own laws and customs (cp the counterpart in Israel 2 K. 17 24 ff.). If the colonists flourished they gradually established their independence; if otherwise, they ultimately lapsed into a state of serfdom (cp Gen. 47 13 ff.). In this respect it is not to be supposed that any considerable change came about under Persian or Greek supremacy as long as the aliens continued to be members of the colony. In Egypt the same course was followed by the rulers or pharaohs, as Gen. 47 3 ff. shows: to shepherds a pastoral region was assigned, and the pharaoh was their master (v. 66; Ex. 1 11). It must be borne in mind, however, that in this case Israelites came into Egypt not only as prisoners, but also as refugees.

Brighter prospects opened up before Israelites in foreign parts as Alexander and his successors founded new cities in the east. In Alexandria they received important privileges; they came into a fellowship of protection with the Macedonians—the 'phyle' which probably was considered the foremost of all and was therefore named after Dionysus (see above, § 7). What use the Jews made of this privilege is shown by Josephus, who asserts that they had equal rights (ισοτιμία, ἰσονομία, ἰσοπολιτεία) with the Macedonians and even the right to bear this honorific name (c. Ap. 24; BJ ii. 187). As Alexandria never attained the characteristic constitution of a Greek city with a βουλή, but continued to be governed directly by royal officials, it is probable that the special administration and special jurisdiction in civil matters which the Jews enjoyed within the bounds of their own quarter of the city were of ancient standing. At a later period, as the Ptolemies came to take more account of the Egyptian population, it is possible that many of the Jewish privileges may have been curtailed (cp Mahaffy, The Empire of the Ptolemies, 76, 359 ff., 381 ff.; Lumbroso, L'Egitto dei Greci e dei Romani, 1895, 140 ff.). In Strabo's time, however, they still had an administration of their own under the special jurisdiction of an ethnarch (Jos. Ant. xiv. 72). In any case, they again received full rights of citizenship in Alexandria from Caesar (Jos. Ant. xiv. 101; c. Ap. 24). In Cyrenaica also they enjoyed special privileges (Jos. Ant. xiv. 72). The Onias colony doubtless enjoyed the special protection of the sovereign (see above, § 8).

In the Greek cities properly so called the Jews were not so favourably situated. In these a group of foreigners could keep up the observance of its ancestral customs, especially its religious customs, only as a private society or club (θίαρος, ἑπάρος; cp E. Ziebarth, Das griechische Vereinswesen, 1896). The Jews in this respect followed the lead of the Phœnicians in Athens and Delos. We do not possess definite evidence of the fact, though it is interesting to note that in the Roman decree preserved in Jos. Ant. xiv. 108 the Jewish communities without prejudice to their privileges are placed upon a level with θίαροι. In particular cities, such as Ephesus and Sardis, they no doubt sooner or later acquired the rights of citizenship (Jos. c. Ap. 24; Ant. xiv. 1024); but whether they already had it under the Seleucidae, as Josephus asserts, or whether they first received it from the Romans, is not quite clear (see above, § 11). It frequently happened that their citizenship became in turn a source of embarrassment. In the Greek cities, by ancient custom, community of place was held to imply community of worship; in many places the fact of citizenship found its expression in some special cult, such as that of Dionysus. Hence a demand that the Jews should worship the local god—a demand which they were compelled by their creed to resist (Jos. c. Ap. 26). Even in Cæsarea Palæstina their ισοπολιτεία did not secure them full protection (Jos. Ant. xx. 879 BJ ii. 137 14-5 181).

It was not till the time of Julius Cæsar and Augustus that the Jews of the Diaspora received a general recognition of their legal standing throughout the Roman Empire. Josephus (Ant. xiv. 85 10 123-6 xvi. 62-7) quotes a series of enactments from 47 B.C.-10 B.C. by which the Jews had secured to them the enjoyment of religious freedom, exemption from military service, special rights in the administration of property, and special jurisdiction (in civil matters). Nicolaus Damascenus, in his apology for the Jews before M. Vipsanius Agrippa in Lesbos, in 14 B.C., says: 'The happiness which all mankind do now enjoy by your means we estimate by this very thing, that on all hands we are allowed each one of us to live according to his conviction and to practise his religion' (Jos. Ant. xvi. 24). In Roman law the Jewish communities came under the category of collegia licita (Tertullian, religio licita). After 70 A.D. this held only for the Jewish religion, not for the Jewish nation. From cases covered by these general regulations we must distinguish those in which individual Jews had obtained for themselves the Roman citizenship (Acts 22 25-29; Jos. Ant. xiv. 10 16 17 f.). See GOVERNMENT, § 30 f.

III. The great difficulty of Jewish social life in the Diaspora lay in the fact that community of place and community of worship no longer coincided. The case had been quite otherwise in Palestine, and the Jewish laws in their original framing had contemplated Palestinian conditions alone. Communities of some sort, however, had to be formed abroad, if Judaism was to maintain itself there at all. Thus the attempt to secure local separateness was abandoned. Attention was concentrated on the effort to maintain the bond of union by means of a separate, if restricted, jurisdiction, and administration of property; the sacrificial worship was given up; and the means for a new spiritual worship were sought in regularly recurring meetings for prayer, reading of the scriptures, and preaching (see SYNAGOGUE). For the central sacrificial worship there remained the high honour of being the expression of the connection still subsisting between Jerusalem and the outside communities; every Jew of twenty years old or more had yearly to pay a half-shekel or didrachma to the temple for the maintenance of the sacrificial system still carried on there. This tax was collected yearly in the various districts, and transmitted to Jerusalem by the hands of persons of repute (Philo, de Mon. 23) under carefully framed regulations (Jos. Ant. xviii. 91). Further, the pilgrimages to the three principal feasts, particularly that of Tabernacles, annually brought vast crowds of Jews of the Diaspora to the religious capital. Josephus (BJ vi. 93) gives the number of persons—natives and strangers together—present at the Passover, according to a census taken in the time of Cestius Gallus (63-66 A.D.), as having been 2,700,000. After the sacrificial system had been brought to an end in 70 A.D., it was by the forms of religious fellowship which had been developed in the Diaspora that the continued existence of Judaism was rendered possible.

The individual community was called ἐκκλησία (lit. 'congregation'; συναγωγή). In towns with a large Jewish population (Alexandria, Antioch, Rome) there were many synagogues. The heads of the communities are usually spoken of as ἄρχοντες. In Alexandria an ἐθνάρχης was at the head of the entire Jewish community (Jos. Ant. xiv. 72); it may be added that he had nothing to do with the office of the Alabarch or Arabarch (cp ALEXANDRIA, § 2). Under Augustus the direction of affairs was handed over to a γερονσία with ἄρχοντες at its head. In Rome each of the many synagogues had its own γερονσία with ἄρχοντες and a γερονσιάρχης over all. The building in which the meetings were held—on sabbaths and feast days especially—was called [ἡ] ἡσυχία, in Gr. συναγωγή or προσευχή, less frequently συναγώγιον, προσευκτήριον, σαββατεῖον. See, further, SYNAGOGUE.

The contact brought about by the Diaspora communities between Judaism and the Græco-Roman culture was of great consequence to the history of civilisation. Here again it is the Western Diaspora that principally claims our attention; the Eastern, in Mesopotamia and Babylonia, had little share in this movement, and indeed hardly comes under observation at all. It was not until comparatively late in the day, it would seem, that the Greeks began to take any but the most superficial interest in Judaism and the Jews. Willrich (43-63) has collected all that Greek writers had to say about them down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, and remarks (170): 'In the period before Antiochus Epiphanes the Greek regarded the Jew with feelings of mingled curiosity and wonder, astonishment and instinctive antipathy.' In these circumstances it is not surprising that, down to the date in question, the intellectual importance of the Diaspora was slight. Traders, freedmen, and prisoners of war constituted the majority of the Diaspora of these days; that such people should excite the interest and attention of educated Greeks was not to be expected. An educated Jew whether we date the production of the Greek translation of the Pentateuch from the reign of Philadelphus (285-246 B.C.), or, as has recently been done by Willrich (ut sup. 154 ff.), from that of Philometor (181-145 B.C.). Whatever its date, this attempt to make the Law speak in Greek conclusively shows that when it was made the Jews of Alexandria had already assimilated so much of what was Greek that they could no longer get on with Hebrew alone, either in their synagogues or in their courts. Their sojourn abroad made it imperative on Jews everywhere to complete their rapprochement with Hellenism. In the process many may well have become lost to Judaism altogether. The Greek version of the Pentateuch, however, evinces the fixed determination of the majority not to allow themselves to be robbed of the old faith by the new culture. As the influence of the Jews, on trade and public life generally, advanced—in Egypt and Syria in the first instance—it became increasingly necessary for the Greeks to decide definitely what their own attitude towards them was to be. This led to struggle, but also to friendly dealings.

Antipathy to Judaism manifested itself both in coarse and in refined ways. The uneducated masses scoffed at the Jews for their outlandish customs, plundered them at all hands, and occasionally gave expression to their hatred in massacres. Civic authorities tried to infringe Jewish privileges or to hinder the transmission of the temple money to Jerusalem (see the decree in Jos. Ant. xiv. 10). Roman emperors even more than once sanctioned measures that pressed hardly on the Jews. Tiberius in 19 A.D. expelled them from Rome, and forced 4000 of them upon military service to Sardinia (Jos. Ant. xviii. 35; similarly Tac. Ann. 285 Suet. Tib. 36). They seem soon afterwards to have been restored to the enjoyment of their rights. Caligula gave free course to a bloody persecution of the Jews in Alexandria in 38 A.D. Petitions and embassies (Philo, Apion) to the emperor proved of no avail. It was not until Claudius had come to the throne that the old privileges were again restored to the victims of persecution (Philo, in Flacc. and Leg. ad Caium; Jos. Ant. xviii. 8; xix. 52). Later, Claudius intervened in Rome in a hostile sense (Acts 18.2 Suet. Claud. 25 Dio Cassius ix. 6). The Jews defended themselves as best they could, not so much by force as by money or writings, and by cultivating friendly relations with those in high places.

The controversy carried on with the pen is worthy of remark. Gentile writers made it a reproach that the Jews as a people had done nothing for civilisation and had produced no men of distinction (so Posidonius, Polybius, Strabo, Apion). These and similar charges the Jews answered in innumerable apologies—some of them (such as those of Nicolaus Damascus and Philo) with a dignity and earnestness worthy of the cause, though others (such as that of Josephus in many cases) showed a disposition to confound the convenient with the true, and others did not hesitate to resort to misrepresentation and positive falsehood (Pseudo-Hecataeus, Eupolemus, Artapanus, Aristobolus, Aristaeus, etc.). The most incredible fables were gravely set forth.

Abraham was the founder of astronomy; Joseph the founder of geometry and the inventor of agriculture; Moses the author of the division of Egypt into nomes, and even of the Egyptian animal worship. Jews and Spartans exchanged salutations as descendants of Abraham (1 Macc. 12.20 ff.; cp Ant. xiv. 10.22).

Such things could be written only by Jews who had become familiar with the activities and intellectual life of Hellenistic circles, by men for whom the Græco-Roman culture had become an indispensable element of everyday life. They were only unconsciously proving the respect which they themselves cherished for foreign culture when they tried to trace the origin of culture to their own forefathers. Such literary phenomena could not be produced in Jerusalem, the home of Judaism; they prove that Judaism abroad, although still wearing the garment of the Law, carried a very different nature under that old-fashioned vestment. It had now found a large range of activities which it shared with contemporary humanity at large.

This struggle—itsself an evidence of the power to which the Judaism of the Diaspora had attained—does not exhaust the history. There were many points of friendly contact between Judaism and the outer world. For the more educated circles of the Gentile world the Judaism of the Diaspora had, in fact, a great attraction. In it men felt themselves face to face with a power which had developed new forces—unflinching self-sacrificing fidelity in the maintenance of religious customs which seemed to the outsider meaningless—sabbath observance, circumcision, laws of purity. Through Judaism they became acquainted with a conception of God which, strange in its severity, enlightened by its simplicity, and attracted religious natures by its purity and its sincerity. The popular polytheism of Greece and Rome had been shattered by philosophy; in the Oriental religions, which at that time were advancing in triumph westward, the idea of a supreme God found many supporters; Judaism in its monotheism presented the explicit conception for which so many were looking. Inseparably connected with it was the thought of a divine creation of the world, of the original oneness of the world and the human race, as well as that of the providential ordering of the world—thoughts which promised to provide fixed formulæ for the cosmopolitan tendencies of the time, and were welcome on that account. No one has set forth the contents of Judaism from this point of view more nobly than Philo, the contemporary of Jesus in Alexandria. The confidence with which he handles these conceptions makes it probable not only that he had literary predecessors in this style but also that an appeal to practical experience gave a powerful support to his teaching (cp Strabo ap. Jos. Ant. xiv. 7.2; also Jos. c. Ap. 1.22 236 39.41 B/iv. 5.2 κοσμητὴ θεοσκέα; also PROSELYTE, § 3). The Diaspora of the Mediterranean, and especially in Alexandria, thus not only led the way to the breaking of the narrow bonds of the Jewish Law, but also was the first to make the heathen world acquainted with a spiritual conception of God and a spiritual worship presented in a positive religion, and thus paved the way for the coming of Christianity.

DISTRICT 1. (דִּשְׁטְרִיק; ¹περιχωρος; vici [once pagus 315]; Neh. 39 1214-18† RV), the name given to certain administrative divisions of Judæa in Nehemiah's time, each of which was under a 'ruler' or 'chief' (רִשָּׁה). These 'districts' comprise Jerusalem and Keilah (each with two rulers), Beth-haccerem, Beth-zur, and Mizpah (BNA om. [L μέπος; for Vg. see above]). It is not impossible that the list was originally much fuller. From the character of the names of the 'rulers' Meyer (Enist. 166 ff.) has concluded that they were Calebites (see CALEB, § 4). The organisation of the Calebites in the genealogies 1 Ch. 2 4 suggests further that the pelek was a tribal subdivision,² the head of which would correspond to the ἐθνάρχης (in Gr. inscr. from the Haurān) of the later Nabatæan kingdom (cp 2 Cor. 11 32, and see ETHNARCH).

DIVINATION. Men instinctively wish to know the future, and among all peoples there have been those

1. Divination. who have, from certain omens, claimed to be able to predict it. Such knowledge could only come from supernatural beings. When beasts or birds, by their movements, or otherwise, gave men intelligible signs, it was because they were 'indwelt' by beings that were supernatural, or because they were supernatural themselves. 'Omens are not blind tokens; the animals know what they tell to men' (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 443).

Necromancy is a kind of divination, not a thing distinct in itself (see below, § 3). It is difficult, if not impossible, to indicate the boundary line between divination and prophecy. In both the same general principle obtains—intercourse of man with the spiritual world in order to obtain special knowledge. In divination, this knowledge is usually got by observing certain omens or signs; but this is by no means always the case, since sometimes the beings consulted possessed the soothsayer. Divination, as practised in this last method, does not differ from prophecy of the lowest kind—that of the ecstatic state—as distinguished from that higher species of prophecy which in Riehm's happy phrase is 'psychologically mediated.'³ See PROPHECY.

The ancient Greeks, Romans, Arabs, etc., had modes of divining that apparently were unknown to the

2. Methods. Hebrews of the OT—e.g., by observation of the flights and cries of birds, inspection of the entrails of animals, etc. (see Freytag, Einh. 159 ff.); but there are mentioned in the OT many signs or omens that resemble or are identical with those in use among other nations.

i. Rhabdomancy (divination by rods) appears to be referred to in Hos. 4 12, 'My people ask counsel at their "wood," and their "staff" declares unto them' (cp Herod. 467). The higher prophets of course forbade this; but we may perhaps assume that it was uncondemned in earlier times.

ii. Belomancy (divination by arrows), a development of rhabdomancy, is mentioned in Ezek. 21 23 ff. [19 ff.], where the Babylonian king is said to have stood 'at the parting of the way,' and to have 'shaken the arrows to and fro.' The doubtful point was whether he was to march from Babylon to Egypt by Jerusalem or by Rabbath-Ammon. As Pocock (quoted by Rosenmüller) long ago pointed out, belomancy was much in use among the Arabs (see also We. Heid. (2) 132). For the Babylonian practice, see Lenormant, La Divination, chap. 2; as this able though sometimes uncritical writer truly points out, belomancy had but a secondary importance. Nebuchadrezzar had certainly consulted the stars and the regular omens in order to ascertain whether the right time had come for the campaign against Egypt. Arab tradition tells how Imra-al-Kais practised belomancy before setting out against Asad. He did so 'by shuffling before the image of the god a set of arrows. These were here three in number, called respectively, "the Commanding," "the Forbidding," and "the Waiting." He drew the second, and thereupon broke the arrows, and flung them in the face of the idol.' Mohammed forbade the use of arrows, as 'an abomination of Satan's work' (Koran, Sur. 592). The arrows were special, pointless arrows (originally rods).

iii. The Babylonian king, however, did more than shake the sacred arrows; the passage continues, 'he looked in the liver' ('hepatoscopy'). (We omit the reference to the teraphim because no new point is indicated by it; the king consulted the teraphim [singular], by shaking the arrows before it, as was always done also by the heathen Arabs.) The liver, which was regarded as the chief seat of life (Prov. 7 23), was supposed to give warning of the future by its convulsive motions, when taken from the sacrificed victim (see LIVER). That an application for oracles was accompanied by sacrifices we know from the story of Balaam. Lenormant (op. cit. 58 f.) refers to two Babylonian fragments relative to the inspection of the entrails, giving some of the features which had to be watched for. The Greeks, too, practised ἡπατοσκοπία.

iv. The objects used for lots in Arabia were, as we have seen, pointless arrows. Among the Israelites, however, the principal objects employed were probably stones of different colours, one of which gave the affirmative, the other the negative answer to the question put (so Wellh., Bu., H. P. Smith, in connection with the classical passage, 1 S. 14 41). Other passages in the historical books in which the phrase יָצַח ('to inquire of') occurs should probably be explained on the analogy of this passage. Cp EPHOD, URIM AND THUMMIM, TERAPHIM.

v. Passing over such omens as Gideon's in Judg. 6 36 and Jonathan's in 1 S. 14 8 ff., and reserving astrology for subsequent consideration (see STARS), we pause next at the most important of all the modes of divination that linked the Hebrews with other peoples—

(vi.) The method of dreams (oneiromancy). Jacob may have sufficient reason for making good his escape from Laban; but he will not take the decisive step without a direct revelation (Gen. 31 10-13). In other cases the divine communication is such as exceeds the power of human reason to discover; instances are the dreams of Abimelech (Gen. 20 3 6 f.), and especially those of Joseph (Gen. 37 5 cp 40 8 41 1 f.). Other noteworthy instances of divinely sent dreams are Gen. 28 12 ff. 31 24 Judg. 7 13 1 K. 3 5 f. Mt. 1 20 2 12 ff. 27 19. Notice E's fondness for relating dreams. The author of the speeches of Elihu also attaches great importance to dreams as a channel of divine communications (Job 33 14-16). It would almost seem as if the belief in the symbolic character of dreams should be reckoned among other revivals of primitive beliefs in the period of early Judaism (cp the dream-visions in Enoch chaps. 83-90, and the dreams in the Book of Daniel; also Jos. BJ ii. 7 4 iii. 83). Men were oppressed by constant anxiety as to the future, and there was no prophet in the great old style to assuage this. They looked about, therefore, for artificial means of satisfying their curiosity. Prophets like Isaiah, however, never refer to their dreams, and it is even a question how far the visions of which they speak are to be taken literally (see PROPHECY).

vii. On a possible divination by means of sacred garments, see DRESS, § 8.

We must now consider briefly the various terms applied to divination and diviners, and endeavour to define their application.

1. קִסָּפִּי, kesem, a general term for divination of all kinds (cp the Ar. kāhin, and see PRIESTS), on the derivation of which see MAGIC, § 3 (v). Thus EV renders

3. קִסָּפִּי, 'divination' (once 'witchcraft,' 1 S. 15:23 EV), קִסָּפִּי, 'diviner' (1 S. 6:2 Zech. 10:2), also 'soothsayer' (Josh. 18:22 EV) and 'prudent' (Is. 8:2 AV); and קִסָּפִּי gives the more general terms μάντις, μαντεύομαι, μαντεία, μαντήριον. Ezek. 21:26 [27], however, shows plainly enough that the word had the distinct sense of obtaining an oracle by casting lots by means of arrows (see above, § 2 [2]).¹ The one selected by chance was supposed to represent the divine decision; on the other hand, in 1 S. 28:8, Saul is made to ask the witch to divine for him by means of the 'db (אִדָּב); see below, § 4 (ii.); and cp MAGIC.

2. קִסָּפִּי (me'ōnēn). The etymology of this word is much disputed (cp Del. on Is. 26). Two interpretations deserve mention: (a) Me'ōnēn is one who divines by observing the clouds (denom. from קִסָּפִּי), a mode of divination well known among the ancients; or perhaps, one who brings clouds, or causes storms (capnomancy). In the passages in which the word occurs, however, there is nothing to suggest that the me'ōnēn has anything to do with the sky. (b) One who smites with the 'evil eye' (denom. from קִסָּפִּי); but, apart from other considerations, the Targ. rendering קִסָּפִּי appears to be decidedly against this view. In the absence of further evidence it is best to follow Ewald (Bib. Theol. 1:234) and WRS (loc. cit.; cp also Dr.), who compare the Arabic ḡanna, 'to emit a hoarse, nasal sound.' The fact that so many of the words connected with magic and divination denote low subdued mournful speaking, favours this last surmise, though there must ever remain much doubt about the exact origin and meaning. קִסָּפִּי renders by a word which means primarily to take an omen from the flight of birds, examples of which practice may be found in Arabia (cp We. Heid. (2) 202 f.). The word is usually rendered by 'observers' (once Judg. 6:37 AVmg. 'regardars' of times' (AV), or 'augurs' (RV) (Dt. 18:10-14, Lev. 19:26 2 K. 21:6), in Is. 2:6 Mt. 5:12 [11] EV 'soothsayers' (so also Jer. 27:9 RV, where AV 'enchanter'; once (fem.) 'sorceress' (Is. 57:3). An oak near Shechem, famous in divination, bears the name 'Oak of MEONENIM' (Judg. 9:37). For other examples of sacred trees cp IDOLATRY, § 2, and see NATURE-WORSHIP.

3. קִסָּפִּי (nišēš), 'to use enchantment' (2 K. 21:6=2 Ch. 33:6 Lev. 19:26; cp קִסָּפִּי, 'enchantment' Nu. 23:23 24:1), or 'to divine' (Gen. 44:5 15 EV; and Gen. 30:27 RV, where AV 'to learn by experience'; cp 1 K. 20:33 'diligently observe,' RVmg. 'take as an omen'), is probably used to include any kind of divination (WRS). In Gen. 44:5 15 the same word is used for divination by a cup²—i.e., probably by hydromancy, where a vessel is filled with water and the rings formed by the liquid are observed. Was קִסָּפִּי originally used in a special sense, and connected with קִסָּפִּי, 'a serpent'? So at least Bochart, Lenormant, and Baudissin (Studien zur sem. Rel.-gesch. 1:287); see SERPENT, § 1, 3, MAGIC, § 8, 3.

4. קִסָּפִּי, gāzerin, is found only in Daniel (2:27 4:4 [7] 5:7 11, EV 'soothsayers'), and may be rendered 'prognosticators,' properly 'those who determine [what is doubtful]'; cp Bev. ad loc. The root means 'to cut'; but whether the 'cutting of the heavens' by Babylonian astrologers is meant, is uncertain (see STARS, § 5). Perhaps (cp Ar. jazara, 'to slaughter') the gāzerin originally offered a sacrifice in connection with the art (cp Vg. haruspices). See § 2, iii.

5. קִסָּפִּי (asāph) and קִסָּפִּי (asāph) occur in the Heb. (1:20 2:2) and the Aram. (2:10 4:7 [4], etc.) parts of Daniel respectively, and are rendered 'astrologer,' RV 'enchanter.' The word is of Assyrian origin (STARS, § 5). It is difficult to say whether קִסָּפִּי and the other terms found were meant to represent a separate class, or whether the writer employed these terms indiscriminately (Bev. Dan. 63).

6. קִסָּפִּי (kasdā'im) in Dan. 1:4 2:10 (5:7 11) means the caste of wise men. This usage (well known from classical writers) arose after the fall of the Babylonian empire, when the only Chaldeans known were astrologers and soothsayers.

² The so-called κυλικομαντεία. Cp Joseph's divining-cup with the famous goblet of Jemshid, and see Lenormant, La Divination, 78-80. For a parallel French superstition, see B. Thiers. Traité des superstitions (2), Paris, 1697, 1:187 ff.

7. For קִסָּפִּי (Gad) and קִסָּפִּי (Meni) in Is. 65:11, see FORTUNE AND DESTINY. See also other terms under MAGIC.

Necromancy, to which we turn next, is, as the etymology of the word implies, divination by resort to the spirits of deceased persons.

4. Necromancy. Three terms or expressions fall to be noticed, all of them met with in Dt. 18:11.

i. We shall begin with that which occurs last in the verse, viz. קִסָּפִּי (one who resorts with an inquiry to the dead), rendered by EV 'necromancer.' It is clear from Is. 8:19 that this is a general description embracing the kinds of necromancy indicated by the two words next to be considered and other kinds (see Dr. on Dt. 18:11): the conjunction with which it is introduced is simply the explanatory 'waw,' answering to the Gk. epexegetica and.

ii. קִסָּפִּי (shō'el 'db), one who consults an 'db. The word 'db is generally found with yidd'ōni (see below, iii.), like which, from meaning the spirit of a departed one, it came to stand for the person who possessed such a spirit and divined by its aid. The full phrase קִסָּפִּי (the possessor of an 'db) is found in 1 S. 28:7, where it is applied to the 'witch of Endor.'

קִסָּפִּי explains the expression by ἐγγαστριμύθος, 'ventriloquist' (i.e., in the OT passages, one who, by throwing his voice into the ground, where the spirit was supposed to be, made people believe that a ghost spoke through him'), and Lenormant (Div. 161 ff.), Renan (Hist. ET, 1:347), and others so explain the phenomenon; but the writer of Samuel, and other biblical writers who speak of this species of divination, evidently regard it as being really what it claimed to be. Lev. 20:27 is the only possible exception.

The etymology of the word is very uncertain. Other suggestions may be passed by, for the field seems to be held by two principal views, H. P. Smith's view¹ (Sam. 239 f.) being not very probable. (a) Ōb has been connected with Arab. aba = avaba, and explained 'a soul which returns (from Shēol)'; cp French revenant. So Hitz. and Kō. (on Is. 8:19), St. (GV 1:504), and Schwally (Das Leben nach dem Tode, 69). Schwally also suggests a connection with קִסָּפִּי 'father' (note plu. of both in oth). Van Hoonacker (Exp. T. 9:157 ff.) objects that in Dt. 18:11 the 'db is distinguished from the dead (mēthim); but if the latter clause of the verse is simply a generalisation of the two foregoing clauses, this objection falls.

(b) The other view (Ges., Del., Di.) connects the word with 'db, 'a bottle, literally 'something hollow.' A similar word in Arabic (waḥā) means 'a hole in a rock,' a large and deep pit—i.e., something hollow.²

On the assumption that the fundamental idea of the word is hollowness, many explanations have been suggested (see Van Hoonacker, as above). Of these, two may be noted as probably approximating most nearly to the truth.

1. Böttcher (De inferis, 101), Kau. (Riehm, HWB), 'Todtenbeschwörer'), and Di. (on Lev. 19:31) hold that the spirit is called 'db, on account of the hollow tone of the voice—such a tone as might be expected to issue from any empty place. Other terms for practising magic and divination lend some support to this view.

2. The idea of hollowness has been held to apply in the first place to the cave or opening in the ground out of which the spirit speaks. Among the Greeks and the Romans, oracles depending on necromancy were situated among large deep caverns which were supposed to communicate with the spirit-world. If the Hebrew 'db is parallel to the Greek chthonic deities and to the Arabian ahl al-ard or 'earth-folk,' with whom wizards have intercourse, it is conceivable that, by a metonymy—contained for container, and vice versa—the hollow cavern may have come to be used for the spirit that spoke out of it. See WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 193.

iii. קִסָּפִּי (yidd'ōni). The English word 'wizard,' by which this Hebrew term is rendered, means 'a very wise one,' and agrees with קִסָּפִּי (γῶστρος (in Dt. 18:11 τερασκόπος), Syriac yaddū'ā, Arabic arrāf, and with Ewald's rendering 'viel-wisserisch.'

Like 'db, yidd'ōni is used, in the first instance, for the spirit of a deceased person; then it came to mean him

² In Job 32:19 קִסָּפִּי seems to mean 'bellows' (קִסָּפִּי ψυστήρ [-της N*] χαλκίως).

or her that divines by such a spirit. Robertson Smith (J. Phil. 14127), followed by Driver (on Dt. 1811), distinguishes the two terms thus:—

Yidd'oni is a familiar spirit, one known to him that consults it. The 'ob is any ghost that is called up from the grave to answer questions put to it (cp 1 S. 28). The yidd'oni speaks through a personal medium; that is, through the person whom it possesses. The 'ob speaks directly, as for example out of the grave (cp 1 S. 28). Rashi (on Dt. 1811) says that yidd'oni differs from ob (בְּאֵל 'ob) in that he held in his mouth a bone which uttered the oracle. It is hard to establish these distinctions, the data for forming a judgment being so slight.

Is it quite certain, however, that the words are to be held as standing for distinct things? Why may we not have in them different aspects of the same spirit? So regarded, 'ob would convey the notion that the spirit has returned from the other world, while yidd'oni would suggest that the spirit so returned is knowing, and therefore able to answer the questions of the inquirer. The fact that in all the eleven instances of its occurrence yidd'oni is invariably preceded by 'ob is in favour of its being a mere interpretation of it. 'Ob, on the other hand, is often found by itself (1 S. 2878 1 Ch. 1013 etc.). It is probable, therefore, that these two characters are at bottom one, the 'and' in Dt. 1811 joining 'ob and yidd'oni in the way of a hendiadys: 'he who seeks a departed spirit that is knowing,' just as the remaining part of the verse is, as we have seen already (§ 3, i.), simply a repetition in different words of the same thought. This is in complete harmony with the usages of Hebrew parallelism. The whole compound expression might be rendered as follows:—'He who inquires of the departed spirit that is knowing, even he who seeks unto the dead.'

iv. To the expressions considered already may be added מְשִׁמֵּר, ittim, Is. 193†, EV 'charmers.' RVmg. prefers 'whisperers'; cp Ar. attū, 'to emit a moaning or creaking sound'; or perhaps rather Ass. ēū, 'darkness.' Apparently renders by ῥά ἀγέλαστα ἀδῶν.

Though condemned in the OT (1 S. 287 ff.; Is. 819; cp Lev. 1931 2027 Dt. 1811), necromancy among the Israelites held its own till a late period. The leaders of religious thought were opposed to both witchcraft and necromancy; but the influence of habit and of intercourse with people around was too strong to be wholly overcome. See Schultz, OT Theology, 2322 (ET). Winer⁽²⁾ (RWB s.v. 'Totdenbeschwörer'; see references) shows that in the ancient world divination by calling back the spirits of the dead was very widespread among the Greeks, the Romans, and the other ancient nations. DIVORCE, DIVORCEMENT (בְּרִיתוֹת; ΔΙΟΤΑΚΙΟΝ [BNAQ]), Jer. 38 Is. 501. See MARRIAGE, § 6.

DIZAHAB (דִּזְחָב, καταρχυρεα BAFL), ubi auri est plurimum—i.e., בְּרִי יִי [Vg.], in the topographical description Dt. 11. 'If it be the name of a place in the "steppes of Moab" the situation is unknown' (Dr. in Hastings' DB, s.v.); on the identifications, cp Dillmann. The explanation 'place of gold' is difficult to justify (see Dr. Deut., ad loc.). The name corresponds to 'Me-zahab' in Gen. 3639 (as Sayce, Acad. Oct. 22, 1892, and Marq. Fund. 10, have observed), and like ME-ZAHAB [g.v.] is no doubt a corruption of מִצְרַיִם (came from מ) —i.e., the N. Arabian land of Musri or Musur, which adjoined Edom (see MIZRAIM, § 2b, or cp Che. Or. LZ, May 15, 1899). It was perhaps premature to identify 'Di-zahab,' before the correctness of the reading had been investigated. T. K. C.

DOCUS, RV Dok (Δωκ [ANV]), called by Josephus Dagon (Δαγων; Ant. xiii. 81; BJ i. 23), a small fortress near Jericho, in which Simon the Maccabee was treacherously murdered by Ptolemy his son-in-law (1 Macc. 1615). The name, doubtless, still survives in the mod. Ain ed-Dikh, 2½ m. N. of Jericho, where there are traces of ancient substructions and remains of a fine aqueduct (Rob. BR 2309; PEF Mem. 3173190; Baed.⁽³⁾ 152; v. Kasteren, Rev. Bibl. 1897, p. 93 ff.).

DOD, NAMES WITH. This group of compound names comprises with certainty only Dodavah and Dodi (see DANIEL, 1), and virtually David, Doda, Dodo. To these Gray (HPN 60-63) would add אֶלְדָּד (Eldad), בִּלְדָּד (Bildad). In all these names he interprets דָּד as meaning 'uncle on the father's side,' which is no doubt a perfectly legitimate sense of דָּד or דָּד (see 2 K. 2417). (a) First, as to Eldad and Bildad. The objection to admitting that these names are compounded with the divine name Dad is obviously provisional. The god Rammān was so well-known in Canaan that we may expect to find at any rate isolated names compounded with Dad, which was one of the names of this deity (Wi. AT Untersuch. 69, n. 1). In the Amarna letters, it is true, the form we find in compound proper names is Addu; but the equivalence of Addu and Daddu is admitted. (b) Next, as to the other names. That Dod is not the name of some one special deity, is admitted; but whether it is, or is not, a term designating some degree of kinship, is disputed. It is undeniable that דָּד (= Ass. dādu) means 'beloved,' and also, by a natural transition, 'divine patron' (cp רַחֵם, used of God, Job 1621). The present writer contends that it is more natural to give this second sense to Dod in the few Hebrew names compounded with it than to adopt the theory (Gray, HPN 60) that דָּד as well as נַח in proper names has the sense of 'uncle' or 'kinsman.'

This is not affected by the discovery that there are some S. Arabian names compounded with Ammi, and some others with K'hālī, both meaning 'uncle.' Nor need we enter into the question whether the S. Arabian name Dādi-kariba (so Hommel gives the name) really means 'My cousin hath blessed' (Hommel, AHT 85). See DODO, DODAVAH. T. K. C.

DODAI (דָּדַי, דָּדִי, § 52; but Ginsb. in 2 S. 239 points Kt. דָּדִי), another form of DODO [g.v.], presumably shortened from a form דָּדִיָּה: see under DODAVAH; 'Yahweh is patron' (Marquart, Fund. 16), 2 S. 239 (RV following Kt.; but AV DODO; COYCEI [B*], cwc. [A], ΛΟΥΔΕΙ [B^b vid. L]) and 1 Ch. 274 (AV and RV; ΔΩΔΕΙΑ [B*], -ΛΕΙΑ [B^b], -ΔΙΑ [A], -ΔΑΙ [L]), where the words 'Eleazar, son of,' found in 1 Ch. 1112 are wanting, but are supplied by Kittel (SBOT) from 1 Ch. 1112; see DODO (2), ELEAZAR.

DODANIM (דֹּדָנִים), or RODANIM (רֹדָנִים).

דָּד, Gen. 104, Vg. DODANIM (cp Pesh.), so EV, AVmg. Rodanim' after ροδῖοι [QABEL], and Sam.; דָּד, 1 Ch. 17 AVmg. RV 'Rodanim' after ροδῖοι [QBA], but many MSS דָּד, cp δωδανεμ [L], DODANIM [Vg.], whence AV 'Dodanim.' In Is. 2113 Aq. Sym. δωδανεμ for ροδῖοι.

A son of JAVAN [g.v.], son of Japheth, Gen. 104= 1 Ch. 17. The same name—i.e., either Dōdān (דָּדָן) or Rōdān (רֹדָן)—should possibly be restored for 'Dedan' (דֶּדָן) in Ezek. 2715 (ροδιων [BQ; adnot. ροδῖοι ορασις κρισεως Qmg.], αραδιων [A]; so Pesh. but Aq. Sym. Theod. δαδαν). The merchants there referred to brought to Tyre the ivory and ebony which they had themselves procured from Africa or India. Two views are held.

(a) Stade, Cornill, Bertholet are strongly for 'Rōdān,' and naturally hold a similar opinion as to the reading in Gen. 104. It is, however, by no means certain that MT is not right in reading דָּדִי, 'sons of Dedan,' in Ezek. 2715; Edom (so all [except Aq.] read for 'Aram') follows in v. 16. As to Gen. 104, the most prevalent opinion certainly is that Rōdānīm is the better reading, and that this term designates not only the Rhodians properly so-called (on whom cp. Hom. Il. 2654 ff.), but also ('many islands' being also mentioned) the people of other Aegean islands. (So Di. Hal., Kau., Holzinger, Ball, GASm. HG 135.) This view is geographically plausible, but the short o in 'Pōdos must not be overlooked.

(δ) Another view, so far as the name goes, is more satisfactory. The Rodanim of the text of Chronicles (if we follow most MSS and Θ) may be as inaccurate as the 'Diphath' which it gives for 'Riphath' (1 Ch. 16), and Dodanim itself may be incorrectly given for Dardanim (Tg. Jon., Luzzatto, Ges., Knob., Franz Del.). The name Dardan, as inscriptions of Rameses II. show, comes down from early times; it designates properly a people of Asia Minor, not far from the Lycians (see WMM, As. u. Eur. 354 f.). It is not impossible that for דודנים (Ch. reads ν) the original source of P's information read דודנים (cp TOGARMAH), and it would be natural for writers and scholars of the Greek period (Θ and perhaps Ch.) to convert Dardanim into Rodanim, and to understand the Rhodians. It has been proposed elsewhere to identify another son of Javan (Tarshish, or rather Turuś) with another people mentioned in the Egyptian inscriptions (see TIRAS). The author of the list used by P may have known Dardan as well as Turuś. If דן is the correct reading in Ezek. we should perhaps pronounce it Redan, not Rodan. Recent critics may, however, have been too hasty in rejecting MT's reading Dedan. The 'islands' are not necessarily those in which the merchants spoken of resided; they may very well be the coast-lands with which Dedan had commercial dealings. Cp DEDAN, and, on Ezek. 27:15, see EBONY.

DODAVAH, as AV, or rather DODAVAHU as RV (דודָוָה), perhaps for דודָוָה, 'Yahwè is friend or patron,' § 47—whence come the abbreviated forms DODO, DODAI [גד. ו.]—ωδ[ε]ι[α] [BA], Δοδαίος [L]; Dodai; Pesh. implies the reading 'Dodo', the father of a prophet called Eliezer (2 Ch. 20:37).

T. K. C.

DODO (דודו, § 52, with which cp דודי, DODAI, and דוד, DAVID). The fuller form is probably דודָוָה [cp DODAVAH], which means 'Yahwè is friend or patron' [so Marq. Fund. 16]. דד, genius loci, is rightly restored by Wi. in Am. 8:14, and there appears to be an allusion to the 'divine friend' in Is. 5:1 (where note that דודי and דוד are parallel). The Dodah (דדח) of Arotho is mentioned in the Mesha inscription l. 12. May we also compare Dudu, the name of a high Egyptian official in the Amarna tablets (Am. Tab. 44:5 52:15, cp Wi. AF 194)?

2. (AV following K^{re}; but see DODAI.) An AHOHITE (q.v.), father of David's warrior Eleazar, 2 S. 23:9 (υἱὸς παραδέλφου αὐτοῦ [BA], see AHOHITE, δουδ[ε]ι [L]); 1 Ch. 11:12 (δωδαι [BAL], -δ[ε] [N]; patruus ejus).

3. An ancestor of Tola of Issachar, one of the Judges, Judg. 10:1, if we should not rather follow eight cursive MSS of Θ and read, for 'son of Dodo,' 'son of his (Abimelech's) uncle Kareah.' See Hollenberg, ZATW, x88:1, p. 104 f. Θ BAL has υἱὸς παραδέλφου αὐτοῦ (so Pesh. Vg.). See TOLA.

DOE (דוֹעַ), Pr. 5:19†, RV. See GOAT.

DOEG (דוג, 1 S. 21:7 [8] 22:9, but דוג, 1 S. 22:18 22 [Kt.], דוג, Ps. 52:2; ΔΩΗΚ [BNARTL], but ΔΩΗΓ, 1 S. 22:9 [A]; Jos. Ant. vi. 12:1, ΔΩΗΓ[OC]). An Edomite (for the reading דוגי, 'Syrian,' presupposed [except in Ps. 52:2] by Θ^{BA} [but not L] and Jos., is certainly wrong) who filled some minor post among the servants of Saul; most probably he was 'keeper of the saddle asses' (cp Judg. 10:4 1 S. 9:3 2 S. 16:2 1 Ch. 27:30), 1 S. 21:7 [8] 22:9. He had been detained (so one tradition tells us) 'before Yahwè'—i.e., in the sacred precincts at Nob (or Gibeon; see NOB)—by some obscure religious prescription (see RSB 456), and had cunningly watched David in his intercourse with the priest Ahimelech (see DAVID, § 3). Soon after, he denounced the latter to the suspicious Saul, and when the king commanded his 'runners' to put Ahimelech and the other priests to death, and they refused, it was this foreigner who lifted up his hand against them (1 S. 22:9-18).

The two passages in which Doeg's office is referred to are no longer in their original form in MT. In 21:8 [AV 7] he is called 'the mightiest of the shepherds' (אֲבִיר רֹעִים), a strange description of a shepherd, and still stranger when we observe that אֲבִיר occurs nowhere else in Hebrew narratives. The conjecture 'the mightiest of the runners' (רָצִים, Grätz, Dr., Ki., Bu.) gives an easier but still not a natural phrase, and disregards the rendering of Θ^{BA} in 21:7 [8], νέμων τὰς ἡμιόβους Σαουλ. There can be little doubt that Lagarde (Mittheil. 3:350) is right in reading אֲבִיר עֲרִים, which he renders 'driver of the mules,'—a less natural rendering than that given above, but still possible. Words like עֲרִי and אֲבִיר are flexible. For the former see Lagarde (Z.c.); for the latter, see ABEL. Almost as certainly we should also read עֲרִי for עֲרִי in 22:9 (see Θ). We's objection to following Θ here (TBS 125) falls to the ground as soon as it is recognised that 21:7 [8] is a later insertion in the narrative.

The reference to Doeg in the title of Ps. 52 is due to the thirst of later Jewish readers for biblical justification of their idealising view of David. The Psalm was written for use in the temple (see v. 8). T. K. C.

DOG (דֹּג), a name, of unknown origin, common to all Semitic dialects; κῡων, canis [but Mt. 15:26 f. = Mk. 7:27 f. KYNAPION, catellus].

1. References. dogs of any noble type are mentioned in the Bible. The Israelitish kings were not, like the Assyrian,¹ great hunters, and even the Hebrew legend of Nimrod the hunter (but is 'hunter' meant literally? see NIMROD) in Gen. 10:9 says nothing of his dogs.² According to EV the greyhound is referred to in Prov. 30:31 as one of the four things which are 'stately in going'; but this is doubtful (see COCK, GREYHOUND). The shepherd's dog is mentioned in Job 30:1, and dogs which guard the house may be intended in Is. 56:10; but neither passage vouchsafes the dog any friendly words. The OT references are in fact almost entirely to the pariah dog, such as may be seen in any of the 'Bible lands' to-day. They seem to have gone careering in packs round the city at night (Ps. 59:6 14 f.); it was dangerous to stop one of them (Prov. 26:17). Doubtless, however, they were useful as scavengers. They were ready to devour even human bodies (1 K. 14:11 16:4 21:23 f. 2 K. 9:10 36 and similarly Jer. 15:3 cp 1 K. 21:19 22:38 Ps. 68:23 [24]), and to them flesh that men might not eat was thrown (Ex. 22:31; contrast Mt. 7:6). From Mk. 7:28 (Mt. 15:27) some have inferred a sympathy between men and dogs in the time of Christ; but this is hazardous. Paul has no such sympathy (Phil. 3:2), and a certain Rabbi dissuades from keeping fierce dogs in the house, apparently because they would frighten away the poor (Shabb. 63 a). Most dogs, then, were fierce. Yet Tobit, according to the Greek text, makes a companion of his dog on his journeys (Tob. 5:16 11:4); see TOBIT.

The pariah dog referred to above is a variety of the cosmopolitan dog (Canis familiaris), though the breed has probably been intermixed by crossing with jackals or wolves. The dogs live in companies, each dog having its own lair (sometimes two), to which it returns for rest during the day. Those that frequent the towns act as scavengers, living on offal; but in the country they are trained by the shepherds and farmers to act as sheep-dogs (cp Job 30:1). Not much good, however, can be said of the latter: they are 'a mean, sinister, ill-conditioned generation,' whose use consists in barking at intruders and warning the shepherds of any possible danger.³ In appearance they resemble the Scotch collie, and are said to be intelligent, and sagacious when trained. Rabies is almost, or entirely, unknown among them.

The stress laid in Judg. 7:5-7 on the way in which Gideon's three hundred drank, lapping with their tongues, like dogs, probably indicates that they were fierce uncivilised men (Moore, Judges, 202). The mention of

3. Exegetical details.

'dogs' in company with 'lions' in Ps. 22 as typical of the fierce enemies of pious Israel, is surprising. There is no OT parallel for the use of the pariah dogs of Eastern cities as symbolic of the enemies of Israel. In later times the Gentiles were called 'dogs' (Niddah, 77 a; Baba Kama, 49 a, etc.); but the Talmudic use has no biblical authority; Mk. 7:27 surely does not express what may be called biblical doctrine. Moreover in Ps. 22:21 only lions and wild oxen are referred to. Aq., Theod., and Jer. evidently read בָּלָקִים 'hunters'; this is a clever attempt to get over a real difficulty. In v. 17 (EV 16) we should certainly read לִבָּאִים בְּבִירִים, and לִבָּאִים, עֶרְוַת רִאשִׁית. The sense then becomes,

Greedy lions in their strength surround me,
A troop of wild oxen encircles me.

Similarly in v. 21 (EV 20) we should read לִבָּאִים הָיִהוּ, and render (reading כְּכִפּוּר כְּחִי),

Snatch my soul from the young lion,
My life from the clutch of the greedy lion.

We now pass on to a group of five passages which have been much misunderstood.

1. 2 K. 8:13 'What is thy servant, the dog [עַל] has 'the dead dog', that he should do this great thing?' RV, paraphrasing, 'which is but a dog.' AV incorrectly, 'Is thy servant a dog, etc.'

2. 2 S. 16:9 'Why should this dead dog [עַל] 'this cursed dog' curse my lord the king?'

3. 2 S. 9:8 'What is thy servant that thou shouldst look upon a dead dog like me?'

4. 1 S. 24:14 [15] 'After whom dost thou pursue? after a dead dog?'

5. 2 S. 38: 'Am I a dog's head that belongeth to Judah?' (EV).

As to (1) AV is quite wrong. Hazael does not revolt in horror from the description of Elisha, but only affects to think it too great an achievement for him. 'Dog' is here an expression of servile humility towards Elisha, as in Assyrian ('we are the king's dogs,' i.e. his humble servants).¹ In (2) 'dead dog' (עַל) cannot be right, as עַל indicates by the substituted epithet (see above). The text must be incorrect. We want some word which will be equally suitable in (2) (3) and (4); and if possible some word which will make better sense than 'dead' (מֵת) even in (3) and (4), where it has hitherto been plausibly taken as an Oriental exaggeration. The word which we seek is נָפֵץ 'unclean'; 'dead dog' should be 'unclean, despised, pariah dog.' To explain his see Doughty's striking description of the treatment of their hounds by the Bedouin, who 'with blows cast out these profane creatures from the beyt.'² As to (5) the text is evidently not quite correct (see Klo.); there seems to be a play on the name of Caleb the dog-tribe (see 1025, n. 1; NABAL). To read 'Am I a dog's head' (omitting the next words), with Prof. H. P. Smith, can hardly be called satisfactory.

This idiom may cast light upon Dt. 23:18[19] where 'dog' appears to be applied to the class of persons elsewhere called kēdēim. It was natural to explain the word as a term of contempt (see IDOLATRY, § 6). If, however, 'unclean dog' or some similar phrase was a common circumlocution indicative of humble deference used in addressing superiors, as kalbu is in Assyrian (especially in the Amarna letters), keleb need not, as applied to these temple servants, have been a term of contempt: it may have been their ordinary name (so RS¹⁹ 292). The word appears in fact in Phœnician, applied to a class of servants (כלב) attached to a temple of Ashtoreth in Cyprus (CIS 1 no. 85 B, l. 10).

There are not wanting indications that the dog was held in religious veneration. A river running into the sea a few miles N. of Beirūt is called the Dog river (Nahr-el-Kelb, Lycus flumen), and al-Nadim informs us that the dog was sacred among the Harranians. 'They offered sacrificial gifts to it, and in certain mysteries dogs were solemnly declared to be the brothers of the mystæ.'³ This seems to be connected with primitive Babylonian mythology; 'my lord with the dogs' (a divine title at Harrān) points to Marduk and his four dogs. It is possible that the dog may have been among the animals worshipped by the earliest Semites as a totem¹ (as, e.g., among some N. American Indians and in Java). Robertson Smith refers to Justin (18:10), who states that Darius forbade the Carthaginians to sacrifice human victims and to eat the flesh of dogs (in a religious meal, it is implied). There seems also to be an allusion to something of this kind in post-exilic Palestine—to a custom, chiefly prevalent perhaps among the mixed Samaritan population,² of sacrificing the dog³ on certain occasions (Is. 63:3).

DOOR (דֶּלֶת, θύρα, θύρωμα, etc. [BAFL], perhaps from דָּלַח, 'to swing,' or cp Ass. edilu, 'to bolt, bar').

The Hebrew deleth is used of the doors of a chamber (Judg. 8:23 ff.), or of a gate (1 S. 21:13 [14]), and even of the gate itself (Dt. 35; EV 'gates'). The difference between petah, which may be any opening or entrance (e.g., of the ark, Gen. 6:16; LATTICE, § 2 [7]), and deleth, is clearly illustrated by Gen. 19:6, where Lot stands in the petah to keep back the men of Sodom from approaching the deleth (cp also 1 K. 6:31). For דֶּלֶת ('door' Ex. 35:17 Job 38:17 AV) see GATE.

However necessary for ventilation doorways were in the East (see LATTICE, § 1), the doors themselves were not employed so much as in less tropical regions. 'The lock was doubtless like those now in use in the East, so constructed that the bolt (מַנְעִיל, Cant. 5: Neh. 3:3 etc., RV; 'lock,' AV) was shot by the hand or by a thong; the key (מַנְעִיל, 'opener') was only used for unlocking the door' (Moore, SBOT [Eng.], Judges, 60). For descriptions of keys and locks, see Wilk. Anc. Eg. 1:353; Moore, Judg. 99; Che. Is. SBOT, ET, 159 f.

way between the promontory of Carmel and Caesarea, at a distance of about eight miles from the latter.

The fuller form of the name is explained by Sym. as the παράλια of Dor, or as Δωρ ἡ παράλια (cp OS⁽²⁾ 115²² 250⁵⁶, dor nafeth, δὲρ τοῦ ναφᾶθ, 142¹³ 288³, nefeddor, ναφεθδωρ); it probably includes the undulating plain of Sharon lying inland. The exact meaning of נָפֶת, נָפֶת (RV 'height', AV 'region, coast, border, country') as well as that of 'Dor' is very uncertain.¹ Outside the OT the shorter form of the name is usual. It is frequently mentioned by Greek writers and appears as δῶρος, δῶρα (δωρὰ in 1 Macc. 15 11 13 25 AV, Dora), also δοῦρα (Polyb.), Dorum (Pliny), and Thora (Tab. Peut.). In Ass. Du-ru (by the side of Megiddo) occurs only once, in a geographical list (2 R. 58, no. 4, l. 57). The meaning of the name is obscure (see EN-DOR, and for HAMMATH-DOR see HAMMATH).

Dor is first mentioned in the Pap. Golenischeff (temp. Hri-hor, circa 1050 B.C.), where D-ira belongs to the Takara, a race which entered Palestine along with the Purusati, and occupied the sea-coast (cp WMM As. u. Eur. 388, and see CAPTOR, §§ 2, 4; PHILISTINES).² Their prince bears the name Be-d-ira, which appears to represent a theophorous name (Abd-il, 'servant of El' or Bod-el). That Dor continued to remain in the hands of a non-Israelite people seems highly probable.

Later writers, with Deuteronomist sympathies, supposed that Dor joined the northern coalition against Joshua (Josh. 11 2), and they include its king among those who fell (ib. 12 23). In the same spirit Dor is assigned to Manasseh (Josh. 17 11; cp 1 Ch. 7 29).³ A more historical view is presented in Judg. 1 27, where Beth-shean, Ibleam, Megiddo, and Dor (in MT the order is disturbed) form a belt of Canaanite towns stretching from E. to W., which must have separated Ephraim from the more northerly tribes. In the time of Solomon, it is true, the 'heights of Dor' was under one of his commissaries; but it is hardly probable that the town of Dor was itself included (1 K. 4 11; see BEN-ABINADAB).

For the next few centuries Dor drops out of Jewish history. It was well known, however, to the Greeks, the earliest authority in which the name occurs being Hecataeus of Miletus (circa 500 B.C.). It is not improbable that it ought to be identified with the Δῶρος which, in the fifth century, was tributary to the Athenians (Steph. Byz. s.v. Δῶρος), and this agrees with the view that the Takara (the earliest known occupants of Dor) were from Asia Minor, and, therefore, might have been in close touch with Greece. At the beginning of the fourth century Ešmunazar relates that Dor (דור) and Joppa (יָפֹה), rich corn-lands (אֲרָמִים) in the field of Sharon (בְּשֵׂר שָׁרֹן), were handed over to Sidon by the king of Persia (Artaxerxes Mnemon?), probably (as Schlottmann conjectured) in return for their help in the battles of Cnidus (394) and Citiium (386).⁴ Hence perhaps arose the belief of later Greek geographers that Dor was originally a Phoenician colony. It successfully resisted two sieges, one by Antiochus the Great (ANTIOCHUS, 1) during his war with Ptolemy Philopator in 219 B.C. (Polyb. 566), and the second by Antiochus Sidetes (ANTIOCHUS, 5) in 139-8 B.C., when the siege was raised in consequence of the flight of Trypho (1 Macc. 15 11 ff.). It was afterwards held along with Strato's tower (CAESAREA, § 1) by a tyrant named Zoilus, on whose subjugation by Ptolemy Lathyrus it became part of the Hasmonæan dominions (Jos. Ant.

xiii. 12 24). From Pompey's time it was directly under Roman rule. Gabinius restored the town and harbour (56 B.C.), and it enjoyed autonomy under the emperors (ib. xiv. 44 xv. 53). It possessed a synagogue in 42 A.D. (Ant. xix. 63). At a comparatively early date after this its prosperity declined, and in the time of Jerome (OS⁽²⁾ 115²² 142¹⁴) it was already deserted, and soon scarcely anything was left but its ruins—which were still an object of admiration—and the memory of its former greatness (cp Plin. 5 17: memoria urbis). Down to at least the seventh century it continued to give its name to an episcopal see.¹ Its prosperity was largely due to the abundance of the purple-yielding murex on its rocky coast, and to its favourable position (but see Ant. xv. 96). The modern village consists merely of a few hovels.

The ancient remains which lie to the N. of the modern village are considerable (Baed.⁽³⁾ 271 f., PEF Mem. 26 ff.), the most conspicuous object, to former travellers, being the ruins of a tower (of the time of the Crusaders) which crowns a rocky eminence. The tower (el-Burj; cp Pargul [= πύργος] in Foulcher de Chartres) has since collapsed (PEFQ, 1895, p. 113).²

A handmaid of R. Gamaliel was called Tabitha (Wayyikra R. 19).

DOTHAN (דוֹתָן [NAMES, § 107]; Di. (in loc.) thinks the latter a vocalic modification of the former. This is doubtful (cp Ba. NB, § 194 c.); but in any case the termination -ān is very ancient, occurring in the Palestine lists of Thotmes III., sixteenth century B.C., tu-ti-ya-na (WMM *As. u. Eusebius placed it 12 R. m. N. of Sebasté (Samaria). The site was identified by Van de Velde³ (1364 ff.) with Tell Dôthân 10 m. N. of Sebastiyeh. the great caravan road from Damascus and Gilead to Egypt, which is still in use, as it was when the story of Joseph and the company of Ishmaelite traders passing Dothan with spices from Gilead for Egypt was written (GASm. At the S. foot of the Tell is a fountain called El-Hafireh; there is a second fountain and two large cisterns (cp the cistern into which Joseph's brethren are said to have lowered him). There is very fine pasturage on the surrounding plain, which the present writer found covered with flocks, some of them belonging to a camp of nomad Arabs. From its site on so ancient a road through the country, and near the mouth of the main pass from the N. into the hills of Samaria, the Tell must always have been a military position of importance; note the description in 2 K. 6:13 ff., and the frequent mention of it in the Book of Judith (advance of Holofernes). DOVE. The word dove is somewhat loosely applied to certain members of the suborder Columbae or pigeons; and, as no sharp distinction can be drawn, it is proposed to treat the doves and pigeons together in this article.

Three Heb. words come under consideration: (1) יֹנָת, yōnāh, probably derived from its mournful note (περιστέρα [Θ]); (2) תֹּר, tōr (probably onomatopoeic, cp Lat. turtur; τρυγών [Θ]), EV 'turtle-dove'; and (3) גִּזְזַל, gōzāl, EV 'young pigeon' (Gen. 15:9, || תֹּר, tōr, περιστέρα [ADL]), properly any young bird; cp Dt. 32:11† (with reference to the נֶזֶר).

Apart from its occurrence in P and Gen. 15:9 (see below), תֹּר is found only in Cant. 2:12 (where allusion is made to its 'voice'), in Jer. 8:7 (a migratory bird; cp § 4 [v.] below; EV in both references, 'turtle'), and in Ps. 74:19 (not Θ). In the last-quoted passage תֹּר, as the harmless, timid dove (cp Hos. 7:11 || Mt. 10:16), is usually thought to be symbolical of Israel. The text-reading, however, is doubtful.¹ Elsewhere it is to יֹנָת ('dove') that Israel is compared (see JONAH, ii. § 3). This is the most common term, which appears notably in the Deluge-story, Gen. 8:8-12 (DELUGE, § 17). Allusion is made in Ps. 55:6 [7] to its plumage, in Is. 38:14 59:11 to its mournful note.² Its gentle nature makes the dove a favourite simile or term of endearment in love poems (Cant. 1:5 4:1 5:2 12:69). That doves were domesticated among the Hebrews may be inferred from Is. 60:8 (see FOWLS, § 5), and it is of interest to recall that carrier-pigeons were well known in Egypt, and that at the coronation ceremony four were let fly to carry the tidings of the newly-made king to the four corners of the earth (Wilk. Anc. Eg. 332o).

Are there reasons for supposing that among the Hebrews the dove ever enjoyed a reputation for sanctity? Conclusive evidence in support of this view is absent; but it is remarkable that the dove, although a 'clean' bird, is never mentioned in the OT as an article of diet. It was a favourite food of the Egyptians, and is commonly eaten in Palestine at the present day. Moreover, we have to note that the תֹּר and גִּזְזַל are mentioned in an old covenant ceremony by E (Gen. 15:9), and that in P's legislation 'turtle-doves' (תֹּרִים) and 'young pigeons' (יֹנָת) are frequent sacrificial victims in ceremonies which,

1 'Deliver not the soul of thy turtle-dove' is a strange expression. Sym. Tg. Jer. find an allusion to the Law (Tg. 'the souls of the teachers of thy Law'); but Θ Pesh. read תֹּרִיךָ; so Gunkel, Che.: 'Deliver not the soul which praiseth thee,' becomes the sense.
2 Cp also Nah. 2:7 [8]; on the text of Ezek. 7:16 see Co.

1 In NT times doves for such purposes were sold in the temple itself (Mt. 21:12 Mk. 11:15 Jn. 2:14 16).
2 On the whole subject see Bochart, Hieroz. ii. 11 and WRS Kin. 196 f.; RS (2) 219 n. 2, 294, etc. Cp also, for 'dove' oracles, Frazer, Paus. 4:149 f. The white dove was especially venerated; Tibullus, 1:7: 'alba Palestino sancta columba Syro.'

3 This is a euphemistic substitute. Some authorities recognise יֹנָת, 'doves,' as an element in the phrase (so Kön. Lehrgeb. 2:102); others take תֹּר to be simply a termination (Ginsb. Introd. 346, 'decayed leaves').

however, do not involve a sacrificial meal (Lev. 5:7 128 etc.; in NT Lk. 22:4).¹ This exceptional treatment of the dove suggests that originally the Hebrews were wont to ascribe to the bird a sacrosanct character, similar to that which it has obtained among other branches of the Semites. In Palestine 'the dove was sacred with the Phoenicians and Philistines, and on this superstition is based the common Jewish accusations against the Samaritans that they were worshippers of the dove.' There were holy doves at Mecca (the custom is hardly indigenous), and according to Lucian (Dea Syria, 54, cp 14) doves were taboo to the Syrians, he who touched them remaining unclean a whole day.² On the symbolism of the dove in NT (Mt. 3:16 etc.) and in early Christian times, see Smith's Dict. Christ. Ant., s. v.

The following species occur in Palestine:—

(i.) Columba palumbus, the ring-dove or wood-pigeon, common in England and throughout most of Europe. Large flocks of these assemble in the winter months and do much damage by feeding on the young leaves of cultivated plants; some migrate in the autumn, but many pass the winter in Palestine. (ii.) C. anas, the stock-dove, smaller and darker than the above and rarer in Palestine; unlike C. palumbus it does not build on branches of trees, but lays its eggs in holes or in burrows. (iii.) C. livia, the rock-dove, is abundant on the coast and uplands; it is the parent stock from which the domesticated varieties have been derived. (iv.) C. schimper, closely allied to the preceding, which it takes the place of, in the interior and along the Jordan valley. It is elsewhere found in Egypt and in Abyssinia. It nests in crevices and fissures of the rock (cp Jer. 48:28). (v.) Turtur communis or auritus, the turtle-dove, which probably represents תֹּר (see § 2), is a migratory species whose return is very constant (Jer. 8:7, Cant. 2:12) about the beginning of April, when they become very plentiful and are to be found in every tree and shrub. This species is the most abundant of all the Columbae in Palestine. (vi.) T. risorius, the Barbary or collared dove, which extends from Constantinople to India. Around the Dead Sea this species is a permanent resident, being found as a rule in small flocks of eight or ten. (vii.) T. senegalensis, the palm turtle-dove, has been regarded by Tristram as the turtle-dove of the Bible. It lives amongst the courtyards of houses in Jerusalem and seems to be half tame; it especially frequents palm groves.

DOVE'S DUNG (תֹּרִי יֹנָת or חֲרִייוֹנִים, Kt. [Ginsb.], דְּבִינִים, ḏebīnīm, Kt.; κοπρος περιστερων [BAL]). In a graphic account of the siege of Samaria, side by side with 'an ass's head' appears 'the fourth part of a kab of dove's dung' (ḥāḏē yōnīm) as a food only to be bought at a very high price (2 K. 6:25). Much has been written to account for this strange-sounding detail; Josephus (Ant. ix. 44) even suggested that the dung was a substitute for salt! The reference to it, however, is doubtless due to an error of an ancient scribe, which is precisely analogous to one in Ps. 123:4 (MT).

In that passage a questionable word (rendered in EV 'the proud') is represented in the mg. as being really two words, one 'יֹנָת'. It is more than probable that 'an ass's head' (חֲרִישָׁה) should be חֲרִישִׁים, 'a homer of lentils,' and 'doves' dung' (תֹּרִי יֹנָת) should be חֲרִיבִים, 'pods of the carob tree' (see HUSKS). That the ancients agreed with MT and that the correctness of the reading can be defended (see Post in Hastings' BD, s. v.) by observation of the habits of pigeons is no reason why we should acquiesce in it; similarly we might defend the painful figure of the 'snail' in Ps. 58:9 (see SNAIL, 2). For the attempts of modern writers to mitigate the unpleasantness of the expression 'dove's dung' by finding some plant which might have been so called, see articles in Smith's and Hastings' dictionaries. Two illustrative passages (2 K. 18:27 Is. 1:20) have, we may believe, been recovered by similar corrections of the text, one certain, the other highly probable. See HUSKS.

DRAGON (דִּיגָן; ΔΡΑΚΩΝ).

For Dt. 32³³ EV Ps. 91¹³ (RV 'serpent') see SERPENT, § 1 11; and for Ps. 148⁷ (RVmg. 'sea-monsters' or 'waterspouts'), SERPENT, § 3 (f) n. For the 'dragons' (דִּיגָן, דִּיגָן, דִּיגָן [sing. דִּיגָן]: in Lam. 4³ AV 'sea-monsters', AVmg. 'sea-calves') of Mal. 1³ etc. see JACKALS (so RV).

In addition to the passages in which the term tannin is used of a natural species of animals (such as Gen. 1²¹ RV 'sea-monsters', AV WHALE [g.v.]; Ex. 7^{9f} EV SERPENT [g.v.]) there are various longer or shorter passages in which a mythological or semi-mythological explanation of the term may be reasonably supposed. Some of these have been, with more or less fulness, treated elsewhere, and may therefore be here considered more briefly.

The passages are as follows (for discussion, see § 3 (f) (a) Is. 27¹ (see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN, § 3 (f) 1); (b) Is. 51⁹ (see RAHAB); (c) Jer. 51³⁴ (see JONAH, II § 4); (d) Ezek. 29³⁻⁶, 'I will attack thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, thou great dragon, which liest in the midst of thy streams, which hast said, Mine are the streams, I have made them. I will put hooks in thy jaws, and cause the fish of thy streams to stick to thy scales. I will bring thee up out of thy streams. . . I will hurl thee into the desert, thee and all the fish of thy streams; upon the open country shalt thou fall; thou shalt not be taken up nor gathered. . . (e) Ezek. 32²⁻⁸, . . . as for thee, thou wast like the dragon³ in the sea, thou didst break forth with thy streams, didst trouble the water with thy feet, and didst foul thy streams. Thus saith Yahweh, I will spread my net over thee, and bring thee up into my snare. I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains, and fill the valley with thy corruption. . . I will cover the heavens at thy setting, and clothe its stars in mourning. . . (f) Job 7¹², 'Am I the sea or the dragon, that thou settest watchers against me?' (g) Neh. 2¹³, 'before the dragon-well'. These are probably all the passages in the Hebrew OT; for Ps. 44¹⁹ (so), referred to by Gunkel in this connection, is certainly corrupt; but (h) Esth. 10⁷ [4] 11⁶ (s), (i) Bel and the Dragon, and (k) Ps. Sol. 2²⁸⁻³⁴ have to be grouped with them (see § 3).

The NT references are all in Revelation, viz., in (m) 12³⁻¹⁷, (n) 13²⁻⁴ 11, (o) 16¹³, (p) 20²; cp 12⁹.

These last require to be treated separately, but with due cognisance of that old Babylonian dragon-myth, uncomprehended fragments of which circulated in the eschatological tradition of ANTICHRIST (g.v.). The dragon which sought to devour the child of the woman is the very same development of Babylonian mythology which lies at the base of Jer. 51³⁴. From a Jewish point of view the woman (cp Mic. 4¹⁰) is either the earthly or the heavenly Zion, and the dragon (originally Tiamat) with its seven heads⁵ is Armilos, or רשעים ('the wicked one'; cp 2 Thess. 2³ 8), i.e., Rome, the new Babylon, which is identified with 'the ancient serpent,' נחש הקדמון (cp Rev. 12⁹, and see Weber, Jüd. Theol. 218). The storming of heaven by the dragon is also Babylonian; it is the primeval rebellion of Tiamat (see CREATION, § 2) transferred to the latter days⁶ (cp Eph. 6¹², the spiritual hosts of wickedness ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις). The additions of the apocalyptic writer do not concern us here.⁷ On the affinities of Rev. 12⁴ to a Greek myth see HELLENISM, § 8.

DRAGON

We pass on to (h) Esth. 10⁷ [4] 11⁶. Two dragons come forth to fight against the 'righteous people,' i.e., the Jews (cp Jer. 51³⁴). These are interpreted in the story as

3. In OT Apocryph.

Mardocheus and Aman, and the justification of this is that they fight together, as Mordecai contended with Haman. This is evidently a late modification of an uncomprehended traditional story. The connection of the dragons with water is evidently an echo of the Tiamat myth. The writer, however, did not understand it, and explained the 'much water' of Esther. (i) Bel and the Dragon strikes us at once by its Babylonian colouring. That it is Daniel, not a god, who kills the Dragon, is an alteration natural to Haggadic stories, to which, as Ball has shown, this story belongs. No trace remains of the old myth beyond what is found in Jer. 51³⁴. (k) Ps. Sol. 2²⁸⁻³⁴ is a picture of the fate of Pompey, the profaner of the temple, which would be hyperbolic if it were not obviously coloured by a semi-mythical tradition.

Resuming the consideration of (a)—i.e., Is. 27¹—we notice that the two Leviathans and the Dragon in the Sea are distinctly mythical forms (the two former, differentiations of Tiamat; the latter, Kingu, Tiamat's husband);

they are identified by the apocalypticist (see Intr. Is. 155) with the three great powers hostile to the Jews,—Babylonia, Persia, and Egypt. The reference to the sea confirms the mythological origin of the expression, for Tiamat is the personification of the primeval ocean.¹

On Yahweh's sword see Gen. 3²⁴, and cp Marduk's weapon, called in Creation tablet iv. l. 49, abūbu, 'storm' (cp ll. 30 39). As to (b), note again the two conquered monsters (Rahab and the Dragon), and the connection with the sea in v. 10. The old myth is applied to the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea; but the application would have been impossible had not the destruction of Rahab and the Dragon been equivalent to the subjugation of the sea. The poet does not say, but obviously supposes, that Rahab and Pharaoh are in some sense identical, just as in Rev. 12 the impious power of Rome is identified with the Dragon. The 'shattering' of Rahab is repeated from the Babylonian myth.

Of (c) nothing more need now be said (see JONAH); but (d) and (e) require to be clearly interpreted. It is not to an ordinary crocodile that Pharaoh is compared. The 'hyperbolic' language would, in this case, be intolerable. It is the despotic and blasphemous dragon Tiamat. The blasphemy is at once explained when we remember that Tiamat was originally a divine being—older in fact than the gods. The denial of burial to Pharaoh is of course explicable out of mere vindictiveness; but it is a worthier supposition that we have here a somewhat pale reflection of the outrages inflicted on the body of Tiamat by the young sun-god Marduk. The 'hook' reminds us of Job 41¹ [40 25] (Leviathan); the net, of a striking detail in Creation-tablet iv., ll. 95. 112.² The 'setting' of the dragon implies that there was a constellation identified with the dragon (cp Lockyer, Dawn of Astronomy, 137, 146). In (f) the combination of 'sea' and 'dragon,' and the occurrence of references elsewhere in Job to Rahab and Leviathan, sufficiently prove the mythological affinities of the passage. The Dragon was, according to one current version of the old myth, not destroyed, but placed in confinement (cp Job 38 41). Cp the stress laid in Job 38⁸⁻¹¹ Ps. 104⁵⁹ 336⁷ [7] 65^{7f} on the long-past subjugation of the sea by Yahweh.

One passage only remains (g). The term 'dragon-well' suggests a different class of myths—those in which the supernatural serpent is a friendly being. Primitive sanctuaries were often at wells (EN-ROGEL), and serpents love moist places.³ Serpents, too, are the

The 'coils' of the Egyptian Leviathan (Apōpi) were in heaven (Book of Hades, RP 12 13). Apōpi seems ultimately identical with Tiamat; but the details of the myth are Egyptian.

³ Schick and Baldensperger (PEFQ [98], p. 23; [99], p. 57) state that long worms and serpents abound in and near the emblems of healing (cp Nu. 215-9), and sacred wells are often also healing wells. The intermittent character of St. Mary's Well (connected with the lower Pool of Siloah) is accounted for in folklore by the story that a great dragon who lies there makes the water gush forth in his sleep. Cp also the dragon-myth connected with the Orontes, the serpent's pool, Jos. B/ v. 32, and the serpent myths of the ancient Arabs (WRS Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 131, 171), and see ZOHELETH.

Thus we have two views of the dragon represented, — as a friendly and as a hostile being. Into the wider subject suggested by this result we cannot enter now (cp SERPENT). It is more important to consider the question, How came these only half-understood myths, represented by Behemoth, Leviathan, Rahab, and the inclusive appellation Dragon, to be so prominent? We have already seen that they are not of native Palestinian growth, but (apart from the myth of the Dragon's Well) of Babylonian origin. Not that every important Dragon-myth in Asiatic countries must necessarily be derived ultimately from Babylon—this would be an unscientific theory—but that for the myths now under consideration the evidence points unmistakably to a Babylonian origin. If we ask how these myths came to be so prominent, the answer is that a great revival of mythology took place among the Jews, under Babylonian influences, in exilic and post-exilic times. Jewish folklore became more assimilated to that of the other nations, and the leaders of religion permitted what they could not prevent, with the object of impressing an orthodox stamp on popular beliefs. This has long since been noticed, especially by the present writer in a series of works (see also CREATION, § 23), where it is pointed out that the Dragon-myth comes from pre-Semitic (Babylonian) times, and where several explanations are indicated as perhaps equally historical.¹ Like other interpreters who used the mythological clue, however, he was not clear enough as to the nature of the conflict between the God of light and the serpent, referred to in Job 9:13 Is. 51:9 etc.² Continued study of the new cuneiform material has done much to clear up his difficulties, one of which may be expressed thus. The Babylonian epic spoke of Tiamat as having been destroyed by the God of light, whereas certain biblical passages appeared to describe the dragon as still existing 'in the sea,' as capable of being 'aroused' by magicians, and as destined to be slain by Yahwe's sword. Hence it seemed as if there was a Hebrew myth (of non-Hebraic origin) which represented the war between the God of light and the serpent of darkness as still going on, and Egyptian parallels seemed to teach us how to conceive of this.³ The defeat and destruction of the gigantic serpent Apōpi and his helpers, when chaos gave way to order and darkness to light, was not absolute and final. They still seemed to the Egyptians to menace the order of nature, and in his daily voyage the sun is threatened by the serpent, and has a time of anguish. When they see this, human folk seek to frighten the monster by a loud clamour, and so to help the sun. The sun's boatmen, too, have recourse to prayers and spear-thrusts. At last, paralysed and wounded, Apōpi sinks back into the abyss. Gunkel, however, has shown⁴ for the first time that Babylonian Birkat es-Sultān; the latter writer suggests that this may have helped to fix the name to the locality.

5. Babylonian origin of myth.

mythology will account for all the details of the biblical descriptions which an accurate exegesis will admit. We need not suppose a reference to the myth of the daily struggle between the Light-god and the serpent. The Tiamat story, as known to the Jews, was briefly this. At the commencement of creation, Tiamat was, according to some, destroyed, according to others, completely subdued and confined in the ocean which encompasses the earth. Without God's permission he can henceforth do nothing. Only the angelic powers, commissioned by God to keep watch over Leviathan, can 'arouse' him and even they 'shudder' as they do so (see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN). This form of the story became popular in later biblical times, because it met the requirements of apocalyptic writing. It was a necessity of biblical idealism to anticipate a return of the 'first things,' of Paradise and its felicity. Evil seemed to have been intensified; the reign of Tiamat was renewed, as it were, upon the earth. A deliverance as great as that wrought by Yahwē (a greater Marduk) of old must therefore be anticipated, and the struggle which would precede it would be as severe as that which took place at the creation. Then would 'the old things pass away, and all things become new.' It is not improbable, as Budge long ago pointed out (PSBA, [83], 6), that Tiamat in course of time acquired a symbolic meaning; certainly the serpent of Egyptian, and not less of Jewish, belief acquired one. The moralisation of the old dragon-myth is recorded in the mysterious but fascinating story of ANTICHRIST [q. v.]. On the twofold representation of Tiamat (dragon and serpent), see SERPENT, § 3f.

6. Later biblical times.

Into the dragon-myths of non-Semitic peoples frequently adduced to illustrate Job 38, it is not necessary to enter. The Semitic material has been growing to such a considerable mass that it is wise to restrict ourselves at present to this. Otherwise we might discuss a striking passage in The Times, Jan. 24, 1898, on the cry for alms in Hindu quarters for the recovery of the sun from the jaws of the dragon Rahu. Jan. 22, 1898, was the day of a solar eclipse. Cp ECLIPSE, § 2.

The fullest English investigation of the different forms taken by the mythic dragon is to be found in W. H. Ward's article 'Bel and the Dragon' (Am. Journal of 7. Literature. Sem. Lang. and Lit., Jan. 1898, p. 94 ff.).

In early Babylonian art the dragon does not represent Tiamat the chaos-dragon, but a destructive demon of pestilence or tornado. The sex of the dragon is not as a rule indicated in the primitive representations, even when the dragon is given together with a god (or goddess); an exception however is figured by Ward, in which the dragon appears to be male. In the Assyrian period, to which the representations of the conflict between Marduk and the Dragon belong, the dragon is of the male sex, which reminds us that the evil serpent Ahriman in Persian mythology is male. It is very possible that in the oldest Babylonian representations the dragon was female (cp DEEP, THE). With regard to the view (implied in parts of the OT) that the chaos-dragon was not slain, but only subdued by the Light-god, we may compare some Babylonian cylinders, older than Hammurabi, which represent the dragon as harnessed in a chariot and driven by Bel while a goddess stands on his back and wields the thunderbolt; or else the god stands on the back of the dragon. The Assyrian representations do not, it is true, show that the dragon was slain; but the natural supposition is that the conflict ended in his destruction.

DRAM, RV DARIC. The rendering of two late Hebrew words: (a) דַּרְקִיָּים, 1 Ch. 29:7 Ezra 8:27f.—i.e., apparently ΔΑΡΕΙΚΟΣ (Syr. ܕܪܝܩܐ, MH דרִיקוֹן, pl. דַּרְקִיָּוֹת [Dalman]), or cp Ass. dariku (pl. darikanu) 'piece of money' Muss-Arnolt; and (b) דַּרְקִיָּוֹת, 1 Ch. 29:7

darē-mōnim, Ezra 269 Neh. 770ff. † apparently ΔΡΑΧΜΗ.¹ Possibly a loan-word (Asiatic) in both Heb. and Gr., see Ew. GGA, 1855, 1392 ff.; 1856, 798; and cp BDB, s.v.

The Vss. give δραχμαί [L], derikhōna [Pesh. except 1 Ch.], solidus [Vg., in Neh. drachma]. But in 1 Ch. χρυσός [BA], δραχμαί [HP '93], דרין, Targ. (see Lag. Hag. 23), Pesh. apparently connected 'N with דרין 'lead.' In Ezra 827 εἰς τὴν ὁδὸν χαίματι [B]. . . δραχμαί [AL] agree in presupposing δδδν χαίματι, i.e., δ; || 1 Esd. 857 [56] BAL om. Ezra 269 μνᾶς [BA] || 1 Esd. 545 [44] μνᾶς [BAL]. Neh. 770-72 B&A om., but νομισματός [Sext.] v. 71, and νομισμασιν [N²] v. 72.

According to the commonly accepted view a and b are identical and mean 'darics.' Against this two objections may be urged: (1) the κ in b is left unexplained, and (2) the form a, which alone supports this meaning, is untrustworthy. In 1 Ch. it is doubtful if דרין may be a gloss: the amount of gold has been already mentioned, and in Ezra 827 the better reading is דרובותים (see above). The form דרובותין (δραχμαί) is preferable, not for this reason alone, but also on account of its identity with the Phen. דרבנות (pl.),² which, as the analogy from Gk. inscriptions shows, must represent δραχμαί. The occurrence of this Gk. (or Asiatic?) word in Ezra-Neh. is due perhaps to repeated glosses: cp Ezra 827 with 1 Esd. 857 and observe that in some of the passages (above) BA omit. DREAMS (הַלְמוּת), Zech. 102, etc.; see DIVINATION, § 2 (vi.).

DRESS. A complete discussion of the subject of ancient Israelitish dress (including toilet and ornaments) is impossible with our present limited knowledge. It is true, the Assyrian and Egyptian artists had keen eyes for costume; but trustworthy representations of Israelites are unfortunately few. It might be tempting to fill up this lacuna by noting the usages of dress in the modern East. This, however, would be an uncritical procedure. We might presume on obtaining more than analogies from the customs of the present; but common sense shows that to look for a Hebrew equivalent to every modern garment would be unnatural. Consequently, in spite of the scantiness of detail in the OT, we must base our conceptions upon OT evidence (viewed in the light of criticism) treated by the comparative method.

There are several general terms in Hebrew for 'dress,' 'garments,' 'attire.' It is needful to give

1. General terms. details, as there are distinctions of some importance which could not be brought out otherwise.

i. בגד, beged (cp perh. Ar. bijād; we cannot assume a root meaning 'to cover'; the verb בגר known to us means 'to deal treacherously'; it is perhaps a verb denom.)⁴ may be used for a garment of any kind 'from the filthy clothing of the leper to the holy robes of the priest,' for 'the simplest covering of the poor as well as the costly raiment of the rich and noble' [BDB]; for women's dress (Dt. 2417; cp Gen. 3814), for royal robes (1 K. 2230), and apparently once for the outer robe or MANTLE (2 K. 913); also for the coverlet of a bed (1 S. 1913 1 K. 11), and for the covering of the tabernacle furniture (Nu. 4613 P.).

2. לָבַשׁ, g'ōm, Ezek. 2724, AV 'clothes,' RV 'wrappings,' mg. 'bales.' Prof. Cheyne writes: 'The existence of an old Hebrew root לָבַשׁ "to roll together" is not proved by 2 K. 28 Ps. 13916; both passages are very doubtful, and can be emended with much advantage.'

plainly = גָּלִי in Is. 823, which Peiser identifies with Bab. gulinu, a kind of garment' (ZATW [97], 17348). Cp CHEST.

3. כְּלִי, keli, a word of the widest signification, is (like the German Zeug) used of garments in Dt. 225 (כְּלִי בָּרָךְ) Lev. 1349 (כְּלִי עֹר).

4. כְּסוּת, k'suth, 'covering,' Ex. 2110 2226 etc., restored by Grätz, Ball, and Cheyne in Gen. 4911 (MT כְּסוּת || לְבוּשׁ, περιβολή, pallium), and by Cheyne in Ps. 736 Prov. 710 (MT כְּסוּת, EV 'garment,' 'attire'). Cp כְּסוּת Is. 2318 (EV 'clothing'); see AWNING.

5. לְבוּשׁ, l'bus (the root לָבַשׁ 'to wear, put on' is found in all the Semitic languages), a general term (not so frequent as 1.); used of the dress of women (2 S. 124 Prov. 3122), etc. Cognates are כְּלִיבֹשׁ 2 K. 1022 (EV 'vestment') etc., and תְּלִבְשָׁה Is. 5917 'clothing.'

We turn now to the Hebrew terms denoting particular articles of dress. It is one of the defects of the EV

2. Special terms. that the same English word is often used to represent several distinct Hebrew terms, and that, vice versa, the same Hebrew term is rendered by different English words (promiscuously). This is due partly to the difficulty of finding an exact equivalent for many of the Hebrew terms, partly to our ignorance of their precise meaning, and the uncertainty of tradition as represented by the versions, Rabbinical exegesis,³ etc.

Of the numerous Hebrew terms denoting articles of dress, those referring to the feet are discussed under SHOE. For the various head-dresses (כִּימָר, etc.) see TURBAN. One of the special terms for garments worn about the body is עֹרֹת, 'esōr, 'kilt' or 'loin-cloth' (see GIRDLE).⁴ Out of this an evolutionary process has brought breeches (cp Ar. mī'sār), which, however, among the Hebrews appear first as a late priestly garment (viz. כְּסוּתִים); see BREECHES. For the ordinary under-garment worn next the skin (תַּחֲשִׁיבִּית, see TUNIC. The over-garment (corresponding roughly to the Gr. ἡμάτιον and Roman toga) varied in size, in shape, and in richness, and had several distinct names (šimlah, etc.), for which see MANTLE.

Certain classes and certain occasions required special dresses. The clothing of ambassadors is called מַדְיָוִים

3. Special garments. (medāwīm?), 2 S. 104 = 1 Ch. 194, EV 'garments.' A kindred word 'mad' (fem. middah, if the text of Ps. 1332 is correct)⁵ is used of the priestly garb in Lev. 610 [3], Ps. 134 (עֲדֻמָּא); of the outer garment of the warrior (plur. only)⁶ in Judg. 316 (EV 'raiment'), 1 S. 412 (EV 'clothes'), 1738 (AV 'armour,' RV 'apparel'), 184 (AV 'garments,' RV 'apparel'), and 2 S. 208 (AV 'garment,' RV 'apparel of war')⁷; 1 Esd. in all passages μανδύας, except 1 S. 412, where ἡμάτια. The mad of the warrior was perhaps some stiff garment which was a (poor) substitute for a coat of mail. In Ps. 10918 mad is used of the dress of the wicked tyrant

1 Others cp Ph. מִיָּת and Heb. מִיָּתָה (Ex. 3433 where Che. reads כִּקְנָה).

2 Others vocalise מִיָּת (ZDMG 37535; properly 'that which is set' upon one).

3 So for the obscure Aram. כִּימָר (Dan. 321 K²8) we find such remarkable variant renderings as 'hosen' (AV), 'tunics' (RV), and 'turbans' (RVmg.).

4 We may compare the saḥ of camel's or goat's hair which, like other primitive garments, long continued to form a garb of mourning. The saḥ was perhaps identical with the kilt of the ancient Egyptians, for which see Wilk. Anc. Eg. (2) 2322.

5 Che. (Ps. (2)) reads מִיָּתָה הַמִּדְיָוִי, 'on the surface of the desert.'

6 On 2 S. 208 see next note.

7 In 2 S. 208 הַמִּדְיָוִי should probably be cancelled; note the Pask, so often placed in doubtful passages. Read לְבוּשׁ כְּסוּת. See Lohr and cp We. ad loc. For other views see Klo., H. P. Sm.

DRESS

who is cursed (but the whole passage is in disorder; see Che. Ps. (2)). In the Talm. מָטָה is a robe distinctive of the Nāsi' or prince. On the priestly head-dress, see MITRE; the priests in later times indulged in sumptuous apparel.¹ In Talmudic times Rabbis wore a special dress, and were crowned until the death of Eliezer b. Azarya (Tosifia, Sotah, 15). In Babylonia a golden ordination robe was used at the conferring of the Rabbinical dignity. A festive garb was worn at the creation of an Elder (zāḥen); the Nāsi' had a special mantle, the Exilarch a girdle.² For the king's regalia see CORONATION, CROWN, § 2. On the warrior's dress we can add very little. RV^{mg} finds the military boot (ḥayit) in Is. 94 [3]; and a reference to the distinctive outer garment (maddim) of the warrior, and to his shoes, has been conjectured in Nah. 24a [3a].³ See also HELMET. For bridal attire (cp Is. 49:18 61:10, ἔνδυμα γάμου Mt. 22:11) see MARRIAGE, § 3, and for the garb of mourning (מִתְעַבְּרָה Is. 61:3, מִתְעַבְּרָה 2 S. 14:2), see MOURNING CUSTOMS.

With the exception of the swaddling-clothes of the newborn babe (hithullah, Job 38:9; cp verb in Ezek. 16:4; σπάργανον, Wisd. 7:4; cp Lk. 27:12), children seem to have had no distinctive dress. The boy Samuel wore a small me'il (see MANTLE), and if the lad Joseph possessed a special kuttōneth (see TUNIC), it was regarded by the narrator in Genesis as exceptional. In Talmudic times boys wore a peculiar shirt (חֵלֶק דְּרִיקָא Shabb. 134a).⁴

In ancient times, dress depended to a large extent on climatic considerations. The simplest and most primitive covering was the loin-cloth (see

4. History. GIRDLE), a valuable safeguard in tropical climates, adopted perhaps for this reason rather than from the feeling of shame to which its origin was afterwards traced (Gen. 3:7). The use of sandals in early times was not looked upon as an absolute necessity (see SHOES), and although the TURBAN in some form or other may be old, the custom of wearing the hair long was for very many a sufficient protection for the head.

It is impossible to say how early the ordinary Israelite assumed the two garments (tunic and mantle) which became the common attire of both sexes. The garments of the women probably differed in length and in colour from those of the men—Dt. 22:5 leaves no doubt as to the fact that there was some distinction. Several terms are common to the dress of both sexes (beged, kuttōneth, simlāh, etc.); for some distinctive terms see VAIL, and cp TUNIC, MANTLE. The Jewish prisoners pictured on the marble-reliefs of Sennacherib are bareheaded and wear short-sleeved tunics reaching to the ankles. This costume differs so markedly from the Assyrian, that the artist seems to have been drawing from life. Jehu's tribute-bearers on Shalmaneser's obelisk wear Assyrian dress and headgear, due probably to the conventionality of the artist. The Syrian envoy in a wall painting in the tomb of Hui at el-Kāb wears a dress so unlike the Egyptian that we seem once more in presence of an authentic record. The overgarment of this envoy, which is long and narrow, and is folded close to the body, is of blue and dark-red material richly ornamented; he has yellow underclothes with narrow sleeves and wears tight breeches. In the OT, however, there is no indication that such a costume was ever prevalent among the Israelites. For simplicity of attire it would not be easy to surpass the dress of the Sinaitic Bedawin (see WMM As. u. Eur. 140), and this simplicity once doubtless marked the garb of the Hebrew.¹ Later, life in cities and contact with foreign influences paved the way to luxury. The more elaborate dress of the Canaanite would soon be imitated. Several signs of increasing sumptuousness in dress are met with in the later writings. The dress at the court of Solomon is aptly represented as an object of admiration to an Arabian queen (מִתְעַבְּרָה 1 K. 10:5). One notes that it is in the later writings that several of the names for articles of dress appear for the first time. Extra garments and ornaments were added and finer materials used. The traditional materials of garments were wool and flax woven by the women; but now trade brought purple from Phœnicia, byssus from Egypt, and figured embroideries from Babylon (see EMBROIDERY). That silk was known in the time of Ezekiel (Ezek. 16:10 13) is doubtful (see COTTON, LINEN, SILK, WOOL). New luxurious costumes (cp מִתְעַבְּרָה, Ezek. 23:12 38:4†; מִתְעַבְּרָה, ib. 27:24 f.) are a frequent subject of denunciation in the later prophets, partly because of the oppression of the poor involved in the effort to extort the means of providing them, and partly because of the introduction of alien rites and customs encouraged by contact with foreign merchants.

¹ The exact meaning of מִתְעַבְּרָה Ex. 31:10 35:19 39:41 (AV 'cloths of service,' RV 'finely wrought garments') is very uncertain; see Di-Ry. ad loc., Ges.⁵. It is possible that the words are a gloss to מִתְעַבְּרָה (מִתְעַבְּרָה for which cp Ex. 28:24 Lev. 16:32, and the enumeration in v. 16:4.

DRESS

In later times intercourse with other peoples led to the introduction of fresh articles of apparel and new terms. Such for example is the essentially Grecian ptērastos (if correct) of 2 Macc. 4:12 (see CAP). Three obscure words denoting articles of dress, most probably of foreign origin, are mentioned in the description of the three who were cast into the fiery furnace (Dan. 3:21).² For Talmudic times Schürer (GVV 239 f.) notes the mention of סָגוּם (sagum) worn by labourers and soldiers, אֶסְטֵלָה (stola), סוּדָפְלוֹן (soudaplon; see NAPKIN), פִּלִּיֹן (philion), אֶסְטֵלָה (ἐμπόλια). Among under-garments are the דַּלְמָטִיקָה (dalmatica), according to Epiphanius (Hær. 15) worn by scribes; and the פַּרָגָאֻדִּיֹן (paragaudion), of which the equivalent paregōt is used in the Armen. Vers. for χιτών. To these may be added מַסְתָּרֶן (macioren) an outer garment, קִילִיִּן (κολόβιον), פִּלִּיֹן a fringed garment of fine linen (see FRINGES). Gloves are mentioned (חֶלֶק דְּרִיקָא Chelin, 16:16, etc.); but they were worn by workmen to protect their hands (cp also נִרְקָא Targ. on Ruth 4:7).³

Increased luxury of dress among the Israelites was accompanied by an excess of ornaments. Ornaments

5. Ornaments, of many kinds were worn by both sexes —primarily for protective purposes (as AMULETS), at a later time (when their original purpose was forgotten) to beautify and adorn the person. The elaborate enumeration of the fine lady's attire in Is. 3, though not from the hand of Isaiah (see ISAIAH, ii. § 5), is archaeologically important. Here the Hebrew women (of the post-exilic period?), following foreign customs, wear arm-chains, nose-rings, step-chains, etc., in great profusion. For these cp ORNAMENTS, and see the separate articles.

On the manner of treating the hair, see BEARD, CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, § 3; HAIR, MOURNING CUSTOMS. Women crimped their hair, bound it with veils (see VAIL) and GARLANDS (g.v.), etc. Later, the Roman habit of curling was introduced (Jos. BJ iv. 9:10).

Washing the body with water was usual on festival occasions, at bridals (Ezek. 16:9), at meals (Gen. 25:2 19:10 Lk. 7:44), before formal visits (Ru. 3:3), before officiating in the temple, in ritual purifications, and so forth. Rubbing the body with sand or sherds was also practised. Unguents prepared by female slaves (1 S. 8:13) or by male professionals (רֹקֵחַ) were used after washing (Ru. 3:3 Amos 6:6 etc.)¹; see ANOINTING, § 2, CONFECTIONARIES. After the Hellenistic period such festal customs became more and more elaborate.

² For a discussion of the terms see Cook, J. Phil. 26:366 ff. ('99).

The eye-lids of women were painted to make the eyes larger, kohl being used for the purpose (see PAINT). It is doubtful whether henna dye was placed on nails and toes.

The references in the EV to dress are so frequent and the symbolical usages so familiar that a passing glance at them may suffice. Food and clothing

6. OT allusions. are naturally regarded as the two great necessities of life (e.g., Gen. 28:20 1 Tim. 6:8). An outfit is called עֲדָת בְּגָדִים (Judg. 17:10). In Talmudic times it consisted of eighteen pieces (Jer. Shabb. 15). Clothes were made by the women (Prov. 31:22 Acts 9:39), but references to sewing are few (תפר, Gen. 3:7 Job 16:15 Eccles. 3:7 Ezek. 13:18, ἐπιπράττω Mk. 2:21).

Clothes were presented in token of friendship (1 S. 18:4; see WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 335), as a proof of affection (Gen. 45:22), and as a gift of honour (1 K. 10:25; cp Am. Tab. 270). Garments were rent (קרע, פִּרַם) as a sign of grief, of despair, of indignation, etc. (see MOURNING CUSTOMS). Shaking the clothes was a sign of renunciation and abhorrence (Acts 18:6; cp Neh. 5:13). Promotion was often accompanied by the assumption of robes of dignity (cp Is. 22:21). So Eleazar takes the robes of Aaron (Nu. 20:28), and Elisha the mantle of Elijah (2 K. 2); see also CORONATION. Conversely, disrobing might be equivalent to dismissal (2 Macc. 4:38). Rich people doubtless had large wardrobes; the royal wardrobe (or was it the wardrobe of the temple?) had a special 'keeper' (1 K. 22:14). The danger to such collections from moths (see MOTH) and from the so-called 'plague of leprosy' (see LEPROSY) was no doubt an urgent one. The simile of a worn-out garment (בִּלָּה, cp Dt. 8:4) is often employed (cp Is. 50:9 51:6 Ps. 102:26 [27]). Rags are called קִלְיוֹת הַתְּשׁוּבָה (Prov. 23:21 EV); cp also קִלְיוֹת קְלָחִים (Jer. 38:11 f. RV), 'old cast clouts and old rotten rags' (all apparently containing the idea of something rent (cp βάκος Mt. 9:16 Mk. 2:21).

To cast a garment over a woman was in Arabia equivalent to claiming her.² Robertson Smith (Kin. 87) cites a case from Tabari where the heir by throwing his dress over the widow claimed the right to marry her under the dowry paid by her husband, or to give her in marriage and take the dowry. This explains Ruth's words (Ruth 3:9) and the use of 'garment' to designate a woman or wife in Mal. 2:16 (Kin. 87, 269). A benevolent law, found already in the Book of the Covenant, enacts that every garment retained by a creditor in pledge shall be returned before sunset (Ex. 22:26); the necessity of this law appears from Am. 28 Ezek. 18:7 16; see PLEDGE.

D's injunction 'a man shall not put on the simlah of a woman,' 'a woman shall not wear the appurtenances (בְּלִי) of a man' (Dt. 22:5) may have been designed as a safeguard against impropriety; but more probably it was directed against the simulated changes of sex which were so prevalent and demoralising in Syrian heathenism.³ Quite obscure, on the other hand, is the law prohibiting the layman from wearing garments made of a mixture of linen and wool (שַׁעֲוָה, Dt. 22:11

² Hence some explain בָּהּ in Ex. 21:8 to mean that the master could not sell his female slave 'seeing that (he had placed) his garment (beget) over her.' See SLAVERY.

³ See Dr. ad loc., Frazer, Paus. 3:197, ASHORETH, § 2. It may be doubted whether in ancient times dressing boys as girls was due, as among later Orientals, to a desire to avert the evil eye.

Lev. 19:19; see LINEN, 7, n. 1). Such garments were worn by the priests;¹ and the law, which may, like the term itself, be of foreign origin, is at all events later than Ezek. 44:18. Another law, which ordered laymen to wear tassels or twisted threads upon the skirt of their simlah, seems to go back to a former sacred custom (see FRINGES). See, further, SHOE, § 4.

Garments had to be changed or purified upon the occasion of a religious observance (cp Gen. 35:2 Ex.

19:10) or before a feast (cp תְּלִיפוֹת, 'changes,' מִתְלַפְּוֹת, 'festal robes,' and Religion. see MANTLE).

Primarily, however, all festive occasions are sacred occasions, and there is therefore no real difference between best clothes and holy clothes. When a garment comes in contact with anything partaking of a sacred nature it becomes 'holy,' and, once 'holy,' it must never be worn save on 'holy' occasions.² This is why in early Arabia certain rites were performed naked or in garments borrowed from the sanctuary (We. Heid. (2) 56, 110). The same principle illustrates the command of Jehu to 'bring forth vestments for all the worshippers of Baal'; the vestments were in the custody of the keeper of the mettāhah (2 K. 10:22; text perhaps corrupt: see VESTRY). That certain rites among the Hebrews were performed in a semi-naked condition seems not improbable. The Ephod itself was once perhaps nothing more than a loin-cloth (cp 2 S. 6:14 16:20, and see EPHOD, § 1).³

Elijah's kilt ('ezor) of skin and the prophet's customary 'hairy mantle' (see MANTLE)—in later times often falsely assumed (Zech. 13:4)—remind us of the priests of the Palmētum who were dressed in skins (Strabo xvi. 4:18; for other analogies see RS (2) 437 f.);⁴ but there is always a tendency in cults to return to ancient custom in the performance of sacred rites, and, as Robertson Smith has shown, later priestly ritual is only a development of what was originally observed by all worshippers when every man was his own priest. The dressing of worshippers in skins of the sacred kind (cp ESAU) implies that they have come to worship as kinsmen of the victim and of the god, and in this connection it is suggestive to remember that the eponyms of the Levites and Joseph tribes are the 'wild-cow' (Leah) and the 'ewe' (Rachel) respectively. See LEAH, RACHEL.

Again, we note that clothing may be looked upon as forming so far part of a man as to serve as a vehicle of personal connection. The clothes thus tend to become identified with the owner, as in the custom alluded to in Ruth 3:9 above. The Arab seizes hold of the garments of the man whose protection he seeks, and 'pluck away my garments from thine' in the older literature means 'put an end to our attachment.' So a man will deposit with a god a garment or merely a shred of it, and even to the present day rag-offerings are to be seen upon the sacred trees of Syria and on the tombs of Mohammedan saints. They are not gifts in the ordinary sense, but pledges of the connection between worshipper and object or person worshipped (RS (2) 335 f.). Thus garments are offered to sacred objects, to wells (ib. 177), but more particularly to trees and idols (see NATURE WORSHIP).⁵ So 2 K. 23:7 speaks of the women who wove tunics (so Kto.) for the ashērah. The custom is not confined to the Semitic world, and instances of ¹ This is distinctly asserted by Jos. Ant. iv. 8:11. 'To pray for a blessing on the flax and sheep,' says Maimonides. This prohibition in the case of laymen was re-enacted under the Frankish emperors (Capitularium, 646). It is just possible that the law aimed at marking more distinctly the priest from the layman.

³ Verse 14b, however, may be an addition. For Ex. 20:26 cp BREACHES, 3.

⁴ In Zeph. 1:8 the wearing of 'strange garments' (כְּלִיבֵשׂ זָרִי) is associated with foreign worship (cp v. 9).

DRINK OFFERING

draped images in Greece are collected by Frazer (Paus. 2574 f.). 'The Greek images,' he observes, 'which are historically known to have worn real clothes seem generally to have been remarkable for their great antiquity.' The custom does not seem to be indigenous; it was probably borrowed from the East.¹ The counterpart of the custom of offering a garment to the sanctified object is the wearing of something which has been in contact with it. At the present day in Palestine the man who hangs a rag upon a sacred tree takes away, as a preservative against evil, one of the rags that have been sanctified by hanging there for some time (see PEFO, 1893, p. 204). The custom of wearing sacred relics as charms is clearly parallel. Now, just as the priests had their special garments, so particular vestments were used for purposes of divination. Thus a magician wears the clothes of Er-ti—i.e., Eridu, a town mentioned often in Babylonian incantations (Del. Ass. HWB 371b). Another instance of the wearing of special dress is cited by Friedrich Delitzsch in Baer's Ezek. p. xiii. An important parallel to this custom appears in Ezekiel's denunciation of the false prophetesses² and the divination to which they resorted (Ezek. 13:17-23). Two special articles are mentioned: (a) חֲסִיתֹת, ḥsithōth, 'bands' or 'fetters'³ worn upon the arms (cp the use of FRONTLETS [q.v.] and (b) מִנְתֵּי, 'long mantles' (ἐπιβόλαια [BAQ], περιβ. [A v. 21], Pesh. taksithā, mā'nā, EV incorrectly KERCHIEFS), which were placed over the head of the diviner.⁴ It becomes very tempting to conjecture that these garments were not merely special garments, but the garments actually worn by the deity or sacred object itself, since it is plausible to infer that they would be held to be permeated with the sanctity of the deified object and that supernatural power might be thus imparted to the wearer.⁵ It is true, the link is still missing to connect the diviner's garb with that of the clothed image; but such a conjecture as this would seem to explain how the use of 'Ephod,' as an article of divination, in its twofold sense of image and garment (in which it has been clothed), might have arisen (cp Bertholet on Ezek. 13:18); see EPHOD.

exceptions (see 1, below) this now misleading term has given place in RV to a more modern equivalent.

The tribal subdivision of which the 'alliph' is the head is called דִּמְיָא 'claph.

2. דִּמְיָא, in pl., of the 'dukes' (RV 'princes') of Sihon (Josh. 13:21). Elsewhere the word is always translated 'princes' or 'principal men' (Ps. 83:11 [12] Ezek. 32:30 Mic. 5:4 [5]).

DUMAH (דִּמְיָא). 1. In Gen. 25:14 (דִּמְיָא [ADE], דִּמְיָא [L]) and 1 Ch. 1:30 (דִּמְיָא [BAL]) Dumah appears as a son of Ishmael. The form דִּמְיָא suggests comparison with Adumu, the 'fortress of the land of Aribi' (KB 2:131), which, as Esar-haddon tells us, Sennacherib had conquered.

2. If the Dumah of Gen. is the same as Adumu, it may be tempting to suppose with Winckler (AT Unt. 37) that the heading 'oracle of Dumah' (Is. 21:11) also refers to this 'fortress.' The prophecy itself, however, seems to forbid this; it begins 'One calleth to me out of Seir.' More probably not Adumu but Udumu, i.e. Edom, is meant (Che. Proph. Is. 1:130); in other words, 'Dumah' is a corruption of 'Edom' (דִּמְיָא 'Idumaias' [BNAQ]; see Sw.), facilitated perhaps by the neighbourhood of Massa (maššā, v. 11, being misunderstood) and Tema (v. 14); see Gen. 25:14 f. It is a less probable view that 'Dumah' ('silence'—i.e., desolation) is a mystical name for Edom (דִּמְיָא 'Idumaias'). See also ISHMAEL, § 4 (4), EDOM (footnote on name of Edom).

3. There is another (apparently) enigmatical heading in Is. 21:1 ('Oracle of the wilderness of the sea'), which should probably be emended into 'Oracle of Chaldaea' (חֲדָא; see SBOT). Both headings are undoubtedly late.

4. In Josh. 15:52† the reading followed by EV is found in some MSS and edd. (see Ginsb.), and being supported by the OS (דִּמְיָא; see below) is very probably more correct than the Rumah of MT (רומה) [Bä. p. 86, Gi.]; so Pesh. and Ῥεμμα [B] ρουμα [AL]. In favour of this is the fact that the name is assigned to a town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned in the same group with Hebron and Beth-tappuah. For there is still a place called ed-Dōmeh, 2190 ft. above the sea-level, 10 m. SW. from Hebron and 12 SE. from Beit-Jibrin, a position which coincides nearly with the definition of Jer. and Eus. (OS 1164 25068), 'a very large village now in the Daroma,' 17 m. southward from Eleutheropolis. DURA (דִּירָא, τοῦ περιβολοῦ [Ῥ7], περιβολον [Syr. mg.], Δεειρα [Theod.] = דִּירָא), the name of a plain 'in the province of Babylon' where Nebuchadrezzar's golden image was set up (Dan. 3:1). If the word is Aram., it should mean 'dwelling-place' or 'village'; but Ῥ's rendering, even if a guess, may suggest that the name had come down from old Babylonian times and means 'wall.' In fact, three localities are mentioned in the tablets as bearing the name Dūru,

1 In all the passages quoted there may have been a confusion between דִּירָא and דִּירָא.

3 Udumu, as Wi. now reads (but cp GI 1:180), was the name of a city in the land of Gar, which may be identical with the Adumu of Esar-haddon, and from this city the land of Udumu may have derived its name. Still the remark in the text appears to be sound.

'wall' or 'walled town' (Del. Par. 216), and several Babylonian cities had names compounded with 'Dur'.¹ That the writer of the narrative knew any of these places, appears improbable. Possibly the old name Dūru had attached itself in his time to the plain adjacent to the remains of the walls of Babylon. At any rate, the scene of the dedication of the image must in the writer's mind have been close to Babylon.
